lowing the fraternity to return to campus with a clean record, Young said.

He added that he is "fairly confident" that the IFC will not seriously punish the fraternity for Sunday's citations.

"Since they've been back on campus, they've been a very good chapter," Young said. "They've been very good with local staff.

Rush and have sponsored a number of risk management programs.

"Actually, I think this is the first time they've had a social-related problem."

The university, however, may view the incident differently, Young said. Even if Zeta Psi does not receive sanctions from IFC, the fraternity can still be punished, he added.

"If the university is really upset, they're Syracuse University — they can do whatever they want," he said. "In terms of IFC, the incident is not serious enough to get them kicked off."

But IFC-imposed sanctions cannot be appealed, he added.

"From an IFC standpoint, (Zeta Psi) is not going to be able to party for a while," he said.

Sunday's party started with 20 to 25 close friends, Lindgren said. But the house was soon overwhelmed with party-hunters, he said.

"We were very pleased to see the police," Lindgren said.

"We happily helped escort people out of the house," Derek Wallace, Zeta Psi financial chairman, said he arrived at the house the moment police arrived.

Wallace received one of the seven citations.

"Many people were forced to leave the bars," said Wallace, a senior policy studies and public relations major. "They were looking for some place to party."

More than 100 people were already being turned away from the house when the police arrived, Wallace said.

"I think the number of people police reported may be exaggerated," he added. "But I'm not positive. I'm not going to argue about it."

Drinks for the party were brought by the group of friends, Wallace said.

"There wasn't anything to drink," he said. "What started as a small party turned into a huge problem."

  example, the recording of a walrus and a baby bear were the basis for the language of the ‘Star Wars’ character Chewbacca.

  Many of the sounds he uses came from SU, Burtt said. With his father as a chemistry professor, he and his siblings created many sounds that could be used in university labs, he said.

  "One sound is a microphone used for completely unrelated physics and I apologize to you for using the microphone," he said. "There is no sound in space.

  There are many words that describ ed, "I am fascinated to see where the sound of music can be found in the 'Star Wars' series."

  To explain the use of sound in a movie to the audience, Burtt narrated a short film called "Adventures in Sound Design."

  "One of the most challenging things in creating the sound is making sure that it fits with the visual elements and the action on screen," said Burtt. "It's important to create an emotional connection with the audience through sound.

Syracuse University senior Fabiola Charles is featured in "Take a Look at Life in Post-Apartheid South Africa through the Eyes of a Young Black Woman and Two Much Older Men in Athol Fugard's 'Valley Song.'" The show, presented by Contemporary Theatre of Syracuse, features Syracuse University senior Fabiola Charles. See the show at 7:30 p.m. today and Saturday at Happy Endings cafe and coffeehouse, 317 S. Clinton St. Tickets are $15. Discounts are available to students for advance tickets. Call 425-0405 for information.

Our very own
SU senior John Murray and junior Adam Hughes co-direct "Search and Destroy," a play by Howard Korder which runs this weekend at the Black Box. Tickets for the show, featuring 11 SU students, are free but must be reserved in advance. Limit of two tickets per person, and reservations can only be made by calling 443-8506 between noon and 4 p.m.

Comic relief
Free live entertainment will be held tonight in Perc Place. A comedy show begins at 9 p.m. An improv show, an unscripted version of "Who's Line is it Anyway?" put on by the Broken Compass Players 2000, begins at 11:15 p.m.

Cinema sounds

Poetic evening
Listen to SU students Nic Darling, Hector Padraza and Desha Lightfoot at "What's in Your Pockets? An Undergraduate Poetry Reading." today from 4 to 6 p.m. at 500 Hall of Languages. Graduate student Janet Ridgeway is the host. There will be free pizza and refreshments.

St. John’s (+14.5) at Duke
Sat., Feb. 25 at 9 p.m. (CBS)

With the Blue Devils’ loss in a game between two of the nation’s most talented teams, the Blue Devils played one of the most entertaining games of the 1998-99 season, a 92-88 Duke win at Madison Square Garden. Although Duke stars Elton Brand and Corey Maggette and St. John’s Ron Artest both nabbed the Hoya in the National Invitational Tournament, with talent to help their chances of making the Big East. It was a stellar play he showed in Wednesday’s game. The Hoyas believe in their young talent, are right in the middle of the Big East pack and can hope for an NIT bid at best. Jameal Wilkins and Rhse Gibson, Georgetown’s two seniors, are not even major contributors. They combine to average five points and 13 rebounds per game. Georgetown has the best rebounding margin in the Big East (+6) but it also has the worst field goal percentage (40.4). Shooking the basketball has not been a problem for Syracuse, though. The Orange’s 47 percent mark is the best in the Big East.

For Blackwell and his two senior SU mates — point guard Jason Hart and center Etan Thomas — Monday’s match up will mark his last home game in the Carrier Dome hardwood.

To continue the stellar play he showed in Wednesday’s 91-65 beating of Villanova. The SU guard dished out a career-high 14 assists, while scoring nine points and nabbing three steals.

The entire Syracuse team played its best basketball since the Orange’s loss to Florida in the Carrier Dome hardwood.

Kevin Braswell leads the Georgetown offensive charge. The sophomore guard — who averaged 14.2 points per game, Miami will look to contain him in search of a regular season sweep. Miami’s got back to the way it played in its first meeting between the teams this year. The Irish, however, will have to contend with the Blue Devils’ top two stars. The Georgetown team has gone as far as the entire season as head coach at Georgetown and the stars of the Blue Devils have been a problem for Syracuse, said Esherick. The Hoyas have two superstars, but neither of them are in the top 20. Keeping Perry and the other Orangemen off the boards is key for the Miami defense. It’s important to limit SU to one shot each trip up the floor, Harmony said. Although Syracuse doesn’t boast a glowing record, Harmony remains cautious.

They can be a tough team,” Harmony said. “They want to jump on them right away and play with a lot of intensity. If you can’t take people lightly, or that will hurt you.”

For the rest of the season, Miami needs to play hard to the game’s end, listen to their coach and play the game they want to play. They need to have some fun and a good time on the court.

Orangewomen head to Miami, hope to break skid

BY ALISON HISCHAK

Nothing seems to change for the Syracuse Orangewomen basketball team.

Holding steady at the 10-win mark, the Orangewomen prepare for their final two regular season matchups, hoping to find No. 11. The team sat at the same point last year and failed to pull an 11th win out of the last five contests.

The way Syracuse has played lately, the squad might not find another victory this season either.

Whether the team struggled due to poor shooting or costly turnovers, the results have been consistent — four consecutive losses. The latest debacle featured 22 SU turnovers and a blown 13-point halftime lead as Seton Hall stole a 55-49 victory Wednesday afternoon at Manley Field House.

Syracuse forward Beth Rocord blamed part of the loss on the team's mentality.

"We sometimes try too hard to grab on to anything," Rocord said. "We just need a kick of energy to grab on to the next game."

The Orangewomen (10-15, 3-11 Big East) will try to snap out of their slump Saturday when they travel to Miami for a 2 p.m. tilt.

"We need just a win," Rocord said. "We need just a little feeling of success. We can't throw in the towel. We have to play like we did in the beginning of the year."

SU showed potential early in the season during its non-conference schedule. It won its first four games, downing opponents such as Northeastern, Brown and Akron.

The Orangewomen found the right mix again two weeks ago, when they posted back-to-back wins against St. John's and Georgetown. Now they look to rediscover their touch at Miami (11-14, 5-8) and an 83-68 loss by Notre Dame.

Georgetown — a team SU beat 75-62 — and the terrific players that have participated, such as Patrick Beverley, Derrick Coleman, Alonzo Mourning and Billy Owens.

For some, however, the rivalry doesn't seem the same now for several reasons.

Beginning in the 1986-87 season, an expanded Big East conference dictated the two teams meet once a year. Then, 13 games into last season, legendary Hoyas head coach John Thompson — the winningest coach in Georgetown history and the one of the all-time favorite focuses of Dome fans' heckling — retired.

Thompson leaving made SU head man Jim Boeheim the lone Big East bench general left from the conference's start back in 1979.

"Obviously, we would need some more wins and to do well in the Big East Tournament," Esherick said. "But beating a team like Syracuse on its home court would be very good for our team's post-season chances."

While the Hoyas scrape for wins and the rivalry's makeup changes, it doesn't seem to be affecting the mindset of the current crop of SU players.

"It's the same for us," Syracuse senior forward Ryan Birkwell said. "We go out and look at it as one of those big-time rivalries. The players may not be the same who were here, but the rivalry's still there."

The games played became part of campus lore.

"It's helped to define the league," Georgetown head coach Craig Esherick said. "There's a reason CBS wants to televise it. It's a game that's attractive for fans — and not just Syracuse and Georgetown fans."
SUNY board nears decision

A Syracuse engineering executive is one vote away from becoming the new president of the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry. SUNY Chancellor Robert King announced Wednesday his recommendation of Cornelius Murphy to replace current ESF President Ross Whaley.

Murphy is the president and director of O’Brien and Gere, a Syracuse-based engineering consulting firm that specializes in environmental conservation.

The SUNY Board of Trustees will make a final vote Tuesday to approve Murphy, said Curtis Bauer, chairman of ESF’s board of trustees.

The presidential search began more than one year ago, when Whaley announced his resignation from his position of 15 years. Bauer said Whaley resigned to pursue the establishment of Syracuse’s first charter school. He received permission in January from the SUNY Board of Trustees to open the school, serving 542 students from kindergarten through sixth grade. The school, set to open this fall, will focus on math and science.

He said he plans to remain in the SUNY system as a professor.

An ESF search committee solicited candidates for Whaley’s re-

Pope visits Mount Sinai

ST. CATHERINE, Egypt

Realizing a personal dream of making a biblical pilgrimage, Pope John Paul II prayed Saturday for religious tolerance in a simple tree-shaded garden under the peak revered as the place where Moses received the Ten Commandments.

The visit to Mount Sinai was the highlight of his trip to Egypt and the first major stop of his planned multivisit to the Middle East. During the visit, the pontiff also scheduled to visit Jerusalem, Bethlehem and other places in Israel and the Palestinian territories.

German party loses vote

B E R L I N — Germany's troubled Christian Democratic Union suffered a crushing defeat in elections Sunday in the northern state of Schleswig-Holstein, as voters revealed the depth of their dismay with the country's mainstream conservative party in the wake of a massive financial scandal. In the first electoral test since the scandal broke three months ago, exit polls showed Christian Democratic turnout finishing a distant second behind the rival Social Democratic Party, which scored a surge in its bid to form a governing coalition with the environmental Green Party.

The Social Democrats won about 40 percent of the vote, while the CDU won 6 percent.

More than 20 alumni brothers from Rochester and Cornell universities came to the Feb. 10 National Supreme President's Initiation of SAM and its three returning members and 37 new members, said Evan Salama, public relations chair for SAM.

The National Supreme President's Initiation is a ceremony in which an individual chapter is welcomed into the national fraternity, Salama said.

About two years ago, SAM lost membership and did not return to campus, Salama said. The brothers sold the house on Ostrom Avenue that had been owned by the fraternity for more than 30 years, he added.

"It's a very prestigious fraternity and we want everyone to know it's back," Salama said. SAM is home to several SU alumni, including sportscaster Mary Albert and Heisman trophy winner Ernie Davis, Salama said.

Bernie Fine, SU assistant men's basketball coach, helped the fraternity return to campus and is now working as SAM's advisor, Treasurer Allen Yesiltepev said. Currently, the brothers are considering a philanthropic event with Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority to host a meal for the homeless, Abdi said. They are planning activities throughout the semester, he added.

"We're all very excited about Samy's return," Salama said. "We plan on making a big impression on Syracuse University. We are a very diverse group of people."

The case was closed with arrest, the report said.

Jason Turner, a Hotel Syracuse employee, assaulted a fellow employee and SU graduate student Sunday morning, according to a police report.
The student was arguing with Turner when Turner punched the student in the face, the report said.

When police arrived at the hotel, 500 S. Warren St., and attempted to arrest Turner, he walked away and attempted to attack the student a second time. He appeared intoxicated, the report said.

Police eventually managed to handcuff Turner and arrest him on charges of disorderly conduct, the report said.

The case was closed with Turner's arrest, the report said.

An SU sophomore reported Tuesday that he found his apartment's second-floor bathroom window damaged, according to a police report.

Nothing appeared to be missing from his apartment, the report said.

The sophomore left his apartment on the 200 block of Kensington Road at about 9:30 p.m. and returned about 40 minutes later to find the screen of the window torn, the report said. The student found the window unlocked, the report added.

Police observed a single set of fingerprints in the snow outside of the window on the roof of the house, the report said.

The fingerprints indicated that someone walked through the bathroom window to the edge of the roof and jumped off. The roof is 8 feet high, the report said.

Several days after filing the report, the sophomore informed police that his roommate was the person who damaged the window. He offered no further information on the incident.

The case is closed, the report said.

An unidentified person broke the windows of a car belonging to an SU employee early Friday morning and stole a compact disc player worth $300, according to a police report.

The housing department employee parked his 1983 Pontiac Grand Prix on the 400 block of Park Street when he went to visit a friend, the employee said. He returned to the car and found the windshield, passenger side window and vent window broken and the stereo window broken, he added.

"Anything can happen," the employee said. "It's not a good side of town."

An SU professor found both driver's side tires of his Ford Expedition slashed on the morning of Feb. 18, in what he believes was a deliberate act of violence against him, according to a police report.

The culprit slashed the tires with a knife and did not attempt to enter the vehicle, the report said.
The professor and his wife discovered the damage to the car, parked at their residence on the 100 block of Windsor Place, when they were preparing to go out of town for the day, the professor said.

"We couldn't go," he said. "It was a big hassle. Little things like this add up."

The professor said that he believes that he was the deliberate target of the act. He has recently been the target of previous incidents involving suspicious behavior.

There were three other cars parked on the street that were not disturbed, the report said.

"It's not the kind of place you have one car's tires slashed in a whole line," the professor said. "It's possible that it was out of vengeance."

An unidentified person stole property valuing $975 from an SU student's Plymouth Acclaim that was parked in the lot at Manley Field House, according to a police report.

The thief took a compact disc player, 25 compact discs, a radar detector and a pair of silver Oakley sunglasses, the report said.

An SU employee discovered Feb. 9 that her car was scratched from the front to the back with a knife, according to a police report. The car was parked in the backyard of the employee's home on the 1340 block of Court Street.

The employee reported that she thought the incident was a deliberate act of vandalism toward her, the report said.

"I'm having an alarm put on my car Friday," the employee said.

The damage totaled about $1,000, the report said.

Diallo verdict leaves questions of trust

Dollars won't bring Amadou Diallo back from the dead. A harsh verdict in a likely civil lawsuit may be the only remaining act of punishment after four New York City police officers were acquitted Friday of murder and other charges in the Feb. 4, 1999 slaying of Diallo, an African immigrant.

Our justice system forces us to place all of our trust in the jury's judgement. The 12-member Diallo jury sat in a box for one month and listened to each piece of testimony presented to them. They clustered themselves in a room for 20 hours and emerged with a verdict: The officers did not murder Diallo.

But the fact remains that Diallo died needlessly. He was unarmed, defenseless and done. While the jury found the four officers criminally innocent, this cannot justify the fact that they killed an innocent man.

An imminent wrongful death suit by Diallo's survivors and action by the New York Police Department could — and should — cost the officers millions of dollars and their jobs.

Police departments build their strength on the community's trust in them. And when officers put 41 bullets in an unarmed man, it shatters this precious trust.

When police officers draw their guns and open fire on a man without the certainty of a clear and present danger, something is most certainly wrong. When juries return "not guilty" verdicts like these, it removes responsibility from the force and assures the community that they are safe.

City dwellers should put their own fingers on the trigger of justice by demanding accountability from those who protect the streets.

"The amount was little," Catfield says. "I always wanted to become an excellent flute player and a professional soccer player." He compromised — he became an insurance salesman for two years after graduating from college in 1957, and a terrible flute player.

"I wanted to be a world-famous seesawing policyhead at the Ronalds Gateway in Carnegie Hall in '82. I never had the chance to practice due to laziness on my part. That's the biggest regret of my life," Catfield says.

Then he takes out his flute and plays a familiar version of the song "We Are the Champions." When asked about his love life, Catfield honestly says: "I'm not sure if I've ever been in love before."

But years ago, he had a crush on this Polish girl who lived in Queens. "I was shy and precarious at the same time," he says. "I decided to buy her a white rose on her birthday. I stood outside her apartment in Queens and rang the doorbell. She came out and told me I had no potential. She slammed the door in my face. After that, I gave up hope entirely." That sums up Catfield's romantic experiences.

I would not call myself a dear friend of Catfield's, for I'm only a frequent acquaintance. But I appreciate his humor and I respect him for who he is and what he has been through. His philosophy of life is just as degenerate as his humor: "You gotta do what you gotta do," I guess Catfield is my version of "but first, let me explain the reasoning, then me the good things in life never change."

I haven't seen Catfield Sinski for three weeks now. Last time when he said he was going to California to direct pornographic movies, I thought he was joking. The self-proclaimed "Futuretive Tanning Center" in the Marshall Square Mall has always puzzled me. I wondered if it's a secret CIA headquarters coated in tanning oil and surrounded by bronzed sorority sisters. As my friend Catfield Sinski proclaims, "What's the thrill of getting tanned like roasted pigs in the middle of winter? We never went to the Caribbean."

New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani stepped forward in defense of the department. He sticks by his belief that the NYPD serves the world's model for law enforcement. But justice cannot be served, however, by ignoring problems or glossing over them.

Catfield is a 35-year-old retired librarian who fought briefly in the Gulf War. Though he is of a Russian descent, he often claims, "My great-grandmother slept with Napoleon," Catfield says.

He immigrated to this country from St. Petersburg when he was twelve. Catfield got his first name from his alcoholic father, who fell in love with a cartoon character. "My father was so drunk he couldn't spell Garfield," he quips.

Catfield speaks with a Russian accent because he has "elected to do so." In America, he says, people are better off with a European accent. "But if you are Asian, you better learn to speak with no accent," he says. "That's the main survival skill."

Catfield has an incredible wry sense of humor. His one-liners are priceless. When we discussed his Russian accent, he says, "That's the main survival skill." "But if you are Asian, you better learn to speak with no accent," he says. "That's the main survival skill."

Then he takes out his flute and plays a familiar version of the song "We Are the Champions." When asked about his love life, Catfield honestly says: "I'm not sure if I've ever been in love before."

But years ago, he had a crush on this Polish girl who lived in Queens. "I was shy and precarious at the same time," he says. "I decided to buy her a white rose on her birthday. I stood outside her apartment in Queens and rang the doorbell. She came out and told me I had no potential. She slammed the door in my face. After that, I gave up hope entirely." That sums up Catfield's romantic experiences.

Forbes supporters must now turn to Bush camp

To the Editor:

Steve Forbes, the man I originally supported for U.S. President, is no longer in the presidential race. He fought hard for conservative principles, but, in the end, he was unsuccessful. Supporters of conservative principles should remember that while our candidate is no longer in the presidential race, our ideas of tax reform, Social Security reform and the protection of the unborn live on.

It is now time for the former supporters of Steve Forbes as well as all conservatives to unite behind a conservative candidate. The candidate must unite behind George W. Bush.

Gore Bush deserves conservative support for a number of reasons. First, he is committed to keeping the Republican Party pro-life. The Governor has been endorsed by the American Conservative Union. His chief opponent, Sen. John McCain, is an ally of specimen liberals in the Washington press corps.

Second, Gore Bush has proposed a Reaganesque tax cut that will millions of families to keep millions of their hard-earned money. Senator McCain's tax cut proposal is virtually identical to the liberal proposal put forward by President Bill Clinton and Vice President Al Gore.

Third, George W. Bush will oppose any campaign finance reform bill that limits the First Amendment rights of American citizens. Senator McCain, on the other hand, has made his McCain-Peiling campaign finance reform bill the centerpiece of his presidential campaign. The McCain-Peiling plan is opposed by everyone from the American Civil Liberties Union to the National Right-to-Life Committee because it would be an unconstitutional restriction on freedom of speech.

I believe the choice is clear. Any American who believes in less government, lower taxes and protection for the unborn should support Gov. George W. Bush for President.

placement through advertising. Bauer said.
“We used the normal methods used for hiring,” Bauer said. “There are publications for advertising read by nearly everyone in academia.”

About 40 applicants responded, he added. The committee then pared the list down to four candidates, Bauer said.

Murphy was joined by finalists William Cole Jr., executive vice president for academic affairs at Lamar University; Stephen Jones, director of the Alabama Cooperative Extension System; and Larry Nielsen, director and professor in the school of forest resources at Pennsylvania State University.

The committee made their recommendation to the ESF Board of Trustees at a Feb. 11 meeting, said Matthew Renaud, the student representative to the ESF board.

The ESF board then ranked the four applicants by preference. Their first choice usually reflects the final decision unless there is a major conflict with the preference of the SUNY board, Renaud said.

“Usually, from what I’ve gathered from hearing stories from other board members, the school’s board of trustees’ recommendation is usually what happens,” he said. “Especially for ESF, which is a specialized school, they really listen to what the board has to say because we know the school best.”

The ESF board’s rankings were sent Feb. 23 to King, who is a member of the SUNY board. King suggested Murphy as a first choice to the board, followed by a second candidate. Bauer declined to name the second candidate.

“They seemed to have the attributes we prescribed in the beginning for the kind of person who could fill the bill for the presidency,” Bauer said.

The board must now approve King’s recommendation to formally appoint Murphy as president, he said.

Spanish Latin American studies major. The consortium is an organization that monitors working conditions in factories that produce clothing for universities, Prediletto said.

SU, however, uses the Fair Labor Association to monitor its factory conditions. This group is operated by corporations and includes no unionized representation, Prediletto said. It also does not have a code regarding women’s rights or the right to organize, he added.

Prediletto called for a switch in allegiance.

The Syracuse New York Public Interest Research Group began the campaign last fall and the coalition has continued to support it this semester, Prediletto said.

Members sent more than 200 postcards this semester daily to the university’s Auxiliary Services. The postcards are signed by different students expressing concerns about the Fair Labor Association.

He added that members foresaw the protest being more successful.

“A lot of time and money was spent for something that wasn’t really seen,” Prediletto said. “We hadn’t planned it out very well.”

The protesters were not upset about being escorted out of the game, Prediletto said. They did not check into the regulations of the home before attempting the protest and understood security officials’ reason for escorting them out, he added.

Korf said she expects to receive a packet of information soon regarding the issue. She said she plans to discuss it with the sorority presidents after which they can reach a collective decision regarding the initiative.

“That way we can sit down as Panhel and as presidents and reach some sort of resolution,” Korf said. “We’re not sure how it’s going to affect things there. There are so many details in each sorority’s resolution.”

SU’s Panhel hopes to encourage every campus sorority to agree on an action so they will not have one sorority following one set of rules, and another sorority following a different set of rules, Korf said.

“My job here is to discuss it with the presidents and make a decision that is fair for all chapters,” Korf said. “We want all sororities to be on the same level.”

Public Safety and Stadium Control refused to comment.

Students only displayed the banner for a short period of time and as a result the message was not clearly relayed, Prediletto said.

“I didn’t really see it,” said Libby Ryan, a freshman retail major. “I just saw them rolling it up after security made them take it down.”

But even for students that did see the signs, the message was not clearly conveyed, said Megan Auman, a freshman visual merchandising major and contributing photographer for The Daily Orange.

“It looked like they were trying to get people to sign something,” said Auman, who attended the game as a spectator.

The coalition first opposed university involvement with the Fair Labor Association last year when negotiations with the organization were taking place, Prediletto said.

“Now that there’s an alternative, we should support that,” he said.

With four-and-a-half minutes to go in Sunday's game against Georgetown, the Orange needed to pick up its game.

Hitting a baseline floater from DeShaun Sims, Orange point guard John Wallace tried to break free of the Hoyas' defense. After reversing himself from the baseline, Wallace found himself with the ball in his hand and the clock ticking.

The senior point guard missed the shot and the ball was turned over. The Hoyas gained possession and the clock went back to zero.

With just over two minutes left in the game, the Orange needed to find their rhythm. They did, scoring nine straight points to put the game out of reach.

The Orange's defense held the Hoyas to just 27 points in the second half, allowing the Orange to cruise to a 67-52 victory.

Jam Session provides smiles, donation

BY KEVIN LEITZELL
Staff Writer

Smiles filled the faces of hundreds of area children and laughter filled the air at Manley Field House on Saturday afternoon.

The Syracuse basketball team made the local children feel right at home during the Fifth Annual Jam Session.

“Jam Session is a community service event featuring a charity basketball contest between the SU basketball team and the Syracuse media,” Former SU and current St. Louis Rams tight end Roland Williams founded the event in 1996.

“This whole event was initially started to give the kids a chance to interact with the athletes, come up on the Hill and see what a piece of college life is about,” Williams said. “I saw a lot of kids laughing and saying how great it was. That’s what it is all about, letting the kids come up and have that kind of experience.”

While the game was for charity, the football squad had revenge on its mind, having lost the previous two games.

SU gained its vengeance, using an array of special 20-point hoops to down the media 146-133.

The Orangemen jumped out to a quick 7-0 lead. Easy jumpers and 3-pointers by the football squad had the media down early.

Both teams traded baskets for five minutes until the long ball proved effective for the media. WTIT-TV’s Rob King and former Syracuse basketball great Roosevelt Bouie each hit 20-point shots — located in specific circles outside the 3-point line — for the media, pushing it to a 44-38 first-half lead.

The football team led 65-59 at halftime. Rookie wide receiver Maurice Jackson bombed away on a 3-pointer right before halftime was open to all competitors.

In between leading the football team to victory, Campbell stuffed a 360-degree, one-handed slam to qualify for the second round of the contest.

In the first round, SU high jumper Marc Gagnon earned a standing ovation for one of his three-handed slams. The 6-footer did not know he could participate in the contest until two days earlier.

With little preparation, though, he slammed some of the most magnificent slams of the afternoon.

“It was a lot of stuff I’ve done just playing around with my brother,” Gagnon said. “I didn’t have time to make anything new or work on any harder stuff.”

Gagnon failed to make any of his second-round slams to qualify for the title.

“It might not have mattered, as the 5-foot-8 Jackson took the crown.”

The Syracuse junior, who returned to the Orangemen after a year at Monroe Community College, in Rochester, excited the crowd with his off-the-backboard, single-pump, two-handed jam.

While the festivities entertained the crowd, the interaction between the fans and the athletes was the true reason behind Jam Session.

Before and during the game, hundreds of children walked up to the football bench and requested pictures and autographs from their favorite players.

Known for his outgoing personality, Alexander made the children laugh by wearing sunglasses during the game and dancing to the beat of the music brought around Manley.

Alexander did his best Harlem Globetrotters imitation, running to the stands, sitting down and talking to the fans.

“I liked the way the athletes went over to the kids and took the initiative to talk to them,” said Kyle Johnson, Jam Session director and SU fullback. “All the groups took the initiative, and they made something happen rather than let the kids come up to them and be dazzled by their athlete mystique.”

A plethora of activities greeted the children, from the Mascot All-Star game to the EA Sports Interactive Booth to the games set up by Syracuse fraternities and sororities.

“I think the kids had more fun than ever this year,” Johnson said. “I think you can honestly say that. I’ve never seen them smile so much. I’ve never seen them interact so energetically.”

Orange lose fifth straight game

Different year, same results.

The Syracuse women’s basketball team lost its fifth consecutive game Saturday, dropping a 68-64 decision to Miami in Coral Gables, Fl.

With the loss, the Orange (10-16, 3-12 Big East) remain on a Shannon Perry efficiency win came against Syracuse.

Connecticut last Wednesday. The Virginia, which lost 100-28 against Miami (12-14, 6-9) rallied to tie the game at 62 and took the lead on an Alicia Hartlaub layup on 20-pointers by Clarice Williams.

Miami led 57-50 at halftime. Miami guard Kristy Grazianni. Perry intercepted Dalia Clarke. Perry intercepted Clarke’s pass upcourt, but the media down the court, and madness then ensued.

Syracuse forward Jazmine James finished the third quarter with four points in 46 seconds left.

The August Project would seem to fit the bill perfectly. The cover letter in the press kit accompanying their debut album, "Looking For Some Fiction," reads: "The August Project is a rock and roll original, and cover band whose driving rhythms and powerful, catchy tunes are guaranteed to get people out of their seats and onto the dance floor."

Indeed, The August Project does provide the obligatory party tunes that you'd expect from a college band. Many of these songs are blandly catchy and serviceable, but where this local band distinguishes itself from most others is when it slows things down: "Looking For Some Fiction" kicks off with the bouncy "Mighty Mighty." Lead singer and Syracuse University junior voice major Jason Klug sings hopefully, "I'm just waiting for the big times/Mighty, mighty, that's what I'm saying."

Keyes questions morality

BY ASHLEIGH GRAF
Staff Writer

The United States is eroding with the fall of morality, support of abortion and the lack of God in politics and education, said Ambassador Alan Keyes Monday night.

“All of us live together in this house,” said Keyes to a crowd of about 400 in Goldstein Auditorium. “I think America’s moral house is on fire, and they are going to burn to death if I don’t tell them.”

Society has completely disregarded the morality of the country in recent years, said Keyes, a candidate for the Republican presidential nomination and U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Social and Economic Council.

President Bill Clinton made these issues of morality as important as they are, he said.

Keyes spent a large amount of time explaining the moral dilemma of the country in his 1996 presidential campaign.

“Has he made my job in that regard so much easier,” Keyes said. “Now I only need to allude to these issues of morality as important as they are, he said.”

Candidate discusses Diallo case aftermath

BY RYAN DONOHUE

Four days after the recusal of the four public officials of murder, the Amadou Diallo case reverberated Monday night in the President’s House.

President Bill Clinton will not be expected to call on the board’s decision, she said. “He really shouldn’t have talked to him,” said Keyes. “He should have asked his representatives that were at the meeting.”

Griener called Vieira to find out the board’s motivation for the decision, she added.

A.S.I.A. president resigns, Eng assumes position

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

Asian Students in America are without a president, but members said Christina Ho’s Friday resignation will not have dire effects on the organization.

“It’s disappointing to have a president resign but at the same time it’s going to make the e-board stronger,” said Paul Dien, A.S.I.A. public relations director. “We have to pull together.”

“Hopefully it will produce more leadership among the executive board and the members,” added Dien, a sophomore public relations and international relations major.

He said he resigned to pursue academic obligations and internship opportunities. She declined to comment further.

A.S.I.A. Vice President Aaron Eng is currently the acting president. He could not be reached for comment.

Eng will perform presidential duties for the remainder of the semester, Dien said.

These duties are mainly organizational, said A.S.I.A. Secretary Mari Lew, a sophomore public policy major. The president is obligated to keep everyone in line and keep people on top of things,” Lew said.

A.S.I.A.’s event-planning schedule delays the placement of a new president, Dien said.

“As of now we don’t have an official decision as an e-board yet,” he said. “We’re really busy with our activities now.”

A.S.I.A. is hosting “Enter the Dragon,” Saturday night in Goldstein Auditorium. The event includes a fashion show, dance performance and dance party. Dien said. A popular New York City DJ will run the music for the party, he added.

The group is continuing to prepare for this event, their biggest of the year, despite Ho’s resignation, he said.

“We’re trying to pull together and come up with good event,” Dien said.

U.S. balloonist reaches Africa

Chicago

American engineer Kevin Uliassi was soaring in his hot air balloon more than 100 miles off the coast of Mauritania, on Africa's west coast, Monday afternoon, when his balloon was jipped by smoke and forced to land in the sea. Uliassi was rescued by the French coast guard and taken to a hospital in Dakar, Senegal.

The admiral's arguments reflect the scramble by the armed services and defense contractors todevelop the most effective and flexible high-tech system there is. The appeal by the four-star chief of naval operations marked the first time a major defender of the plan formally has pushed for a role in national missile defense, although Navy authorities have argued privately for some time that ships would provide a cost-effective substitute. The Navy has already plowed over $300 million into the development of an experimental ship that can detect and track targets up to 3,000 miles away.

Between 1988 and 1998, 57 police officers in the United States were slain with their service weapons. An additional 113 had their guns taken from them.

With a $620,000 grant from the National Institute of Justice, Sandia researchers determined that some sort of radio transmitter worn by an officer would be the best approach with existing technology. Sandia's work supports the idea that a "smart" firearm could be used to prevent police officers from turning their own guns against them.

"We're just not going to buy more guns," said Kevin Uliassi, 37, who was found safe in the rubble of downtown Bujanovac. "What's more, a top Russian commander said Monday that the United States is considering sending 5,000 troops to the area in the next few weeks.

Since then, SmartLinks also has had the deaths of 22 people, including a man who died of a heart attack and a woman who died of a stroke. The jury of eight whites and four blacks, including a police officer in the United States, turned in their note.

Spiraling heat oil costs are having a devastating effect on the Central New York economy, said John Simmons, legislative assistant for U.S. Rep. Jim Walsh (R-Syracuse).

Crude oil prices rose to $30 per barrel in January, triple the cost at this time last year, Simmons said Monday. As a result of the rising cost of crude oil, the cost of heating a home doubled last month, he added.

"I have no money to begin with," said Matthew Stein, a senior broadcast journalism major and off-campus resident. "Now all my money's going to driving around and heating my apartment. I don't turn the heat up, I tell my roommates to wear jackets."

The current shortage is because member nations of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries are refining two million barrels of oil less than are demanded each day, said Maura Dougherty, spokesman for U.S. Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.).

The shortage is approaching levels the region has not seen since the 1977 oil crisis, according to a report from Schumers office.

Mild winters in the Northeast over the past few years decreased demand for heating oil, Simmons said. OPEC nations agreed to limit oil production this year to drive up prices to recover recent profit losses from the mild winters, he added.

"We need to develop more long-term solutions to these types of problems," Simmons said.

Walsh has proposed a home heating oil reserve, so that refined oil can be immediately released in times of excessively high prices, Simmons added.

Clinton is delaying on the issue to avoid economic consequences, said Debra Martinez, chairwoman of Pataki's New York State Consumer Protection Board.

"The government does not want to release the oil to influence market prices," she said.

"We're working to make sure no one will have to make a decision between buying milk and heating their homes," Martinez said.

Local leaders are scrambling to alleviate the price problem and are calling for President Bill Clinton's administration to release oil from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to stabilize prices.

"New all my money's going to driving around and heating my apartment. I don't turn the heat up, I tell my roommates to wear jackets."

The United States holds a reserve of 470 million barrels of crude in Texas and Louisiana in case of extreme emergencies, such as embargoes and shortages. Walsh, Schumer and New York state Gov. George E. Pataki are all asking for Clinton to open these oil reserves.

It would send a message to OPEC that the United States will not tolerate anti-competitive practices, Simmons said.

A former Syracuse University School of Education employee will return to the classroom this fall to give city children a lesson on tolerance.

Janice Grieshaber, executive director of the Jenna Foundation for Non-Violence, raised about $6,000 at a fund-raising event Saturday to help establish a mentorship program promoting tolerance and combating school violence.

Grieshaber and former SU football player Don McPherson plan to begin the program, McPherson's Mentors, in the spring of 2000.

McPherson's Mentors will partner elementary school students with high school student mentors. Baldwinsville Elementary School piloted the program, which aims to strengthen a child's character and social skills, rather than just their academic needs, Grieshaber said.

"It's just spit in the ocean," Grieshaber said of the fundraiser. "We always need more money."

McPherson, who finished his SU football career in 1987, is involved in various mentoring programs across New York state and could not be reached for comment.

Grieshaber's daughter, Jenna, for whom the foundation is named, was murdered Nov. 6, 1997, by a paroled felon in the state to serve sixth-sevenths of their sentence before being considered for parole.

"This is the way we raised our kids," Grieshaber said. "Jenna was always out there trying to make the world a better place."

The foundation will meet with Syracuse City Schools Assistant Superintendent Anthony Megg+cato this week to discuss implementing the program in 11 city schools by next fall.

The district currently has other mentoring programs in place, but is looking to expand, Megg+ cato said.

Mentoring has been one of the most viable initiatives in public education," he added.

Grieshaber said she is hopeful that children in the program will build a tolerance to gend-ors, races, religions and ethnicities different from their own that will lead to a future reduction in violence.

"We're going in the classrooms and talking about how important words and attitudes are," Grieshaber said. "When you talk to a bunch of little boys, what's the biggest insult you can say? 'You hit like a girl.' And why should that be an insult?"

New York State Assemblyman Harold Brown, Jr. is working as an honorary member on the foundation's board of directors along with Pataki.

Brown said the mentoring program is important to public schools because it may reverse the saturation of violence that children receive from the national media.

"We're trying to eliminate violence from public schools," Brown said. "We have so much abuse of women. The sooner you educate young people, you're going to be better off."

Brown said the mentoring programs do not impart morals on students that conflict with the mission of public education.

"There are so many dysfunctional families these days, it's a different school system," he said. "There are changes in what is important in education."

While sorting through Jenna's possessions after her death, Grieshaber and her husband found a children's book titled "The Old Turtle," which had been long-treasured by their daughter, Grieshaber said.

The book's theme now serves as the foundation behind McPherson's Mentors, she said.

"It's about diversity and accepting people for their beliefs," Grieshaber said. "It's what Jenna stood for."
Keyes misplaces political ideology

Alan Keyes has an unwelcome running mate on the 2000 Presidential campaign trail: God.

To an enthusiastic audience in the Schine Student Center's Goldstein Auditorium on Monday night, Keyes again made the dangerous mistake of mixing politics with religion. It's a recipe for disaster at this point in the campaign.

Keyes, an incredibly charismatic and articulate speaker, presents a sound ideology. But his message gets lost when he clutches the almighty hand of God on his way down the campaign trail.

The former ambassador's views on abortion, capital punishment, school choice and race relations would appeal to a much broader base of voters than the religious right. But most of his wishy-washy competitors in the race to the White House.

Keyes pushes a conditional agenda, inclusive only to God-fearing Christians who share his religious ideals.

Keyes' platform forces Christianity down the throats of a religiously and ethnically diverse voting population. And it doesn't look very plausible.

It is his unwillingness to compromise that makes him unelectable.

Pandering to the whims of interest groups often paves the way to Washington, and Keyes' refusal to huddle from this holy pulpit alienates most of the electorate.

The U.S. Constitution did not spring from a divine mandate. It embodies the vision of the Founding Fathers — a vision intended to cut through all religions and political worship. But Keyes presents a sound ideology. But his unwillingness to compromise that does not budge from his holy pulpit alienates most of the electorate.

dent of the United States?”

The morality crisis is not because of the leaders, such as Clinton, but of the American people, Keyes said.

If there is a failure in society, it must be traced back to its beginning and examined seriously, he added.

The nation is living in a time where the system of checks and balances does not work, Keyes said, noting Clinton’s scandalous behavior.

It is disturbing that Americans are living without objection in a society that exhibits characteristics of tyranny, Keyes said.

The cause for this lack of morality is the idea that the Consitution and the Bill of Rights guarantoe people their rights — but this is not the case, he said.

“Our rights come from God and must be respected as the authority of God,” he said.

People now look to government for their moral conscience and government is failing in this mission, Keyes said, citing the gun control debate.

“Violence does not come from the guns, it comes from the hearts of those yielding the guns,” he said.

The role of the government in deciding the morality of the country is also a factor in abortion, Keyes explained. Women now believe that they have absolute power over their body and the government gives them the right to do with it as they please,
said.

This creates a situation where some lives are perceived not as important as others, he said.

“We now believe that there are actual persons and potential persons. I don’t see how anyone can tell me the unborn aren’t mentioned in the Constitution,” Keyes said. “Every life is precious.”

But Erik Levis, a senior broadcast journalism major, said although Keyes is a gifted orator, he is too conservative to win the GOP nomination.

“I think America still has a decent heart,” Keyes said. “We will stand for justice because God does prevail.”

he stood, unarmed, in the vestibule of his home. The officers were patrolling Diallo’s Bronx neighborhood looking for an immigrant Diallo 19 times as police officers shot the African group as being more likely to profiling.

But in a question and answer session afterward, he spoke at length about racial profiling.

“I’ve learned that it’s somewhat dangerous to vote demographically, if you know what I mean,” said Kamika MacDonald, a former columnist for The Daily Orange, in the first question of the night.

MacDonald, who is black, continued to ask why black people should be shot and called "simply because of who they are.”

In his response, Keyes blamed black criminals for making racial profiling a necessary evil. They give other blacks a bad reputation, he said. He supported police use of general physical descriptions, such as skin color, to conduct broad searches.

Keyes compared racial profiling to police profiling of university students, if crime occurs at a higher rate around a college.

“Are (police) forbidden to notice these things?” he asked.

MacDonald tried to re-respond, saying, “It should be deeper than just students.”

In a ten-minute-long answer, Keyes at times ridiculed the senior Caliph Brown, refer-ing to the total number of bullets the police officers fired at Diallo.

“Individual officers should be judged by their individual actions,” Keyes said in reponse.

After leaving the auditorium, Rafel struggled to reconcile what he said was an inconsistent message from Keyes.

“I stand for the victims,”
Keyes said.

“Do you stand for Amadou Diallo, too?” sophomore Gideon
Rafel shouted.

“Forty-one shots,” chimed in senior Caliph Brown, refer-ing to the number of bullets the police officers fired at Diallo.

“I think America still has a decent heart,” Keyes said. “We

In other SGA news: Vieira's appointment to SGA comptroller next fall sparked debate among students at Monday's meeting in Maxwell Auditorium. A group of 20 students claimed that the appointment process is "one-handed" and "not representative of what the student body wants.

A debate was conducted March 21 between Vieira and David Gaulin for the comptroller position. The candidates answered questions from Greiner and the audience. Vieira then collected and tallied the votes.

"I wanted to know how the candidates fared on their feet," Greiner said. "How you speak is an important aspect of this position.

Students claimed that their votes had no effect on the comptroller appointment and that the decision was made despite overwhelming support for Gaulin.

"SGA is supposed to be representative of the student body," said Ryan McAllister, sophomores in the College of Arts Sciences. "The Assembly doesn't get to select candidates who are going to be in positions of major authority."

The vice comptroller appointment was based on the candidates' letters of intent and their honesty in the debate, Greiner said. Vieira's experience with the Finance Board and with Black Voice magazine made her the most qualified candidate, he said.

"Both candidates were taken with me and I suspect that it allowed (Gaulin's) supporters to believe they had won it for him," Greiner said.

Gaulin could not be reached for comment.

Vieira believed that the appointment process was fair, she said. People were welcome to go to the debate, but the comptroller has the authority to appoint whom ever he wants to take his place.

"It's his assistant," she said. "And once you're in there, you can always get taken out."

Assembly retracts student groups’ funding

Stone said current SGA policies give the UU speakers board trouble because of the fluctuation in availability of speakers. She also said she talked to Greiner about the funding situation and hopes to sit down with SGA today and come to a compromise with the organization.

"The current system throws a monkey wrench into programming," Stone said.

The remaining three organizations spent money on personal expenditures, Greiner said. SGA can only guarantee loans for such expenditures, and the student groups did not know they had to pay them back, he said.

The groups, however, suffered low ticket sales, adding to the financial burden, he said.

The College Republicans lost $175.10 after experiencing a snag in ticket sales for speaker William F. Buckley in December, Greiner said. Buckle addressed issues including U.S. foreign policy and the protection of international democracy during his speech in Hendricks Chapel. The speech attracted about 100 people.

The Syracuse India Association and the Haitian American Student Organization lost $104.00 and $183, respectively, also after low ticket sales during various semester events, Greiner said.

Asian Students in America had $82.22 retracted by SGA in February due to a lack of funds from ticket sales for their Autumn Bizzare event during the 1999 Fall Semester. SGA also took back funding from the College Democrats at the last minute after miscommunication about who would pay the $1,000 rental fee for Goldstein Auditorium for First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton's 10:10 speech.

Vieira said that regardless of who is at fault, miscommunication is a serious issue with fund allocations. "If an organization makes contact with the comptroller, then it is his fault if a misunderstanding occurs," Vieira said. "If the organization doesn’t approach the comptroller, it is the organization’s fault."

Student injured in fight outside Booth Hall

Staff Reports

A Syracuse University student was injured during an argument outside Booth Hall, according to a Department of Public Safety report.

SU ambulance responded to the call and treated the student at the scene, the report said.

The argument started between two students and two other men, one of which was also an SU student, in front of 302 Marshall St., the report said.

One of the men, whose identity is unknown, threw a bottle at another man in the group. The bottle, however, did not hit anyone, the report said.

The other companion, who was not from the university, left Marshall Street and went to Booth. The other

Cell out
An experimental cancer vaccine, made by fusing a patient’s tumor cells with specialized cells of the immune system, has produced dramatic shrinkage of tumors in a small study of patients with advanced kidney cancer, researchers reported Monday. Although the results must be confirmed in larger studies, they are encouraging enough that doctors in several countries are launching experiments using the same approach to treat other malignancies, including skin cancer, breast cancer and ovarian cancer.

Crack down
Delving into the lingering controversy over “crack babies,” the Supreme Court said Monday it would rule on whether public hospitals may test pregnant women for drug use and provide the results to police. A group of 10 women who had been subjected to such testing at a Charleston, S.C., hospital claimed it violated their constitutional protection against unreasonable searches. The hospital’s practice dates to the 1980s, when maternal crack use was a high-profile social problem, and the medical staff took the initiative with local prosecutors to safeguard babies’ health.

UU brings good films to campus
If you look hard enough for entertainment, you may find that there really are alternatives to punching out a window at Faegans.
My weekly job in those pages is to figure out what exactly these mysterious activities are and tell you guys about it. But, to tell you the truth, it’s really difficult and sometimes I get a little frustrated when trying to entertain myself at Syracuse University. Back in a column that ran in a November Daily Orange, I wrote: “I’ve seen better film presentations in 9th grade biology class.” Luckily, I’ve been trying to keep a more upbeat attitude, and I’d like to issue an apology this week to University Union cinemas for trash talking their contributions earlier in the school year. Surprisingly, the UU Cinema people didn’t seem to hold a grudge against me when I ventured down to the basement of the Schine Student Center to talk about their thankless job of bringing new movies to us all here on the SU campus.

“Yeah, we get bitched out a lot,” said Matt Singer, a sophomore television, radio and film major in the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications and co-chair of the UU Cinema Board. “But we laughed at that one.” I ended up hearing only two horror stories about angry audiences, after “South Park” and “The Matrix.” Most of the other films went off without a hitch. Singer’s defense for the low quality of some of the film presentations has to do with the subpar theaters on the SU campus and blunders made by the distributor, not the nice UU Cinema team themselves.

Something is missing from the Carrier Dome repertoire.

Each year the Dome hosts many exciting sporting events, like this year’s football games against Michigan and West Virginia, and the basketball games against Connecticut and Georgetown. But the Dome has not hosted a major music concert since Billy Joel hit the stage in December 1998.

Student Government Association President Jamal James said students perceive Syracuse University as more interested in putting on sporting events than concerts, and that the Carrier Dome is often an underutilized resource for entertainment.

Regardless, there are a variety of factors that determine when and how concerts are arranged, said Carrier Dome Manager Pat Campbell.

“The number one reason that the Carrier Dome exists is for SU athletics,” he said.

Kat Widden of Concert Ideas, a concert promotion company in Woodstock, likens concert promotion to a chess match — bands play where they will get the best deal.

The venue’s size, location and logistics naturally influence a band’s decision to perform there, but other factors are involved — other bands that are touring, which bands can fill the venue, the last time the band played in a certain geographical area, relationships between the different parties and what the band wants to do. But because stadiums generally give priority to athletics, the football schedule must be determined before Campbell can attempt to schedule music concerts.

“Everything is on hold until the football schedule is released,” Campbell said. Scheduling usually occurs some time in January, he said.

The football schedule has been determined, Campbell schedules recurring annual events, such as the local high school football and soccer championship games, preventing concerts from coming on certain weekends. Campbell said that, while ticket sales at these games make up for the expense of running them, the majority of any profits made are given to the high school athletic associations and, therefore, the Dome does not make any money at these events.

James noted that the SU trustees may frown upon the Dome holding events during the week, because of their concerns over the event’s possible negative impact on the school. Only after all of these events have been scheduled can Campbell begin considering scheduling a music concert for the remaining free weekends.

When planning a weekend concert is not like planning a weekend party.

Logistically speaking

Have been impressed features — its size — can work against it in trying to provide somewhere to go for a concert, said the football schedule is required to be 90% full.

Logisticaly speaking have been problems with construction of the dome is that the tourist season's possible negatively affect the Dome’s profits, a further deterrent. For concerts, the Dome rents a ground-supported sound system from an outside company. The cost of the rental comes out of the artist's profits, a further deterrent. In addition, Campbell said that the types of concerts that have come up have changed.

“There are not as many studio shows as there were 10 years ago,” Campbell said.

Widden agreed. In the past decade, smaller outdoor amphitheaters have replaced stadiums as the major summer concert venue. Not many acts can fill stadiums with capacities of 50,000 or more, and the Dome’s maximum concert capacity is 40,000. Because amphitheaters are generally smaller than stadiums, a single artist can continue his or her tour year-round, staging the same show in an amphitheater in the summer as in an arena during the winter.

Ironically, the domed stadium bearing the name of one of the world’s largest air conditioning manufacturers is not air-conditioned. This prevents the Carrier Dome from hosting concerts in the summer. This included in a major summer stadium tour, the Dome must cancel either the tour’s front end in April or May, or its tail end in September or October, said Campbell. But few tours begin or end in Central New York.

“I’m looking at where the Backstreet Boys want to go to Albany and not to Syracuse,” James said.

James also noted that the band ‘N Sync played to a crowd of 35,000 in Hartford, quickly selling out the stadium. He said he hopes to receive similar results at the Carrier Dome.

James said he is “informally” contacting promoters and looking to create partnerships to better market the Dome to promoters. One example of possible partnerships include using WJZP 89.1 FM, the student radio station, to promote concerts.

Strock said he would like to see more concerts at the Dome, but is aware of the difficulties.

“Though its maximum concert capacity approaches 40,000, the Dome can also be configured to hold as few as 8,500 to 10,000 attendees, Strock said.

And appearance isn’t everything. It’s not a bad thing to sell half the tickets in a capacity of 40,000,” he said.

Strock said he isn’t giving up either and said he will work with the administration cooperatively on improving the number of concerts at the Dome.

The SU films are shown during the week at the Watson Auditorium and on the weekends at Gifford Auditorium. UU Cinemas provides second-run Hollywood films on 16-millimeter reels, as opposed to the larger 35-millimeter that we see in the theaters. Believe it or not, but the reels of film that are shown actually cost more than the newer films are limited to.

But even more remarkable is Thomas' inspiration. He started visiting Potter at the shop as part of an entrepreneurship class. Potter works with SU students each semester, even allowing two business majors to volunteer to run her store last Sunday. But beyond her magazines and fax services, Potter also serves as the proprietor of the black spirit on the city's South Side. She hands out school supplies to underprivileged youth, and her newsstand includes a research center for younger children and an AIDS aware-

She said she looks for diligent workers to help at the store, but she also search-fternoons just outside Tulsa, Deborah, a special education teacher, preached the stories of black heroes to her young son. He read Alex Haley's "Roots" and studied from "Kafir Boy," a tale of a young black man's fight against adversity. The written and spoken words stuck with Etan as he arrived in Syracuse. Introspective by nature, Thomas continues to write thought-provoking poetry and rap lyrics.

He penned a eulogy for Malcolm X in a public speaking class in the School of Visual and Performing Arts that professors still show today. While signing posters and homemade signs at the newsstand, Potter and the children begged for him to bust out a few rhymes.

The humble Thomas failed to oblige Friday, but his trip to the newsstands in the past helped to break through his shyness. Meeting with Potter, a figure nearly identical to his mom, ignited a synergy in Etan that spilled into the essay contest.

"They both have a passion for black heritage," Etan said. "My mom does a lot of the same things with little kids. I think that's what got me drawn to do more stuff with (Carol). I got to know her, and she tries to do a lot of things for the community."

The next project, the essay contest, will last until summer. Children ages seven through high school can submit pieces before the May 19 (Malcolm X's birthday) dead-time. The topic must center around one of 21 black individuals, from Colin Powell to Maya Angelou to Jesse Owens to Queen Latifah.

Thomas will help select the contest winners, and the best writers will receive prizes at a June 19 celebration at the neweststand. But

Thomas told the youngsters every participant wins a new knowledge of the men and women who shaped their past.

And Potter appreciates his little-recognized work.

"I know him as a man who loves to write and enjoys poetry," she said. "He comes down here, and he started to get a feeling. This was all his thing — he wanted to do something."

Despite Friday evening's snub, Deborah still accompanied Etan to midcourt at the Carrier Dome for Monday's Senior Day ceremonies. She joined the 31,009 who lauded his efforts with a thunderous standing ovation.

But her cheers, the community's cheers, went to a black man who mixed basketball and a strong community conscience to brighten a February Friday for 60 Syracuse boys and girls.

Include Thomas' name with Rony Seikaly, Roosevelt Bouie and Derrick Coleman as great SU big men. But be sure to also mention him with community leaders, men and women from Oklahoma to Onondaga who change the lives of young people and em-ply heroism.

Like mother, like Carol, like son.

The decision to come to Syracuse was easy for Lai because her older brother already attended SU. Lai also looked forward to a change of environment.

Other schools offered her a spot on the team, but none tended to be as scholarly as Syracuse, so she stuck with Syracuse.

Thomas remains true to roots

His mother stepped off the plane at Hancock International Airport at about 5 p.m. Friday.

She traveled halfway across America, from the plains to the Hill, to see her beloved son play his final home college basketball game against Georgetown on Sunday afternoon.

She likely expected some quality time with her boy, maybe even a quick visit to eat fast food at the McDonald’s on the corner of Main and Grove streets.

But little Debbie, Deborah Thomas’ NBA-bound son, elected to please mom in another way.

Etan Thomas, SU’s All-Big East center, spent almost 90 minutes Friday night at the South Side Newsstand, a tiny shop tucked in a bland plaza on Salina Street.

He signed autographs for five dozen youngsters, not mentioning Sunday’s showdown with the Hoyas or urging them to fire jump shots on chilly nights until their fingers freeze.

Thomas instead challenged the kids, ebony and ivory alike, to write an essay profiling a hero in black history.

He spoke few words, allowing store owner Carol Potter to do the talking. But his gesture Friday night should overshadow his school blocked shots record and glitter brighter than any Big East Championship ring.

Sure, he didn’t enter a segregated school in Arkansas or play down in the second row of a Detroit bus.

But Thomas, one of those evil Di...

SUNY appoints new ESF president

Murphy to assume position March 15

BY JOHN ARWEILER

Staff Writer

Dr. Cornelius Murphy, Jr., is the new president of the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry.

“I’m very excited,” Murphy said after Tuesday’s announcement by the SUNY Board of Trustees. “I really look forward to serving as president.”

The decision came during the SUNY board’s monthly meeting in Albany. It was followed by the dinner reception at the Nelson Rockefeller Empire State Plaza Hotel in Albany.

His appointment by the SUNY board follows his endorsements by the ESF Board of Trustees and SUNY Chancellor Robert King.

“Murphy is an outstanding choice for ESF president,” said Ross Whaley, the school’s current president. “He has rich experience in leading large organizations, He has a strong technical background and knowledge of environmental issues.”

Murphy is president and director of O’Brien and Gere Limited, a Syracuse-based design, engineering and consulting firm that specializes in environmental conservation.

O’Brien and Gere employs more than 1,000 people in 29 locations worldwide, according to ESF.

“I come from a corporation that dealt with all the disciplines taught at ESF,” Murphy said. “My goals are to apply them to solve social problems.”

His appointment ends a more than year-long search to replace Whaley, president of 15 years.

Whaley is leaving to establish Syracuse’s first charter school for children in kindergarten through sixth grade. The school curriculum will focus on science and math.

Murphy will assume the presidential role March 15.

Syracuse police and Syracuse University Public Safety officials came to South Campus Tuesday night to speak at a drug awareness forum in Goldstein Student Center.

“People are very enterprising as far as drugs go,” Corbett said to about 25 students at a drug awareness forum in Goldstein Student Center. “I like to offer a show-and-tell kind of presentation because it means much more to people to see the implements associated with drug use.”

The presentation, led by Corbett, addressed drug-related issues, including drug paraphernalia, legal ramifications and side effects. Corbett answered student questions and displayed a collection of common drug paraphernalia.

The Syracuse Common Council wants Syracuse University professors to help revise the city charter.

An advisory board will assist the newly-created City Charter Commission in re-evaluating the 40-year-old charter, a series of codes under which the city operates, said Patriciapi, a spokesman for Mayor Roy A. Bernardi.

The board will be comprised of members of both the city and university community, specifically SUNY’s Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs.

BERLIN — A German prosecutor announced Tuesday that he is seeking murder charges against three U.S. teenagers after they reportedly confessed to hurling boulders from a highway overpass in a dangerous game that killed two drivers and injured five passengers.

In a troubling incident that could undermine relations between the two countries and their German hosts, the youths — all children of U.S. Army soldiers — told police they were seeking to establish their own criminal reputation.

We hope to have some members that do not live in the city, which would include some representative from the Maxwell School," he said.

Bernardi first presented the plan for the commission in his Feb. 9 State of the City address, Parenti said. Bernardi discussed the proposal Sunday night with members of the Council.

The mayor quelled some skepticism regarding the effectiveness of the commission after he detailed the plan, Parenti said. "They were fairly positive and anxious to see what the commission will recommend," he said.

The commission will examine merging the city and county purchasing division as well as other government offices, he said. This merger would help both the city and the county operate more efficiently, he added.

Council Minority Leader Steven DeRegis said he agreed only partially with the mayor's proposal. "I think we should study it and it needs to be looked at," DeRegis said. "I favor some charter reform."

The Council needs to be presented with the ideas and determine if they make sense, DeRegis said. But the current charter is outdated and a revision must occur, he added.

In the county system, the legislative body has most of the power. In the city of Syracuse, the mayor has more power than what is good for the people, DeRegis said.

"The mayor has the ability to arrange items in the budget as he likes because of the support he receives from the predominantly Republican Council," he added.

If anything is going to be merged or changed, both the county legislature and city council must first approve it, Parenti said. The proposal will also be slated in the form of a referendum question in the November 2001 elections, he added.

It needs to be kept in mind that the people are important to the decision, Parenti said.

"We are sort of putting the cart before the horse the other way," he added.

Although the commission has not yet been established, several potential candidates are being considered, Parenti said. The mayor is optimistic the referendum will pass in 2001, Parenti added.

"After speaking with the mayor, the committee members were much more receptive to the idea," he said.

Candidate friends belittle SGA process

An odd thing happened during the Student Government Association's Feb. 21st assistant comptroller debate: students came to watch. But they were friends of assistant comptroller Dave Gaulin, rather than eager SGA participants, who packed the seats of Maxwell Auditorium. Their thinly-veiled intentions were clear: They hadn't suddenly been moved to observe Syracuse University's campus leaders in action, they were there to cheer on their buddy.

During the debates, Greiner passed out ballots to solicit audience opinions on who would make a better appointment to the position. He noted, however, that the choice was up to the student body — or Gaulin's friends — questions Greiner's judgement, then perhaps they should have considered challenging him during the debates.

Granted, the assistant comptroller doesn't hold anywhere near the same amount of clout as other SGA officials. It seems wasteful to award so much procedural fanfare to a position as other SGA officials. It seems wasteful to allow such a minimalistic position to a position that is little more than a glorified Finance Board seat.

However, the assistant comptroller often rises to power as SGA comptroller, who controls the entire $1.5 million Student Activity Fund — in the following election. Students hand over $106 every year to SGA, and they just need to learn when not to toss in their extra two cents.

Black History Month further stratifies society

Another February has come and gone, and with it another widely successful Black History Month. What a great idea, this: 27 years of isolation and segregation by allotting a separate month just for the celebration of black history

SGA comptroller ignores voice of concerned students

To the editor:

Monday night, I saw democracy at its worst. I attended a meeting of the Student Government Association and was extremely disappointed with what I saw. For an association established for representing the students, I was extremely disappointed with what I saw. For an association established for representing the students, the SGA Assembly does not give the students a voice.

Article III, Section C of SGA's constitution states, "all students have the right to address the Assembly." This right was not given to all the students who attended the meeting. In fact, one student was interrupted mid-sentence by the Comptroller, George W. Bush got everybody to listen. I thought that the whole point of politics Imagining Sen. John McCain being the New York State primary and claiming it wasn't fair because George W. Bush got everybody to listen and vote for him.

Regardless of campaign strategy, the simple fact remains that allowing Greiner dictatorial rights over deciding the next assistant comptroller is atrocious. By expressing my concerns to the assembly, I was called "belligerent." My opportunity to address the Assembly and from my experience as an SGA member, Greiner became argumentative and patronizing in his response. Please understand: this isn't about candidates, it is about a process. This is no way to decide an election for a highly important office.

Greiner and company, listen up: If you want to be taken seriously by the students, start taking the students seriously.

Many whites, like the elderly German man at the supermarket, often face a challenge when confronted by white Afro-Germans about their heritage, Blackshire-Belay said. Many whites, like the elderly German man at the supermarket, simply do not believe that there is such a person as a dark-skinned German, she said.

"One of my friends was approached in a supermarket and asked by an elderly German man, 'Are you African or are you one of ours?'" Blackshire-Belay said. "It was a day that no Afro-German, nor could I, forget."

Afro-Germans often face a challenge when confronted by white Germans about their heritage, Blackshire-Belay continued. Many whites, like the elderly German man at the supermarket, simply do not believe that there is such a person as a dark-skinned German, she said.

"When I said I was American, the Germans said I was trying to better myself, that I was really Jamaican or from Trinidad. They couldn't believe I was American."

CAROL AISHA BLACKSHIRE-BELAY
Indiana State University Professor and SU African-American Studies' chairperson candidate

Afro-Germans are highly discriminated against, Blackshire-Belay said. Many whites do not believe that blacks can hold academic jobs, she added.

"I was American," she said. "When I said I was American, the Germans said I was trying to better myself, that I was really Jamaican or from Trinidad." She said. "They couldn't believe I was American."

"At the time I went to school, there were no black students, period," Blackshire-Belay said. "I was a rarity. I didn't think I was a rarity. But when I look back, I see I was in a very special group of students."

"Despite their historical presence, Afro-Germans are still looked at today by Germans as foreign or, at best, oddities," she said. "More and more Afro-German children are born every year, and still, Germans refuse to recognize them."

The speech was well-received by the audience, said Christians Awosan, a freshman in the College of Arts and Sciences.

"I really liked it," Awosan said. "I've never heard of Afro-Germans before. It was very interesting to hear about their heritage - being black and at the same time being German citizens."

A decision by an SU African-American Studies department search committee regarding the chairperson position is expected in about a month.
The overall theme is to get a little bit better educated to what's out there.

She said drug use is an ongoing concern for the university and the university is perpetually trying to educate the student body.

Corbett, a State University of New York College of Environmental School of Forestry alumnus, showed students drug-related items including water-pipes, marijuana pipes and simulated vials of crack cocaine. His examples of paraphernalia could be used for drugs including marijuana, cocaine, LSD and PCP. Although each of these items have been confiscated on duty in the city of Syracuse, Corbett pointed out that these problems exist close to campus.

"Many of you probably don't realize that we have these type of items on our campus." Public Safety Lt. Grant Williams said.

"I've seen it all before." Williams conducts year-round drug awareness forums in residence halls in an effort to prevent students from trying drugs. Both Williams and Corbett warned students about certain drugs that seem to be gaining popularity on the SU campus.

"MDMA (Ecstasy) and GHB, the second generation of 'date rape' drugs, are blowing up," Corbett said.

He said his department once confiscated 40 vials of GHB from a South Campus apartment.

"Sexual predators are using this stuff — it's not to be reckoned with," Corbett said. "America used to be a drug sub-culture and like it or not, today we are a drug culture.

The forum is an effective means of conducting the message of drug awareness, said Michael Riecke, a sophomore broadcast journalism and policy studies major.

"It was definitely a learning experience," Riecke said. "I think for me, being a resident advisor, that I should know what's popular and how to recognize these drugs and be aware that they're out there."

HUFMANN'S THIS IS WHERE IT GETS GOOD
Zimbabwe provides insight

BY JOY DAVIA
Special Projects Editor

As she walked through the crowded streets of Harare, Zimbabwe, University of Notre Dame senior Amanda Gentile began to understand how racial minorities may sometimes feel in America.

"We were walking through a public market place and not seeing another white face came as a shock. A student in SU's Division of International Programs Abroad program in Spring 1999, Gentile said her presence was deemed unusual because the white, ruling class did not associate with the black middle class in the African countries.

They stayed in big houses behind gates.

Gentile, who wanted to study in Africa ever since she met a woman from Uganda in college, has performed in University Union comedy shows and other comedy events throughout her career at SU, agreed about standing up in a big arena.

"You get an immediate, strong reaction from the audience that you get, whether it's good or bad," he said. "That's addictive. It's a great feeling."

Malkoff, a member of JSU, opened last year's for Notorious Night host Ken Jimmy Fallon and just drove North Mac Donald to the airport.

"I'm very happy that people like to see me perform and think that I'm good because," he said. "I'm thrilled to work with such talented people."

JSU's Comedyfest features a 7:30 p.m. Thursday in The Daily Show to Comedy Central's "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart." The show is a 9:00 for his appearance — air in Harare.

"Africa's image as a dangerous continent," however, makes it an unpopular choice for students with a desire to study abroad, said James Buschman, chairman of SU's DIPA.

Referring to the media's portrayal of Africa as a war-torn continent plagued by starvation and AIDS, Buschman said these images often deter students from venturing to Africa.

"The typical student does not want to study there," he said. "They are afraid."

Washing hands helps students prevent illnesses

The food in the Syracuse University dining halls may not always seem edible, but at least you don't have to worry about it killing you.

I've never seen a case of food poisoning from dining hall food," said Kathleen VanVechten of SU Health Services.

But the food may not always be the source of the problem. Did you ever stop to think what you're coming into contact with? It's allaround you. The grime. The fungus. The slime. The grime. The fungus. The slime.

Washing your hands can help reduce the risk of food poisoning: washing your hands probably have a nice big. For once, I'd like to see more of the white elites, he said. "For once, I'd like to see more of the white elites.

"We try to raise people's awareness in the entertainment industry," said JSU, has been previously hosted by Henry Winkler, Alan Dower, Wolf Blitzer and Alain Sarda.

"He did commend JSU for going to perform at SU, though."

The star of the one-man New York comedy club show, "Black Humor," Black travels extensively and almost constantly. This week already, he has been to Los Angeles, New York City and Washington, D.C., and will head to Cleveland after finishing his performance in Syracuse.
Black said he agreed to play SU not only for the smart college audience but for the sports.

Horace Campbell, director of the Harare program from 1993 to 1996, said ignorance about Africa was one of the first obstacles he encountered when the program was inceptioned in 1993.
In the past, when there has been a conflict in a part of Africa, like Somalia, SU has received phone calls asking why the university placed the students in danger, when the city is actually over 5,000 miles from Harare, he said.
"I am sure that if there are problems in one European city, the media does not treat Europe the same way that Africa is presented," said Campbell, an African-American Studies professor in the College of Arts and Sciences. "This is the biggest problem and the good thing is that the students who go offer the best antidote to the media vilification of Africa and Africans.

Transcending barriers
Those students who do look beyond the negative imagery are usually from various ethnic backgrounds and are interested in taking African courses, Buschman said.
Campbell described the typical SU student travelling to Zimbabwe as intellectuals open to studying its rich history.
"Weak students were not attracted to the program because of the intellectual rigor," he said.
SU senior Kriisa Blumreich's adventures in Zimbabwe made her realize how much Americans take things for granted, including tasks such as laundry and grocery shopping, she said.
"Harare is far from a consumerist culture, said Blumreich, noting the slim brand selection of food at the grocery store. Washing machines are also non-existent and a majority of the population washes laundry by hand.
Blumreich, a political science major in the College of Arts and Sciences, said her decision to study abroad in Harare in the spring of 1999 stemmed from the Zimbabwe friends she made as an exchange student in Switzerland. She never considered looking at other programs outside of Africa, she added.

Students hoping to learn more about Africa were instrumental in starting the program in 1993.
"The work was that of a group of very bright students who felt that if one had the opportunity to go to London, Florence, Madrid there should also be the opportunity to go to Harare, Kampala or Dakar," Campbell said.
The students lobbied DIPA, stressing the importance of learning more about Africa and overcoming the notion that the country was intellectually impoverished, he added.
Zimbabwe's stable government and friendly relations to the United States prompted DIPA to locate in Harare, Buschman said.
"Gentile's experience as a minority in Zimbabwe alerted her to the need for education, including the black character in the movie "The Green Mile" who could not spell, talk and had a large frame, she said.
"I can't even watch movies," she said. "I can not believe how racist they are."

hadn't been to the dining hall in two years before getting a meal in a takeout box. In general, she avoids the food. "I don't want to eat food that I don't know what's in it," she said.

According to a recent press release from the American Dietetic Association, forty-four percent of Americans forget washington before sitting down to dinner. This is due to their hands when they sit down to eat, and therefore the Americans should cook their meals as "definitely not she said. "I just wash my bathroom before I eat.

Most students have a habit and it's pretty safe," she said.

Food poisoning is a serious

Regardless if it's Senior Night or not, SU junior Beth Record said, "we should come out like it was our last game. If we play every day like it's our Senior Night, and reverse the roles a little bit, we could use it to our advantage." Record tallied 16 points for the Orangewomen, while Jaime James added 14 points on four 3-pointers.

SU's toughest defender, Jakia Ervin, managed to shut down BC's leading scorer, Cal Bouchard, who poured in 28 points in the first meeting between the two teams this season. The senior from Canada scored just a half-dozen points on the evening. SU's biggest struggle, though, came inside the paint. Centers Leigh Annis and Tara Trammell, who grabbed a career-high 10 rebounds, shot a combined 4-of-15 from the field.

Neither player could do much to slow down Cournoyer on the interior. The 6-3 junior made 11-of-17 attempts from the floor. "She shot over 50 percent," BC head coach Kathy Inglese said. "She's capable of doing that on any given night. What's nice about it is that we spread the floor a little bit more, and that enabled her to get the ball."

BC had plentiful spacing and created several easy baskets by dishing out 21 assists while the Orangewomen managed just six. "Regardless if it's Senior Night or not," BC's Colleen Manley said, "we had to take care of the formation of conferences. We have to take care of the formation of conferences, and we have a shot at an AQ. We are located in three top basketball bars and will help the conference gain media attention and land top recruits, she said.

Additionally, Cournoyer believes the youth movement among coaches adds a fresh approach to the game. "The Big East is increasingly becoming known as a grayed-old conference, not just a basketball or football league," Cournoyer said. "Both the more-established and up-and-coming programs are located in three top basketball bars and have strong coaches. This can be a conference very competitive on the national level."

Many teams are on the verge of stepping into the limelight."

"Putting out the Big East ballots for Player of the Year... you can't choose your own player," Doherty said. "But when I can with the All-American ballot, I put Troy's name down. He's the focal point of the other team's defense, and he's been able to put up some great numbers."

Despite his guard stats, Murphy does not worry about numbers. He wants to take the Irish to the NCAAAs. The guard's times looked good at one point. Quality wins against Top 25 teams Ohio State, Connecticut and St. John's put them in position for a solid RPI rating.

The ball was in the Irish's hands, but they fumbled and, hence, tumbled in the standings. An 89-79 loss to Providence a week ago — Murphy was seven-of-17 with 31 points — was to Wade canned 10 threes and scored 30 points — did not help the Fighting Irish cause.

Neither did a 55-52 loss to Miami in which Murphy and Matt Carroll missed last second shots to tie the game. After hosting SU, Notre Dame hops to Washington, D.C., for a showdown with Georgetown and then to Madison Square Garden for the Big East Tournament.

Each game is significant, Murphy said, but the Irish must increase their intensity if they harbor any remaining NCAA Tourney hopes.

"We haven't played with a lot of energy and emotion the last couple games," he said. "We have been lackadaisical with our execution."

"We're a young team, and a lot of times we play to the level of the opposition," he continued. "We competed with UConn, and we were in the Syracuse game until (Preston) Shumpert went off."

In the game Murphy speaks of, Shumpert torched Notre Dame for seven 3-pointers and finished with 26 points, exploiting the Irish 2-3 zone defense.

Doherty plans to stick with the defensive scheme, saying it is the Irish's hallmark.

With SU hitting 36.4 percent of its 2-pointers, Doherty's scheme is risky.

And if Syracuse continues to play like it did in the second half in Sunday's 67-52 win against Georgetown, head coach Jim Boeheim thinks the Orange can show well against the Irish and at No. 24 Connecticut on Saturday.

"I think we're getting better in some areas," Boeheim said. "We have two very difficult situations left. I think these are games that will help us to become a better team. This league is very difficult. The teams in the middle of the pack can beat you."

"We've got a big test for the Big East crown. In their meeting in South Bend in January 1999, Blackwell held Notre Dame's Troy Murphy to just five points and zero field goals. The Orangeemen own three straight wins over ND, the last an 80-71 Hardware Classic Jan. 16. Preston Shumpert canned 7-of-9 threes against a passive Irish zone in the game."

Big East lax now reality for women

When the 2001 lacrosse season opens, the Syracuse women's team will have an added prize to play for — the first-ever Big East women's lacrosse championship.

Commissioner Michael Tranghese announced last week the formation of the Big East women's lacrosse league, approved unanimously by all 14 of the conference's athletic directors. The decision introduces women's lacrosse as the league's 20th sport and 11th for females.

"Women's lacrosse is a growing sport within the NCAA," Tranghese said. "We have schools with quality programs, and those institutions want to compete under the Big East banner." Syracuses senior forward has a backup plan in the second round of Dodd's bracket. Eagles down Orangewomen

BOSTON — The Syracuse Orangewomen looked for red in the face as they walked onto the Conte Forum parquet Tuesday night. The Eagles was battling its jinx in the blocks and steals.

And even though it was 40 degrees cooler in Beantown than Miami, the Big East has been anything but.

"We have to learn how to defend," SU head coach Marianna Freeman said. "Defensively, we need to pick up the type of intensity that we needed to play against them. We just didn't do a good job defensively, and they exploited our weakness.

"The Eagles played unselfish basketball against a talented Boston College, 86-72.

Despite shooting 45 percent from the field, the Irish tossed the ball away 19 times and grabbed 12 rebounds in the first half.

The Orangewomen, who scored 25 points in the second half, scored 20 points in the first half and 20 points in the second half.

The Eagles were held to 25 points in the second half.

Freund assesses university

Syracuse University stands only five steps away from future success, Vice Chancellor Deborah Freund said Wednesday.

Freund, who came to SU in August from Indiana University at Bloomington, presented a five-point plan to a faculty-filled Maxwell Auditorium as part of her State of the University address.

"She has an understanding of the university," said Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw, who introduced Freund. "All five points she made were all right on target."

Freund called for improvements to faculty recruitment and retention, as well as graduate and undergraduate programs. She also proposed campus renovation plans and called for a higher level of diversity in students and faculty.

"It was pleasing that she didn't have 15," he said. "I think they are all things on which we have to take initiative. There will be trade-offs as far as what to emphasize, but the vice chancellor is not going to bring things up just to talk about them.

"We want to focus on a few things and do them well."

Making room
SU has $170 million to spend on establishing more space for academic departments, Freund said.

Many departments, particularly in the humanities, need this space, she added. Since the university does not have the humanities, need this space, she added.

College details embezzlement

The Syracuse University School of Architecture reported Thursday $12,738.85 missing from their work study budget, according to a police report.

Police are investigating two SU architecture students, Bruce Sparano and Mark Rhodes, on charges of embezzlement, the report said.

The two students are suspected of collecting the money by lying on time cards about the actual number of hours they worked, the report said.

Sparano allegedly received what the school said was an excess of $11,190.10 for work that he did not do, the report said. Sparano has worked for the school since 1996, the report said.

Rhodes, who started working for the school last semester, allegedly took $1,548.75, the report said.

Neither student could be reached for comment.

A resident of the Alpha Phi sorority house, 308 Walnut Pl., reported Tuesday repeated harassment calls, according to a police report.

College students drive the U.S. anti-sweatshop movement, said a National Labor Committee official Wednesday.

"Don't underestimate the enormous power you've got," Charles Kernaghan, executive director of the committee, told 500 students assembled in Grant Auditorium. "Anybody who tells you otherwise is lying. This battle is only going to be won by pressure."

The New York Public Interest Research Group and the Student Coalition on Organized Labor invited Kernaghan to speak about his role in the movement.

"They don't tell you that millions of children made the clothing. It's criminal."

WILKINSBURG, Pa. — A gunman set fire to his apartment, killed one man and critically wounded another Wednesday morning before taking hostages, three condominium residents said. The gunman, who had been living in a drug-infested house for nearly a month, was charged with first-degree murder and three counts of attempted murder.

Police said the gunman, a 25-year-old man, entered the condominium building on Wednesday and shot the first victim, a 35-year-old man, in the living room. The second victim, a 30-year-old man, was shot in the head and died at the scene. The third victim, a 30-year-old woman, died later at the hospital. The gun was recovered at the scene, and police said it was a .44-caliber revolver.

The shooting occurred at the River Park Condominiums, a 13-story building in the city's Chinatown area. Police said the gunman had been living in the building since April and had been involved in a number of incidents, including several shooting incidents.

The shooting was the latest in a series of gun violence in the city, which has seen a spike in shootings and murders this year. Police said they were investigating the shooting as an act of gang violence.

National greeks debate campus hazing, punishments

BY JOY DAVIA

The action of one Sigma Chi brother at George Washington University ended that chapter's presence on that campus last month and symbolized a threat facing greek houses across the nation.

Drawing on a history of chapter violations going back to 1997, Sigma Chi's international organization suspended the chapter after a brother threw a bottle out a fraternity house window and at a maintenance worker.

The Sigma Chi incident is one in a variety of alleged incidents by greek individuals that have reflected upon and — in the case of George Washington University — ended a greek chapter.

“Sigma Chi believes in the philosophy that one individual’s actions reflect on the entire chapter,” said Ryan Rosebip, the director of chapter development for the fraternity’s international organization. “For that reason we hold the chapter accountable.”

Greek international and national organizations direct the policies of campus chapters, and not all of them suspend a chapter for the actions of one member.

At the University of Wisconsin earlier this semester, five Delta Delta Delta sisters were suspended from their sorority for hazing, said Katherine Helms, chapter service coordinator for the international TriDelt organization.

“Sigma Chi has done nothing to Members apart from others and anything that subjects a person to ridicule. It’s not cut and dry physical harm to a member,” she added.

Education teaches its members that hazing is more than just physical abuse, she said.

“Hazing is not always what is put on TV,” Helms said. “They are not beating anyone.”

For the University of Wisconsin TriDelt, hazing consists of anything that separates a member apart from others and includes anything that subjects a person to ridicule.

The investigation process will “hopefully” conclude by the end of the week, Walsh said.

A O Pi is not suspended at this time, Goldberg said. But the new members are not allowed to participate in sorority activities for the time being, she added.

“Right now our pledges are temporarily inactive,” Goldberg said. “We hope to have them back in a few days once this is all cleared up.”

The Kansas State University chapter faces punishments ranging from campus suspension to fines and membership review, he added.

The investigation, conducted by OGL, found sufficient evidence of hazing, the university said.

If OGL finds sufficient evidence of hazing, the university will take action against both A O Pi and the girls found in that fraternity's international organization.

“A O Pi is not suspended at this time, Goldberg said. But the new members are not allowed to participate in sorority activities for the time being, she added.

Bush campaign propels student activism

TIFFANY LANKES

Campaign strategies targeted at college-aged voters make Texas Gov. George W. Bush the students' choice for president, said Scott Stewart, chairman of the College Republicans National Committee.

This has been the most active Republican campaign in years, Stewart said. "Just look at the growth of young people coming to the primary polls. More young people have voted in this year's primaries than ever before."

Republican presidential hopefuls Bush and Arizona Sen. John McCain made extensive campaign efforts to encourage youth participation in government, Stewart added.

"They're specifically addressing young people," Stewart said. "They're actively going out and asking young people to participate."

Already courting eight state Republican primary wins, Bush now prepares for 11 more state contests, including one in New York next week on "Super Tuesday."

An advocate of tax relief, educational reform and economic advancements, Bush has also won the support of New York state Gov. George E. Pataki and Syracuse Mayor Roy A. Bernardi.

Student interest in issues including tax relief and economic opportunity upon graduation are key factors influencing young voter turnout, said Joe Burns, a Bush supporter and chairman of the Syracuse University College Republicans.

Bush supports a reduction of federal income taxes, a plan that would enable working citizens to receive more from their wages, said Burns, a junior political science and history major.

"George Bush's tax relief plan will provide real money in the hands of real people," Burns said. "That's very important in this area, and especially for college students who will be out in the working world in a few years."

Republican spokesman Jim Parenti agreed, saying that cutting taxes by decreasing government spending has been a long-standing, yet unsuccessful goal in New York state.

Bush's tax cuts in Texas during his gubernatorial run resulted in about $2 billion to the working class, he added.

"That's very impressive to be able to cut the cost at which government operates," Parenti said. "That's something we'd love to do in New York. (Bush) has indicated that if he were to implement similar programs nationally, he would be able to do it.

Bush's integrity and ability to defend his stance on controversial issues such as affirmative action also make him an appealing candidate, Parenti said. Principles are a key component to any presidential campaign, he added.

On the issue of...

- Health Care: plans to expand medical savings accounts, proposed tax incentives to small businesses to provide health care to employees, would encourage everyone to contribute to Medicare, increasing coverage for the elderly.
- Affirmative Action: supports a plan where that would not have funding shifted to charter schools, proposed a plan to build 2,000 charter schools nationwide.

Bush is a pro-life candidate who opposes abortion laws, except in the cases of rape, incest or when a woman's life is endangered.

He has the courage to say what he believes and not back down. The other candidates in the race at the time, Gary Bauer and Alan Keyes, only combined for 9 percent of the vote.

After the New Hampshire victory, McCain began to gain on Bush in polls across the country. McCain grabbed victories in Michigan and his home state of Arizona on Feb. 23, while Bush won this week's contests in Washington, Virginia and North Dakota.

Candidates need a total of 1,034 delegates to secure the Republican nomination.

McCain ballot battle leads to anticipated Super Tuesday

A few months ago, John McCain's New York state supporters were as confident as if their candidate would appear on the ballot in New York state but is unable to teach children the correct values, said Greg Burns, a Bush supporter and chairman of the Syracuse University College Republicans.

Keyes conveys steadfast principles

BY ASHLEIGH GRAF

Ambassador Alan Keyes stands strong on many controversial issues.

The Republican presidential hopeful wasted no time in declaring his policies on those issues including abortion, education, gun control, affirmative action and moral equality.

"He's not wishy-washy like the other candidates," said Noah Coldman, the editor of the New York state chapter of Students for Keyes. "You can renew something of a sense of morality."

No woman has the right to abortion, according to Keyes. "I feel that all humans, fetuses included, are created equal," the campaign said.

Keyes believes that euthanasia and suicide also take away the right to life — no one has the right to take their own life, he said.

A strong proponent of education reform, Keyes feels the government is wasting its money by supporting public schools that are unable to teach children the correct values, said Greg Legnisi, the Keyes campaign coordinator for New York state.

"Any good conservative can tell you the public schools are in shambles," Legnisi said.

Government and religion should not be completely separated, he added. Children should have moral guidance in school. Even families of lower income should have the opportunity to send their children to a school that reflects their faith.

"We can't force people to pray, but you can give people the option to have that option," he said.

Keyes conveys his stand on education in a series of nine videotapes, "Coaching the Children," which he released last year.

"We could be more American here. As a country, we're not looking too far into the future of our children's education," he said.

"You need a cooperative gathering between parents and the community," Keyes said.

The country's lack of morality is the general cause for the fall in the level of education, Legnisi said. U.S. students are testing lower than other industrialized nations, he added.

"This is America where we should be on top of the pile," he said.

Gore uses policies to combat image

Being stiff in front of the camera should not take precedence over the real issues, said Vice President Albert Gore.

In these days of short evening news profiles, lack of congeniality can easily alienate voters, he said.

"They say he comes off as wooden," she said. "But what he lacks in TV cues and ratings, he more than makes up for in his legislative skill and ability as a legislator.

Gore, a Democrat and presidential hopeful, is a staunch supporter of environmental protection and has authored a book entitled "The Future for the Environment: Ecology and the Human Spirit." In the past, Gore has endorsed the views of Republicans of being anti-environment. In 1995 he reportedly blasted Republicans for trying to "eviscerate" a Clinton administration proposal for a dam in the Snake River.

According to a March 1 Zagat Survey of 455 likely Democratic voters, Bradley is trailing opponent Vice President Al Gore in the March 7 state primary, 32 percent to 5 percent, respectively.

But people find Bradley appealing because he is not afraid to fight for legislation that would be unpopular in Congress, Wachtel said.

Bradley strives for more party leadership, voters

While recent polls suggest that former New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley's popularity is waning, supporters believe that his policy proposals would lead the country toward a prosperous 21st century.

"I think that Bill Bradley makes people believe that big problems can be solved in this country," said Steve Wachtel, Bradley's New Jersey campaign coordinator. "People view him as someone with a lot of experience and integrity."

Bradley's plan calls for eliminating "Saturday Night Specials," handguns that are typically used in street crimes and bought for less than $100.

The proposal also includes limiting handgun purchases to one per month, requiring trigger locks on handguns and obligating background checks of potential gun buyers at gun shows.

"Anyone who tells you a background check can't be written into a national database, such as the FBI has, is selling a line to the public," Snyder said. "It's just bullshit."

• Education: Branches of the New Jersey family have always been pro-education, said Brooke Schiferle, coordinator of SUN for Bill Bradley.

"I think it's absolutely incredible," she said. "His helpfulness is outstanding." Bradley's plan is divided into proposals for children, adults and senior citizens.

"The first part of Bradley's health care proposal would guarantee health care for all children until they are 19 years old," said Schiferle, a senior political science major.

Bradley would also work to have affordable health care access for all adults, she said.

This would help the elderly deal with the unique obstacles that confront them at that point in their life," Schiferle said. Much like his health care proposal, Bradley is looking to make changes at all levels of the education system, he added.

Bradley is looking to make the U.S. educational system more accountable and better able to serve students, said Scott Lipton, a junior political science major.

"He still believes in letting the youth of America get the early education they need," Lipton said.

Health care reform plan boosts Bill Bradley

It takes a strong man to gain respect on both the hardwood of a professional basketball court and on the floor of the United States Senate.

Bill Bradley did both with ease. The former New York Knick and New Jersey Senator's leadership skills and forward-thinking approach earned him the Democratic nomination for U.S. President.

Bradley brings the politics of equality to the polls. He has separated himself from the White House establishment through his bold health care reform plan.

Bradley's plan is gutsy, and it paves the way for sweeping changes in the managed care system. When President Clinton's health care plan faltered on the Senate floor six years ago, 33 million Americans remained uninsured. Today, the number has leapt to 44 million. Bradley's plan, over time, would provide tax breaks and government subsidies to bring quality health care to even the poorest communities in the nation.

But its success depends solely on funds from the projected $3 trillion budget surplus. Although Bradley hopes the program will eventually become self-sustaining, he admits that it will be a black hole for government dollars in the meantime. He's taking a risk — treading a slippery slope. There's no guarantee that today's strong economy can be sustained through a Bradley term in office, and a recession could swiftly wipe out the funds on which he is banking.

There's a crafty method behind Bradley's seemingly pie-in-the-sky proposal, though. His liberal plan for universal, government-subsidized health care will surely moot a nasty firewall in liberal plans for universal, government-subsidized health care. Though seemingly pie-in-the-sky proposal, though, his program of "tailored reforms" for the health care system as a whole, including Medicare, is a realistic, honest and he embodies the best of the Democratic party. Never one to water down his liberal policies to pander to Republicans or more moderate members of his own party, Bradley can be trusted to develop new ideas and take a stand when carrying them out.

McCain offers Americans reform, leadership

Arizona Senator John McCain brings a familiar face to politics. Americans see a piece of themselves in him.

McCain offers Americans the chance for a renewed faith in government. He is a person of genuine integrity, not a polka-faced candidate. The Daily Orange endorses him as the Republican nominee for the U.S. presidency.

Unlike his Republican competitor, Texas Gov. George W. Bush, who is merely a party line to make change. He backs efforts to secure school choice programs and is a supporter of Republican backwards "straight talk express" campaign. McCain's program of "tailored reforms" for the health care system as a whole, including Medicare, is a wise move, since the 65-plus population will more than double within the next decade.

McCain is prepared to restore integrity to the presidential office. He offers the nation's conservatives a chance to vote for the upstanding character and solid set of ideals that has always alluded them at the polls.

After a series of anti-hazing seminars urging Syracuse University's 2000 pledging period to be free of alcohol- and drug-related mishaps, the greek system is scrambling to explain why two Omegas Pi pledges ended up in the hospital Sunday night after an evening of reckless intoxication.

The A Ω Pi president reported that the two freshmen — along with four other A Ω Pi pledges who were found drunk in Flint Hall — hadn't been drinking during a sorority-sponsored event.

But the fact remains: While all members of the greek system should strive to maintain their independence, they must also be aware that they wear their letters everywhere. Just one unmonitored slip-up can cast the whole greek system into the shadows of a hazing scandal.

Greeks pride themselves on their strong sense of brotherhood and sisterhood. But when a couple of freshmen drink themselves into an oblivion on a Sunday night, it’s clear that no big sib has been looking out for them.

And if the office of Greek Life or Judicial Affairs determine that the incident was hazing-related, then the burden also falls on the pledges to take responsibility for their actions. Some Greeks don’t drink, and nothing forces new members to fall to peer pressure.

Women, especially, should strive to engender a sense of personal responsibility in their pledges where drugs and alcohol are concerned. Dozens of women are sexually assaulted each year, and spending weekends in a drunken stupor isn’t about lining up empty beer bottles on the walls of that precious community, but about earning the right to call those walls home.

Greeks, keep your eyes open all the time, or the walls of that precious community could collapse around you in no time.

Editorial

Taking television classes makes it exceedingly easy to put off schoolwork. As soon as I put down the remote, I can immediately rationalize watching some TV. "After all," I say, "this is just like schoolwork." This rationalization is even easier thanks to the wealth of "educational" programming offered by fifty-one new channels and cable television. I can watch PBS, The Discovery Channel, C-SPAN, or even The Learning Channel. I can get history, science, geography, politics and just about anything else I want, as long as I am ever cracking a book. If I rationalize hard enough, I can even convince the little voice that says "you should be studying," into saying "you are studying.

There are certainly a lot of programs on television that have great educational value, but clutching the remote control in the hopes of getting a master's degree without leaving my couch is a bit delusional.

Often, in these hallucinogenic states of procrastination, I flip to The History Channel, hoping to be educated that night. I can get history, science, geography, politics and just about anything else I want, as long as I am ever cracking a book. If I rationalize hard enough, I can even convince the little voice that says "you should be studying," into saying "you are studying.

But beware, in the televersc, things are not always as they seem. The History Channel, by name alone, seems like it would be a respectable authority on historical matters. The ominous "H" logo, etched in the lower right-hand corner, almost seems like a label that says "be careful, this is history." Without consulting my better judgement, my brain just assumes that we're about to be educated.

Sadly, this is not entirely accurate. In researching a paper I wrote recently about The History Channel, I uncovered the awful truth. My heart sank when Professor Levine from the history department calmly informed me of the difference between popular history and academic history.

The main goal of The History Channel is entertainment, not education. Just like television news programs, they are usually more concerned with the ratings than with the actual information. The History Channel is a business, and not subject to the formal methods, procedures and peer evaluations that most academic historians must undergo.

Again, much of the programming on The History Channel is very informative and certainly entertaining, but it isn’t always the whole truth. I know from the start of the project that The History Channel was quite militant in its historical fiction. Almost a third of their programs contain overt references to weapons or combat in their titles. I also knew that they tended to be very nationalistic, glorifying the valiant battles of World War II, while shying away from shame of Vietnam.

I was somehow unprepared for what I found. In my research I discovered everything from twisted facts to outright lies. One program about the Tokyo war crimes trials made unsubstantiated statements about the minds of Japanese officers. A show about the Korean War didn’t contain the viewpoint of a single Asian person.

The worst of all was "Inferno: The True Story of Dresden." I would have assumed that even popular history would consider the bombing of Dresden, Germany, to be the single largest bombing in the history of warfare. This is a topic important enough to warrant the attention of professional documentarians. Instead, The History Channel contracted Terment Arts, Inc., a production company that is better known for programs like "Busted on the Job." To give you an idea of Terment’s qualifications, "Busted on the Job" once featured a woman urinating on her boss’s office furniture in retaliation for being fired.

In addition, the only historian consulted in "Inferno" is David Irving, a well-known Nazi apologist. Irving, who wrote the introduction to "The Leuchter Report," is a infamous denial of the holocaust, has denied that Auschwitz was ever a death camp. He has also said Anne Frank’s diary is not even a diary, but a piece of "educational entertainment of any value.

Despite all this, "Inferno" identifies Irving as a "controversial historian" and fails to mention any of his best known views on relevant topics such as the holocaust.

You can learn a lot from television, but like any- thing else, it cannot be taken at face value. Keep procrastinating, but try to look critically.

Daily Orange lauded for positive coverage

To the editor:

We all know about the lunacy of the SU Hill. This reality of college life seems like a weird dream to me more than anything. Whether it’s sitting or sleeping through seemingly pointless classes or dealing with the ridiculousness of the bars on the weekends. Syracuse University never ceases to amaze me with all of the utter bullshit that takes place.

I was actually glad to read The Daily Orange on Tuesday. It brought out two good stories that depict the decency of some of the people who care about society. Magazine in McKenna’s article about McPherson’s Mentors touched a piece of news that deserves recognition.

I personally worked with Don McPherson for four years in high school as part of a Student-Athlete Leadership Team, sponsored by the New York Mets, that involved high schoolers talking about issues with that younger students in our district. McPherson spent many hours with us going over how to relay strong values such as good decision-making techniques to youngsters who looked up to us. Sometimes, we found, they just didn’t feel comfortable talking about the racier topics with their parents, teachers or even other adults for that matter. I encourage SU to give as much support as possible to this program.

Ethan Thomas, a junior at the South Side Newsstand, also, deserves the print that is usually taken up by scandals and violations. It is a nice breath of fresh air to read such a statement from a student athlete. His groups on this campus get plenty of negative publicity, but rarely is anything positive published.

Sterotypes still rule the Hill, but I give the best to the D.O. for finally rising above all of this nonsense and printing the good things that we all are capable of taking it in hand. The majority of students on this campus have realized that it is necessary to give back to society as much and even more goodwill than society has given to you.

in the anti-sweatshop movement.

"He's probably the foremost expert in labor practices in the country," said Edward Freund, a UBIG coordinator for Syracuse University and the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry. "There's really no better person to ask about this campus."

Known as the "man who made Kathie Lee Gifford cry," Kernaghan achieved notoriety when he exposed the sweatshop practices used by Gifford's clothing label, Niki, in the late 1980s.

During a routine trip to Honduras to investigate the labor practices at Wal-Mart, Kernaghan discovered that the store's Kathie Lee Gifford women's clothing line was being manufactured by children under harsh conditions.

The Kathie Lee Gifford label was in the palm of my hand," Kernaghan said of his discovery. "She said that she would see me if I kept talking about her. But I can't help myself!"

During this time, 15-year-old Wendi Diaz, one of the children employed in the sweatshops, traveled to the United States on behalf of the National Labor Committee to speak about the sweatshop conditions at both Gifford and the public.

"She tells Kathie Lee Gifford what it's like to earn 31 cents an hour, to go bed hungry, what you feel like when the manager throws pants in your face and calls you a "sh*thead,"" he added. "It's only fate that Wendi was in Honduras when you're sitting here."

Gifford publicly denied any prior knowledge that her label was produced in sweatshops by children and now donates a percentage of her profits to children's charities.

"They don't tell you that children made the clothing," Kernaghan said. "Wal-Mart needs to learn, and Kathie Lee Gifford needs to learn, that you can't help children in the United States off the backs of children in Honduras, by yanking it in."

Throughout the 90-minute lecture, which was followed by a 30-minute question and answer session, Kernaghan attacked the labor practices of Wal-Mart and Nike Apparel.

Wal-Mart denies all allegations of unfair labor practices.

In October, Nike released 42 factory locations that produce apparel for five colleges and universities in the United States.

Kernaghan described women working more than 80-hour workweeks and being paid "starvation" wages by corporations like Wal-Mart and Nike.

Kernaghan said that a $1 million anonymous donation to the United States is needed to continue pursuing the practices of Wal-Mart and Nike.

Wal-Mart's reputation has been tarnished by several labor practices of companies like Nike, Kernaghan added. You should not allow Syracuse University to continue purchasing clothing that are made in factories all over the world, Kernaghan said.

"If you are a university you support human rights and basic dignity," Kernaghan said.

Kernaghan described a situation last summer when he took a 30-minute question and answer lecture, which was followed by a 30-minute question and answer session, Kernaghan attacked the labor practices of Wal-Mart and Nike Apparel.

Kernaghan called religious advocates that American companies publicly disclose the names and addresses of overseas factories. It also asks that colleges and universities across the country demand higher standards of labor practices of companies like Nike, Kernaghan added.

He also proposed strategies to incorporate public service as a requirement for welfare recipients.

Bushi now looks to the nation, especially college students, for support in his endeavor to follow his fa-thor, former president George Bush, to the White House, Parenti said.

The college vote is very important, he said. "We hope every-student at the university would take the time to look at the candidates and decide for themselves who best fits their needs."

KEYES

Keys also feels it is the duty of every U.S. citizen to own a gun tool, and not to allow the government to take it away from them.

"It is the opportunity to participate in a nationally recognized Republican primary," Keyes said.

"If we do not come from the gun, it comes from the hearts of those yielding the gun," Keyes said.

Along with gun control, Keyes is firmly opposed to affirmative action, according to cam-baign reports.

Affirmative action began during the 1960s to promote racial equality. This good-intentioned policy don't necessarily in students' and minorities feel inadequate — that they cannot succeed only on the basis of their skills, according to Keyes' campaign.

Several military issues also need to be closely examined, Legakis said. "There are many men fresh out of high school, with hormones raging, and they are not able to concentrate on national defense if they are distracted by a woman in the ranks, he said.

Gays in the military also pose very interesting questions, he added.

"There can't be a guy in one stall worrying if another guy is looking at him funny," Legakis said.

This is a sign of moral decline in the U.S. military, as well as in the United States itself, he said.

"You need to have a fighting machine with strong morals," he said.

These principles are appliable to all U.S. citizens, Legakis added.

"They would have to do to benefit college students would benefit the nation," he said.

MCCAIN

stated his Super Tuesday

"This is the first time in more than 30 years that New Yorkers have the opportunity to participate in a nationally recognized Republican primary," McCain said.

"One, I might add, that the state party leadership tried to prevent from happening," McCain said.

State party leaders and Bush supporters, including Gov. George E.
Pataki and Bill Powers, state party chairman, led the campaign to keep McCain's message out of print.

McCain needs the votes of all
New Yorkers, including college University students, to defeat the established Republican machine and break the state's two-decade republican winning streak, he said.

McCain's message attracts a diverse voter base, McCain said he believes that the message will expand particularly well to McCain's message of reform.

"One of his key principles is trying to alleviate cynicism and politics as usual," Flood explained.

"That's a weird way to appeal to more than 35 million people and voters and students."

Some of the actions and pandering by politicians like Bush contribute to the lack of political moeral in the country, he said.

"McCain does not pull young voters what they want to hear for political gain, but rather tries to identify empathy and expose students about the political process, he added.

"This is a different kind of message," Flood said. "I think McCain is saying that politics is above all that political correctness something bigger."

"If McCain wants to win New York state, however, he must appeal to all members of the Republican Party, not just the base students, said Gina DeRossi, secretary of the McCain campaign.

"Right now he's getting this image that he's not a true Republican," DeRossi said. "That's obviously causing problems, especially in those close elections.

Some of McCain's primary victories came in states with open elections where independent voters were allowed to vote in any primary even if they were not registered in the Republican or Democratic Party, she added.

"We have now, might consider voting independents, she added.

The victim was unable to be reached for comment.

■ An unidentified suspect stole two bicycles, valuing $1,100 total, Sunday from the basement of a house on the 800 block of Lancaster Avenue, according to a police report.

Carolyn Rose, a junior industrial design major, said she kept her bike in a neighbor’s basement, which she used for storage and laundry facilities.

“I went to do my laundry on Sunday, and I saw that it wasn’t there,” Rose said.

The basement door knob was broken and a key was needed to get the door open, she added.

“It couldn’t be opened without the key,” she said. “But I guess they found a way.”

There was no forced entry, the report said.

“There were no broken windows,” said Stephen Cislo, a resident and senior at Lafayette College. “Hopefully there’s a chance they will find it.”

■ Two SU students found their shared computer missing Sunday when they returned to their apartment on the 500 block of University Avenue, according to a police report.

The victims told police that the suspect entered their apartment between 9 p.m. Saturday and 3 a.m. Sunday, the report said.

The back door may have been unlocked, the report added. The victims found the door slightly open, the report said.

The students first thought that a friend had borrowed the IBM computer, valuing $800, the report said.

The students later found a $200 Sony PlayStation video game also missing, the report said.

The students refused to comment on the situation.

■ An unidentified person shattered a window Tuesday of a house on the 100 block of Euclid Avenue, according to a police report.

Residents heard glass break and found a dining room window broken by a small rock, the report said.

The rock, thrown from the sidewalk or street, broke through the screen and window pane, the report said.

There are no witnesses, the report added.

■ Senior Greg Nason’s car was broken into on the 500 block of Euclid Avenue for the third time since he came to SU, according to a police report.

“This is the third time my car was broken into in Syracuse, and the fourth time in New York state,” said Nason, an imaging major.

The culprit broke the rear left window, the report said.

“The same window was broken last time,” Nason said.

The suspect stole the stereo from the car, plus, did the stereo faceplate not being there, Nason said.

Nason said he believes that the thief is someone who has driven in his car before, he added.

“The trunk was opened, but they didn’t take the VCR that was in there,” Nason said. “The VCR is broken. It looks fine, but it eats tapes. I think that whoever did this knew the VCR was already broken.”

The stereo, valuing $250, was the only thing missing, Nason added.

“I have an idea of who it is,” he said. “But I can’t prove anything.”

■ A Syracuse basketball fan found his car, parked in the Ali-brand Catholic Center parking lot on University Avenue, broken into and his cellular phone missing Feb. 23, according to a police report.

Raymond Meiner, owner of the 1998 Toyota Forerunner, was attending an SU basketball game at the Carrier Dome, the report said.

“I parked in good light and close to the read,” Meiner said. “The passenger side window was shattered.”

The car alarm sounded, Meiner said.

“There was a wrench in the front seat,” he said. “The thief must have panicked at the sound of the alarm.”

The cost to replace the broken window is $250, he added.

There have been eight other car break-ins this semester, according to police reports.

■ An SU sophomore lost her driver’s license plate and the car license expired in January, the report said.

The Syracuse City Police Department called for more than 20 car keys this semester from neighborhoods surrounding the university, according to police reports.

The owners received citations for illegally parking and obstructing roadways, the reports said.

Hacking away
As members of Congress get down to the details of how to toughen federal statutes against cybercrime, they are wading over a thorny issue: What to do about teenage hackers?

The usual suspects for computer hacking have been teenage boys who are alienated from high school classmates and have inept social skills and want to show off their computer expertise, legal experts say. But most federal computer-crime cases are filed and won against adults. Following last month's attacks against several commercial Web sites, federal lawmakers are considering ways to crack down on teenage hackers.

Harsh laughter
A baby's first laugh should bring only joy. But for a small number of children, some early giggles can signal a rare brain abnormality characterized by seizures and an unprovoked urge to burst out laughing, it's caused by a congenital brain lesion called a hypothalamic hamartoma. The urges don't always produce laughter, and many patients find the feeling unpleasant, scientists say. The disorder can last through the patient's lifetime, and though drugs can control the seizures, sufferers can feel the urge to laugh up to 10 times a day.

Coming up roses
The English garden's image is of honeyed Cotswold stone framed by cherry red climbing roses. But icons change, and although Britain's National Trust may have done a great preservative job of preserving the quaintness of these models for tourists, the privately designed space today is more likely to be as edgy as the latest track from Oasis. The English fascination with plants and the domestic occupation with garden crafts both yield to a bigger idea of the garden as sculpture: land art for the back yard.

Olestra is a butter and fat substitute with some negative side effects.

BY DOMINIC FRANCENE
Staff Writer

Late night snacking stakes a claim in almost every college student. All the willpower in the world sometimes cannot keep one's hand from reaching for that tempting bag of chips or another tasty treat.

But, largely due to a relatively new snack food ingredient, these indulgences may not mean bulging out of those black pants or forming a pockety.

Olestra, a fat alternative known by it's brand name, Olean, is showing up more and more in the snack food aisle, and lately more often in students diets.

Olestra was introduced to the public by Proctor and Gamble in early 1996, after 25 years and $200 million in development. It is a man-made fat composed of vegetable oil and sugar. Although made of natural ingredients, the Olestra molecule is too large for the body to absorb. The substance therefore, passes through the body and is excreted without being digested or absorbed.

The benefit of this process is that Olestra adds no fat to foods, allowing people to snack more and more without as much guilt as before. Unfortunately, this snacking doesn't bring about the desired effects.

"People think that fat-free means I can eat more," Syracuse University Food Services Nutritionist Julia Salomon said.

The Center claims that over 15,000 people have reported symptoms of adverse reactions to Olestra.

The reactions have led to embarrassment, missed time at work and emergency room visits. A 70-year-old woman even had to be rushed to the emergency room after eating only one ounce of Lay's
Wowl chips, the Center re-

In a December 1998 press release, Michael P. Jacobson, executive director of the Center, called for a ban of Olestra.

"Severe side effects might be acceptable from a cancer drug, but they are completely unacceptable from a food ad-itive consumed by millions of people," said Jacobson.

Some food companies are also angry because foods containing Olestra are labeled "fat-free," even though Olestra contains indigestible fat.

Even with the fat-free label and lower seem to want to suffer the possible consequences.

By late 1999, Olestra sales were 30 to 40 percording to Proctor and Gam-

A Thomas three-point play temporarily silenced the raucous crowd of 11,418 until Notre Dame pulled to 65-64 on Macura's final trey of the game.

He took a pass from Graves, who had penetrated through the Orangemen's defense and buried the right-wing shot.

The stage was set for another SU senior to take over. On back-to-back possessions, Hart used a high double-screen to free himself for driving layups that pushed the lead back to five.

Hart finished with 16 points and six assists, even though he picked up his fourth foul with more than 14 minutes to play.

"We went to him (down the stretch), and we've been going to him all year," Boeheim said. "He's made big shots and big plays for us."

With the game still in doubt, the noisy Notre Dame crowd impacted on the game. Upset with the officiating, Irish fans tossed a variety of objects toward the floor.

After the first object hit the hardwood, ND head coach Matt Doherty addressed the capacity crowd and issued a warning.

However, the actions continued, and the team received a technical foul following a foul on Blackwell with 8.8 seconds remaining and SU clinging to a two-point lead.

Blackwell hit two of the four free throws, and seconds later, Damone Brown hit another to extend the lead to five points.

Murphy, who finished with 20 points, drilled a final-second 3-pointer to close out the scoring.

The technical, however, did not play a roll in the outcome of the game, both coaches said.

"I warned them to stop after first, but it's (the team's) fault," Doherty said. "If we had played the first half like we did the second half, it wouldn't have mattered. We would have been up 10 points."

Syracuse continued to get strong play from its bench. Although he didn't record gaudy numbers, Allen Griffin played a tremendous floor game, Boeheim said.

Irish-killer Preston Shumpert — who scorched ND for 26 points on six 3-pointers in SU's Jan. 16 win at the Carrier Dome — continued to shoot the ball well. He drained three first-half threes, including one 2.9 seconds before halftime to give SU a 45-31 lead.

"Preston Shumpert was ridiculous," Doherty said. "I'll have to look at the tape to see how closely he was guarded on some of those shots.

"He's paying me back for not recruiting him at Kansas. I went to watch him play at camp to replace Paul Pierce, and now that kid is paying me back."
Big games loom for conference teams

We're less than a week away from the Big East Tournament, and hardly anything is set in stone. Fans know one thing about the Orangemen — they will have a first-round bye.

By virtue of Wednesday night's win over Notre Dame, they pushed their lead to a full game over St. John's and Miami. With just one game left on the schedule, Syracuse (24-3, 13-2 Big East) should win Maddison Square Garden with the No. 1 seed.

Southern Showdown

If Syracuse does beat Connecticut on Saturday, the game between Miami and St. John's will be a battle for second place. It should be a fun contest.

In the game against Pittsburgh, Jennings posted 10 assists, his fifth double-figure output of the season.

Walking the plank

That popping sound you hear could be Seton Hall's bubble bursting. The Pirates (18-14, 10-6) finished the season by losing four of their last five games.

And everyone knows the NCAA selection committee likes to take teams that are playing well coming into the tournament.

Winning ways

Although it hasn't exactly played up to expectations this season, UConn has still been successful. After all, the defending national champions had a tough act to follow.

The Huskies' 74-69 win at Rutgers on Monday night guaranteed a winning record in the conference this season.

Clawing their way up

Villanova is making its move into the Big East standings. The Wildcats (18-10, 8-7) have won five of their last six, including a win Saturday over Seton Hall. Villanova's recent push has helped the team pass Notre Dame in the standings.

It's middle of the road teams like the Cats and Irish that make it anyone's guess as to how many teams will be left in the Big East when the tournament begins.

The big four — Syracuse, St. John's, Miami and UConn — are locks. But Seton Hall, Nova and Notre Dame (16-13, 7-8) all have slight chances to make it. If the Wildcats can finish with a few more wins and then make a strong run in the Big East Championships, they might be able to make it at least five conference teams in the Big Dance.

The Irish superstar and Thomas, but the SU center still managed to take 13 shots, securing the victory against the Orange, allowing the Orangemen with two more points.

"I think we did a good job looking for him," Boeheim said. "I think we can still do even a better job. He was active."

The Irish's focus on Thomas also opened up the inside for SU's 3-point sharpshooters, who took full advantage, hitting 10 threes.

Time and again, however, it was Thomas who silenced the rowdy crowd at the JACC. It's No. 1 vs. No. 2, the Orangemen have personality. They have flair. They have what it takes to win their first championship since 1995. To opponents, Powell's No. 22 is like Hyster Pryne's 'A', a revealing sign that says: watch out. Syracuse outlasts Irish

BY ERIC NATHAN

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Let the madness begin.

On the first day of March, Syracuse and Notre Dame duked out a classic 12-round bout, previewing a hectic month ahead for both basketball squads.

The Fighting Irish waived goodbye to three seniors in their final game at a packed Joyce Athletic and Convocation Center, but it was an Orangemen senior who stole the show in a 73-72 SU win.

The victory gave Syracuse (24-3, 13-2) a share of the Big East regular-season championship.

SU senior Ryan Blackwell tallied 24 points — 15 in the first half — on 9-of-15 shooting.

He heaved the Irish defense with 11 of SU’s first 15 points, knocking down two 3-pointers in the stretch.

There are times when he gets the ball at the top of the key and he’s looking in to me, and they say off,” SU center Etan Thomas said. “We always tell him, ‘Shoot it.’ He can make that shot, and it’s just a matter of him having the confidence to do it.”

Blackwell added seven rebounds, six assists and three steals along with his excellent defensive effort against the Big East’s leading scorer, Troy Murphy.

Murphy scored 20 points, dealing with Blackwell and Thomas, the Big East’s leading shot-blocker. The 6-foot-9 center menaced Blackwell as a help-side defender, complementing Blackwell’s on-the-ball pressure.

The Murphy-led Golden Domers (16-13, 7-8) fell in the late rounds — and also probably fell out of a possible NCAA Tournament bid — but did so with a strong fight.

Entering the second half faced with a 14-point deficit, they staged a huge comeback to pull with in a point.

In the end, however, SU’s first-half lead was too large for ND to make up.

The Orangemen built a 16-point lead — the largest margin of the game — with 11:39 remaining thanks to the hot-handed Blackwell’s bank 3-pointer.

ND then fought back with a 15-2 run covering six minutes to trim SU’s lead to 62-59. The spurt featured 3-balls from David Graves, Jere Macura, Mike Monserez and Jimmy Dillon.

“When you’re up a lot, teams come back — that’s the way it goes,” SU point guard Jason Hart said. “They hit some big three threes, but fortunately we were able to hold them off.”

BY CONNOR ENNIS

St. John’s guard Erick Barkley and Auburn forward Chris Porter were both suspended indefinitely Wednesday.

Barkley’s suspension stems from financial aid he received while a prep student at Maine Central Institute. SJU’s investigation concluded no rules violations took place. But the NCAA disagreed, forcing school president the Rev. Donald Harrington to declare Barkley ineligible.

“Our focus now is getting Erick Barkley reinstated,” said SJU athletic director Ed Manetta. “We worked with the NCAA to come to a resolution.”

Auburn lost Porter for an undetermined time period for taking $2,500 from a sports agent. He sat Sunday’s game at Florida and missed practice Wednesday.

Agents have hounded the Tiger players all season, Auburn coach Cliff Ellis said. Team officials chased "suspicious people" out of a hotel lobby on a trip to Louisiana State earlier this season, and the school now uses aliases to check Porter into hotels on the road.

Orangemen mix personality with business

Meet Ryan Powell, the man of two faces.

He runs around the Carrier Dome during the Syracuse men’s lacrosse team practices, flashing his brilliant game and flapping his lips at teammates.

He laughs if they muck up. He yells if they get cracked with a hard check.

He crams when he heads. He goofs and deposits a ball in the back of the cage.

Talk to him on the sideline, and he is a laid-back, easy-going guy.

The senior captain personifies this eclectic 2000 version of the Orangemen.

Syracuse is part rock-and-roll, part three-piece suit.

Meet Danny Steensen, he of the blonde dye-job with patches of pink hair scattered on his scalp.

Meet Joe Ceglia, the smooth-talking 5-foot-8 goalie.

Meet Marshall Abrams, the All-American firefighter with an offensive game to boot.

They’re fun to listen to. Meet Tim Byrnes, the well-spoken team captain and midfielder whose versatility allows him to take face-offs.
Three seasons are gone, but Ryan Powell's hands remain bare.

Three sophomores join perennial All-American Ryan Powell on Syracuse's potent front line.

Three seasons are gone, but Ryan Powell's hands remain bare.

The senior attacker starts his final go-around with the Orangemen this Saturday at Virginia.

But well before the beginning of the 2000 campaign, Powell prepared to make one last run at a national championship — and the ring that accompanies it.

Powell and Syracuse came close to claiming the championship last year but dropped a 10-12 decision to the Cavaliers in the national title game.

The seniors from last season became the first class since 1983 to leave Syracuse without a ring, and Powell said he does not want to see his class come to the same fate.

Helping Powell lead the SU attack most likely will be sophomores Liam Banks and Mike Springer. All three players overflow with talent, but Banks said it's Powell's play that sparks the unit.

"He's an incredible player," Banks said. "My job gets easier every week because he gets the best defense, and he still does his job every week. It opens things up for everybody else, having a Ryan Powell on the team."

Powell, a pre-season All-American, earned that type of praise in his first three collegiate seasons. He is a returning first-team All-American and led the Orangemen with 85 points last year.

Whether it's the popularity of the zone defense or opponents aiming to shut down Syracuse, the once unbeatable Orange attack has lost some of its punch.

The Orangemen ranked No. 9 in the country last season in goals per game.

Every August, a new crop of Orange athletes are shipped in from all over the country.

High school stardom led them to the SU Hill, as they inherit the pride and tradition of the Carrier Dome, a famous number and numerous Final Four appearances.

From Donovan McNabb to John Wallace, high-profile athletes have built a foundation that the SU student athletes of today try to emulate and duplicate.

However, it is not the fresh faces on the football field or the diaper dandies on the basketball court who endure the most pressure from a tradition standpoint.

The Syracuse University lacrosse program — the one of 17 consecutive Final Fours and led by the No. 22 — is one of the most heralded collegiate athletics programs in the nation.

Subsequently, the level of talent pouring into the team each year is among the nation's best.

This year, the tradition continues. "The whole group is very athletic and hard working," assistant coach Roy Sim-

Despite an offer to join a fledgling conference and the lure of NCAA Tournament automatic bids, Syracuse men's lacrosse remains without a league.

BY CHRIS SNOW
Staff Writer

The formation of a new conference and the introduction of automatic qualifications for league champions will shake up this year's Division I men's lacrosse tournament picture and could hurt independent programs such as Syracuse.

Next month, seven teams begin play in the newly formed Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Lacrosse League.

ECAC commissioner Phil Buttafuoco said the NCAA Lacrosse Committee's move to form the new conferences sprouted as an offshoot of the decision to offer each regular-season conference champ an automatic tournament spot.

In addition to the ECAC, the America East, Ivy and Patriot Leagues, as well as a team from the West, will receive automatic qualifiers (AQs) this season. The Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference also will receive an AQ beginning in 2002, Buttafuoco added.

SU head coach John Desko fears that teams stronger than any of those in some conferences might not reach the postseason under the new format. Many of the bubble teams, he said, will be independents.

"The traditional powers, including independent schools like Syracuse that have traditionally supported the sport to the greatest extent, may be getting punished under the new system," said Virginia head coach Dom Starsia, the only Division I coach on the 12-member NCAA Executive Committee.

"Hopefully, automatic bids go hand-in-hand with an expansion of our tournament. That would be best for our sport."

The NCAA Budget Committee is handling the decision passed by the body's Championships/Competition Cabinet to expand the postseason from 12 to 16 teams for the 2000-2001 budget cycle, Starsia said.

This resolution ranks eighth on the Cabinet's priority list developed during its meetings Feb. 1-3, the NCAA News reported Feb. 14. The NCAA estimates the cost of expansion at $104,000, but the D-I Men's Lacrosse Committee believes it will generate $85,000 in additional revenue.

While Desko does not know the odds of this proposal coming to fruition, he believes the planning stages are headed in the right direction.

"The expansion of the tournament field would be wonderful for the sport, and AQs will get the tournament more attention nationwide," he said. "That hopefully will add a little spark to regular-season games, especially within the conferences."

When named ECAC commissioner in July 1998, Buttafuoco took it upon himself to work toward adding excitement to those games. Sending a letter to the then-17 independent programs inviting them to Rutgers, he said,

"The formation of a new conference and the introduction of automatic qualifications for league champions will shake up this year's Division I men's lacrosse tournament picture and could hurt independent programs such as Syracuse."

Next month, seven teams begin play in the newly formed Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Lacrosse League.

"What I didn't like was these coaches and people all getting together in little groups with similar teams and saying, 'Why don't we think about this because it could be our way into the playoffs?,'" he said.

Desko suggests a committee be appointed to deal with conference formations, making sure balance and a strong commitment to maintain scholarships are key ingredients in the formation of any future leagues.

There was some discussion of forming a Big East conference sight to 10 years ago, Desko said. He rules out that possibility today, however, because Georgetown, Rutgers, Notre Dame and Providence all joined conferences.

While he does not cite any one conference as the most dominant, Desko's biggest concern is the fact that the Patriot League and the MAAC failed to place a team in last season's tourney.

"It's a trade off, because being in a league may help somebody," Desko said, "but the tournament might not represent the best teams. That was the beauty of lacrosse."

Desko's fears are unfounded when applied to the ECAC. Georgetown, Maryland-Baltimore County and the Naval Academy, three of the seven schools joining the league, qualified for last season's 12-team tournament. Penn State, Massachusetts, Stony Brook and Rutgers round out incoming ECAC members.

"Starsia's solution to the increased difficulty for independent teams would be to Sophomore Billy St. George started last season in his rookie campaign, but Syracuse's depth could force him into a lesser role this season. Returning for the Syracuse defense are pre-season All-Americans Marshall Abrams and John Glatzel. At an intimidating 6-foot-3, redshirt freshman Solomon Bliss could also see playing time.

With an astounding six national titles and 17 consecutive trips to the Final Four, the Syracuse men's lacrosse team demands attention. Opponents and experts normally notice its potent offensive attack led by Powell brothers. But the 2000 edition of the Orangemen will also feature a deep defensive front as Nos. 7 and 18.

A solid defensive corps returns for the national runner-up, which allowed just 10.24 goals per contest a year ago. "The defense is a good group," head coach John Desko said. "We can put five, six guys out there, and depending on the matchups on attack, we can move people around. We're just trying to improve and eliminate some of the penalties." The close defense goes seven deep and is led by celebrated senior Marshall Abrams. Last year, he racked up a collection of postseason hardware, garnering NCAA All-Tournament Team and STX/USILA second-team All-America honors.

The accolades continue to roll in for the senior captain, who finds himself on Face-Off Magazine's pre-season first-team All-America squad. Without heavy-hitting Josh Ruhle — who graduated — to patrol the crease, Abrams' role as leader of the defense is of more importance. Abrams possesses the uncharacteristic ability to transform his game into that of a midfielder. It's common to see him take off down the field — cradling like a attacker — and head straight to the crease for a transition shot or the set-up of a wide-open teammate.

Despite the plaudits, Abrams remains down-to-earth and humble, and does not allow the expectations to tinker with his psyche, assistant coach Roy Simmons III said. "Marshall is a funny kid like that," said Simmons, who works with the close defense. "He has such confidence in his skills. He hears the pre-season hype, and it doesn't enter his head. "He's a captain, but he doesn't do a lot of talking, yelling and shouting. When he speaks, people listen. He works great with the younger kids." Helping to replace Ruhle's intangibles is John Glatzel.

The junior sat out last season, suspended for his role in a Manley Field House brawl in fall. The tough season is behind Glatzel and the SU lacrosse, Simmons said, and both player and team seem ready to focus on the upcoming campaign.

"It's been a long year for all of us," Simmons said. "He's well aware how he hurt himself, his family and the Syracuse lacrosse family. He's made strides since last year. We're ecstatic that he is back."

While Glatzel sat out last year, he played heavy minutes as a freshman. He and Abrams form one of the best defensive tandems in the country, Simmons said.

While Abrams is the athletic part of the duo, goalie Rob Mulligan said Glatziel would just as soon lay the wood down and decapitate an attacker near the crease. Attackers around the country will not be fooled when they duel with Glatzel. His reputation for being a solid defender earned him Face-Off's pre-season second-team All-America honors.

"John is a very strong defensive player," Desko said. "He's a good one-on-one player. John doesn't make a lot of mistakes. He's gonna help us out a lot. He's a good one-on-one player. John doesn't make a lot of mistakes. He's gonna help us out a lot."

Said Abrams: "He's gonna help us out a lot. He's one helluva player, and I'm glad he's back. He played real good (in the Fairfield scrimmage) and he's an assist. I'm looking forward to playing with him."

With two pre-season All-Americans solidifying two of the starting spots, an interesting race is developing for the third slot. Sophomore Billy St. George appears the "odds-on favorite" for the spot, Simmons said. As a freshman, he was pressed into duty before he was ready to play, Simmons said. While he seems the logical choice to step into that position again, having played admirably during his rookie campaign, he will not do so without a fight.

Nipping at his heels is redshirt freshman Solomon Bliss, a 6-foot-3 bruiser with solid stick handling skills, and junior Tom Nee, who Simmons said makes up for subpar athleticism with exceptional smarts.

Led by three potential All-Americans, the versatile Syracuse defense could push the Orangemen over their Final Four hump.

A lot is being said and written about the strength of this season's Syracuse attack unit and its ability to put the ball in the net regularly and efficiently.

But without a strong group of midfielders to move the ball from the defense to the front line, Ryan Powell, Liam Banks and Co. would be rendered useless.

However, that is not a problem the Orangemen face in the 2000 campaign. On both sides of the ball, the Orange midfield is deeper than Lake Onondaga and just as poisonous for the opposition.

"I think we have a really strong two lines," junior offensive middle Brian Solliday said. "Everyone says Syracuse's weak point is their middies, but I don't believe that at all this year."

Despite losing two key contributors in Jeff and Chris Cordisco to graduation, senior co-captain Sam Bassett said there are still 12 players competing for six spots on the first two midfield lines.

"It should be a good advantage," Bassett said, "so no one gets tired, and we can be able to rotate all good players."

Senior Matt Caione paces a strong SU midfield. A year after placing third on the squad in scoring, he joins classmates Tim Byrnes, Sam Bassett, Joe Ceglia, Kevin Kelsoy and Stu Smith on the Orangemen's midline. The corps' depth is significant, as post SU midfields have lacked the manpower of this season's.

SU's two strong midfield lines silence the unit's past critics.
Marshall Abrams, a member of the Onondaga Nation and All-America team, gives everything in one last run at a national championship.

Almost every afternoon, Marshall Abrams crosses the white line onto a Syracuse University lacrosse field. He takes with him an Orangemen practice jersey, blue side turned out, and a six-foot aluminum pole with a plastic head and an undying love for the game.

But not everything travels across the line. The biochemistry textbooks do not make the daily trip.

The responsibility of a nurturing a month-old infant remains behind as well.

Most of all, the centuries of Iroquois heritage, an aspect of life the All-American defender packs away from even his closest friends, stays distant from SU's workouts.

"Lacrosse is big through my heritage," said Abrams, a member of the Onondaga Nation. "But when I play at SU, I'm really doing it to have fun."

SU fans identify lacrosse with the punishing checks, the cheetah-fast outside shots and the gorgeous close-range goals.

But to the Onondagas, one-sixth of the Iroquois nation, lacrosse holds importance as a game with healing powers.

On the reservation, tribal men play the game with an intention, said Greg Lyons, chairman of the Iroquois Nationals Lacrosse Program. A person, a family or a nation can request a contest.

The game itself involves ceremonial procedure that remains a secret among the tribe and involves men of all ages. Lyons, in his 70s, stopped shots from the much younger Abrams in a game this past summer.

While the NCAA determines its championship in front of thousands of spectators on national television, Abrams and the Onondagas play the ancient sport for tribal healing and unity.

"The first purpose of the game is as a medicine game," Lyons said. "It still serves that purpose today. The game itself is part of the structure of the Onondagas and all nations of the Iroquois. We've been playing it for a long time."

Lacrosse in America predates Columbus. Lyons said. In centuries past, tribes would battle on fields without boundaries, sometimes playing to the death.

But the supposed brutality pales in comparison to the sacredness of the sport. The locals ingrain the tradition into young boys with some kindergartens, working them into a comprehensive lacrosse program.

The tall, lanky Abrams excelled in the program from the beginning, starring in Canadian box lacrosse tournaments throughout his childhood. As a defensive midfielder, his go-to mentality and aggressive marking helped him stand out north of the border.

Abrams also possess sensational stick skills developed in the box games. Lyons attributed the talents to his lineage. Abrams' uncle, Sid Hill, played defense for the Iroquois Nationals a generation ago. The SU star's great-grandfather, Bicycle Hill, also took the field in the early 1900s.

"I think Marshall was inspired by Sid's defense play," Lyons said. "It's a continuing line in his family, an ongoing dynasty."

When he arrived at Lafayette High School in nearby Nedrow, Abrams dominated on the lacrosse field and the hockey rink. His stick savvy and hard-nosed play in the springtime, however, caught the attention of the SU coaching staff.

The lacrosse link between the Onondagas and the Onondagas stretches back at least a half century. Lyons garnered All-America honors twice in the late 1950s as an SU keeper, and Roy Simmons Sr. credited the tribe for keeping the game going during World War II.

"I guess it's given more importance, since they do it to help people out, it's a powerful game, a healing game. But I try to keep it at that."

At Syracuse, Abrams switched to close defense as a sophomore and hopped into the starting lineup. In his third year at the new spot, Abrams' game still mirrors that of a speedy midfielder rather than a lumbering defender.

But coupled with bruising John Glatzel and Billy St. George, Abrams can roam a little more and take chances up the field.

"Agile is the word to describe him," SU goaltender Rob Muligan said. "He can take the ball away, run down the field and stick the ball into the goal. He plays a different game, and it's an awesome asset for us."

As a sophomore, Abrams scored five goals and three assists, the best output for an SU defender in the 1990s. He added another goal and five more assists last season, helping lead Syracuse to the national title match.

The numbers and the reputation bring Abrams busheals of national honors. A high school All-American, he made second-team All-America last year and received several similar preseason honors this winter.

It's a slight move, a moment of quiet focus, but it's enough. The look that Sotheby's forthcoming acquisition will remain, a remnant of the previous.

It's not a complicated strategy, and it's not one that stays with the players for long. But it's one that's needed.

The ball is poised. The peloton is on the lookout for the first sign of weakness, for the slightest opportunity to pass, to shoot, to find the open man.

Now, it could be Banks to Coffman.
A split second, a moment of hesitation, and the Orangemen could be on their way to a national title.

And after a bevy of pats on the back from the coaches, the players are ready. The pressure of expectations across the country is building.

The coach knows it, as do the players. They hope to walk the gilded road that leads to SU.

"Looking over at Matt Cutia last year after the national final,
I thought, 'This is it. This is what we've been waiting for.
This is the moment we've been working towards."

An attackman his entire life, Coffman was a natural fit for the gilded road that leads to SU.

"I'm seeing it happen. And it's the same way that Jim Kel succeeded at SU, to advance to the Final Four, Virginia's 12-10 title-game triumph marked the first time a national championship ring.

"Eighteen straight (Final Fours) is more than an expectation," Mulligan said. "Our expectation is to win that national championship."

"I've pretty much had that motto in my head," Banks says. "I've pretty told me, 'One point for a goal, two points for an assist, three points for a hat trick.'"

"He always looks to get the assist." Desko says. "That's his role as an on-field leader.

The Final Four isn’t good enough this year, the sophomores say. The champion, when it comes to the Orangemen, they want the title that eluded last year’s seniors, the first class to leave Syracuse without a championship since the Class of 1987.

In the past, the Orange have taken three consecutive titles from 1988-90. The Gaits, who led the Orangemen to three

The SU coaches noticed Mulligan’s tendency to wander, and they are trying to take advantage of this to leave the line of defense. Mulligan has never forgotten the SU back line. Last year, the junior netminder played all but 17 minutes of four games. He stopped 224 shots and had a save percentage of .901.

With the Orangos offense finding their way back, the netminder is feeling more at ease. He has allowed 39 goals and has an overall .912 save percentage.

The Carrier Dome crowds, the one-sport Szyluk feels, is a top one-on-one player. "We can beat anybody. If we play our best, we can beat anybody."
Syracuse senior Jenna Szyluk ranks as one of the all-time great Orangewomen athletes. She received the 1999 women's soccer team most valuable player award, leaving the program as one of its highest scorers. In lacrosse, Szytuk fills the role of finisher in one of the country's premiere attacks. She enters her third year on the SU lacrosse squad in hopes of leading it to its second consecutive postseason appearance after helping the soccer team to its first tournament bid in 1998.

- Finished No. 16 in Big East women's soccer scoring in 1999
- Ranks first in assists and second in goals scored on all-time Orangewomen soccer list

She helped bring SU to its first NCAA Tournament in women's soccer. Now Jenna Szyluk looks to repeat the feat on the lacrosse pitch.
Following an ECAC Championship, the Orangewomen want more — namely, a trip to the NCAA Tournament.

Usually, coaches whine about arrogant athletes who boast too much of an attitude.

You won't hear that complaint this spring from Syracuse women's lacrosse coach Lisa Miller.

Instead, Miller argues her team doesn't have enough attitude. The Orangewomen don't talk trash to their opponents. They don't puff out their chests and walk with swagger.

Miller wishes they would.

"All good teams have a certain amount of attitude," said the third-year coach. "My team tends to be humble. Which is nice in a lot of ways, but I'd like to see that attitude a little bit more."

Just in its third season of existence, Syracuse has proven itself among the country's best. The team posted a 12-4 mark last year, missing the NCAA Tournament by just a single game. Instead, SU settled for a spot in the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference playoffs and took advantage of its opportunity.

Syracuse downed No. 17 Boston University 9-8 in overtime before beating No. 11 Yale 9-8 for the ECAC title. Playing in the ECAC Tournament helped the Orangewomen learn to play with championship pressure, Miller said.

SU graduated just one senior, Carrie Bolduc, from its ECAC Championship squad and added several talented freshmen who would contribute immediately. Yet junior attacker Katrina Hable said the team acts humble and does not fathom its ability.

"I don't think we realize how good we really are," Hable said. "We have to realize that we are a really good team. Every other team knows that. Now we just have to realize it for ourselves."

Hable is one reason the Orangewomen should believe. The West Genesee High School graduate garnered pre-season All-America honors after finishing first on the team in goals and assists.

"She's one of the best attackers in the country," Miller said. "She's just every coach's dream in a lot of ways. Her teammates like her, she's nice and she's unselfish on the field."

Senior Jenna Szyluk is another Syracuse scoring threat. While defenses concentrated on Hable, Szyluk found the net 38 times last season. The Orangewomen might be without Szyluk for a short time, though, as she is out indefinitely with a back injury.

"I think they're starting to believe that it's not all about (Hable) and (Szyluk),” Miller said. "Our attack is balanced. It's designed to be that way. We expect all of them to keep the defense honest."

Another player who can help build Syracuse's confidence is senior goalkeeper Clothilde Ewing. After starting all 16 games in the cage last season, Ewing is looking for more consistency and a better presence in net.

"I'm pretty small," the 5-foot-3 Ewing said, "so just having a larger presence in the goal and just being bigger (is important). Whether that means coming out more — I have to appear bigger than I am."

If Ewing finds her rhythm and the offense clicks, the Orangewomen should be able to convince themselves of their potential for success.

Syracuse will be tested early, however. The first three games pit the squad against Virginia, Georgetown and Maryland, each of whom finished last year in the top eight.

The Orangewomen open their season at Virginia as part of a doubleheader with the men's squads Saturday. The women then travel home for contests with the Hoyas on Wednesday and the Terrapins four days later.

After taking a beating from Maryland the last two years, falling 21-7 and 18-8, Ewing said it's time Syracuse notches a victory against the Terps.

"We definitely have the potential to beat them, but we haven't done that," Ewing said. "So this year, it's time. I definitely think we can do it. It's just a matter of believing we can do it."

Last year's ECAC Championship planted this winning seed and people don't really think we can do it. I think we really showed them (in the ECACs) we can play with the top 10 teams."
Head coach Lisa Miller bolsters her Orangewomen lineup with nine freshmen.

The printed roster tells us that Sami Stock and Carla Gigon will wear Nos. 1 and 2, respectively, for the 2000 Syracuse Orangewomen lacrosse team.

Fittingly, the jersey numbers match the players’ class rank, as the two freshmen highlight a crop of nine newcomers that hope to boost SU from regional bully to national contender.

The fresh blood face a rough road to crack head coach Lisa Miller's starting 10. With just one senior gone from last season’s ECAC Championship squad and a veteran-laden lineup in place, the new Orangewomen might knock heads with each other for precious playing time.

"This freshman class will contribute as a group," Miller said. "We're a very balanced lineup, but they work very hard. They did well in the scrimmages in the fall."

When Miller hit the recruiting trail a year ago, a stud goalie ranked high on her priorities. With three-year starter Clothilde Ewing graduating in May and unproven Tegan Leonard and Sabrina Harvey behind her, the SU staff sought a keeper who could excel by coming far out of the cage to play ball, a style somewhat unorthodox to the women’s game.

Miller, who said she feels Gigon should be one of the nation's premier keepers by the time she leaves, said her rookie's active style meshes with her veteran defense. For this season, Miller labeled the Gigon as a competent backup.

"I came here because I fit in position-wise," Gigon said. "I'd like to play, and I played a bunch in the fall. But I don't know how much I'll play this season."

Perhaps the most athletic SU recruit man the front line. Tiny Sami Stock starred on defense for Radnor High School for three years before moving to attack last season.

"I didn't know what I wanted to do," Stock said. "I planned to join lacrosse teammates Phoebe Burns and All-American playmaker Katrina Hable, but I tried out for the national team for soccer squad this fall but opted to focus on lacrosse at the 11th hour."

"I didn't know what I wanted to do," Stock said, "but I tried out for the national team for soccer, and I felt burned out. I'm glad I played soccer at SU in the fall."

"I didn't know what I wanted to do," Stock said, "but I tried out for the national team for soccer, and I felt burned out. I'm glad I played soccer at SU in the fall."

Seven other freshmen join Gigon and Stock in the Class of 2003. Miller said she noticed freshman Kim Wayne clicking with senior midfielder Stacy Brown during February practices.

Elsewhere, Christina Nockunas adds another weapon on attack, while Penn Yan Academy grad Jessica Trombley arrives from what Miller called one of the state's premier lacrosse programs.

In addition, Sarah Rodgers boosts a veteran defense anchored by Erin Boyle and Carrie Souls.

From the moment she took over the infant Orangewomen program, Miller emphasized recruiting the Central New York area.

Two years ago she landed finisher Phoebe Burns and All-American playmaker Katrina Hable. Last year Miller added Erica Mathewson and Kara Napover to her attack.

Three more local products hop on board for the 2000 campaign. Ellen Rust and Stacie Rosati, teammates at local powerhouse West Genessee High School, will add speed on defense. Miller said. Erin MacDonald, a Henninger High grad, joins the attack as well.

With SU's on-field success, Miller said the local lacrosse landscape no longer belongs to Central New York recruiters.

"We're a lot from West Genessee," Miller said. "But I would say the kids are getting more attention from other schools. The kids have always been overlooked up here. That makes me feel good about our program."

Unlike their friends on the volleyball, field hockey and soccer teams, freshman lacrosse players receive a few months for adjustment to college before the season begins.

Although practice and conditioning fills the time, it also allows the team to grow closer and set its collective goals, Stock said.

As the snow melts away and intensity builds toward the opener, the SU freshmen find themselves part of a mission to bring national notoriety to Syracuse women's lacrosse.

"We won the ECACs last year, but we want much more than that," Gigon said. "We still don't get respect. We all want to break the top 10."

In its two years of existence, the Syracuse women's lacrosse team has survived by the same game plan — attack, attack, attack.

This year, head coach Lisa Miller hopes for the defense to catch up to the offense's success.

Like the previous two seasons, the offense will carry the team, and it centers around Katrina Hable.

While opposing offenses put pressure on goals Clothilde Ewing with 194 goals on 397 shots, the Orangewomen offense put even more on their opposition.

In 2000, Syracuse slung 479 shots at the cage with 180 finding the back of the net. Their 11.25 goals per game ranked No. 25 in the nation, and they outscored their opponents by an average of 2.88 goals a game, ranking 19th.

"We're loaded," Miller said. "We're really loaded up front, and we understand (how to play) the game. They're having more fun with their settled attack. I hope they don't move away from our transition game."

Opposing defenses will set up game plans to defend Hable, a West Genesee High School graduate. She has been one of the SU attack's cornerstones since her freshman season.

In her stellar career, the junior has tallied 72 goals and 31 assists, with 37 and 20 coming last year. Her 2.15 assists per game tied for 29th in the country.

Her assists total skyrocketed last year, as defenses tried to single her out. Like facing a double team in basketball, the former high school point guard found linemates Jenna Szyluk and Lauren Brady.

Last year, Hable was a third-team All American and this season, Street & Smith Magazine named her a pre-season honorable mention All-American.

Hable's play has gradually earned her the awards and rewards come with the increased sense of leadership, a role teammates say Hable handles well. "She definitely makes up for a lot," Brady said. "When we see her on a run, she's scoring two, three goals all throughout the game — which isn't unusual — it pumps everyone else up. Some of her goals are pretty, and she's fun to watch even if you are on the field with her."

On the back end of most of Hable's assists was Szyluk, also a star soccer player. She is preparing to play in her seventh season (four soccer, three lacrosse) at a college athlete.

Szyluk stepped up last season season and took the heat off Hable, notching 16 goals to bring her career total to 75.

One of five SU seniors, Szyluk has been one of the mainstays for the team in its development. Recruited as a soccer player, she joined the lacrosse team in her sophomore year.

The senior is nursing a back injury and has not practiced this season, but she hopes to be ready for the opening face-off this Saturday at Virginia.

"Right now we're definitely missing Jenna," Brady said, "because she is similar to Katrina in that she gets us all fired up, she knows when we have to buckle down, work hard and get the job done in games or practice. We're definitely looking forward to getting her back."

The Orangewomen — the defending ECAC Champions — received a tough test in the fall season, when both of their stars did not participate in the exhibition games. Szyluk was finishing her dynamic career with the soccer team, and Hable did not suit up due to a foot injury, which has since healed.

However, Brady's emergence late last season added much-needed balance for Syracuse. Playing off the attention defenses paid to Hable and Szyluk, Brady netted 20 goals.

With the stars absent in the fall, Brady stabilized the front line. Because of her autumn leadership, she has been honored as one of three captains, along with Hable and Ewing.

Brady also assisted on five SU goals, and her 25 points were good enough to tie Carrie Bolduc for third best on the 1999 squad.

"Lauren stepped it up really big," Hable said. "She started off in this program and had to come off the bench. She's a very hard worker, and she'll work until she gets what she wants. She came in and made big plays at the end of games. Overall, she is turned into a very good lacrosse player."

One thing Miller will not have a problem with is depth. Besides the talented trio of Szyluk, Hable and Brady, SU returns junior college transfer Kara Hanover.

Freshmen Sami Stock, Kim Wayne and Jess Trombley should also be able to contribute throughout the year, Miller said.

The team also welcomes back Karen Healy, who spent last season away from the Orangewomen for personal reasons. Healy is a tremendous athlete and is the team's best power shooter, Miller said.

While Miller strives for a balanced team of offense and defense to charge past the ECAC championships and into the NCAA tournament both for the Orangewomen.

College revises work program

School of Architecture reports embezzlement

BY TIFFANY LANKES

After reporting last week to the Syracuse Police Department more than $12,000 missing from their work study budget, administrators at the Syracuse University College of Architecture changed policies on recording student work hours.

Professors in the school will now have to sign for the total number of hours that students complete regularly during the semester in the work study program, said Charles Savage, a computer consultant at the College of Architecture.

College administrators sent faculty members a letter Monday informing them that they must sign for all students' hours upon completion and submit them to the appropriate office, Savage added. Previously, professors working with students in the program were allowed to submit the total hours worked at the end of each semester without a signature.

Though the letter did not state the reason for the change, it might be due to the recent reports of suspected embezzlement through the work study program, he added.

Party leaders decry corporate policy

BY DAVE LEVINTHAL

There really is only one major political party in the United States — corporate greed, said Green and Socialist Party representatives to support their candidates.

It is therefore vital, they said, that members of minor political parties not choose the "kinder, gentler corporate domination" of Democrats, and instead vote their conscience in November's U.S. presidential election.

"It doesn't matter if it's a Republican, a Democrat or a Green Party candidate," said party spokesman Howie Hawkins.

"More important is to vote for the candidate that is not going to be corrupted," Hawkins said.

McCain to visit Le Moyne

BY KEVIN TAMFONE

John McCain's Straight Talk Express will roll into Syracuse this weekend for one of the Arizona senator's town-hall-meeting-style campaign stops.

McCain, a Republican presidential hopeful, will host the meeting at 5 p.m. Saturday in the Hennessey Athletic Center at Le Moyne College. The 300-person venue will be the site of one of the last campaign stops McCain will make before Tuesday's New York state primary during which 101 national convention delegates are at stake.

Ten other states are running primaries Tuesday, with more than 600 convention delegates up for grabs.

Starbucks opens, locals leery

After months of waiting, opposition and anticipation, Starbucks Coffee will finally open today at 177 Marshall St.

In the time leading up to its opening, activists groups panted anti-Starbucks signs on the store windows and knocked down the logo signs on the corner of the building, said Brenda Milante, manager of the new store.

The Seattle-based company headquarters addressed the problem with a "blessing" and contacted all those thought to be involved, she said. Milante added that she is not worried about any incidents occurring today.

Audrey Taylor-Smith, owner of the Coffee Cave, 161 Marshall St., said she is both excited and concerned about the Starbucks arrival on Marshall Street.

"I am looking forward to it because I'm hoping it will bring more people out on the street to coffee awareness," she said. "I'm glad it's finally here. I'm sick of waiting and wondering what's going to happen."

But she added that she is also nervous about the possible loss of business to small area coffee shops because of Starbucks' visible corner location in the building that once housed a CVS pharmacy.

Colleges form individual plagiarism policies

BY JOY DAVIA

When a Syracuse University senior revealed in her 1992 Honors Program thesis that 28 percent of upper-classmen in the School of Management plagiarized, the school revamped its entire academic integrity policy.

"It showed a bunch of things that got the faculty going," said Elletta Callahan, associate professor of law and public policy at the School of Management.

The student administered the survey in 1991 and the school implemented a new policy during the 1993-1994 academic year, she added.

Each college at SU is responsible for drafting and carrying out its own policy regarding plagiarism - territory that the Office of Judicial Affairs regulates, said Shira Rhodes of Judicial Affairs. This includes each college having its own advisory board to hear cases.

The policy at the School of Management encourages professors to report all academic integrity cases, ranging from plagiarism to forgery, to the school's administration. This includes those cases that are resolved between the student and professor and do not involve the school's Academic Integrity Committee.

Tracking repeat offenders and informing students of their right to appeal is one aim of the reporting policy, she said.

During the 1998-1999 academic year, 16 instances of plagiarism were reported out of 41 academic dishonesty cases, Callahan said. Dishonesty cases include both plagiarism and:

Numerous software programs, available through Wordcheck KEYWORD software, Plagiarism Services, Inc. and Plagiarism.com have emerged to help professors detect Internet plagiarism.

One group using the Wordcheck software program is the National Science Foundation, said Richard Austin of KEYWORD.

The frequency of use in electronic documents to calculate a percentage match, be it electronic or personal, Wordcheck software is said to be a key tool in finding Web sites whose content has been lifted.

For a fee, the software is said to send an alert to a scholar that papers found on Web sites are not intended for private use.

"They used to charge $100 to $200, now the fee is $500 to $1000," Austin said.

"The software has become a very valuable tool for clearing the name of a scholar," he added.

The National Science Foundation uses a Web site that lists the name of scholars whose names have been found in a database of scholarly papers.

"It's easier to access but it's also easier to get caught," she said.

Super Tuesday highlights tough battles

New York state primary tallies will have far-reaching effects

In the years past, by the time the New York state primary roles around, there is little doubt about who will win the party nomination. In 1996, pundits declared Bob Dole a veritable shoo-in for the Republican nomination even before primary season began. Meanwhile, President Bill Clinton (long before the Monica Lewinsky scandal and subsequent impeachment trial), riding high on his presidential successes, was the obvious candidate for the Democratic party.

But this year the state is riveted by the primary proceedings — the race is unlike any year in recent recollection. As Super Tuesday (referred to simply as "Tuesday" by political nationwide approaches, neither the Republican nor the Democratic nominations are certain.

The conservative camp has known primarily for tales of his years as a Vietnam POW, only a few months ago before pulling off a string of impressive primary wins in New Hampshire, Arizona and Michigan. Texas Gov. George W. Bush, the GOP's predicted favorite son since early in the race, has struggled to hang onto his lead after the early defeats. He has also recently begun to disassociate himself from his father, former president George Bush, in attempt to prove himself worthy of the nomination on his own merit. Yet despite having been publicly called on the carpet after stumbling over the names of the leaders of countries such as India and Pakistan, Bush has built momentum going into the New York primaries after convincing victories in South Carolina, Washington, Virginia and North Dakota.

The third candidate in the Republican race is the ultra-conservative, Bible-spouting Alan Keyes, who spoke Monday night to an enthusiastic crowd in Syracuse University's Goldstein Auditorium. Despite finishing in last place in most of the primaries, Ambassador Keyes has decided to stay in the race because, he says, he "has nothing better to do with his life."

Among the democrats, the showdown is between Vice President Al Gore and former New Jersey Sen. and New York Knick Bill Bradley. Bill Bradley has struggled lately, but still believes he can garner enough support in New York to win the March 7th primary, which could then set a precedent for victories further down the primary line. And indeed, a New York win would be Bradley's last hope in setting the stage to secure the Democratic nomination.

Gore, however, now occupies the spotlight of success within the party, after sweeping victories in Washington and New Hampshire. Gore has an obvious advantage over Bradley, although he does carry the burden of Clinton's scandalous tenure in the White House — he can claim responsibility for the great shape of the U.S. economy. And after last year's shameful impeachment proceedings, Dems can breathe a sigh of relief knowing that either candidate offers them a chance to bring the party back to its roots.

The nation's eyes will be on New York state this Tuesday when the polls close and the election results roll in. The outcome of the state's primary will surely be a pivotal point in the fast-paced charge toward 1600 Pennsylvania Ave.

Lack of checkpoints leads to cash loss

The School of Architecture's piggy bank feels a bit lighter these days. The college reported $12,738.85 missing from its federally-subsidized work study budget Thursday.

That's not change management.

Now, two work study students in the college are being investigated of charges of embezzlement this week.

If the two students did, in fact, distort hours on their time sheets in order to siphon extra funds from the budget, the university is left holding the bag for their costly dishonesty.

College students are certainly mature enough to handle the responsibility of properly filling out their time sheets each week. But when thousands of dollars disappear, an essential piece of the payroll pie is clearly missing.

The crafty work of the students who found the weak link in the chain of command will surely outlive their tenure at Syracuse University. Supervisors university-wide will now be forced to keep their eyes peeled for lies and cheaters, the hallmark of quick buck.

Sure, students should be held accountable for tallying their own hours, but exaggerations and lies in their time cards should be ferreted out long before a fat check hits the teller's window at the bank.

Installing time clocks would take much of the guesswork out of the process, and eliminate most of the accidental malfeasance — such as errors — or intentional fudges — that students might make when totaling their time.

It's a small price to pay.

Someone will always attempt to cheat the system and put some more pennies in their pockets.

Blindly rubber-stamping time sheets when they roll across administrative desks is what leads to "loaves" like these.

It doesn't take a master's degree in calculus to keep cash from disappearing — a little common sense and a few punches on the calculator would go a long way.

State surplus to cover city budget deficit

By Kevin Tampone

A projected New York state budget surplus of more than $700 million drew a collective sigh of relief from Mayor Roy A. Bemardi's office.

City officials are hopeful the surplus will help fill the city's $15 million budget gap, said Jim Parens, a member of the mayor's office. The new estimate, announced Wednesday by the State Division of Budget, surged beyond previous projections of a $265 million surplus.

The increased surplus comes from higher-than-expected income tax revenues, said Todd Albart, budget division spokesman.

Now that the state is an even more stable financial ground than previously expected, the mayor's office is optimistic about the city's chances of getting the $15 million in state aid he was in line to receive during the next fiscal year, Parens said.

"Now, it won't be a question of whether the money is available," Parens said. "The money is there, it just hasn't been budgeted."

The city is hopeful the legislature will meet the April 1 deadline for its budget, but the new surplus estimate does not guarantee Syracuse will get the money it is asking for, Albart said.

"Addressing the needs of cities is obviously part of the budget deliberations, but I think it's too early to jump to conclusions about what the legislature will do for cities," he said. "We'll just have to see what happens when we get to the budget proceedings."

Syracuse has needed state aid for the past several years to cover the city's budget, Parens said. Last year the state suspended $6 million in aid. While developing the budget this year, Parens said on Wednesday, the city counted on at least that much and discovered the city would need an additional $4 million in aid. Now the city needs the extra cash to cover basic operating expenses such as employee salaries, Parens said. The current version of the budget, he added, is $4.5 million below last year's budget.

"If state aid does not come through, however, citizens could feel the effects of the cash shortage within the city," Parens said. "Any cuts would have to be made in public safety, parks, the libraries and the schools." Parens said.

The mayor's going to have to estimate how much state aid we're going to get. Say he puts 12 or 15 million dollars down that doesn't come through," DeRegis said.

"The street budget is the biggest thing we have to worry about," said Dave Schmitter, Syracuse Common Council minority leader.

During the meeting, the council heard a presentation on the state aid topic by Steven DeRegis, Syracuse Common Council minority leader.

"The mayor's going to have to estimate how much state aid we're going to get. Say he puts 12 or 15 million dollars down that doesn't come through," DeRegis said.

"The street budget is the biggest thing we have to worry about," said Dave Schmitter, Syracuse Common Council minority leader.

The state Aid of the 4 percent Onondaga County sales tax. County officials have slowly cut that percentage over the past 10 years so that today the city only receives 23 percent of the county aid.

That was a drastic cut and over the past 10 years, we've lost 8 percent of that money due to passage of that, DeRegis said. "The city obviously can't afford that, and not a lot of help from the county."

One remedy city officials are considering is a property tax hike, Parens said. "If property taxes are too high, then residents and businesses will leave the city, and take their tax revenues with them," he explained.

This would completely defeat the purpose of mitigating aid from the first place and also discourage people from moving to Syracuse, Parens said.

"If we don't get more outside contributions, then the last thing we want to do is raise property taxes," Parens said. "Our expenses are reductive to what we're trying to accomplish."

Common Council plans Clinton Square renovations

The Coimcil accepted Mayor Roy A. Bemardi’s proposal to eliminate some of the parking in downtown Clinton Square, and improve Clinton Square in downtown Syracuse.

"Currently, the intersection of Salina and Clinton streets is one of the most dangerous intersections in the city," Bemardi said.

Democrat Councilor Van Robinson personally experienced the dangers of the intersection when he was involved in an accident at the intersection of those streets.

"It was involved in an accident of those crosswalks," Robinson said. "There is clearly something wrong with this intersection."

The street width is too narrow, the crosswalk is too long, and the light changes quickly — it just isn't set up right well now," Robinson said.

Once alternatives to the current SCAD protocol are approved by the state, the council intends to work with the state on the redesign of the Clinton Square area.

The demolition of current structures in Clinton Square is scheduled to begin in July. The Council is already discussing temporary sites for this summer’s festival, but no firm dates have been decided on yet.

Researchers probe ancient viruses

A team of local researchers are using a discovery they made last year to help prove that life exists on Earth.

Several State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry researchers found a 140,000-year-old plant virus frozen more than a mile beneath the Greenland icecap.

The discovery of the virus, known as Tomato Mosaic Tomato, is significant because it can affect humans, and whether global warming will cause the ice to melt and these viruses to be recycled.

"It's important to remember that these viruses may yet have something to teach us, especially when we consider the possibility of finding organisms on other planets," said Castello.

Problem would arise if a virus increased and spread to an organism that had been unexposed to for thousands of years. In this case, it could possibly cause an epidemic. Since one Earth would have developed a new virus and infected the Earth.

Dr. William Stamm, an expert on the ESF, said the discovery is a "timely reminder of the importance of studying the past, and how we can use that knowledge to inform our future.

Dr. Catlanis and Dr. Rollo Rogers said they were surprised to find the virus in the ice core, Castello said.

After melting the ice and culturing the bacteria in the water, they found what they were searching for. They found that the bacteria were living in the ice core.

"People who study evolution usually start by looking at the past," said Castello. "If we want to understand how these viruses have evolved, we need to look at the past.

Stamm and Catlanis began to wonder if there were other microbial activities in the ice cores, said Castello.

Some of the core samples were examined by Dr. Gregory Gehr, a professor of molecular biology at the University of New York.

"These bacteria and viruses are not just living in the ice, they're also changing the ice," said Castello.

The team analyzed 42 ice cores — 26 from Greenland and 16 from Antarctica — to find ancient viruses. They found "a wealth of microbial activity in the ice that has been trapped and preserved in the ice.

"One of the cores was from a very old ice core, and it contained viruses that were from the past," said Castello. "But the other cores were from more recent times, and they contained viruses that were more recent, Castello said.

"The dream, Ehrenreidi said, is that "people will be able to use this information to develop new strategies to combat global warming and reduce its impact on the environment.

"If we can learn from the past, we can learn from the future," said Ehrenreidi. "We need to understand the past, so we can work towards a better future."

Douglas shines in unusual new movie role

Douglas has been one lucky bastard this year. After successfully proposing marriage to the stunning 30-year-old actress, Catherine Zeta-Jones, Douglas pulls off his second miracle of 2000 with the surprisingly thoughtful new comedy, "Wonder Boys." And to think, it's only March.

Douglas plays Grady Tripp — a role for which he gained a substantial amount of weight — a creative writing professor at a small liberal arts college who's been attempting for seven years to write the follow-up to his first successful novel. But he's got the complete opposite of writer's block. Through a mist of thick pot smoke and handfuls of codeine pills, Grady's boss, has just told him that she's pregnant with his child.

With all these dilemmas at hand, "Boys" offers intelligent humor for intelligent viewers. No one plays the jokes like they're supposed to be hilarious. But the film does deviate from subtle humor when Maguire's character shoots Sara's mean blind dog, Poe. Sure, the recurring joke of the dead dog's body is sick and twisted. But you've got to laugh when it drops down on the ground in a funny oddball sort of way. Unlike the poor-pooch in "There's Something About Mary," this dog is not coming back to life with the help of any lamp.

As we are taken through a tragic weekend in this man's mid-life crisis, it becomes clear that Grady's dyslexia is never too late to start over again for any of the characters. Douglas takes on a role devoid of the eras materialism and sexuality that dominate most of his other memorable characters in films like "Fatal Attraction," "Wall Street" and "Basic Instinct." By breaking typecast, the role of Grady, a pathetic washed-up, overweight, pot-head professor is a breath of fresh air for the 50-year-old actor.

Show stopper

The film belongs to Douglas all the way, even though the supporting actors are top-notch talents. But while no character overpowers one of Grady's students, is never without a pair of red cowboy boots. And to think, of the two works are striking, one of which is the Gardens of Gethsemane, the other is the Gardens of the Gospels.

Douglas plays Grady Tripp

The film is a poignant tale of a man on the verge of giving up on his writing career, but in the end, he finds the strength to keep going. It's a story about the power of love and the importance of never giving up on your dreams.

The blunt and profanity-laden comedian Lewis Black excels at his craft. His set当晚 at Comedy Central's "The Daily Show" regular slot is well-known for its raw, unfiltered humor.

Black's style is characterized by his ability to spin tales of the everyday into comedic gold. He has a knack for finding the absurdity in the ordinary, whether it's the challenges of parenting, the intricacies of politics, or the quirks of human behavior. His delivery is often punctuated with expletives andsavagelandscapedecayhumaninterest. His audience is typically on the edge, laughing through the profanity and the punchlines alike.

"When I'm talking to the audience, I want them to feel that I'm talking to them, that I'm talking to their friends," Black said. "I want them to feel that I'm not just making jokes, but that I'm really talking to them."

Reviewing Black's performance, The Daily Orange's Andrew Parks noted that Black's "sick-kid-tested and mother-approved." Parks praised Black's ability to "keep the laughs, but it also benefited from pickup lines like "I'm a hard-drive recording of Comedy Central's "The Daily Show.""

Black's show is a mix of personal stories, political anecdotes, and commentary on the world around us. He often delves into topics like politics, family, and everyday life, delivering his observations with a blend of humor and seriousness.

For those attending, the experience is one of being locked up in a basement with a doorbell that only a few people understand. The event is a testament to the power of humor to connect with and entertain an audience.

In conclusion, Lewis Black's comedy tour is a must-see for fans of his work and anyone looking for a good laugh. His latest iteration will undoubtedly be as substantial as his previous ones, with new material and insights to enthrall his audience.

The Daily Orange's Andrew Parks reminds us that Black's "sick-kid-tested and mother-approved," ensuring that his jokes are appropriate for all ages. The next performance of his tour will undoubtedly be filled with the same energy and humor that has made Black a beloved figure in the comedy world.

Key Players

C Eten Thomas (13.9 ppg, 9.7 rbg, 5.9 apg), G Jason James (13.1 ppg, 5.6 apg), F Ryan Blackwell (11.1 ppg, 7.4 rbg)

The Orangemen return to the site of one of their biggest wins of last season, a 90-42 triumph over the undefeated Huskies on March 2, 1999. A win gives SU the Big East regular-season title, its first outright league championship since 1990-91. Blackwell shined in the freshman dominating against UConn, scoring 19 points and grabbing 10 rebounds while holding Kevin Freeman to just one hoop. SU's senior forward bustled out again Saturday at Maryland, working primarily on set of-fense, filling in for injured star forward Edmund Saunders.

Wrenn made the trip and dressed for the game out of the New York State Health Department.

The Orange women, now 25-3 and first in the conference scoring champion, averaged 16.4 points a game.

SU tennis team looks to restart win streak

Staff Reports

The Syracuse tennis team looks to get back on the winning track this weekend. Last week, they fell to Dartmouth 5-4.

"Their two top players are a big challenge. They are experienced veterans. Junior Alex Brown, senior Roger Dougry and graduate student Adrian Woodley strive for titles at the meet. We are con-ning to continue our streak of 100-0.

"We have to win the match before the national team comes this weekend. We are focused on getting the win against the Cavaliers."

New Year’s at the Calhoun and El-Amin households arrived filled with smiles and cheer.

After a season-opening loss to Iowa, the Connecticut Huskies won nine straight games, topped by neutral-site victories over Duke and Arizona.

As the new millennium hit, the Huskies sat at No. 2 in the Associated Press poll and a sure bet to visit their second Final Four in as many years.

But since a Jan. 3 triumph over lowly Sacred Heart, UConn experienced a free fall. Over the next 17 games, UConn lost seven times, three in its home state.

Each loss dropped head coach Jim Calhoun’s team in reputation and rankings, sending UConn plummeting like a Plinko chip on The Price is Right.

Now ranked No. 24 in the country, the Huskies can avenge a January meltdown when Syracuse invades the Hartford Civic Center on Saturday for a 2 p.m. tip.

“When you lose, you get people upset,” said Khalid El-Amin, the Huskies point guard and emotional captain. “You get people crying over little things and your team is not really a team.”

The stakes are high, the odds even and the implications heavy.

It’s No. 1 vs. No. 2.

It’s a lacrosse game pitting Virginia against Syracuse this Saturday at Klockner Field in Charlottesville, Va.

It’s a rematch of last season’s national championship game the Cavaliers won 12-10 and a rest of a rivalry currently tied at six.

It, said SU players, is the reason they chose to come to Syracuse.

“It’s two powerhouse teams going against each other,” SU captain Tim Byrnes said. “You can’t paint a better picture than this.”

Said goalie Rob Mulligan: “What can you say? It’s going to be the matchup of the year.”

Eclipsing the previous SU-UVa showdown was that the loser would be eliminated.

“Those two teams are remarkably similar,” Virginia coach Dom Starsia said. “When you lose, you get people upset,” said Khalid El-Amin, the Huskies point guard and emotional captain. “You get people crying over little things and your team is not really a team.”

Syracuse meets Hoyas in round one

BY GREG BISHOP

For the Syracuse women’s basketball team, the road to continuing what has become a disappointing campaign cannot get much longer.

After wrapping up the regular season at 10-17 (3-13 Big East), the Orange women and their thin bench travel to Storrs, Conn., this weekend to take part in the Big East Tournament.

Looking back, Syracuse head coach Marianne Stanley said her team can play two very different extremes.

Sometimes, like in a near-defeat of No. 8 Rutgers, Syracuse looks like a conference contender. Other times, like during a downright embarrassing loss to West Virginia, SU looks more like a Big East pretender.

“Against some teams we played very well,” Freeman said. “Against some teams we played very poorly. Looking back at the number of players I had on my bench, we did what we could with what we had.”

Syracuse enters a conference tournament that Rutgers head coach C. Vivian Stringer called a preview of the Final Four.

The conference is home to three top 10 and four Top 25 squads, all of whom have beaten the Orange women this season.

As the No. 12 seed, SU will play No. 5 Georgetown (16-11, 6-7) in a first-round winner-takes-all loser-goes-home bout scheduled for 2 p.m. Saturday.

Fortunately for the Orange women, the last win the squad picked up was a 75-62 victory against the Hoyas on Feb. 13 at Manley Field House.

A slumping Jaime James experienced an encore during the contest, scoring 20 points and hitting five 3-pointers. Coupled with 19 points from Beth Record, the Orange women cruised to victory.

Forward Leigh Ariz contributed an 11-point, 11-rebound performance in the win.

Katie Smerka-Duffy, the leader of the Hoyas, paced her squad with 23 points and five rebounds in the loss, but Georgetown’s play left much to be desired, head coach Patrick Knapp said.

“We did not defend well. We did not rebound well. We did not shoot the ball well either,” he said. “There are other places that we can score. We can play a much-improved game. But SU played well, you have to give them credit.”

Since the win against the Hoyas, Syracuse has been sliding hard like Pete Rose toward the Big East basement.

A close loss to Rutgers, which scored the final 16 points in a 56-51 win at the Carrier Dome, followed by a loss at UConn were expected.

The slide continued, however, as Syracuse dropped back-to-back games against Seton Hall and then two more against Miami and No. 19 Boston College, raising the losing streak to six.

The weapons remain for Syracuse, though, especially on the outside, said Knapp.

Tax evasion closes 44's

Droves of thirsty students had one less happy hour option when they headed to Marshall Street on Friday afternoon.

New York State Department of Taxation officials seized and closed 44's Tavern, 113 Marshall St., at about 3 p.m. Friday for tax evasion, according to signs posted in the tavern's windows.

But the closing is only temporary, said Marc Albert, 44's owner. Managing the bar from a distance while working at an additional job in New York City since October, Albert said the bar will re-open on Tuesday, pending paperwork to be filed with the state today.

"Forty-fours is in the best financial shape it's been in a long time," Albert said. The New York State Department of Taxation could not be reached for comment.

The weekend's closing is because of poor management, Albert said. Although he noticed problems in the business, "Forty-fours is in the best financial shape it's been in a long time," Albert said. The New York State Department of Taxation could not be reached for comment.

A Syracuse man stole $250 and a credit card early Thursday morning from the South Campus apartment of two Syracuse University sophomores, according to a police report.

John Gent, a mutual friend of the two women who were burglarized, entered their Winding Ridge Road apartment with another woman, said the report. At the time, one of the apartment's residents was sleeping and the other was out, one of the residents said.

"Somebody who we both know was in our apartment," the student said. "He took the stuff and later 'fessed up to it.'

One roommate later returned home to find $250 missing from her wallet that was in her bag in her room, the student said.

The other roommate realized her credit card was missing when she received a call.

The Syracuse University Office of Greek Life is investigating three Greek house following reports of conduct violations at two houses and an alleged hazing incident at the third.

Results of a national investigation into a reported Delta Sigma Pi and Sigma Nu sorority conduct violation are expected this week, said Lisa Walsh, OGL assistant director. An investigation of another conduct violation at Zeta Beta Tau began Friday, she added.

The investigation of an alleged hazing incident at Chi Omega will soon begin.

As many Syracuse University students are making plans to be in the sun, four SU public relations seniors are promoting safety awareness for those students when they begin Spring Break.

The four seniors developed a public relations class project that received recognition from the American Advertising Federation of Upstate New York.

"We get that message really early on and we wait for a very long time. What do we wait for?" said author and psychologist Jane Adams Friday.

"Women should take charge of their own lives instead of waiting for someone else to give them direction," said author and psychologist Jane Adams Friday.

Clinton attends march

SELMA, Ala. — Thirty-five years after America's Bloody Sunday, when police beat and bludgeoned thousands of black Americans who tried to march at the Edmund Pettus Bridge, many of the same people came Sunday to commemorate the march in this historic civil rights capital.

Coretta Scott King, widow of Rev. Martin Luther King, and Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., were among the many to march in honor of the slain civil rights leader.

$3 million buys time for customs

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Just days before a customs fall would have forced the shutdown of a computer prototype system used to speed imports through three border ports, the Treasury Department has found $3 million to keep the system operating until October.

The prototype, which Detroit automakers rely on to quickly obtain parts and supplies, was launched by the U.S. Customs Service in 1998 as a first step toward a large-scale computer modernization project. Customs suspended work last month on the overall project because of funding problems.

The computers at Customs collect about $20 billion in import duties and fees on imports, making the agency the second largest source of income for the government after the Internal Revenue Service. But the computers are 17 years old, suffer from breakdowns and have difficulty keeping pace with the nation's ever increasing volume of imports.

College decision stuns students

GREENVILLE, S.C. — Bob Jones University's decision to lift its half-century ban on interfaith marriages has stunned students and the fundamentalist Christian school's president, who learned about it Friday night in a national television interview with President Bob Jones III.

Hundreds of students and supporters gathered at the university's auditorium to watch Jones' interview on CNN's "Larry King Live." Jones said the extraordinary national scrutiny the school has received since Texas Gov. George W. Bush made a campaign appearance led him to change his mind.

Bush appeared at the school last month and later apologized for failing to criticize the school's anti-Catholic views and racial policies.

The Greenville school's ban on interracial dating in the 1960s led to a wave of protests that resulted in the Upstate Medical University, Catholic University in Leuven, Belgium, and the University of Illinois in Urbana-Champaign to lift their bans on interracial marriages.

Israel approves Lebanon pullout

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced Sunday that Israel will pull out of all its military bases in Lebanon by July 2000 and from there will withdraw the entire northern towns and villages.

But the statement, read by Cabinet Secretary Vitaly Grossman, suggested that, if no peace accord is signed before the then-scheduled withdrawal, a new agreement would meet again to discuss whether and not to lift the embargo, to implement the pullout.

U.S. troops join flood relief

JOHANNESBURG — Nearly 600 U.S. troops arrived Sunday to begin delivering food, medical supplies and tents to neighboring Mozambique, where a month of flooding has left an estimated 1 million people homeless.

After a week in which more than 12,000 people were displaced, federal and local officials said that 600 people remain marooned.

The United Nations has called on the U.S. to provide food, clean water and medical care to nearly 250,000 people who have been left marooned by floodwaters which have affected some 10-12% of the 16 million people in the region.
Bush, McCain seek final Upstate support

Texas Gov. George W. Bush visited Syracuse on Friday to ask local Republicans to help end the Clinton-Gore era and usher in a new age of responsibility by voting for him in Tuesday's New York state primary.

"Ours is a campaign of fresh ideas," Bush said at ExecAir's hangar at Hancock International Airport. "Ours is a campaign that embraces a philosophy that is conservative with results that will be compassionate for every citizen."

Bush discussed tax cuts, education and a renewed commitment to the military. He highlighted the broad base of support he is receiving in his campaign and pledged to restore honor to the office of the presidency.

McCain promised citizen power, end to politics as usual

Arizona Sen. John McCain visited Central New York Saturday night donning a blue suit — with no orange. Instead of stopping at the Syracuse University Hill, McCain's campaign visited nearby Le Moyne College in DeWitt.

A crowd of about 850 war veterans, Le Moyne and SU students, packed the college's gymnasium with sports arena-like energy. "Shake It Up Baby" and "We Will Rock You" blared through the public address system as McCain supporters cheered.

McCain criticized the morality of Bill Clinton's presidency while distancing himself from the Republican "establishment" that he said, up until one month ago, kept him off the New York state ballot.

"My friends — reject that kind of politics," he said.

He called New York state Gov. George E. Pataki, "Comrade Pataki," in reference to his efforts to prevent his name from appearing on the ballot.

Bush supporters, including Pataki, challenged McCain's petitions for a ballot spot in New York state in January. McCain filed a lawsuit in a Brooklyn federal court to overturn the challenges on the grounds that the state's laws are unconstitutional. The judge ruled in McCain's favor in February, guaranteeing him a place on the ballot.

McCain pledged Saturday to destroy the "iron triangle" in Washington, taking away power from special interest groups and returning it to the public.

While Bush has the support of high-profile politicians like Pataki and former presidential hopeful and potential running mate Elizabeth Dole, McCain's list of delegates are a group of unknowns.

"Bush is being put into the office because of his family name," said William Walsh, a McCain delegate.

Walsh added that supporting McCain in the face of die-hard Republicans is "lonely."

"But that's the road that John McCain has taken," he said.

Brendan Williams, an SU senior political science and broadcast journalism major, said McCain and his lesser-known supporters are a strength not a weakness.

Delta Gamma sponsors charity for blind

BY KATE STEVENSON
Assistant News Editor

Fraternities hit the pool and the stage last week as part of sorority Delta Gamma’s annual Anchor Splash competition.

The competition was a combination of three events — water contests, a skit competition and a combination of three events — water relay races, water polo and synchronized swimming. On Tuesday, Delta Gamma hosted a non-alcoholic skit night at Darwin’s Restaurant and Bar, 701 S. Crouse Ave, during which brothers performed lip syncs and acted.

“There was this one frat, they were really good at it,” Tillson, a senior public relations major, said. “That was kind of the theme.”

Another part of the Anchor Splash competition was a table set up in Schine Student Center last week displaying jars with photos taped on them for the Most Beautiful Eyes penny war. Individual fraternity houses submitted photos of the brother they thought had the best eyes, said Tillson, a senior public relations major.

The event raised money for Service for Sight, a national organization that benefits the blind. Service for Sight is the national Delta Gamma philanthropy, which means that every Delta Gamma chapter raises money for that cause, Tillson said.

Lyra Manning, the director of the event, said she was not sure how much money the event raised because the tallies have yet to be tabulated.

Competition ended to pay an entrance fee for the event. In addition, money was collected from the Most Beautiful Eyes penny war, alumni donations and contributions from area merchants, Manning said.

“It varies every year,” she said. “This year we had a lot more participation. It looks like we’re going to raise a lot more money than in the past.”

Manning attributed the increase in participation to not only the widespread publicity, but also the timing of the event. If it occurred later in the year, there would have been a possibility of scheduling conflicts with other houses’ philanthropy events, she said.

“We were able to not have it conflict with anything else other houses were doing,” she said.

Alpha Tau Omega won the overall competition, Manning said. Zeta Psi came in second place overall and Delta Kappa Epsilon and Pi Kappa Alpha tied for third, she added.

“It was close between all of the houses,” Manning said. “They all participated and they all did a great job. It’s always fun every year.”

Another improvement this year was the strengthened support for participants by their brothers, she added.

“What was really exciting this year was that a lot of the fraternities showed up to cheer on their brothers,” she said. “I spoke to some of the guys after and they said, ‘Yeah we had a blast. It was so much fun.’

Polls show that Vice President Al Gore will score an easy victory in Tuesday's New York state Democratic primary. But it's far too early for him to get cocky and lay off the gas pedal of his campaign bus. Gore remained notably absent from Upstate New York as Texas Gov. George Bush and Arizona Sen. John McCain made last minute campaign stops last weekend in Syracuse.

Republican candidate Alan Keyes and Democratic contender Bill Bradley have also made recent appearances.

Gore is the only major presidential candidate who hasn't visited the Salt City during the Democratic contender Bill Bradley have also made recent appearances. New York state is the second most populous state in the nation, and it boasts the second largest number of Super Tuesday delegates, behind only California. Trips to the Big Apple don't scratch the whole state off a candidate's agenda. Upstaters pull the lever, too.

And they pull it powerfully: The seat of the Empire State's agricultural, manufacturing and industrial prowess lies north of Westchester county.

If Gore thinks he has the Democratic nomination locked up, he may be right. But a seat in the Oval Office is far from a sure thing. He neglects the inevitably tough race in the general election against whoever garners the GOP nomination.

Both Bush and McCain could halt the vice president's plans if he fails to follow their lead on the campaign trail.

The general election day comes this November. Gore's lip service won't be enough to match the real contributions in the academic arena — our labels of apathy, vanity and disinterest, are the same govern-mental and rights issues. Mean-while, our generation has fallen victim to a different light. Chinese Americans have also made con-siderable contributions in the academic arena — our scholars have won Nobel prizes in physics and the other achievements in math, economics and biochemistry.

But politically speaking, we have only one Chinese-American governor, one Chinese-American Congressman and one Chinese-American senator. This means an optimistic progress, after we have left the railroad and wagon tracks of the early years. And yet, there are certain things that need to be done.

First, we Chinese Americans need to become more involved in the political process. First, many Chinese Americans consider themselves "expatriates" and outsiders of American politics. As one of my uncles says, "Politics in America is the white man's game." Most Chinese are susceptible to the Chinese tradition of passive involvement in political development. But if we all care about is making money and taking care of the family, once the family is fed and dressed, we have little else to worry about.

Second, there aren't many ethnic organizations in America that are Chinese-based. Unlike blacks who join ethnic groups like SNCC, NAACP and Black Panthers, Asians have no habit of forming interest groups that mobilize the masses and send them canvassing in person, door to door. Sometimes that is why we most elected representatives often ignore the Asian vote.

"Next year, Prof. Tien Chiang Lin of the National Science Committee called on Chinese Americans to form groups to influence presidential election outcomes and to "become the master of our own affairs." To gain a say in politics, we must start at the college level. That is why I applaud A.S.I.A.'s effort in combating the discriminatory treatment of Asians in the educational system.

The underlying factor for a disputed Chinese-American representation can be explained by the power-structure's demonization of China. In essence, this is the same power structure that used to establish Jim Crow laws and literacy tests to prevent blacks from participating in politics. Each year, Congress introduces a negative history of China's human rights record as an excuse to deny China's Most Favored Nation status.

According to CNN, FBI agents employed even nastier methods to interrogate Lee Wan Ho, the Chinese-American scientist who allegedly disseminated classified nuclear information to China. CNN reported that the feds compelled Lee to admit to his crime by deliberately misleading the lie-detector machines, threatening to harm his family and placing him in the electric chair.

It is ironic to see such flagrant infringements of human rights happening in a country that glorifies its respect for human rights and the rule of law.

I condemn such barbarism and atrocious behavior which an insult to democracy and the principle of "all are equal before the law." It is for Chinese Americans to unite together, improve the state and protect their interests. We must demand that the US. government stop the persecution of Chinese Americans. We should also encourage our children to study history, politics and law to make them realize that they are American citizens who must be free from racial discrimination.

A starting point is to clean up Chinatown and ensure that people do not only associate Chinese as merely ethnic cuisine. Only Chinese Americans with dignity can contribute to justice and social progress in the United States.

To the Editor:

If there is one thing that Syracuse University has too many of, it's students who don't want to know and don't care. Our genera-tion is locked down upon by older generations.

They claim we are apathetic, and they have good reason to do so. Our generation is probably the most restless since my grand-parents' generation, which it comes to any issue concerning the welfare of our future.

We are too preoccupied with looking for immediate, being popular, having the most expensive jeans and impressing others. We are commod-ified victims. We are prey to governments and corporations who want to set exactly the way they want us to: vain and apathetic.

They assume our disinterest in political, economic, social, environ-mental, and gender issues. Mean-while, many of these governments and corporations that assume our disinterest, are the same govern-ments and corporations that are the largest violators of our rights.

The "fuck-the-world-I-only-care-about-myself" attitude is played out, and because of it, our generation has fallen victim to such greed. It is not good enough to simply acknowledge an issue which many people are ignorant of in the first place! We must do something about it! It is our duty to bring about change.

I want to thank those of you who truly do your part. To those of you who feel you can't be bothered, I urge you to reconsider your apathy. Find out what is going on in the world and become more active. The future is ours! Take action now!

The investigation into ZBT is suspended until the investigation is complete, Walsh said. ZBT has not recently received a citation, Walsh added.

The fraternity is being investigated in response to an incident Wednesday, she said. Underage parties and parking violations. Students who live on Ackerman Avenue expressed shock that the serious crime has also been targeted.

The 12:30 a.m. robbery occurred during prime time patrol hours.

"I think they're more party patrol," Bianculli said. "They seem to try to bust parties instead of watching out for suspicious characters.

But SU has seen its share of violent crime since the patrols began in August.

In November, three students were robbed at gunpoint in their South Campus home. Armed with a handgun, robbers took a laptop, cash and credit cards.

In October, four students were beaten and robbed on Euclid Avenue and Redfield Place.

"The university drops all this money on the patrol," senior Frank Matta said. "And it's not working.

two weeks ago, Albert said he thought those whom he left in charge while he was away would take care of the tax situation.

Albert said he has since returned to the Syracuse area to amend the tax problem.

"I've never trusted the bar to anyone else," he said. "I made a mistake by putting someone else in charge.

"I can't have a life outside Forty-fours I guess."

Changes in management have already been made, Albert said.

The bar's locked doors is only a minor setback, he said, noting that the bar did not lose much money during the three days it was out of operation.

Someone placed a "Rest in peace" poster on the door in honor of the bar, called by many the "Syracuse Tradition."

But Albert is optimistic about the bar's re-opening.

The bar will be moving to a larger, expanded location by fall, he said. The new location will be on Marshall Street and will include a kitchen, Albert said.

Friday's closing was a surprise to everyone associated with the bar, said Corey Banning, a Fours bartender.

"None of us had any clue what was going on," said Banning, a Syracuse University junior economics major. "This is the biggest shock I've had in two years.

"Everything was running smoothly and then this happened."

The closing was also a surprise to sophomore and Fours regular, Erika Johnson, who headed to the bar on Friday for happy hour with her friends, she said. Johnson said Friday afternoon at Fours are always "ridiculously" crowded.

"We didn't know what it was about but we knew it was money related," Johnson said. "So everybody just headed to Lucy's (Retired Surfer's Bar)."

But Chris Raslan, manager of Maggie's Tavern, 720 University Ave., said he saw no change in his business this weekend from Fours being closed.

"I heard what happened," Raslan said of Fours. "But my business doesn't increase or decrease because of them being closed.

"But that's not healthy business," he said of the tax evasion. "It's not proper. It's not right."

McCain attracts young Republicans

Fourteen-year-old Christian Brett does not talk about sports with his friends at his eighth-grade lunch table — he talks about politics.

Brett, with friends Greg Collier, also 14 and Joe Zullo, 13, headed to Le Moyne College in neck ties and loafers Saturday to hear Arizona Senator and Republican presidential hopeful John McCain speak before a crowd of more than 800 people.

McCain visited Central New York on Saturday, just three days before the New York state primary this Tuesday. His visit was the last of the St. Lawrence University debate Complex at the college attracted people of all ages; most wearing McCain 2000 stickers in support of the candidate.

Donning stickers themselves, Brett, Collier and Zullo said the event only enhanced their newfound enthusiasm about politics.

"It's exciting," said Brett, a 9th grader, president of the SU College Republican club.

This is the second year, he said, they've been interested in politics.

With all the hype that's been going on, he said, "I've made her vow to never, ever, ever, ever, ever run for Senate," said McCain in reaction to First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton's bid for the New York state Senate seat in the U.S. Senate. The statement elicited boisterous applause.

The national media spotlight has focused intensely on McCain and the potential vice presidential contender running for Senate. said McCain, adding that the two have jostled through television advertisements and verbal attacks. McCain kept the pressure on Bush Saturday, bashing him for allegedly spending $2.5 million in negative television ads.

Looking to November

Though the Bush-McCain battle is yet to be decided, the Arizona senator is confident about his chances in the general election.

"I could beat (Al) Gore like a drum," he said of Democratic hopeful Vice President Al Gore.

Recognizing the Democratic party, McCain introduced his wife Cindy.

"I've made her vow to never, ever, ever, ever run for Senate," said McCain, in reaction to First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton's bid for the New York state Senate seat in the U.S. Senate. The statement elicited boisterous applause.

Missing the Hill

McCain, when McCain's press office released his weekly campaign schedule with Syracuse as a stopover, many thought the senator would visit SU. McCain also was in charge of McCain's campaign in Central New York.

"I received a short e-mail saying we got your message," Sickinger said.

Sickinger, a senior, said that it was only Feb. 26 when McCain officials telephoned and told him they were interested in coming to the Le Moyne University.

DeRossi said the reason McCain failed to appear at SU was the stronger campus support at Le Moyne.

"My family wants to hear him speak," Sickinger said.

"I have no doubt that he's going to win New York."
Her daughter gave her the courage to go back to school, she said. Adams added she will turn 60 this year and receive a Ph.D.

"There has been a shift in the average age of women when they marry," she said. "Baby Boomers wanted to do everything they could before they got married," Adams said. "Then they woke up when they were 36 or 40 and can't find the perfect match." Adams added.

The younger generation sees this happening and becomes so frustrated that they marry at a young age," she said. "Much of that fear stems from levels in a person's conscious and sub-conscious mind that govern what women say, think and do," Adams said.

Mindful of society

"There are three levels to the mind," she added. "One level is the 'big mind.' This level is not as straightforward out and the right person was blamed," the student said. The case was closed with Gent's arrest, the report said.

The Syracuse Police Department arrested Anthony Lacini, a Syracuse University student, Friday afternoon on charges of criminal possession of a controlled substance, unlawful possession of marijuana and assault, according to a police report. Lacini identified himself and police handcuffed him, the report said.

Police went to Lacini's apartment, 1015 Harrison St., to arrest him on assault charges. During the move, Facility Coordinator Patricia Swaites, in a procedure organized by the Department of Design and Construction, the report said.

An unidentified person stole a Dell computer Thursday afternoon, valued at $3,465 from Link Hall, according to a police report. The computer was being moved, along with other equipment, from Hinds Hall to Link Hall, in a procedure organized by the Department of Design and Construction, the report said.

Adams encouraged the audience to take control of their own lives by listening to their 'big mind,' to not be swayed by what society thinks is proper. "The end result may not be what was once envisioned, but it was arrived at by the process of listening to one's own mind," she said.

The student said he put off his education for marriage. Later in her life, after her divorce, she made the choice to go back to school and pursue the higher degree she had put off, the report said.

Dole asks women to help Bush win presidency

BY JOY DAVIA
Special Projects Editor

Gov. George W. Bush's presidential campaign will at- tempting to prove he is the woman-appealing candidate of the Republican party, predicted for- mer presidential contender Eliz-abeth Dole Friday night.

"Women are going to help sweep Bush into the White House," said Dole at a rally in the Eckerd College student center International Airport.

Pointing out that Bush's record as a reformer who "works both sides of the aisle," Dole pointed to the Virginia governor's ability to gain support from different groups. In the 1996 Virginia gubernatorial election, two-thirds of women, one- half of Hispanics and about one-third of blacks voted for Bush, she said.

"Helping women help people together," she added.

With 53 percent of the elector- ate being women, and swing voters traditionally being older women and older mothers, women will play a larger role than normal in the upcoming primaries, Dole said.

Dole, who is a potential vice presidential candidate along with New York state Gov. George P.ataki, said her sup- port of Bush stems from her abil- ity to lead and his accomplish- ments as governor of the second largest state in the country.

"He has executive experi- ence, and instead of saying he would be the president of the United States, he said," Dole said. "New York state Lt. Gov. Mary Donohue also gave sup- port for the the Republican presi- dential contender, adding that it is not 'compassionate to leave it to Answers, who believe in com- passion and in the power of the individual.'

"For too long we have heard the 'rags to riches' story. Is that what we want today?" she said. "We know that many single mothers and their record on education — a centerpiece of his focus his Texas government.

"Women fall squarely on both sides," she said.

Maxine Babcock, a Syrac- use University alumnus and 11th-grade teacher at Port Au- gus, said Bush's pro-life stance should not be an issue for women voters.

Babcock, who came to the rally with her three children, said the only time Bush might make a judgment based on his abortion stance would be in ap- pointing Supreme Court Justices.

But Babcock added that it is often difficult to tell which way a judge would vote on an abortion-related issue.

Gina DeRossi, SU College Republicans president, who many women may be turned off by Bush's pro-life stance. Most women voters are not only pro- choice, but hold more liberal views, she added.

"I'm a woman and I'm con- servative on some issues, but I'm not a semi- Democrat," said DeRossi, a senior public relations major.

"His pro-life stance should not be the primary issue for women, especially when he is not committed to overturning the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision which legalized abortion," she said.

DeRossi said she would vote for Bush in the general presidential election. In the pri- maries, however, she said she would vote for Arizona Sen. John McCain.

"My problem is, is that I like Bush a lot," she said. "But I don't want to be the fed- eral government, Bush said.

He added that an impor- tant part of making the Ameri- can dream more accessible to all is reforming the income tax to make certain necessary measures to attain that goal, Bush said.

Bush wants to put the ma- jority of the federal budget sur- plus back into the tax reform bill and to pass the necessary 26-cent decrease to save social secu- rity, Bush said.

"They say it's risky when they heard our plan," he said, reffering to Vice President Al Gore and Iowa Gov. Chet Scholz of Arizona Sen. John McCain. "Leaving unspent surplus in Wash- ington, that's whos risky."

Middle-class families can expect to save $1,000 on the income tax cut if he's elected, Bush said. He also projected that taxes on people with high in- come would decrease by 26 percent.

"I can't wait to take this message all around America," Bush said. "I can't wait to re- turn to an America in which people go to have a friend in the White House in George Bush.

With regard to national se- curity, Bush said even though we live in a peaceful world, the armed CmCibn must be prepared because the United States still has global enemies. The countrv's monev must go to war on this front, Bush said.

"It's by no means a sweep," said Eannace. "But it's a very important change in the balance of power."

quired working on a program for a non-profit organization.

"People let go when they go on Spring Break," said Mayrin Michelli, a senior public relations major who helped develop the program. "They don't think what the dangers are if they don't think ahead."

The organization is affiliated with the SU Substance Abuse, Prevention and Health Enhancement program at the SU Health Center. The group will sponsor awareness events this week in the Schine Student Center.

"The myth of Spring Break is that people have to be in a drunken stupor," said Rebecca Harvey, coordinator of health education for program. "Drinking in Syracuse with people you know is one thing, drinking with people you don't is another. Drinking more than you usually do and in an unfamiliar situation may make you an easy target.

Students should be concerned with sexual predators and date-rape drugs that can be easily placed in a drink and frequently result in the victim passing out without any recollection, Harvey said.

She added that students should know how to access their health care insurance before they go on break and should be aware of the circumstances and laws around them.

"When you're away, you have to take prevention strategies with you," said Dolores Card, director of the SU Rape Advocacy, Prevention and Education Center.

"Be aware there could be sexual predators waiting for students to arrive."

Also, some students who are not familiar with drinking and driving laws in other states find themselves in trouble with the law.

"Both Florida and North Carolina, common Spring Break destinations, have low blood alcohol limits."

In New York state, the limit is .08 for people of legal drinking age, whereas the limit is .05 in Florida and North Carolina.

The limit for underage drinking ranges from .0 to .05 and many states have sobriety checkpoints on major interstates to check the blood alcohol contents of drivers.

Michelli said the group hopes that its presence in Schine will encourage traveling safely.

The events in Schine will provide information on how to be safe during Spring Break and how to have fun.

From 10 a.m. to 3 p.m., Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, there will be tables in the Schine Atrium offering information and beach pails with items for students to win a $300 certificate toward Spring Break 2001 or a tanning package. The proceeds will go to AIDS Community Resources.

The event will also feature appearances by "Condom Man," who will dress up in a condom and distribute samples.

SU Computing and Media Services will videotape students talking about their plans for Spring Break, Perez said. The tapings will be shown Wednesday to show students where their peers are headed for Spring Break and for research at the SU Health Center. The Health Center wants to learn where students are going in order to offer information for next year's Spring Break.

"Spring Break is an excuse to let go and people should let go."

The beach pails will include samples of Hawaiian Tropic sunscreen, Blistex chapstick, leis, Band-Aids, Trojan and Lifestyles condoms, stickers and pamphlets provided by the SU Health Center on drinking and safe sex. A raffle will be offered for students to win a $300 certificate toward Spring Break 2001 or a tanning package. The proceeds will go to AIDS Community Resources.

SU Computing and Media Services will videotape students talking about their plans for Spring Break, Perez said. The tapings will be shown Wednesday to show students where their peers are headed for Spring Break and for research at the SU Health Center. The Health Center wants to learn where students are going in order to offer information for next year's Spring Break. Harvey said.

"Students need to be aware of possible situations but also enjoy themselves," Michelli said. "Spring Break is an excuse to let go and people should let go."

After being embarrassed on ESPN in the first matchup between SU and UConn, Husky point guard Khalid El-Amin redeemed himself with a 29-point, 14-assist performance in UConn's 69-54 win.

HARTFORD, Conn. — The Syracuse Orangemen clawing their way to a 10-point victory over the Huskies in the Civic Center on Jan. 24 was an aberration.

Top outside threat Preston Shumpert appeared to be in top form as he poured in 20 points, but uncharacteristically had three turnovers. Forward Ryan Blakes added 15 points and pulled down 11 rebounds. Forward Etan Thomas finished with just 13 points and eight rebounds.

"It's difficult to win at any road when you have that many turnovers, that many missed shots, and we've still got the game," Huskies' coach Jim Calhoun said.

Sophomore Tony Bland connected for a three-pointer late in the second half, marking the only deep attempts. He's a player who can hit any shot." Bland said.

When外界 seems to be in control, the Orangemen (16-3, 6-1) have been able to weather any storm. But when they fall behind, they've been unable to catch up in the final minutes.

"When I get my feet set to shoot, I can't really fir the ball with it," Bland said. "It's just felt good, just having the ball and trying to get it off of it. I know when I'm in a shooting groove, I'm going to get them down the stretch."

"If they get it going, they're hard to stop," Huskies' guard Albert Mourning helped the UConn defense both times, and I was able to get them down the stretch."

Syracuse lacks killer instinct in loss

HARTFORD, Conn. — The game contrasted like a fresh snow and a can of Beast or a warm summer afternoon and a snowy winter morning.

The Syracuse Orangemen came here Saturday a confident bunch, trying to prove they’re not 7-4 whooping they laid upon the Connecticut Huskies on Jan. 24 when they made the Huskies look like head coach Jim Boeheim calls it.

And, as such, went the ballgame.

Syracuse dictated the pace in its 68-51 victory in front of a crazy 16,594 at the Hartford Civic Center. The Huskies hit the boards hard, outbounding Syracuse by one after getting demolished on the glass in the first meeting 47-31.

For these loose balls, hit those big shots and took care of business, they did enjoy an intangibles needed to get an 8-2 record and an 8-2 record, head coach Jim Boeheim calls it.

They definitely wanted it more.

“Coming into the game,” UConn point guard Khalid El-Amin said, “the guys were very excited about not starting. They had a lot of energy. They and wanted to win this game and wanted to end our regular season with a win.

“Definitely wanted to beat the team that embarrassed us on ESPN!”

El-Amin spoke with vengeance in mind, a hint of the killer instinct championship teams must have.

UConn won the national title last season. Saturday, the Huskies were hungry.

In the waning minutes of the loss, the Orangemen were in the lead and at one time, as high as No. 4 — showed that will and desire come only in spurts.

The clock read 4:36, the scoreboard 53-47 in Connecticut’s favor. UConn pressed the ball, with El-Amin doing jumping jack shots.

One ... two ... three ... four ... five, Turnover, Syracuse.

Twenty-four seconds later, El-Amin pointed in Jason Hart’s face. El-Amin fouls Hart the next time down. SU’s lead point guard misses the first half of a 1-and-1.

UConn boards and runs. Ajou Dong misses a jumper, but the ball in the game, and I thought that was the difference.

Syracuse may not play basketball.

Only two Orangemen, Bland and Etan Thomas, scored in double figures. The first time the teams met, SU booked six double-digit scorers.

SU shot an abominable 1-for-12 from 3-point range. Their defense could not handle the double- and triple-teams. At times, their defense weren’t crisp. They shot free throws like Shaz.

The foul line combined to cause a meltdown. Still, said SU captain Hart, the Orangemen retained the confidence with which they entered the Garden.

Retention for five days, however, is a different task. Syracuse is playing the jaunt this week to New York City for the Big East Tournament, a bracket ripe with NCAA Tournament implications.

Boeheim spoke of the team’s different phases.

Phase 1, the regular season is over. Phase 2, the conference tournament, begins for the Orangemen.

And Phase 3, the NCAA Tournament? Well, anyone cares.

If Syracuse can muster a strong Big East showing followed by a long NCAA Tournament run, the sting of the UConn loss will lessen win-by-win.

Maybe. It just depends which Syracuse team decides to show up.

East mistakes highlighted the backcourt.

Kevin Freeman hit a driving layup and followed with a blocked shot on Hartford’s El-Amin’s third triple of the game.

Syracuse called a timeout and tried to regroup offensively, looking to shake a hassling Connecticut man-to-man defense.

The attempt was futile, however. After an El-Amin foul, SU was whistled for a five-second violation on the in-bound.

The Huskies (21-6, 10-6) ran their halfcourt offense to perfection and players swarmed the high post and gave El-Amin the choice to pop a trey from the right wing.

“We put him down com- ing on a post, but he didn’t do much at Syracuse,” SU head coach Jim Boeheim said. “He’s off-looking to shoot the ball and he’s a good shoot- er. He’s going to make them.”

Leading 56-47 with 4:14 remaining, UConn tacked on another five points, including a 3-pointer by El-Amin.

The run was disappointing. SU center Etan Thomas said, “We were on the high end of seven Orangemen earlier in the game.”

Syracuse trailed 35-27 at halftime and UConn stretched the lead to as many as 10. But a Ryan Blackwell leaner from 12 feet gave SU a 45-44 lead with 8:34 remaining.

“We had clawed our way back,” Thomas said, “but they scored 13 and grabbed 17 rebounds in the first half, and I thought that was the difference.”

Syracuse scored 12 in the first half. They got the loose balls and the offensive rebounds that were out of their norm.

It’s just the fact that we missed our sets,” Blackwell said. “I think that was the difference.

Handling Hanley
Early in the third quarter of Saturday's game, Syracuse's first-string goalie John Glazetl's stick broke near the handle. After chasing Virginia midfielder Hanley Holcomb for a loose ball, Glazetl became tangled with the Cavalier junior. The Orangemen defender tried to break his cross away and ended up with the top quarter hanging limp.

While his teammates scrambled to get him a replacement, SU assistant equipment manager Gary Austin dealt the cross and tossed it back to its owner at the 5:15 mark. Holcomb found himself in the middle of another third quarter scruffle. After Syracuse goalie Rob Mulligan charged a loose ball, Holcomb impeded his path back to the cage.

No flag came, and Mulligan voiced his displeasure. The Orangeman drew a penalty of his own, and the Cavaliers won a faceoff with him in the box.

SU wins in classic game

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — When Saturday's 13-12 overtime epic ended, victorious Syracuse head coach John Desko and his Virginia counterpart Dom Starsia called it the game of the year. Orangemen hooked up in a classic duel that added to one of lacrosse's top rivalries.

Four quarters brought crunching checks, precision passing and a slew of unlikely heroes. But 60 minutes of regulation play left the teams locked at 12 apiece.

The game's terminal play shook the supporting casts and left the two superstars in the spotlight.

Ryan Powell, ball in his crotch behind the net, chopped it away from UVa's superstar defender Ryan Curtis. A battle of seniors, a battle of teammates, a battle of matchups could be a determinant. Gill on Saturday in the No. 1 Syracuse vs. No. 3 Virginia match of last season's national championship game.

More important than the scoring, Glazetl didn't allow Gill to break free and feed the net to his teammates. "Glazetl really does a great job distributing the ball, and a lot of that goes through him," Desko said. "He's very good at finding the open man, so we knew we were going to have to get on his hands."

Gill placed the orange on a postcard, the rescue, moving in front of the net and taking Gill's shot off his leg. Gill saw an open net and took a shot, but Glazetl stepped in to the rescue, gutting out the 13-12 victory in a rematch of last season's national championship game.

"That was my first save ever," said Glazetl, while Mulligan almost missed it. "Right spot, right time, just a guess." Sure enough, on a central Virginia afternoon so beautiful it belonged on a postcard, the No. 1 Cava- liers and UVa's goalie Derek Kenney at the 2:07 mark for the sudden-death win.

Powell's tally capped a three-quarter display that saw the ball change direction between the two, matching last year's war in the national title game, a 12-10 Cavalier triumph.

"It was two players battling each other like crazy," Desko said.

Cavaliers humiliate visiting Syracuse

BY ALISON HISCHAK Staff Writer

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. — In preseason chatter, the Syracuse women’s lacrosse players said they were confident. They said they had the ability to play with some of the best teams in the country.

But neither Syracuse’s confidence nor their ability showed when they took on the No. 3 Virginia Cavaliers on Saturday at Klöckner Stadium.

Instead, in their chance for recognition, the Orangewomen at best mustered a lackluster defense and a virtually nonexistent offense. "It was just a poor effort all the way across the board," head coach Lisa Miller said. "We don’t do the little things in practice, and it catches up to us." The Cavaliers (2-0) showed their offensive prowess from the get-go. On three consecutive trips up the field, Virginia attackers found the back of the net, as the Cavaliers took a 3-0 lead before any of the Orangewomen even cradled the ball in their sticks.

Gina Sambus drove to the cage for the first goal, and preseason All-American Amy Ewing capitalized on a free position chance — a free shot on goal after a penalty — from the right side for the second goal.

Just 30 seconds later, Molly Canemgi hit Jamie Haas crossing in front of the net for a 3-0 UVA lead two minutes into the game.

When Syracuse finally settled into its offensive position, the players faced an attacking Cavalier defense that denied any attempt to get the ball even close to the cage.

Miller cited a lazy attitude and lack of effort as part of her team’s early troubles.

"I’m not sure they even started, so how do you give up when you don’t start?" Miller said. "My team can overwhelm these teams athletically, but when they actually have to work, they might not be willing to do it.

While Syracuse struggled to find motivation, the Cavalier offense continued to roll.

Mills Hook connected on another free position opportunity, and Ewing notched her second of four goals on the afternoon to put Virginia ahead 5-0 with 23:09 left in the first half.

Virginia played full of emotion, Hook said, which helped spark the quick start.

"We came out really intense," Hook said. "We played with lots of guts and desire. Throughout the whole team, we were fired up for our first home game. That’s what made the real difference.

SU finally settled after the opening rush. Junior attacker Karen Healy used a nifty move to shake free from defenders and skip the ball into the cage for the Orangewomen’s first score. Healy paced SU in the game, finishing with two goals and an assist.

Lauren Aumiller answered for the Cavaliers, taking advantage of another Orangewomen foul and scoring on a free position goal.

After the goal, Virginia was late getting back, and Healy found All-American Katrina Hable open down the left side of the field.

Hable scored the first of her two goals, cutting the lead to 5-2 with 6:25 to play in the first.

Virginia quickly squashed any chance of a rally, scoring two goals in 1:24 span before halftime. Hook notched goals No. 2 and 3, while Sambus added her second score of the game, sending the Cavaliers to the break with a 9-2 advantage.

"We wanted things to go this smoothly," Hook said. "We knew it was a big game for them. We felt like if we took it to them, we thought they might fall.

The second half featured the high-powered Cavalier offense continually firing away at Syracuse keeper Clothilde Ewing, opening and opening up a 14-3 lead.

The senior netminder allowed 15 goals (as opposed to six saves) before being pulled for backup Tegan Leonard in the final 10 minutes. Although Swan struggled, Miller didn’t overly criticize her performance.

"I don’t think Clo played particularly well," Miller said, "but our defense didn’t protect her either.

SU was whistled for 20 fouls, and Virginia capitalized on 7-of-9 free position opportunities. In comparison, the Cavaliers committed only 12 fouls, with the Orangewomen scoring on 5-of-6 free chances.

SU’s offensive output wasn’t much better. The team took only 13 shots on goal and struggled with passing the ball up the field and around the cage.

Attribute part of the offensive woes to the noticeable absence of Jenna Szyluk. The senior attacker is nursing a back injury and is on the shelf indefinitely.

But between the dropped passes and intercepted feeds, the Orangewomen couldn’t find an offensive rhythm.

She traced all the problems, great and small, back to attitude and intensity.

"Until we start to be more aggressive day in and day out and do the little things," Miller said, "then when we play an elite team this is what happens."
Orangewomen display heart in 67-65 defeat

BY GREG BISHOP
Staff Writer

STORRS, Conn. — In a nail-biting Big East Tournament loss, the Syracuse women's basketball team proved that men's point guard Jason Ennis' basketball team proved wasn't the only heart in the Constitution State for the weekend.

And while the Hart-led Orangewomen lost to UConn in near-by Hartford, Conn., the No. 12-seeded Orangewomen played their hearts out in a season-ending 67-65 first-round loss to fifth-seeded Georgetown.

The setback extended the team's losing streak to seven games.

"I thought we played with a lot of heart and desire," SU head coach Mariana Freeman said. "We came back to make it close the ballgame. We had a close the ballgame. We had a close the ballgame. We had a close the ballgame. We had a close the ballgame. We had a close the ballgame. We had a close the ballgame. We had a close the ballgame.

The Orangewomen's last shot by Record, though, fell short. Still, the never-say-die attitude accomplished a difficult task, as it turned Syracuse into fan favorites in a neutral court.

"Today, I thought we had great team chemistry," Aziz said. "We wanted to win more than anything. It's all we've been talking about. It's all we've been waiting for. It was really exciting to be here."

Record, Perry, Aziz and guard Jakia Ervin exemplified the squad's heart in its last game of the season.

Record, a third-team All-Big East selection, combined with Azia, who played like she had in the beginning of the season, for 40 points and 24 rebounds.

The undersized Perry continued to snag offensive rebounds, grabbing six while continually cutting through the Hoyas zone to allow players like Aziz to get open jump shots.

The Orangewomen's second-chance efforts kept them in it, Freeman said.

"On the boards, they gave us quite a bit of difficulty," Georgetown head coach Patrick Xnapp said. "Record played well, and Aziz stepped it up. But the second shots killed us and made this a very ugly game.

Pacing the offense in the comeback was Ervin, who might be granted another year of eligibility for next season. The senior point guard, who was placed on academic probation her first year for her standardized test scores, will get another year of eligibility if she graduates in May, which she plans on doing.

Against Georgetown, Ervin dishouted six assists, with no turnovers, while hitting two key free throws down the stretch to keep the Orangewomen in the game. Ervin, who went 0-for-10 from the field, also ran the Syracuse offense like a seasoned veteran.

The strong effort of Syracuse, which finished second-to-last in the conference, is indicative of how good the conference is from top to bottom, Freeman said.

"Any given night, any team can come away with the win," Freeman said. "We are capable of playing well, we just haven't done that consistently. Our record may be a little different than what we are capable of. Today, we gave as much as we could give.

There comes a time when each of us has to give up our dependency on this place. Working at the D.O. was one of the best experiences of my life. I can't believe it's finally over. I have met some of the most unique people I will ever know at this place. I want to thank you all for the special part of my life. And don't blame me for leaving because, really, how LONG can someone work in copy? I will never read a novel, paper, newspaper or even a syllabus without copy editing it. I have been cursed.

Saps - Will I ever see you again?? You're always here. I was pissed off when we bribed you but I guess I'm over it now. Thank you so much for dealing with my constant shit... and bummies.

And thanks for copy editing my dude. Want some chicken??

ANIMAL!!!

Yinka - Oh, so you need the most thanks because who was there to hear my constant spazz, day in and day out. I have always been here for you, even when you didn't want to be. You know so much, you should have worked here. College wouldn't be complete without you.

Christian - Thank you for always being proud of me. Remember my mom's "proud of you" songs?? You hired me this year, thank you. I bought Whitney to the porch. When was the last time I heard "ABC"? In here?? Thanks for always having faith in me.

Billy - Who else but Billy was more of a space than me?? I miss those Kformance/ Celine Dion days. You know I love you.

Ryan - I am so glad that I met you. I remember the first day you walked in here, when you looked over my shoulder all night, as if you were trying to learn something. From then on, you always spent at least 20 minutes on each story, and were successful in finally ending Billy's Streisand/Dion escapade. Thank you for keeping the "80s at 8 alive. Remember the good old' days??... don't make me cry.

Shodie - I thank you for being as crazy as I am. You have always been the most fun, and I still can't figure out why pinching does not harm you.

Joy - I will call you for your fleeting thoughts. Try not to miss me too much. Just look at the Pope and think of me. Or the pigeons. There was always that night of rain In Venice... ok sorry.

Tom/Adet - I am leaving because I do not see that disco ball that was promised. It's just not fun anymore. I will miss seeing you both on an everyday basis, but I will come in for a voice of reason once in awhile.

Sports - I have read your stories for over a year. I still do not understand anything. Obviously, it's just me, I am a disgrace.

Em - How could I not thank the best managing editor in the world? Next time we go to Denny's, I'll give you my butter.

Ron - I will never forgive you for not hiring me as the staff psychologist. Maybe we can go talk about that in the bathroom.

To my friends outside of this place (you know who you are...) - I am sorry I went for so long. Thank you for being so supportive, I love you.

I leave the D.O. officially smoke-free. You've finally gotten rid of us fiends.

After an SU timeout, the Hoyas' Tameke Folston tried to inbound the ball to Katie Smoket-Duffy. The All-Big East second team selection couldn't hold onto the ball and it rolled out of bounds, giving possession back to the Orangewomen and taking them closer to the half. We inbounded the ball to Record at the top of the circle. Record came off a screen and pulled up for a jumper from the left wing. Her shot fell short but Perry grabbed the offensive board with a second left on the clock.

However, the freshman's follow didn't fall, ending the game and the Orangewomen's season.

Record and Leigh Aziz led the Orangewomen with 22 points while National Boarder Bona pitched in 21.

Record, Perry and Aziz were the key components in Syracuse's 33-8 offensive rebounding edge.

After keeping pace with the Hoyas for the first half, SU only trailed 35-29 at the break. The Hoyas jumped out on a 10-0 run to start the second half and built their lead to 15 as the Orangewomen failed to hit a shot in the first four minutes of the period.

Syracuse led 53-38 with 13 minutes remaining in the game before Syracuse went on a 11-0 run to pull within four with 7:40 left.

In the stretch, Syracuse capitalized on poor Georgetown shooting and four strong offensive boards. The Hoyas missed four jumpers and three layups during the scoring drought.

The Georgetown head coach Patrick Knapp said his team's execution down the stretch allowed the Hoyas to take revenge on the Orangewomen, SU beat Georgetown 75-62 on Feb. 12 at Madison Square Garden.

"I think the second half killed us," Knapp said. "It was a very ugly game, and it went down to the wire. But I think we executed better than the last time, and we made more shots." Record grabbed seven offensive rebounds and 15 total for the game. Nine of her rebounds came in the second half, including four in SU's game ending 9-3 run.

Despite shooting just 34 percent as a team in the first half, Aziz kept the Orangewomen in the game effectively. Aziz shot 5-for-6 in the first frame for 13 points. She drove to the hole on several occasions with reckless abandon and battled the taller Georgetown forwards for position on the offensive boards. She punched in five offensive boards in the first half.

The Orangewomen needed Aziz's production in the first half. The Hoyas' backcourt of Jaime James and Jakia Ervin combined for zero points in the first stanza.

As a team, the Orangewomen held a 40-35 rebounding advantage over the Hoyas despite Georgetown's taller presence in the middle.

The Hoyas' frontcourt of 6-foot-10 center Suzy Bennett and 6-foot-3 Bourderee, who combined for only eight boards, while Aziz and Record had 24 combined boards.

Syracuse head coach Marianna Freeman said the rebounding edge, especially Aziz's first half performance, kept her team competitive.

"Aziz really addressed the boards for us," Freeman said. "It's always tremendous when you have someone that's scoring for you as well as going to the boards. I know that kept us in the ballgame."

The team was without senior forwards Paula Moore and Erin Pratt for much of the season. Freeman faced the task of working with a nine-player bench.

Plagued by the lack of depth, SU dropped 15 of its last 18 games after a promising 7-3 beginning.

Yet the Orangewomen nearly upset Rutgers at home and lost five other conference games by seven points or fewer, including Saturday's two-point setback.

"I think we were capable of playing as consistently well as we did (Saturday) every single game, our record would certainly be better," Freeman said. "This team experienced a lot of different things that happened to them throughout the season. We felt that this team came out and just gave as much as they had to give."

Many songs are maddeningly inconsistent in their tone. "Sado" has a promising apocalyptic beginning before succumbing to the same generic guitar and drum arrangement. Occasionally in the song, the band will abruptly get quiet, then immediately get loud again. Because of this, "Sado" is a jarring headache. It's trying to be three songs at once. Since the songs can never find a comfortable internal flow, it only stands to reason that the album on the whole is all over the map. Giving homage to different groups and genres is fine (see Beck's brilliant "Midnite Vultures") but copying is a different story. For example, I was enjoying the track "Time" for a minute or two, then I realized it sounded exactly like Alice in Chains' "Man in the Box." The first 11 songs on The Deadlights debut have plenty of screaming and deafening guitars but are strangely devoid of passion. The band just sounds like it is going through the motions, copying everyone else in hopes that they will be labeled the "next fill-in the blank." Which is what makes the final track, "Falling Down," such a welcome and unexpected surprise. The melodic, creepy arrangement relies on acoustic guitars and sitars. Duke's voice is solid and disciplined. Whereas the lyrics throughout the rest of the album are generic—often unintelligible—rants, here you are mellow and poetic: "You are just a fleeting dream/created by me/We all fall down/time slowly slips away."

"Falling Down" shows that The Deadlights can be a disciplined, creative, engaging band. This makes the rest of the album even more annoying in retrospect. It seems like all the hollering and banging was just a way to get people's attention. Ironically, the only song from the whole disc that stuck in my head was the slowest, quietest one.

In the end, The Deadlights arrive with a decidedly underwhelming debut effort. They experiment with different styles, and most of the time they fail. But, "Falling Down" offers hope. One song can not redeem this album, but it does promise for the future of The Deadlights. When they finally decide on a style, I'm hoping they get over their Kurtin fixation and just evolve.

P-Nut is famous for his bass-slapping solos, and the band followed suit with the fun-kay "Feels So Good." P-Nut did not disappoint—in mid-song, he proceeded to slap his bass like a red-headed stepchild, and the crowd erupted in cheers.

The crowd demographic consisted of two majorities: One, Syracuse University students and two, local high-school children with history papers due. The SU kids were there to see the first REAL rock show at Goldstein in months; the tweens were stoked to be smoking Virginia's finest on a school night. Nevertheless, the crowd was full of die-hard fans who were at least familiar with the hits, and the group had no trouble getting them to sing along. 311 ended with "Who's Got the Herb" and "Down," their biggest hit to date. During "Down," everyone took a break from slamming into each other and sharing sweat—it was time to get your own groove on. "All Mixed Up," "Strong All Along" and "Who's Got the Herb" and "Down," their signature tracks "Time" for a minute or copy is a different story. For the album on the whole, it only stands to reason that the album even more annoying.

Deadlights’ debut album lacks originality, energy

There is a certain irony in debut albums. Often times, the young artists are unsure of the sound they are looking for and experiment with many different styles. As their careers progress, the bands usually pick a style and stick with it, never daring to experiment again.

The Deadlights certainly experiment with different sounds on their self-titled debut album, often within the same song. So why do the majority of the tracks sound so familiar? Probably because The Deadlights rip off every successful hard rock band they can get their hands on. They try to be everyone else at once, and consequently form no identity of their own.

From the look of the disc itself, which looks exactly like “The Downward Spiral,” you’d expect The Deadlights to be a rip-off of industrial rockers Nine Inch Nails. But from the very beginning of the album, the inspiration for The Deadlights is apparent — KORN.

“Bitter,” a brief introductory track, focuses on heavy metal guitar, pounding drums and a lot of shouting. Frontman Duke (no first or last name, just Duke, because he is cool even if it sounds like RoR’s Jonathan Davis when he is growling at the top of his lungs.

The next track, “Amplifier,” follows the same mold, but is carried by its furious energy. The verses are a chaotic mishmash of guitar, drums and shouting, which segue into surprisingly well-arranged choruses. It’s derivative, but it is fun to listen to.

Up to a certain point. The Deadlights seem to lose their energy after the first two songs. There is no snap in the guitars, and Duke’s growling just becomes monotonous. Even when the band slows things down in the middle of certain songs, such

Police neglect initiative promise

Robinson uninformed in wake of robberies

TIFFANY LANKES
Asst. News Editor

While two Syracuse University seniors found themselves robbed at gunpoint early Saturday morning, SU Public Safety found itself left in the dark.

The Syracuse Police Department agreed when the Neighborhood Patrol Initiative was established in August that it would inform Public Safety of any reported incidents involving SU students.

The department, however, failed to notify Public Safety of Saturday's incidents involving SU students.

"We would certainly want to know," Robinson said. "We have an agreement that anytime something affects our students, they contact us. It seems right now that no one has done that."

Syracuse Police Spokesman David Sackett confirmed that the police department normally informs Public Safety of incidents involving SU students.

The seniors were walking on the 800 block of Ackerman Avenue at about 12:30 a.m. when a man reportedly approached them and asked them for money. When the students refused, the man pulled out what appeared to be an automatic handgun from his sweatshirt pocket, a police report said. The seniors gave the man $35.

Fours reopens on Marshall Street

By Emily Kulkus
Managing Editor

Just three days after New York state tax officials seized 44's Tavern, the popular Marshall Street bar will reopen its doors today to the public.

The New York State Department of Taxation and Finance issued three outstanding warrants for sales withholding and corporate tax evasion by Fours, forcing the state to seize the property at 113 Marshall St. at about 5 p.m. Friday.

The warrants include outstanding sales tax debts of $7,315.08 from Oct. 21, 1998 that $7,306.07 from Dec. 14, 1998 and an additional $8,463.96 from Jan. 12 of this year, said Michael Bucci, assistant director of communications for the state tax department.

China hikes military budgets

BELING — The Chinese economy will grow by 7 percent, and the painful task of reorganizing money-losing state enterprises will move ahead during the year 2000, the Chinese Premier Li Peng announced last Monday in its annual budget presentation.

At the same time, the People’s Liberation Army, the world’s largest military force, will increase by 14 percent in 1999. The budget for the year 2000, as presented by the Finance Minister Li Peng on Monday in its annual budget presentation.

Child murder shocks Japan

TOKYO — Mitsuko Yamada, a 10-year-old girl, was murdered last Thursday in a house in her neighborhood.

The murder of November last year has been attributed to a variety of motives, including school competition, jealousy and bullying. The victim was an 11-year-old girl whose parents were said to have been alarmed by her recent good grades in school. The suspect, a former classmate, is now in custody.

Jett skids, crashes into car

LOS ANGELES — A Southwest Airlines jet carrying 137 passengers was forced to land at Burbank Airport Sunday night, after the pilot reported that he had seen a car on an adjacent street where the plane hit a car.

The jet, a 377-SE, was approaching the runway at 6:11 p.m. when the pilot saw a car on a road near the runway. The jet hit a car that was parked on the road, and the jet ran off the runway.

Several passengers and witnesses said the plane was flying too low and too fast. As the landing was frightening, passengers said no one on board was seriously injured. But officials said neither were injured.

Federal Aviation Administration officials said it was too soon to determine the cause of the accident, but a spokesman said it appeared the pilot overshot the runway.

Class resumes in Michigan

MOUNT MORRIS TOWNSHIP, Mich. — Gretted by teddy bears and extra security, Buell Elementary School children returned to class Monday for the first time since a first-grader was shot to death in her classroom.

Room 6, where the shooting occurred, had been cleaned and repainted. Trauma counselors with teddy bears were in each room to help the children, and by the lunch break, some children were skipping on the sidewalk outside the school.

A group of police officers were inside and outside the school. School officials would not give attendance figures.

Senior officer Charles Schwartz, officer Thomas Wiese and Thomas Bruder were found guilty of conspiracy to obstruct justice because they had claimed Schwartz was not present during the attack on Louisa. They could be sentenced to five years in prison.

Schwarz already faces a possible sentence for his 1999 conviction for violating Louisa’s civil rights by holding her down as Officer Justin Volpe sedated her with a broken-off broom handle in a Brooklyn jailhouse bathroom on Aug. 9, 1997.

Court rejects oil tanker laws

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Supreme Court rejected Washington’s state regulations of tanker laws on Tuesday, in an opinion that appeared to be a victory for international law.

The ruling is a reversal for officials who had been working to protect Puget Sound and other waterways from contamination. The court said that federal law covering tankers generally takes precedence.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy acknowledged in the opinion that the states have been the source of much of the federal government’s authority over the nation’s waterways.

The case involved a federal law covering tankers generally takes precedence.

Professor dies at 58, school mourns

BY KEVIN TAMPORE
Asst. News Editor

Jeffery Katzer, associate dean and professor in the Syracuse University School of Information Studies, died Saturday at the age of 58.

"He really embodied the spirit of organization," said Ray mond von Dran, school dean. "He was the kind of person that anyone could confide in."

Katzer joined the school faculty in 1968, when the school was just beginning at SU. He found the school a loosely grouped mix of faculty focused on library science and helped to transform it into a national leader in the information field, von Dran said.

"There's not a faculty member here in IST, including myself, that he didn't have a hand in. He was the kind of person that everyone respected," von Dran said. "He helped us all."

Commitment to students was one of the most important things to Katzer, von Dran said. He was always able to see the positive aspects within his students and colleagues and improve himself to do so.

Despite his relatively young age, Katzer was wise beyond his years and used his intelligence to work for the school and those surrounding him, von Dran said.

"He always helped other people compete," von Dran said. "He never tried to compete himself."

As associate dean, Katzer was responsible for curriculum development, faculty development and research within the school. During his tenure at the school, Katzer also founded its doctoral program and directed the program during several different periods.

Katzer's presence at the school was a constant uplift for all his colleagues, said Barbara Kwasniski, a professor at the school.

"What I remember the most about him is what an incredible colleague he was," she said. "He was a very gentle person with a great sense of humor."

Katzer's wit was one thing both von Dran and Kwasniski could remember. His joking manner has been helping many of his colleagues work through this difficult time, Kwasniski said.

"As a teacher, Jeffery Katzer was an inspiration," von Dran said. "He had a way of making everyone feel included and like they were part of the community."

Kwasniski said that Katzer's toughness in the classroom was well known throughout the school.

"He was brilliant, but never egotistical. He always used his mind to try and change the way students think," she said. "I told me once that was his goal."

A memorial service for Katzer will be held at 3:30 p.m. Wednesday in Hendricks Chapel. School faculty and staff are planning to read some of the messages from students at the service. Kwasniski said. Katzer is survived by his wife Linda, whom he met when he was 17, and his children Andrew and Jill.

Katzer was diagnosed with cancer in October, but continued to teach classes from his home until he was not able to, Kwasniski said.

That dedication and love for the school, as well as the improvements he made to the program, ensure that Katzer leaves a legacy for all future students, faculty and staff in the school, Kwasniski said.

"One of the things he did really well was he encouraged a sense of community in our school," she said. "He was so fair and so balanced."

placed outside someone's house is in such poor condition that people no longer want it inside. "They're old and rotten, they look terrible," he said. "If it's not good enough for their living room, why is it okay to put it outside so we can all see it?"

Erich Rydlewski, a junior public relations and marketing major who lives in an apartment on Strathford Street, said appearances are very subjective.

"It's your own place," he said. "It seems like it's just a matter of people's different tastes in decorating."

Jennet Arcara, a senior anthropology and foreign language major, agreed, saying that there is nothing wrong with putting furniture on her Ostrom Avenue porch and sitting outside.

"I like to sit out on our porch in the spring, it's nice," she said. "We're not breaking the law by sitting there."

The law does not prohibit patio furniture, designed specifically for outdoor use, but Arcara said that this is not a very feasible option for her and her six roommates.

"We're not going to go out and buy furniture for our porch when we have stuff in the basement," she said.

Schmid, former president and a current member of the SEUNA, said she expected students to question the move.

"They'll say it's inexpensive and that they're getting rid of reusing things, and that makes sense to a point," she said. "But you have to think of the impact this will have on the rest of the community."

Schmid said there is currently a ban on placing indoor furniture outside in the fire codes, but by putting the legislation before the Council, the law can now be more strictly enforced by the Syracuse Police Department.

"We're not going to go out and buy furniture for our porch when we have stuff in the basement," she said.

"I don't know what we'll do," Arcara said. "If it's not in my body that needs feeding, better call for takeout. Again.

Pan Am trial prosecutor resigns, new counsel takes role

BY JOY DAVIA
Special Projects Editor

The newly appointed prosecutor in the Pan Am Flight 103 case traveled from Scotland to the Boston area Saturday to alleviate the victims’ family members’ concerns that the change in leadership would weaken the trial.

Bob Hunt, who lost his daughter when the plane exploded in Dec. 1988 over Lockerbie, Scotland, said he is concerned that the new prosecutor, Scotland’s solicitor-general Colin Boyd, will not have enough time to prepare for the May 3 trial against the two Libyans suspected of the bombing.

“I would rather delay the trial and have the new prosecutor well-versed in the case and not make any errors,” said Hunt, who was not able to attend Saturday’s meeting.

Eleven Lockerbie residents on the ground and 259 passengers, including 25 Syracuse University students, who returned from a semester abroad in London, died in the bombing.

The Saturday meeting was with the Victims Families of Pan Am Flight 103 group, which meets about four times a year.

Boyd replaced the former superior in the trial, Lord Andrew Hardie, who stepped down from the trial last month to become a judge.

HeLEN Englehard, who lost her husband in the explosion, said Boyd’s prior role as the “number two” man on the prosecution team should help him prepare for his new leading role.

There have been speculations in the media, however, that Hardie stepped down because the case against the two Libyans was not strong enough, said Melissa Dias, a freshman business major at SU.

But the media speculations are unfounded, said Englehard.

“The media doesn’t know what they are talking about,” she said. “They keep saying, ‘There is no case, there is no case.’ But no evidence has been released.”

The Scottish have been “tight-lipped” about the case, which includes 10,000 pieces of evidence and 1,000 witnesses.

“Aunt,” an SU masters student in the College for Human Development at the time, died in the bombing.

Dias said she did not expect Hardie to resign, especially because of the constant communication he had with the victims’ families, including sending them Christmas cards.

“I was surprised,” she said. “But when I read that he took a judgeship, it’s understandable.”

Hardie’s resignation is one more complication in the families’ 11-year struggle to bring those responsible for the bombing to justice.

In November 1991, Scotland issued warrants for the arrests of Libyans Abdel Basset Ali Mohamed al Megrahi and Lamen Khalifa Fhimah. The two Libyans suspected in the bombing were not brought into custody until the fall of 1998 because Libyan leader Muammar Gadhafi refused to hand them over.

But Gadhafi agreed in 1998 to release the suspects if they would be tried by a Scottish judge in a neutral country.

The contents of this agreement were never revealed, Hunt said, leading him and other family members of the victims to worry that Gadhafi may have been granted immunity if he became a suspect during the trial.

“People are concerned,” he said. “I hope the truth comes out and they don’t run us around the bush.”

Earlier Friday night, Aurelio Guzman, another SU student was approached in the same location, by a man of a similar description, who asked for $5. The student gave him the money and the man drove away.

Guzman said he called Public Safety to report the incident around 2 a.m.

Public Safety told him it was an off-campus incident and suggested that he call Syracuse police, he said.

The street is one of many off-campus neighborhoods that is being policed as part of the patrol initiative, Robinson said.

“That’s an area we highly patrol,” he said. “When I say highly, I mean that it’s patrolled fairly regularly under the Neighborhood Patrol Initiative.”

SU Public Safety, however, has little influence patrolling the area, Robinson said. Because it is not on SU property, most matters in these off-campus neighborhoods are dealt with by the police in those communities.

“We are powerless to go off campus and patrol so we have to work with the city,” Robinson said. “I would think that the police department will take a good look at what’s happened and beef up patrolling there.”

While the police department can make extensive efforts to patrol the area, they can’t do it in all places at once, Sackett said.

“You could have a patrol on every corner and if something happens between, there’s nothing you can do,” Sackett said. “You’re there to prevent usings but you can’t always count on all. That you can try.”

Saturday’s robbery is the fourth this year involving SU students.

“Even one is too many,” Robinson said.

On Feb. 7, an unidentified man robbed an SU student at gunpoint in Thornden Park. The robber took the student’s wallet containing $25 and his driver’s license.

In November, three SU students were robbed at gunpoint in their South Campus apartment. Two men entered the apartment and bound the girls and locked them in their bathroom. The men left with a car, cash and a laptop computer.

In October, a group of men robbed and beat four SU students on Euclid Avenue and Redfield Drive.

“Off campus, these things happen,” Robinson said. “What I do know is that sometimes our students take unnecessary chances. Some things are going to happen. Thornden Park is not the best park at night. We know that. But people aren’t going to stop going through there.”

“If you’re young, you don’t think things will happen to you.”

Off-campus patrols miss crucial crimes

Crack open a beer on your porch and the cops will be there in no time. Run into a hooded man with a gun in the street, and you could be waiting for help all night — or worse.

Three Syracuse University students were robbed at gunpoint last weekend on Ackerman Avenue while cops broke up parties just blocks away.

SU spent $46,000 last year to form the Neighborhood Patrol Initiative with the Syracuse Police Department. But it doesn’t stop crimes about student noise from community groups, or safety complaints from students, that led SU to step up their “security” measures.

The university says that Public Safety’s union with police aims to protect SU students. But it flunked the test.

SU students’ tuition fills the city police’s coffers, but students still can’t stroll down their own street after dark without watching their back every step of the way.

On the university’s dime, the Syracuse police provided for loud parties and raucous drinkers while armed predators jump students on the same darkened streets. Students living off campus must also contend with frequent break-ins to their cars and apartments.

SU should prioritize student safety, rather than pacify vocal community residents furious after last year’s Livingston Avenue student riot.

Dollars would be better spent if police kept their eyes peeled for the real crimes that plague the SU Hill — car break-ins, muggings and apartment burglaries.

Instead, SU collaborates with police and doles out punishments through Judicial Affairs for noise violations and underage drinking done off campus. The Student Code of Conduct, SU says, applies to students no matter where they are.

SU’s efforts to keep the peace are thwarted, however, when the most dangerous criminals escape penalty-free.

Hopefully, it won’t take a robbery gone wrong and a bullet in a student’s brain for SU to figure out what real threats are.

Block Party lineup fails to meet goal of campus unity

A wave a relief passed over me as I read through the list of acts on MTV’s Campus Invasion Tour — The tour, headlined by these English wankers Bush and technotronic, was being touted as SU’s answer to campus unity.

What used to be a time when students could tread on the sun-shine with other students was spoiled after MTV’s hit song steal of approval.

Not only did boats close early, but the event was ransacked by ac-sated teen-agers. Students from Jamevilla-Dewitt and Nottingham high schools showed up to the stade on their own money, but handed over their student IDs to get in.

This left special SU students scratching their heads, wondering if this free concert was worthy of the price they paid.

For your last Block Party was an event SU students looked forward to. Even myself, the professional procrastinator, would row through pages of reading and other inane assignments ahead of time just so I could join in on the fun.

I can only imagine the difficulty Student Government Association and University Union has in choosing a line-up. Availability money and likability all factor into the equation.

So I decided to stroll into Maxwell Auditorium Monday night for SU’s weekly meeting. Surely someone would be on hand to address my Block Party concerns. After all, SU was the one I was worried about.

As I waited for my roommate to finish his computerized banking, I started thinking about all the things I needed to do over the weekend, but I had further questions.

I had had further questions.

During early spring 1997, I remember walking into a bar and finding a uni-ster who was giving me a free drink. I overheard a conversation between a group of black students, discussing Block Party.

“What they need is something like Wu Tang Clan,” one of the students said. “You know, an event where you can go out, have a good time, and then go home.”

I had Block Party reaction inged in my head. I envisioned Block Party as the chance for the entire campus to share a moment together.

I shared these concerns with James, who said he thought Block Party could represent a spectrum of musical genres.

I considered his response and walked away, shaking my head. At least I didn’t have to put up with Jar Jar.

SU students volunteer, work for local causes

To the Editor:

Many letters which have appeared in The Daily Orange have discussed the threat of these old generations you refer to. We are a group of people, its just unfortunate that you don’t realise that.

Mr. Katcher, why don’t you stop buying into the negative images the media is feeding you and start trying to change the perception of these old generations you refer to. We are a hard working and accomplished group of people, its just unfortunate that you don’t realise that.

Finally thank you for your “please and thanks” to those of us who truly do work for our part. I don’t know who put you in charge of the gratitude committee, but people chose to better the world in their own individual ways, and you don’t need to bother yourself with determining who is doing your part and who’s not. It’s not for you to decide.

Hidden viruses infiltrate computers

BY ASHLEIGH GRAF
Staff Writer

They are called the "Buddy List virus" and "Pretty Park." And several Syracuse University students recently found them in their computer accounts, causing their systems to freeze, shut down — and then send the virus out to their friends.

Both viruses are a type of Trojan Horse, according to a report by McAfee, an anti-virus computer software company. A Trojan Horse is a program that enters a computer account as a harmless file or an e-mail from a friend.

The Buddy List virus originated from America Online and affects only users of that Internet provider, according to the report. "This Trojan works as a password stealer, running in Windows memory, monitoring your AOL logon account information," according to McAfee. The information is then sent via e-mail to the members contained on the AOL Buddy List of the infected computer. A Buddy List is a list made by an online subscriber to locate their friends online and to set up chats with them. The virus e-mail is titled, "hey you." It contains a letter, seemingly from an acquaintance of the account holder, about scanned photos, according to McAfee.

David Butler, director of SU Network and System Services, said he was not informed of the virus. "Amy Burstyn, a sophomore psychology major, said she was infected by the Buddy List virus and cannot operate AOL or turn the computer off normally. Burstyn contacted SU Computing and Media Services and is currently waiting for service." The virus e-mail is transmitted through e-mail, said Claire Tafelski, a victim of the virus and a freshman political science major. "The virus was first discovered in mid-February, according to the McAfee report. "My friend sent it to me," Tafelski said. "The virus e-mails itself to all the people in your address book." This program is spread through e-mail to the members contained on the AOL Buddy List of the infected computer.

"No changes have been filed as yet," SU Public Safety also investigated the student in relation to the series of fires in Brewster Hall during the 1999 Fall Semester, the report said. Public Safety, however, was unable to find enough evidence to link the student to any of the Brewster Hall fires, the report said.

"The Montgomery County case is still open," SU Public Safety Director Robert Robinson said.

Bernardi, Councilors debate city-country lawsuit

BY CHRISTINA DENARDO
Staff Writer

With Syracuse Mayor Roy A. Bernardi sitting a few feet away, Onondaga County Executive Nicholas Pirro denounced the Bernardi sitting a few feet away, Syracuse residents are — not lawsuits.

"It is kind of difficult to have negotiations when your being sued," said Republican Martha Mr. (N-Republican Party), who is also a lawyer, "if this gets stuck in the courts, it's going to be a nightmare." Democratic Councillor Joseph O'Hara called the lawsuit "bad manners," and compared the city to a child who wants to take his ball home if he does not get his way. "We are elected to do a job. As elected officials we should be able to work things out," he said.

Democrats werefar from unified in their position. Bernardi responded to the county executive's criticism that the city was trying to shift blame to the county for its financial problems. "I am representing the people of the city," he said, adding that city officials are willing to negotiate the issue with the county. "Some members of the Syracuse Common Council and the legislature, however, said they have doubts as to how well the city and county could work together if lawsuits are being thrown around.

"Some members of the Syracuse Common Council and the legislature, however, said they have doubts as to how well the city and county could work together if lawsuits are being thrown around.

In the lawsuit filed Wednesday, the city, which is running with a $12 to $15 million budget deficit, disputes nearly $15 million in county tax charges that came as a result of the double-charging. The city's lawsuit was filed just days after Pirro himself threatened to sue the city over the county's request for permission to build a sewage pipeline on Midland Avenue.

Although both city and county officials agree the city is unfairly taxed, some county legislators say the only solution would result in higher city taxes. That solution would be to allow the city to control those services for which the city is charged twice.

A resolution was also introduced by Ed Ryan, a Democratic county legislator, that criticized Oglesby's and Sanford's resolutions as politically motivated. Ryan's plan calls for involvement from outside the county government to include opinions that would not normally be considered in county government. A resolution that passed, Sanford's resolution, gives the majority party — the Republicans — more power in appointing committee members.

Oglesby said he believes that because most Republicans represent suburban districts, they will be hesitant to give up any revenue to the city. Sanford, however, said that regardless of who makes up the committee, the county will consider all opinions before making any decisions.
Greiner presses SUNY ESF for more activity fee support

Staff Reports

Syracuse University and the State University of New York at Environmental Science and Forestry both pay a Student Activity Fee to fund events run by student organizations on the SU campus.

The Student Fee is $100 and because of a bill that passed in the Student Government Association Assembly Monday night, the fee will increase each year in parallel to tuition increases starting in the 2001-2002 academic year, SGA Comptroller Chris Greiner said.

SUNY ESF students, however, currently pay a $23 Student Fee. But they have no authority to raise the SUNY ESF fee because it is approved by the New York State Assembly.

“ESF has a higher authority to answer to than SU,” said Greiner, a junior finance major. “SU can change their Student Activity Fee without responding to the state.”

As a result, while SU students are paying an increasing amount of money each year for the Student Fee, SUNY ESF students will continue to pay $23.

“I can’t say that I think it’s fair,” Greiner said. “But it is because that the two schools are different. One is public and one is private.”

SGA Assistant Parliamentary Faith Tartaglia said she will write legislation in an attempt to assuage the concerns of SUNY ESF students.

Right now, they are receiving benefits that they are not paying for,” said Tartaglia, a junior chemical engineering major. “I’m looking at a way that the fee is paid by anyone on either campus. The difference is SU has to pay the SUNY ESF, whereas SUNY ESF students are currently paying no SUNY ESF representatives in the Assembly. As a result, no SUNY representative was available for comment.

David Perrino, a freshman broadcast journalism major, said that the issue is unclear.

“I think they should pay their fair share,” Perrino said. “If they receive the exact amount of programming we do, they should pay the exact same Student Activity Fee.”

Jason Panus, a freshman landscape architecture major in SUNY ESF, said that the increased fees and the need for more organization fees should reflect that fact. He also cited a general lack of interest among his fellow students for SU events as a reason for a lower fee.

“Not every ESF kids don’t go to SU events anyway,” he said. “I don’t.”

LET'S MAKE A DEAL

For college students, buying a car is a big deal.

BY TOM HOWES
Staff Writer

After being stranded one too many times on the side of the road by an aging engine, junior painting major Mike Sedelmeyer realized he needed a new vehicle. Like most college students, his options were limited by monetary concerns, but his patience had been worn thin by his mid-1980s sedan.

Sedelmeyer is not alone in his automobile woes. For college students, the process of purchasing a car from a dealership is often stressful, said Dave Harr, a sales and leasing representative from Village Chevrolet in Fayetteville.

"Usually in high school, students get a hand-me-down from someone they know, like a friend or a relative," Harr said. "He estimates that 10 to 15 percent of his customers are college students between the ages of 18 and 24.

College is a time when students are usually buying their first "nice" car, either new or only a few years old, Harr said. There are many differences between buying a new or slightly-used car from a dealer and buying a used car, and Harr insists that each individual scenario demands a different vehicle.

"College students are usually looking for something economical, something easy to maintain, but also something that looks good." Harr said.

Many college students opt for the Geo Prizm or the Chevrolet Cavalier, two vehicles on the lower end of the price range, though each student's situation is different, Harr added. Students that come into the dealership with money to burn or a gift from their parents, while others are looking for something extremely cheap.

Numerous automobile manufacturers offer college graduates substantial rebates if they buy or lease a car around the time of their graduation. General Motors offers college graduates a $400 rebate on brand new cars. Their offer also includes lower finance rates, no down payment and a 90-day deferral on the first payment, according to a GM report. To qualify for this offer, the student must be graduating from a two-or four-year college or nursing school, and within two years after graduation and finance the vehicle through the dealership.

For many at Syracuse University, last weekend could possibly have been the most awful in recent memory. Was there a terrible blizzard that left ten feet of snow outside our windows? Was there a tragic incident that involved a number of SU students? Was there possibly a huge midterms test slated for Monday morning?

No, it was much, much worse! 44's Tavern, the "Syracuse Tradition" — cough, cough — was closed down for the weekend because some idiot forgot to pay taxes. Entire social calendars had to be rewritten for the regulars, who practically call "Four's," 113 Marshall St., home almost every day of the week.

With tears being shed by students left and right on "M" Street, I figured that I'd take this misfortune as an opportunity to help out those "Four's" groupies with their entertainment in the future, if this situation should reoccur. You never know, one day someone may wake up to the fact that most of the clientele of these places are nowhere near the age of 21. Like that will ever happen?

By the way, "Four's" is supposed to reopen today. Sure you could just change your preference and go to Harry's Bar and Grill, 700 S. Crouse Ave. — don't forget to bring your illegal substances and bad attitudes — or Lucy's Retired Surfers Bar, 721 S. Crouse Ave. What the fuck is a retired surfer, anyway? But that would be way too easy.

Here are a few tips on what else you could do to pass the weekend if "Four's" gets shut down again.

Hit up the mall and pick up replacements for your collection of black pants. You know, there's not much to do with black pants unless you're wearing them at a one of the "M" Street bars. ESF president steps down for charter school

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Asst. News Editor

Ross Whaley, president of the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry, did not know what conservation was until he went to college.

"I grew up inside the concrete and asphalt jungles of Detroit, Whaley's upbringing did not convey the kind of natural beauty that SUNY ESF students and faculty reverence," said Connie Garten, the college's president.

"My family had no interest in the outdoors whatsoever," said Whaley, seated in his Bray Hall office. Nowadays, the room is covered on several sides with panels of various wood indigenous to the United States, a far cry from the asphalt and concrete that surrounded Whaley in his youth.

This summer, after nearly 16 years in "the best job in the world," Whaley will leave the SUNY ESF presidency to chair a board that is founding Syracuse's first charter school. Charter schools are publicly-funded schools that typically focus on a specific academic area. Whaley's school, the Syracuse Math and Science Charter School, is set to open in the fall and will enroll about 500 kindergarten through sixth graders.

The college's staff and administration will keenly feel the loss of their president, said Connie Webb, vice president for administration at SUNY ESF.

Whaley possesses all the things one could hope for in a college president, she added.

When I first learned that he was leaving, I went through my own sort of personal grieving process, as I think a lot of people at ESF did when they heard," she said. "After I got over being sad, I realized he has other things in his career he wants to accomplish.

Whaley has left his mark on both the institution and the people he has worked with at SUNY ESF, Webb said.

"He has a great ability to look at problems from all angles," Webb said. "He is open to all kinds of arguments and persuasions, and that's just a wonderful trait for anyone to have, but especially for someone in higher education."

Education pioneer

Whaley's career and interest in education began long before he ever set foot in Syracuse or on the SUNY ESF campus — Whaley was the first member of his family to attend college.

Whaley said he truthfully did not know what to expect when he enrolled in the University of Michigan in 1956. "I knew doctors went to college and ministers went, but who else went to college? I didn't know," he said. "It was all foreign to my experience."

His interest in environmental issues sprang only from bits of broken conversation he heard around campus, Whaley said. "Once he listened to those conversations about things like wildlife management, conservation and forestry, however, he was hooked.

I had no idea what those were all about, but they sounded intriguing to me and certainly different than the life I had in Detroit," he said. "If a student today told me this was how they made their career choices, I'd tell them that they better think it through a little more carefully."

After earning his bachelor's degree in 1959 and a doctoral degree in resource economics from the University of Michigan in 1968, Whaley entered the realm of higher education. Aside from the six years he spent working for the U.S. Forest Service, Whaley has been a teacher or administrator at a college or university ever since.

"Call it good luck or call it providence, it has just shaped the most marvelous career imaginable," he said. "You always have the sense that you're dealing with really important issues and managing our resources."

Working for SUNY ESF allows people to deal with two of the most important issues facing the human race, Whaley said. "The education of young people and the management of natural resources are not just interesting, but critical to the world's survival, he added.

Tough choices

Whaley said that his decision to leave such a significant educational institution came as the result of a deep belief that public schools' performance between traditional public schools and charter schools is not improving. Stepping down from the presidency also allows Whaley to return to one of his longtime loves — teaching.

"The idea behind charter schools is flawed, Whaley said. "Charter schools take desperately needed funding from public schools, because they still operate on public funds, while providing an educational focus different from public schools, she added.

Whaley's school could take up to $4 million dollars from the Syracuse City Schools when it opens in the fall.

"I think it's a disgrace how these schools are funded," McKenna said. "Most charter schools are going in the wrong direction and are struggling with budgets. So what do we do? Give them less resources."

Whaley said he is hopeful that charter schools and public schools will not compete with one another, but rather feed off each other's respective strengths. This situation will create the best possible education for America's youth, he said.

"Maybe eventually the distinction between charter schools and traditional public education will disappear," he said. "If you have the healthy competition where, 10 years from now, you could not find a difference in the performance between traditional public schools and charter schools, but they were all higher than would be successful for me."

whether they want to buy or lease their vehicle. GM says the benefits of buying a vehicle include owning the vehicle for more than a few years, unlimited mileage — most lease agreements include stipulations and limitations regarding mileage — and the satisfaction of owning your own vehicle. Many students, however, cannot afford to purchase a brand-new vehicle and must opt for financing.

When financing a vehicle, students must be prepared for a lengthy investigation. A better finance rate can be offered by a dealer, but it all depends on the situation, said David Whitney, a branch manager for Daytime Savings Bank. He added that each vehicle has its own unique finance rate, and certain offers such as the GM graduate offer — may apply. Though car dealers and local banks do offer similar finance rates, the consumer must investigate the matter by examining the rates for the model they are looking to buy.

"A good idea," Whitney said, "is to get approved for an automobile loan at a local bank before talking with the dealer."

Sometimes dealerships offer special rebates in the form of a lower finance rate or a cash-back bonus. If a student has already been approved for a lower rate at the bank, he or she can get the cash instead, Whitney said.

Banks are required by law to offer the same interest rates to everyone, and are therefore not allowed to offer special rates to college students. This should be taken into consideration when the purchaser qualifies for a special rate from a dealer, Whitney said.

Another issue facing car buyers is how to choose an insurance provider. There are several options exist for insurance: buying from an agent or buying directly from a large company, such as Geico Direct. The matter is worth careful investigation, and it once again comes down to the individual situation, said Scott Campbell, a representative for Winslow Warren Insurance Agency.

Most of the time, the direct companies offer cheaper rates, but often the agents can beat them, Campbell said. The role of an agent is to defend and assist the buyer in the case of an accident, and to provide service for the customer.

"If you have a claim filed against you and you have direct insurance, you're on your own," Campbell added.

Different insurance companies distinguish their customers by their driving records and cater accordingly to different types of drivers. Better drivers generally pay less, Campbell said.

In the end, buying a car comes down to individual preference and a decent amount of research. Sedelmeyer, who recently purchased a smaller-sized pickup truck, said he knew what he wanted in a vehicle right away.

"I just needed a truck because I'm always hauling a lot of gear for soccer equipment," he said.

After deciding that financing the vehicle was opposed to leasing, was his best option.

"I just bought an airplane, and I plan to go to town on this thing," he said. "You can't return a leased
Thomas closes SU career with 1-2 record at EIWAs

Five Orange grapplers traveled to Annapolis, Md., for the EIWA Tournament. Only two recorded wins, but the experience was worth the trip for all five.

Junior Ike Wennihan, hobbled all year by knee injuries, battled his way to a victory. Sophomores Jerry Pacillo and John Soden didn’t earn a win but earned tough experience at a top level of competition. Freshman Brett Cowen capped off a strong season with two close losses.

“IT’s a great conference, and we don’t have the horses to compete,” head coach Scott Miller said. “But our guys did as well as they could. We were better at the end of the season. You can see steady improvement since our first match.”

The one horse many thought could compete was senior Shawn Thomas, but into the semi he rode with two losses after an opening-round victory.

The 174-pounder defeated a familiar opponent in the first round of the conference tournament. In 6:39, he pinned Franklin & Marshall’s Tom Briener, a wrestler Thomas has met numerous times in his four years at Syracuse.

Thomas went on to lose to two top-ranked opponents, both of whom will progress onto the National Championships in St. Louis. After his victory, Thomas lost to No. 4 Ed Nordyke of Harvard and Navy’s Mark Newman.

With his losses in Annapolis, the Orangemen finally waved goodbye to their lone senior. Thomas closed out his career at SU with a 58-45 record, including 27-13 in his senior campaign. This year alone, he recorded 23 pins, totaling 41 for his distinguished career.

“I’m disappointed,” Thomas said. “I would have liked to finish in the top four and get to the Nationals.”

“Right now, I’m pretty sure I’ll take some time off and get my weight back up. It was a good career. It could have been better. It’s good that I stuck it out, but you can’t help but think what could have been. That’s the way it goes.”

Likewise, Miller is not anxious to see the back of Thomas’ dyed-blonde head rolling out the door.

“The thing about Shawn is that he kept getting better,” Miller said. “Shawn could have transferred, but he stayed here to compete with the Orangemen. That speaks well about loyalty and character. Above all, I had the most fun coaching Shawn.”

Aside from Thomas, only Wennihan recorded a win, a 3-3 decision in his first-round consolation match against Princeton’s Anthony DeBartrallo. Pacillo, Soden and Cowen, though, all had chances to pull out a victory.

The four non-seniors struggled against the military academies. At 141 pounds, Pacillo learned the toughness of the military schools. He lost to No. 4 seed Mark Conley of Navy and Charles Russ of Army.

While the first match was close for a while, Conley eventually pulled away from his Syracuse opponent.

Pacillo faced much better against Russ. He tied the Cadet late in the final round, sending the match into sudden death overtime. In the extra session, Russ scored a take-down to secure a 10-8 victory, but Pacillo said the experience should help him in years to come.

“I was doing pretty well against (Russ), but these Army boys have a lot of wind,” Pacillo said. “They can really go a long time. But just watching the EIWAs and the finals with the crowd in is big. It’s just a little more motivation to try harder next year.”

Around midseason, Cowen emerged as one of SU’s top wrestlers but tailed off toward the end of the campaign. He had a chance at redemption in the final tournament of the year.

Cowen drew a tough bracket, facing No. 1 seed Dave Espolito of Lehigh in the first round.

Espolito overmatched the freshman, pinning him in 1:05. Cowen bounced back to battle Columbia’s Chris Felicetta in a 4-2 loss.

“As a freshman, Brett just struggled,” Thomas said. “There were no expectations for him, but he did well. It’s a tough tournament and the freshmen learn to turn it up. It’s a different mindset for Brett to learn.”

“I could definitely feel something different before the match on Saturday,” Gifford said. “We all were a little tense and worried. The last time we felt something like that was against William and Mary.”

The Orangewomen lost to nationally ranked William and Mary 8-1 on January 22. Gifford and Straudova-Bacova believe that the team will start playing better against top teams when they get used to playing under pressure.

In order to win the big matches, everyone will have to play well," Straudova-Bacova said. "That is why we are stressing the importance of playing well and keeping a high intensity level at practice."

The tree's five-year suspension (for Stanford students fixing the last four letters) was cut down to four years and he is back in the competition. Syracuse students are some of the worst fans in college sports, but this is something the athletic SU student body cannot live with. I wish he had never left the comfort of dorms, apartments or frat houses.

Syracuse had no problem defeating the Cincinnati Bearcats in round one. However, Otto will face a huge test in the quarterfinals — it will likely take on Wisconsin's intimidating Frank Boeheim. If Otto makes it to the finals, he'll most likely go against the winner of the pivotal showdown that could develop in the lower bracket between Stanford's Tree and Penn State's Nittany Lion. Defend your school pride and cast your vote! Otto takes the field in round one on March 8-11.

Now it's back to the action on the court.

Big East Tournament
March 9-11, New York City

Syracuse gets the No. 1 seed since Miami beat St. John's last Sunday. However, I think the Orange would have had an easier road if the Red Storm had given SU the No. 2. Ifseed. That way, Syracuse would have wound up playing Miami in the semi-finals. Instead, the Orange get a tougher draw in my opinion, potentially facing the Connecticut/Steven Hall winner in the semis. With Troy Murphy and streaky 3-point shooting, Notre Dame could win a few games. Rutgers also appears to be a potential problem, considering the Scarlet Knights can play with nothing-to-lose attitude.

Villanova might need to win a couple of more games to make the NCAA Tournament, but Pitt's team play could be a problem in the first round. Pitt has nothing to lose and Villanova's reason to win the Big East finals makes for a great ending to the regular season.

Pick: Syracuse

Big Ten Tournament
March 9-12, Chicago, Ill.

Ohio State and Michigan State are the Big Ten's favorites. The Spartans are ranked fifth, both teams have a legitimate shot at returning to the Final Four. Purdue and Indiana are a tough team when A.J. Otto should have made it to the tournament presented by ESPN.

The conference as a whole could win a championship, but a cold shooting night could win a few games. Auburn is not a cold shooting night could win the game. Every time we play the game.

Junior Michelle Nevekula, Syracuse's No. 3 singles player, was not able to compete because of a sickness that made her very weak, Gifford said. Without Nevekula, each Orangewomen player played a spot higher, matching Maryland's higher seeds with SU's lower seeds.

This setback eventually led to a 6-3 Terrapins victory. The loss was SU's second in a row.

The Orangewomen rebounded quickly from the defeat, shutting out the Maryland team 7-0.

For the ease with which they beat the Hoyas, the Orangewomen had equal trouble with the 52nd-ranked Terrapins. No. 2 singles win on the court came from the No. 1 doubles team of senior Shareen Lai and Anna Khvalina, who beat Jessica Johnson and Stacy Walkowitz 8-6.

As for the Orangewomen (8-4) also earned points by default in the No. 6 singles and No. 3 doubles positions.

Lai almost continued her unbeaten streak at the No. 1 singles spot, but she fell to Johnson in an exciting three-set match 7-6, 1-6, 7-6.

At the No. 2 spot, Khvalina lost to one of the top freshman in the nation, Delila Causseve, 6-3, 6-4.

Freshman Masha Kabanova shifted from her normal No. 4 position to fill in for Nevekula at No. 3, where she was defeated by Walkowitz 6-2, 6-1.

“With the regular season concluded, SU had the No. 1 seed, will face the winner of the first round match between No. 6 West Virginia and Georgetown.

The Orangewomen, after finishing 9-0 this season, lost four of their final nine games. Nevertheless, the season ranks as a great success, Bland said, and he expects the Orangewomen to make a good showing at Madison Square Garden.

“We set our goals at the beginning of the season, and we think we accomplished a lot,” Bland said. “We still want to get the (championship) ring and show we're No. 1 in the Big East, regardless of what anyone says.”

Syracuse's tennis head coach Mac Gifford said the efforts of his singles players would make or break the match with nationally-ranked Maryland on Saturday.

Unfortunately, the Orangewomen experienced a setback before the first rally of the match.

Junior Michelle Nevekula, Syracuse's No. 3 singles player, was not able to compete because of a sickness that made her very weak, Gifford said.

Without Nevekula, each Orangewomen player played a spot higher, matching Maryland's higher seeds with SU's lower seeds.

“We had high expectations going into this match, Gifford said. "It is always fun to play a better team, but the loss comes as a surprise to us.”

The following day, though, New York's surprisingly returned to the lineup and had a strong showing with a 6-0, 6-1 victory against the Hoyas' Malissa Mendes.

Lai might have started another winning streak, racking up a 6-0, 6-4 victory at No. 1 against Lakshmi Ravindra.

Khvalina beat Ravindra's sister, Sara, at No. 2 singles, 6-4, 6-4, while the rest of the Orangewomen took care of their opponents in straight sets. Katie Thompson, Syracuse's No. 6 singles player, defeated Atlee Boyle 6-3, 6-0.

Syracuse will rest until March 15, when it travels to Princeton to take on Southern Illinois and Central Florida, two teams Gifford believes can compete at about the same level as Syracuse.

Matches will be good tests for the Orangewomen, who need to get used to playing better teams so they will be able to compete with Notre Dame in the Big East Tournament, Gifford said.

Assistant coach Jana Stadnovevac said the team hopes to practice more and at a higher intensity level in order to be prepared for the better opposition.

In addition to their normal practice schedule, the Orangewomen now have weekly one-on-one sessions with Gifford or Stadnovevac.

"We want to be the giant killers," Gifford said. "We need to learn that practice has to do a lot with personal performance.

This weekend would have been a great time to be giant killers. To their disappointment, both of the nationally-ranked team looming, SU did not have its normal pre-match feeling.

Bush, Gore score wins

NEW YORK CITY — Presidential contenders Vice President Al Gore and Texas Gov. George W. Bush jumped ahead Tuesday in the race for their party’s nomination.

Gore, a Democrat, and Bush, a Republican, are each expected to capture primary victories in each of the 13 states hosting Democratic primaries.

Bush, in his own backyard, where he established himself as a Hall of Fame basketball player for the New York Knicks in the 1960s and 1970s, after recent primary wins in Michigan and Arizona, McCain’s momentum was stymied with Tuesday’s losses in delegate-rich California and Arizona.

One-third of delegates to the Republican convention, the amount of Democrats and Independents casting their vote for the Arizona senator in the presidential nomination races have been one of his most critical assets. This appeal across party boundaries is what prominent New York state Republican said they hope will propel Bush to the winner’s circle in November.

“I would like to congratulate Senator McCain for including more people in our party,” New York state Gov. George E. Pataki said to a crowd of Bush supporters.

Campus NAACP plans King remembrance

Beth BrauerMAN
Staff Writer

Only seven members of the Syracuse University chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People met Tuesday night because of a lack of notice.

Those attending the biweekly general body meeting in the Hall of Languages to discuss upcoming events, said Nahesh Lambert, a sophomore psychology major and the chapter’s executive secretary.

“The message was not sent out until about 3 o’clock in the afternoon”, said Shabir Glenn, NAACP external vice president and senior information science and technology and marketing major.

She added that the NAACP chapter has 35 to 40 members and the meetings usually bring a crowd of 20 to 25 people.

During Tuesday’s meeting, the group began organizing a vigil for the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. The vigil is scheduled for April 4 and will include speakers, Lambert said.

Other plans have not yet been determined, Glenn said.

Members also discussed the recent Amadou Diallo case.

Lambert said the group felt the verdict was unfair. The NAACP plans to send at least three members to probe members of a third house.

The current dean, Robert Jensen, retires July 1, ending a 36-year career at SU.

“I am delighted that Cathryn has taken on this assignment and I look forward to working with her in the months ahead,” Freund said in a written statement. “She was nominated for this position by many faculty and staff and she has their great support.”

Freund’s academic background includes a bachelor’s degree in geography from Duke University, a master’s degree in sociology from the University of North Carolina and a doctoral degree in earth sciences from the University of California at Santa Cruz.

She joined the SU faculty in 1983 and becomes the Interim Dean of Arts and Sciences.

Arizona votes via Web

California voters on Tuesday approved a controversial ballot measure in the state, leading to a constitutional challenge in the nation's first such ballot. Exit polls indicated that the measure, sponsored by Republican Proposition 22, declared assault charges among state and federal courts, allowing the state to proceed in a disciplinary hearing for public employees who violate the law.

The ballot measure, Proposition 22, declares that "only marriage is between a man and a woman." More than 500,000 people voted yes, by 500,000 in, and the party's Web site recorded about 200 votes per minute during the "supper hour." Bill Taylor of election.com said.

Whoever wins this election, some computer users may have experienced new types of online gambling sites, but there were no problems with hackers, said Taylor. The company hired to run the election site made changes to the Web page where they can vote. The company increased the identification number along with state and date of birth. Early voting continues through Friday for Saturday's state election.

On primary day, other votes are to be held in one of 134 polling places where they can use either a traditional ballot or computer. The Voting Integrity Project has hosted an online election, arguing that it would harm the voting rights of the poor and minorities who have less computer access than others. A judge refused to stop the election, but the group plans to challenge the result.

Clinton will visit Pakistan

WASHINGTON, D.C. — After President Clinton ended the national defense discussion Tuesday, the White House announced Florida yesterday that Clinton will stop in Pakistan for talks with the country's military leadership during a five-day visit to South Asia later this month that will also take him to India, Pakistan's archival.

The decision to add Pakistan to the itinerary was a long-planned debate within the administration and is bound to alter the flavor and substance of what promises to be one of the more unusual, and potentially more important, overseas trips of the Clinton presidency.

White House officials told reporters that Clinton will spend several hours in Islamabad on March 25, the final day of a trip that includes a stop in Bangladesh. By visiting the Pakistani capital, Clinton will place himself squarely in the center of a tense political standoff between Washington and Islamabad, two nuclear states that have already fought three major wars over the past half a century and still engage in frequent military clashes.

Tokyo trains crash, kills three

TOKYO — Two subway trains carrying more than 1,500 rush-hour commuters collided when one of the trains derailed Wednesday, killing three people and injuring more than 30 others. The impact sheared off the wall of one of the train's rear cars, leaving a hole in the roof. Red iron and other debris littered the scene.

The cause of the accident was not immediately known, said spokesman Ryoichi Kiohara of the Tokyo Rapid Transit Authority. An initial press report blamed the accident on an explosion, but officials — including the prime minister — quickly denied that. There were 240 passengers and 1,800 on the oncoming train that hit it, the fire department estimated. One of three passengers in critical condition in a hospital hours after the accident. A man and a woman were killed in the collision.

Syrian cabinet officials resign

DAMASCUS, Syria — President Hafez al-Assad, a senior official of his ruling Baath Party, has announced that he will resign Monday after the government resigned and leave the day in a protest against the United Nations Security Council.

The cabinet shake-up is expected to last eight years. Assaid packed Mohamed Mustafa Miro, the governor of the northern Aleppo province, to form a new Cabinet, according to a presidential announcement. Miro said that the outgoing government would continue working in the meantime.

The shake-up was seen as a move to avoid new blood in the aging Cabinet.

Her past scholarly achievements include publication in professional journals and several research grants from the National Science Foundation.

Newton served in an administrative capacity prior to Monday's appointment as Arts and Sciences' interim associate dean for programs, curriculum and instruction.

officers were later acquitted of all charges stemming from the incident.

The case caused a stir in the community as a whole, not just minority groups, Glenn said. The public wants to know how anyone can get away with this, she added.

Lambert said the members "also discussed their opinions about the upcoming presidential election, but added that they were not supporting any particular candidate. Glenn said they talked about their voter registration drive last week and the group's plans to "continue to encourage minority members to vote."

The NAACP also plans to send members to next month's Kid's Fest, an annual event at Manley Field House in which various campus organizations interact with children from the Syracuse community. Glenn said the group might perform skits for the children.

The group also spoke of диапе committees that they wanted to establish. They plan on organizing committees to focus specifically on political action, scholarship and community service, Lambert said.

Thursday night, the SU chapter of NAACP will send executive board members to a city chapter meeting. They plan to ask the city chapter for help in organizing the Martin Luther King memorial, Glenn said.

The city chapter has goals that do not directly affect college students, but they are always willing to help the university chapter, she added.

"They always have their arms out to us and we always have our arms out to them," she said. "The door is always open."
SPJ invites local media to discuss politics

BY SAPNA KOLALLI
Lifestyle Editor

Political reporters need to be skeptical of everything they encounter, said Frederic Pierce of The Syracuse Newspapers.

Pierce, a city hall reporter, said skepticism is almost essential when covering politics.

"You become suspicious of everything," he said. "No matter how much you trust a source, there's a chance you're spinning the story, not telling you everything or outright lying."

Pierce warned, however, that reporters must also be sure their skepticism does not become cynical.

"It's important to question but you have to be open to ideas and not automatically assume everything is wrong," he said.

Pierce and other Syracuse-area journalists will participate in a panel discussion focusing on how local media cover primaries and elections.

The Syracuse University chapter of the Society of Professional Journalists sponsors the discussion, scheduled for 7 p.m. today in the A1 auditorium of the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications.

Other panelists are Greg Munno of The Syracuse Newspapers, Bill Carey of Channel 9, Paula Garrel of Channel 3, Chris Bolt of WAFR-FM 88.3, and Paula Garrell of The Syracuse Newspapers.

"This is the perfect opportunity to discuss politics, the day after one of the biggest political days," said Jessica Cauffman, a junior newspaper major and SPJ vice president. "The reporters just covered this so it will all be fresh in their minds. And, hopefully, the students were paying some attention to the coverage. We should be able to get a good discussion going."

Cauffman said she hopes panelists will address how they have covered elections in the past and the ethical issues surrounding campaign and election coverage.

"Sometimes I want to know how different candidates get different coverage," Cauffman said. "I mean, should Alan Keyes get more coverage than Al Gore, or is he just not going to win?"

The type of coverage a candidate receives in a particular geographic area often depends on the media outlets that are available, said Bolt, WAFR's news and public affairs director.

"I think public radio stations, like we are, have a little different approach and put politics and elections in a different light," he said. "We put more emphasis on education a lot of times and do things that commercial radio stations might think is boring."

Bolt added that public radio repeating it also different than television reporting, and he wants to make sure that students understand the differences.

"I'd like our point of view to be represented, although not everyone may think it's right or wrong," he said. "Students are not aware many times of how different it is, and maybe this will be a career option for them."

"Students are interested in broadcast journalism major and SPJ is interested in life, but not sure people are not interested in entering politics or journalism as a career, this seminar will be helpful and informative."

"Something like this can help you no matter what your major," she said. "Everyone will be getting a point in their life."

With McClure on the panel — he must give views of media and politics as an outsider to the journalism field — Cauffman said she hopes students of all fields and academic backgrounds will attend, especially political science students.

"I really hope some Maxwell people come," she said. "It will hopefully give the journalists a regard to the perspective on things."

Irwin said learning about politics, elections and media coverage will help people make informed political decisions in the future.

"It's a difficult thing to understand because there are so many aspects," she said. "People criticize the media all the time, for emphasizing the horror race aspect or a candidate's sex. The thing is that people are not interested in entering politics or journalism as a career, this seminar will be helpful and informative."

"Something like this can help you no matter what your major," she said. "Everyone will be getting a point in their life."

"Students don't really have good ways to learn about this," he said. "Sometimes a candidate will come to campus but, really, the 18 to 24 age group is a little bit out of things. They have other priorities."

Once students begin learning about politics, they may become more active, concerned and interested, Bolt added.

"Once the college-aged block is a big block," he said. "Something like this won't immediately change things but it's a start."

OGL should reach a decision this week, she added.

Representatives from OGL could not be reached for comment.

The national office is helping OGL arrive at a university decision, said Melanie Doyle from the A O Pi national office.

"We are cooperating with SU and working on their investigation," Doyle said.

Goldenberg said she is optimistic that OGL will reach the appropriate decision.

"I have a feeling that they will arrive at their own appropriate action," she said.

Goldenberg, however, said she has mixed feelings about the decision.

"They were my pledge sisters," she said. "I love them to death," she said. "But it's for the better of the sorority."

ZBT

Any Zeta Beta Tau social party is canceled for this week, Young said.

"ZBT can't have any social events such as parties at the house this school year," said Young, a junior in the College of Arts Sciences. "I believe things have been wrapped up."

The fraternity was investigated because of a report of an unauthorized social event on March 1 at the chapter house. ZBT reportedly served alcohol at the party, which was not intended by minors.

"All fraternity parties must be first approved by the IFC," Young said. "He is unaware of any charges, but there could very well be two different decisions."

There is little opportunity for students to understand ZBT's decision, Young added.

"The rules are established by the frats themselves," he said. "These are all rules that are not written down, so how can we argue about it when we're not informed?"

TriDelt

The fraternity's new developments occurred this week in the TriDelt case, he added.

The investigation involves a Feb. 23 request by a student to conduct individual interviews, he added.

"Hopefully, things will be wrapped up by Spring Break," he added.

"The sorority is acting on its own accord regardless of the incident," said Jenay Lipstein, TriDelt president.

"This is an internal matter," Lipstein said. "Things are being dealt with in the best way according to our policies and procedures."

Goldenberg said.

On Feb. 27, six new pledges of A O Pi were found intoxicated at Frint Residence Hall. Two of the pledges were brought to Crouse Hospital, the other four returned to the night under observation.

The four sisters have been suspended for at least six years," said Goldenberg, a sophomore public relations and finance major.

The national office is suspending the chapter until the incident is dealt with within the appropriate time, Goldenberg said. "Their national office made the call down," Goldenberg said. "Greek Life is still doing its own investigation."

New political spirit falls to status quo

The results of Super Tuesday's presidential primaries caused irreparable damage to the nation's political process. U.S. voters asked for change. Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley offered them the chance to seize it. But Americans failed at the polls. They failed to deliver themselves the new politics they craved.

They caved to big names, big money and empty promises, rejecting the chance to elect a president who wears the real face of the nation. And they will undoubtedly pay for it throughout the next four years.

Mc Cain and Bradley — both considered dark horse candidates just months ago — have run class-act campaigns and ushered a fiery, dynamic spirit down the campaign trail. Casual political observers and disenfranchised voters suddenly sprung to action, hoisting signs and toting petitions in support of these insurgent candidates.

George W. Bush and Vice President Al Gore, however, rally for the status quo and trail behind these maverick competitors in some state polls. They epitomize the anarcho-aristocratic, family-name politics that Americans love to hate.

But when the establishment-backed, business-as-usual candidates score big wins at the ballot box, the nation still scratches its head. Eight months before the general election, the die has already been cast in the shadow of competitors in some state polls. They have run class-act campaigns and ushered a new president of the millennium. But it however, when they cling to the past and jet to the nomination race.

Bradley and McCain will concede to their ballot box, the nation still scratches its head. That Americans love to hate.

Risks accompany Spring Break fun in the sun

Hey, campers! In anticipation of the consequence-free Spring Break hedonism, we’ll be playing a spring break adventure game. For those of you who don’t know how to play, it’s very easy.

Read the first section and make a choice, which will lead you to another section. Keep going until you win or until you reach one of the horrible alternate endings. But remember, the real Spring Break isn’t all fun in the sun. There’s tough choices to be made. Make sure you choose the right ones.

#1 — You’re planning your Spring Break trip and you have the option of spending your money on a ticket from a known airline, or saving your cash for alcohol and going with a sketchy airline you found on the Internet. If you choose to take your chances with the unknown airline, go to #11. If you’d rather dish out the cash and fly Delta, go to #6.

#2 — You get back to your hotel room and although you’re wasted, you succeed in doing whatever it is that college kids do when they go home together from a bar. If you get up the next morning and start your day, go to #10. If you’re up early and out on the beach looking for your next conquest, go to #12.

#3 — You get to the hotel and go directly to the bar. After quite a few drinks, you need to decide where to go for the evening. If you choose to go to one of the bars that’s running a Spring Break special, go to #7. If you prefer to take some local advice and try a place a bit more adventurous, go to #8.

#4 — You walk to the beach and things start to get physical. Unfortunately, neither of you has brought anything to put it off until the next night, go to #6. If you’ve just got to have it, no what so ever, go to #14.

#5 — Big mistake. You wake up the next morning naked and chained to a palm tree with strange symbols tattooed all over your body. Later tests will reveal that you’ve contracted a serious STI. Congratulations! Your flight arrives safely in (insert tropical location here). When you step off the plane, a man approaches you and says he was sent by the hotel to help you with your bags so you can explore the island. Do you trust him? If you give him your bags, go to #12. If you’d rather hang on to them, go to #3.

#7 — With your vision beginning to get hazy, you walk into the bar and immediately start to party. After a few more drinks, someone approaches you and offers you a drink. If you take it, go to #6. If not, go to #13.

#8 — Your wake up on the beach the next morning alone. Looks as if this is going to be the pattern for your Spring Break. Oh well, better luck next year.

THE END. Lesson: Always make sure your hotel switch on the adult movie channel plays the tape again. The BEST choice. Your outdated Soviet military prop plane explodes within seconds of takeoff, sending you to a fiery death.

THE END. Lesson: Never buy anything over the Internet.

#9 — After giving the man your bags, you walk down to the beach to check out the action. You’re approached by yet another local who opens his coat and displays a stunning array of hallucinogenic drugs. If you purchase some of his more powerful wares, go to #9. If you tell him you just like to buy a joint, go to #7. If you prefer to stay substance free this week, go to #3.

#10 — Bad choice. Your outdated Soviet military prop plane explodes within seconds of takeoff, sending you to a fiery death.

#11 — You wake up on the beach the next morning and are greeted by a man with strange symbols tattooed all over his body. He offers you a drink. If you take it, go to #5. If you don’t, go to #13.

#12 — Oops! You just got yourself in a relationship. Looks like there’s no more hope for a Spring Break orgy for you. THE END. Lesson: Spring Break hook-ups should be just that: hook-ups.

#13 — You chose poorly. Two weeks after break, you start to feel a burning sensation around your genitals, and you’re constantly itching. Welcome to the exciting world of STDs. THE END. Lesson: Always use protection.

#14 — You choose... poorly. Two weeks after break, you start to feel a burning sensation around your genitals, and you’re constantly itching. Welcome to the exciting world of STDs. THE END. Lesson: Always use protection.

#15 — Success! You got to the beach, got wasted and hooked up with no strings attached. If you can just make it through the rest of the week without any trouble, you will have officially kicked Spring Break’s ass!

THE END.

GOP coverage highlights party shortcomings

To the editor:

This is in response to the editorial stating that Al Gore was "neglected" by The Orange. Can I point out that Al Gore delivered a speech at a campaign rally in Vicksburg, Miss. (a suburb of Buffalo, and my hometown) live on CNN Saturday, (day one of the Convention). How can the editor be so oblivious to this fact?

The paper's lack of political coverage is obscene. Is this paper the reason for the increasing apathy on campus? Probably. For the editor of the most widely read newspaper on campus to not do this simple research (it was on national television), is an example of how horrible this pseudo-journalistic newspaper has become.

Secondly, The Daily Orange's coverage of the GOP is sickening. These aristocratic bureaucrats are so far right, it is painful to read of their travels.

They support anti-gay rights, anti-women rights and anti-personal liberties. These conservative bastards are so corrupt, they continue to allow children to be killed by guns. For the NRA to fill their wallets too heavy to get up and take action.

Keep Women's Choice alive.

Students plan week of sweatshop dialogue

BY STEFANIE KRATTER
Staff Writer

Syracuse University’s Student Coalition on Organized Labor met Tuesday night to plan for sweatshop awareness week. Members will use the week after Spring Break to inform students of sweatshops and their practices.

Tuesday’s meeting at the New York Public Library Research Group’s office on South Crouse Avenue was one of the largest turnouts in recent years, said J.J. Butts, SCOOL member.

The increased student support might be a result of labor activist Charles Kernaghan’s speech in Grant Auditorium last week on the anti-sweatshop movement, Butts added. About 350 students attended the event.

Sweatshop awareness week will begin March 20 and end March 24. SCOOL will run educational sessions across campus to educate students and explain how sweatshops are hurting workers nationwide, Butts said.

SCOOL will organize rallies during the week and set up model sweatshops to further educate students about the poor working conditions that workers across the country are enduring.

In previous years, SU had sweatshop workshops speak to students about some of these issues, including basic human rights violations, lack of union and power to negotiate contracts, said Butts, a graduate student.

“Students should be concerned about what’s going on here. Our community extends beyond university grounds,” he said.

Butts said currently SCOOL members are working to have the university recognize a campus sweatshop awareness group, run by the University’s Student Coalition on Organized Labor.

“Students have enormous potential to bring about change in sweatshops,” said Wissink, a senior in the College of Visual and Performing Arts.

Wissink and other members of SCOOL are urging students to consider the University to stop using the labor practices that have been found so far.

SCOOL wants the University to change the procedures of labor conditions that the students have found in sweatshops, Wissink said.

SCOOL supports WRC because it is more effective in monitoring the sweatshops, Wissink said. The WRC has a system that allows a worker to easily file grievances against their company without fear of being fired or harassed, she said.

“An employee should not have to worry about being blacklisted for filing a complaint about unsafe working conditions,” Wissink said.

The speech, Snyder said, may have been Bradley’s last opportunity to contend with McCain.

And although Bradley failed to win a single Super Tuesday contest, Snyder said the campaign’s Upstate staff did a “tremendous job” to prevent McCain’s New York state defeat of Bradley 65 to 34 percent. Some Bush supporters anxiously anticipated election results over pizza and beer.

Bradley campaign supporter and New York state Senator Mary Stevenson agreed. “Sometimes you have to go against what is popular in order to win,” she said.

Stevenson’s participation in the local campaign was based on her belief in Bradley’s message, not on his ability to win the nomination, she said.

“You can’t give up,” she said. “Sometimes you have to go against the pollsters.”

Stevenson said she always votes with her conscience, they vote for the candidate who they perceive to be winning,” Stevenson said.

“I heard so many people say they liked Bradley and his platform, but they won’t vote for him because he can’t win,” she said.

While anti-sweatshop campaigns are in the works at SU, Wissink wants to make it clear that such action is not a boycott.

“We are trying to use the pressure on corporations to reform labor practices and put an end to human rights violations at the sweatshops,” Wissink said.

Syracuse, Syracuse Mayor Roy A. Bernardi and New York state Senator John Swift co-chair the campaign here, all Bush delegates, hosted a well-attended party at Twin Trees Too restaurant and bar, 1029 Milton Ave., where more than 40 Bush supporters anxiously anticipated election results over pizza and beer.

Their anticipation paid off, with Bush defeating Arizona Sen. John McCain in New York state 51 to 43 percent.

Butts added that the Central New York Bradley Campaign Coordinator Steve Wachtel called one of the most successful Bradley support areas, the candidate garnered only BLANK delegates, losing contests in all 16 states and support and a high percentage of union endorsement, he said.

Bradley campaign supporter and New York City Councilwoman Mary Stevenson agreed. “It’s not a win, it’s not a loss,” she said. “People do not always vote based on their belief in Bradley’s message, not on his ability to win the nomination, she said.

“You can’t give up,” she said. “Sometimes you have to go against the pollsters.”

The crowd at the Today Show appearance of a Keyes placard in New York City, filming in New York City, was short on money and experience, said Legakis, who is a potential supporter for Bush. "I think he's going to do something, he's going out and do it," Legakis said. "This is the guy who is so close to people. I think he's going to win New York.

An advocate of improving minority rights, Bush received strong backing from many Hispanic political groups in New York City, said Olga Gomez, a member of Cubans for George W. Bush.

After meeting with Bush in Virginia last fall, the organization decided to support Bush because of his dedication to include all people. "We are a party of principle," Bush said. "We must also be a party of inclusion. We must welcome a new America. An America of choice," Gomez added that Bush's proposed reforms to education, welfare and taxes make him appealing to minority populations.

"This is what we minorities are looking for in the American dream," Gomez said. "This is America and this is why we come to this country. I believe from all the candidates, he is the one that looks to the United States of 2000. This is the new America." Other supporters at Tuesday night's primary party commented Bush's record in reform as governor and as a spirited campaigner. Standing on the brink of the new century, America needs a leader who can invigorate the people of the nation, as well as its economic and political standing, said Tom Basile, a member of Rockland County Republican Executive Committee. "He has a genuine passion," Basile said. "That is what we need in this country. There is a positive energy around this man that can bring this country into the 21st century."

Wednesday his organization would meet to "evaluate" his campaign.
"We will never give up this fight," he said.
With that, all the momentum McCain had built during this particular week in New Hampshire and Michigan had seeming-

Bradley
porters said they knew that they were fighting a losing battle, at least for Tuesday's primaries.
"I think he is going to drop out," said Rachel Koss, a freshman at Barnard College in New York City.
Campaign volunteer Ezra Friedlander, a resident of Brooklyn, said he is not sure of Bradley's chances in the race.
"I've known Senator Bradley for over 10 years," he said. "I know from the onset he couldn't win the nomination."
Cornell West, a Harvard professor and social activist, said he is remaining positive despite Tuesday's defeat.
"I think students ought to remain realistic," said West, who visited the Syracuse University campus last October. "Gore is the dishonorable campaigner."
Bradley is the best candidate for the job, especially for college students, because of his backing for education, Koss said. She added that she will be disappointed to see him end his campaign.
Sarah Slobodian, also a freshman at Barnard and a New Jersey native, said Bradley's own dedication makes him deserving of the dedication of his supporters for as long as he wants to stay in the race.
"He was my senator for the past billion years and I want to see him continue his work," Slobodian said.
Laura Schoeler, a former employee of Bradley during his Senate tenure, said she was upset because she was unable to vote in a booth because of a registration error. Instead, she was forced to use a paper ballot, which she said she suspects "are not counted anyway."
"An employee (of the voting precinct) was supposed to photocopy my signature so I can vote at the polls, but they didn't," she said.
Each year, voting registrants tell Schoeler to re-register to be able to vote in a booth rather than with a paper ballot, she said.
"Every year I do what they tell me to fix it and every year I have the same problem," she said.
Despite her difficulties at the polls, Schoeler still managed to cast her vote for Bradley. She conceded, however, that she will throw her support to Gore if her candidate fails out of the race.
"But not all Bradley supporters are so quick to abandon their candidate.
Marc Pelka, a freshman at New York University, said he will continue to support Bradley as long as he can.
"He is the first candidate I feel strongly about," he said. "He cares about social issues, such as gay rights," he added.
Pelka and his friend, Sara Motejl, both members of the NYU College Democrats, organized activities at their school in support of Bradley. Their efforts included voter drives in the campus dining halls.
Motejl agreed with Pelka's belief that Bradley deserves support until he says he is ready to leave the race.
"He is the most truthful candidate," she said. "It's sad, but I think he pushed Gore in the direction he should be going."

New York loss wounds McCain

BY ANISH SELVAM

NEW YORK CITY — The count of a presidential primary in New York state on Tuesday night was a battle between the governor and the senator. The result was a close race, with Senator John McCain winning by a narrow margin. The victory was significant for McCain, who had been trailing Senator Hillary Clinton in previous primaries.

In presidential primary elections, voters help select delegates to their party's national convention. Delegates then vote at the national convention to nominate their party's candidate for president.

In New York state, voters on Tuesday chose who would represent the Democratic and Republican parties in the state's primary. McCain won the Republican nomination with 43% of the vote, while Clinton received 34% of the vote. The Democratic nomination was too close to call, with no candidate winning a majority.

The New York primary is one of the most important in the presidential nominating process. The results will likely determine who will win the nomination for the Democratic and Republican parties. The winner will then be able to campaign in the general election, with the goal of winning the presidency.

The outcome of the New York primary is significant for both candidates. Clinton, who has been the front-runner for the Democratic nomination, now faces pressure to perform well in other states. McCain, who has been trailing Clinton in previous primaries, now has a chance to close the gap.

The New York primary is one of the most important in the presidential nominating process. The winner will likely secure the nomination for their party, and will then be able to campaign in the general election, with the goal of winning the presidency.

CNN estimated that Gore was 158 New York state delegates, compared to Bradley, who won an estimated 85.

The elected delegates will vote in August for the candidates they support, doing so at the Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles. It is at the party convention where the Democrats will officially nominate their candidate for president.

Jon Adams, a graduate student at Columbia Law School, said he first started becoming heavily involved in the Gore campaign when he and several other Columbia students boarded a bus to New Hampshire in February. There, they passed out fliers and campaigned door-to-door just before the state’s primary.

“We hunged on doors in the cold and tried to get the votes out,” Adams said. “New Hampshire was a place that was really close. I think we identified a lot of undecided voters.”

Adams’ friend, Columbia graduate Melinda Gesell, agreed.

“It’s important to be visible, even if you do put in a negative reaction,” Gesell said, a cup of celebratory beer in hand. “Food and beer in ice-filled metal drums were abound at the party.”

They know that the candidate generated enough support from you that you went out hammering on doors.”

New Hampshire residents were generally “very nice,” Adams said.

In contrast, Adams said he encountered some “very negative” pedestrians while fliering in New York state.

“One guy took a pamphlet and put it in right in the trash can,” he said. “So, I walked over, took it out, brushed it off and handed it to the next person.”

Despite some negative reactions, both said Gore is the person for the job. Bradley’s crushing defeat may soon cause their favorite candidate to be the only Democratic candidate for that job, they added.

A Bradley withdrawal may come soon, Gesell said, something Adams said would be the best thing for Bradley to do.

“I think he cares enough about the general election to not engage in a suicide campaign,” Gesell added.

Group support

The Republican South Carolina primaries of several weeks ago actually strengthened Gore’s chance for an overall win in November’s general election,

Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who attended the New York state party convention where the Democrats will officially nominate their candidate for president, said he expected a Bush victory.

“People get scared,” Ron said. “You don’t invite people’s personal space here.”

A lot of the campaigning done in the city was accomplished by using telephones.

“I agree with the issues he’s proposed,” Ron said. “I think Gtore has more experience, and if I can help a Democrat in Michigan, I’ll do it.”

AIDS alert

The global AIDS epidemic has suddenly become a front-burner issue in Washington, D.C., with at least 11 bills and a multi-million dollar proposal pending on Capitol Hill, President Clinton raised the AIDS issue in his State of the Union address last week, stating that the solution to raking HIV, tuberculosis and malaria rates "must include the development and the delivery of effective vaccines." The proposed $1 billion tax credit would go to drug companies that develop vaccines for these diseases, and $50 million would be used by the private, Geneva-based Global Alliance for Vaccines and Immunization to purchase those products and distribute them in needy countries.

Overwhelmed women

By a wide margin, freshman stress is a women's problem. Thirteen percent of the freshmen women surveyed reported feeling stressed. Among male freshmen, 20 percent reported feeling frequently overwhelmed, up from 12 percent in 1985 according to a report released last week by the American Council on Education and UCLA's Higher Education Research Institute. Linda J. Sax, the UCLA education professor who directs the American Freshmen Survey, says the gender differences result from the fact that women spend more time on more stressful activities, while men use leisure time playing games.

"Net tax"

The savings typically found with e-commerce may be no more. Given the rapidly growing number of Internet purchase and shoppers and the increasing headaches from taxes and losses, the nation's governors, mayors and county executives are debating in their annual sessions of Washington conventions whether an internet tax is justified, George Patall of New York wants to first imposing any taxes that might stifle the evolution of electronic commerce and Internet transactions.

Students encourage non-vegetarians to participate in the Great American Meatout.

BY CAROLINE CHEN
Staff Writer

A peachy-pink piglet, already sprouting the beginnings of eyebrows and eyelashes, lay on the hard table.

The biology student picked up her scalpel.

"This is how Michele Cronin, a senior magazine and English and textual studies major, remembers dissecting a fetal pig the spring of her freshman year in General Biology 2."

"I had little teeth, and I had to break his jaw," Cronin said. "It was terrible. I thought it was the worst thing I'd ever done."

For several months, Cronin stopped eating meat. She subsisted on bagels, cereal and honey dew melon.

On March 20, animal rights activists will encourage people like Cronin to become vegetarians as part of the 18th annual Great American Meatout.

The Meatout began in 1985 when a group of animal rights activists became outraged by a U.S. Senate resolution supporting National Meat Week, said Laurel O'Brian of the Farm Animal Reform Movement, was one of the activists behind this year's event.

Dr. Alex Hassan, founder of the Farm Animal Reform Movement, was one of the activists behind this year's event.

New exhibit disposes 'arty' images

Jane Rushmore

I'll admit it, I was scared. Those "arty" types can be so mean and bitter.

After looking at Leigh Adamson's work in her exhibit at the Zoid Gallery in the Comstock Art Building, I approached him and asked someone to point me toward the artist. I followed his gaze and spotted her — yellow and pink hair, a body piercing, holes in her clothes and army boots.

"Great," I thought. "This is reassuring."

But my fears quickly dissolved.

"A lot of people get turned off from art as a whole because it's stereotyped as elitist," Adamson said a few minutes after we started talking. "I think everyone is artistic in their own way, but they're taught not to be."

A junior sculpture major, Adamson is a down-to-earth artist with a unique perspective. Funky stuffed animals with crazy stitching or hanging in empty frames — fill the space of Zoid Gallery.

The gallery was opened two years ago, said Lawson Smith, a professor in the College of Visual and Performing Arts. It holds about 10 exhibits a year.

"It's called 'Zoid' because the shape of the walls is so strange," Smith said. "It's a trapezoid."

Adamson's work gives plush toys a little twist. Think: Beetlejuice as a friendly stuffed animal. Now you're getting the idea.

Smith said Adamson has "a fondness for making critics with unique personalities."

There's a lot more than just that—who initiated the first MEATOUT on the Farm, R.A.R.O., a non-profit animal rights organization, now coordinate Meatout, Blanchard said.

National Meat Week was abolished 13 years ago, but its opponents continue to advocate veganism. Last year, more than 2,000 groups in the United States and Canada organized events promoting this diet, event organizers said.

Meatout organizers will hold a congressional reception March 20 in Washington, D.C. Last year’s event attracted about 300 members of Congress and their staffs, she added.

The Meatout relies on grassroots support from environmental activists, animal rights activists, health professionals and college students. A group of Syracuse University students founded the Student Anti-Anthropocentric Reasoning Organization this year to address and educate others about animal rights issues. S.A.R.O. hosts tables in the Schine Student Center about every two weeks as part of its on-going campaign to raise awareness about the issue among the student body.

Responses from students in regard to animal rights issues ranged from curiosity to rudeness to empathy, said Sam Bratton, a freshman film major and co-president of S.A.R.O. But, he added, like nature of college student, is one characterized by apathy.

“I just don’t want to be bothered with issues that they don’t have to be concerned with,” Bratton said.

Sarah Watson, a freshmen film major and S.A.R.O. member, has distributed literature advocating animal rights at the college during several times this year.

“I try to get other people to understand, but sometimes I believe on other people,” she said.

Veganism—a lifestyle rejecting the use of any animal products—takes a great deal of self-discipline and self-control at first, said Elizabeth Cline, a junior policy studies major and treasurer of S.A.R.O. Cline, who has a teatmeal plan, said she shops at Whole Foods at 6867 E. Genesee St. and works with SU dining halls to make sure there are cruelty options for both vegetarians and vegans.

“They’ve actually gotten a lot of good vegan stuff now,” Cline said.

A meat-free diet is healthy, minimizes harm to animals and slows down destruction of the environment, argued Cline.

Animals are threatened by rainforest clearing, overfishing, and other destruction of their living environment. None of the animals we eat are ‘free-range’ to erectful dysfunction because eating meat is linked to clogged arteries, resulting in strokes and heart attacks. Cline said, citing an article by New York University professor David Katz in the Physicians Committee for Responsible Medicine.

The American Diabetic Association and the American Heart Association recommend plant-based diets, Blanchard said.

A plant-based diet consists mostly of vegetables and grains and a limited amount of meat. Veganism can be a healthy lifestyle, said nutrition professor Tanya Honicek.

Other animal products are the only complete sources of protein—they have all the necessary amino acids in the right proportions—a combination of vegetables and grains can serve as an alternative. Vegetarians, however, have to be careful when planning their meals to make sure they get all the essential amino acids, vitamins B12 and D and minerals their bodies need, Honicek added.

Vegans, she said, are at a greater risk for a B12 deficiency because the vitamin is naturally found only in animal products, milk, meat and eggs.

Vegans live 10 years longer than non-vegetarians, and are at low risk for Alzheimer’s disease and diabetes, Cline said.

Baking with eggs, vegans run the risk of irreversible nerve damage and actually paradoxically if they eat foods fortified with vitamin B12, Horacek said.

Making the switch

We’ve all been hooked eating meat during our sophomore and junior years at SU, lettuce to a vegan when she entered college.

Animals are mistreated because of the billions of dollars by annual commodity sales, Watson said.

In the beef and dairy industry, a consequence of the animals live under inhumane conditions, some animals are castrated or dehorned every year. Their life span is cut to one-fifth or one-tenth of the normal life span.

Animals raised for slaughter are pumped with hormones and antibiotics with reckless disregard for their health, Cline said. Cows are genetically manipulated to have oversized udders, which causes blood and pus to mix with the milk, she said.

These hormones can be traced through the food chain and human consumption, Cline said.

Animal feed producers are prohibited by law to label milk as containing bovine growth hormone, she said.

“Cow’s milk and dairy is a huge industry,” Cline said. “They have a lot of money and a lot of lobbying power.”

The meat industry has made tremendous progress, green, Watson said, in 20 years it has seen more than a 3 billion increase in meat consumption, with every person having an equal share. If you eat meat, you don’t have to be a carnivore, said Watson.

Watson said that because of the increase in meat production, the only place to raise animals for food, he added.

Beefing up

Sarah Friedman, a former vegan, said one of the reasons she stopped eating meat during high school was her concern that animals were a waste of resources.

“I was starting to get into an environmental sub,” said Friedman, a senior and a communication major at the State University of New York College of Environmental Sciences and Forestry.

Friedman began eating meat again in college, however, mainly because the dining hall food was sometimes unappealing or sometimes dried out and tasteless.

Her reintroduction to meat was a happy one. Friedman said. “Wow, what was I missing all these years.”

Killing animals is part of the natural cycle, said Friedman, a sophomore in the L.C. Smith College of Engineering and Computer Science.

“In it’s your blood to eat meat,” Leipzig said. “It’s natural instinct. That’s what we’re put there for, really.”

Canines and incisors in the human dental structure are evidence that humans were designed to eat meat, said Douglas Armstrong, chairman of the anthropology department.

“All you have to do is take your tongue and feel your teeth,” Armstrong said. “We have a very elegant and diverse mouth.”

Brian Small, a sophomore marketing major, said eating meat makes him happy.

“I like meat on a stick,” he said. “There’s something primal about it.”

Small said he had a close friend who was a vegetarian and developed a face because she could not look it in the eye. “I’d feel bad,” he said. “then I’d go and have a burger.”

Creative outlet

Art has been a part of Adamson’s life from the beginning.

“I can remember carrying around my Big Bird sketchbook and I’d scribble in it, ” she said, “I thought it was the greatest thing in the world.”

Childhood themes have a strong influence on Adamson’s work. Her stuffed animal pieces are a mix of frighteningly exaggerated smiles, reminiscent of cartoon characters, and cheesy game show hosts, with funky color and fabric combinations.

For those of you who complain that there is nothing to do on campus and nothing to see, stop by this exhibit. Building isn’t that far away. Just stop in the next time you drop your car off at Manley or work out at the gym. Leigh Adamson will be happy to show some cool stuff over in Zuid Gallery. From me, there’s really no reason to be scared of those “arty” people.
Women sweep weekend doubleheader

BY JASON REMILLARD
Staff Writer

Three weeks ago, the Syracuse softball team wrote the first entries into its record book — first game, tournament and win.

Last Sunday at West Point, the Orangewomen were able to add "first doubleheader sweep" to the first-year program's list of accomplishments.

The Orangewomen took different routes to victory in each game against Army.

They shut out the Cadets 2-0 in the first game, but had to score three runs in the final inning of game two to take a 6-3 decision.

Syracuse (4-3) slapped seven hits in the first game, including two apiece from freshman infielders Jackie Herman and Leah Hansen. Freshman shortstop Lindsay Richards drove home both SO runs.

"I think a lot of times when we get down, we stay down," Richards said. "Getting a couple RBIs makes my confidence a lot higher."

Junior Missy Bieman continued to lead the Orange on the mound, striking out four and giving up only two hits. She earned her second shutout of the season to improve her record to 2-2 and lower her ERA to 1.05.

In the second game, the Cadets (2-0) scored two runs in the second inning and one in the third before the Orangewomen chipped away at the lead.

SU scored one run in the third, fourth, and fifth innings before exploding for three in the top of the seventh to take the win.

\[SU 6, \text{Army 3} \]

"I think they did a good job," head coach Mary Jo Firnbach said of her pitching tandem.

"Some of their pitches weren't working. There are some things we're working on to get them a little more consistent and getting ahead of batters a little more."

SU broke out of an offensive funk with its 14-hit output in the two games after getting only 16 in its five previous contests.

"It's starting to come around a little bit," Firnbach said. "We hit the ball hard, right at people. We're starting to take advantage of some of those pitchers who might make mistakes and not have as much control."

Syracuse faced some local competition Monday night, hosting Cazenovia College in an informal scrimmage.

No scores were kept, but Firnbach said her squad showed improvement from their last encounter with Cazenovia in a tournament in Liverpool last fall, which the Wildcats won.

"I think we stayed focused, which is good," Firnbach said. "We didn't play down to their level. I think we showed some adjustments from the fall season and the winter conditioning phase."

The Orangewomen hope to take the momentum with them this week, and when they travel to Tuscaloosa, Ala., to face Alabama and Tuscaloosa County in a Crimson Tide Classic.

SU will tangle with Western Michigan and the best team on Friday, and take on Radford the following day. Firnbach said the Tide are a strong offensive team, though she knew little else about the other squad.

"Whatever team we're going up against, it's just a matter of which one of our teams shows up," she said. "If we're a confident team and we're consistent, and don't have a lot of errors, we can hang with anyone we go up against."

"Hopefully it doesn't make too big of a difference," Szyluk said. "I think that all the players who were starting from the beginning will guess they could use me, but they don't need me." Slyzuk was not burned out by their efforts in the first game of the season. "There is nothing we can really do about it," Hable said. "We just have to keep on winning and doing our thing on the court." Slyzuk was able to get back to her normal self and do what she does best, said, but she still has something to prove in order to win. "So the Orangewomen will again be without one of their leading scorers when No. 7 Georgetown comes to the Carrier Dome for a 3 p.m. game today.

While SU is struggling to put its loss to Virginia behind them, Georgetown (1-0) comes off a 1-7 victory over Vandy last week.

Junior All-American Sheehan Stanwick tallied four goals and two assists against Vandy. Sheehan, a junior midfielder, and American sophomore Erin Eibe and second-year Hoyas Kate Abrahamson and Erin Moloney were returning attackers that helped lead SU to a 15-5 win over the Cavaliers in the NCAA Tournament last season.

"I think that's probably where our strength lies," Georgetown head coach Kim Simons said about the attack. "We have a couple really talented attack players, and I think they can create some things off that off." Unlike the Hoyas, Syracuse didn't get to do too much of its attack against Virginia. A 1-0 loss to the Cavaliers was the first time in three years that Syracuse had been shut out in the game. "It sucked," Ewing said. "It didn't feel good after a loss like that. No one on this team ever wants to lose, but I think most of the intensity was having to deal with the feeling of that loss and never wanting to duplicate it."

The defense will be tested against Virginia, which is expected to be one of the top teams in the conference. "We have two players who I think can be very effective," Ewing said. "It didn't feel good after a loss like that. No one on this team ever wants to lose, but I think most of the intensity was having to deal with the feeling of that loss and never wanting to duplicate it."

SU ends year frustrated

BY GREG BISHOP
Staff Writer

Ripe with the potential of youth, the Syracuse women’s basketball team enters the league’s final weekend in second place.

On preseason media days, the team seemed poised, even downright giddy, and quickly jumped to a 7-3 start.

Citing a lack of effort, a lack of game preparation — especially in practice — a thin bench and an inability to finish off near-wins, the Orangewomen had slid like an avalanche.

In late December, the snow began to fall in Central New York and, like dirt, it gathered around the Orangewomen.

Nothing could stop the sprint toward the basement. With SU struggling down the stretch, the看着s mounted and frustration set in.

Syracuse managed a meager three wins after winter break with five times as many losses.

For assistant coach Polina Legette-Jack, Syracuse’s past all-time leading scorer and rebounder, the season was frustrating, especially since the effort needed wasn’t always present.

“At times, it’s tough for me to be here at Syracuse because I’ve always compared,” Legette-Jack said. “I’ll fall down to make it up. For me, being from Syracuse and knowing how much blood we shed and how many tears we cried, how hard we played on a day-in and day-out basis.

“To see kids that are wearing the same Syracuse uniform, and that don’t complete, and they don’t take as much pride in the University and the school color as I did. That is the most frustrating thing at times. I have to figure out how to let that go.”

In November, Syracuse sat at 4-6 heading into the Gazette Hawkeye Challenge at the University of Iowa. After a 81-55 victory against Chicago State, the Orangewomen met the host team in the NCAA's second-round NCAA Tournament.

The 76-73 loss, in which SU led often, showed a team wearing jerseys that couldn’t hamper the Orangewomen all season long.

Jenna Szyluk attended Syracuse women’s lacrosse practice Monday afternoon at the Carrier Dome.

But she sported a gray No. 42 sweatshirt and navy sweat pants instead of a practice jersey and shorts.

Her hands rested at her sides, instead of being tightly gripped on a lacrosse stick.

The senior midfielder continues to nurse a back injury, which has kept her off the field for about six weeks, including Syracuse’s 16-5 season-opening loss to No. 4 Virginia on Saturday.

She must watch her team from the sideline, with words of encouragement the only source of support she offers.

Standing idly while her team competes is not a role to which Szyluk is accustomed, but after Saturday’s trip to Virginia, the SU senior is adjusting.

As hard as it was to sit on the sidelines and watch, I was glad to be there with them and support them,” Szyluk said.

“I’m trying to refocus and make my situation more productive and try to help them from the sidelines a little bit more.”

What Szyluk contributes from the bench won’t match her impact on the field.

She finished the 1999 season with 38 goals and four assists for 42 points.

Police Reports:

Students arrested on larceny charges

BY EVANS BOSTON

The target of an embezzlement investigation, Syracuse University senior Bruce Sparano turned himself in to the Syracuse Police Department Wednesday morning, according to a police report. Sparano was arrested and charged with grand larceny of the third degree for allegedly embezzling $11,190.10 from the School of Architecture, the report said.

The Syracuse Police Department also arrested architecture senior Mark Rhoads Wednesday for fourth-degree grand larceny, the report added.

Police were investigating accounts of embezzlement reported by the School of Architecture Feb. 24. The school reported $12,738.65 missing from their work study budget. Sparano had participated in the school's work study program since 1996 and was embezzled $11,190.10 from the program by recording false numbers of working hours.

Rhoads, who worked in the program since last semester, allegedly took $1,548.75.

Bruce Abbey, dean of the School of Architecture, could not be reached for comment.

Syracuse media criticizes election coverage

BY KEVIN TAMPONE

There are fools in the national and local news media, said a panelist at a Society of Professional Journalists discussion Wednesday night.

Robert McClure, associate dean of the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, insisted that no matter where you look in the news business, it is easy to find someone who is botching political coverage.

McClure and several local journalists, members of a panel on local press coverage of national elections, discussed the issue in the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications and attracted about 110 people.

"It has nothing to do with the level they're at," McClure said. "It has to do with how hard they work or how lazy they are."

All the fools running around the news media are helping to distort our view of what the president's duties should be and the kinds of knowledge that presidential candidates should learn," McClure explained. The type of coverage candidates receive in newspapers and on television networks causes us to demand too much of them, he added.

When presidential candidates such as United Nations Ambassador Alan Keyes or Texas Gov. George W. Bush visit Syracuse, journalists often press the presidential hopefuls into answering questions that they do not need to know, McClure said. If the candidates do not produce a sufficient answer for the journalists, the media automatically brands them as evasive or unintelligent, he added.

"The big problem is that people running for the presidency of the United States should not be running around allowing people to ask these questions," he said. "You're turning the presidency into just another local boss. That ain't the job."

An example of this brand of journalism, is Keyes' answer to a question about the Amadou Diallo case that a reporter asked during a press conference when the ambassador visited Syracuse University on Feb. 26, said Bill Carey, a reporter at Channel 9 in Syracuse.

Diallo was a West African immigrant shot 19 times by police in New York City and later died. The trial of two Libyans suspected of bombing Pan Am Flight 103 is scheduled to begin May 3. The bombing killed 259 passengers and crew aboard the flight, including 35 SU students returning from a semester abroad in London, and 11 Scottish residents of Lockerbie, Scotland.

A Scottish court on Tuesday rejected the British Broadcasting Company's attempt to televise the trial.

Chester Phillips, father of one of the Syracuse University victims, said he was not surprised by the decision.

"I don't know of any logical reason why they would allow anyone other than the family members to view a broadcast of the courtroom," he said.

Because so many students for Syracuse are from New York City and other metropolitan areas, especially students of color, these issues really hit close to home," Grady-Wills said. "We're not talking about mere abstractions. This is a reality for several of the students who go to school here."

Diallo, a 22-year-old West African immigrant, was shot to death by four white officers outside of his Bronx home Feb. 4, 1999. The officers fired 41 shots at the Diallo, hitting him 19 times. They justified the shooting by claiming Diallo was reaching for a weapon, when he was really reaching for his wallet.

A national controversy about police brutality and race relations between the law enforcement and the public immediately ensued.

The officers went to trial in Albany. The jury, comprised of eight whites and four blacks, acquitted the officers on all 19 tiroes. They justified the crime as necessary to protect the officers' lives.

"It was a complete farce," said Reba Hodge, a journalist and Diallo supporter. "I think it was wrong for them to acquit. I think it's very symbolic of the way things are in this country."

The two detectives at the forum, Frank Fowler and Virgil Hutchinsen, co-founders of the Central New York Association of Minority Police Officers, fielded student questions regarding police brutality, the definition of race and sexual orientations.

"People within the community that we serve are going to be dealing with these issues," Fowler said. "So we need to be sensitive to that, at least for a period of time until people have had a chance to process this."

Hicks said she organized the meeting because she heard there was a need for such a discussion among South Campus residents.

"Students needed a forum in which to talk about it," she said. "People could have chelor reasons to be anywhere else. It's mid-term time, people are busy. To still have so many students come out and show that they were concerned about the case, that's a wonder to what they needed."

Hedge said she attended because there is a need for discussion.

"I didn't feel like the university had taken any kind of stand against it. They hadn't even discussed it. It was like they felt it was unimportant because it didn't happen here," she said. "People needed to become more involved in condemning the incident."

"I think everybody is feeling it and they all have their own opinions on it but the opinions are not being expressed in a way that shows that we care," she said. "I don't see anybody doing anything."
Faulty wiring sparks student car fire

Student Chris Leonardo said he was driving home early Wednesday morning when he noticed smoke coming from the hood of his car. Leonardo, a Syracuse University junior, pulled over near the intersection of Ackerman Avenue and Stratford Street to find "a big flame" underneath the hood, he said.

"I was like 'holy shit.' It was weird because I had only been driving for a few minutes," Leonardo said, describing flames of about three inches in height. He said he ran to his apartment on the 600 block of Ackerman Avenue and called 911. The Syracuse Fire Department arrived to extinguish the flames, according to a police report. Leonardo responded by stating he had smoke coming from the car's main battery. From the car's main battery, active wires disonnected from the car's main battery caused the fire, the report said. But the flames caused only "minimal damages" to the car, Leonardo said.

"It kind of sucked because I'm going to Florida. I had all this money set aside," he said, adding that "it could have been a lot worse."

cers in February 1999. A jury acquitted the officers of mur- dering Diallo on Feb. 25. A reporter asked Keyes whether or not he believed the verdict was fair, Carey said.

Keyes responded by stating he thought he had enough information to answer the question because he was not a member of the jury and did not have all the facts of the case, he said.

"He doesn't have to know everything," Carey said. "You shouldn't be afraid to just say, 'I don't know.' The problem is that we demand that they have a response for everything."

McClure said that by asking candidates about such specific incidents as the Diallo case and disregarding larger themes and issues, we ignore the founding principles of our nation.

"There is no way that the president's view has any bearing on the outcome of this case," McClure said. "We need to understand our Constitution. We need to understand the nature of our government."

Elizabeth Lo, a graduate student in Maxwell and Newhouse, disagreed and said that requiring political candidates to be prepared to answer local questions, instead of national, is fair, Carey said. "If you're going to be a politician, you should at least be able to send local journalists those questions, but journalism professors, said Fred Pierce, a reporter for the Syracuse Newspapers and adjunct journalism professor at Newhouse. "When you're a local reporter, that's part of your job," he said. "You're going to approach things differently from the national media from which to cover candidates, said Fred Pierce, a reporter for the Syracuse Newspapers and adjunct journalism professor at Newhouse. He had been a Democrat all his life and he had just changed parties, said Coleman, a sophomore broadcast journalism major. "We weren't even sure whether this was valid or not."

The journalists on the panel said it would be easier to deal with such situations is to maintain a healthy, but not cynical, sense of skepticism.

"You gotta be willing, if you want to tell the world the way the world is, to be willing to make those mistakes and then learn from it," he said. "Democracy is all about letting people hear the candidates have to say — unfiltered. Let the people sort it out themselves."
Students must decry Council's couch ban

As the thermometer shoots up and the sun peeks out from behind those gray, winter clouds, students emerge from their cold weather refuges to kick back outdoors. But don't get too comfortable. Authorities might come by and yank that ratty front-porch couch out from underneath you while you lounge in the sunshine.

The University Common Council passed a city-wide law last week prohibiting use of upholstered furniture on front porches or lawns. Pending Mayor Roy A. Bernardi's signature, police will now be allowed to patrol the university area and ticket anyone perched on their Lazy Boy.

The Council claims outdoor furniture devalues property and makes houses look more run-down. But it doesn't take a licensed assessor to realize that most of the university-area residences aren't hot real estate, anyway.

Year after year, students pay rock-bottom rents to turn dilapidated houses into their own cozy— albeit often filthy— homes. It's a fact that the charge, right down the street, is shabby, beer-stained couch on the rickety porch.

It won't be enough, however, for students to get riled up at city councilors for passing this ridiculous piece of legislation. The couch law, undoubtedly, resulted from pressure by university-area and ticket anyone perched on their front yards.

Here, we'd better make some noise.

Dr. Laura preaches dangerous conservative values

Every so often I turn on the radio. Yeah sure, it's an outdated medium. The music blows, and with the exception of a few NPR shows, the programming is even worse. But that's exactly why I turn it on.

Rush Limbaugh is a personal favorite of my pseudo-redneck, ignorant, right-wing relatives. I tuned him for hours on end. Sometimes I try to imagine what it would be like to be a "ditto-head," like Hitlery, the liberals,图纸, and indulging individualism. I'm just right of a John Ford Western.

Although an incredible specimen of the idocy available on radio, Rush doesn't hold a candle to Dr. Laura. Schlessinger hosts a syndicated radio show where immense losers from all over the country call in so they can tell him how to solve their problems.

But perhaps Dr. Laura's most famous attribute is her status on homosexuality. She has called gays and lesbians "deviants," and at one point suggested that homosexual activity is a "biological error that inhibits you from relating normally to the opposite sex."

When discussing the topic of "gay rights," she even went so far as to say "that's what I'm worried about with their children." Schlessinger's concept of "family values" makes Ward Cleaver look like Ike Turner.

victims' families are considered negatively affecting the case because they would bring that up in court if they are unable to travel to the Netherlands, Dios' aunt, a masters student in the College for Human Development, said. "They couldn't have a courtroom big enough," she said. Televising the trial would negatively affect the case because viewers may make assumptions without knowing all the facts, she added.

Judy O'Rourke, vice president of undergraduate studies and coordinator of Remembrance Scholars, said she did not know why BBC was even interested in televising the trial. "I am assuming the media would just want to cover it as closely as they can," she said.

The court's decision to allow family members private viewings counter to their right to see the trial if they are unable to travel to the Netherlands, O'Rourke said. "They couldn't have a courtroom big enough," she said.

"No one will be allowed to react loudly, or they will be removed," he said. Melissa Dios, a freshman business major, said she expected the court to ban BBC cameras. "We could not point to the time when Bradley's support began to dwindle." she said.

"I always thought we had to win New Hampshire," he said. "He just didn't respond quickly enough." Wachtel, however, said he thought the court's decision to allow family members private viewings counter to their right to see the trial if they are unable to travel to the Netherlands, Dios' aunt, a masters student in the College for Human Development, said. Latino students argue Elian Gonzalez case

BY CAROLINE CHEN

For the past several months, a 6-year-old boy stood in the center of an international custody battle between the United States and Cuba. Whether Elian Gonzalez should be returned to Cuba or be allowed to remain in the United States became the focus of a forum Wednesday night in the Schine Student Center to debate whether Elian Gonzalez should remain in the United States.

Students and faculty members gathered Wednesday night in the Schine Student Center to debate whether Elian Gonzalez should remain in the United States.

"In the political world, all objectivity is lost," Garcia said. "The kid is just a pawn."

Garcia said that children do not always know what is best for them. Even kids who are physically abused by their parents often say they want to return home, he added.

"Poor Elian is the biggest loser in this," he said.

"We're trying to save someone who doesn't really need to be saved," said Alberto Dominguez, a senior political science and international relations major. "We want you to start questioning who it is that calls the shots.

Gonzalez is being used as a banner by politicians, said Dominguez, the chapter advisor and public relations officer for La Unidad Latina Fraternity.

"You see this nice little 6-year-old kid and all you think is Cuba, Communist," Dominguez said. "We're trying to save someone who doesn't really need to be saved."

The international custody battle over Gonzalez became a war between socialism and capitalism, said Alejandro Garcia, a social work professor and one of 30 students and faculty members attending the event.

"In the political world, all objectivity is lost," Garcia said. "The kid is just a pawn."

Garcia said that children do not always know what is best for them. Even kids who are physically abused by their parents often say they want to return home, he added.

"The Cuban boy has been placed in a fishbowl," Garcia said. A cult has even developed around "Jesus Elian," he added.

You're making him something very special and holy and he doesn't know what's going on," Garcia said.

"It's beautiful when you can see a bunch of Latino students come together and learn from each other," he added.

The event is the first of two workshops hosted as part of the 50th annual Images Latinos cultural exhibition, which is funded by the Syracuse University Latin American Studies Department.

The purpose of the exhibition, which displays items of Latino culture, is to raise awareness of the Latino-American movement in history and Latin-American students at SU, Alberto Dominguez said.

Students are invited to view the exhibition between 8:30 a.m. and 10 p.m. Friday in the Schine Student Center, Room 227. La Unidad Latina Fraternity will also host a poetry reading at 7 p.m. in the same location.

Memory-enhancing drugs are not all they're cracked up to be.

BY ERIN CORCORAN Correspondent Writer

It's the night before your psychology midterm, and chapter upon chapter of textbook jargon beckons to be read. Not even Sigmund Freud himself could remember all this information.

Sound familiar? The solution used to be relatively simple: Sitting up all night with a cup of hot caffeine创下, however, college students are presented with another option: Popping a brain booster pill — a memory-enhancing drug designed to help even the most stressed student.

Brain boosters are organic pills designed to sharpen memory. Some advertisements even claim that there is no need for studying at all.

The pills are chemically-enhanced herbs that stimulate the memory and brain cognition. Memory boosters increase the flow of oxygen to the brain, which allows more information to be stored and remembered with greater clarity.

Ginkgo, for example, is a powerful antioxidant herb best known for its ability to enhance blood circulation. It has the ability to squeeze through even the narrowest of blood vessels, increasing the supply of oxygen to the heart, brain, and all other body parts.

This ability aids in mental functioning and helps to relieve muscle pain. It also lowers blood pressure, inhibits blood clotting and has anti-aging properties.

For Ma, a junior English and textual studies major, popped the pills on a whim a couple times last semester to study, he said, "I noticed a difference after taking it," he said, "I remembered what I had read earlier in the book. I was also able to answer questions correctly."

Brain boosters entered the American market in the early 1990s. Many of the popular names, such as Gaeng or Ginkoche, were intended for elderly people who could not remember were they placed their car keys.

The DeCoding of a country begins

The population of an entire country is whoring its medical records and letting go of their privacy for profit.

DeCode Genetics, a subsidiary of DeCode Genetics, Inc. of Delaware, has bought the medical histories of the people of Iceland for a cool $200 million in order to further genetic research. This purchase has brought about more ethical concerns about whether patient-doctor relations have been breached and also whether exploiting these people for the good of the whole is more important than the interests of the individual.

The doctor-patient relationship is one of the most sacred and honored traditions in medicine, and to deny the individual this right, would be a travesty. There are exceptions to the tradition, in that sometimes patients can offer their medical histories for studies on the terms of informed consent.

In this type of agreement, the patient signs a document indicating that they are aware of the proceedings that will be undertaken and are made conscious of even the most remote repercussions of the study. In the case of Iceland's population, this vow has been violated.

The Icelandic approach flips this issue: The patients are responsible for their own medical histories, and the companies offer to pay for information. This is a mandate that the people should remain anonymous.

That's anything but the case.

"Legal experts have pointed out that the database, as described in the bill, consists of personal information, which, though de-identified by encryption of names, will not be anonymous," according to a report by Iceland's Psychiatric Human Rights Group. This is one of the loopholes that DeCode and the rest of its cousins capitalize on, the other being the fact that they're outside the borders of the United States.

In a report released by DeCode, they claim that they are a "private limited company registered in Iceland," not bound by the ethical laws and considerations of the United States. The fact remains that its corporate sponsor and main branch are based in Delaware.

Placing blame

In some respects, this is more the sponsor's fault for letting this research company exploit people in this manner, though DeCode should recognize this as well. They blatantly violate the rules of conduct concerning informed consent, and make a case for the citizens to reject the companies offer.

"The government is trying to bully us into accepting this bill, and we are deeply concerned that the public may be unaware of the seriousness of the issue," says Dr. Gudmundur Bjarnason, chairman of the Icelandic Medical Association.

One of the most controversial and relatively scary parts of this issue is the exclusiveness DeCode was given to this information.

In some respects, this is more the sponsor's fault for letting this research company exploit people in this manner, though DeCode should recognize this as well. They blatantly violate the rules of conduct concerning informed consent, and make a case for the citizens to reject the companies offer.

"The government is trying to bully us into accepting this bill, and we are deeply concerned that the public may be unaware of the seriousness of the issue," says Dr. Gudmundur Bjarnason, chairman of the Icelandic Medical Association.

One of the most controversial and relatively scary parts of this issue is the exclusiveness DeCode was given to this information.

As if the extra door didn’t make it easy enough to get into. As improvements go, the Saturn engineers came up with a good one. A third door, right there on the driver’s side, that makes it easy to get dogs, tubas, even people into the back seat of our coupe. And, continuing on the whole “easy to get into” theme, you can get the Saturn three-door coupe for a very impressive lease payment. So drop by your Saturn retailer. We’ll show you how to get into a great car. Without cleaning out your bank account in the process.

Syracuse hopes to avoid the fate of St. John's (3-2) and avoid being shut out of the post-NCAA Tournament field, St. John's second-half collapse against the Hoyas (16-5) sealed the Red Storm's fate.

"We set our goals, and we accomplished a lot," Tony Torbush said. "We got to the Sweet 16, and we made a lot of history."

Even after his team ran over Syracuse, UConn coach Jim Calhoun praised the Orange.

"He's the best basketball coach in the league," Calhoun said. "I've never seen a guy with that kind of energy."

Syracuse's bid for a national title ended in the Sweet 16, where the Orange fell to eventual champion Duke.

But the Hoyas will need more than Bob Knight and Tom Izzo to get a better seed in phase three — and the expectations even higher.

"We have to play well," Hart said. "And we have to get the title. I'm all about phase two right now."

Orange face phase two

SU goes to New York with title aspirations.

By Jeff Passan
Asst. Sports Editor

More and more as it endures, Syracuse's 1998-99 season begins to resemble head coach Jim Boeheim's career. After last week's loss 69-54 loss at Connecticut, Boeheim said the season is broken into three phases.

Phase one is the regular season, a time in which the team establishes itself. In Boeheim's case, the early years of his career served this purpose.

Phase three is the NCAA Tournament, in which SU has seen moderate success. Boeheim, in his 24th season, still seeks his first national championship.

To buffer the primary and tertiary phases, the Orangemen must first succeed in the second — the Big East Tournament this weekend at Madison Square Garden in New York City. Syracuse faces Georgetown at noon today in a second-round matchup.

This year, though, is Syracuse's best chance of reaching the Final Four during the 1995-96 season. The Orangemen See MANHATTAN page 15

With four minutes left in the first half, Syracuse head coach Lisa Miller yelled down the line to freshman goalkeeper Carla Gignon.

Syracuse senior goalkeeper Clothilde Ewing started in net against the No. 7 Georgetown Hoyas on Wednesday afternoon at Carrier Dome.

But Ewing struggled for the second consecutive game, allowing six goals and making zero saves and forcing Miller to call for the freshman goalie.

"She was like, 'Get your helmet on and get warmed up,'" Gignon said. "I was like, 'OK, here we go.'"

Gignon replaced Ewing between the pipes and made her collegiate debut against one of the best teams in the country.

Her first game, however, didn't end on a happy note.

For football squads across the country, long months are in the weight room preceding the start of fall practice. When the August dust has cleared, a new edition of Syracuse's football team searches for the duster, the weight room precede dusting off the pads for a few weeks of spring practice.

With the move toward more option teams, the Syracuse defense starts new in the spring game.

Last year saw a host ofSU additions, but for new teams, most notably Kevin Rogers' acceptance of the offensive coordinator position at Notre Dame.

The Orangemen added Brian Schottenheimer, son of former Kansas City Chiefs head coach Marty, as its wide receivers coach. SU also hired defensive line coach Thurmond Moore and secondary head man Kevin Kelly.

Again, it's time to bust out your pencil — you'll need a fresh eraser, too — and scorecards, because the Spring 2000 shuffle is already under way.

Schottenheimer left for Southern Cal after spending just a single season working with the Orangemen's wideouts. Kelly jumped back to Marshall to serve as its offensive coordinator.

Just last week, offensive line coach and recruiting coordinator Jeff Stoutland left for greener — and whiter — pastures at Michigan State.

Head coach Paul Pasqualoni hired two familiar faces to replace his departed colleagues: Steve Bush to coach the secondary, and Jim Hofher to guide the quarterbacks.

"I was looking for gainful employment," Hofher said. "I've coached here before, and I'm familiar with the system and the members of the staff."

Although Pasqualoni hired Hofher as the tight ends See COACHES page 12

Chuck Petruccione
It's finally here! Championship week is upon us, and that means teams from all around the country are making dreams come true. As for the Big East, we are already in the tournament, but the big games have yet to be played. So here aremy picks for how the rest of the bracket will play out, and for who will (or in some cases, should) be taking home post-season awards.

Chuck's Tournament Picks
With the No. 1 seed, Syracuse will play Georgetown, who knocked off West Virginia on day one of play. The Orangemen handled the Hoyas on the last day of the regular season, and there's no reason it won't happen again. Syracuse 74, Georgetown 59.

The Orangemen's opponent will either be UConn or Seton Hall. Both have beaten SU this year. However, SU would much rather face the Pirates. Unfortunately, things won't work out, as UConn's experience will help them pull through to the semifinals, Connecticut 68, Seton Hall 61.

In the lower half of the bracket, Miami should come See BENB page 12

The Syracuse Police Department has yet to identify any suspects after a Syracuse University student was assaulted last week in her apartment on the 800 block of Ackerman Avenue.

An unidentified man broke into the senior's first-floor apartment March 19 and beat her with a clothes iron, according to a police report.

"It occurred at about 5 or 5:30 a.m.," said Aubree Murray, the victim's roommate. "The alarm (door) was a little open and he had hidden in a front hallway."

The victim, who did not wish to comment, had just gotten out of the shower and walked into her bedroom when she noticed that some of her dresser drawers were open, the report said.

She then observed a gloved hand reaching around the door, the report added.

The senior was unable to force the door shut and the intruder pushed the door open. He struck the student several times with what appeared to be an iron, the report said. The senior then fell to the floor kicking and screaming.

The attacker then ran from the bedroom, the report said.

Students will decide next month whether to continue funding the New York Public Interest Research Group.

The Student Government Association voted for a referendum in April that will determine the fate of the current $6 per person NYPIRG fee.

Currently, Syracuse University students pay a $106 Student Activity Fee to SGA each year. Six dollars of that fee is directly given to NYPIRG, said Jonathan M. Taylor, SGA parliamentarian.

By voting in the referendum, students can choose to keep the fee mandatory. If students vote in opposition, the Student Fee will remain $106 with SGA keeping all the funds and making all the money available to campus organizations.

SGA President Jamal James said $60,000 will be given to these organizations, he added.

But Kevin Conroy, a NYPIRG member, said the $6 fee is important to maintain his organization's accountability to the students of SU and the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry.

Clinton to meet with Syria

DHAKA, Bangladesh — President Bill Clinton announced Tuesday that he will meet with Syrian President Hafez Assad on Thursday in Damascus, as he is restarting Middle East peace talk in Syria and Israel.

The planned meeting, to occur just weeks from now and be held at the airport in Damascus, marks the first U.S. president to visit this troubled nation, announced about $200 million in new aid to Bangladesh.

Clinton and Assad met twice in 1994 and again briefly last year at the funeral of Jordan’s King Hussein. Their relationship has not been friendly, however, as the United States and others have accused Assad of side tracking arms for the war in Lebanon that killed more than 200 people. The United States has been a staunch ally of Israel, and Israel has been a strong ally of the United States.

I don’t want to unduly raise expectations, but I think that if this is a step forward, that thing for me to do to try to get it back on track," Clinton said during an appearance with Bangladesh Prime Minister Fakhruddin Ahmed. "I think the first U.S. president to visit to this troubled nation, announced about $200 million in new aid to Bangladesh.

The United States and other nations have accused Assad of sending arms to Hezbollah guerrillas in the war in Lebanon. Assad’s government is credited with a recent reduction in such deliveries. Clinton had planned to visit Syria but an unspecified security threat prompted U.S. security agents to cancel the plan last Sunday night. Instead, authorities brought about 300 Jordanians residents of the U.S. Embassy in Jordan.

Bike stolen from student’s apartment

A Syracuse University student found his green mountain bike, valued at $500 dollars, missing Saturday from his apartment, according to a police report.

The victim noticed that his bike was missing from the front hall when he returned home and later notified police, the report said.

A search of the area produced no results. There are no witnesses and no signs of damage or forced entry, the report added.

This kind of drug bust "happens year-round," Robinson said.
"You'll find a bong, a couple of roaches," he said. "Normally when the students leave you find one of the two. As a result of this, we've had a few drug busts."
Schillinger, a junior policy studies major, said the incident was "unfortunate," but added that Public Safety had a right to confiscate the material.
"Pot is illegal," she said.
"People aren't supposed to have it. I don't really care that they get busted."
The fact the students' door was left unlocked also gave the officers more reason to enter the apartment, said Johnston, a junior international relations and psychology major.
"It's totally their own fault if they leave the door unlocked," she said. "It definitely sucks for them, but at the same time, it's university property."
North campus residence halls, however, do not conduct room checks during Spring Break, said Brian Chu, a resident advisor on the ninth floor of Brewster Hall. But advisors do check rooms before leaving for Winter Break, he added.
The checks are to make sure all residents are out and that rooms are secure, said Reid Ockerman, the residence director for Lawrison Hall.
"We have to make sure everyone is out of the building before shutting it down," he said.
While checking rooms for residents, advisors make sure that window blinds are closed, appliances are unplugged and doors are locked.
"Other than that, the only reason is to check to make sure everyone is out," Ockerman said.
Students do not receive a letter of warning for the searches, but are told of the checks at floor meetings, he said.
There is no direct mention that contraband can possibly be confiscated by Public Safety, Ockerman said. But he added that advisors often infer this to the floor residents.
"I think RAs have a common sense talk with the floor," he said.
"They say, 'Look, don't leave a keg sitting in the middle of the room.'" Candles and incense, however, comprise most of what is confiscated during room checks, Ockerman said.
"If we walk into a situation where paraphernalia or things are blatantly laying out, we have to confiscate it," he said. "If we don't see anything, you know we aren't pawing around."

SU must respond to habitual violence

Dear Syracuse University Administrators:

Three students are robbed at gunpoint in the shadows of Ackerman Hall. Two weeks later, an intruder sneaks into an off-campus apartment and bludgeons a woman with an iron in her own bedroom.

Their cries for help have fallen on deaf ears — yours. You have formed a pricey alliance with the Syracuse Police Department to banish lounges and kegs from off-campus neighborhoods. But it seems you are blind to the peeping toms, car thieves and violent robbers who still prowl the streets of nearby residential areas to pounce on unsuspecting students.

After pocketing $30,000 from each student on campus, generous alumni donates $46,000 to take down the socialist political group. But it seems this is not the "do" list? You allotted zero dollars to campus, generous alumni donates.
Your school made it. The others didn't.

In other SGA news:
SGA is continuing to work with campus security to better serve SU students, James said. He presented six areas of concern for student safety to the Assembly.

These areas included aligning the campus bus schedule with library closing times, extending the times that buses operate and increasing safety at all bus stops.

- The SGA shuttle bus service at Hancock Airport during Spring Break was a success, James said. More than 600 people used the service.

- James added that he is hoping to expand to the Regional Transportation Center and also offer the service for all major breaks during the academic year.

At a Feb. 23 Council meeting, about 100 residents protested the county's request to the city for the easement of a pipeline behind the Centro Bus Garage.

"Everybody voiced their objections and low and behold, the county says it doesn't need an easement," said Rich Tulchalski, executive director of Syracuse United Neighbors. "This is another game the county has been playing."

The pipeline would allow for the construction of the sewage treatment plant, which will be built between Midland and Cortland avenues, near Oxford and Blaine streets. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers plans to release its study on Onondaga Lake next month. But Cunningham said the release of the study is not enough of a deterrent to halt the preliminary work on the project.

"There is no guarantee they will find a different approach or technology," he said. "We are under court order to eliminate the overflows and we have to do it."

Former Councilor Nancy McCarty became a plaintiff in the lawsuit when she was contacted by the Atlantic States Legal Foundation, who is leading the suit.

"This is basically an attempt to get the EPA to pay attention to the implications of putting a treatment center in the middle of the neighborhood," McCarty said. "This is not the solution. We need to deal with the Army Corps of Engineers."

Cunningham said the city's permit to build the plant, Cunningham said the city's permission is not needed because the sewage system falls under the jurisdiction of the county.

"All we need is a street cut permit," he said. "And you don't get that from the Common Council."

Residents have opposed the proposal since last March, when the county formally introduced it to the Council.

By not heeding the concerns of South Side residents, the county is being ignorant to the basic rights of those living in the neighborhood, McCarty said.

"Their attitude about human beings seems to be abominable," she said. "Their rush to judgement seems to me like it has more to do with lucrative interests."

Cunningham, however, denied that the sewage treatment plant will cause harm to the neighborhood.

"It will have no impact on the community or the people in it," he said. "Some people don't understand it, or they don't want to understand it."

But McCarty accused Cunningham and the county of being "bureaucratic" and said that the city misled residents by encouraging them to move to the South Side with various housing initiatives.

"The county decided it was the most vulnerable group of people who would just shut up while they were being screwed," she said. "Well guess what folks, those days are over."

CLEVELAND — Their eyes may cross the better rooms. After the plot, when you ask the team's biggest wish, and they say, "If we can get enough games, it will help us," and you think, "There's no way we're going to let 10 games."

"Neither team could make anything today," SU head coach Jim Boeheim said. "It was just a matter of will and determination and seeing who could bang in there and make some stops.

It was also a matter of rebounding. The Orangemen bested the Wildcats on the glass 40-33. Thomas paced SU with 10 boards. Syracuse cleaned the glass best on the offensive end, coming up with 21 offensive rebounds, compared with just 12 for Kentucky. SU's mastery of the boards allowed it to score 22 second-chance points and kept the Orangemen in the game despite just six assists. "If we didn't hit the glass hard, we lose by 10 points," Boeheim said. "That was a big factor in the game, no question about it."

SU's stifling defense played a major role in the victory as well. Syracuse started off in man-to-man but switched to a 2-3 zone to protect Thomas when he got in early foul trouble.

Although Thomas was disqualified later in the game, the strategy forced the Wildcats — shooting just 42 percent for the season — to take a bevy of outside shots. "We didn't play up to our ability at the end of the season, and we're 2-0," Hart said. "We're in phase three of our season. This is a new season, and we're 2-0."

Tayshaun Prince — who had a career-high 28 points in Kentucky's first-round double-overtime victory over St. Bonaventure — was held to just 10 points on Saturday, after squeezing off just seven shots. "He's one of their key guys, and he's going to come out and try to shoot the ball," Blackwell said. "We did a good job keeping it out of his hands and keeping him away from the basket."

To make up for Prince's dropoff in offensive production, the Wildcats employed a balanced attack. Bogans and center Jamaal Magloire both tallied 12 points, while Camara chipped in 10. Bogans also added 10 rebounds.

The Wildcats were not able to fully take advantage of Thomas' absence in the game's final moments, however, because of the defensive play of Blackwell.

The senior forward was forced to man the middle in the SU zone after Thomas picked up his fifth foul. Blackwell limited UK big men Magloire and Marvin Stone inside and forced the Wildcats to look to the outside for scoring.

Blackwell also came up big on the offensive end in crunch time. He hit two free throws to put SU up 48-45 with 4:10 remaining and canned a shot on the baseline over Magloire to make the score 50-48 with 2:19 left.

Boeheim was so impressed by the senior's play on the offensive end that he designed SU's final offensive play with the purpose of getting the ball in Blackwell's hands.

It ended up in Shumpert's, however, and SU now finds itself in the Sweet 16 after its first-round defeat in the Big East Tournament had naysayers predicting an early March exit for the Orangemen.

"We didn't play up to our ability at the end of the season, but that's over," Hart said. "We're in phase three of our season. This is a new season, and we're 2-0."

The announcement last week that scientists had created the world's first clone of a pig marked a milestone in the century-long quest to use animals as a source of organs for transplantation into humans. But significant technical hurdles will have to be cleared if pigs are to solve the chronic organ shortage that allows tens of thousands of patients to die on waiting lists every year.

Scientists trying to overcome these difficulties are focusing on pigs because pig organs are about the right size to fit inside people, and because the fine physiology is reasonably similar to human physiology. That means a pig kidney, for example, can probably do for a person everything a human kidney is designed to do.

Common sense

Uncle Sam is facing up to one of the toughest marketing challenges of the millennium: persuading an increasingly price-conscious public to fill up 2001 census forms. The Founding Fathers mandated the census in the Constitution, but a growing number of Americans no longer view the national headcount as a patriotic obligation. As few as 55 percent might return the 98 million forms landing in mailboxes nationwide this week, down from 65 percent in 1990 and 76 percent in 1970.

Movies rival basketball for audiences

There's another March Madness for those who aren't die-hard college b-ball fans, and the outcome of the winners and losers is just as nail-bitingly tense. Sunday evening marks the 71st annual presentation of the Academy Awards. Bet are being made even as we speak on who will take home the most prized award in the business.

There are looking up for the 2000 version of the Oscars too. Fifty-three of the 55 statues that were stolen from a loading dock two weeks ago were found in a dumpster yesterday. Comedian Billy Crystal will be coming back to be the MC of this year's event, erasing the memory of Whoopi Goldberg and her insanely stupid dance numbers that just put most people to sleep. Yet despite these improvements, the best candidates for film of the year are still ignored by a voting system that wouldn't know a great film if it jumped up and bit them in the ass. Go see "Electra," "Three Kings," "Being John Malkovich," "The Matrix" and "Flet Story 2" (all absent by the way) or watch Matt Damon in "The Talented Mr. Ripley" to see why so many people complain about the misguided nominations each and every year. Despite the fact that any film is eligible from the past year, only those in the final few months of eligibility are ever considered. For the most part, the voters made poor choices about 50 percent of the time.

OK, enough complaining about things that should be left for the critics with real clout to address. Let's take a look at the awards that'll matter — there are only six biggies to stay awake for. Even though the nominees are different, the Golden Globes have pretty much already dictated who and what will win Sunday. So even if you didn't see any of the movies or actors nominated, you'll find out which are the most anticipated matches at the Oscars.

Staring blankly at the computer keyboard, Patrick Sakpedeli tried to figure out how to make a bracket appear on the screen. Finally, after several moments of quiet deliberation, the 15-year-old gave up and abruptly raised his hand for help.

Jean Denis, a senior information studies major, was on the scene within seconds. He listened as Patrick, who lives on Syracuse's north side, explained his bracket question.

Denis then placed his hands on Patrick's shoulders and explained how to use the "Shift" key.

"He always helps me," Patrick said. On a recent Saturday, Denis brought Patrick and about 15 other children, all participants in the International Children's Project, to Syracuse University's Link Hall to learn how to make their own Web pages.

A project of the SU volunteer organization, Students Offering Service, ICP coordinates educational and cultural activities for refugee children of color on Saturday afternoons.

Originally developed for Haitian children, ICP branched out recently to include children from other countries such as Liberia and South Africa.

All recent refugees to the United States, many of the children have little or no prior computer experience, which meant creating Web pages for each child was that much more difficult.

Denis, who one day hopes to work as a computer consultant, said that volunteering with refugee children — which he has been doing since his sophomore year — has been a rewarding experience.

A Rochester native, Denis never did community service before college.

"I thought that since I was able to go to college, than I should give back to younger kids so they can go too," he said. For Denis, the perfect opportunity to volunteer was with ICP.

Shumpert hit an easy layup after scooping an offensive rebound with 1:38 remain ing in the first half to put SU up 21-20.

He stroked another triple — this one from the right wing — to cap a 7-0 Syracuse run and give the Orangemen a 30-27 advantage early in the second half.

And 15:45 later, he hit his next shot. A bevy of bricks separated Shumpert’s final two makes, but on the last shot, he forgot about the score and time left on the clock.

“Most shots, I got wide open and set my feet and started thinking about it,” he said. “This one, I just caught and released without even thinking. That’s when you hit most of your shots.”

Said head coach Jim Boeheim: “He’s our best shooter, and he’s going to shoot against a zone. When-ev er you’re playing in a late-game situation, you can’t necessarily get one guy the shot. You’ve got to get whoever’s open the shot. He knocked that shot down.”

Down went the Wildcats
(23-10), too, and by the same fate that kept them from a first-round defeat.

Against St. Bonaventure, Kentucky ran a double-screen on the baseline to free up its sharpshooter, Tayshaun Prince. With the Wildcats down three, Prince nailed a triple and sent the game into overtime.

The Orangemen ran a double-screen, too, freeing up point guard Jason Hart.
He ran the baseline and sent a perfect bounce pass into Shumpert’s hands. With Prince in his face, Shumpert lofted the winning shot.

“If he kicked it to me, I knew I had a shot, and I hoped and prayed that I’d knock it down. I was worried about missing it and having a good, clean release.”

that makes jealousy among the shooting-impaired. His smooth wrist-flick allowed him to shoot a team-high 46.9 percent on triples this season.

Shumpert’s Fort Walton
Beach (Fla.) High School team set a national record for 3-pointers in one season. He’s a product of the environment.

In shooter’s fashion — and with a true gunner’s mentality — Shumpert never shies away from the opportunity to squeeze off a jumper.

Especially when the clock is winding down.

“I’m always looking for my next shot,” Shumpert said. “Always looking.”

the key player in the Orangemen offense never found the back of the net, Coffman said. Fielder Josh Coffman finished the night with four assists, snapping the first half charge that saw SU take an 8-5 lead to intermission.

Less than three minutes into the game, Coffman fed classmate Banks in the center of the field. From eight yards out, Banks whirled and beat Carcaterra for a 1-0 lead.

Then, with five seconds left in the period, Coffman found Springer, who stuffed a shot past Carcaterra's right calf to pull the Orangemen 58-26, including a 16-3 success in the first quarter and a remarkable 21-2 difference in the final stanza.

"I thought the offense played a very good game," Coffman said. "They played a lot of zone, and mixed it up a lot. But I thought we responded well to everything in the second half."

The Coogan-Springer tandem hooked up again to bookend a four-goal run that gave SU a 5-3 lead midway through the second. His final assist came with 2:58 left in the first half when he hit a cutting Caione on the doorstep.

"It's always nice to see a short stick," he said. "Sometimes when the ball was just behind the goal, he had a shot past Carcaterra's right calf to pull the Orange-

For a millisecond, it looked as though the Carrier Dome would play host to one of college lacrosse’s most remarkable comebacks.

No. 7 Johns Hopkins trailed Syracuse 13-10 with less than a minute on the Dome timer. But the Blue Jays scored two quick goals, and freshman Bobby Benson appeared to tally a third an instant before the final buzzer.

While two endline officials signaled a goal, the judges at midfield ruled the ball failed to clear the line before the final horn. While Benson and Hopkins head coach John Haus protested, the No. 1 Orangeangemen celebrated a 13-12 victory.

All I’ll say is that we fought until the end,” Haus said. “Unfortunately, we came up one goal short.”

The furious final seconds failed to drown a Hopkins surge that saw them rally from down a nickel in the fourth quarter.

After Benson scored off a Conor Denihan feed with 19 seconds remaining, Syracuse’s Sam Bassett scooped up a faceoff and attempted to run out the clock. Bassett, however, lost the ball, and a scramble brought a loose-ball push that gave Hopkins (1-2) possession with seven seconds left.

On the restart, senior co-captain A.J. Haugen heaved a shot toward the SU net. After a two-goal first quarter, Nos. 21-2 shots advantage over the Orangeangemen recorded six goals, two of them by dishing out four assists in SU’s dramatic 13-12 victory.

But the referee near the penalty box never hesitated, waving off the tying tally as soon as his comrades near the goal signaled it good.

“The best thing was when the clock hit zero,” attacking midfielder A.J. Haugen said. “But if we had capitalized better at the offensive end, we wouldn’t have been in that situation.”

But exactly half of those shots slipped past Blue Jays goaltender Brian Carasanta, and, despite leading by 32 in the shots column, the Orangeangemen pulled off a 13-12 victory.

Syracuse struggled to fire shots from the opening faceoff. Hopkins outshot SU 16-9 in the first quarter and kept the ball in SU’s zone for a 5:03 stretch in the stanza. The phenomenon repeated in the fourth quarter, when JHU held a 21-2 shots advantage over the Orangeangemen. In both periods, the Blue Jays mixed defenses to confuse the home team, and the usually sure-handed SU attackers and midfielders botched easy passes.

“The best thing was when the clock hit zero,” attacker Liam Banks said. “But if we had capitalized better at the offensive end, we wouldn’t have been in that situation.”

After a two-goal first quarter, SU’s conversion rate multiplied by three in the second stanza. The Orangeangemen recorded six goals, two

Binge drinking increases
National study reflects SU drinking behaviors

The number of students rushing the bar for last call continues to rise, even as more of their peers are turning to abstinence.

Binge drinking on campuses across the country increased by more than 14 percent since 1993, according to a study released last week by the Harvard School of Public Health in Boston. The study notes that although excessive drinking is on the upswing, non-drinkers are gaining popularity — they grew by 24 percent.

This national trend mirrors student drinking habits at Syracuse University, said Deena Bergen-Cico, director of substance abuse prevention and health enhancement at the SU Health Center.

“Part of it is the social mentality of excess,” she said. “And then there are students who can’t have a friendly or intimate relationship without a buzz.”

The recent abstinence trend stems from more substance abuse prevention and an abundance of alcohol-related accidents, Bergen-Cico said.

“Within the last four years there has been a lot of dialogue and focus on this that has supported those who abstain,” she said, adding that “with binge drinking increasing, there are a lot of negatives that turn people off.”

The study is the culmination of student surveys conducted during 1993, 1997 and 1999. In all three years, students reported their binge drinking peers interfering with their sleep and studies.

In an attempt to diminish student apathy on campus, the Residence Hall Association has a new face and it vowed Tuesday to show it more often.

As public relations director, Sutter said she plans to establish an association newsletter to circulate among the student body. Actively publicizing events is a point on her agenda, she added.

Maintaining strong ties with the Student Government Association is another goal of the new board, Sutter said.

“In essence, SGA and RHA are going to be doing a lot of the same things,” she said.
Tobacco regulation rejected

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Supreme Court Monday called a sports under-18 America's "single most significant threat to public health" but nonetheless ruled that federal health authorities have no power to regulate their manufacture and sale.

Concluding that Congress needs another approach, the Court's decision last week on the tobacco company's challenge to the FDA's authority under this law when it announced new anti-smoking regulations designed to protect the nation's children.

The decision blocks those rules from taking effect. They are expected to be challenged in the courts.

The FDA has since proposed new regulations to deal with the growing epidemic of teenage smoking.

FDA pulls diabetes drug

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The popular type II diabetes drug Renuzil was pulled off the market Tuesday after federal regulators determined it was too dangerous to continue marketing.

The Food and Drug Administration asked Parke-Davis-Warner Lambert, which makes Renuzil, to withdraw it and the company agreed.

The drug, which is used to treat type 2 diabetes, was voluntarily pulled from the market after the FDA received reports of liver failures, including 61 deaths.

The swift conclusion to the excruciating siege began when 10:20 p.m. when one of the hostages, Lynn Whitehead, jumped from a window of the first-floor apartment in the East Point neighborhood where she lived and had been held for almost 100 hours, according to a Baltimore County police spokesman.

Andrew McCord, her boyfriend, who had shot her, next came from the building, and police then entered through living room windows. They shot Palczynski and recovered the third hostage, Bradley McCord, the 30-year-old who had been naked and按 to the family house for almost 100 hours, according to a Baltimore County police spokesman.

The action came after the FDA had faced heavy criticism for approving the drug to the first place despite concerns about its safety, and for allowing it to stay on the market until it was too late to fall.

The controversy over Renuzil also contributed to rising concern that the FDA was approving new drugs too quickly.

Hostages safe after standoff

DUNDALE, Md. — The four-day standoff in Baltimore County between police and a man accused of four murders ended suddenly last night as police moved in a farmhouse and fatally shot Joseph C. Palczynski. All three of the hostages he had been holding were reported safe.

India rejects nuclear curbs

NEW DELHI — India rejected President Bill Clinton's calls for further curbs in its nuclear tests program Tuesday in the face of rising international pressure to end India's nuclear test ban.

Vajpayee made some conciliatory comments at a joint news conference Wednesday, saying, "There is no threat of war" with Pakistan and that India's view was new testing of nuclear bombs.

A census enumerator will probably be spending a fair amount of time in the lobby. With representatives in the lobby, the students may be reminded to return their forms, Spring added.

"We are hoping not to have to go door to door in the dormitories," he said.

The census results will determine the number of seats each state has in the U.S. House of Representatives and the amount of federal dollars each state receives, said Blair Horner, legislative director for the New York Public Interest Research Group. Government agencies also use the results to determine representation in state senates, he added.

It is suspected that upstate New York may lose one state senate seat and two assembly seats, he said.

"The hard thing is when looking at estimates, it is hard to say what the final census will say," Horner said.

It is also difficult to say whether Syracuse should be concerned about the shift in population even though Onondaga County is one of the largest losers of population in the state, he added.

Downstate New York gained more than 245,000 people since 1990, according to NYPIRG reports. It is very important for Syracuse to get out the forms, Martinez-Daloia said.

The university has already completed a fair amount of advertising to encourage student participation in the census, said Sylvia Martinez-Daloia, SU Director of Community Relations. The city of Syracuse is working with the university to distribute the information, she added.

Martinez-Daloia recently helped host tables in the Science Student Center with staff from the Census Office available to answer questions about the process. Another table will be set up during the first week of April, she said.

Martinez-Daloia said, "The sooner the students return the form, the better. Maybe within that week, they should get it out," Martinez-Daloia added.

There are two different types of forms a student may receive, Spring stressed. There is a short form that most students will receive and a long form that will be distributed to one in six students, he said.

Each year that the census is taken, congressional districts are redrawn according to shifts in population. A recent trend in district redrawing is an expansion eastward and southward, Horner said.

This change in districts may make Syracuse much larger, he said. The expansion will make it much more difficult for specific groups to be represented with everyone spread out, Horner added.

The government, particularly the federal government, uses the census to fund programs in each state, said Art Levy, spokesman for state Sen. John DeFrancisco (R-Syracuse).

There has been a growth in the southern and south eastern states and a definite depletion in New York state's population, making it almost certain that New York state will lose at least one seat in Congress and possibly two depending on the outcome of the census, reports from DeFrancisco's office said.

These facts make it critical for students to participate in the census, Martinez-Daloia said. "The city has tried to increase the awareness of the census," she said. "We're working alongside with them to get the word out."
SU officials ignore national trend to ban Napster

BY KATE STEVENSON
Assn. News Editor

Days after the University of San Diego began banning student use of Napster, Syracuse University officials announced they would not follow suit.

University of San Diego administrators cited traffic problems caused by excessive use of Napster, a Web site used to download music files, and copyright issues regarding its services as reasons for the block this month.

Several universities also recently banned Napster when it began to constitute 5 percent of the school’s Internet traffic, said David Butler, director of SU Network and Systems Services.

“That seems kind of low,” Butler added. “I think in order to cause a problem it would have to be higher than that.”

At most, SU officials may limit the site’s access in the event of a network backlog, he said.

But the university is wary of blocking any Internet access, preferring to keep the network relatively open, Butler said.

A restriction on Napster, however, may actually benefit students. Heavy use of Napster may start to clog the entire system, which would slow access to other sites and cause problems for students trying to log on to research sources and other Internet areas, Butler said.

Napster provides free downloads of a wide variety of music files, called MP3s. Membership to the service is also free.

The Record Industry Association of America sued Napster in December on behalf of record labels and recording artists, alleging that the site is facilitating the trade of illegal copies of songs. They are seeking a settlement of up to $100,000 for each song available on the site, which hosts up to 714,000 songs.

An SU Napster ban as a result of copyright issues “depends entirely on the legal outcome,” Butler said. “It depends on the decision,” he said. “Our lawyers may say ‘Gee, we are at a high risk if we don’t shut these people down.’

SU students are also debating Napster copyright issues.

“I guess they are doing something wrong — no one’s buying CDs anymore,” said Libby Ryan, a freshman retail major.

However, she said she is hesitant in condemning Napster since she uses its services. She said she has about 300 MP3 files on her computer.

“But it’s great, I haven’t bought a CD in months,” Ryan said. “If you can get the two songs you want, you don’t have to buy the CD. It’s great for us but it kind of attacks for the record companies.”

The university does not take action against individuals using MP3s on campus unless they are contacted by record industry officials, Butler said.

“Usually we do this when we get written complaints from the record industry association that they found machines here with illegal MP3 files,” he said.

There is a distinction made, however, between illegal files and the average student downloading tracks from their favorite bands, he added.

“It’s usually when someone sets up a Web site encouraging people to download MP3s from their computer,” he said. “The mere fact that you have MP3 files on your PC will not cause us to shut down your computer.”

SU must discuss apparel contracts

It’s harrowing to imagine that someone thousands of miles away paid only pennies per hour to sew Syracuse University logos onto the athletic apparel adorning screaming fans in the Carrier Dome.

But it might be the truth.

The Student Coalition on Organized Labor has designated this week as “Sweatshop Awareness Week.” The group is planning rallies and events to raise awareness about the unfair labor practices employed by big-name corporations that contract with colleges nationwide, including SU, to manufacture athletic apparel.

SCOOL hopes to catch the reluctant listening ear of the university, which so far hasn’t revealed information about their ties to Nike and other corporations employing sweatshop labor.

While a group of angry students can’t cripple a multi-billion dollar collegiate licensing industry, a coalition of concerned colleges might. The University of California system and Boston University have both recently come out in support of tighter monitoring of corporate employment practices. Along with other big-name schools, SU could lean heavily to make sure that workers stitching Nike swooshes on SU jerseys in underprivileged countries are paid fair wages for their work.

SCOOL has taken the first important step toward heightening campus consciousness about this crucial issue, which has grabbed headlines at colleges nationwide. But the coalition presents only one side of the matter. A real dialogue can only begin once the university meets their call to step up and explain their contractual obligations.

Even SU’s sibling school, the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry, began investing in “socially responsible” companies this year after student complaints about the school’s holdings in companies like Chevron and Home Depot.

SU should seize the opportunity to be a leader in advocating stricter controls for the companies that supply its endless stream of pricey athletic garb.

SU must clean up Carrier Dome exterior

To the editor:

As a Syracuse University employee, I have the pleasure of walking past the Carrier Dome on my way to and from work each day. In my opinion, I’ve never seen such a shabby-looking building. There is always trash strewn around and there has been graffiti on the walls for at least a year (if not longer). Is there really any excuse to leave graffiti on the walls for years?

I certainly hope the university decides to clean off the graffiti and pick up the trash at the East Regionals this weekend. Otherwise, it will be one more example of how dirty and shabby the SU campus really is.

Baker leaves university after lucrative campaigns

Staff Reports

Lansing Baker, senior vice president of university relations, will retire this December after a 13-year career at Syracuse University.

As director of university relations since 1987, Baker has been responsible for developing better public visibility for the university, fostering relationships with alumni and organizing fund-raising efforts.

Some of the fund-raising campaigns Baker organized during his tenure in university relations include the Campaign for Syracuse that ran from 1987 to 1991 and the current Commitment to Learning Campaign that began in 1995. The Campaign for Syracuse raised about $100 million and the Commitment to Learning Campaign has already raised more than $208 million, according to the university.

Before Baker began his position in university relations, SU brought in about $8 to $10 million per year through his office. Since he took the position, that figure has grown to about $50 million per year, according to the university.

As head of university relations, Baker also oversees the Office of Alumni Relations, University Communications and the Lubin House in New York City, according to the university. The Lubin House is an SU-owned center offering alumni events, classes and interviews for prospective students.

Baker was out of town and could not be reached for comment. A search for his replacement is set to begin immediately, according to the university.

production of SU apparel and ensure it is not made in sweatshops, Wissink said.

The anti-sweatshop movement is gathering momentum on college campuses across the nation. This campaign is designed to feed on that activism, Baker said. Boston University administration announced Wednesday that it will request their apparel companies to disclose the locations of their factories and the University of California also recently took similar measures.

A mock sweatshop will be set up throughout Thursday on the Quad, where working conditions in factories of third world countries will be recreated. A "shanty town" will accompany the sweatshop, to show how workers live off their low wages, Cox said.

"The people that work in sweatshops make SU clothing barely earn enough to get by," Wissink said.

A rally will begin on the Quad at 4 p.m. Friday. The rally will be kicked off by a tentatively-planned nude bike-ride across the SU and ESF quads.

"We're trying to get things moving," said David Radley, a member of SEAC. "We need support though. It'd be stupid not to ride naked across the Quad."

The bikers plan to circle the quads wearing posters that protest the use of sweatshops by Charles Keraghan, executive director of the National Labor Committee.

Earlier this month, 200 people attended a lecture about sweatshops by Charles Keraghan, executive director of the National Labor Committee. SEAC hung a banner at the lecture. "We'd rather wear something than wear SU apparel that was made in sweatshops," Radley said.

Events planned this week continue recent efforts by student groups to raise sweatshop awareness. Some students, however, question the importance of the anti-sweatshop campaign.

"When I go to the mall to buy a sweatshirt, I don't care who makes it," said Marc Stern, an undeclared sophomore in the School of Management. "I pay the price I pay, it's irrelevant to me."

Twenty-five students sought help through the center for alcohol abuse this year on their own accord, Bergen-Cico said. Only six had the previous year, she added.

Focusing on greeks

Although he admits binge drinking is a legitimate concern for all students, SU's Interfraternity Council President Brad Young said there should not be too much emphasis put on the recent study.

"Studies like this come out every other week. Every study says there is a problem," said Young, who is also president of the campus Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity. "There aren't many students here that will argue that college kids drink more than anyone else."

The study included participation in the greek community as the only listed student activity. It cited a 15 percent rise in binge drinking since 1993 and a 53 percent change in greek abstainers.

"The survey in the respective years. The study defines binge drinking as consuming five or more drinks in a row for men and four or more for women."

His hand is bigger than my face. I'm serious. He's 6-foot-9. I'm 5-feet-9. He bench presses 360 pounds. I weigh 95 pounds. But in the day I spent with Etan Thomas, Syracuse's hulking center, I learned that our worlds seem complete contrasts, our daily adventures are quite similar.

Get this, doubters: Etan and his Syracuse teammates are normal guys. After practice on March 8, we walked through Manhattan a day before SU's first-round matchup with Georgetown and saw the World Trade Center. The guard there suggested we hit a Chinese restaurant. Problem was, Etan and road roommate Kueth Duany thought he said "Yo Hip." We found our way to the area where we put our tips. But no Yo Hip in sight. Finally, we found the place: Ho Yip—"What kind of name is that?" Etan asked—was a little hole in the wall on a large city block. We went back to the hotel and they showered, still tired from practice. The guys rested for a couple hours and back into the city we went. This time, we hit the Homestead Steak House. Once there, I learned the difference between my hunger and theirs is infinitely different.

I got a big Caesar salad. Etan got a big steak. A BIG steak. It looked like someone killed an entire cow, cooked the thing up and slapped it on Etan's plate. The 60-pound porterhouse steak—mind you, for two people—was so big it would've taken me a week to eat it. He ate it in one sitting.

So our eating habits are dissimilar. But, like everyone else, we run into the occasional absent-minded problem. After dinner, we headed back to the hotel, where Etan realized he forgot his toothbrush. He wondered what to do, not knowing that the front desk would deliver one to the room. "Man, your breath stinks!" yelled Kueth. A polite call down to the front desk fixed that, as a bellboy brought the toothbrush. Etan's breath was fine. He scored 17 points the next day, but SU lost to Georgetown 76-72. Drove of SU fans left Madison Square Garden saddened, but only because their heroes lost a bad game. What they didn't know is that their heroes are just the same as us.
Orangewomen finally earn first win

BY CHRIS SNOW

Scheduling the first-, third- and sixth-ranked teams in the opening three games of its season, the Syracuse women's lacrosse team knew its road to an NCAA Tournament appearance would not be easy.

Three early losses presented more questions than answers. A solid 9-3 win over Notre Dame on Thursday, though, and promising practice sessions have the Orangewomen poised for a deciding three-game week beginning Saturday at UMBC.

“We had turned the ball over a lot and the other team capitalized on those mistakes,” junior attacker Karen Healy said of the disappointing losses. “I think after we beat Notre Dame, we remembered we can win and we have our confidence back.”

A showdown with five-time defending champion Maryland on March 12 offered Syracuse an opportunity to gauge its caliber against the nation's top measuring stick. Remaining within striking distance and scoring only 11-4 at the half, SU allowed five unanswered goals to open the second half en route to a 24-11 loss.

Shining in the loss, Healy and senior attacker Lauren Brady scored three goals apiece, with Healy adding two assists.

“The first half, we were aggressive and played the way we should have,” Miller said. “But (Maryland) scored a series of quick goals, and we started to be unsure of ourselves and were tentative. And when we do that, we get into trouble.”

That wait-and-see SU approach allowed Maryland a significant advantage in possession time and forced the Orangewomen into poor decision-making on offense, Miller said.

SU quickly got back to basics during a matchup with Notre Dame in Florida.

Applying strong defensive pressure to ball carriers, protecting goaltender Clothilde Ewing and tightening up the overall defensive scheme marked the key components of a promising victory over the previously undefeated Irish team, Miller said.

Brady said a stingy defensive showing and stellar goal-tending coupled with offensive success boosted the team's confidence.

“We're getting to where we want to be,” Brady said. “We just have to balance ourselves out in the transition game and know when to settle things down. Defensively, we're trying to stand up the attacker sooner and meet her rather than let her get the shot off.”

In the Notre Dame game, SU showcased the building blocks needed for a successful tournament run, Miller said. She added that last year's team began 0-3 before peaking during a late-season surge.

“That group, however, failed to make the NCAA's. We need our keepers to make saves,” she said, “and I still think our defense needs to communicate better. They were aggressive the way I would like them to be. Last year, the team improved throughout and we were playing our best at the end. We're hoping to build like that.”

Despite pulling Ewing twice this season in losses to Georgetown and Maryland, Miller said the senior goal-tender remains her top option in net.

“She made some nice saves versus Notre Dame, and she finished strong last year,” Miller said. “It's a tough position. But Clo is our starting keeper.”

Ewing acknowledged the losses to Virginia, Georgetown and Maryland as three of her post-college performances, but her confidence remains intact.

“I'm pretty much trying to forget about the first three games,” she said. “There's nothing I can do about that. Notre Dame was really important. Now, I think it's mental focus and it's just having the confidence to know I can do better and move on.”

While the Orangewomen's attack currently averages over nine goals per game, the defense has yet to demonstrate significant advantage in possession.

Success experienced by Brady, Healy and senior Kara Hanover eased the absence of SU's top offensive threat, sophomore defender Carrie Soulsa is increasing her two-way play and stepping into a leadership role, Miller added.

We're an opportunity to climb above the sea-level mark over the course of the next 10 days, Ewing said now is the time for SU to hit its stride.

“It's great for confidence,” Ewing said. “We need three wins, and we'd like to get off those first three. We're going to go into the rest of the season knowing we have to win every game and planning to do just that.”

Scientists have uncovered what they believe to be glaring errors in a patent issued last month to Human Genome Sciences Inc., for a human gene that plays a crucial role in AIDS. The potential setback comes after Human Genome Sciences' stock price soared last month on news that it won a patent on the AIDS gene. But investors have cooled to the high-flying genomics industry in recent weeks in reaction to negative news. The company's description of the gene's sequence, or chemical makeup, contains at least four significant mistakes, according to research scientists, an allegation that legal experts say could allow the company's competitors to attack the patent's validity.

Race matters
The Supreme Court on Monday cast doubt on the future of voluntary moves to integrate the nation's public schools, as it let stand a ruling that bars "racial balancing" by school officials. Under this decision, which arose in a Maryland case, officials may not consider a student's race as a factor in transfers between schools. Since 1980, many large school districts have tried to bring about racial integration through magnet schools and other programs that encourage students to look outside their neighborhoods for education. Typically, more students apply to magnet schools than can be accommodated, and race usually figures into deciding who is admitted.

Trip teaches girls self-respect

A week in Cancun for Spring Break sounded so appealing to us — four friends since high school on a vacation in paradise for the cruelest time of our lives. Somehow, though, we didn't quite fit in.

Spring Break in Cancun is about more than just the place. It's about the mind-set — sunshine and sand for miles. Your toughest choice here are what kind of drink to order and, once the drinks have done their job, discriminating amongst the endless people to find someone to hook-up with.

It's all about the random hook-up. And sitting on the patio of the Carisa Y Palm, and listening to the soundtrack provided by Slices, the bar across the street, I couldn't help but wonder how a random hook-up differs depending on your gender.

It's different for chicks. I refuse to make this an article bashing guys, nor is it my job to defend them. They are accountable for their own actions. I am more interested in the hypocrisy of the female gender as a whole.

Duran Duran, ’80s deserve appreciation

It's the year 2000. The eighties are long gone, and its music is pretty much something to talk about in retrospect and make fun of. Nowadays, Ricky Martin is gyrating his way across the world, The Backstreet Boys are topping the charts and everyone loves Blink 182.

But most people have completely forgotten the essential foundation that pop bands of the
Or, in my own case, what I am thinking. I'm not some mullet who wears stone washed jeans and a headband. I'm just a guy who has a deep-rooted love and respect for the genre of MTV music.
Take Duran Duran, for example. Now there's an eighties band. Their dynamic pop tunes epitomized what it meant to be hip, cool and wanted. More importantly, these songs put the attitudes of an entire decade into a frame of guitars, keyboards, bass and vocals. Duran Duran began as a band whose sole purpose was to become famous rock stars and play huge concerts that would draw thousands of fans from all over. Success is something that they achieved with relative ease, with tremendous hits like "Rio," "Hungry Like the Wolf," "The Reflex" and "Ordinary World." Duran Duran rapidly became one of the biggest pop bands in England, the United States and the world. From their first, self-titled album to their latest release, "Duran Duran" has taken pop music to the next level.

From the point they began to write their first song, Duran Duran has been putting out wonderful pop tunes and remains true to how they look at their music and how they want to be perceived by their audiences. Vocalist Simon Le Bon is more arrogant and full of himself than the majority of rock stars. But his fans absolutely love it—they always have and they always will.

I, for one, got the shivers and started screaming in bliss the last time I saw Duran Duran, with the band strutting on stage to the opening riffs of "The Reflex" and with Simon Le Bon starting off with "you all love me because I'm a fuckin' rock star!" It was divinely full of conceit and everyone knew it, and it absolutely set the mood for an amazing performance.

The next generation
The majority of today's pop music has lost that arrogant edge and pays little or no respect to what a band like Duran Duran has done to shape the face of pop music. You either have your run-of-the-mill boy band with bad pop musicians such as NSYNC, Mariah Carey, Britney Spears and the like.

All these acts are immensely popular and can be heard on radio waves and MTV all over the world, but I feel that they do little in the way of being true pop bands. I've listened to the majority of these bands either blasting out of the window of a first house or on the radio. Sure it's well-produced and very catchy, but it's missing the soul and the arrangement—there is something left of what pop music really is.

Go ahead and turn off the radio, take the Sublime CD out your Discman, dig through those old tapes and records that are probably collecting dust somewhere. Take out the first Duran Duran album that you find and put it in. Let the music flow through you, listen to all of its levels and really, truly listen to what it is. You won't hear just words and instruments, you'll hear the essence of pop music, in the way that it should be.

Go ahead, I dare you to click off the "this is what I want" New York magazine into "voice" and listen to the sound good music. If you don't like it, you can go back to whatever you feel is acceptable, but at least understand that it isn't for bands like Duran Duran. The face of pop music today would be blank. People tend to forget that it was '70s high time that respect be paid.

Rock on with your ball self.
There's no music like eighties music.

Our gender is a walking contradiction. Women like myself exist within the same gender marker as the women who have no self-respect. I've found that there are more little righteous girls preaching to everyone.

"I had my fair share of random hook-ups, I just want to go back to the whole Spring Break mentality," Le Bon, one of MVTs preferred male-front men said of the wet T-shirt contest that lasts for more than a half hour. By the time the girls get to the final round, it's not enough to take your shirt off— you've got to get really outrageous at this point and lick yourself or make out with other contestants.

Girls grind with each other on the stage at Senor Frogs. They strut out onto the top stage at Coco Bongo and flash the audience. Am I the only one who is confused by this?

Women like myself east within the same contradiction. Women like myself struggle with the idea that men are comfortable with your body.

It has taken me a long time to be comfortable with my body, and I consider that an accomplishment. But it seems to me that some of those girls, who are more than willing to take their clothes off, are the first guy who asks, merely have issues with their bodies and think approval from guys will give them the esteem they lack. Maybe they just don't give a shit, and then the whole thing comes down to self-respect. I have the utmost respect for my clothes on and that people treat you as some one can't expect a guy to actually ask my name before he shoves his hand down your pants or gives you the finger at the opening of a little club.

Am I a party-pooper? Am I just that girl from your own yard? I was starting to feel that way.

The hell that has happened to our society when I feel guilty for expecting someone to take enough time to ask my name? It's no wonder guys think women are such a paradox. The idea of being reduced to sex symbols in the media, and about the injury of being treated like that, doesn't let them get away with it. So go ahead, get up on that bar and shake your bon-bon. God knows I did enough over Spring Break. Some pretty girls are comfortable with your body. If you don't want me to think twice before you flash that crowd or start grinding with the girl who walks by you, then you can't blame guys for disrespecting it.

Against the Wildcats, the duo combined for 18 points and four 3-pointers, along with seven rebounds and four assists.

Shumpert's two triples came at key points in the Kentucky triumph. He shot with 36.8 seconds played like '70s disco as the Orangemen's tournament hopes were stayin' alive.

Williams added 26 minutes in only his second NCAA Tournament game and insisted that despite his youth, there were no pre-game butterflies in his stomach.

For Shumpert, his role is what remains important. Not his starting lineup status.

"We've had depth all year long, and it's just helped us," Shumpert said. "Any given night could be any given guy coming off the bench and scoring. We're looking for a mix to help us win."

I don't really worry about it (starting) much. It doesn't matter if you come off or if you start. It matters what you do in the game. Either way it goes, I'm playing, so I'm happy.

Against Kentucky, starting center Etan Thomas found himself foul trouble and the Wildcats' zone defense tightened up. Williams and Shumpert earned extra time and took advantage.

Both shooters, along with their teammates, need to better their 31.7 shooting percentage as a team against Kentucky to have a chance against Michigan State, Hart said.

The zone SU faced against the Wildcats may not be an option against the Spartans, who play a similarly man-to-man.

In that situation, Shumpert and Williams will have another opportunity to be successful, Boeheim said. Thomas tends to find himself in foul trouble against zones and the bench players squeeze more shots in those scenarios.

But to count out Syracuse sans Thomas has been a mistake too many have made.

"When (Thomas) has been out and hasn't been able to play, somebody makes plays," Boeheim said. "Some people said that we couldn't win any games without Etan Thomas. That's obviously been proven wrong all year long. If something happens and he gets in foul trouble, we'll do our best to try and win the ball game."

The numbers (Shumpert 10.4 ppg, Williams 6.3 ppg) are apparent. The individual accolades, however, remain low priority to SU's top reserves.

Despite the SportsCenter highlights from his recent game-winner, Shumpert would rather see a win against Michigan State than another night as a hero.

For the freshman Williams, who has struggled at times to get off the bench this season, a win means more than an impressive highlight.

"The win is what excites me the most," Williams said. "I could score no points and not even go out there, as long as we win. That's all that counts right now."

Difficult weekend plagues SU softball

BY JASON REMILLARD
Staff Writer

Syracuse head softball coach Mary Parkin said she described her team's experience in Alabama and Florida as the "road trip from hell.

The Orange women lost 10 of 13 contests against Missouri, Alabama and Florida, and were led by a 11-day span in Alabama and Florida, but the voyage has not been the most strenuous aspect of the Spring season.

The team was stranded in the Tampa, Fla., airport for six hours and in Atlanta's for 12, where they slept Sunday night. Also, the team's luggage was lost and, upon return, damaged.

Our team was pretty laid back about it," freshman infielder Rachel Park said. "Everything that could have happened did, but we were able to laugh about it."

On the field, the Orange women (7-13) struggled offensively. Seven of their losses were shutouts, and the lack of run support ruined several strong pitching outings by freshmen Tiff DiMaggio and junior Maryse Biemian.

DiMaggio struck out seven and allowed only two hits in a 4-2 loss to host South Florida on Saturday in the Clearwater Parks and Rec Tournament. Only one of the four USF runs was earned.

"I don't know if we were trying too hard or what the answer is," Park said. "We had some great pitching performances, and we still wound up losing." SU's offensive inefficiency was most obvious in a 1-0 loss to Northern Illinois on St. Patrick's Day. Kristen Collins and Leah Hansen each went 2-for-3, but no runs resulted. The Redbirds broke the scoreless ties in extra innings.

"We just got so nervous," Park said. "We were putting so much pressure on ourselves in the box to get runs across the board."

The next day after DiMaggio's strong showing in the USF loss, the Orange broke out the bats for 11 runs in the second inning in a 13-3 rout of Seton Hall. Proving the SU bats were not completely dead.

Despite the subpar record, the Orange women held their own against tough competition, Park said. Four of SU's six games in Alabama early in the road trip came against Crimson Tide.

The Orange lost to No. 15 Bama 3-1 and 4-0 in the Crimson Tide Classic on March 11 and 12. But by the time the two teams squared off in a doubleheader on March 15 in Tuscaloosa, the Orange women were the gap.

In the opener of the twin bill, the Orange took the Tide to 10 innings before DiMaggio gave up her second home run of the game to Alabama's Kirsten Freuen for a heart-breaking 2-1 defeat. Alabama completed the sweep with a 3-0 win in the nightcap.

"We found out we could hold our own," Park said. "We easily could have won that game."

"We just have to come out of every game the same way we play to our own ability," Syracuse's other two victories were a 6-0 decision over Fordham on Thursday and a 3-1 win over Radford on March 11.

"Some of the games we did lose, we played very well and just ended up on the short end at the end," Park said. "We didn't come to play on some of the days, but our focus was not in the right area."

However, Park said she thinks the team's future is bright. As the right direction going into this week's tournament in Southern Illinois.

SU will not be the only first-year program at the tournament, as Western Kentucky joins the Orange.

But the weekend should hold extra significance for Fimbach, who returns to alma mater, where she was inducted into the Carrier Dome Hall of Fame.

"We think we're okay," Fimbach said. "We easily could have won that game."

"I think that's what we're lacking."

He reinvigorated a sinking Spartan ship upon his return, providing unmatchable spark and leadership.

"As I look back on the Mateen Cleaves ordeal, it was a situation where more than I even thought to play at the level he wanted to play for us to be successful," Izzo said.

"I give him credit that he battled through it and found ways to take games on his shoulder and win them."

So Cleaves: "When you're a senior, it's just urgent. When you get down like that, you're thinking that this can be your last time on the floor."

The Spartans are a senior-dominated team, joining Cleaves are fellow seniors All-American Morris Peterson and forward A.J. Granger. Peterson scored 18.7 points and scooped 6.3 rebounds per game. Granger, a big man with a touch — he shot 40-for-80 on 3-pointers — scored 9.1 points per contest.

Mix in juniors Charlie Bell (12.3 ppg) and Andre Hutson (10 ppg) and you have a lethal offense. Forget about that, though. The real place the Spartans control the game is in the glass.

MSU outrebounds its opponents by an astronomical 12.4 per game, a number that led the nation. The box score is balanced too — Peterson's 6.3 a game lead the team.

"When we're not shooting the ball well, the rebounds are going to be there," Blackwell said. "Myself and Etan (Thomas) and Damone Brown used our quickness to get around the big guys." For a stuck, MSU is quick too, with swingmen Mike Chessell and Jason Richardson as good as any bench players in the nation. The Spartans also benefit from the quickness of Anangoye and Ballinger.

The raw talent finally jelled — they return Western Michigan and Kansas without its point man, the Spartans lost games to West Virginia, Arizona and Kentucky.

MSU run off three victories in a row with Cleaves back. A loss to Ohio State followed, but the team won five consecutive, capping the streak with an 85-66 dismantling of Connecticut.

The Spartans' last defeat was their 81-79 overtime loss to Indiana. They're still alive in the NCAA Tournament, though, the most important task come March.

"After seeing some of these teams get beat," Izzo said, "I have a greater appreciation of what we've done."

What they did is run through the regular season and the Big Ten Tournament and, possibly, the rest of the nation.

They face Syracuse and its tough 6-3 zone defense, which worries Izzo.

"The zone gives you problems because you don't know how to attack it," Izzo said. "You don't know how not to be important.

The Utah win, though, was an important step in the Spartans' quest to better its Final Four run of last season.

The victory served a distinct purpose, Izzo said. While 20 of MSU's victories this season have been by 15 points or more, the close call allowed his team to experience an important tight-game situation.

"The key to winning the whole thing is that you have to win games in different ways," Izzo said.

"When Duke was blowing everyone out last year, people said, 'If you can just keep them close, you have a chance to win,' and of course that happened."
Bench provides spark

With the score deadlocked at 50 in its second-round NCAA Tournament contest, Syracuse looked past its starting five to an unlikely hero waiting in the right corner.

Despite a poor shooting performance, the Orangemen would prevail — thanks largely in part to their Grand Canyon deep bench — and sixth man Preston Shumpert’s game-winning shot.

With its trio of starting seniors, Etan Thomas, Ryan Blackwell and Jason Hart, held to only 24 points against Kentucky, the Orangemen looked down the pipe for production, a theme that has traveled with SU (26-8) as the season has progressed.

“We have great balance from our bench all year,” starting guard Tony Bland said. “They’ve been giving us a lot of things that we needed from them all year. Coming off the bench, giving us great scoring and contributing when we need it.”

With a matchup against No. 1-seeded Michigan State looming Thursday, Syracuse will once again need bench production if it hopes to advance to the Elite Eight.

The Spartans face the Orangemen in a Sweet 16 contest that will feature two of the deepest benches remaining in the tournament. The Spartans’ bench, led by freshman Jason Richardson and Duke transfer Mike Chappell, can play competitively with most starting fives in the country.

“Richardson is a tremendous freshman, one of the best freshmen in the country,” Syracuse head coach Jim Boeheim said. “He’s a great talent. But they’ve got a lot of guys that can come in and hurt you and play well.”

While it’s true that Syracuse possesses quite a few weapons of its own.

“I don’t really feel we’re underdogs,” the captain said. "A lot of people say that because they’re ranked higher than us. Earlier in the year, we were playing just as good as they are now.

“I don’t feel that we’re overly matched or that we’re outnumbered. I think that pound-for-pound we’re just as good as them.”

Sophomore sharpshooter Skupert and freshman DeShaun Williams, two of the Orangemen’s most dangerous offensive weapons, constantly terrorize opponents coming off the pine.

Mateen Cleaves is not particularly big nor is he known for his strength.

But Michigan State’s 6-foot-2 point guard carried the Spartans on his back Saturday, leading a 27-7 second-half run to help defeat Utah 73-61.

MSU, the Midwest Region’s No. 1 seed, advanced to the regional semifinals and will face Syracuse on Friday in Auburn Hills, Mich., 82 miles from the school’s campus.

“If I could pick one team, I’d be the jockey for that horse,” said Utah coach Rick Majerus. “We’ve played the national champion four times in this tournament. These guys have the look of a national champ.”

“They’re awful deep down. There’s a reason they are seeded No. 1. I really like their team. They must be fun to coach them.”

MSU head coach Tom Izzo concurs. The fifth-year head man led the Spartans to a 26-7 regular-season record, recovering from an ugly 9-4 start, which included an unlikely loss to perennial powerhouse Wright State.

Cleaves is to thank for the resurgence. A foot injury kept him out of MSU’s first 15 games.

Although first-round games produced few surprises, second-round NCAA Tournament action was both exciting and unpredictable. Two of the four top seeds were not only home, not to mention the third No. 2 seeds and two No. 3 seeds that earned an early exit.

AUROII HILLS, Mich. — Six days after St. Patrick's Day, the Palace at Auburn Hills is still echoing with cheers for Duke and Florida. The Syracuse men's basketball team faces Michigan State University tonight at 7:30 p.m. in the NCAA Midwest Regional on a neutral court, just one hour away from the MSU campus.

Local and national businesses are stocking their shelves, hoping that Syracuse University will survive another week of March Madness. SU's student newspaper during the March 13 incident, an unidentified man broke into the senior's apartment and beat her with a clothing iron. The victim had just gotten out of the shower and walked into her bedroom when she noticed her dresser drawer open and belongings displaced. She then observed a gloved hand reaching through the door and attempted to force the door open.

The intruder pushed his way into the bedroom and proceeded to beat the student with the iron. The victim was then taken to Crouse Hospital, 736 Irving Ave., where she received 96 stitches and 10 staples to close her wounds.

The case is currently being investigated by the Syracuse Police Department, Detective Carl Schmidt said.

Three other SU seniors were robbed at gunpoint March 7 on the same block of Ackerman. The students were approached by a man who asked them for money. When they refused, the man reached into his sweatshirt pocket, pulled out what appeared to be an automatic handgun.

The dark messages were a call to universi-ty officials to improve student safety off the campus, Mustlmanto said.

Students and residents on the 800 block of Ackerman Avenue demonstrated their disapproval of Syracuse University safety policies early Wednesday morning.

One graduate student disputes his inability to receive benefits under SU’s Adoption Assistance Reimbursement Plan.

BY CAROLINE CHEN Staff Writer

The homeless children roaming the streets of South America, shining shoes and begging for scraps of food at restaurants distressed Syracuse University graduate student Brian Selmeski as he conducted research for his dissertation in Ecuador.

With many of these children leaving orphanages by the age of seven and turning to a life on the streets, Selmeski and his wife, Nori, decided to try to adopt an Ecuadorian baby.

Hoping to ease the financial strain of the estimated $3,000 adoption, Selmeski said he turned to SU and looked into a benefit that reimburses parents $5,000 for an adoption.

But Selmeski said his request for financial help was not considered by the Office of Human Resources. Instead, he was informed that the Adoption Assistance Reimbursement Plan applies only to full-time and part-time employees — not graduate assistants.

“It seems that either the university administration has a false image of graduate students, their goals and dreams, or is simply too cheap to afford us the same degree of support they provide other employees,” said Selmeski, a university fellow. “I ask the administration, why not begin treating graduate assistants like grown-ups and afford us the same respect, assistance and recommendations we provide other university employees?”

Acting like a foster parent, Selmeski has had custody of 3-month-old Joaquin David for two months. Joaquin was abandoned at birth by his mother — a single, teenage, Ecuadorian woman — because she could not support him financially.

“By adopting one child, we save him from a life of poverty, exploitation and misery,” Selmeski said, looking forward to a formal adoption.

Working with a small budget of personal savings and research grants, Brian and Nori Selmeski plan to adopt Joaquin during their stay in Ecuador because they cannot afford a regular international adoption, which costs between $15,000 and $25,000.

Selmeski said he already spent about $6,000 on the adoption and will likely spend at least $3,000 more.

“How much easier this would have been if only we had the same support that other university employees and their families have,” he said.

Qualifying employees can be reimbursed up to $5,000 in costs incurred during the adoption process, under a benefit that went into effect July 1, 1998.

SU developed the adoption benefit “to provide assistance to all employees who are building families,” according to the Adoption Assistance Reimbursement Plan. But graduate, teaching and research assistants are ineligible.

A committee examined adoption programs at other universities and decided the benefit would be valuable at SU, said Neil Strodel, associate vice president of Human Resources.

“We wanted our benefits program to have the look and feel of a family-friendly program,” Strodel said. Only full-time and part-time employees who work a minimum of 20 hours a week for SU are eligible.

SU pays for preventive dental benefits for full-time and part-time employees. Employees can choose from the following plans, which can also be expanded to include the employee’s partner and children:

The preventive plan, with a maximum annual benefit of $500, covers all preventive dental services, including oral examinations, teeth cleaning and X-rays.

The comprehensive dental plan, which carries a $16.31 monthly cost for the employee, has a maximum annual benefit of $1,000 per person. This plan covers all preventive services and additions including fillings, bridges and dentures.

Dental care benefits elude SU graduate students

BY CAROLINE CHEN Staff Writer

Graduate Student Organization senators confronted the Syracuse University administration last year about the lack of dental benefits for graduate assistants.

They were told, however, that administration officials and Neil Strodel, associate vice president of SU Human Resources, would consider the proposal. It would cost the university $100,000 to provide dental insurance for them, he added.

About $15 million is spent by the university yearly on benefits for the 48,000 benefi-cies-eligible employees, Strodel said. Dental insurance benefits are limited to full-time and permanent part-time employees who work a minimum of 20 hours per week for at least a year.

The existing $150,000 graduate assistant benefit program, which includes group medical insurance, covers 1,000 graduate assistants, he added.

“It’s money well spent because we want to have a benefits program to attract the best people,” Strodel said. “But we only have so much money in the pot.”

But former GSO President Zac Moore said it is not right that he cannot afford dental insurance — and noted that his father is a dentist.

“We are like every other employee in that we require the living wage, dental, health and a decent life,” said Moore, an international relations and social science graduate student.

Moore, the center of controversy earlier this year when he accused a professor of plagiarism, was one in a group of senators who brought the issue before Human Resources in February 1999.

University revenues finance graduate and employee benefits, Strodel said. Sixty percent of SU’s total revenue comes from student tuition, said Lou Marcocci, senior vice president of business, finance and administration.

at least a year qualify for the benefit.

By definition, graduate assistants are not entitled to full-time or part-time employees, regardless of how many hours they work, Strodel said.

"Graduate assistants are really students first and employees second," he said.

Instead of looking at individual benefits, SU should sit down and look at the whole picture, said Eric Hunn, Graduate Student Organization president.

Graduate assistants should not be eligible for every benefit full-time and part-time employees receive, said Hunn, a law and public administration graduate student. It would be inappropriate, for example, if graduate assistants asked for retirement benefits, he added.

Financial infeasibility is the main reason for denying graduate assistant benefits, Strodel said.

"The bottom line is we have to have a funding source," he said. "It all comes down to that." But denying graduate assistants the adoption benefit is an unfair double standard, Selmeski said, because graduate assistants are not entitled to the adoption benefit program even though their families receive medical coverage.

SU's medical coverage paid for the prenatal care, birth and temporary hospitalization of Selmeski's biological daughter, Amelia Selmeski, now two years old, Selmeski said.

"Why doesn't the university understand that adoption is basically the same process?" Selmeski asked.

Faculty in the anthropology department first mentioned the adoption benefit to Selmeski and have been very supportive of his struggle to adopt, he said.

"I worked my butt off," Selmeski said. "How ridiculous that gives all the hours I have dedicated to teaching and service, the university would not assist my family in fulfilling a lifelong dream."

As an SU employee and fellow, Selmeski worked as a teaching assistant in three sections of introductory anthropology courses from Fall 1997 to Spring 1999. He also helped reorganize the Latin American studies program and created WebCT, the anthropology department.

Selmeski is great with his students, said Doug Armstrong, chairman of the anthropology department. He is "someone we rely on for almost anything," Armstrong added.

"We stand behind him and his wife," Armstrong said. "It's very important to him and we're excited for them."

Eight SU employees have already taken advantage of the adoption benefit, said Sheri Masse, benefits systems administrator in Human Resources.

Carol Liebler, director of the graduate program in public communications, and Cheryl Ficarra, associate dean in the College of Law, both adopted daughters from China last year and will apply for the $5,000 reimbursement.

Because the university requires U.S. documents, however, they must wait until the adoptions through New York state are finalized.

The benefit is welcomed because the adoption process is so expensive, said Liebler, who estimated the total adoption cost at $20,000.

"It's a wonderful benefit," Ficarra added.

But Selmeski said financial struggles and the Ecuadorian government's regulations on domestic adoptions have hindered the adoption process.

Because of a two-year residency requirement for foreigners living and adopting in Ecuador, Selmeski must stay in the country 18 more months before the government will allow him to finalize the adoption.

With financial assistance from SU, he would have been able to do a typical international adoption and avoid the residency requirement, Selmeski said.

Selmeski and Ficarra's daughter, 18-month-old Anyi Elena Liebler-Bendis, was found abandoned in the Hunan province.

Until he reaches the two-year requirement, he said he hopes that no unforeseen complications in Ecuador — such as his lawyer being jailed or government officials suddenly turning against his case — will result in losing custody of Joaquin.

"We feel like we're walking on eggshells."

DENTAL
continued from page 3 and administrative services. To the SRO, Strodel said SU is unable to raise the money needed to pay for graduate assistant dental benefits.

"It comes back to who's going to pay for it," he said.

The company that provides dental insurance to most SU employees, New York City-based The Guardian Life Insurance Company of America, was also reluctant to cover graduate students, Strodel said.

"Grads tend to come and go," added SU lacks the funding to provide benefits for every group on campus, Strodel said. But desired benefits excluded by university policy are constantly reviewed, he added.

Although graduate assistants do not receive dental benefits, they are entitled to medical insurance — a benefit implemented more than four years ago when other colleges did not.

"We feel that it's adequate for that group of people," Strodel said.

Although providing graduate assistants with dental insurance benefits may be too expensive, the university could search for less expensive packages, current GSO President Eric Hunn said.

It's just a question of valuing our teaching assistants," he said.

Although graduate assistants should be entitled to dental benefits, they are not just university employees but students as well, he added.

"We need to be reasonable," he said. "We're here for the specific mission of educating ourselves."

Chung-Chih Li, a computer science doctoral student, said SU should ease the financial burden of dental fees.

Li, who has studied at SU for five years, said he supports his wife and two sons by working as a teaching assistant. He has no dental insurance for himself or his family.

Three years ago, Li spent $2,000 for a root canal, but yearly dental fees average about $1,000 for his family, he said.

"The salary of a TA of course is not enough to cover everything, least of all dental," Li said.

While graduate assistants are not considered full-time or part-time employees, they deserve some of the benefits because they provide a lot of services, Hunn said.

"If students are here for five to seven years working on PhDs, it just doesn't seem fair," he said.

TAs are students before employees

They grade papers, take exams and raise families. They sit in the center of the gulf between professors and students. They are graduate student teaching assistants. Although they are here to study, just like the thousands of undergraduates on campus, they also trade their services as teaching assistants for a stipend and a generous medical benefits package.

Not a bad deal, especially when some graduate students attend school for free, on the dime of employers or fellow students.

TAs at colleges nationwide have recently attempted to unionize in order to solidify their rights as employees at their respective universities and receive benefits similar to full-time workers.

And an SU TA recently sought the university's help during an international adoption process. He was denied the right to the $5,000 adoption reimbursement offered to full-time university employees.

But SU's TAs comprise only a small percentage of the 3,200 full-time graduate students. And so far, very few students have come forward requesting larger benefit packages.

Graduate students don't warrant special treatment from the university. If TAs' deals were, in fact, sweetened with fringe benefit deals equal to those of other full-time employees, the costs would most likely be covered by tuition increases. And undoubtedly, undergrads would be hit square in the wallets — hardly a fair trade.

While graduate students do face unique challenges — many are older and have families to provide for — the eventual rewards of higher education require some sacrifices in the meantime.

The fact remains that graduate school is a levying experience, a natural extension of undergraduate education.

It's not, however, an opportunity to snatch benefits that aren't even offered in many of the nation's workplaces.

Covert intelligence operations undermine democracy

During the latest winters of the Cold War, the US government developed the most advanced and extensive system of communications in human history. With everything from simple phone taps to electronic surveillance to the Internet, our government can now literally read newspapers from space, spy on phone conversations, and even read your e-mails — a surveillance network that spans the globe.

The National Security Agency and the Central Intelligence Agency are the Agencies of the Intelligence Community that have the most direct access to this spy network. As many Americans know, these agencies operate in a clandestine manner, often denying their actions in the interests of "national security." While these organizations do handle many sensitive military matters, the legislative and judicial oversight of them is clearly insufficient.

In a book entitled "Secret Power," and a series of articles published on the Internet in 1996, investigative reporter Nicky Hager revealed the secrets of the NSA's ECHELON computer network, which purportedly sifts through private electronic communications — including all telephone communications and e-mails — to target potential terrorists or conspirators.

Hager draws from over 50 sources from New Zealand Intelligence who worked closely with US, British, Canadian and Australian intelligence forces during the Cold War to detail how the ECHELON network uses government satellites to intercept electronic messages.

The system scans all of this information for key words and phrases, which could include words such as "bomb" or "terrorists" and phrases like "all the president's men," or "key messages" and forwards them to those sentinels for further review. According to Hager it was "designed primarily for military intelligence operations, businesses, and individuals worldwide.

Though it was initially developed to monitor Soviet activities during the Cold War, ECHELON is now used for commercial espionage in favor of US defense contractors and to monitor political dissidents, Hager claims.

Of course, the NSA denies the existence of ECHELON. But if these allegations prove to be true, US Intelligence has perpetrated its most despicable scheme since the days of J. Edgar Hoover.

In response to recent information about ECHELON, the American Civil Liberties Union established an "ECHELON watch" page on their Web site (www.aclu.org). In an open letter to Congress dated last April, the ACLU said, "by its very nature, ECHELON may involve the interception of communications involving Americans in the United States, without a court order." The letter also pointed out that various federal regulations and portions of the Bill of Rights that such surveillance would violate.

The French government is currently suing the government for the US and Canada for allegations that ECHELON was used to help US corporations underbid French defense contractors. British Parliament member George Sarre said, "The participation of the United Kingdom in spying on its European partners for and with the US raises serious questions." In the wake of all this public attention, the US House Appropriations Committee on Intelligence requested the release of certain legal documents from the CIA and NSA. The Agencies responded with a denial on the grounds of attorney-client privilege. Prompted by this stonewall attempt, Congress amended its funding for the NSA to require the publication of a report on the legal standards used in surveillance.

In theory the report promises answers that the American people are entitled to, not holding my breath. Controversy over National Security tends to blow over in three stages. First, the government denies the existence of the problem. This is easy because all the evidence above a circumstantial level is classified. Then, overwhelmed by mounting allegations, Congress calls the Select Committee on Bureaucratic Nonsense to investigate.

The Committee asks for a report from the Agency for Reality Slow Publications. Months later, the report that concludes this process is so mired in government jargon that no one can tell it's a lie.

Finally, after the next Administration has entered office, more sensitive information is leaked to the public. The scandal comes out, and it can all be conveniently blamed on the previous administration's evil tactics. See in this case the Zachry story, or former US Attorney General Janet Reno's President for details.

I understand why it's unwise for the military to broadcast their primary bombing targets on the evening news during war time, but the NSA's power to operate unreviwed is out of control. Intelligence information may be essential to foreign policy at times, but covert domestic surveillance without judicial oversight is in violation of the US Constitution, and unchecked military power undermines the most fundamental principles of democracy.

Ackerman crime victim

To the editor:

I feel personally insulted by Monday's editorial cartoon portraying last weekend's assault on Ackerman as a victim.

It isn't just because I'm a friend of the victim, that's completely beside the point. There was absolutely as reason to choose that story, or at least depict it in that way, as comic relief. You're not just depicting her. I live on that street and feel vulnerable because of the crime alone. The visual image of it makes me even more afraid. I wonder if the point was to make people afraid enough to do something about it, or did it have to use the victim in the process? She had to live theにとっては acceptable and cope. Then, sitting in class one day she leisurely glanced through The Daily Orange and sees her experience is published and almost ridiculed. Surprise!

I agree with the point of the

the lack of interest, GSO President Eric Hunn said. Many students are not even aware of their full benefits, he added.

Doctoral students, for example, are often so immersed in their research that they lack a strong political sense, he said. Graduate positions on university boards are difficult to fill because students find it hard to invest an hour a month to fill a position on the Board of Graduate Studies — the governing branch for graduate students, he added.

Graduate students simply aren't passionate about our issues and or don't want to invest time,” Hunn said. “Thus, SU will never unionize until a hot button issue comes up or a lot of graduate students get excited enough to pull it together.”

When graduates encounter problems, they often turn to GSO. The body often serves as a mediator between students and the university, he added.

GSO members often serve on a variety of boards, campus-wide to defend their interests, including about 11 students on the Board of Graduate Studies, nine members on the University Senate and a representative on SU’s Board of Trustees.

Johnson added that because GSO serves in this mediation role, a union is not necessary. Only when students stop filling university board positions will a union be needed, he said.

The benefits offered to graduate students compelled Johnson to enroll at SU — reflecting another reason why a union is not foremost on their minds, he said.

“For one thing, SU does offer a large majority of graduates good benefits,” he said. Most graduates are entitled to health benefits, such as hospital visits or prenatal care, which can also apply to their family. Although graduates are entitled to many of the benefits allotted to employees, a union would still not be beneficial.

“I fear a union would throw a wrench into the relationship we have with the university,” he said.

MICHAEL JOHNSON
secretary of the Syracuse University Graduate Student Organization

“Although forming a union is not foremost on the minds of graduate students on campus, other national colleges are grappling with unionization issues.

The eight-year struggle to legalize the Graduate Employees’ Organization as the official collective bargaining unit of graduate students at the University of Illinois overcame another obstacle last week, said Charles Allen, co-president of GEO and a geography graduate student.

With an overwhelming majority of students agreeing that graduates should have union representation to address their concerns, Allen said the university still refused to recognize their organization.

The university’s refusal, however, cited a legal glitch preventing GEO from becoming the official union for graduate students.

“It’s a legal question,” said Michael Loui, professor of electrical and computer engineering and associate dean of the graduate college at the University of Illinois. “Students are not allowed to form collective bargaining units.”

An education labor law in Illinois prevents students from forming unions, he added.

University of Illinois does not automatically recognize campus groups that wish to form unions, he added. Although the university clerical staff is currently unionized, the university was hesitant to recognize them as a formal collective bargaining unit during that staff’s first attempts in the 1980s for representation.

Tampering with the faculty-student relationship is another area of concern with the university where professors should act as mentors and not as a member of management, Loui said.

“It should be a collegial relationship, not an employee relation,” he said.

But Allen said a union is needed because graduates do act as employees. Graduates also should have more influence in issues that directly affect them, he added.

“On one hand we are students, but we are clearly employees,” he said. “We want an actual say and the university closes its doors.”

With graduate assistants taking on more responsibilities, the role of a union becomes more important to make sure teaching assistants in one department are not carrying more of a workload then another.”

Doctoral students, for example, said David Friedman, law student and president of the Graduate Assembly at the University of California at Berkeley.

Although the United Auto Workers have been representing University of California graduate students for about the past 10 years, elections were conducted last semester asking graduate students if they wanted the Association of Graduate Student Employees — the educational arm of the UAW — to act as their collective bargaining unit.

With the graduates at the University of California schools voting in favor of this new agreement, the university was supposed to negotiate a new contract. "A provision Friedman alleged it never pursued.

“They were not negotiating in good faith,” he said.

University of California officials could not be reached for comment.

The union filed 40 unfair labor charges against the university and members voted to strike this week during finals, but the strike was cancelled March 15 after the university filed unfair labor practice charges against the union. The university, however, did agree to engage in a 3-week mediation period with a third party.

Probe into Bird Library sicknesses to continue

BY EVANS BOSTON

Studies of the air quality in Bird Library will continue after employees protested Wednesday a University Senate vote to end the testing.

The Senate Agenda Committee asked USen's Committee on Administrative Operations to review several air quality concerns expressed by SU employees of the library last year, according to an AdOp report.

The 14 members of the committee voted unanimously to end the study of the air quality in Bird, the report said.

"We reported on our recommendation," said David Bennett, chairman of AdOp.

"You can't test air after hyperventilation," she said.

Air testing was also intentionally skewed by hyperventilating the library in the days prior to quality tests, Gewanter said.

"There are blatant lies in the report issued by the Administrative Operations," Gewanter said.

"Gewanter has worked with library employees and is involved with a committee of library staff," she said.

AdOp stated that they have "adequately responded" and have done what is "required by law" in their report. But this is not enough, Gewanter said in a response to the report.

"All the university wants to deal with is the fact that there is no problem," Gewanter said.

"The library's ventilation system is not running as well as described in the report," Gewanter said.

"The system sometimes causes negative pressure in the building, allowing carcinogenic fumes from cleaning and repair to circulate, she added.

"We are unsure what further actions will take place," Carter said. "Nothing definitive happened at the meeting."

Graduates question basketball ticket policies

BY ASHLEIGH GRAF
Staff Writer
Alumni are debating on Internet message boards about the lack of special preference given to Syracuse University graduates in the distribution and sale of tickets for NCAA Tournament games.

Some SU alumni are unhappy that they are not given preferential treatment over the general public in ticket sales, said 1991 graduate Rick Sauter, president of the Washington, D.C. SU Alumni Club and a participant in the message board discussion.

But Syracuse area residents have paid taxes and given donations that helped build the Carrier Dome, while many SU graduates were not even fans of the Orangemen until they first attended the university, he added.

"The local population also has a right," Sauter said. "There are a lot of local residents who have supported the team for 30-odd years, so what about them?"

Jennifer Butler, who graduated last year, agreed that alumni have no more of a right to tickets than the general public. Even if preference was to be given to alumni, there would be no way to determine who would be the first graduates to receive the tickets, she added.

"Well, who decides who does that?" she asked. "If we look at the class of `99 alone, there aren't enough tickets. So should we go by major or rank?"

Although the alumni are upset about the methods used to distribute tickets, the Syracuse University Men's Basketball Media Guide statistics showed tickets are becoming more available.

Average ticket sales at the Dome have steadily declined since an NCAA-record-high 29,919 in the 1989-1990 men's basketball season. The average number of seats sold for the 1998-1999 season was 20,800, according to the guide.

Some current SU students have not been able to obtain unwanted tickets after they purchased them and then changed their plans.

"Since they are really bad seats, I thought that was only fair," he said, adding that there were some students he talked to about buying his tickets who expressed no interest in the game.

"A few people have said, 'Why would I want to go?'" he said.

But on Thursday, she will root for her cousin, with whom she spoke family doesn't ask questions — we understand.

Each school participating in the Midwest Regional is allocated 200 tickets for students. The Palace has sold out its more than 19,000 seats. However, fans may search for tickets on the auction Web site eBay and among expected scalpers outside The Palace, who will try to sell the $35 to $70 seats for prices rumored at $450 to $1,400. Scalpers have sold the $35 to $70 seats for prices outside The Palace, who will try to sell the tickets on the auction Web site eBay.

But Jason Hart said the game will only benefit the Spartans.

"It's a win-win situation for us," said Hart. "MSU standout point guard Mateen Cleaves said although the venue is not home, the state support will only benefit the Spartans. "It's cool to be around and be close to home, but it's not the Breslin Center," Cleaves said of MSU's home court. "I hope everyone around the state comes together as one big family. We beat up on Michigan earlier in the season but, hopefully, they can all come together."

While Michigan State lost to Duke in the Final Four last year, a win would be victory party turned into a riot, generating several arrests and expulsions from the university, said Mike LePe, who was hit by a beer bottle during the riots.

"I thought it was just going to be a little party, but it got wild," LePe said. "It was unreal."

Last year's riots prompted a more relaxed situation this season from MSU head coach Tom Izzo to all of Michigan State's 40,000 students. He urged them to act responsibly throughout the tournament.

"As fellow members of the Spartan team, join us as we strive to be champions on and off the court," Izzo wrote. "You are the best. I want everyone to know what I know. Spartans act with class."

Whether or not his SU team wins or loses tonight, Greg Steen will accept the final score with class because his wife, an SU alumna, will be wearing green, he said.

Steen, a former defensive end for the SU football team and a 1974 graduate, lives in Michigan with his wife. Steen's father, Jim, was an All-American football player before his son was orange and blue.

"It's a win-win situation for me," Steen said. "If we win, which we might, or if Michigan State wins, which they might — especially with the home court — I'll be happy because my wife will be happy."

"My wife has green and white blood, but my blood only runs orange."
Student hospitalized after attack outside Fours

Staff Reports

After being attacked early Wednesday morning by two men outside 44's Tavern, a Syracuse University student received treatment for several minor injuries, according to a police report.

The student was waiting for his friend outside the tavern at 113 Marshall St. when two unidentified men exited the tavern and told him not to stand on the sidewalk. When the student did not leave the area, the two men, both wearing 44's jackets, punched him several times in his head and body, the report said.

The owner of the tavern could not be reached for comment.

Following the attack, the student went to an unidentified hospital, the report added.

Companies print out two different designs for the two teams that will advance to the championship. About 2,000 copies of each shirt design are printed out and sent to Total Sports, Cuomo said.

Once the outcome of the final game is known, the shirts from the losing team are destroyed and the companies put their machines into mass production for the winning team's gear, he said.

This way, merchandise for the winning team will be available for those who have placed early orders, Cuomo said.

More SU wins would inevitably lead to a surge in the university's apparel sales, Jacobs said.

"Obviously if we win, we increase more shirts, more sales," Jacobs said. "If the team does well, we do well. Everyone prosper."

Nester agreed.

"It's tremendous for us," Nester said. "It's exciting for the team too, but just business-speak. It's great for us too because our orders have increased. It's turning out pretty excellent."
McCall, senators put Pataki on defensive

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Asst. News Editor

Three New York state senators last month accused Gov. George E. Pataki of promoting the state’s high school seniors to submit bills that only the legislature is entitled to give.

Comptroller H. Carl McCall, a Democrat, presented his budget earlier this month, and asked his office to solicit applications and get people’s hopes up when they don’t have the money yet,” he said.

The governor has no power to create a program and begin spending money on it without approval from the legislature, Tompkins said. There is no guarantee that the budget proposals will pass by the April 1 deadline, so the scholarships may not be available immediately, he cautioned.

“You shouldn’t be out there soliciting applications and getting people’s hopes up when you don’t have the money yet,” he said.

Pataki proposed to fund the Leaders of Tomorrow scholarship program with money from the New York State Lottery in his budget. Members of Pataki’s budget staff began developing the program with lottery officials more than nine months ago and the proposal in the budget is the final result of the planning.

“This is just outrageous. This guy is just using these scholarships to improve his political image. The three of us really blew our stacks about this. These are just self-serving ads for the governor and the lottery,” Eric Schneiderman New York state senator.

Schneiderman, Stachowski, Dollinger and McCall all favor increased scholarship aid for students, but want an increase in state funding for state schools and the Tuition Assistance Program, Schneiderman said.

These programs provide higher levels of aid to a much broader base of students, he added.

The lottery scholarships do not significantly improve the amount of funding the state provides for graduating seniors, Schneiderman said. It is also too disorganized since it does not provide the educators making decisions on nominees with sufficiently specific requirements for the award, he added.

Students must have at least a B average, have demonstrated leadership skills and involvement in extracurricular activities to be considered eligible for the scholarships, according to the Lottery Department.

“This is a program where the guidelines are so general that principals can basically decide the winning candidate by flinging a coin,” Schneiderman said. “That’s an unforgivable scholar-lesson for kids.”

Lottery Department officials are continuing to promote the program, however, and have set a March 31 deadline for nominations, said Rob Hayes, spokesman for the Lottery Department.

“Regardless of Comptroller McCall’s concerns about the program, we feel it was done in good faith to get the program underway,” Hayes said. “We’re moving forward with this.”

Hayes stressed that the Lottery Department has always had complete control over the program and that consent from the legislature is not necessary for payment of the scholarships. The program will proceed as planned and officials will do whatever is necessary to ensure the the money will be available, he added.

The move by McCall was politically motivated and a deliberate attempt to slow down the budgeting process, Hayes said.

“It’s nothing more than political football for him. It’s nothing he ever paid attention to until three Democratic senators raised a ruckus about it,” he said. “It’s clearly an opportunistic move for him.”

Tompkins disagreed and said that McCall responded to the requests from the senators because it his job to oversee the state’s fiscal matters. This program, he said, falls in his main.

Tompkins explained.

“There’s nothing more than political promotion of a program. Three authorities have raised a ruckus about it,” he said. “That’s the height of political football.”

Teach-in feeds campus sweatshop dialogue

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Staff Writer

Students must use information as a weapon to fight against large, worker-exploiting corporations like Nike, said Kirk Kelly, a recruiter for the Organizing Institute of the National AFL-CIO. "They sell an image," Kelly said. "Pressure has to be put on that image."

The Wednesday morning speech in the Schine Student Center was a part of an all-day "teach-in" presented by the Student Coalition of Organized Labor. The event was part of Sweatshop Awareness Week at Syracuse University.

"We have to keep spreading the word," said Marika Wissink, a member of SCOOL. "We have to keep letting consumers know. We have to keep fighting."

The teach-in was intended to educate and raise awareness for Sweatshop Awareness Week, said J.J. Butts, a member of SCOOL and an English doctoral student.

There will be more visible campus campaigns when a sweatshop is set up Thursday on the Quad, Butts said. An anti-sweatshop rally, also on the Quad, is scheduled to begin at 4 p.m. Friday, he added.

Corporations are sophisticated, Kelly said. Instead of thugs, they use consulting firms to get their way, he said.

But they cannot get to students like they can get to workers, he added.

"In any country where there are no environmental or labor laws, the price of organizing is that you disappear," Kelly said. "GM and Nike know that workers have no voice."

The world is in a new age of globalization and people must start changing the laws that exploit people, he said.

"The only way to change things is for all workers to stand up together," Kelly said. "The worker relationship is the brick that the big fortress of the labor movement will be built on."

ACKERMAN

"We can't drink if we're being mugged," was one message students wrote on the block Wednesday. Others included "Students want about crime" and "SU won't protect you."

Austin Murray, a roommate of the victim in the March 13 beating, agreed that the university is not doing enough to combat violence.

"One of the concerns we see is that older people are used to being mugged," Murray said. "It's really cool."

SU spokesman Kevin Morrow said that the university is working with a limited amount of funding to implement programs focused on student safety.

"First of all, the university is concerned about students well-being both on and off campus," Morrow said. "The university is limited in its ability to safeguard students who live off-campus."

Legally, the Department of Public Safety cannot act patrol off-campus neighborhoods, Morrow said. Those areas are under the jurisdiction of the Syracuse Police Department, he added.

Also, the primary purpose of the Neighborhood Patrol Initiative is not to break up parties, as commonly believed, but to look out for students, Morrow said.

"The university shares the students' concerns and wants to work with the Syracuse Police Department to increase safety," he said. "Students need to take a certain amount of responsibility on their own."

Some of the students are also working with SU's Community Relations Committee to establish neighborhood programs promoting public safety awareness, Mustamato said.

"Our main goal is to let students know how much they have to report everything," she said. "I'm not sure what more we can do."

The students also plan to write letters to local media criticizing SU for their policies, Mustamato said. A graduate wrote a message encouraging former students to do the same.

While the intentions of the students were good, the messages were a disturbing reminder to the victim and her roommates of last week's incident, said Murray, a senior cultural anthropology major.

"I think it's important that everyone gets involved in prevention," she said. "At the same time it's a little hard for us to see this right outside our apartment."

The victim and her roommates were not aware in advance that their neighbors would be writing on the street.

Murray said she would like to see the university become more involved in off-campus neighborhoods and suggested having meetings as a good way of increasing awareness.

"It's so much better to get involved in implementing programs, it may take some time before we write letters to local media, but we have the issue of safety," Murray said. "I want people to take some time to get over this, she said. "I'm happy to see everyone is so aware of it and I hope they keep awareness up. I hope it's not just a week-long thing."

Vitamins add health risks

BY DOUG LEVY

In a culture defined by Big Macs and french fries, it seems fitting that the consumption of dietary supplements has wormed its way into the American palette. But some members of the medical community warn that vitamins may cause more harm than good.

“People in good health shouldn’t bother taking extra vitamins,” said Dr. Mark Bright of Bridgewater-Goddard Park Medical Association in lined.

Potential risks associated with vitamin overdose can cause liver damage, high blood pressure, short-term skin discoloration, hair loss and bone deformities, resulting in only the most extreme cases.

“Some are just too much,” said Bill Clark, supervising pharmacist at Syracuse University Health Services. “But for college students, taking a multivitamin certainly wouldn’t hurt.”

The human body cannot distinguish between vitamins obtained from food and those from pills, Bright said. Using vitamins as a form of dietary supplementation does not offset poor eating, he added.

“Vitamins A, D, E and K are fat-soluble. Unlike water-soluble vitamins C and B, the human body retains the excess in the liver and fatty tissue. This storage can prevent the absorption of other vitamins and minerals essential to a well-balanced diet.”

“Like jester in a king’s court, scientists entertain the public with fancies of a utopian society free of disease. As juggling human genes becomes a common practice among researchers, ethical concerns hang in the balance. Part of being human is being fallible. We’re not immune to all the dangers that surround us in the world and are prone to mis-

Contact lens wearer Carolyn Barrett recently had an eye-opening experience.

Barrett, a junior chemistry major, woke up at 3 a.m. and felt something on her eyelash. It turned out to be her contact lens, twisted and dried. It was the first time the lens had been out of her eye in almost three months.

“They were really cruddy, she said. They were really cloudy, and my vision was blurry with them. You don’t realize how bad they are until you put your glasses back on.”

When it comes to contact lenses and the problems that arise, most of them are because of laziness, said Dr. Barry Weiner, an optometrist in Phoenix, Md.

Barrett, who has been using extended-wear contacts since the 11th grade, said that she wasn’t always so nonchalant about her eyeliner.

“I used to be a good little contact wearer and take them out every night to clean them,” she said. “Once I came to college, though, I just kind of left. I mean, if you’re up late studying and it’s three or four in the morning, it’s so much easier to just sleep in them rather than wake up three hours later and go through the hassle of putting them in again.”

medical studies link antioxidant consumption to decreased risk for cancer and stroke.

"If you smoke," Bright said, "there may be an increased risk of cancer associated with the consumption of antioxidant vitamins (A, C, and E).

As a result, people at higher risk for cardiovascular disease may be the most to gain from antioxidants. Most of the research is inconclusive, however, the future for antioxidants appears bright.

"Too much beta carotene [found in tomatoes and other vegetable antioxidants] can have a potential to turn red and may affect eye vision." Raj said. "Extreme cases can lead to lung cancer, but this has not been proven."

Raj, an adjunct instructor in the department of nutrition at the University, said.

Taking extra iron supplements can hasten damage to the body, Raj added. But evidence to that effect has been inconclusive, she said.

Raj also teaches a graduate course in vitamins and minerals.

Both Bright and Raj agree that different groups of people have different vitamin needs based on their lifestyles. High alcohol consumption affects people who are alcoholics and drug addicts, may find vitamin supplementation beneficial.

"Pregnant women need to consume extra iron to help prevent neural tube defects, such as spina bifida, in infants," Bright said.

She referenced a 1995 Journal of the American Medical Association study that showed pregnant women who consumed higher levels of neural problems in newborns.

Beta carotene is a B vitamin essential to cell division and people who have been exposed to high amounts need to be consuming 400 micrograms daily," Raj said.

Women may need more iron, for example, as they lose iron during menstruation, she said.

enables people to contact lenses depending on their needs, but not as a medical device," said Dr. Richard Fuente, an optometrist in DeWitt.

Fuente said that contacts have been made into a consumer item, driven from their original purpose.

Making contact lenses

There are two main types of contact lenses: hard and soft, both of which have disposable and extended wear varieties. Disposable lenses are thicker and extended wear has been the lowest amount of time that a contact lens stays in the cornea of the eye, said Dr. Rebecca McPherson, an optometrist in New York.

Disposable contacts should not be worn for more than two weeks, even in the case of a seeminly harmless eye infection. Both Bright and Kaj are agreed that different groups of people have different vitamin needs based on their lifestyles. Bright said. Walk-ons relish experience as Orangemen

BY ALISON HISCHEK
Staff Writer

Looking along the Syracuse men’s basketball team bench, you spot all the familiar faces.

There’s head coach Jim Boeheim standing with his hands on his hips and assistant coaches Mike Hopkins, Larry Orr and Bernie Fine scribbling notes or shouting instructions.

Then come the marquee players, point guard Jason Hart, center Etan Thomas and forward Ryan Blackwell. A little farther along are the young sharpshooters, Preston Shumpert, Tony Brand and DeShaun Williams.

Finally, all the way down at the end of the bench sit two players who couldn’t be more proud or more honored to don the orange Syracuse uniforms. Meet juniors Rob McClanaghan and Chris Schau, the SU walk-ons.

They aren’t the most recognizable Orangemen and they hardly ever see playing time, but they play their important role.

“We have to keep these guys going if they’re down,” said McClanaghan, a guard from Cranston, R.I. “If they’re not hitting their shots we have to help them. We have to encourage them a lot.

“During the opening round of the NCAA Tournament, Schau said he couldn’t help but be in awe of the surroundings.

“I was turned away. He wondered if maybe Syracuse had too much talent and not enough room for him.

Not wanting to let go of his dream, McClanaghan told himself he would give it one more shot. He spent the following summer adding muscle to his frame and working on his basketball skills.

When tryouts came around his sophomore year, McClanaghan and his Archbold Gymnasium basketball buddy Schau found success — and both are proud or more honored to don the recognizable Orangemen and they are.

“Going 19-0 was pretty exciting,” McClanaghan said of SU’s hot start. “Another great experience was going to my hometown, Providence, and actually getting in the game. Going up there in a Syracuse uniform was a lot different, with my family just being across one state. This is like there’s only 16 teams left in the country, and we’re one of them.”

Although McClanaghan and Schau will be watching Syracuse’s game against Michigan State from their seats at the end of the bench, they each secretly hold out hopes of one day getting their chance to shine for the Orangemen.

“We enjoy the show from the bench,” Schau said. “At the same time, divine intervention could happen and one of us could get called in.”

As a scrappy, wide-eyed freshman, McClanaghan tried out for a spot on the team but was turned away. He wondered if maybe Syracuse had too much talent and not enough room for him.

But this season has certainly been one to remember.

Schau found success — and in the building. It’s amazing, anything can happen. It’s a crazy experience.

McClanaghan compared the NCAA Tournament to his high school playing days.

“Another great experience was going to my hometown, Providence, and actually getting in the game. Going up there in a Syracuse uniform was a lot different, with my family just being across from the team bench was great.”

Schau has his own memories from the season. He notched his first career points with a dunk against the New York AAU team in December. The shot even made the team’s highlight tape, which was shown at the Big East dinner.

Although McClanaghan and Schau will be watching Syracuse’s game against Michigan State from their seats at the end of the bench, they each secretly hold out hopes of one day getting their chance to tourname nt action in Cleveland, Schau said he couldn’t help but be in awe of the surroundings.

“The atmosphere there is just completely different from any home game or even the Big East Tournament.”

He said, “You could just feel the energy in the building. It’s amazing, anything can happen. It’s a crazy experience.

McClanaghan compared the NCAA Tournament to his high school playing days.

The only thing I could compare it to is my state championship, but that was a whole different scene,” McClanaghan said. “That was just high school, one state. This is like there’s only 16 teams left in the country, and we’re one of them.”

Now, as he prepares for Syracuse’s weekend with Michigan State tonight, McClanaghan looks back at the long road he traveled to earn a seat at the end of the SU bench.

Michigan State coach worries about zone

BY DAVE CURTIS
Sports Editor

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. — Every year, the 2-3 zone defense seeps into Syracuse’s basketball game-plan.

Sometimes it ranks as a mere sidelight, another weapon in a normally loaded arsenal. But more often it dominates SU’s defensive scheme, a strategy opposing coaches dread.

Michigan State, one of the elite teams in America, matches its consistent offense against the Orangemen’s zone defense. It’s a concern, since we haven’t faced many. But we have a lot of weapons to attack. It’s just a matter of whether the bullets are in the gun.”

Joe Izzo, coach of the Spartans

Syracuse’s 2-3 zone revolves around accurate 3-point shooting. Michigan State canned 38 percent of its treys on the season, and four Spartan regulars shot better than 35 percent from behind the arc.

Starters A.J. Granger and Morris Peterson lead the Spartans at 44 and 43 percent, respectively. Senior Charlie Bell, bothered this week by tendonitis in his left knee, serves as a deep threat as well.

Perhaps the most intriguing Spartan shooter is point guard Mateen Cleaves. Knocked for his jump shot throughout his college career, the senior hit 37 percent of his triples this season.

In Saturday’s second-round matchup with Utah, Cleaves kickstarted MSU’s second-half comeback with four 3-pointers.

Against four teams. The Utah选择 to keep him alone at the top of the key, eliminating his ability to penetrate and forcing him to shoot 20-footers.

“Just make sure we have a number of weapons to attack. It’s just a matter of whether the bullets are in the gun.”

Izzo

“You can’t back off any college player,” SU guard Jason Hart said. “I don’t think Utah’s strategy worked. That was crucial for Michigan State, and we don’t want them to build confidence shooting threes.”

Successful downtown shooting by foes sunk Syracuse in most of its losses this season. Opponents shot their threes at no worse than a 40 percent clip in four of the five setbacks, topped by an impressive 12-for-25 effort by Seton Hall on Feb. 7 at the Carrier Dome.

While the zone yields its share of open looks in every game, it also propelled the Orangemen to 26 wins in 1999-2000. Overall, SU’s opposition leaves more than 17 3-point attempts at the basket each game but connects on just 32 percent of its efforts.

Izzo said the activity of SU’s zone increases his ability to penetrate and elbow room to shoot 20-footers.

“I think it will be easier to rebound because of the open lanes against the zone,” he said. “There are just more lanes to get the ball to the basket. I think that will work as an advantage for us.”

Despite the knocks against the zone, Boeheim sticks with it, and in the last five years, posted a solid March record.

Armed with the vaunted 2-3 in 1996, Syracuse defeated Georgia, Kansas and Mississippi State on its way to the national championship game. The zone also became trademark of the 1998 squad, which advanced to the Sweet 16 before succumbing to Duke.

Again this season, the Orangemen’s 2-3 pushed them through a tournament tussle.

“Our zone defense is good,” Boeheim said. “It’s been a huge part of our defensive philosophy over the past couple of years. Some years we use it more, but it is always a priority within our defensive plan.”

Both are four-year starters. Hart is 4.4 assists a game, while Cleaves, but Cleaves is as good a point guard as you're going to see," Boeheim said.

"It'll be very competitive," Hart said. "Nothing dirty, just two guys who are going to do everything in their power to try and get this victory."

"The competitive natures of both, combined with their athletic talent, are major reasons each is considered the key cog of his team." Hart's will and desire was a driving force behind the 19-0 start that propelled the Orange to national prominence and put them into a position to make a run in the NCAA Tournament.

The Spartans, on the other hand, were just 9-4 when Cleaves returned from a stress fracture in his right foot. MSU went 19-3 with him back in the lineup and, many people said, were new the top team in the tournament.

"I don't like to compare players, but Cleaves is as good a point guard as you're going to see," Boeheim said. "He put the ball in the basket, he makes plays and he's as competitive as anyone you'll ever see."

"Jason's a competitor, too. He can put the ball in the basket and he can guard you. They're both great leaders, and that is why their teams are still playing."

GUARDS

Cleaves guided last season's SU team and coaching staff, however, tonight's game provides another chance for those around the country to see that Hart can do the same thing they see him do every day. "I just think they're two of the best point guards in the country," Hopkins said. "They're going to be showcased. I mean, Jason's already against Connecticut's Khalid (El-Amin), Jason played against (St. John's) Erick Barber. It's just going to be another one of those games when you've got two great guards and two head to head against each other."

The point guards both downplay the showdown, instead focusing on what their respective teams must do to be successful. "I'm not going to come out and just try to outplay him," Cleaves said. "I'm going to come out and I'm going to try to win the game. I don't care about the one on one, that type of thing. We have two good leaders here who play on, so it's going to be a team thing. I don't care if both of us come out and have great games. Whoever loses, you're going home."

For those remains, however, that both players are the keys to their teams.

Cleaves will harass Hart with an aggressive, physical defensive style when SU has the ball. "It'll be very competitive," Hart said. "Nothing dirty, just two guys who are going to do everything in their power to try and get this victory."

Big East finds success in postseason action

The Sweet 16 has arrived and, like many people expected, the Big East has three teams all over but who had the right three? Conference powerhouse St. John's, Expectations Connecticut already bowed out, but Syracuse, Miami and Seton Hall are ready to carry the banner. So far, they've each had very different roads into the regional semifinals.

Orange brick road

Though Syracuse was supposed to make it this far according to the bracket-makers, many people were sure. Before the tournament, Samford was a popular pick as a first-round upset over SU. Experts spoke of the Bulldogs' ability to hit the 3-pointer and how strong guard play usually made younger teams win.

In the closest second-round in recent memory, a No. 5 over a 12种子 wouldn't have been hard to pick. But something happened down the stretch. Miami had thought it had won the game, but the Orange pulled away with a 62-50 win.

The losers

Just like Seton Hall, Connecticut suffered an injury to their point guard during the first round. However, they were unable to overcome it.

Rivals

On the other coast, St. John's was easy discovering Big East fans as well. We should have seen it coming through the year. The Buckeyes beat Northern Arizona in the first round, but momentum is everything. And it throws by Erick Barkley lifted the Red Storm to a 31-56 victory in the second round.

That brought the huge second-round meeting with Ohio State. The Buckeyes were one of two Big Ten teams to make last year's Final Four, and there was no reason to think they couldn't do it again. The game against Miami remained close throughout the first half, but something happened down the stretch. Miami felt the magic of upset weekend and pulled away with a 75-62 win.

Rock you like a hurricane

Miami pulled ahead early, the Hurricanes were seeded number one in the dance. Though they did knock off the Buckeyes in the second round, it was the biggest upset in the tournament — and the basketball team seemed to underachieve every game. Miami is actually the favorite of the dance, though, by a 4-1 margin. We feel the magic of upset week-end.

In the South Regional, Miami is actually the favorite to win its game. By virtue of Tula's win over Cincinnati, Miami will be wearing the white uniforms in their Sweet 16 game. Jimmy Helmlys has been shooting the lights out for the 'Canes, and I think the inside play of Mario Baldo. The Big East has one team into the Elite Eight with Miami's third win.

So that brings us to the Orangemen. Even though I picked Miami as the favorite, there is one thing I would love to see more than anything a Final Four run by Miami. That would bring the huge third-round win. Seton Hall's point guard, though, is still a big question.

Orangemen face top-seeded MSU

BY DAVE CURTIS
Sports Editor

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. — At 19-0 late in snowy January, SU fans visualized a perfect March for the Orangemen.

They saw their team roll into the NCAA Tournament as a No. 1 seed, survive the first two rounds and, with the help of a couple of upsets in other regions, enter a Sweet 16 game as a favorite to win the first national title of the Jim Boeheim era.

But SU bottomed out from its early-season joy ride with a sloppy four weeks that saw the Orangemen enter the Big Dance with losses in five of 10 games.

So this evening at The Palace at Auburn Hills, rather than serving as the team to beat, the now-underdog Orangemen (26-5) meet top-seeded Michigan State in a Midwest Regional Sweet 16 matchup.

Yet despite their dissimilar rankings and popularity among bracket barons, the two squads mirror one another in several ways.

Hart, Cleaves finally meet

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. — For two players whose paths have never crossed in an organized basketball game, Jason Hart and Mateen Cleaves go way back.

During high school, with Hart in Los Angeles and Cleaves playing in Flint, Mich., both heard stories about the other.

Back and forth went the argument among the experts: Who is the No. 1 college point guard prospect in the country?

The answer didn’t come in high school. Their teams squared off once in a tournament, but Cleaves sat out with a back injury. The debate lingered.

Then came recruiting time, and Jim Boeheim went knocking at both players’ doors.

The promise that the Syracuse head coach made to both — along with fellow recruits Shabazz Holloway and Kevin Morris — was the first one to commit to the Orangemen would be the only point guard SU signed.

Both players liked Syracuse. In fact, Cleaves says that if he had gone out of state to play college ball, he would have wanted to at See GUARDS page 19
Spartans end SU season

BY CONNOR ENNIS
Asst. Sports Editor

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. — It resembled a demolition, when something that previously looked solid and tall simply blows up.

For about 25 minutes Thursday day, Syracuse remained ahead of the Midwest Region’s No. 1 seed, Michigan State, in front of a partisan Spartan crowd at the Palace of Auburn Hills.

However, the sharp shooting of MSU forward Morris Peterson and a second-half scoring barrage by the entire Spartan team collapsed the Orangemen’s foundation in a 78-62 loss in a Midwest Regional semifinal.

Michigan State (29-7) advances to the Elite Eight on Saturday against Iowa State, which beat UCLA on Thursday. The Orangemen’s season ends at 26-6.

“I have said that this is a special team since the beginning, and they showed it in the second half after being beaten in the first half,” Michigan State head coach Tom Izzo said.

The shots we got were everything that kept Mateen Cleaves scoreless for 23 minutes hardly helped, either.

Hart’s head dropped near midfloor, timer and a nine-point lead overwhelming his hands on his hips, frown on his face, eyes toward the heavens.

Ryan Blackwell, watched their careers close their hands on knees, no expression on his face.

Every system that clicked for the game’s first three-and-a-half quarters malfunctioned that kept Mateen Cleaves scoreless for 23 minutes hardly helped, either.

With 1:04 left on the clock, Ryan Blackwell, watched their careers close their hands on his hips, frown on his face, eyes toward the heavens.

Hart’s head dropped near midfloor, timer and a nine-point lead overwhelming his hands on his hips, no expression on his face, eyes toward the ground.

The 11-point, 10-assist performance came nowhere near easing the pain. The defense that kept Mateen Cleaves scoreless for 33 minutes hardly helped, either.

Despite to any highlight package or witty, alliterated newspaper lead, the Spartans' point-guard's demeanor near the center circle always summed up the state of Orangemen basketball.

Dr. Curtis

He performed a little jig in the waning seconds of a win with his teammates dancing at the center of the foul line. After a tough home loss, he'd press the large orange "S" in the Carrier Dome's center jump circle, hands on his hips in front of his face, eyes toward the heavens.

Thursday night, with 1:04 left on the timer and a nine-point lead overwhelming his team, Hart's head dropped near midfloor, hands on knees, no expression on his face, eyes toward the ground.

The 11-point, 10-assist performance came nowhere near easing the pain. The defense that kept Mateen Cleaves scoreless for 33 minutes hardly helped, either.

Hart, like classmates Etan Thomas and Ryan Blackwell, watched their careers close Thursday night in most painful fashion.

For 35 minutes, the Orangemen battled Michigan State to a draw on the scoreboard.

Little separated the two teams as winning a second-half scoring barrage by the entire Spartan team collapsed the Orangemen’s foundation in a 78-62 loss in a Midwest Regional semifinal.

Celebrities to tour campus

BY ASHLEY GRAF
Staff Writer

Continuing the spirit of this week's anti-sweatshop protests, celebrity speakers will bring other controversial issues to the table Sunday as the Spitfire Tour 2000 travels to Syracuse University's Goldstein Auditorium.

"I came across it on the Internet and it just seemed like a really great thing," said Josh Katcher, president of Student Anti-AntropocentricReasoning Organization and one of the organizers of the event.

Actor Andy Dick, from the sitcom "NewsRadio," is expected to speak about drug abuse. Radio and former MTV personality Katcher will give a presentation titled "If Freedom Rings, Will You Answer Us?"

Michael Franti, a member of the band Spearhead, will deliver an address called "Staying Human". Jello Biafra will give a speech called "Non-Violent Extremism Of The Rich." Biafra is a former Dead Kennedys band member and a current candidate for the Green Party's presidential nomination.

"It's basically to use celebrities to get our message out," said Elizabeth Cline, a member of SARO and a junior policy studies major. "SARO is a group that advocates human rights, environmental issues and animal rights."

Katcher, however, said he felt slightly disappointed about the choice of speakers, with the exception of Biafra.

"Initially, I intended Spitfire to focus on specific topics of human rights, environmental issues and animal rights," he said. "Certain speakers were not progressive enough, so that kind of contradicts the purpose."

The students could not control the specific guests coming to SU, said University Union and SARO spoke with Spitfire organizers to try to request speakers pertaining to issues dealt with by SARO, Katcher said.

"I told UU what we wanted and they really want in either of our control," he said. "I am a little disappointed but I am glad it is coming at all. It is a good event overall. It raises awareness about issues in general."

A number of activist student organizations will set up tables outside the auditorium before and after the presentation, he added.

"It's not really a question to how they can come up and talk to us one on one," Cline said. The organizations expected to be represented include the Student Coalition on Organized Labor, the Student Environmental Action Coalition and the Syracuse chapter of the New York Public Interest Research Group.

Onondaga County Commissioner of Transportation Bruce Trexler said he does not know when the construction will start, but the path should be completed by summer. It took about six-and-a-half weeks to construct the east shore trail, he added.

Trexler said he hoped the entire loop would be completed in seven years, extending to outside trails in Canastota and DeWitt. "It is a really great thing," said Josh Katcher, president of Student Anti-AntropocentricReasoning Organization. "It is a good event overall. It is a good event overall. It is a good event overall."

About 15 years ago the West Shore Trail was leveled and filled with gravel, said Liverpool resident David Kline, who frequents both paths. But the path has since worn away, he added.

"It is really hard to bike with and some gravel," he said.

John Dellas, co-owner of Varsity Pizza, 802 S. Crouse Ave. in Syracuse, said his frequent bike rides will be more scenic with the extended bike path. Dellas said he normally rides 15 to 20 miles during each visit and has to ride back and forth on the path.

Although Kline saves his inline skating for the east shore trail, he said he prefers mountain biking on the West Shore Trail because of its seclusion and natural terrain.
How do you feel about the Orangemen’s success?

Students share their thoughts on being an SU hoops fan.

Students must wear orange pride

It is one of the most exciting times of the year in the world of athletics. The NCAA basketball tournament has infiltrated the campuses of 64 different colleges across the country. All the schools competing will be able to show off their true colors and prove whether they can meet the high expectations set for them.

During this time — March Madness — many die-hard Syracuse University fans, like me, begin to feel a bit more excited. Our hearts pound faster, our patience begins to get shorter and shorter, and the air smells fresher and during each hour of the day we count down how many hours until tip-off. The adrenaline is flowing in all of us.

However, there are many people with no interest in basketball that say, why? Some people turn to sports as a distraction from their dealings with everyday life and some just like being around a loud crowd that generates excitement.

The most important reason why I enthusiastically cheer for SU is that I feel an obligation to do so. I am a believer that in sports fans can have an enormous effect on the image of a team. The more exciting and passionate the fan base is, the more exciting and winning the team will be. For example, the Duke Blue Devils are considered the most exciting team in the country to watch. Although they are definitely one of the most talented teams in America, an extra excitement is added to them because their fans are considered the loudest fans in college basketball. Since the entire country feels this extra excitement from Duke's fans, they get more national recognition. This helps their school out tremendously by being able to get better recruits for future years and increasing revenue through the athletic department.

If all SU students look at this example, it is clear to see the benefits of being a crazy Cuse fan. If each student does something special to show their support for the Orangemen, we as a group of fans will be recognized across the country. This form of situation would bring great benefits to our entire school community.

Sports fail to show full college picture

Over lunch today, my roommate gave me the lowdown about tonight’s basketball game in Auburn Hills, Mich., where the Syracuse Orangemen will face off against Michigan State Spartans. As I listened to her detail and dispute the actual neutrality of the Auburn Hills court, I was still just 50 miles from SU, so the stands are sure to be packed with Spartan fans — I began pondering the implications of attending a completely sports-oriented and sports-driven university.

Athletics is the so-called joy of Syracuse. But the mind-numbing spirit crunching, overwhelming presence of our sports teams infects our every thought and action.

Is it really such a beautiful thing to everyone? What about the kids who never really got into sports? The kids who were always picked last in gym class, who ran off to the bathroom instead of doing pull-ups? Is there any place for them at this school?

In my high school, even though there were dozens of different types of people, I was always able to find someone I could identify with. But here, I'm immediately made out to be the "weird" one because I'm not slipping orange and blue paint on my face and screaming at the top of my lungs on the 50 yard line of the Carrier Dome.

People attend college, I hope, to learn. I doubt there's many people here who are really going to be an NCAA star someday. I believe that people easily lose sight of the fact that it's the time in class, not the time on the field or in the stands, that probably matters most.

When I'm away from school and the topic of my university comes up, I always get one of the same two responses. The person I'm talking to either knows of SU because of its stellar, orange-coated sports program, or they've never heard of it before. This is incredibly disturbing.

Why isn't the nation more aware of the academic programs here? What about all of the intelligent people doing cutting-edge research here? Why is it that a bunch of meatheads running around with balls are unconditionally applauded, while everyone else's accomplishments are quickly glossed over?

While the clock is ticking in the Dome, there's a dozens of other activities going on across campus. There's over 100 student groups, from the College Democrats to Republicans to the Feminist Collective, that are constantly searching for bodies to help them achieve their goals. Celebrities and industry leaders lecture regularly on campus. When else will students really have the chance to be exposed to these things?

Sports obscure the real SU — don't be fooled.

Student fees ensure exchange of ideas

It may be guaranteed by the First Amendment, but on college campuses, free speech doesn't come cheap.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that public colleges can require students to pay activity fees to fund political advocacy groups that don't align with their own beliefs.

University of Wisconsin law student Scott Southworth brought the case before the court in protest of use of his fee dollars for campus groups such as Amnesty International, and the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender Campus Center.

But Southworth doesn't want his money back. He just wants to see the groups he opposes banished from his campus.

He's fighting a losing battle, and he picked the wrong plan of attack.

If Southworth wants to put his dollars to work, he should join an organization that reflects his own interests or combats groups with which he disagrees.

Or better yet, he might think about creating his own student group. The beauty of student fees fund the ability to exchange ideas.

The trade-off students have made (or have been forced to make) isn't free.

Student fees fund the ability to choose. They establish the framework for a variety of interests and afford students the ability to examine issues from every angle.

It's natural for fiery exchanges to flare up between various groups on campus. In fact, these scuffles should even be encouraged to contribute to the learning process.

The ability to trade ideas freely is a precious commodity. Interactions between diverse communities should flourish in the academic and social environments that college life offers, not be hindered by close-minded penny pinchers.

But it costs money to establish the initial lines of communication. Students shouldn't be trying to nickel and dime their way to mature conversation — it's priceless.
Study seeks to cut women HIV cases in Onondaga County

BY JOHN ARWEILER

Many young women lack the motivation to end their promiscuity, said Dianne Morrison-Beedy, an associate professor in the Syracuse University College of Nursing. "We have to develop practical means of intervention to reduce their risky sexual behavior," Morrison-Beedy said.

Single, sexually active women in Onondaga County between the ages of 15 and 19 will be recruited for the study. The women will undergo clinical studies and attend an intervention study group once a week for four to five sessions.

"This population is overlooked in certain areas," said Jean Eboh, a graduate student in nursing practice. "We're trying to help women empower themselves."

Interventions will include game playing and values assessment, among other programs, said Judith Dyne, an instructor at the college.

"The study is a pivotal point for the college, since this is an opportunity to gain recognition and move forward with research," Morrison-Beedy said.

Global warming is rising and threatening to change society as it is now known, University of Arizona professor Jonathan Overpeck said Thursday.

Overpeck cited both natural and human causes for the increase in global temperature to a crowd of about 100 people in Hearst Auditorium.

We need to start considering that there are a lot more seriously as a society, Overpeck said. "Global warming appears to be a real phenomenon on every single continent."

The global temperature has been rapidly increasing throughout the 1990s, Overpeck said. The warmest temperature ever recorded was in 1998, he added.

Six of the other warmest years to be recorded were also during the 1990s, he said.

"We need to ask questions to anticipate what's going to happen in the future," he added.

Natural occurrences, such as the change in number of volcanic eruptions and changes in the sun's energy output, affect global temperatures, he said.

The rise in global warming became prevalent following the Industrial Revolution, Overpeck said. Our modern dependence on fossil fuels, which release harmful gases into the environment, could also contribute to this phenomenon, he added.

"Each of us is going to get to be careful because when you start to take this study seriously, you start making some societal decisions," he said. "All of these decisions are pretty darn expensive."

At times the government is hesitant to study the global warming because of the enormous expense involved, Overpeck said. The costs of not examining the problem, however, could be more severe, he added.

Overpeck serves as the director of the Institute for the Study of the Patagonia Earth at the University of Arizona. The institute studies the origins of global warming, he said.

Modern studies of the phenomena include using natural indicators to compare temperatures of the past with today's. Some indicators used in the studies include tree rings, ice cores, and lake sediments.

"Each allow us to go further back in time and look at the common signal," he said. "Nowhere, looking back in time, do you get temperatures anywhere near as high as in 1998."

Overpeck said that the drastic increase of the global temperature, global warming may contribute to natural disasters, including droughts and tropical storms, Overpeck said.

"It might turn out that our biggest worries are surprise changes," he said. "As we go into the future, the problem is we don't know how mother nature works well enough."

Overpeck's speech followed a presentation of five Holmes Awards to students in introductory level courses, said Cathryn Newton, chairwoman of the Syracuse University geology department.

The awards are named for a 1927 SU graduate, Chauncey D. Holmes, who made an endowment to help encourage the study of geology as one of the first academic disciplines. While the lecture was well attended, many in the audience came in pursuit of extra credit points for their geology classes, said Barbara Anderson, a sophomore political science major.

I had to come for my geology class," Anderson said. "I thought it was interesting though."

Freshman Trina Nocerino, an English education major, admitted that she was also motivated by the extra credit points. The lecture, however, was worth attending, she added.

"I'm not really a science person but the information was presented in a way I could understand," Nocerino said. "He made a point of appreciating everyone's questions and explanations."

Several students in attendance commented on New York Public Interest Research Group, who attended as a part of the group's comprehensive environmental campaign, said Ben Trueheart, a freshman international relations major and NYPIRG member.

NYPIRG is a student organization that advocates awareness of public issues.

"It was easy to understand," said Trueheart of the lecture. "It's important because so many aspects, like energy and environment, affect society as much."

Note from the Daily Orange editorial desk:

NYPIRG is a student organization in Syracuse University. The students are volunteers who help promote awareness of public issues. The organization does not have a political bias and is open to all students.

Note from Tiffany Lankes, Daily Orange Editor:

Overpeck's talk was well received by the audience. The students and faculty members were interested in the topic and asked many questions during the presentation.
Jazz it up
With spring just around the corner, it looks like we'll be fielding blue skies all the way to summer. The SU students can redeem basketball loss through video game tournament.

BY SAPNA KOLLALI
Lifestyle Editor

Basketball fans afraid that Sunday's game will end the March Madness fun at Syracuse University can rest easy. The EA Sports NCAA March Madness 2000 video game tournament hits SU Monday night.

Utilizing the Sony PlayStation game of the same title, Monday's tournament is a continuation of the NCAA tournament and is open to all SU students, faculty and staff. "We wanted it to happen within the regular tournament," said Ryan Stalzer, a senior broadcast journalism major and a campus representative for KA Sports. "It's better for both things that way."

The tournament will be played on 22 other college campuses nationwide, including Michigan, North Carolina, Florida, Tennessee, Texas, Nebraska, UCLA and Ohio State. Stalzer, also a Daily Orange staff writer, and Mike Principato, a senior broadcast journalism and policy studies major, are organizing the SU tournament.

Stalzer said EA looks primarily for big schools with well-known sports reputations, but other factors play a large part in the selection process as well. "They look geographically, too," he said. "In the northeast, Syracuse is one of the only schools able to pull such a crowd for sports. There is a pretty good following, people are interested in sports."

EA Sports sponsored four successful video game tournaments last semester, three football and one hockey, using games like Madden NFL 2000 and NHL 2000. Mostly undergrads participated in the previous tournaments, Stalzer said. "We all like to play video games, but you can only play..."
‘Raisin’ questions racial stereotypes

BY MAGIN MCKENNA

A lifelong wrestling fan himself, Eric Rosenthal agrees that the first play written by a black woman to be performed on Broadway, ‘Raisin’ chronicles the struggle of the black Younger family to move into a predominantly white neighborhood.

‘It's always something when the theater can help people realize their preconceptions,’ Moss said. ‘We can show people who they might not bring into their living rooms, but who they can meet and experience in the theater.’

‘Raisin,’ written during the Harlem Renaissance, takes its name from the Langston Hughes poem. The play is about family and student audience

For Syracuse Stage’s ‘A Raisin in the Sun,’ the more foreboding is the city’s white neighborhood. "He feels the woman's place in the home—barefoot and pregnant,” Grossett said.

A lot of racial struggles to come to terms with English, says Mary Ann Calo and Syracuse University did Parsons said he had no idea that this first play written by a black woman to be performed on Broadway was to have had never occurred to me," he said.

Grossett attended SU in 1984. "I remember sitting next to a black guy in class who was talking about slavery," Parsons said. "I was so fascinated because it had never occurred to me. I had only read stories about it."}

"It was a pretty good representation of a white middle class," Parsons said. "There were no blacks, no Hispanics and no Jews," Grossett said. "I had never been to Syracuse University did Parsons, who graduated in 1980 with a degree in communications in a cultural immersion."

"It’s a way to come to grips with the city’s white neighborhood. "I remember sitting next to a black guy in class who was talking about slavery," Parsons said. "I was so fascinated because it had never occurred to me. I had only read stories about it."
Duke ‘crazies’ await Florida

BY COREY HANN
Asst. Lifestyle Editor

Like hippies to a Grateful Dead show or freshmans to a cold keg, Duke University basketball fans are swarming Syracuse University in a wave of white and blue.

Commonly referred to as the “Cameron Crazies,” Duke fans will live the game in tears, Mountains of noise, heat and intensify their efforts of their fans, according to the Duke athletic department.

"There’s a lot of energy in the Cameron Indoor Area," Panek said. "We can generate tremendous amounts of noise, heat and intensity. If we’re not making noise, we’re doing something wrong," Kessler said in the email.

Also, because of their proximity to the court, fans can often see the action in the games there. "The players tend to feed off us," Panek said. "I’d say we’re almost like the sixth man in the game," Kessler said.

Duke fans look for other ways to let their support be heard. "Coach K says to yell and clapping. Bringing down the other with some yells and clapping gestures is almost a special way to get support," Kessler said.

"We are right on top of the action," Kessler said. "I could literally hear every word in the ear of opponents who are located. There are seven guys, with seven beers in their pockets and they are located."

"The volume within is tuned down," Kessler said. "Nevertheless, everyone is satisfied with Syracuse's growing lead and shouting out props to Jason Hart, among others."

Half-time arrives, with Syracuse ahead. A trip down to the "party" in the Cameron Indoor Area, Kessler said. "Ten students set up a tent, and someone has to be there at all times of the day," Kessler said.

"I've been out there waiting on line, when out of the line, we send out places for all of us in the tents," Panek said. "He’s very supportive of his players as well as us."

Coach K also has routine questions and answers with the public to keep them up to date with the status of the basketball team and personal matters.

"He knows that what makes Duke special is the unique relationship he has with the school’s student body," according to a report by the Total College Sports Network.

Kessler said he believes that part of being a Duke fan is self-sacrifice, and that sometimes even support for the team can be seen beyond the student body. He had chipped close in order to attend the ACC tournament without telling his professor.

The next week, he asked me how I enjoyed the game," Kessler said. "It seems he lost it and saw me on TV. He then commended me on my wise and judicious use of time. Only at Duke."
Coaching nemeses presents challenge for SU

BY GREG BISHOP

While Johns Hopkins' furious St. Patrick's Day comeback against No. 1 Syracuse fell short by an inch, the magic of its former coach, Tony Seamon, could not be stopped coming in the Carrier Dome rafters.

Seamon certainly left his mark on the Orange's program, amassing a 77-33 record in five years and positioning Syracuse third on the Blue Jays' all-time win list.

The Johns Hopkins-Syracuse matchup became legendary in March 1989 when, after two sequels, Seamon squared off against Roy Simmons Jr., his powerhouse Towson.

In Simmons' tenure, the teams met 10 times, each taking five victories. When Simmons Jr. retired, Seamon moved on and took his former zone defense and bag full of tricks to nearby Towson.

New, Seamon and his Tigers (1-2) renew their yearly battle with Syracuse at 1 p.m. Saturday at the Carrier Dome in Syracuse.

"The only trick Seamon has is he has no trick," Simmons said.

"He's a very顾tful coach. He's going to be ready," Simmons said. "I don't think they're going to play defense, but we're on a roll this year."

 offender's defense remains the same in tomorrow's matchup.

Sticking in Powell's mind, however, is the Orangewomen players going for score after score after score in tomorrow's matchup.

The zone isn't the only trick Seamon has. His team has dominated, recording 10 goals and six assists in the three games.

With a goal on a behind-the-back shot against Hopkins, the Johns Hopkins Engineers were downed and three goals on a goal on a behind-the-back shot against Hopkins.

When coach and player come together, the Tigers say they have a group of stars.

"They just need to talk it up a little bit more," Simmons said.

"The defense is the heart of the team. They just have to work three times as hard."}

Dome's lore, history provide perfect setting

Clanton and Santana, Prince and Dolly, the Boss and the Chairman. Billy and Bono. They all played it.

So did Ewing and Mourning and Mutombo, Billy and DC. "So," said Duke coach Mike Krzyzewski, standing in the bowels of the Carrier Dome, "it's nice to be in the house that Boeheim built."

The place hasn't changed. It's still an intimidating, cavernous air-pressure setpiece just hard enough to fit 50,000 people inside.

Top shelf, 20,000, and you've got yourself a basketball crowd. Sometimes, a rabid one.

This weekend, an insane one.

The NCAA Tournament's East Regional finals kick off tonight in a Duke-Florida tipoff at 7:38 p.m. in the vaunted Dome. It opened Sept. 29, 1980, the day before I was born. Admittedly, I've aged a bit better than the Dome. After all, I don't have a roof that, like the Dome, was replaced a year ago. While the graffiti on the Dome is, uh, mighty nice, I prefer not to spray paint a patch of illegible lettering on my forehead.

Still, the lore and legend remains. Years of exposure and press left the Dome the most revered sporting venue in the nation.

"It's a unique facility," said Pat Campbell, the Dome's general manager. "There are very few places in the nation, let alone of college campuses."

You've got the 50,000 seats and the 24 aisles of lights and the 36-lettered vats of fans and the eight blocks of speakers dangling from the roof.

Section 107 is Tom Bland Land. Section 206, Row M, Seat 2 — where Campbell was sitting — would've given you a perfect view of Pearl Washington's hall-of-fame performance against Boston College in 1984. You could see Denovan McNabb's last-second touchdown heave to Steve Brunsmann against Virginia Tech in 1988 from about anywhere in the Dome.

The incredible moments, those pictures that freeze in your mind and never thaw, make the Dome what it is.

"It can generate as much noise, excitement and intensity as any building in the country," head football coach Paul Pasqualoni said, "because when you've got the fans into the game, there's no place more exciting."

"It's a unique, coach. It's insane. It's insane," said former Duke and Notre Dame great Tom Granger, harking back to the sellout football and basketball crowds in the mid-'80s.

Campbell fondly recalls those days.

"I remember a throwback pass to Donnie McPhee," Campbell said. "He caught the ball for a touchdown and was about the railing. Everyone was slapping him five and pushing and the railing gave way."

"Yeah," he said, sarcastically. "That was good." No."

And with each foul he appeared bit by bit. The defensive rebound. The place and the railing has been reinforced. Along with the roof.

The indelible moments, very few others like it in the mid-'80s.

You've got the 50,000 seats and the 24 aisles of lights and the 36-lettered vats of fans and the eight blocks of speakers dangling from the roof. The huge place where so many memorable moments occurred could spawn another act.

After the game, Thomas gave credit to the Spartans for their second-half performance and called Michigan State a great team. The Orange could be seen on his face, however, as Thomas faced the questions about how MSU had attacked him.

"They did a lot of high-shot blockers and they are getting in to his head."

"We tried to go at him when he was on defense," Izzo said. "You have to play your best against him. Otherwise, if he's off the ball, he turns from a very good shot blocker to an incredible shot blocker."

Both of Thomas' blocks occurred when he came from the outside to help on a Spartan who had driven past one of his SU teammates. One of them — a shot by Mateen Cleaves layup attempt — came on a fast break.

"We knew that he wasn't as great a shot blocker then," said Granger. "The ball was on his hand."

"When he was off the ball, he was more of a swat of a Mateen Cleaves layup attempt — came on a fast break."

"We tried to go at him when he was on defense," Izzo said. "You have to play your best against him. Otherwise, if he's off the ball, he turns from a very good shot blocker to an incredible shot blocker."

Griffin's efforts wasted

BY DAVE CURTIS
Syracuse University

Allen Griffin played his best game of the season, leading Syracuse with 14 points in 32 minutes.

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. — Allen Griffin tore his warmup from his body a little less than three minutes into the game, far and away his earliest reveille of the season.

He joined the SU defense as an active participant as it faced an 11-5 deficit and a bloodthirsty assembly packed mostly with Michigan State fans.

Griffin's presence seemed to spark the Orangemen to reverse the six-point margin and silence the crowd. Slashing to the basket and playing strong defense at the top of the 2-3 zone, Griffin scored 11 first-half points and helped lead SU to a 34-24 advantage at intermission.

Despite Michigan State's explosive second half and eventual 17-point win, the 6-foot-1, 190-pound Griffin showed his stuff in 32 minutes. He finished with 14 points on 5-for-10 shooting, handed out one assist and stole a Charlie Bell pass in the first half.

"Allen came in and had a tremendous first half," SU head coach Jim Boeheim said. "We went with Allen to take advantage of his speed, quickness and dribble penetration.

They're great guys with great families," Juli Boeheim said. "I'm trying not to look at it as their last game. It's just great to be here in the Sweet 16.

Attributing much of the team's success during the first half to Jason Hart, former SU and Detroit Pistons legend Dave Bing said the Orangemen played better than he had seen them all year.

Their strength in the first half surprised many people, Bing said. "I think Michigan State is under a lot of pressure because they're the No. 1 seed going in," he said at halftime. "Essentially, they're on a home court and everyone is expecting them to beat us up on Syracuse.

"Michigan State's got it in the back of their minds, 'Maybe this is a better team than we thought.'"

Bing ate dinner with Boeheim and assistant coaches Mike Hopkins and Louis Orr on Wednesday night, where the three were "playing it cool," Bing said.

"I think they were trying to be low key," he said. "They didn't want anyone to think they had a chance to win."

The Gators have come full circle in the NCAA Tournament. After 1996's 87-67 loss to Duke, the Blue Devils of this season (29-4) constitute that same sentiment. It is like the ball is in our court, the game in our hands, and we have the advantage.

The Gators hope it's closer than last season's 116-86 debacle against the Blue Devils at Cameron Indoor Stadium. The result: A fresh bench, fresh legs, as the Gators surprised themselves in beating Duke tonight at 7:38 p.m. in the Carrier Dome. It might as well be changed to "Billiken" for this game.

"I think I was trying to make things too difficult, harder than what they were supposed to be. Now, I'm just playing the game," said Jason Williams, Florida's senior guard, who was named tournament MVP.

"I'm making the game simpler now," he said earlier this season. "I think I was trying to make things too difficult, harder than what they were supposed to be. Now, I'm just playing the game."
Mike Krzyzewski
School: Duke University
Record: 29-4 this season (571-218 overall in 24 seasons)
NCAA Tournament: Krzyzewski reigns as the most successful of the four East Regional coaches, having won two NCAA Championships and making eight Final Fours during his illustrious career. In his 20 years at Duke, 17 of Krzyzewski's teams have made the tourney.
The Scoop: What can you say about Mike Krzyzewski? He's the best coach in college basketball today. No argument here. He's the best coach of his generation. That's a given. He's the best ever. That's still to be seen — Coach K must win an awful lot of titles to catch up to John Wooden. Still, the legacy Krzyzewski has left in Durham, N.C., is unparalleled. His 1998-99 team overpowered and dominated opponents on its way to a 37-2 record. One of those losses was in the national title game to Connecticut. Promptly, four Dukies went in the first round of the NBA Draft. Krzyzewski not only churns out players, but his kids are good people. A military man, Krzyzewski knows the meaning of discipline: He was a graduate assistant under Bobby Knight in 1975 at Indiana.
Fun Fact: The Duke Web site has a 2,429-word biography on Coach K.

Billy Donovan
School: University of Florida
Record: 26-7 this season (110-68 overall in six seasons)
NCAA Tournament: Florida's head coach made the Sweet 16 in his first appearance last season, driving the youthful Gators past Penn and Weber State before succumbing to Gonzaga, 73-72.
The Scoop: Donovan is another in the long line of Rick Pitino disciples. And where he's gone, success has followed. The scrappy Donovan took Providence to the Final Four as a player in 1987. Six years later, as an assistant, he rode with Pitino's Kentucky Wildcats to another Final Four. He then jumped to Marshall and became its head coach in 1994. There, he compiled a 35-20 record, turning around a near-dead program. Donovan left for Florida, and he hasn't looked back, assembling one of the most talented teams in the nation. He faces Krzyzewski, a coaching legend, in the first round. A win over Duke could be Donovan's first step into the category of college's coaching elite.
Fun Fact: Donovan has recruited four McDonald's All-Americans (Mike Miller, Teddy Dupay, Brett Nelson, Donnell Harvey) in the past two seasons.
Old School
School: Oklahoma State University
Record: 26-6 this season (658-258 overall in 30 seasons)
NCAA Tournament: Sutton is the only coach ever to take four teams (Creighton, Arkansas, Kentucky and OSU) to NCAA Tournaments. He has also taken 21 of his 30 teams to the NCAA's.
The Scoop: When you follow in legendary coach Henry Iba's footsteps, there's a lot of ground to cover. But Sutton seems to have done a good job, amassing 650-plus wins in his 30 seasons as a college basketball coach. An Oklahoma State graduate, Sutton worked as Iba's graduate assistant at OSU during the 1958-59 season. Sutton's teams have twice posted 32-4 records — the first time, with the 1977-'78 Razorbacks, he went to the Final Four; the second, with the '85-'86 Wildcats, he made it to the Elite Eight. Sutton finally arrived back at the Final Four in 1995, when his Bryant "Big Country" Reeves-led team powered its way past opponents. This game pits a Great Gatsby-like scenario, as Sutton — the old — faces Seton Hall's Tommy Amaker — the new up-and-comer.
Fun Fact: Sutton has coached more years (41) than Amaker (35) and Billy Donovan (34) have lived.

New School
School: Seton Hall University
Record: 22-9 this season (52-39 overall in three seasons)
NCAA Tournament: After two 15-15 NIT seasons, Tommy Amaker has finally made it to the Big Dance. Question is, can his Pirates ride the emotion of first- and second-round overtime victories into an upset against Duke?
The Scoop: Tommy Amaker could very well face his mentor, Mike Krzyzewski, in the East Regional final should both teams win their semifinal matchups. It would be a classic student-teacher battle, two coaches with similar systems facing off. Thirteen years at Duke — four as a player, nine as an assistant coach — instilled Coach K's idiosyncrasies in Amaker. Using them, Amaker has found great success with the Pirates this season. SHU upset Syracuse 69-67 in the Carrier Dome earlier this season, earning Amaker's biggest win to date. He should post many more, considering how respected he has become. Amaker garnered the same plaudits as a player, earning All-America and National Defensive Player of the Year honors in 1987 for the Dukies.
Fun Fact: Amaker also helped lead the 1985 U.S. Jones Cup team to a gold medal.

All season, Seton Hall head coach Tommy Amaker fed the Big East media a cute but simple mantra. "We're going to go as far as The Little Man can take us," he would say in almost every interview.

The Little Man, 5-foot-10 senior point guard Shaheen Holloway, lifted the Pirates throughout the year and kept his magic alive in March. Last Friday in Buffalo, his last-second layup gave SHU a 72-71 triumph overtime triumph over Oregon.

Highlights dominated Holloway's season, an exclamation point after three campaigns of injuries and disappointing records. Despite playing in a league full of standout point guards, he posted 13.2 points and 5.7 assists per game, good enough to merit second-team All-Big East honors.

But in round two of the NCAA Tournament, fate pulled the emergency brake on Holloway's season. After scoring a layup against Temple, the senior landed awkwardly on his left ankle and severely sprained its outer ligaments.

- Confined to a wheelchair, Holloway watched SHU upset the Owls 67-65 to advance to Syracuse. But the status of The Little Man who led the Pirates physically and emotionally remains in doubt as his team battles Oklahoma State tonight.

The Pirates get outrebounded by two boards per game and average more turnovers than they force. But the Pirates own a 7-1 mark in games decided by five points or less and four wins without a loss when contests spill into overtime.

With a healthy Holloway running the show, don't expect the No. 10 seed Pirates to keep to this weekend.

Heavenly grace.

The skid hit without warning in mid-February and nearly sent Seton Hall to a Spring Break in the NIT.

The Pirates hovered near the top of the Big East standings into the conference schedule's final quarter before dropping four of five contests heading to the tournament.

Nothing went well for the boys from South Orange. N.J. Sharpshooter Darius Lane's bombs found rim instead of net, and Haitian center Samuel Dalembert found himself in foul trouble night after night.

After splitting a pair in the Big East Tournament, the Pirates survived two overtime thrillers in Buffalo to advance to Syracuse.

Lame and reserve guard Ty Shine canned big triples to hang with Temple, and Dalembert shut down Oregon's post threats in a fistful of blocked shots.

"I can't tell you how thrilled and excited we are to be in this position," head coach Tommy Amaker said. "To beat an opponent (Temple) that probably had a chance to win it all, we kept on the spot." There was an opportunity to be there at the end. It's a very tough task."

Amaker starts two freshmen and a sophomore with seniors Holloway and Rimas Kaukenas, and the mix of youth and experience carried the Pirates to wins over Syracuse and St. John's in the regular season. The Hall has won three straight under Carrier's bubble as well, capped by a 69-67 triumph to break Syracuse's 19-game winning streak.

Oklahoma State head coach Eddie Sutton is in his 30th year of coaching, but he still hasn’t lost his enthusiasm for the game. His dynamic Cowboys enter the third round of the NCAA Tournament after dominating their first- and second-round games.

When you have a high-flier like Desmond Mason, a floor general like Doug Gottlieb and a scorching player like Fredrik Jonzen, it’s easy to be content.

"It is a special time of the year for college basketball and it has grown in leaps and bounds," Sutton said. "A first-round game today is like what a Sweet 16 game was like, and the Sweet 16 is as hyped as much as the Final Four was."

In said Sweet 16 matchup, the Cowboys face an upset Seton Hall team that upset second-seeded Temple in the second round.

And they do so with a strong and balanced offense.

Gottlieb dishes out 8.6 assists per game, second best in the nation. His recipients are Mason (15.1 ppg), Brian Montonati (12.2 ppg) and Glendon Alexander (12.0 ppg).

But, said Sutton, the Cowboys have a tendency to fall into lapses.

"Our inconsistency has concerned us, but you have to remember who we have played," Sutton said. "I’m sure some of those teams were responsible for us having an off night."

He still has Mason, one of the most explosive players in the nation. The 6-foot-5 swingman shoots 50.7 percent from the field and an unconscious 42.6 percent from 3-point range.

And his purpose for the Cowboys is evident: Provide the spark that will advance the boys from Stillwater to the next round.

"When Desmond plays well," Sutton said, "we are a great basketball team."

When you have a high-flyer like Desmond Mason, a floor general like Doug Gottlieb, and a scorching player like Fredrik Jonzen, it’s easy to be content.

Sometimes, it runs uncontrollably wild.

Doug Gottlieb’s mouth, something he can’t seem to — or chooses not to — control, has earned similar press to his teammate, Desmond Mason, and notably rivaling his head coach, Eddie Sutton.

Don’t forget: Oklahoma State’s senior point guard has game. Give him a silver medal for his 8.7 assists per game. And Gottlieb earns an undisputed gold, along with a 1.0 for his mastery of the art few can perfect.

Running smack.

Gottlieb brings his pass ‘n’ crash show to Syracuse this weekend, as his third-seeded Cowboys look to escape the NCAA Tournament’s East Regional and move on to the Final Four.

Neither the hard-hitting one-liner nor the game-long verbal tirade is a problem for Gottlieb, who, when not talking trash on the court, moonlights on Jim Rome’s nationally syndicated radio program.

There, he engaged in a verbal war with Kansas’ Eric Chenowith. After Chenowith berated Gottlieb about his 44 percent free-throw shooting, Gottlieb effortlessly shot back.

"At least I don’t get booed at home," he said about the much-maligned Chenowith.

Gottlieb 1, Chenowith 0.

And like most of the games the smack-talker plays, he ended up ahead.

University investigates 30-person brawl in Schine

BY TIFANY LANKES

A dance party ended in mayhem Friday night when a 45-minute brawl ensued between members of the Syracuse University football team and brothers in the Omega Phi Psi fraternity.

The only arrests made after the fight in Schine Student Center were of two SU football players, center Patrick Alexander and cornerback Will Allen, said Sgt. Dave Sacltett, a spokesman for the Syracuse Police Department. Both were charged with disorderly conduct and resisting arrest, according to a police report.

Offensive guard Vaughn Smith was a suspect in the case, according to a police report.

The incident involved about 20 people cut of the more than 600 who attended the event, said Leslie Grinner, with the issues and the way previous political actions, it is difficult to tell it apart from professional wrestling.

The system should be privatized, de-fragmented, she said. "Social Security system is going to go bust in 14 years," Kennedy added.

There has been a deliberate and steady erosion of their power." he said. "We have to find a way to get our power back."
Protesters clash with police

NEW YORK CITY — Furious protesters hurled bottles and clashed with police Saturday near the United Nations, chasing an unarmed black man shot dead by a police officer, the latest police shooting to inflame tensions between Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and the minority community.

The 24-year-old Jo led the exultation that greeted the Rev. Al Sharpton when he arrived on the scene Saturday with a group of national clergy to knock bottles thrown outside a Brooklyn church as the funeral Mass ended. One officer was seen holding his head, wrapped in a bandage. In all, 23 police were injured, some suffering torn ligaments or broken fingers. Others had to have shards of glass rinsed out of their eyes.

Police said 27 people were arrested on charges ranging from disorderly conduct to inciting a riot during the clash which occurred within the boundaries of an American flag. They were expected to be arraigned on Sunday. Four civilians were injured, police said, but details of their conditions were not immediately released.

Police said a miles-long procession of more than 3,000 protesters and mourners led by the Rev. Al Sharpton had followed a hearse carrying the body of 1-year-old Patrick Dorismond from a funeral home to St. Ann’s Catholic Church in the service.

Dorismond’s shooting in March was the third time in the past 13 months that an American black man has been fatally shot by undercover officers.

Microsoft faces deadline date

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Clinton administration’s drive for emergency funds to combat Colombian drug traffickers and to consolidate the anti-Kollonian government apparently is waning Sunday, after House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said he agreed with Senate leaders that a final decision on such financing be put off until later this year.

The House Appropriations Committee recently approved a $9 billion package of emergency spending, including about $3.8 billion more than Clinton requested.

But the administration now says that Congress should consider the funding request as part of next year’s regular appropriation bills.

Hastert and the White House until now have argued for swift action on Colombian aid to help staunch the flow of illegal drugs to this country. But on “Fox News Sunday,” the speaker acknowledged, “We may have to break it up and move it into the regular appropriation.”

The administration said it still was not too late to pass the emergency spending measure this spring.

Gore pledges campaign reform

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Vice President Al Gore, conceding he is an “imperfect messenger” for campaign finance reform, plans to unveil Monday an ambitious proposal for eliminating “soft money” and financing American politics with a new public-private endowment.

With Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., at his side, Gore intends to promise that if he is elected president, the first bill he will send to Congress — on his first day in office — will be Feingold’s proposed campaign finance overhaul.

Gore also will promote forming a “Democratic Endowment” that would pay for presidential and congressional elections with tax-deductible contributions.

The speech, excerpts of which were provided by the Gore campaign, promises that the talks center on placing the second-place finisher. Com- munism is a “cancer on the potential credibility problem on the issue.”

Bush has bemoaned political money as a “cancer on the issue.”

Campaign finance reform is “a cancer on the issue.”

While the rally served to inform students about SIU's reluctance to join, it also served as a warning to university administrators that more direct action would be taken if it did not join by April 1 — a deadline SCOUL and SIEAC gave the university, said Sam Adoff, an un- declared sophomore.

Syracuse fails to meet requirements of real city

A family friend once said, “If a person sees a peddle on the street and stops to fix it on, then he is definitely from the city.” Since I was born and raised in Hong Kong, I know exactly what he means. When my friend Ed Mattiuzzi came to visit me last October, we had an educational debate over whether Syracuse is a city because it has factories and strip clubs. On the contrary, I believe Syracuse is only a town since it lacks the essential characteristics of a city.

My version of a city consists of a downtown area bustling with life, a public transportation system that is easy to navigate, and extensive cultural activities that are at least three hours away where people can hang out. Let’s call it “Chung’s four-pronged test.” All the major cities in the world satisfy these requirements. Think Paris, Berlin, Buenos Aires, London, Tokyo, Lisbon and Madrid.

However, Syracuse fails the Chung test. First, Syracuse tacks off into the “endangered species” category. If you don’t have a car in Syracuse, you are pretty much stuck. If you have to leave the SU Hill, you can either beg a ride from a friend who has a car or call a cab company. Calling a taxi in Syracuse is itself a Kafkaesque experience: you have to wait for thirty minutes or the cab will never show up. My worst record was a three-hour wait to get home from the movie theater on a snowy night.

Every city’s underground transportation has its unique culture. The Tokyo Subway is the fastest. The Boston T is the slowest. The London Underground is the gloomiest. The Hong Kong Mass Transit Railway is the cleanest. The Paris Metro has the best-looking people. The New York City Subway is the dirtiest and has the most lunatics.

Syracuse’s only major public transportation system is the Centro. My educational horizon is enhanced every time I take a Centro bus. One gets to meet pot heads, gigantic people, pretentious suburbanites, and characters straight out of the Goofus baseball trilogy in just one ride. Of course, the best moment occurs when the last stretch ends and the money is yanked from these people to keep them quiet. Each Centro bus ride equals the joyride of a lifetime.

Finally, there is arguably only one place where people hang out in Syracuse — Armory Square. Actually, I take it that Syracuse girls are only mediocre. Evidently, we must first blame the tanning centers for making our sorority sisters look like roasted pigs, and the trendy stores for supplying them with high-scaled shoes. Ed insists that Syracuse girls try hard to catch up with the New York City fashion, only that they are four months behind. I agree.

To sum up, many of my male friends, certain features of Syracuse girls are questionable though they never blame them to their female counterparts. For example, dark-colored nail polish such as purple and black should be prohibited. Too much makeup does not depict the purpose of natural beauty. Smoking in public places is the ultimate turn-off. Artificial tan is a sin.

My friend Armando Rosquete from Miami says girls in Miami are more naturally beautiful, but northern girls are much more sophisticated. Though there is some truth in his statement, I always wonder if he could blame some of his sorority sisters dancing on their own porch that is 44% on Manhattan Street.

Ryan Powell's two-goal, six-assist performance leads No. 1 Syracuse past the Tigers.

Mulligan's 23 saves shut down Towson

In the final stanza, it was the All-American Powell and the SU defense that came through with flying colors, holding all play at the other end of the field. The senior tallied two of his three scores, including the exclamation point for only the third time in his 4-year career, with 8:54 left. The Orangemen (4-0) are looking for a No. 1 victory in the second consecutive game, this time 39-33.

The SU offense just has too many weapons, Desko said. "They held it a little bit, especially in the first half. Once they had moved south due to the NCAA's recommendation, the teams were playing pretty good, but the SU defense remained steady, with junior Patience limited to a trio of shots. The All-American Powell is the key to the Syracuse attack. He's every move. The TU senior did not record a point for only the third time against a ranked opponent. The Syracuse defense, led by Rob Mulligan's 23 saves, shut down Towson.

Despite pasting the Tigers, Josh Coffman and the SU offense was penalized for the second consecutive game in the Crease, but only 25 possessions, and the junior in the crease to maintain the Orangemen's 6-2 victory over Towson.

Family dedications inspire Gators to victory

Above Udonis Haslem’s Bashy Nikes and below his bright blue Florida shorts, a badge of honor wrapped around his ankle. Written on it, in a piece of plain white tape, in bold, block letters, was simply “MY BROTHER.” “He was the kind of guy who inspired me,” said Haslem, the Gators’ 260-pound center. “As a young kid, I went to the court with a lot of big guys, and they wouldn’t let me play. My brother was the only one that would pick me. He would give me a chance to play.”

As Haslem celebrated the Gators’ 77-65 victory against Oklahoma State on Sunday in the Carrier Dome, all he could think about was his brother.

Sam Woosen, the guy who dragged eager Udonis along with him to the courts in Miami, died last year of cancer. He was 30.

Brian Wright cut two lockers down, “BROTHERS AND SISTERS” written on his ankle.

“We haven’t done anything like this before,” he said. “But, there’s a first time for everything, and it made us focus on our task at hand.”

There was a little black dot.

“We think (Paradise) is one of the better shooters in the country,” SU head coach John Desko said, “so we wanted to know where he was at all times. John Giatzel did a nice job covering him and really knowing where he was off the ball.”

SU also got strong play from Joe Ceglia and reserve Tom Nee. With the additional help, starters Marshall Abrams, Billy St. George and Giatzel had plenty of support in keeping Towson cutters from getting good looks.

With Kenyan Weeks’ thunderous jam as time expired, their mission had been accomplished.

Personally and as a team, Weeks spoke with his mother, Karen Mintor, at 9 a.m. yesterday, “I told her I was going to do something,” Weeks said, “and it was going to be for her.”

The senior captain walked around after the game wearing an old white jersey with smeared blue and pink ink on it.

You could vaguely make out what the letters said.

We are going to the Final Four.

After my pre-game meal, at about 2:35, I came up to my room, Weeks said. “I wrote this on my shirt. I wish you could be here to see this. I know he’s watching. I know it.”

Yes, Sam Woosen was watching, as was the rest of the Florida faithful. All saw a great — and grateful — Gator band fueled by the six-inch-wide badge of honor.

Indeed, the tape told the story.

MSU road trip proves fun despite loss

In the end, it was all worth it. Fourteen hours of driving, 14,000 Michigan State fans and 40 minutes of basketball that took us from the kings of Brackenridge to just another Sweet 16 side-show.

The road trip really began at 4 a.m. on Monday when tickets for the Sweet 16 first went on sale at Manley Field House. Derek and I were the first to arrive, and we were rewarded with a TV appearance on the 6 o’clock news.

After three days of anticipation and hype, we left Delphi Hall at 11:45. Thursday morning, and our journey had begun. Derek was a Detroit native and the seven-hour drive that lay ahead was routine for him. But this time, we were heading back to the Motor City with a purpose—to see our beloved Orangemen continue their run through the tournament.

About six hours later, we hit Windsor, Ontario, to where we would return later in the night. We decided to make a quick pit-stop before we headed back over the river and we picked up a pair of Cuban cigars for what we hoped would be our victory celebration.

As we got closer to Detroit, we began to pick up the local sports-radio station. The talk was dominated by Michigan State fans who had already handed the victory to the Spartans. The DJs were even promoting a contest to win tickets to see Michigan State on Saturday.

Of course, with the game being played in the backyard of East Lansing, the entire city was painted green and white for the big game. As we neared the Palace of Auburn Hills, the State fans surrounded us as cars passed us by with State stickers, flags and license plates. We got to our seats dressed in full orange paraphernalia, greeted the rest of the SU supporters who made the journey and settled in for what we hoped would be a memorable night. Down 11-3 after the first few minutes, we still stood proud waiting for our team to get in sync. And by the time the first half had come to a close, the Orange faithful, including the two of us, were overwhelmed with excitement. The majority crowd was quiet and complaining.

I had left my voice five minutes into the game, and the 100 or so orange-clad fans around me were in the same situation. We chanted, "Let’s Go Orange," and shouted back at all the Spartan fans who were in shock by the Orange output in the first half. For the moment, we felt

NYPIRG argues vote

BY TIFFANY LANKES Asst. News Editor

Tension filled a crowded Maxwell Auditorium on Monday evening as members of the New York Public Interest Research Group plotted against the Student Government Association to secure about $70,000. After more than an hour of debate, the Assembly voted to uphold its decision to conduct a second NYPIRG referendum in two years. The result of the vote will determine NYPIRG's future Student Activity Fee funding.

For more than 20 years, the group has received its funding directly from students through a referendum vote conducted every four years. The referendum last year allowed $6 from every Syracuse University student's activity fee — or about $70,000 total — to go directly to NYPIRG. But SGA decided last week to conduct another referendum two years before the next scheduled vote.

Though only 4 percent of the student population voted in last year's referendum, 83 percent of those who participated voted to approve the funds, said Ben Tevelin, a NYPIRG member and senior geography major.

SGA Assistant Comptroller Mery Vieira said all money allotted to the group should be filtered through the association, like other student organizations. This would ensure that all student groups have a fair share.

SGA merger looms with University Union

University Union and the Student Government Association are looking to merge, but said Monday they need student feedback before scheduling a vote.

"We are a student group," said Assemblman Adam Duffy, a freshman in the College of Visual and Performing Arts. "We need to know what the students think about this."

SGA approached UU a month ago to discuss the benefits of a merger between the two student-run organizations, said SGA Assistant Comptroller Mery Vieira.

Class project aids charity walkathon

BY BETH BRAVERMAN Staff Writer

Ten teams of Syracuse University students and faculty participated in the American Heart Association's fund-raising walk Saturday, collecting more than $2500 for the association.

Members of the Community Outreach Group had hoped to raise at least $1000 through the program and are pleased to have surpassed that goal, said Matt Koren, an organizer of the event and a founder of the group.

The group, comprised of five public relations students, aimed to help a non-profit organization as a class project. They researched several organizations but chose AHA because it is a worthwhile cause that best suited the community, said Kevin Roane, a founder and member of the group.

"Heart disease is the leading cause of death in the nation and the Syracuse area, and strokes are number three," said Christine Lorry, an AHA representative.

The group also represented SU at the walk "because it was not well-represented in the past," group member Chris Wallace said. Last year only one team from SU participated in the event.

The group spent time recruiting teams from campus organizations and collected prizes and donations from local businesses as incentives for the teams.

First prize was a dinner gift certificate for Darwin's Restaurant and Bar, 701 S. Crouse Ave. Second was a dinner from Papa John's Pizza and third prize was a basket from Bruegger's Bagels. The SU Office of Admissions raised the most money and won first place.

To establish teams, the group also sought people from various groups to serve as a team captain and then make their own team, Wallace said.

Manitoba - In 1895, a 6-year-old boy named Elian Gonzalez was rescued from Cuba during an attempt to flee the island. His mother died in the attempt, and Elian was placed in the care of his father, who worked in the United States. Elian quickly became an American citizen and spent much of his time in the United States.

The case of Elian Gonzalez was a controversial one, with much public debate and legal wrangling. In the end, the boy was allowed to stay in the United States with his father.

The story of Elian Gonzalez was one of many international stories that helped to shape the modern world. It is a reminder of how events in one part of the world can have far-reaching consequences, and how important it is to be aware of the issues that affect people around the globe.

IMMIGRANTS LOSE WELFARE BATTLE

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Supreme Court of the United States has ruled that immigrants who are here illegally are not eligible for welfare benefits.

The court’s decision is a significant setback for the immigrants who have been living in the United States without legal status for years. Many of these immigrants have been relying on welfare programs to make ends meet, and the ruling will likely lead to a significant increase in poverty for this group.

The decision was also seen as a blow to the Democratic Party, which has traditionally been the party of immigrants. The party has been criticized for its policies towards immigration, and the decision is likely to further damage its standing with voters.

OPEC NEARS CONSENSUS

VIENNA, Austria — With much of the world praising for the first time since 1973, OPEC has agreed to increase production by 2 million barrels per day, a move that is expected to bring prices down to levels not seen since 1990.

But as ministers from the cartels 11 members held their first meeting Monday at a luxury hotel not far from OPEC headquarters, there were clear differences of opinion. Some nations wanted higher prices while others were willing to accept lower prices in return for more oil being pumped out of the ground.
Point Zero encourages racial profiling dialogue

By Kate Stevenson
Asst. News Editor

To inform students about policies in racial profiling, Point Zero is hosting a panel discussion about the issue at 7:30 tonight in the Schine Student Center Underground.

"Originally it was just going to be a straight discussion," said Point Zero member Michele Lee, a sophomore political science and public relations major. "But we decided that a panel discussion would be more useful because a lot of people don't understand the subject of racial profiling."

Racial profiling is the practice of focusing law enforcement on groups of individuals who are deemed more criminally active based on their race. Sophomore Mark Samuels, a marketing and advertising major, agreed that Syracuse University students need more information about the topic.

"Most parts of the day not filled with work are filled with leisure activities, not focusing on issues going on in the real world," Samuels said.

Few people read newspapers unless it is for a class, he added. This lack of attention to current issues can contribute to the ignorance of the subject, he said.

"It's not something people want to think about," Samuels said. "They want to dismiss it."

Hopefully, tonight's discussion will be "one of many," Samuels said. Point Zero plans to host more discussions of racially-oriented subjects, including one regarding affirmative action sometime this semester, he said.

The group chose to discuss racial profiling because of recent events that raised questions about the policy. Lee said.

In February 1999, 22-year-old West African immigrant Amadou Diallo was shot to death by four white police officers outside of his Bronx home. The officers fired 41 shots at Diallo, hitting him 19 times. They justified their actions by claiming Diallo was reaching for a weapon. He was actually reaching for his wallet.

The discussion will look at different aspects of racial profiling, racial profiling in the media, the Diallo case, lots of stuff," Lee said.

The event will feature African American Male Congress President Anthony Quinn, Nashonie Chang from the Caribbean Students Association and College Republicans representative Luke Gabello.

Gabello will offer a different, positive viewpoint regarding racial profiling, Lee said.

"It's very difficult to find people who support racial profiling," she added.

Gabello said he supports racial profiling, but not to "assign automatically a sentence of guilt." The practice is common sense, he said. "It's very prudent for police officers to use their experiences to help enforce laws," he said. "It really does help reduce crime."

He referred to former ambassador and Republican presidential hopeful Alan Keyes' favorable stance on the issue as being a wise one. People should be aware of stereotypes and work to combat them, he said.

"When you go out in public, you represent three things," said Gabello, a junior computer and political science major. "Yourself, your family and your race."

He added that he hopes students who attend the "very open dialogue" will leave with a greater understanding of the subject.

"It will provide SU with a greater amount of opinion on the matter," Gabello said. "More people will consider the matter more personally."

The night, that resulted in the arrests of two football players, began when one player allegedly hit another attendee and knocked him out. The brawl then escalated to involve more than 30 people.
The Syracuse Police Department arrived at the scene with dogs, allegedly letting one loose on at least one student.
Center Patrick Alexander and cornerback Will Allen were charged with disorderly conduct and resisting arrest. Offensive guard Vaughn Smith was a suspect.

"There has always been friction at those parties. But I don't think we've ever had anything like this," Robinson said. "There's always been some bad blood between those two organizations."
Robinson refuted claims that Public Safety officers neglected their job when they did not interfere with the brawl.
"With five to 600 people, what are you going to prevent?" Robinson asked. "If people are going to fight, they're going to fight. If there's a fight going on, they do what they can."
Because of the number of people involved in the brawl, students can be thankful there were not more serious injuries, Robinson said.
There were only two reported injuries, those of the attendee who was knocked out and of football starting running back Dee Brown who injured his hand.
The university must now investigate the brawl to determine its causes and who was involved, SU Spokesman Kevin Morrow said.
"Then a decision will be made about what action should be taken," Morrow said. "We have to determine what caused the arrest. We need to determine what happened."
Morrow added that while he was not sure how the students would be reprimanded, the charges for which they were arrested may also have violated the SU Code of Student Conduct.
"This was an unfortunate incident," Morrow said. "There were certainly a number of individuals acting irresponsibly."

SPRINGTIME, WHEN A YOUNG MAN'S FANCY TURNS TO 6'7" POWER FORWARDS IN LONG SHORTS.
SGA second guesses NYPIRG allocation

More than 900 freshly-inked John Hancocks wasn't enough to convince the Student Government Association that the SU sports teams don't want another trip to the voting booth.

Under a 27-year-old contract, SGA is required to call a referendum every four years to decide if the New York State Public Interest Research Group can continue receiving $4 from each Student Activity Fee. However, the contract also allows SGA to call referendums more often — as often as it deems necessary.

But a referendum this year, just one year after 83 percent of the SU voting population chose to maintain NYPIRG's funding, isn't necessary.

SGA claims a new referendum is needed to counter last year's "skewed" voting process, when NYPIRG members championed their cause near polling places, unfairly swaying voters.

But fierce conviction and convincing arguments are the hallmark of a good campaign, not a reason to cry foul at the ballot box.

But referendums shouldn't happen at the hands of a few Assembly members with a transparent agenda. Organization of the voting process takes time and money that neither of the groups has to spare.

If SGA wants to hold NYPIRG as tightly as the dozens of other campus student groups and review their financial allotments each year, perhaps it's time to take a look at altering SGA's contract with NYPIRG.

But last year, students willingly opened their wallets for NYPIRG for the next four years. It's not SGA's job to tell them they don't know how to manage their own money.

Comic books provoke thoughts on reality, equality

Comic books are not merely a medium for entertainment, they can also provoke thoughts on reality and equality. They provide a platform for diverse representations and interpretations of cultural and social issues.

When I was a kid I wanted to be Superman. Or was it Spider-Man? I really can't remember. My childhood thoughts were as clearly as I once did. Too many brain cells have met their demise at the hands of frosty, cold beer.

But I digress.

I, like many kids, found enjoyment in comic books. Comics were filled with courageous, spanel-clad heroes trying to save the world. I wanted to be a part of them. I wanted to feel the wind rush through my hair, soaring high above the clouds. I wanted to thwart a nefarious villain's scheme by wrecking his elaborate doomsday device with a snap of my fingers.

But puberty never granted me superpowerful, any other special skills. Maybe I'm a late bloomer. Maybe in June my superhuman ability to transform will reveal itself. I guess that's why I still collect those funny books — I'm still holding onto the dream.

Assuming that never will happen, I decided that journalism is my field, but no matter how exciting it is to be a maverick armed with a pen and a notepad, nothing can beat the hero's life.

But superheroes in comic books never could rely solely on action and guns. Each character had a secret identity, a human persona. The Hulk is really Bruce Banner, a scientist. Peter Parker-Spider-Man — is a nerd with a alter ego for photojournalism. Batman is billionaire Bruce Wayne. The good writers trump up the human side of the heroes, taking the reader under the mask to depict how technology advances no video game can do for a kid what a good comic book can — and the good writers had me hooked.

But even the other characters the wife of Wonder Woman, I could never get into the movie Superman. Thor is just a comic book character, he's the ancient Norse god of Thunder. With his blond hair and blue eyes, Hitler used him in his argument for a master race. Call me radical, but fierce conviction and convincing arguments are the hallmark of a good campaign, not a reason to cry foul at the ballot box. Thor opened my eyes. I realized that every other character the wife of Wonder Woman, Spider-Man, shared a common guise — they all were card-carrying members of the most powerful special interest group in the world. They were all white men.

The sweatshop campaign continues with vigils

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Staff Writer

The Student Environmental Action Coalition is building on the awareness of globalization brought by last week’s sweatshop protests, said Keegan Cox, SEAC member.

SEAC set up information tables Monday in the Schine Student Center directed at educating students on environmental activism, and how to mobilize against the International Monetary Fund and World Bank, said Kelly Nagy, SEAC National Council coordinator.

"They’re bogus corporations that were set up to diminish poverty in the third world but instead work in favor of large corporations, increasing poverty in the third world," Nagy said.

A presentation regarding the World Trade Organization protests in Seattle earlier this year will be made at 7 p.m. Tuesday in the Hall of Languages, Room 500, said Cox, a graduate student in the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry.

The purpose of the forum is to inform students on why thousands of people, from academics to family farmers, assembled to protest the policies of the WTO, Cox added.

The demonstration will teach civil disobedience tactics to safely and effectively shut down the meetings of organizations like the IMF and World Bank, Cox said.

Another rally on the Quad is set for 9 p.m. Thursday.

"We got a lot of people to come out and hold candles in the rain," Wissink said after the first vigil Monday night. About 15 people attended the vigil.

"It's an opportunity to learn more and to meet people with different ideas," said SEAC member Eric Montgomery, a senior geography and Spanish major. "Something has to be done to prevent the IMF from exploiting the poorer third world."

Vigils will be held at 8:30 p.m. every day this week on the Quad, Nagy said. Students attending the vigil will sing on behalf of exploited workers in sweatshops.

"We're not making any money on campus," Wissink said. I believe the coalitions on this campus are directly responsible for the inevitability."

SGA continued from page 1 chance of receiving available funding, Vieira said.

“When it’s not fair that you’re one organization that is being favored over other one organizations,” said Vieira, a freshman in the College for Human Development. “If you are really for our students then you’d cooperate with us. We just want to level the playing field so everyone has a chance.”

NYPIRG was not notified when the issue would be addressed, said Tyler Sparks, a NYPIRG member. When the organization learned of the new referendum, members circulated a student petition to stop the vote, he added.

“Nobody in our group was aware NYPIRG was coming up in the Assembly,” said Sparks, a senior broadcast journalism major. “Working with SGA, we wanted a chance to answer any questions and discuss having this referendum again.”

NYPIRG received 922 student signatures in support of stopping the vote. Sparks said.

Group representatives presented the signatures to the Assembly on Monday night, along with a 1970s contract between SGA and NYPIRG to consider a reconsideration of last week’s decision.

The contract states that a referendum vote will be conducted every four years to determine if NYPIRG should receive its funding directly from the student body. According to the contract, however, SGA can conduct additional votes if it deems that NYPIRG is neglecting its responsibility to work for students’ needs.

“Students on this campus and students in the student association get together and decide that students need an outlet for activism,” said Kevin Connex, a NYPIRG member and senior television, radio and film major. “They had an allocation to pay for a separate student fee to achieve goals that the students want.”

Sparks said that if the organization loses its funding, many programs that were planned after last year’s vote would not be able to continue. The time and cost of advertising for these programs would go away from the group’s ability to focus on more important issues, he added.

“Referendum is a tremendous time and energy consumer,” said Tevelin. “NYPIRG has a responsibility to every campus to provide events. It takes a lot of time away from what we’ve been doing for the students.”

NYPIRG members argued that the bill passed by the Assembly last week falsely identifies the organization as being a part of the budget process. The clause in the bill reads that students can vote to "exempt NYPIRG from the budgetary process. The group, however, has always been independent of SGA for funding.

In next week’s referendum, students can vote to have their $8 directly allocated to the Student Fee rather than NYPIRG.

Procedurally that can’t happen because the contract we have with you states the SGA shall not be authorized to otherwise allocate this money,” Sparks said.

Parliamentarian Jonathan M. Taylor, a fifth-year architecture student, explained that the bill passed by the Assembly means that every four years NYPIRG can conduct an additional referendum.

While NYPIRG claims to be an independent student organization, many students on campus do not know of the organization or its various programs, Assemblyman Dwight Williams said. Decision of this new referendum is necessary, he added.

“I do deem it necessary when a lot of students are collecting signatures about NYPIRG,” said Williams, a senior management major. “I see questions and the small turn-out at last year’s vote. I feel it’s necessary to take a re-count.”

Assemblyman Joe Sauer said he had been approached by a student who was unhappy with the manner in which NYPIRG solicited signatures for their petition.

“Students are coming to us and saying, ‘we had a merger proposal, and a student who was unhappy with the way it has been handled.’”

Following NYPIRG’s presentation, Assemblyman Eric Seltzer motioned to reconsider the proposal referendum and vote to rescind.

A referendum is a tremendous time and energy consumer.

Lisa Stone, UU president.

A separate organization is probably fit for NYPIRG because it is not a student organization, so it does not need the extra burden of making financial decisions, Stone said.

SGA Parliamentarian Jonathan M. Taylor said that by having the two groups join, their role on campus would expand, but not extensively.

“They can provide more help to the 75 to 80 other organizations on campus,” said Taylor, a fifth-year architecture student.

Taylor also proposed changing the name of the Student Association in order to reflect its new programming function, if a merger is passed.

There was no communication between the organizations before this proposal, Stone said.

“UU was not involved, and confused” when they heard of this lesser merger proposal, she added.

“Worse, I am disappointed that this was left out of the previous discussions considering that we do play a part in this merger,” Stone said.

UU had a meeting Monday night to discuss how the merger would help the organization accomplish its goals, Stone said.

“We have common goals — to provide the best programming possible, the student said. “But we also have overlapping interested and understandable to all student groups.”

If student organizations feel that it is easier to host events going through a separate one, NYPIRG then the same group will be willing to change, Stone added.

Because we are not expecting students to respond positively.

If thousands of students wanted to, then the money back from NYPIRG,” Stone said. “If students don’t want the money, the College of Arts and Sciences. “It almost seems that we have the money.”

The next week to withdraw their funding from the interest group, it will be unable to operate the same way it has in the past.

But this does not necessarily mean an end to the group, Assemblyman Adam Duffy said.

“Just means they are going to have to work even harder to keep their interest alive,” Duffy said, a freshman in the College of Visual and Performing Arts.

Though NYPIRG members were disappointed with SGA’s decision for an additional referendum, they now look to the student body to approve its funding.

Because the students voted for it overwhelmingly last year, Stone said, “they will do so again,” Sparks said. “Basically what happened here tonight is Assembly members have heard the voices of 922 students and ignored them.”

(VITA) is a free tax service available to all students trying to avoid a run-in with the Internal Revenue Service. A group of students, including myself, have been involved with the program for four years. Besides helping students complete their tax forms, Walsh said that the program is also very beneficial to the volunteers themselves. "The volunteers are getting the hands-on experience of applying tax principles," he said. "They are using the knowledge they have gained in the classroom to help others."

Students can bring their tax forms to the Bird Library during scheduled hours and have them completed in about 15 to 20 minutes. VITA is an IRS-sponsored organization with groups all over the country, including about six sites in Syracuse. In order to gain eligibility into the organization, students in the Syracuse University group must pass an exam issued by the IRS and given to all VITA members.

Frank Marra, a junior accounting major and VITA volunteer, said that the time students give to the VITA service is very helpful for inexperienced students trying to complete their taxes. "We know what we are doing and in a couple minutes, we are done," he said. "That's better than struggling over a book for two hours and not getting anywhere." Marra said that students can bring their W-2 and 10-99 forms to the volunteers on Tuesdays and Thursdays from noon to 5 p.m. and on Wednesdays from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. About 30 to 40 volunteers take shifts during these time slots to complete federal and New York State taxes. Volunteers can also complete out-of-state taxes if students bring a copy of their state's form.

William Walsh, an accounting professor who helps with the program and administers the IRS exams, has been involved with the program for four years. Besides helping students complete their tax forms, Walsh said that the program is also very beneficial to the volunteers themselves. "The volunteers are getting the hands-on experience of applying tax principles," he said. "They are using the knowledge they have gained in the classroom to help others.

Modern radio is organized so that people don't have to keep up with popular trends in music. If you don't like current Top 40 fare, you can easily switch to an easy listening station, which is basically Top 40 music from the previous decade or two. If easy listening is still too cutting edge, you can tune into an oldies station — Top 40 from a half-century ago. Most music strives to hit the modern Top 40 before going the less-hit route of easy listening. This is not the case with Steely Dan's new album, "Two Against Nature," which goes directly against typical Top 40 fare and aims for the easy listening portion of the dial.

Steely Dan, composed of Donald Fagen and Walter Becker, haven't released an album together since 1975's "Gaucho." Twenty years ago, the duo was known for producing light jazz-rock. Two decades haven't changed the formula — "Two Against Nature" is unplottably light listening, but occasionally so light that it becomes inaudible.

At its best, "Two Against Nature" is the model of an old-fashioned jam session. Fagen and Becker, noted perfectionists, surround themselves with talented studio musicians skilled on all kinds of instruments.

The album's eight-minute-plus coda, "West of Hollywood," is engaging through-out, thanks to a quick tempo and a flawless arrangement. Each member of the patched-together ensemble is given time to shine, especially Chris Potter, who closes the disc with a wonderful three-minute saxophone solo.

The two excellent tracks, however, are the exception rather than the rule on "Two Against Nature." The songs' up-tempo, energetic grooves are atypical of the rest of the music on the album, which favors slower, more deliberate rock-jazz. Unfortunately, "Two Against Nature" and "West of

Quote of the Day:

"If you don't like current Top 40 fare, you can easily switch to an easy listening station, which is basically Top 40 music from the previous decade or two. If easy listening is still too cutting edge, you can tune into an oldies station — Top 40 from a half-century ago.

Most music strives to hit the modern Top 40 before going the less-hit route of easy listening. This is not the case with Steely Dan's new album, "Two Against Nature," which goes directly against typical Top 40 fare and aims for the easy listening portion of the dial.

Columnist goes one-on-one with Shaw

Since it was a slow week in the world of entertainment, I decided to let the following two questions be my feature. The ideas came from the Summer Term in Syracuse University’s greatest mysteries. It would have been a waste of time to figure out why no one has ever heard of the man who originally gave it to me, but I decided to go with it.

By the way, his father liked to call him “Buster.” His favorite things are watching mystery novels, watching basketball and going to the movies. Shaw seems like a normal guy with personal concerns other than simply watching the game of the year, whatever order of events you, my reader, contrive. You may even see him eating a slice at Varsity’s Pizza.

VITA in order to help others.

VITA began helping students during the first week in March. Tapia said that though Tapia said that working with VITA has been a very positive experience, there are a few small drawbacks. For example, it is not unusual for someone that they own money to the government,” she said. SU students during the first week in March, and will be held a week before taxes are due. Last year, student volunteers filed 400 returns. Tapia said that the program has been just as successful this year.

The volunteers are available in Bird Library to file forms as well as answer any questions that students have. Tapia said that students need to file their taxes on their own, but still need some help, a Web site that gives them step-by-step filing instructions to avoid mistakes. "Don't feel bad," she said. "We all make mistakes." The program is sponsored by the local community.

"We generate income for other athletic teams through these two sports,“ Shaw said. “We also have to cater to people who’ll come back year after year. But doesn’t every other school do this as well without having student support? If so, what about SU wrestling? And without student support, why even have students pay for tickets?" Shaw said.

The Hobart head coach said he has known Desko since he was young and that he grew up admiring former Syracuse head coach Roy Simmons Jr.

"I have the utmost respect for the Syracuse program," O'Hara said. "This is a game that our kids are excited to play. They have the opportunity to beat the No. 1 team on its home field. You have to be ready for something like that."

Lastly, since Syracuse and Hobart share the same free-way, they also share the same recruiting hotbed in Central New York.

While Syracuse's national prominence may overshadow much of Hobart's recruiting efforts, both squads draw plenty of talent from the CNY area.

"We recruit a lot of players from that area," O'Hara said. There is a lot of talent to be found in Central New York."

Hobart enters each season with lofty expectations, O'Hara said. Thus far, those expectations have not been fulfilled.

The Statesmen tripped up in their first game against Army and also lost a one-goal game to Harvard. Hobart's wins came against Holy Cross and a 15-3 shellacking of Lafayette.

Hobart is led by junior midfelder Jamie Breslin. In the Lafayette blowout, Breslin registered six goals and an assist, earning him Rochester Area College Athletics Male Athlete of the Week Award.

"He plays big," O'Hara said of his star. "He looks more like the paperboy, but since the day he got here, he has been an inspirational leader to this program."

Breslin and Beebe lead the Statesman with 10 points each, while Kevin DeWall has tallied nine and Scott Harvey has garnered eight.

The Statesmen's roster boasts 19 New York products, including three West Genesee alumni — Jared Beebe, Mike Boaz and Eric Burns. Orange¬men Dan Stessen, Bob Rust and Brian Herloski all attended the Central New York lacrosse factory.

The key for Hobart, O'Hara said, will be to keep the ball out of Powell and company's hands.

"We need to make sure they don't have too many opportunities," O'Hara said. "Possession is the key. They have more than their share of people who can score. When they go on a tear, we need to stop the bleeding and get control of possession."

For the Orangemen, the 4-0 start is encouraging, especially with wins over lax powerhouse houses like Virginia and Johns Hopkins.

Both Hobart and Syracuse played games on Saturday, possibly leaving both teams a little tired. Come championship time, Syracuse hopes to be playing Saturday and Monday.

SU goalie Rob Mulligan said, so the schedule provides practice. For Syracuse, its good to be back in the Dome, fulfilling the legacy of a local rivalry.

"The home field is definitely an advantage for us," Mulligan said. "But we feel this team could win anywhere."

"We have a good team, and there's good camaraderie, and we're playing well. Home or away, we should win the game regardless. But we definitely love playing in the Dome. The crowd is always great."

Canadian Bieman leads by example

BY JODI HEBERT
Contributing Writer

Missy Bieman gave up the chance to finish college in warm, sunny Florida to come to cold, dreary Syracuse.

Missy Bieman left the friendships she spent two years developing to come here where she did not know anyone. Why would she pass up all of that?

In a word, softball.

Bieman, a 21-year-old junior, came to Syracuse University this year to take on the role of team leader for SU’s new Softball program.

Originally from Wingham, Ontario, Bieman knew the responsibility she would take on in joining the team.

“I knew it was a new program and that I would have the opportunity to help build it,” Bieman said. “I think it was exciting to step in help build a good team for future right off the bat.”

She is one of only two juniors on the freshman-dominated squad, as well as only two pitchers in this year. But Bieman takes it in stride.

“Missy has responded well to problems, and is not letting losses get to her too much,” head coach Mary Jo Firnbach said. “She is a strong person to want to come to a new program like this. She puts a lot of weight on her shoulders.”

Bieman’s mother, Nancy, explained her daughter’s dedication and leadership have grown out of her love for the sport.

“We gave her the opportunity to take on that responsibility that was Missy that had the drive to work hard,” she said. “It was Missy that was getting up in the morning to practice and was going to the gym three days a week.”

In softball, the pitcher plays a key role in the outcome of the game, and Bieman thrives on that pressure of leadership and drive to succeed.

“I like being a pitcher because I like having control and setting the tempo of the game,” Bieman said.

Despite her experience, dedication and competitiveness, Bieman still does not believe it is her place to tell her teammates what to do. Instead, she leads by example.

Bieman believes if she works hard and her teammates see it paying off, they will follow suit.

So far, Firnbach has been pleased with Bieman’s leadership, but the coach would like to see her take a more active role.

“We are looking for Missy to develop her leadership,” Firnbach said. “She is learning a lot about herself, how to handle her teammates and how to help them. We need her to become a little more vocal.”

As Bieman becomes more comfortable and adjusts to the change from her junior college to SU, she is beginning to realize what she has to do to both on and off the field.

The maturity and leadership skills she is learning now will help her reach her goal of becoming a coach in the future.

“When you are playing,” Bieman said, “you pick up things that will help you in everyday life after college.”

Hable trying to get off scoring snide

By Alison Hischak

Returning off a sophomore season in which she added 37 goals and finished with 106 points for the Syracuse women's lacrosse team, Katrina Hable expected more from herself this season.

The senior attacker, however, did not rack up high point totals with the Orange women's first five games.

She had tallied an occasional goal for SU, but Lauren Brady and Karen Haysly are now the leaders in the scoring column.

Hable broke out of her mini-slump and onto the scoreboard, scoring two goals in Syracuse's 8-3 victory over Massachusetts on Saturday.

SU football coaching staff set

By Eric Nathan

Just a few days away from the opening kickoff of spring football, coach Paul Pasqualoni filled out his roster of coaches.

While much of the student body sat at some sunny resort with a tropical drink in hand, coach P was hard at work in the Salt City during Spring Break.

He rounded out his staff by hiring Chris White, an SU graduate assistant from 1990-92, to assist with the tight ends.

White assumes the position formerly held by Dennis Goldman, who slid over to work with the wide receivers.

He arrives from Cal Poly-San Luis Obispo where he was the special teams coordinator. His resume includes stints as the line backers coach at UNLV and Arkansas State and quarterbacks coach at Holy Cross.

He was also the head man at Bishop Manogue High School in Reno, Nev., where he was honored as Northern Nevada Coach of the Year.

TriDelt sorority receive sanctions

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

An Office of Greek Life investigation into the Syracuse University chapter of Delta Delta Delta sorority concluded Tuesday with social and disciplinary probation given to the house, barring any social events for the remainder of the semester.

They were found responsible for Student Conduct Code violations — specifically alcohol and other drug policies, with regards to supplying alcohol to minors, creating a threatening environment, that type of thing," said Lisa Walsh, Assistant Director.

The investigations by OGL and the national TriDelt office were in response to a Feb. 23 alcohol violation.

TriDelt will remain on social probation until the end of the semester, meaning that the sorority may not sponsor or host any social events for the remainder of the semester.

The social violation is something to be concerned about. "This investigation is a reminder of the seriousness surrounding alcohol issues," Walsh said.

More students study abroad

There is a growing interest in international topics and the global economy. Students are seeing going abroad as useful to their future plans.

SHARON WITHERELL spokeswoman for the Institute of International Education

More Syracuse University students are studying abroad this year, said officials from the Division of International Programs Abroad Tuesday.

SU student enrollment in DIPA rose 37 percent since the 1995-1996 academic year, including a 12 percent increase from last year. This reflects national trends, said Jon Booth, DIPA deputy director.

The number of students nationwide studying in a foreign country also increased 15 percent during the 1997-1998 academic year and doubled during the past decade.

State official describes refugee atrocities, U.S. policies

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Asst. News Editor

When most diplomats travel to foreign countries, they stay in hotels and work in the capital city of the nation they are visiting, said Alan Kreczko, a U.S. deputy assistant secretary of state.

As senior deputy assistant secretary of state for population, refugees and migration, Kreczko is responsible for helping to organize the United States' role in aiding refugees throughout the world.

Kreczko visited Syracuse University Tuesday afternoon to explain aspects of U.S. refugee policy. He spoke to about 500 students and faculty in the Global Collaboratory classroom in the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs.

"Warfare has become increasingly inhumane," he said. "It has come to include the deliberate targeting of civilians in terror campaigns."

As of Jan. 1, 1999, there were 11.6 million refugees scattered around the globe, according to the United Nations High Commission for Refugees.

The U.N. commission defines a refugee as someone who cannot or does not want to return to their own country "because of a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of their race, religion, nationality, political opinion or membership in a particular social group."

The United States is the largest contributor to the U.N. See KRECZKO page 4

Panel exposes profiling fears

Students gathered Monday night in the Schine Student Center Underground to discuss what they fear is a growing trend — racial profiling.

As part of an event hosted by Point Zero, more than 40 students discussed the practice of focusing law enforcement on groups of individuals who are deemed more criminally active based on their race.

This practice led to the killing of West African immigrant Amadou Diallo on Feb. 4, 1999, by four white New York City police officers. Police shot Diallo 19 times after mistaking him for a suspect. He was unarmed.

"It scares me that someone that I care about is going to go outside and get shot or pulled over and beaten," said panelist Nashon.

More Syracuse University students are studying abroad this year, said officials from the Division of International Programs Abroad Tuesday.

SU student enrollment in DIPA rose 37 percent since the 1995-1996 academic year, including a 12 percent increase from last year. This reflects national trends, said Jon Booth, DIPA deputy director.

The number of students nationwide studying in a foreign country also increased 15 percent during the 1997-1998 academic year and doubled during the past decade.

State official describes refugee atrocities, U.S. policies

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Asst. News Editor

When most diplomats travel to foreign countries, they stay in hotels and work in the capital city of the nation they are visiting, said Alan Kreczko, a U.S. deputy assistant secretary of state.

As senior deputy assistant secretary of state for population, refugees and migration, Kreczko is responsible for helping to organize the United States' role in aiding refugees throughout the world.

Kreczko visited Syracuse University Tuesday afternoon to explain aspects of U.S. refugee policy. He spoke to about 500 students and faculty in the Global Collaboratory classroom in the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs.

"Warfare has become increasingly inhumane," he said. "It has come to include the deliberate targeting of civilians in terror campaigns."

As of Jan. 1, 1999, there were 11.6 million refugees scattered around the globe, according to the United Nations High Commission for Refugees.

The U.N. commission defines a refugee as someone who cannot or does not want to return to their own country "because of a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of their race, religion, nationality, political opinion or membership in a particular social group."

OPEC to increase output

VIENNA, Austria — After two days of grueling debate, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries approved a plan to increase oil production over the next three months in response to growing Western demand for fuel. OPEC said it was acting in response to U.S. sanctions that regulate its sales.

Negotiations continued through the night over how to divide up the extra production. But since Saudi Arabia has plenty of spare pumping capacity, specialists said the disagreement among OPEC partners should not hamper efforts to put more oil on the market and bring down prices.

Mexico, Norway and Canada, although they do not belong to OPEC, have indicated they will comply with the extra 400,000 barrels a day. If OPEC lives up to the commitment, analysts say, it would take two weeks to achieve this target. But one day after the Clinton administration failed to curb the rise in gas prices, a number of economists warned that the increase in output would be too small to push down prices.

Two kids die as train hits bus

TENNESSE, Ga. — A freight train hauling automobiles tore a school bus off its wheels in a collision at an unguarded railroad crossing early Tuesday, killing two children and injuring at least two others.

The train dragged the bus, battered yellow body about 100 yards. Some of the children were thrown to the ground beside the tracks. Others were found bloodied inside.

"It sounded like thunder or a bomb blew up," said Joe Brown, who lives about 300 feet from the crossing. He said he had seen his son's friend's daughter among the dead.

The crash is raising questions about the safety of rural crossings, particularly those near the homes of elderly neighbors.

President Clinton's administration recently called for an increase in births, a rise in fertility rates for most ethnic groups, and upward blips in deliveries for women of earlier and younger ages than their mothers did, returning to the trend of the 1950s and 1960s.

UC boat sinks, killing three

SAN DIEGO — A boat carrying at least nine college researchers studying spiders and other pests was lost at sea off Baja California, killing as many as 12 people and prompting an international search for the missing.

Four people were saved from safety and the near-sanctuary were rescued early Tuesday, said Lisa Jane, a spokeswoman for the University of California, Davis. A search was underway for the others.

The school said graduate students, undergraduate students and a visiting Japanese scholar were killed. The Coast Guard also said two people died, although the U.S. Embassy in Mexico confirmed three deaths.

The boat was on of two, 22-foot inflatable crafts carrying a total of about 20 people. It was a research expedition to study spiders and scorpions of the site, and had been in the water for about two days.

The crash is raising questions once again about the safety of rural, grade-level crossings. The one-lane crossing, just across the state line in Tennessee, has no lights or signs, only a few trees on either side, and the tracks curve through pine trees in hilly terrain, making it difficult to spot trains from the road.

North Korea warns U.S.

BEIJING — A high-level North Korean leader's proposed visit to the United States may not be possible as long as Washington continues to pressure North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons. The visit, proposed by North Korean leader Kim Jong Il, was tentatively scheduled for Sunday.

NIEDELL, Austria — An Alpine avalanche, started by a wall of snow Tuesday, killing at least 11 people, rescue officials said.

Ten people were found dead in the area of the avalanche near the town of Ischgl and another died after being hospitalized. Two others were able to free themselves while rescuers dug out a third survivor, who was found dead just west of the avalanche site.

Senators look at finance, U.S. flag

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Senate today rejected a proposed constitutional amendment giving Congress power to set reasonable limits on the amount of contributions that can be made to candidates for federal office. A two-thirds majority is needed for constitutional amendments.

Some hearings wanted his provision added to a proposed amendment on flag desecration introduced by Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. The flag vote could come later today or Wednesday.

The Hatch proposal is likely to mirror the lost flag-desecration vote in the Senate, in 1985, when supporters fell three short of the two-thirds needed to amend the Constitution.

Debate has focused on both sides of the issue, as opponents argued they seriously underrate Amendment's free speech rights.

Sorority representatives were unable to be reached for comment.

TriDelt did not receive extra sanctions from the SU Panhellenic Council, Walsh said.

Panelist and the SU Interfraternity Council Monitor houses separately from OGL. The council prosecutes chapters for violations such as hosting unauthorized events for Rush-related infractions, Walsh said. When a house violates university rules, such as those in the SU Student Code of Conduct, OGL becomes involved, she said.

Walsh added that she does not expect any problems from TriDelt during its probation. The sorority has not had any major violations in the past, she said.

“They’re great women,” Walsh said. “Knowing them, they’ll fix it and do something really positive. I think they’ve learned from this and will learn to have a social life without alcohol. The punishments for the sorority will not affect its participation in the impending Greek Week, which begins April 9, Walsh said. The week is an annual event during which houses participate in contests and games to raise money for a charity. This year the philanthropy will benefit victims of Huntington’s Disease.

In other Greek news: Investigations into Zeta Beta Tau fraternity in regards to an alleged March 1 Student Code of Conduct violation are concluding, and fraternity members are awaiting a letter informing them of the outcome, Walsh said.

Alpha Omicron Pi sorority is still under investigation by OGL for an alleged hazing incident Feb. 27. That investigation may not be completed until the end of the semester, Walsh added.

refugee commission and the role of Kreczko's bureau is critical to the U.S. government, he said. The federal government gives about $600 million each year to the U.N. commission, which accounts for 25 to 35 percent of the commission's budget, he added.

Even though the refugee bureau receives a large amount of federal spending each year, its mission is rarely questioned by Congress, Kreczko said.

"We're one of the only organizations that when we go up to testify before Congress, we get asked, 'Have you asked for enough?" he said. "It comes from Democrats and Republicans. It's not a political issue."

The attention on refugees from highly publicized conflicts, however, may actually hurt other refugees, said Gabriela Cohen, a public administration graduate student.

"Those refugees where the conflict is going on for a long time, it seems like they might get more aid, but not than the ones in those countries where a conflict just explodes," she said.

The high degree of publicity surrounding conflicts, such as Kosovo, have the potential to drain resources from other refugees, she added.

Kreczko agreed and said that situations like Kosovo often arise and draw in funds from long-term problem areas, such as some African nations.

"We are fortunate. We did not have to divert and divert dollars from Kosovo," he said. "We got extra money from our Congress. That wasn't true of some other countries."

Whatever the amount of money earmarked for humanitarian aid, workers in refugee camps use that aid to give refugees the basic necessities of life, Kreczko said.

The people living in the camps are skilled at stretching all the money and materials received as far as possible, he added.

"Frequently shelter means no more than sticks to hold mud in place and maybe sometimes some plastic sheets," Kreczko said. "But you'd be surprised how far these people can stretch what they have. They're really very resourceful."

In one camp Kreczko visited in Sudan, he said the refugees used tin cans that had contained vegetable oil to make roofs for their makeshift homes.

"We're really very resourceful," he added.

Kreczko's 25-year career in public service provides a model for all employees of the federal government, said Melvyn Levitsky, an SU international relations professor.

"He was a very rich man right now, but he chose to be a public servant," Levitsky said. "He is a great example of what a public servant should be."

At one point during his speech, Kreczko was describing a refugee camp he visited in Africa and became disturbed to the point where he had to stop and compose himself before continuing.

"There were people who had had their limbs chopped off," he said. "Some of them were just young children. But our assistance does a tremendous amount of good. You just have to deal with it."

The number of non-SU students participating in DIPA also increased this year by 12 percent, cultivating in a 1.6 percent increase from the 1995-1996 academic year, Booth added.

The number of non-SU students participating in DIPA also increased this year by 12 percent, cultivating in a 1.6 percent increase from the 1995-1996 academic year, Booth added.

"Students are seeing going abroad as useful to their future plans.

Despite the increase, less than 10 percent of undergraduates at four-year universities study abroad, according to institute statistics.

But for those participating students, studying abroad is a way to enhance "one's life skills" - especially when more employers are looking for workers with international experience, Booth said.

"A student's ability to study abroad is enhanced by a strong economy, he added.

"When parents are doing well financially, they are more likely to send their son or daughter abroad for a more expensive semester," he said.

The increase can also be attributed to word of mouth and encouragement from administrators and faculty, he said. Parents who have studied abroad themselves are also more likely to send their son or daughter abroad, Booth added.

"The number of non-SU students participating in DIPA also increased this year by 12 percent, cultivating in a 1.6 percent increase from the 1995-1996 academic year, Booth added.

The number of non-SU students participating in DIPA also increased this year by 12 percent, cultivating in a 1.6 percent increase from the 1995-1996 academic year, Booth added.

"It went up really high last year," she said.

"But this year it's down. We are, however, seeing a slight increase over the past several years."

Women are more likely to take risks then men and possess better people skills — valuable assets for students studying abroad, he added. Women are more likely to break from their comfort zone and venture abroad, he added.

"It's a combination of history, courses offered and women being the ones who are more risk-takers," he said.

Courses offered by SU also reflect this trend, with the majority of DIPA courses geared toward women. Women's studies classes are popular with students abroad, he added.

IN DIPA's Zimbabwe program, for example, 60 percent of students enrolled are women and the SU Women's Studies department has a large program at that location, he added.

Sixty-four percent of students enrolled in Michigan State University's abroad program are also women, Chalou said.

"When you think of SU, you think of good, quality academics. You think of the football, basketball and lacrosse teams and you think of an outstanding legacy of study abroad," Booth said.

Heather Thompson, study abroad office manager at the University of Texas at Austin, agreed that more high school students are looking for colleges with a strong study abroad program.

"Freshman applicants are getting information earlier than they used to," she said.

Last year junior Erica Rychwalski, a public relations and marketing major, worked in the SU School of Management to answer questions from prospective students. "One frequently asked question concerned the study abroad program offered at the university. When Rychwalski gave campus tours last year, many parents inquired about DIPA.

"Prospective students are definitely more interested in studying abroad then a few years ago," she said.
Cox decries global trade, plans April protest

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Staff Writer

The International Monetary Fund is a loan shark, setting a debt trap where third world countries have no choice but to abide by its programs, said Keegan Cox, a member of the Student Environmental Action Coalition.

SEAC sponsored a lecture Tuesday regarding international money lending institutions and last November's protests in Seattle.

Protesters successfully shut down World Trade Organization meetings in a peaceful, civil disobedient manner, said Cox, a graduate student in the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry.

"The battle's not over," said Cox, an environmental studies major. "The WTO still exists, and Inst November's protests in Seattle. Protesters successfully shut down World Trade Organization meetings in a peaceful, civil disobedient manner, said Cox, a graduate student in the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry.

"The battle's not over," said Cox, an environmental studies major. "The WTO still exists, and

In November, more than 70,000 people convened in Seattle to oppose capitalist exploitation and the WTO meetings. Protesters bound themselves together, blocking entrances to the convention center to prevent WTO officials from attending the scheduled meetings.

Police officers attempted to halt the protesters by spraying them with tear gas, and in some cases, beating them and threatening them with guns.

The corporate-controlled media emphasized the violent protests of only a few individuals in Seattle, he added.

"Ninety percent of the protests, a weeklong festival of resistance, barely received media coverage," Cox said. "It was a lot of fun. There was a carnival-like atmosphere."

The IMF and World Bank are a threat to democracy and the environment, Cox said.

The institutions force countries to submit to their structural adjustment programs in order to receive economic aid, he said. These countries must promote sweatshops and the exploitation of natural resources, he added.

"The success of the IMF is debatable," said Steve Penn, a research associate in the Syracuse University physics department. "The IMF forces the cutting of social institutions, and the economy is said to improve."

The IMF is an organization of 183 member countries that promote international monetary cooperation and economic growth. The organization also helps provide financial assistance to under-developed countries. The World Bank also helps the countries improve their economic status through loans and investments.

But poverty increases while multi-national corporations are the real beneficiaries of the institutions, Penn said.

The WTO eliminates non-tariff barriers to trade, Cox said. That allows corporations to ignore environmental and labor laws, he added.

The U.S. ignores its own legislation for the IMF," Cox said.

Spring protest
SEAC will be carpooling to April's event, named A16, and encourages other students to go. Cox said. They will join other upstate New York colleges on the trip.

A16 is a continuation of the movement for human rights and free trade, according to the event's Web site at www.a16.org. Because the main offices of the U.S. Treasury, the IMF and the World Bank are all located in Washington D.C., the capital is the most effective place to stimulate change, the site said.

Each of these groups plays a key role in controlling the global economy, the site added.

Fifteen organizations are co-sponsoring the protests that more than 400 groups nationwide have endorsed, the site said.

The protests will begin April 9 with a call for cancellation of debts for countries in Africa, Latin America, Asia and the Caribbean. Activists will host lectures and forums throughout the week. Protesters plan to construct large puppets, signs, banners and props to use in their marches.

The protests will conclude April 17 following a large-scale protest at the IMF and World Bank, the site said.

Flag amendment mars speech rights

Asst. Copy Editor

The American flag flies for individuality, personal freedom and choice. The stars and stripes don’t represent homogeneity or a single-minded society. But some citizens of the United States seem to think they do. And they’re trying to make it illegal to set those stars and stripes ablaze.

For the third time in a decade, in a U.S. Senate vote this week on a proposed amendment to the Constitution that would make flag desecration a crime.

Perhaps the most telling hallmark of the United States is its First Amendment rights. They’re a precious package of freedoms that few nations can claim as law. An amendment banning flag desecration would be the first dangerous step toward tarnishing these rights.

Flag burning is not a violent act. It’s a form of symbolic speech — the same speech that must be respected and tolerated like any that can be read on newspaper pages, heard from church pulpits or spoken in casual conversations.

By nature, humans build strong opinions and react viscerally to events in the world around them. A small handful of people may choose to allow those feelings by putting a match to their country’s flag.

It might pierce the nationalist pride of some U.S. citizens if it burn. But no law should ever prevent that. Hiding the match won’t prohibit the free exchange of ideas that the U.S. Constitution guarantees. In fact, it would probably only serve to fanning the flames that conservative Congress members hope to stifle.

Stringent local laws make it difficult even to burn leaves in a backyard barrel. Amendment or not, anyone caught burning a flag would likely be fined for burning without a permit — the same hollow punishment for flag burning to bum leaves in a backyard barrel.

The U.S. government is elected to serve the people, not to watch over the creation of its own concept of moral integrity and force feeding it to its constituency.

Homosexuality quickly becomes last national taboo

Asst. Sports Editor

Matt Walton

I’ve heard a lot of anti-gay comments made by candidates like Alan Keyes and his counterparts in the religious right and the lifestyle choices of others, younger people seem to be more tolerant of differences among the people around them.

For a time I agreed with him, but now I’m beginning to ask myself even if just tolerance is too much to ask. Why, in this era of acceptance and celebration of our differences, is this still such an issue?

I believe that our views are still warped by misconceptions of homosexuality that exist from past generations, misconceptions that are unfounded and in part of our religious and political beliefs. How common is the image of anti-gay comments made by candidates like Alan Keyes and his counterparts in the religious right and the lifestyle choices of others, younger people seem to be more tolerant of differences among the people around them.

I believe that we should be doing more to teach our children ways to prevent prejudice and intolerance.

SU administration fails to address WRC request

To the Editor:

Last Friday, for Syracuse University’s birthday, a group of three Students and Workers Rights Coalition members presented a petition to Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw with an SU shirt made in a mock sweatshop on the Quad the day before. The SCOLL member asked Shaw to sign the Workers’ Rights Coalition to end the licensing of the university logo to companies using sweatshop labor. Shaw flatly refused.

More than 1,000 students at SU now support the WRC. Over 85 percent of respondents said that they believed the university administration is failing to recognize the lifestyle choices of others, younger people seem to be more tolerant of differences among the people around them.

I’m fully aware of the pressure to conform, but there are reasons still to stand out in our lives within the peer pressure excuse just doesn’t work anymore. Everyone is too easy to feel comfortable being themselves these days, unless of course, that self is gay (two exceptions being musical theater majors and the likes). Homosexuality is quickly becoming the last great taboo.

I won’t end with a call for universal acceptance or a plea for tolerance of others. As a society I think we’re even close to being ready for steps like that. I’ll just suggest that next time you find yourself about to make a derogatory or hostile comment, think twice. It’s just not cool anymore.

Matt Walton is senior music composition major. His column appears Wednesdays in The Daily Orange. E-mail him at mjwtalton@syr.edu.

Public Safety Reports:

A suspicious man was seen early Sunday morning in Boland Hall, according to a Public Safety report.

One resident saw the man at about 1 a.m., but did not report the incident until five hours later, Public Safety Director Robert Robinson said.

The Syracuse University student said she did not contact Public Safety earlier because she did not know how, Robinson said.

"The only thing about this incident that disturbs me is the student didn't know how to call Public Safety," he said. "That worries me."

In response to this concern, Public Safety officers will be going to the Brewster/Boland Complex to speak with resident advisors about informing students of safety procedures, Robinson said.

"All of us have to take some responsibility for ourselves," Robinson said. "If I don't know how to call the police, I need to learn."

- Protecting sweatshop activities: Friday, unidentified people placed posters and a T-shirt on the statues between the Shaffer Art Building and Bowne Hall. It was not reported what was on the posters. The posters and T-shirt may have been in relation to a naked bike ride hosted Friday by members of the Student Coalition On Organized Labor to protest sweatshops, Robinson said.

- Alleging that a male student had violated SU's Nonconsensual Sexual Activity Policy, an SU student filed a complaint Wednesday with the Office of Judicial Affairs, according to a Public Safety report. The student, who was referred to the Counseling Center, said the incident occurred at an off-campus location, the report said.

- The e-mails all requested photos of an SU women's athletic team, the report said.

- The case is being investigated by Public Safety officials, the report said.

- An SU student reported a suspicious woman driving Sunday on Euclid Avenue in a dark blue Honda, according to a Public Safety report.

- The woman stopped to ask the student for money for her baby, however, the student said he did not see a baby, the report said.

- The student advised the Syracuse Police Department of the incident, the report said.

- An intoxicated person passed out while riding the Centro from North to South Campus on Friday, according to a Public Safety report. SU Ambulance responded and took the intoxicated student to the SU Health Center for treatment, the report said.

- The student's case is being referred to Judicial Affairs, the report said.

- After being fired from his job in Bowne Hall, an employee deleted computer files in his department, according to a Public Safety report.

- All of the files were restored Thursday and Public Safety continues to investigate the incident, the report said.

Sophomore Laura Gottlieb was already interested in becoming an active part of Jewish life at Syracuse University before her "inspirational" trip to Israel with the United Jewish Association during the winter her freshman year.

"After going to Israel, I knew that being Jewish was my life," she added. "The experience made me want to become even more active in Jewish life at SU."

Gottlieb, a political science and public relations major with a minor in Judaic studies, quickly moved up in the executive board ranks and was recently elected as the Jewish Student Union's first female president.

And while she is happy to have attained this position, she said that being female has little to do with JSU's success on campus.

"We all do an equal job, regardless of gender," Gottlieb said. "But it's nice to be the first woman to do it." Gottlieb, a sophomore political science major, said she hopes to set an example for other women.

It is JSU that bonds us," said Payzakhovitch, a sophomore political science major. "Not that we're all female."

Gottlieb, who was elected in December and took office in January, also served as the programming vice president last year, under former president Brian Cohen, a senior advertising major.

"Laura is one of the hardest working people, and the most involved," he said.

A Cleveland native, Gottlieb says she has always been an active member in her Jewish community, even before she came to SU.

In high school, Gottlieb founded the school’s first Israel Culture Club. She was also a member of B’nai B’rith Youth Organization for four years and eventually became president of her local chapter.

“Being president of B’nai B’rith really made Judaism part of my identity,” she said. “Judaism was no longer just a thing, it became a part of me.”

When deciding what college to attend, Gottlieb said a deciding factor in choosing what school was best was the population of Jewish students on campus. SUI fit the bill, as it is approximately 20 percent Jewish, she said. She joined Hillel and SUI right away. She was elected to Cohen’s board last January and decided to run for president to succeed him.

Her goals for the rest of her term include carrying out the traditions of bringing well-known personalities, like actor and director Henry Winkler and comedian Louis Black, to campus.

Four females, in addition to Peysakhovitch, comprise Gottlieb’s executive board — Financial Vice President Becky Klein, Communications Vice President Lisa Cohen, Administrative Vice President Elisabeth Margolius and Social Action Vice President Mara Silver-Smith.

The board members have some ideas of their own to foster greater interest in SUI. Programming vice president Peysakhovitch will likely oversee most of the new initiatives.

She has planned movie nights on the last Thursday of every month in the Hillel lounge in Hendricks Chapel and is currently organizing an Rock ‘n’ Bowl, Israeli dancing and a Holocaust week at the end of April.

“I believe that SUI is a service organization,” Silver-Smith, a sophomore marketing major, “We have a responsibility to the SU community to hold programming that brings students together with service opportunities.”

Silver-Smith, who served as financial vice president last year, promotes campus awareness of social causes from a Jewish perspective. She is currently working on a hunger banquet and is recruiting volunteers for the Comstock Kid-fest.

Cohen, a sophomore architecture major, promotes the organization’s activities on campus. She, too, said she was active in Jewish activities before arriving at SUI, particularly Young Judea, a national Jewish youth group, she said.

“Judaism was no longer just a thing, it became a part of me.”

SU goalie Robby Mulligan had a successful night, making 10 saves. His Hobart counterpart, James Murtha, made 11.

However, if it weren’t for the strong play of Tim Byrnes and Chris Cercy in the face-off circle, Syracuse would not have held possession as often as it did.

The Orange won 19 of 26 face-offs, losing only one of 10 in the second half.

“You really can’t minimize the impact that a team with so many weapons like Syracuse has when they have the ability to continually get the ball back,” Hobart head coach B.J. O’Hara said. “It’s almost like playing ‘make it and take it’ in half-court basketball. They score, and they get the ball back.”

The Syracuse defensive unit used its size to wear down Hobart’s smaller attackers, putting the 6-foot, 200-pound Marshall Abrams on 5-foot-5, 140-pound Jared Bebee.

Bebee, a West Genesee High School alum and one of Hobart’s leading scorers, was held pointless in his return to the Syracuse area.

Penalties plagued the Statesmen (2-3), who racked up 30 minutes to Syracuse’s seven. The Orangemen responded by scoring on four of its eight man-up opportunities.

Josh Coffman found Springer in front of the net for his second goal in the final two minutes of the first period, and O’Hara said the momentum permanently shifted to Syracuse.

“You could hear a big ‘poof’ right at the end of the period,” the elder Statesman said.

Even Syracuse’s defenders played a role on offense during the scoring spree. Junior defensive midfielder Joe Ceglia picked up a face-off and sprinted in from midfield to launch a longstick shot past Murtha.

“I just think we have better stick handlers on the defensive end this year,” Ceglia said. “We all feel comfortable with the ball and we don’t mind running up the field with it.”

After taking a 12-3 half-time lead, Syracuse took it easy on Hobart, scoring only once in a third quarter that was even slower than the first.

The highlight of the quarter was a nice display of ball movement from junior Pat Kennedy to Coffman to Powell, who netted his fifth goal of the game for a 14-4 advantage.

The Orangemen look to remain undefeated Saturday at Brown, as Desko said he does not let perfection or the No. 1 ranking affect his team’s focus.

“Our goal is to go out and play like we’re No. 20 and not No. 1 every game,” Desko said. “We aren’t going to be comfortable sitting on top.”

opportunities, more runs than usual. I think it's more beneficial for everyone."

Schmidt led the Orange to a victory that evening, including two first-place finishes in the 110-meter hurdles and the long jump. With Bedard placing 13th in the event, in which she qualified for the Olympic Trials in Atlanta, Woodley will try to improve his performances of a year ago. Although he would need a cool feeling to have a chance in this event, he said, "I've always wanted to achieve this goal."

"I always keep practicing hard. When, then, if I get a game, there's no frustration," he added.

Schmidt hopes to go out on a positive note. "I haven't run the time that I wanted, and I'm hoping to see some results in this outdoor opener," she said. "It's frustrating, being your last home that you want to do."

"I just have to try to stay focused and get the work done in practice," said Kelley.

The duo, and likely a host of others, could probably start for the bulk of the nation's Division I teams. It was back to practical this week to prepare for the big showdown this Saturday at Stevenson Field.

The reserves might relish their playing time for an instant, but once the chatter returns, any ego trip will screech to a halt. It depends on the tempo of practice," Kelley said. "If the defense is playing well, someone will start talking, and then it will go back and forth. But it's not trash, it's fun. It means everyone's playing well."
SU pounds Statesmen

BY JASON REMILLARD

A group of face-painted, sign-carrying Hobart lacrosse fans entered the Carrier Dome with just four minutes to go in the first quarter Tuesday night.

They arrived just in time to see the Syracuse Orangemen begin a scoring barrage that probably made them wish they hadn't made the trip from Geneva.

The nation's No. 1 team racked up 10 unanswered goals in the first half, including eight in the second quarter, to take a 10-1 lead on its way to a 16-6 victory over the visiting Statesmen.

"I think we got some confidence from that," SU head coach John Desko said. "Any time the game is close, you're playing a little bit to make a mistake to give the other team the lead. We were able to break open for two or three goals that kind of fueled the fire."

Senior attackman Ryan Powell showed why he is one of the nation's premier offensive players, tying career highs with six goals and 10 points.

The All-American scored Syracuse's first two goals after Hobart jumped out to a 1-0 lead. Powell said the pair of goals gave him the confidence to take over the game.

"Just because our offense is so good this year, it opens a lot of things up for me," Powell said. "I had a couple nice moves and I got off to a good start."

Two quick goals, good off the bat. When I do that, I usually have a good game."

But Powell was not the only Orange man marching in the goal parade. Sophomore Michael Springer scored three of his four goals in the first half run, and 10 Orange men in all found the back of the net.

Assembly divided on merger

Alliance sparks SGA debate, UU members remain hesitant

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Staff Writer

A proposed merger of the Student Government Association with University Union has members of both organizations taking sides.

SGA Parliamentarian Jonathan M. Taylor proposed the merger to the Assembly on Monday night in hopes of securing a majority vote. Assembly members, however, decided to postpone the vote until they could solicit more student response.

The merger would result in the Student Association, a student government with programming powers, said Lisa Stone, UU president. "It would devolve the UU into the name, and make it a part of SGA," said Stone, a junior television, radio, and film major. "It would continue programming and act as advisors to the finance board."

The experience of UU in bringing programs to Syracuse University would be valuable to other student organizations, said Taylor, a fifth-year architecture major. Its advice could bring efficient budgets and event planning, he added.

Sixty-five percent of the SGA budget goes to the UU, Taylor said.

Currently, organizations that want to bring programming to the university have to go through UU for planning and SGA for funding, said James James, SGA president. "This would create a one-stop center for students," said James, a junior musical theater major.

The merger, however, would create a structure of inherent conflict of interest, Stone said.

Taylor refutes this by saying the current proposal would keep the SGA Finance Board and the UU programming board autonomous. The programming board See MERGER page 8

Welfare provisions directly fund faith-based charities

As the nation’s welfare rolls plummet, Republican presidential candidate George W. Bush is banking on faith-based organizations to help those who remain in poverty.

"We encourage all local social services to use the resources of any local organization if it can help our state’s people leave welfare behind," said Jack Madden, a spokesman for the New York State Office of Temporary and Disability Assistance. "And it doesn’t matter what religion runs the program, as long as they all have the common goal of helping people run

Congress has rejected a bill in the U.S. Senate that would have banned the making and selling of certain animal products. The bill, which was introduced by Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, would have made it illegal to sell products made from elephants, dolphins, and other marine mammals. The Senate defeated the bill by a vote of 51-49. The House has already passed a similar bill, but it is unclear whether the two chambers will be able to resolve their differences before the end of the congressional session.

The Senate vote came despite strong opposition from animal rights groups, which have long argued that the ban is unnecessary and would harm the U.S. economy. Opponents of the bill said it would only hurt the legitimate wildlife trade and could lead to a black market in wildlife products.

The Senate vote also marked the latest in a string of defeats for animal rights activists in Congress. In recent years, they have failed to pass legislation to ban the sale of fur, animal testing, and the use of animal products in clothing and food.

Still, animal rights groups said they were encouraged by the vote and vowed to continue their efforts to pass similar legislation in the future. "We will continue to work to protect America's wildlife and the environment," said Susan Chirico, president of the Animal Welfare Institute.

The vote on the bill came as part of a larger debate over immigration policy in Congress. Republicans have been pushing for a bill that would tighten border security and crack down on illegal immigration, while Democrats have called for a more humane approach that would provide a path to citizenship for many immigrants. The animal rights bill was attached to the immigration legislation as a way to block the Republican bill.

The Senate vote was the latest in a string of defeats for Republicans in Congress, who have failed to pass any major legislation this year. The lack of progress has led to frustration among many Republicans, who say they are being held hostage by the top Republican leaders in the House and Senate.

Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., the majority leader in the Senate, said he was seeking to work with Democrats on immigration legislation, but he also said he would not allow the animal rights bill to become an obstacle to passing a bill that he believes is needed.

The vote on the animal rights bill was part of a larger debate over how to build a border wall along the U.S.-Mexico border. Republicans have been pushing for a border wall, while Democrats have said it would be a waste of money and would do little to actually reduce illegal immigration. The issue is a major sticking point in the immigration debate, and it remains unclear how the two sides will ultimately reach an agreement.

Sean Gaw reaches out to the community through a pane of bulletproof glass.

As a full-time FrancisCorps volunteer at Syracuse's Downtown Emergency Assistance Center, the 1999 Syracuse University graduate helps distribute food, clothing and advice to city residents in financial crisis.

Gaw and four other volunteers who live together in a house on the city's North Side are the helping hands behind FrancisCorps' maiden voyage. Sponsored by the Franciscan order of the Roman Catholic church, the program is tailored for recent college graduates, who give a year of service to area Catholic Charities programs in exchange for housing and food.

Catholic Charities, a faith-based, not-for-profit organization, utilizes funds from the federal 1996 Welfare Act's Charitable Choice provisio to provide social services.

FrancisCorps is one of hundreds of small, faith-backed programs ministering to the poor across the nation. The program is the brainchild of Franciscan Brother Jim Moore, who splits his time between coordinating Francis Corps and serving as assistant director of the Allhbrand Catholic Center.

Moore, who came to SU after a stint at Catholic University of America in Washingon, D.C., stresses the program's ability to weave together two goals: performing "good Catholic social work" and building a strong "faith community."

Gaw and his four counterparts - Keith Heath, Andy South, Mel Maykuth, Mike Huynh — donate their volunteer efforts to the Northside Community Youth Organization, the Salina Civic Center and the Dorothy Day House for battered women.

In return for each volunteer's 40-hour work week at one of the charities, they each receive $70 a month for food and $85 a month for personal items, as well as a stipend of about $8,000 at the end of the year. During their time in the program, Syracuse Catholic Charities also pays for college graduates, who give a year of service to the Catholic church-sponsored FrancisCorps.

MENTOR

"We live in a world where," he says, "you can't look at how other cultures live, through their emphasis on diversity celebration.

"You cannot look at what's portrayed in the media," she said. "But I think also you look at things that are really like. They teach here.

Dithole Retela said she thinks the smaller age gap between the students and the mentors enables them to forge stronger bonds than those she has with his teachers at Percy Hughes. The relaxed atmosphere and willingness to work one-on-one with her son sets the volunteers apart from traditional educators, she said. "The volunteers are so magnificently gifted," she said. "They really have the kids at their best and they really go out of their way for them.

"The volunteers also help children build their self-confidence and self-esteem, and take them on trips to local museums and most unique cultural experiences are missing from the Franciscors' volunteer work.

"We've really several of them in the Franciscors' volunteer work."

A tiny brown bag, however, has not been the group from finding fun in everyday activities. They check out free wine tastings at a local liquor store on weekends, and then they role through the rooms in the Van Vincent DePaul thrift store on North Salina Street and scope out $1 ice cream deals on the shelves at the Northway supermarket.

The volunteers sit atop stacks of Crayolas, left-overs from a making project. "We seem to own definition of simplicity," Searle says, "because a laugh and a nothing, a pair of knitting needles and a blue slipper from the kids.

"In the six months we've been here, we've all started knitting, crocheting and baking.

"And their simple living arrangements are a model. The Franciscors have their own separate commonality with their North Street neighbors. We don't have any church teachings, like cooperative use, abortion, the enfolding of women and capital punishment. But being able to discuss the issues and the facts, our special community helps enlighten others regarding tough topics, Maykuth said.

"We've developed more strong community in the house," she says. "This is a place where no one can afford a computer, let alone an Internet connection.

"You have your faith, which you're really sure about in church, and then you have your work and your relationships," Searle said. "That's really hard. What better ways at your faith, though, than to help your own kids, like we're doing in our work?"

"You're helping to keep the spirit of the project's purpose alive.

But Dunlap was discouraged by the roadblocks the children encounter when dealing with school personnel, including several flaps to write the necessary recommendation letters for college. She said she wished she had more power to influence their decisions about the girl's future.

"Finally," she said, "it's going to be important that you won't learn anything, and if you don't learn anything, you won't ever get a job."
SGA crosses line with UU merger

For years, the Student Government Association has struggled to define itself in the sea of other student groups dotting the campus. It hasn't had much success.

But it seems that now, SGA has a solid plan to make a name for itself. In a quest for credibility, it plans to steal the identity of the most powerful and well-known student group on campus: University Union.

Only two brave underclassmen Assemblymembers, David Gaulin and Adam Duf^, were willing to vocally oppose an impending vote to absorb UU. It meant standing up to five-year SGA member Jonathan M. Taylor at Monday's SGA meeting and convincing the Assembly to postpone a merger.

Unfortunately, their voices may not be strong enough to halt SGA's runaway power trip.

UU is a well-organized group that brings exciting concerts, speakers and comedians to campus. It directs a television and radio station. It drives its own tour bus and plans conferences. It is formidable.

But SGA holds a powerful trump card — the $1.3 million Student Activity Fee. And now, it seems SGA is using that trump card to make a last-ditch effort to steal that name to something students care about. The impending vote to absorb UU means stand-

As an SGA member, I want to see SGA's efforts to eat up UXJ's powerful New York State Public Interest Research Group, SGAs efforts to eat up UXJs independence doesn't say much for the sincerity of the defender of the students' claims.

As long as SGA Assemblymembers, David Gaulin and Adam Duf^, are willing to vocally oppose an impending vote to absorb UU, it means stand-

As an SGA member, I want to see SGA being as fair as possible when it comes to funding. It is imperative that SGA is transparent with its decisions and that members are held accountable for their actions.

NYPIRG vote necessary to fairly spend student fee

To the editor:

Frustrated, my political views had no bearing in forwarding the NYPIRG referendum to the student body for vote.

Due to the 99 members of NYPIRG who attended Monday night, and the 900 or so students who signed a petition in support of NYPIRG, a motion to hold a referendum was introduced. The motion was passed and a referendum will be held.

Since all students (and organizations) have the right to have their concerns heard at a meeting of the SGA Assembly, they were not only given that opportunity, but the issue was thoroughly debated and voted on. Two weeks ago, the Assembly's decision was unaniself-sufficient lives.

Faith-based groups, however, are aware of the Charitable Choice provision, said Donna Carlson, author of “The Welfare of My Neighbor: Living Out Christ’s Love in the Poor.”

“The funding is there for so many wonderful programs,” said Carlson, an adjunct scholar for the Family Research Council, a Washington, D.C.-based advocacy group. “There’s no need for more funding, but the need is out so that it can be taken advantage of.”

New York state reported that welfare rolls dropped 37 percent — a reduction of 60,730 cases—since 1995.

With savings from the reduction in welfare cases, more grants are now offered to faith and community-based organizations through the Charitable Choice provision, said Martha Lide, executive deputy commissioner of the Department of Social Services in Onondaga County.

Most local social service grants are tagged for use in specific areas, such as child care for families receiving Temporary Assistance to Needy Families, substance abuse counseling or transportation. But it is up to the counties and local state agencies to develop fund requests that suit their needs, said Lide.

In Onondaga County, portions of these grants have been channeled toward various private, community-based organizations, like Catholic Charities and Liberty Resources. The county solicits program ideas and community organizations may then submit their own plans for use of the money, Lide said.

Syracuse Catholic Charities uses the Charitable Choice provision to obtain money for their Jobs Connections program, a spin-off of Congress’ welfare-to-work legislation, said Joe O’Hara, the organization’s director of community and development.

But with extra state funding, O’Hara said Catholic Charities could expand their Eastern European and Asian immigrant resettlement program, which currently provides job searches and U.S. cultural education programs. English-language tutoring programs and mentoring programs for immigrant children in local schools or other possible additions, he said.

Faith-based organizations are best equipped to develop mentoring programs for children and impoverished mothers, Carlson said. While governmental agencies deal with procedures for obtaining welfare assistance, faith-based groups can play an important role in providing quality child care and teaching women how to balance their new jobs with their family responsibilities.

“Social workers aren’t paid to be around for these families 24 hours a day, seven days a week,” she said. “That’s where the faith-based groups can help — they have an amazing ability to build strong relationships with the needy.”

Some critics, however, denounced faith-based aid in fear that the organizations would prey on the poor and target them for conversion. But O’Hara said he is confident that reputable religious organizations are only concerned with improving the quality of life in the community.

“When they invented Catholic Charities in 1884, the only criteria for people to come to us was that they had a need,” he said. “We’re providing human services.”

“Whatever religion you are doesn’t even enter into the equation.”

The relationship between church and state, however, may stand in the way of maximizing partnerships between faith-based community groups and governmental social service agencies, said Nicole Keim, a junior religious, French and policy studies major and Students Offering Service Advisory Board member.

“Obviously, there isn’t enough money to give out to every group that wants some,” she said. “And so that implies a choice, and the possibility of favoring one group or religion over another. I wonder if they might favor or seek out one particular religious affiliation.”

But the 1996 Welfare Act protects the interests of faith-based groups while maintaining the First Amendment’s religion and freedom clause. The law does not forbid these organizations from participating in government-funded public service programs, and government-funded organizations cannot be forced to abdicate their religious affiliations.

Bush vows that participation in faith-backed welfare support programs would remain entirely voluntary, McClellan said.

“The governor is dedicated to funding programs that work, not funding any particular religion,” he said. “But we do have a plan in case the court rules in religious pluralism, not just the Christian tradition.”

“There won’t be discrimination against Jews, Muslims, Buddhists, even people of no faith.”

questions about the influence the nominator’s life and the SU community, she added.

“All of the winners, something about their nominations struck us,” she said.

Parks, director of African-American Programs and Student Services, spoke about the prominent, yet unseen roles of women in history during her address.

In every historical period, women and girls have participated with vigor and discipline in world history,” Parks said. “Women played significant roles historically, responsible as sisters, as friends, as mothers.”

Women have had a great effect on U.S. military history, although it is often only heard that the women kept hidden in the closets and drawers of the women involved, Parks explained.

“I would suggest to you that women influenced the outcome of World War I, World War II, the Korean Conflict,” Parks recited, and otherurrent theaters of war, perhaps had their lives saved.

During World War II, women trained at the Tuskegee Institute to become pilots and part of the air corps. Parks said. The women there learned the same tasks as the men including how to fly airplanes and channeled toward various skills, she explained.

She encouraged members of the audience to find out more about women’s history.

“If you as women, if you as men, if you as gentle people, if you as students, ask about women’s lives at a different time, do please visit Seneca Falls,” she said.

Seneca Falls was the site of the first women’s rights convention, established in 1848. The convention was organized by Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Lucretia Mott in response to unequal treatment of women at an anti-slavery convention eight years earlier.

Parks urged the audience to be aware of how the women, especially in March, which is Women’s History Month.

“We need to remember the genius of the women that we have preceded us,” she said.

The winners

ORL and OGL honored each award winner with a print commemorating women’s issues and historical achievements.

Tanya Ortiz, a freshman management major, won the undergraduate award.

“One of my first recollection was on midday,” she said. Mary Triano, a Residence Director at Ortiz’s residence hall.

“What I remembered most of all was that this resident was comforting her mother,” she said.

Ortiz is a member of the executive board of Boland Hall and also volunteers at a day care center in Syracuse, Triano said.

Vince Kuss, the OGL program coordinator, presented the graduate award to Elizabeth Skews, a doctoral student in the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications.

Skews is a member of the Graduate Student Organization and a student representative on the S.T. Board of Trustees.

The faculty member honored for her outstanding work was Sally Wagner.

“Vagin, a professor in the women’s studies department, educates her students on the triumphs of woman everyday,” said Gillian Budman, an assistant director.

A housekeeper in the Watson Hall, Toni Doup was the winner of the staff award.

“This woman has had a profound impact on people in Watson,” said Rachel Alldis, a residence director.

Doup tries to get to know the staff in Watson, as well as the residents, Alldis said. She shares stories, memories and other thoughts with them, she added.

Sarah Lee was nominated for the undergraduate award, but did not win. The loss did not come as a shock to her, she said.

Lee, a sophomore inclusive elementary education major, was nominated by her resident assistant.

“She said that his positive attitude and personally helped build a community on our floor,” Lee said. “I was so surprised, I didn’t even know that there was this program.”

Andrea Hurwitz, also a nominee for the undergraduate award, agreed with Lee. She way to say the Academy Awards, it is an honor just to be nominated,” said Hurwitz, a sophomore public relations and sociology major. “It is just good to know that a lot of students are doing this. It’s just good to be recognized.”

SU, high schools join in racism fight

BY EVANS BOSTON  Staff Writer

Syracuse University students are working with area high schools to get the university more involved in fighting racism in the community.

School of Education professor Mara Sapon-Shevin and School of Social Work Assistant professor Carrie Smith designed Eracism, a six-week discussion group to break down the barriers of racial tension, Sapon-Shevin said.

"We talked about issues around racism," said Aaron Harrell, a junior in the School of Social Work. "And how to access it actually for someone who is being oppressed.

"We need to have people realize that we are not just an isolated problem," Harrell said. The group joined SU students with TentAFE 1 students from Thomas H. Corcoran and William J. Nottingham high schools to discuss oppression and ethnic heritage during the six-week program, Harrell said.

"We would like to develop an anti-racism curriculum in high schools," Sapon-Shevin said. "We are actively involved to take a chunk out of racism. There are race issues everywhere. These issues need to be addressed.

The high school students, who are from different ethnic backgrounds, mentioned racial problems in their schools involving minorities such as Arabs and Native Americans. Harrell said.

"The problems are not just black and white related," he said. "The high school students are reacting very well. They are highly engaged in discussions. It's a fresh perspective.

Including high schoolers in Eracism is an important step toward ending discrimination in schools, Sapon-Shevin said.

"At the high school level, there is still a tremendous amount of tension between students of different backgrounds," she said.

The high schoolers brought real-life situations from their respective schools, Harrell said.

Some of the current issues are the same as when he was in high school, he added.

"Racism is a touchy topic that is generally avoided," Harrell said. "I think there are a lot of people who want to discuss race issues. It's hard to find the right setting for discussion.

Eracism established a comfortable setting for confronting such delicate topics, he added.

The emotional fervor one usually sees around the topic of racism is not present or is properly channeled through activities and discussion," Harrell said.

The discussions prompted questions that are important in ending discrimination, Harrell said.

Harrell said his experiences in Eracism have been positive.

"I have increased awareness of myself as well as the needs and ideas of others," Harrell said. "It's a cool experience, because we talked about things we don't normally talk about.

The group is planning to have another program similar to Eracism this fall, Sapon-Shevin said.

Harrell said he plans to facilitate in the fall.

"This method of approach is the right one," Harrell said. "There are no hurt feelings and topics are discussed as rational people.

"They never sent anyone," said Stern, a senior advertising major in the College of Visual and Performing Arts.

The victim flagged down an officer writing tickets, Stern said. The officer said he was more concerned about a street sign in the house than the break-in, he added.

"I think it's B.S. that the cop thinks he's doing him a favor by writing a police report," Stern said.

Their house was broken into two months ago, Stern said. When police arrived, they were more concerned about a street sign in the house than the break-in, he added.

"I would never, ever live here because of the way the cops are here," Stern said. "It's just ridiculous.

- Two car license plates were stolen Friday from the car of Mia Hall, a second-year student, according to police reports.

Hall said she parked her car at her boyfriend's house in Clifton Heights on Ivy Ridge Road and went to the basketball game. She noticed that her license plates were missing Saturday morning, she added.

Hall, a native of California, said she had to ask her mother to mail her new plates. It kind of sucks because if you lose your license plates, you can't get replacement plates," Hall said. "You have to get them from your state.

- A wallet, belonging to an SU sophomore public relations major, was stolen Thursday at A.F.W. A.'s, 321 S. Clinton St., according to police reports.

The wallet was stolen from the victim's purse between 1:30 and 2 a.m., the report said.

- A Freedom Pass, at the bar emptied their pockets, but the wallet was not found, the report added.

- A wallet containing the victim's credit cards, library card, insurance card, social security card and $25, reports said.

"It wasn't that big a deal," the victim said. "People have had their wallets stolen. It could have been worse.

- An SU employee had her car stolen Feb. 14 along with hundreds of dollars of camera equipment, according to police report.

would not vote on whether the event would occur, eliminating a conflict of interest, he added.

"The UU program boards program their own events," Taylor said. "They're not a campus wide programming board."

UU's programming board would advise student organizations on planning, budget and other event logistics. This information would then be brought before the Finance Board.

"We don't see a problem in the way UU runs now. We plan successful programs that are representative of student interest," Stone said. "The UU believes an autonomous organization would be more effective than a conglomerate."

UU and SGA share a common goal, Stone said, adding that her group wants to provide the best programming on campus and make it available to all student groups.

"We already work to help each other organizations," Stone said, adding that her group wants to provide the best programming on campus and make it available to all student groups.

The debate yielded a constitution, but many argue that it is ambiguous and filled with loopholes. The debate over the goal of SGA continues with this new merger.

The new proposal was tabled Monday by Assemblyman David Gaulin.

"I, and, as it turns out, others didn't know enough about it to pass it that night," said Gaulin, a sophomore in the College of Arts and Sciences. "It's a significant thing."

Assemblyman Adam Duffy agreed that to accept the proposal, SGA must first be receptive to student opinions.

"I do think we have to bring this up to the student body," said Duffy, a freshman in the College of Visual and Performing Arts. "The basic concern is for getting the input of the students. I wouldn't feel right passing it without knowing what the students think."

Gaulin added that some SGA members, particularly Taylor, were anxious to pass the bill Monday night.

An advocate forum is set for 7:30 p.m. Sunday in Conference Room 304C of the Schine Student Center. Representatives from SGA and UU will attend.

Members of student organizations are urged to also attend, because this proposal directly affects them, Stone said."

"Right now I'm not sure if I'm for or against it," said Jonathan Engel of the University Senate. "I think SGA and UU could work together. But when it comes to budget favoritism, I could see where other groups could see conflict."

Flyers were distributed on campus earlier this week protesting the merger. One flyer deems the merger a "take over."

Other groups might fear being taken over by the SGA in the future, Engel added.

Another Assembly meeting is scheduled for Monday. Stone said SGA can either vote on it or table it again.

An Assembly vote and a UU Board of Directors vote are needed to pass the proposal, Stone said.

"We don't assume our position is the same as the students', that's why we're heavily advertising for the open forum," Stone said."

If the students felt that a merger was the best idea, UU would reconsider their stance to the proposal, she said.

"There has to be a less dramatic way," Stone said.

UU has continued to suggest alternate proposals, said David Vagnoni, head of UUTV, a branch of University Union.

"It's been a long process with long meetings," said Vagnoni, a junior broadcast journalism and political science major. "There have been moments, I wouldn't say heated, but the SGA firmly believes in this and we are firmly opposed to some of SGA's ideas. It's been difficult to mesh."

Panhel to participate in women's safety march

Staff Reports

A march advocating safety for women on college campuses toppied the agenda at Syracuse University's Panhellenic Council meeting Wednesday night.

The march, called Take Back the Night, will take place during Greek Week, which begins April 9.

"It's an annual event that works to raise awareness of sexual violence and also safe streets in general — safe neighborhoods, the ability to walk alone and feel safe," said Beth Wodnick, a coordinator of the event.

Walking safely at night is something that "is not always the case," Wodnick added.

"Take Back the Night will include a rally, a speaker and a march. The march will begin at Hendrick's Chapel and circle the campus before ending back at the chapel."

Delta Delta Delta sister and musician Anadara Farmer will sing and play guitar at the event.

"It's a very important event, especially for women," Panhel President Sarah Korf said.

If enough money is collected, T-shirts will be available for marchers, Wodnick said. Event coordinators will either give the shirts out to the marchers or charge participants for the shirts. If the latter is the case, all proceeds will go to the SU Rape Advocacy, Prevention and Education Center, she added.

Organizers also sent invitations to several public officials, including Syracuse police officers, SU Public Safety officers and SU Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw, Wodnick said.

"The more people we have marching, the more effective you are," said Leslie Grinner, advisor of the Take Back the Night planning group and teaching assistant in the SU Women's Studies Department.

Panhel representatives also discussed two scholarships available to members of the Greek community.

The Al Paige Scholarship is for students with a GPA of 3.0 or higher, who display leadership within their chapter or organization and are actively involved in community service. Applicants may be nominated by themselves or by chapter members, with letters sent to the Office of Greek Life by April 11.

The Dwyer Scholarship, a $600 award, is based on leadership, academic achievement and dedication to Greek life.

was a GSO representative in the Syracuse University Senate where she sat on the Agenda Committee and also served as a senator-at-large and Student Legal Services representative, she said.

Carter said some of her ideas for her administration include creating a dental plan for graduate students, working with Public Safety to arrange escorts from on-campus buildings to off-campus residences and reviewing Office of Judicial Affairs' policies and procedures for graduate students.

But her presidency will not focus on accomplishing her own goals, Carter said.

"My main role is to listen to what the constituents and the senators want," she said. "I'm not going to sit there and pursue my own agenda."

Carter's successor as comptroller is Chris McGee, a first-year senator and member of the GSO Finance Committee.

McGee helped the Finance Committee establish a travel fund for graduate students and is a member of the Inn Complete Board. He ran unopposed and was elected to a position on the new executive board.

GSO should work to increase awareness of the organization's procedures for allocating money to student groups so the same "handful" of groups are not the only ones requesting funds, said McGee, a chemistry graduate student.

"All senators should be aware of what money is in what account," he said. "I'm not sure that everybody is completely aware before they vote."

Carter said she was pleased GSO voted McGee into her former position.

"I asked Chris to run," Carter said. "I think he's going to be great on the job. It's not an easy job and you have to be patient and explain things over and over. You have to work hard and be organized. I told him he'd be excellent for the job."

The Senate also unanimously elected Enver Rahmanov vice president and Ananya Bhatcharyya secretary. Both Rahmanov and Bhatcharyya were nominated at the meeting and ran unopposed for their positions.

It is typical that executive board positions go unopposed because the main goal of the elections is to get the new officers ready to begin work during the summer, said Eric Hunn, outgoing president.

Carter's unopposed election, however, was unusual, he said.

"I was a little surprised because historically someone always emerges out of nowhere to contest the presidency," said Hunn, a law and public administration graduate student.

Senator T.J. Lakin, however, moved to postpone the elections until the next GSO meeting April 17 so more students would have a chance to consider running. Lakin withdrew his motion before it was voted on because the Senate would have denied it, he said.

"The elections were announced and then they happened with no time to see if you wanted to run," said Lakin, a law and public relations graduate student. "There were 11 positions open and only four people on the ballot. So to me it seemed that there needed to be more publicity."

The outgoing executive board met its goals by making the GSO meetings more efficient, straightening out its financial matters and increasing representation, Hunn said.

The new executive board should continue to achieve its goals, Hunn said.

"They have substantial experience with GSO and Frankie knows as much as anyone," he said. "They're a bright crowd so they should be a good team next year."

The Senate also appointed Mehmet Sayin to one of five open Senate representative positions, Elizabeth Slowe as a representative to the Board of Trustees and outgoing Vice President Joe Roser to one of its six open senator-at-large positions.

As a senator I couldn't understand why people hated the meetings because I loved all of them," Roser said. "I have tons of ideas, and as a senator I will be at all the meetings."

There were no nominations for five representatives to the Board of Graduate Studies positions, alternate representative to the Board of Trustees, representative to the Law School and representative to Student Legal Services.

In other GSO news:

The Senate approved the Finance Committee's recommendation to open the Jewish Graduate Student Organization $850 to help fund an annual dinner. Last year 66 people attended the dinner, but they need more money this year because they are expecting about twice as many people to attend.

The Student Concerns Committee will recommend whether GSO should assist the Student Coalition on Organized Labor in persuading SU to switch its allegiance from the Federal Labor Association to the Worker Rights Consortium at the next Senate meeting.

The Incomplete will host the Graduate Trivia Challenge on April 15. Teams of four to 10 graduate students from different departments will compete against each other. Teams must enter by April 7 and pay a $10 entrance fee.

A secret society so powerful, it can give you everything you desire.

At a price.

Drug debate
Companies that market "fat-busting" drugs Chitin and Chitosan have made "unsubstantiated ad claims" about their products "that are false and misleading," says California's Napa County Deputy District Attorney Daryl Roberts. The Department of Federal Trade Commission, which enforces federal consumer protection laws prohibiting unfair and deceptive practices, last year won an $8.3 million judgment against a company named SlimAmerica which markets Chitin. Industry experts say more legal action by both federal and state officials is expected.

Dr. Love
Alex Comfort, the British physician, poet, novelist, gerontologist and philosopher who wrote more than 50 books but will be forever known as the author of one landmark 1972 best-seller "The Joy of Sex," has died. He was 80. Comfort died Sunday in an Oxfordshire, England, nursing home where he had been under care after suffering a series of strokes over the last nine years. A singular personality who was once jailed with Bertrand Russell for organizing an anti-nuclear sit-in at London's Trafalgar Square, Comfort came to regard "Joy" as something of an albatross that he said he felt improperly overshadowed the rest of his work.

Viagra venture proves successful
Viagra anyone?
Looking for a little online adventure, I decided to see how easy it is for a healthy 20-year-old guy to purchase some of Bob Dole's happy pills. So I ran a query on Viagra into one of the many search engines...

A host of sites came up ranging from soft-core porn to safe-sex initiatives. One drugstore caught my eye, claiming their prices were "better than the rest" — safewebmedical.com.

I thought it would be too good to think that I could actually order Viagra online without a prescription, but I went ahead with my curiosity query and clicked the brightly lit Viagra link.

An order form was the next page to pop up.

Upon review of the situation I thought John Q. Curious would be our online patron from Nowhere, NC. A Credit card number was then asked. Surprisingly my application was approved even when I ran a string of nine zeros for my credit card number. In a survey of other sites, I found that this purchase would be impossible with such an outlandish card number.

A medical questionnaire, which is supposed to replace the advice of a physician, unfolded onto my monitor. I asked the basics: age, sex, height and weight.

John, I decided, would be a smaller man, around 4 feet tall with a slight weight problem, weighing in around 300 pounds. A host of questions were then asked regarding medical history, drug allergies and any surgical procedures that had been performed in recent weeks.

Luckily, John was in good health regardless of his physical condition. I affirmed that this information was

Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism (NIAAA), “research has revealed an association between moderate alcohol consumption and lower risk for coronary heart disease.” This document continues to state that, “with few exceptions, epidemiologic data from at least 30 countries in North America, Europe, Asia and Australia demonstrate a 20 to 40 percent lower CHD incidence among drinkers compared with non-drinkers.”

Because alcohol’s effect varies from person to person, “moderate consumption” is difficult to define. Roughly, moderate consumption is two drinks per day for men and one drink per day for women and the elderly.

One drink is defined as 12 ounces of regular beer, five ounces of wine or 1.5 ounces of hard liquor — a regular bottle, a glass and a shot, respectively.

Heart breaking
CHD, whose most common form is a heart attack, is a major contributor to cardiovascular disease, the number one cause of death in the United States, according to the Center for Disease Control. About 500,000 victims annually make up 25 percent of all deaths nationally.

CHD can result from the build up of cholesterol and other fatty substances in a person’s arteries or from a constriction of the arteries. Either of these events can block the flow of blood and cut off the heart’s supply of oxygen, causing a heart attack.

But although studies have shown that daily moderate alcohol consumption is linked to a decreased chance of death due to CHD, it has not been clearly proven that the alcohol is a direct cause of decreased risk.

Researchers believe there are several ways in which alcohol can reduce the risk of CHD. Moderate amounts of alcohol increase levels of HDL cholesterol, sometimes referred to as “good cholesterol.” HDL cholesterol transports “bad cholesterol” that clogs arteries — out of the body.

A drink or two per day will decrease the chances of a blood clot forming that blocks blood vessels, which can cause strokes. Aspirin has a similar blood-thinning effect.

Alcohol also decreases insulin levels and insulin resistance.

Setting examples
The health benefits of alcohol first gained attention in 1991 when “60 Minutes” reported on FPG Insulations low heart rate attack rate, despite a tendency in the country to eat foods high in saturated fat.

But along with these high fat foods, the French tend to drink red wine with their meals.

Since then, the “French Paradox,” as the piece was called, has been the cause of many studies in alcohol and prompted alterations in the American Dietary Guidelines.

Red wine may also possess health benefits beyond those of other forms of alcohol. Antioxidants found in grape skins and seeds may also fight against cancer, arthritis, Alzheimer’s disease and other ailments. But the skins and seeds are used solely in the production of red wine — and not white wine — so only the red variety possesses those antioxidants.

But having a glass of wine with dinner should not replace the other factors that reduce the risk of heart disease — a healthy diet, exercise, not smoking and maintaining a healthy body weight.

Some good advice
The CNPP does not encourage non-drinkers to start drinking alcohol in order to reduce their risk of heart disease, especially since CHD is a problem mostly for people aged 45 and older — moderate daily alcohol consumption has less benefit and more health risks for younger people.

About 40 percent of the nation’s population already suffers from drinking problems, according to the NIAAA, and heavy drinking does not provide the same benefits as moderate drinking. Drinking fourteen shots of vodka on a Friday night, for example, does not have the same effect as two bottles of beer at dinner every evening.

Heavy drinking, in fact, can triple the risk of heart disease, as well as a host of other problems. Besides heart disease, alcohol abuse can increase a person’s risk for the onset of cancer, cirrhosis of the liver, liver disease, depression, accidents and violence. In general, the CNPP advises that, “if you drink alcoholic beverages, do so in moderation, with meals, and never to excess.”

And yet, the health benefits of alcohol are so clear, and the temptation to use it for any one of the above reasons is so strong, that one cannot help but wonder, “why isn’t everyone moderate drinking?”

The health benefits are evident for women, and even more so for men.

To date there are few incidents of adverse effects to buying prescription drugs online, but the ones that have been reported are dramatic.

According to the FDA, a 52-year-old man with a family history of heart disease died of a heart attack last March, shortly after buying a drug online from an online source that only recently taken initiatives to help prevent unsanitary products from being sold.

President Bill Clinton has recently taken action to regulate online sales, requiring carriers to help prevent unsanitary products from being sold.

The White House would ask Congress to regulate online sales, requiring carriers to help prevent unsanitary products from being sold.

But until then, buyers beware. The world of online drugs cannot be trusted.

her last year, but she doesn't seem to be hurting because of it. When you're that athletic, it doesn't seem to be hurting because of it. It may even be a good thing sometimes."

After Wayne's goal, Kelly Darrow beat SU's defense and brought Colgate to within one at 3-2.

Syracuse (3-3) then erupted for four unanswered goals, highlighted by free-position goals by Katrina Hable and Carrie Soults, pushing the lead to 7-2 with 14:51 remaining in the first half. While the offense peppered shots at Colgate keeper Jane Leitzell, the Orange women's defense worried about protecting the netminder. Syracuse played tenacious defense, breaking several clear and disrupting any Red Raider attempt at transition. SU forced 14 Colgate turnovers while limiting the Red Raiders to 15 shots on goal.

"We have great individuals in this unit," Miller said. "If they play as a unit, that's when they're at their best. When we play as a team, they're dominating." Although the defense played well, Miller said she wants more effort, especially picking up cutters and moving around picks. Colgate sparring broke through SU's defense, registering back-to-back goals. Anne Currier scored a transition goal and Kate Manzella capitalized on a free-position opportunity, clearing the gap to 7-4. Manzella led the Red Raiders with four goals and Currier notched two scores.

But SU answered with five consecutive goals to close out the half.

Wayne sparked the run with two assists, dishing once to Lauren Brady for a transition goal and then connecting with Hable in the offensive set, sending Syracuse to the locker room with a 16-4 advantage.

After working on the transition game in practice all week, Miller said she was happy to see it blend together with the Orangewomen's usual settled attack.

"We've been leaning too much toward the settled attack," Miller said. "That doesn't really fit our personality. We need to be able to do it, we need to be able to do it well, but the bottom line is we like to run 'n' gun. If we can get them moving, they'll score a lot of goals."

The only problem with the transition game is turnovers. SU gave the ball away 13 times in the game, but Miller said she can forgive some of the turnovers if her players get comfortable with both styles.

Healy showcased the combination offense at the start of the second half. She took a pass from freshman Sami Stock and drove around defenders for her third goal. Four minutes later, Healy struck again, giving SU a 14-4 lead with 25 minutes remaining.

After a nine-minute scoreless stretch for Syracuse, Healy notched her final goal, sprinting up the field in transition and taking it to the cage.

Although Syracuse dominated and built a big lead, Miller said her team never took it for granted.

"We want to stay focused and work on the little things," Miller said. "Sometimes it's difficult to play when you're ahead, but sometimes you just want to work on little parts of your game that you're going to need for the next one, and that's what we tried to do."

If NCBA had its way, would band march on?

Just beyond the curtain, perched in four rows behind the basket, the State University band pumps out the school fight song.

Oboe sits on the dark side of the blazer, his tear streaming down his right cheek and a look of contempt on his cleanly shaven face.

“Fifteen years of lessons, summer afternoons trained at camps, long bus rides to 8-0 soccer games,” Oboe said through clenched teeth. “All to play here. And those bastards took my glory away from me.”

On the bright side of the blue curtain, CBS’ cameras and 40,000 fans joined State’s band in anticipation of Saturday night at the Final Four, a five-hour evening that decides the champions in the nationwide game.

But on Wednesday, the National Collegiate Band Association ruled Oboe took $160.79 from an agent to help pay for a year spent at the Caribou Prep School in Northern Maine.

Oboe, an All-American tuba player and leader of State’s 57-piece ensemble, must sit the weekend and will never again delight thousands with “Proud Mary” at the under-12 television timeout.

It seems fair enough. The crime, the theft, the organization says. But the NCBA’s ruling makes its executives appear more cruel than Hammurabi.

For one, the “agent” was Old Lady Mendillo, who paid Oboe for shoveling snow in their Johnston, R.I., neighborhood with heaping plates of ravioli.

On her deathbed, she bequeathed her lifetime high-stakes Bingo winnings to the 15-year-old Oboe, who played the blues on weekends at a Caribou watering hole just to make ends meet.

Oboe said he never wanted the money, but watching his fellow band members receive new music stands, boxes of sheet reeds and those ridiculous marching-band hats with orange feathers enticed him to grab the cash.

A hot prospect out of Caribou Prep, Oboe chose State for the chance to start as a freshman. Dubbed the Brass Bandit by a major national band recruiting publication, Oboe helped State to strong showings in the Big Dance each of his first three years.

But the goal of a Final Four eluded him the way any hint of style escaped most of his comrades.

Oboe said Mendillo’s gift never stayed far from his mind, but he never lifted an eyebrow when the NCBA started its witch hunt early this season.

“I was a good kid,” Oboe said as State fell behind in the national semifinal and its band started “Crazy Train” a second too late. “I passed all my tests, never did anything wrong.

“I just wanted to live my dream with our band. But now listen to them. We have a good team, but they need me out there. It’s killing me.”

The annual allegations flew at usual suspects. Eastern University’s low graduation rate and instrument-related, on-campus felonies always cast the NCBA’s shadow on its campus.

But clean-cut University of the Atlantic drummer Bob Snaire missed nine games for the chance to play on the NCBA.

And now, a message from the Headless Horseman:

“H'ya folks! If you're like me, you enjoy human decapitation. Am I speaking your language?

Then come on down to UU Cinemas’ presentation of SLEEPY HOLLOW March 31st and April 1st for $3.

The show’s in Gifford Auditorium. Showtime’s 7 and 9:30. Go is free at midnight. See you there!”

The Syracuse softball team reached another milestone in its inaugural season with 3-0 wins against the Saluki Invitational last weekend.

After a mentally and physically taxing trip down south over Spring Break, the Orangewomen bounced back and strung together four consecutive victories to capture coach Mary Jo Firnbach's first recruit tossed SIU's load.

Junior Missy Bieman got the only SU hit on the mound. Firnbach said "They're pitching a lot of ballgames," Firnbach said. "Do they throw perfect games all the time? No. Are all their pitches on all the No, but they seem to be getting a lot of hits with some good wrists and hitting the locations.

Syracuse's Stacey Brown certainly was a marked woman, as three Colgate players chase her. And that's what the Red Raiders were doing all Wednesday night — chasing the Orangewomen. SU dominated Colgate on the offensive end in a 16-8 win at the Carrier Dome.

BY ALISON HISCHAK

If anyone wondered how quickly Syracuse midfielder Karen Healy would return to form after missing last season for personal reasons, they need only look at the Orangewomen's statistics.

Healy sat at the top of the scoring charts with 11 goals and five assists entering SU's game with Colgate on Wednesday night.

The junior midfielder only increased her lead in the offensive department, erupting for five goals and one assist and surpassing Syracuse's 16-0 victory at the Carrier Dome.

"I was very nervous to come back," Healy said. "But having that year off made me very excited to come back and play hard. I realized what I didn't have while I wasn't playing." The former Empire State Games MVP made an immediate impact against the Red Raiders (1-3). Healy took a feed from attacker Kara Hanover, breaking through the middle of the defense and scoring to give Syracuse a 2-1 lead with 25:28 left in the first half.

Two minutes later, Healy blew past Colgate defenders in transition and passed off to freshman Kim Wayne, who found the net from five yards out. (Healy) should be one of the best attackers in the country," SU head coach Lisa Deshman said. "Unfortunately, we didn't have her last year..."

Nuclear buyouts find opposition

BY ASHLEIGH GRAF
Staff Writer

The nuclear power industry is placing Central New York residents in danger, said Tim Judson of the region's Citizens' Awareness Network.

Judson spoke Thursday in front of Syracuse City Hall during a press conference used to begin the network's new campaign. A sign reading "Who ya gonna call? Nuke Busters!" hung from his podium.

The campaign aims to prevent the regional corporates from buying New York state nuclear reactors and to warn residents of the buyouts, he said.

"We are concerned about the threat of nuclear power in our neighborhood," Judson said.

With about a dozen supporters — including a man dressed as a cat — cheering him on, Judson compared the campaign to Paul Revere's ride, serving as a town crier.

The nuclear power market is undergoing deregulation, which means the government will no longer have control of the price that customers pay for energy, said David Katz of CAN. In the past, all price changes were monitored and needed approval by the government, she said.

Private companies will now have control of the prices, she added.

Amgen and Entergy are negotiating with the state's Nuclear Regulatory Commission to buy several upstate plants.

Amgen is in the process of buying two Nine Mile Point plants, both in Oswego. Entergy already controls the Fitzpatrick plant in Oswego and the Indian Point plant in Buchanan, Katz said.

The reactors are being sold for far less than they are worth, she said. Pilgrim, a reactor in Massachusetts, valued at more than $400 million, was sold to Entergy for $23 million, she added.

"These reactors are going dirt-cheap," she said.

The companies do not have the interests of the community in mind, she said. They only care for the profits they can make from their acquisitions, she added.

The deregulation is an effort to improve the energy industry and give customers a choice in their power companies, Katz said. The sale of New York state's nuclear reactors is a result of this.

Braving a torrent of sleet and wind, members of the Student Coalition On Organized Labor marched Thursday across the Syracuse University Quad in protest of their latest loss in a string of anti-sweatshop battles.

SCOOL organized the protest in response to the outcome of a Wednesday meeting with SU Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw, said Marika Wassink, a senior music major and the sole student member of the university's Trademark Licensing Advisory Board.

During the meeting, Shaw balled at SCOOL's call for SU to join the Worker Rights Consortium, Wassink said. The consortium is an independent organization that aims to verify and inspect conditions in factories that manufacture apparel for colleges and universities, she added.

Carrying handwritten signs reading "Keep SU Sweatshop Free, Sign On To The WRC," and chanting for fair labor, the group gathered at the Student Union.

Giuliani hearing date set

NEW YORK CITY — Police Commissioner Howard Safir and city medical examiner Dr. Michael H. Heas are expected to testify Friday at a state Assembly hearing in Nashville on whether Mayor Rudolph Giuliani broke the law in releasing a photo of a man shot to death by police.

Giuliani was invited but will not attend, according to Heas. The mayor is expected to be out of the state.

Patrick Dorismond, 26, was fatally shot March 16 in midtown Manhattan after he responded angrily when approached by an undercover narcotics officer who asked him for drugs. Dorismond, a father of two who was a security guard, was unarmed; the officer who fired the shots was not identified.

Soon after Dorismond's death, the New York Police Department revealed that he had been arrested for robbery and assault as a 13-year-old.

His juvenile record had been sealed under state law, and many legal experts say it shouldn't have been made public. His release brought a chorus of criticism and condemnation from Dorismond's family and from some elected officials at the city and state levels.

Giuliani has said that he authorized Safir to release the juvenile record, which also included 1993 and 1996 arrests.

Deputy Mayor Joseph Lhota has said he believes Silver is acting to help fellow Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign against Giuliani for U.S. Senate.

Date rape drug killers sentenced

DETROIT — Three men were sentenced to up to 15 years in prison for manslaughter in connection with the first of a series of date-rape drug cases.

A fourth man received a shorter term for his part in the death of 15-year-old Samantha Reid of Brooklyn. All four were convicted on March 14.

On Jan. 10, 1999, Sammantha asked for a drink at a party and was given a soft drink spiked with the drug ketamine. She became violently ill, lost consciousness and died the next day. A friend also ingested the drug and was briefly in a coma, but survived.

GHB has been linked to at least 56 deaths since 1990 and more than 5,700 reported overdoses, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Joshua Cole, 19, of Southfield; Matthew S. Neher, 23, of Detroit; Thomas P. M. Paine, 18, of Trenton; and Nicholas H. Paschall, 19, of Detroit, were sentenced to four to 15 years in prison for involuntary manslaughter.

McCain forfeits delegates to Bush

LANSING, Mich. — John McCain is giving former primary foe George W. Bush six delegates he won in Michigan, allowing Gov. John Engler to suspend the National Republican Convention as a Bush delegate.

The agreement, announced Thursday, is the latest move toward GOP reconciliation after the rough primary struggle.

McCain agreed to give Bush six delegates to add to the six the Texas governor won in the Feb. 22 Michigan primary, leaving the Arizona senator with 46 of the state's 58. McCain has suspended his campaign, and Bush has won enough delegates to clinch the nomination.

The move will allow Engler, a top Bush supporter, to attend the convention as a Bush delegate.

McCain won Michigan 51 percent to 43 over Bush, largely on the strength of independent and Democrat voters who supported him in the open primary. But he has since lost the delegate battle, with the Arizona senator's two-week campaign concentrated on the Michigan primary's Tuesday weigh-in on the Michigan delegate tally.

— the same time the library closed, James said. Many students were not able to catch the bus when they stayed at the library until closing time, he added.

After a 90-minute discussion, James said he convinced members of the board to hold the liability for an additional 30 minutes after the library's closing time.

Many students complained that after going to late movies on the weekend, they have to take a cab back to campus, Duffy said. "We have a lot of issues to deal with bus services," said Duffy, a freshman in the College of Visual and Performing Arts. "It's one of the main concerns on campus. As long as we keep working on it we can do something.

Another student concern the Assembly plans to address is limited busing to South Campus on weekends and late on weeknights. The last bus to South Campus on weekdays leaves at 3:30 a.m. from College Place. This does not accommodate many students, Assemblyman David Gaulin said. "That's something that's been brought up a number of times by people who live on South Campus," said Gaulin, a sophomore in The College of Arts and Sciences. "For safety and convenience, this is something that SGA has been focusing on.

Gaulin added that SGA also is hoping to extend the hours of the Goldstein Student Center's computer lab so that students do not have to commute to North Campus to work in one of the 24-hour computer labs.

SGA is also working to add services at times during the day when buses are extremely crowded, he added.

"The officials that we work with are cooperating," Gaulin said. "They weren't aware at how severe the problem was."

But Robinson said that to his knowledge, the students had no indication that they would be prevented from the university to bring the protest from the Quad into the administration building.

Robinson said that according to insiders of Shaw's office, "the university has not been notified of the realm of their authority," he said. "We certainly didn't want to prohibit the young people from expressing their ideas and concerns.

Administration responds
Shaw issued a statement Thursday afternoon detailing the university's membership in the Fair Labor Association.

"At this time, SU will remain a member of the FLA, along with 133 other colleges and universities," according to the statement. "At the same time, we will give due consideration to the Worker Rights Consortium, once that organization has become a functioning entity.

Shaw left the city of Syracuse shortly after issuing the statement and could not be reached for comment.

The FLA is a non-profit organization established to protect the rights of apparel and footwear workers in the United States and abroad. SU Spokesman Kevin Morrow said.

Among the companies included in the FLA are Nike, L.L. Bean, Liz Claiborne, Eddie Bauer, Kathy Lee Gifford, Levi Strauss and Co. and Reebok.

The university believes the FLA has strong leadership in place," Morrow said. "It is committed to working with manufacturers to introduce change in the workplace.

Syracuse auditor encourages community revival

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Asst. News Editor

The days of families and friends taking long walks through downtown Syracuse are gone, said City Auditor Minch Lewis, a 34-year resident of Syracuse.

"There's a new environment for things now. Absolutely everything is different," Lewis said at a Thursday Morning Roundtable discussion. "We don't stroll down Salina Street anymore. We stroll through cyberspace so we have a refit of the past," Lewis said.

And when personal relationships suffer, the work efficiency of government rapidly follow, he said.

Lewis added that dwelling on the way things were in Syracuse more than 30 years ago will achieve little progress. The focus of government must now be on bending modern society to improve the quality of life, he explained.

We must bring technological advancements to bear in a context for human development," he said. "When we look around our city, we can see, it seems to me, many cases where we haven't done that, where the changes have overwhelmed us.

By creating the virtual city, officials can measure where Syracuse has gone and ensure the community is strengthening, Lewis said.

Comparing the present to the past also allows officials to learn where mistakes are made and to learn from them, he added.

"We can paint the picture of the future with some of the best pieces from the past," Lewis said. "We need the benchmarks so we have a reference point where we can judge how far we've come or how far we haven't come in terms of maintaining the quality of life." Syracuse can then solve its upcoming debate on how to distribute Onondaga County sales tax among the county, the city, the towns and villages and the school districts, he said.

Every 10 years, the Onondaga County Legislature convenes a sales tax commission to help the body decide how to carve up the sales tax revenue.

Under the current formula, the county receives about 28 percent of the revenue, the city gets about 26 percent, the towns and villages get about 11 percent and the county's school districts receive about 7 percent.

To fairly distribute the more than $517 million the county collects in sales tax each year, legislators and members of the commission should look to the mistakes and progress that the 1990 commission made.

"It's an opportunity for statesmanship, but it's also an opportunity for the narrowest brand of politics," Lewis said.

"The community is being put to the test with this," Lewis said.

Dennis Connors, a Syracuse resident who agreed with Lewis' opinions about the sales tax debate, said the county legislature's current structure is ill-equipped to deal with an issue such as the sales tax distribution. The 24-member legislature is too large and too diverse to arrive at a meaningful consensus, he said.

"It's tough to get 24 people to agree on anything," Connors said. "Everybody's kind of fighting over their piece of the sales tax pie.

Connors suggested that a smaller nine-person legislature would deal with local issues, such as the sales tax, more effectively.

Under the current system, if the constitution is changed, officials can measure where Syracuse has gone and ensure the community is strengthening, Lewis said.

Comparing the present to the past also allows officials to learn where mistakes are made and to learn from them, he added.

"We can paint the picture of the future with some of the best pieces from the past," Lewis said. "We need the benchmarks so we have a reference point where we can judge how far we've come or how far we haven't come in terms of maintaining the quality of life." Syracuse can then solve its upcoming debate on how to distribute Onondaga County sales tax among the county, the city, the towns and villages and the school districts, he said.

The current debate on how to consolidate departments and operations among the city, county and school districts to improve efficiency and cut costs also provides a chance for citizens to live up to their constituents' expectations, said Sarah McVain of Syracuse.

McVain said some officials have hesitated in consolidating departments because they do not want to give up power to different levels of government. The reasons the officials give for not consolidating, however, do not mirror their intentions, she added.

"Some of the elected officials in the city of Syracuse claim they don't want any consolidation because they've worked hard to represent minorities," McVain said. "They seem to think that consolidation would hurt that.

Lewis urged audience members to be cautious of issues such as consolidation. Politicians often advocate these trends because everyone else is talking about them, he added.

"Consolidation is a buzz word. We need to analyze the specific things we're talking about," he said. "I wouldn't put it in terms of a racial, minority or ethnic dynamic. We just need to create a government that is close to the people."

"The leaders, public and private, must help create a new social, economic and political environment that replaces above all else the promotion of human potential," he said. "We need a new approach, aimed at improving the quality of life in the city."

Only a consistent philosophy or working for the needs of constituents and not for political gain will allow Syracuse and the rest of New York state to prosper regardless of any future problem, Lewis said.

How safe do you feel as a student at Syracuse?

Students respond to recent burglaries, thefts and assaults.

Safety responsibility must be shared

Q: Do you think students should fear for their safety on campus and around the university?
A: I hate the cliché about having a false sense of security, but it’s true. People don’t realize the possibility of crimes until they see it happen to people they know. My apartment was burglarized in November, and it really made me watch out for myself after that. I automatically lock my door behind me as soon as I got inside now, and I’m just much more aware of my surroundings.
Sara Naggar
Arts and Sciences
Class of ’00

Q: How much of a responsibility does SU have to protect its students?
A: While they’re right about needing to lock up your doors and check your peephole, it shouldn’t be purely the students’ responsibilities to look out for themselves. We’re paying money to go here and live here, and there’s sort of a double standard. They can come in to your apartment on South Campus, or your room, and check through your stuff, but then they expect you to protect yourself from intruders that want to break in.

Q: Does the university do enough to secure residence halls?
A: People think it’s a hassle to have to swipe their cards and check in with an RSA when they’re coming in late at night, but that might be the only thing that keeps people safe.

One of my favorite programs is when resident advisors go around to the rooms in the middle of the night and check locks. For every open door they find, they leave a note that says, “You’ve been robbed.” I think that really helps teach people that they’re always an easy target.

But really, you shouldn’t have to feel in danger all the time when you’re in a residence hall environment.

Sara Naggar is a sophomore newspaper major. She is the incoming Residence Hall Association president.

Syracuse police utilize sparse resources

Q: Is the Syracuse University area safe for students?
A: Well, whenever there’s a very large population of kids going around, there are going to be more incidents of crime. I went through the university area street by street and checked the crime reports. People say there’s a crime spree going on, but there’s not. There was one robbery on Ackerman Avenue, but the only one in our building was a student in her house early in the morning. But there were the only two major incidents, and they’re definitely unrelated, and there’s no correlation between those and the car burglaries and things that are going on.

And students know that it’s risky to leave their apartments unlocked, especially when they go away. Someone could very easily break in during breaks and vacations.

Q: How much patrol priority is the university area given throughout the week?
A: Everything is based on the workload. The officers have to respond to every call they get, and they can’t leave one call to go investigate another, so we have to call in someone else off another beat, which leaves a hole somewhere.

The officers go from one call to another all over the place from the minute they get to work until the minute they leave. The only thing else we could do — and it’s not feasible — is to put a car on every corner.

We try to do the best we can with the resources we have.

Q: What is the purpose of the Neighborhood Patrol Initiative with the university?
A: Initially, the patrol was established in response to complaints — quality of life calls — from residents in the area who don’t want noisy parties going on all the time, and the officers have to respond to every call. The officers check the crime spree going on all the time, and there’s not enough cars parked on both sides of their street — things like that. But we hope that the presence of the police being in the area, even if they’re just breaking up parties, is a deterrent to any violent crime that’s going on.

Sergeant David Sackett is the public information officer for the Syracuse Police Department.

Delegate reshuffle won't quiet McCain

U.S. Sen. John McCain may be out of contention at the U.S.-presidential ballot box, but he won't let his influence fade into primary election antiquity.

The Republican presidential contender extended his first tenuous olive branch to Texas Gov. George W. Bush on Thursday, giving him six of the delegates he won in his Michigan primary victory in February.

The reshuffle leaves McCain holding 46 of the state's 56 delegates. It also guaranteed Michigan Gov. John Engler — who has been noted on the growing list of potential Bush running mates — a vote for Bush at the Republican National Convention.

McCain's initial campaign surge was obliterated by droves of voters in key states who supported Bush, the GOP's favorite son. But he'll still captivate an audience at the Republican's nominating convention. Though delegate concessions are an inevitable part of the post-primary letdown, McCain refuses to concede all of his candidates.

McCain boasts a commanding presence and an irresistible desire to serve the American people. He needs to use them in order to keep the party spirit alive and buck the status quo that Bush generally advocates.

Although he was forced to halt his bid for the White House, it is vital that McCain keep his hands in the Republican party ring. It's doubtful that he'll ever actively campaign for Bush, but McCain's strong support lobby is the perfect bargaining chip to use when trying to assimilate some of his agenda items into Bush's platform.

The Republican establishment may have tried to sideline McCain's insurgent campaign, but the strength of his message endures even after the ballots have been cast.

SU officials fail to budge on sweatshop issue

To the Editor:

On Wednesday, three members of the Student Coalition on Organized Labor met with Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw to discuss Syracuse University's position in the movement to end sweatshop labor conditions in the production of university apparel. We informed the chancellor that over 1,000 students had signed a petition demanding that SU sign onto the Worker Rights Consortium, all of which were collected in under one week. This, as well as the many recent displays of student concern, Shaw responded by basically not responding.

The accolades and "hero worship" awarded to black athletes by the larger university community is often unmet within the smaller black student community.

Regardless of their motive, it is clear that these athletes should be held responsible for their behavior just as any student would be. Protectors and officers of the community members should not be used as scapegoats to protect the black image. Call university leaders to task for creating and perpetuating an inherently racist and elitist hierarchy among the student body. This blatant inequality must end.

Opinion

Hero worship of black athletes leads to alienation

Black athletes are often treated as commodities — perhaps to the point of veritable enslavement — by the capitalist university systems which offer them an education in exchange for athletic "services." But immunity from prosecution of inappropriate and unlawful behavior should not be part of this package.

When it is, in squabbles between black student athletes and black men who aren't athletes, the non-athletes are often most criticized. This is true of the current weekend's melee between members of SU's football team and a black fraternity.

Not all law enforcement officers feel compelled to comply with the "hands off" approach to athletes that has been imposed by SU Public Safety. One member of the Syracuse Police Department told me that when members of the football team have been arrested, the university most often retains an attorney to rescue them before the ink has dried on a complaint.

The similarities between recent events at Syracuse University and those that took place during your years at USC are striking. Plainly stated, some black male student-athletes choose to prey upon other black students. There are only a few places where black men can achieve a type of "elevated status" in our society, and one of those places is in athletic teams.

But for their actions, the sense of entitlement that the status quo grants them, the black male athlete is often served to alienate them from the black community regardless of their actions, the sense of entitlement that has been ingrained in these athletes by universities has often served to alienate them from the black community at large.

The accolades and "hero worship" awarded to black athletes by the larger university community is often unmet within the smaller black student community.

Perhaps some black athletes recent this fact. They may also resent the fact that black fraternity members are sometimes more revered without ever having stepped on a playing field or court. This notion is often served to alienate them from the black community regardless of their actions, the sense of entitlement that has been ingrained in these athletes by universities has often served to alienate them from the black community at large.

Assembly promotes watch as crime remedy

The congregation comprised mostly of greeks, who were targeted by the event planners.

The students also sold white ribbons to raise money for the Vera House. Chavez said. Twenty-one sororities and fraternities participated in the ribbon drive, donating about $75. The ribbons were distributed Sunday at chapter meetings, she added.

Vera House provides emergency shelter services and domestic violence education for the Syracuse area. The Vera House sponsors White Ribbon week, a campaign dedicated to promoting awareness of domestic violence issues and raising funds for a battered women's shelter. This is the first time the event has been brought to Syracuse University, Chavez said. It is the sixth year Vera house has sponsored the campaign.

"We have to let women know that they don't deserve to be abused," Kolb said. "There is a lot of self-guilt involved with victims."

Women who are victims of domestic violence often suffer not only physical, but emotional damages, Kolb said. The idea of a neighborhood watch program was "encouraging," Kolb said. "We have to look at the cost and maybe decide based on the cost, Kolb said."

Some students involved in the Vera House felt that a program is essential, he added. "I know there are some students interested in seeing what they can do about it. To get student involvement in this kind of project is exactly what the university would hope would happen."

Several students, besides the ones who are actively lobbying for the program, are in favor of the proposal, James said. James said many of the students he spoke with on campus during his Spring 2000 Campaign, an effort to improve student awareness of SGA, were in favor of the idea and some were willing to assist in its operation.

The watch program may begin late this semester, during the summer or early next semester, James said.

"We have to look at the cost and maybe decide based on the cost," he said. "It may not cost much at all."

Y'All come back
Y'All and old-time country music for the 21st century returns to Central New York. Y'All combines the rural nostalgic Americana of their upbringing with an urban forward-thinking fanatic to create songs that strike a chord with music lovers of all stripes. The spare, simple sound of Y'All — built around acoustic guitar, baritone ukulele and the duo's sweet, clear harmonies — recalls the American music styles the band members grew up with, including folk, gospel and country. The band is performing at 8:30 p.m. tonight at Happy Endings, 317 S. Clinton St. Tickets are $8 and can be purchased at the door. Call 475-1853 for more information.

Enjoy jazz
The Corinthian Foundation presents an evening of traditional and New Orleans jazz to benefit the Wagon Wheel Senior Center. The mellow night of soothing sounds and reverent music appeal will be highlighted by cocktails at 6 p.m., followed by the main jazz ensemble and a dinner buffet from 7 to 9 p.m. Special guests include the versatile Jazz vocalist Nancy Kelly and New Orleans' trombonist/jazz vocalist Steve Yocum. The performance is at 7 p.m. tonight at the Hotel Syracuse Persian Terrace, 500 S. Warren St. Tickets are $35 for dinner and jazz, $20 for jazz only. For more information, contact Barbara Barnett at 479-6681.

Toy swap
The International Toy Collectors Association Toy Road Show is on national tour offering the unique opportunity for local residents to bring in their old toys from their attics. Associates will be on hand to purchase toys such as robots, space toys, dolls and other memorabilia. They advise patrons not to attempt to clean toys that have been stored for long periods of time because it may destroy the originality of the finish and decrease the toys' value. The ITCA is also interested in any broken toys that may be used for parts. The exhibition will be from 8 a.m. to 7 p.m. Sunday to Thursday at the Best Western Airport Inn at Hancock International Airport.

A performer's life is one defined by the emotions of anxiety, hopelessness and excitement. Next Thursday, April 6, these feelings will saturate the atmosphere of the Goldstein Auditorium stage, as the performers in "A Chorus Line" act out the jitters that invariably accompany theatrical auditions.

In the musical, a production by the First-Year Players, 32 performers vie under intense pressure for eight spots as dancers in a fictitious play, making for a comedy infused with angst and sexual innuendo, said Ali Snabon, a freshman music education major.

"It's a lot of drama, it's a lot of laughter, it's a lot of everything," she said.

Of the original 32 auditioners, the 18 remaining performers intensify their fight for the eight coveted spots after making the first cut.

"Things are cut-throat," said Stacy Moreau, a freshman management and television, film and radio major. "It's a really competitive business and that's what it's all about."

Moreau plays Sheila, a sultry sexpot consumed with worries about turning 30 and insecurities about her future.

"She pours on the sex appeal," Moreau said of her character.

Whether this ribaldry will win Sheila a spot is at the discretion of the musical director, Zach, played by John Murray, a freshman television, film and radio and English and Textual Studies major.

As the man who holds the mandate over the performers' fates, Zach is respected for recognizing the most talented performers but is seen as cold and callous, Murray said.

Actors try to shape themselves into what they think he wants, but Zach asks them to tell him about their lives during the audition.

"He isn't interested in how they dance and how they look," Murray said. "Zach is really looking for what's underneath."

By telling their personal stories through song and dance, the 18 performers add another dimension to their characters as real people under the stage facade.

The inequality of the relationship between newlyweds Al and Christine, both dancers, becomes apparent during the auditions.

Christine, played by freshman Leanne Ginstory, looks to her husband for support. Al responds by controlling her life, even to the point of answering the director's questions for her.

Al "wears the pants" in the relationship, said Ryan Grow, a freshman

Romeo’ rap-Kung-fu mix misses mark

“Romeo Must Die,” but he doesn’t. Jackie Chan is not giving it away of course. Jackie Chan will live throughout the whole movie. Obviously from the title, this marriage of the rap and Kung-Fu worlds is oddly enough a fulfillment of the Shakespearean classic.

We haven’t seen the likes of this since we unfortunately reviewed “Ten Things I Hate About You,” which was based on “The Taming of the Shrew.” Although there is no stranger to the Asian influence, from Fu-Schickens to Wu-Tang Clan, Red Pea has been cutting up the charts for years.

Set in Oakland, this bay area tale of two families, broken down and unbalanced in their own way, is the story of the race for real estate and the greed that corrupts both families to the point of death and dishonor.

In this informal support group, both personal and professional.

Enter Aaliyah and Jackie Chan, who basically have character names that don’t represent their screen performances as well as their real names.

Super play
Bring the whole crew to experience the pageantry and spectacle of Central New York’s most revered theatrical production, “Jesus Christ Superstar.” See the mounting and passionate telling of one of the last days of Jesus Christ through music and song. Performances will be performed at 7:30 p.m. today and Saturday and at 2 and 7:30 p.m. Sunday in the Salt City Center for the Performing Arts, 601 S. Crouse Ave. Tickets are $15 for seniors, $20 for non-seniors, students and groups. For further information, call the box office 474-1122.

Lesbian humor
Her humor is gutsy and honest, and coming from Susan Westenhoefer has a totally likable personality, mixing with the audience like a statue on the dance floor.

Grow said he found parallels between Al’s audition and one of the most iconic renditions of the classic love song, “You’ll be hungry later, order dessert now.” Rosenthal: “You’ll be hungry later, order dessert now.” Rosenthal: “You’ll be hungry later, order dessert now.”

“Go on, back to your podium!” Do we see the best performance comes from “a non-actor” — DMX!

But seriously, although he sounds like he’s commercial, charging that guns don’t kill people, he does. Dark Man X puts in a surprisingly promising performance, which now has producer Joel Silver ensuring him more screen work in the future.

The parade of a seemingly endless budget includes such song staples as hot cars, hot women and hot clothes, giving the film an extra gloss. Like this movie needed it with this kind of name-dropping in the future.

The male stars
Anchu Anderson plays the babysitting thug in Aaliyah’s family. He provides the goofy guys with getting ready to perform and enlightening and cushioning Jet Li’s fall out a window.

How ‘bout no?
Yes, we do have to come to them all when their names sell tickets like they do. Hey, if they built with film, stories around our reputation, we’d throw “Cinemaniacs” into the mix, too.

And so one is Bruce Lee!
The male stars are expected to step up to the challenge of the two movie books, but Jet Li’s a failed attempt to save the whole movie. Grow said he found parallels between Al’s audition and one of the most iconic renditions of the classic love song, “You’ll be hungry later, order dessert now.”

The show is all about energy, she added.

The musical affects Grow’s energy, she added. “The show is all about energy, she added.”

The musical affects Grow’s energy, she added. “The show is all about energy, she added.”

As long as we keep up our energy and everyone stays healthy, we’re going to perform like we’ve never performed before.”

Buddy said he expects great performances coming from the hard work of the entire cast and crew.

As long as we keep up our energy and everyone stays healthy, we’re going to perform like we’ve never performed before. Grow said.

Director April Nauman said she has been feeling exhausted but happy from running the paper this year. Since the show was picked in Oct. 1999, the First-Year Players production has essentially absorbed all of her time, she added.

“Of course, there’s been a lot of frustration, a lot of stress and a lot of work,” Nauman said. “The hardest thing is to realize that once it’s over, it’ll be so amazing.”

Nauman, a junior Spanish, French, and German education major, has been involved with three previous First-Year Players productions.

It’s definitely think from my past experiences, they’re the most talented groups I’ve worked with,” she said.

Although Saturday's women's lacrosse game at the Carrier Dome was an away game for the University of Connecticut, the result marked nothing more than a homecoming for several Huskies.

Eight Syracuse-area natives return to Central New York for the 230 p.m. showdown, providing added enthusiasm on the Husky sidelines and looking to better the results from last season's SU-UConn clash, an 11-8 Orangemen triumph.

Four of the Huskies' seven attackers live within a short drive of the Dome - midfielder Heather Bliss of Manlius and Bonnie Weininger of Constantia are tied for first in scoring with 19 goals each, while sophomore goalie April Pollock of Cicero, defenders Claire Swedick of Syracuse and Susan Fralick of Penny and sophomore defender Lindsay Clarkson of Ridgewood High School in New Jersey, Springer expected to come...
No. 12 Orangemen crew opens spring season

BY JODI HEBERT  Contributing Writer

The members of the Syracuse Orangemen crew might give you the shirts on their backs if they had to, but they would much rather take the shirt off of your back.

This weekend, the Orangemen hope to add two more shirts to their wardrobe when they meet Boston University and Brown on Onondaga Lake.

Syracuse, like many other rowing programs, has a tradition for many years in the Eastern Association of Rowing Colleges for the losing squads to give the shirts off their backs to the winning squad.

And to have the shirt of another team to wear around your home campus is a great motivating factor, said co-captain Josh Stratton.

“If you are wearing another team’s shirt, it means that you beat them,” he said. “You don’t want to give up your shirt either, so you give everything you have to win.”

Each team in the EARC, including SU, is extremely competitive, and this weekend will be SU’s first chance to see how they can hold up against the other teams in the league.

In a pre-season poll, Syracuse was ranked 12th, while Brown was No. 2 and Boston University (BU) was ranked No. 8.

Every EARC squad is focused throughout the end of the season, every squad usually lines within a few seconds of each other in races.

If SU wants to win this weekend, they are going to have to row at the top of their game, assistant coach Chris Ludden said.

The three SU squads competed for the first time this season, and the varsity eight, junior varsity eight, and the freshman eight, have been training since the end of December.

SU has spent a few hours every afternoon rowing on Onondaga Lake in September, October, and part of November. Outdoor water workouts start again in March.

During the winter, however, the Orangemen practice indoors, using the rowing tank and ergometers — rowing machines — at Archbold Gymnasium.

They even run the steps of the third level in the Carrier Dome as well as the stairs up to Mount Olympus.

Every weekend, they do a triathlon of sorts, too,” Ludden said. “We row, we run, and we swim — which is fun to watch because you can’t swim to save their lives.”

But to be a good rowing squad, mental and physical preparedness is required, Stratton said.

Each boat member must be in sync, rowing at the same time to achieve the perfect stroke, he said. This aspect seems especially important to coach Bill Sanford’s squad, since the SU squads spend less time on the water than other teams because of the cold weather.

Brown, which SU will race on Sunday, has not been affected by the harsh work hard enough, he said, because the work has been focused on one week and lost to it the next.

“When you beat a crew, it is because you have performed all you have,” Stratton said. “There is no other feeling like it.”

This weekend, the team gets its first look at how it will measure up to the other teams.

Each race will span 2000 meters straightaway covering parts of Onondaga Lake and the Erie Canal. It will take each crew about six minutes to complete the race.

That is six minutes of hardcore rowing, which is like “running and weight lifting all at the same time,” Stratton said.

“I am really excited for the weekend,” he said. “I have been watching us grow all year, and I can’t wait to see what we are capable of.”

Orangewomen enter poll with weekend sweep

BY JASON SACKS  Staff Writer

As the hype for March Madness is settling down, the Syracuse University’s campus, the Orangewomen rowing team traveled to West Point and played its way into the national rankings.

The Orangewomen, ranked 78th in the nation, won three matches at the Army Invitational last weekend. SU defeated Temple 6-3 on Saturday, and then collected victories over Fordham 6-0, and Army, 7-1, on Sunday.

With the weekend sweep, the Orangewomen have won four of their last five matches and hosted Prov-idence College this weekend before the Big East Tournament.

The match with Seton Hall is important because it has implications for the seeding in the Big East Tournament, said coach Mac Gifford.

“With only a 1-2-2 record in the Big East this season, it will be important to get the win to advance to the Big East Tournament,” he said. “I have been watching us grow all year, and I can’t wait to see what we are capable of.”

The match with Seton Hall, the Orangewomen will be focused on winning if it means they get more seconds when they host Brown, their final match before the Big East Tournament.

Gifford believes the team must play better than it is now if it wants to beat Brown and advance in the tournament.

“This is a hard-working bunch of girls,” Gifford said. “The seniors have been knocked out early in the tournament the past few years. This year, they are focused, and want to win in Miami.”

There's been a pretty decent amount of idiocy thrown here, too, but I think I'll try to remember the talent.

When I first decided to be a sports writer, I did it — like most people — because I'd get to watch games and write about them for a living.

For a sports fan, it doesn't get much better than that.

My seat for every big game was either from a vantage point or as close to the action as you could get — and I didn't have to pay.

That strategy paid off for me. I've been able to see some great basketball games and been able to attend a few relatively exciting football games.

I've been up close with some of the best players and some of the best coaches in college sports.

And I was almost trapped by the Syracuse student body after the men's basketball team's Carrier Dome victory over Connecticut this season.

In other words, it's safe to say that I'm in an envious position for a 22-year-old.

And now it's all coming to an end.

If I continue on as a sportswriter in the outside world, I'll be a sure bet to cover over 40 softball league games than an NCAA Final Four. But I guess that's not the point.

The reason that I became a sportswriter still holds true — I like sports, and writing about them for a living doesn't seem like work to me.

So whether I'm talking to Ken Griffey Jr. about how it feels to break Hank Aaron's home run record or to Mel the local bartender about what happened to Stinky's pitching arm in the fifth game of the Beer League softball tourny, I'll be happy.

I'll be in my element and talking to people that are a lot like me — well, hopefully, Stinky's not a lot like me, but you get the idea.

And because of the people that I've worked next to over my time at the paper, I've come to learn that you can take a lot of pride in the writing that you turn out, whether it's about Division I athletics or tee-ball.

I've seen these guys sacrifice a lot of things the normal college student takes for granted — like sleep, study time and a social life during the week — in order to put together the best possible sports sections.

But in the end, we're just like most of the people that read our stuff — just plain sports fans.

We don't point our faces or talk like the media (at least games we cover). We don't even root for one specific team.

But we love the sports we love, and we're here because we wanted to find the best seats for the cheapest price.

Syracuse visits Bears

BY JEFF PASSAN
Asst. Sports Editor

Brown attackmen, meet the Syracuse defense.

Here's John Glatzel, a potential All-American who swings a mean long pole and isn't afraid to crack you hard. Next to him is Billy St. George, a hard-hitting sophomore with the same dangerous aggression shown by his linemate.

All-American Marshall Abrams, Syracuse's senior captain whose stick checks wreak havoc for any ballhandler, anchors the defensive corps.

And when the Bears face No. 1 SU at 2 p.m. Saturday at Brown Stadium, suffice to say the meeting and friendly form will come in a rather unfriendly form.

"They don't know what to expect," St. George said. "They don't know who's going to be coming at them, if it's going to be Marshall or Glatzel. Even (goalie Rob) Mulligan will wind up and nail somebody."

"They have no idea what's going to happen. If they think they do, we'll pull out something new."

Sounds easy enough, but the Orangemen's defense has proven it possesses the clout to back it up.

SU (6-0) allowed just three goals in a victory against Towson a week ago Saturday, and romped over Hobart in an 18-6 victory Tuesday.

Mulligan can take a good share of the credit. While the three big bodies in front of him do the grunt work, Mulligan scrambles — while his mouth rambles — to make fantastic saves.

"They've got a goalkeeper who's maybe as hot as anyone in the country," Brown coach Peter Lasagna said. "And they've got defenders who terrorize you when they have the ball on your stick."

The trio has done more than terrorize. It's dominated.

Glatzel, who returned to SU this season after being suspended for breaking into Manley Field House last season, stabilized a close defense that otherwise requires a lot of time in the weight room, to bulk up what has been described as a wiry frame.

In fact, Springer's soft-spoken nature only contributes to his effectiveness on the field, teammate and roommate Joe Ceglia said.

"He's a goodball. You can ask anyone on the team," Ceglia said. "He's walking around campus. He doesn't look like he can walk two feet without falling, but then you put him on the lacrosse field and he shoots the ball 100 miles an hour and he's an athlete."

"He's just different. He's Mike Springer. That's a class unto itself."

Springer's class is a tough one to get into.

First, it requires the ability to get open on the offensive end.

Second, it requires a lot of time in the weight room, to bulk up what has been described as a wiry frame.

Last, it requires self-proclaimed 96 mile-per-hour shot — a shot, like a Tiger Woods drive, that seems impossible for someone lacking the musculature to make such an imposition.

"He's got a cannon," defender John Glatzel said. "He always hits our goalies out there. I don't think our goalies like it too much when they get punished by his shot. That's why Robbie has to be careful with his drives."

Plus, if John Jilotty could write five nights a week and still manage to spend half of his conscious hours in a haze created by happy hours and fishbowls, then writing once or twice a week would be easier than getting into Maggie's with a fake ID.

Dome arrests

The Orangemen won't be the only ones fighting for the Carrier Dome this year. The Syracuse Police Department had their share of arrests for crimes ranging from scalping to disorderly conduct.

During the NCAA tournament alone, six people were arrested for scalping tickets to the event.

Many a drunk are arrested for disorderly conduct as they stumble their way past security and into the Dome after their "pre-game" in parking lots across campus.

There is the woman who refused to leave the Dome until her stolen beer was finished. That's right, the woman stole two beers from a vendor and then told security officers to "fuck off" when they asked her to leave.

In November, police arrested a Dome employee for stealing $56 from his co-workers before the Syracuse/Boston College football game. The part-time concession worker admitted to police that he hid the money in his left sock.

Then in January, conceptions were hit again when a man used a counterfeit $100 bill to buy beer. Some people will do anything to get their share before the last quarter.

And then there's always that incident from September when students damaged a fan's SUV by throwing an empty beer keg out of the window of a house on Comstock before the Syracuse/Michigan football game.

The keg landed in the driveway of the house and bounced off the curb, denting the man's car.

Apparently, they were a little upset it was empty.

Bagels

I've grown up with real New York bagels. So, coming to Cornell three years ago practically meant the end of a good breakfast. Then I discovered early classes at the Huntington Beard Crouse Building, Blinker Deli is, by far, the best place to eat bagels on the Hill. Blinker opens at 8 a.m., just in time for the hideously early 8:30 a.m. classes. The bagels are usually fresh, unlike in the other bagel places on campus, and are always toasted upon request, unlike nearby People's Place in Hendricks Chapel. Contrary to Kimmel bagels, there is an abundance of cream cheese, butter, peanut butter and jelly or sandwich items to put these bagels in the "substantial lunch" category. And Blinker bagels come in more varieties than any other snack bar or food court on campus — among them blueberry, cinnamon raisin, salt, onion, poppy, sesame, strawberry, everything, vegetable and, my personal favorite, Italian. Also, Bruegger's has more of a corporate clientèle, the ho-

It's a cold January Friday and at 4 o'clock on the dot, you're at the door of the Regatta, hoping the low traffic will make the bouncer let you in with no hassle. The Happy Hour specials and the "regular crowd" await you.

Come on, you know you've done it — the end of a line that led to the front doors of the hotel itself so you could join the festivities.

"Sometimes our customers say something, but it's kind of nice to know how many people on our property," said David Heymann, general manager of the Sheraton University Hotel and Conference Center.

You've probably also told people that you've been to the Sheraton, 801 University Ave. But the ground level view of the main staircase, the carpeted-and-couched lobby and lounge that you see from the Regatta are tools with your beer goggles on are just the tip of the iceberg.

The 231 rooms — each with a color television, in-room movies and large desks — are spread out over eight floors, each with two wings, making the 15-year-old Sheraton a spacious, airy hotel. It's fully-carpeted, too.

Staffed by about 150 employees, there is 24-hour security at the hotel. Other facilities — common to most of the Sheraton hotels worldwide — include an indoor pool, an exercise room, an attached garage, free campus parking, internet access and a guide to area attractions.

Food and brew

The Regatta and The Pavilion, the Sheraton's fine dining establishment which runs room service, are also available for clients.

"It's the only adult bar in the area," said Stodie Backman, an SU employee who lives in Cato. "I can come here and relax and it's quiet here. It's nice."

While the Regatta is perhaps the most popular, especially on Fridays, Heymann said The Pavilion is not as frequented by the general community.

"We're right next to Marshall Street and with so many great restaurants downtown, people just don't come here, even though it's a good restaurant," he said.

"But people who travel alone, especially women, will eat there or use room service."

Catering to a "mainly corporate" clientele, the ho-

Tucked between Marshall Street’s Sharma Emporium and Cosmo’s is a place where many baffled guys and curious customers stumble into a world of perpetual Valentine’s Day.

Behold Hamilton’s Floral Garden — Syracuse’s answer to “What should I get so-and-so for (fill in the blank here)?” open between 10 a.m. and 8 p.m. everyday, except Sunday.

“We specialize in flowers, plants, balloons — basically,” said owner Joni Hamilton.

Hamilton’s shop is a colorfully-decorated extravaganza of gift-giving — fresh flowers and greengrass bombard the walls and floor around stuffed animals, balloons and glass vases. A few stray ker-plunking customers view the inventory while Hamilton prepares an order big enough to landscape a third-world country.

“Sometimes, people don’t know they are in a flower shop,” Hamilton added with a laugh. “I had a woman come in that was looking for motor oil. People don’t realize where they are. They just kind of walk in. Even with its ambiguous storefront — besides the large green sign on the front of the white building — Hamilton reports business is going well. More than a thousand people visit her store every week since its opening two years ago, Hamilton attributes her success to her floral foundations and prime location.

“I’ve been in the business for a while. I worked at a flower shop in the Marshall Square Mall before this,” she said. “This is a good area. There’s a lot of traffic here.”

Hamilton added that the friendly storeowners also make her feel like a main attraction.

“All the merchants on Marshall Street are really nice — especially the people from Cosmo’s. It’s like a family.”

Barry Neudorf, a junior retailing major and employee of Hamilton’s, agreed.

“This is such a happy, uplifting place to work,” she said. “Customers can look for that, commenting the helpful service and Hamilton’s knowledge of flowers and general sweetness” keeps them coming back.

“I come in once a week,” said Reena Amin, a graduate textile design major. “It’s very good service and she’s very nice.”

Canine appeal
Amin has been making her weekly visits since she came to Syracuse last year because of Hamilton’s selection of flora and her desire to have flowers around the house — not to mention Casey, Hamilton’s 7-year-old, pure-bred Keeshond.

“The first thing I saw when I walked in here was Casey,” she added.

Casey is a favorite on Marshall Street, spending his days lounging about while enjoying the petting and baby talk of M-Street’s wandering customers.

“Casey started coming to work with me when he was a puppy” Hamilton said. “People loved him. Students would ac-

Barber shop
There are hair designers, and there are barbers. Joe LoBello and Duke Drumm are the only surviving barbers on the SU Hill. Best known as half of the old Orange Tonsorial Barbershop, the “guys” are now working at Tony Christopher Hair Design on Marshall Street. But don’t let the name fool you, they are barbers, nevertheless. It is in their blood, in the mannerism created during 30 years of cutting hair. They don’t style it, they cut it — and talk about the game last weekend and the beautiful girl walking by like only guys do. Never mind the adversary on the other side of the shop — this duo is a dying breed.

They are the hometown barber that gave you your first haircut at age three. You grew up with these shit-shooting gossips who know everything about anyone and can smell an out-of-towner quicker than you’ll pull out the $2 tip. They forgo the electric to shave you with a straight-edge and then send you on your way smelling of stale aftershave. It’s an experience similar to sloouching in a leather armchair, putting a dark cigar and drinking a thick beer. Going to a barber is like joining a club, exclusive to only those enjoying a dirty joke and a good laugh. Next time you are in the chair, if your hair designer begins a trendy J-Crew cut, proceed to Tony Christopher. Ask for Joe or Duke. Grab a beat-up Maxim and read it, knowing that your hair is the least important part of getting a haircut.

Place to bitch
Arrrrghh! The lovely Syracuse weather, the friendly folks who work around campus, the fact that I’ve got enough luggage under my eyes for a ten-year stint in Cancun — it’s enough to turn any girl into Fran Drescher.

Can the point? I love to bitch.

Yep, I expect everything to be the way I want it, when I want it, how I want it and can I get fries with that please? Up here on the hill, there’s plenty of room to make demands.

Check out a couple of my favorite places to let loose some militant feminist 1980s style punk-rock rage.

1) Public Transportation: I’ve been known to go off on everything from my menstrual woes to the lack of appreciation for Pop Rocks while riding the wild Centro Buses and... local trains. It’s the best therapy in the world and it only costs a little over a buck.

2) Any Crowded Lecture: No one knows what is going on in there anyway, so why not share some angst with the rest of the crowd? It’s the perfect time to talk about your grandmother's symptoms and why Santa is actually Satan in disguise.

3) M-Street: Everyone else is doing it, so pop a squat on the sticky pavement and let it all out. Dress grungy and some old crap might throw in a little cash.

4) The Schine “Quiet” Area: What is this place, a goddamn library? Run, don’t walk. It’s not like anyone really wants to study. Any more time spent here will only serve to increase the number of books you will have to pay for this week.

And if you’re a girl, some solid one-on-one time with Vandy will get you the potential to go on a first date, no way. The museum/IMAX date gives you the chance to meet someone really special. It’s the best dates include a guy/girl that you at least find interesting — it’s all right there. The museum/IMAX date — it’s all right there.

Diner

“Dinner is laughingly located seemingly in violation of several county health codes and so very aptly named.

One of Syracuse’s only collection of food—albeit eccentric and unappetizing—Diner has something for everyone. It’s a place to escape your problems and to spend an afternoon with your friends.

The decor is unique and the menu is vast, with options ranging from sandwiches to salads to desserts. The staff is friendly and the prices are reasonable, making it a popular spot among locals.

The best thing about Diner is the atmosphere. It’s a place to relax and enjoy a meal with friends or family.

But even the best places in Syracuse are not without their flaws. For example, the service can be slow, and the food is hit or miss. However, these issues can be overlooked when considering the overall experience.

In conclusion, Diner is a must-visit for anyone looking for a unique dining experience in Syracuse. Whether you’re a local or just visiting, be sure to check it out for a memorable meal.
According to Happy Gilmore, stress can be cured by traveling to a "happy place." While Gilmore's "happy place" consisted of a fantasy realm of nubile women and cold beer, Syracuse University students need not travel to such an abstract place. Instead, Happy Endings cafe, at the edge of Armory Square, offers a relaxing escape from the stresses of school. Happy Endings cafe, 317 S. Clinton St., has been serving its house blend of caffeine and life since 1993 when Shelby Crowley and her son opened its doors. Inspiration for Happy Endings came in 1980, when Crowley walked into a small coffee and dessert shop in Toronto. She found the store so charming that she decided to open a similar shop in Syracuse.

At a youthful 63 years of age, it is obvious that opening and running Happy Endings has been a labor of love for Crowley. Happy Endings, though, offers more than just coffee, and has had a strong relationship with SU students since its opening.

"The students come in, and they keep coming back until they graduate," Crowley said.

SU students are frequent customers, and Crowley generally employs several students each year.

"I love having the kids here. It's really fun," Crowley said.

Meghann Peterson, a senior magazine and English and textual studies major, has been going to Happy Endings since her freshman year.

"It's a great place to go and just hang out," she said. "You don't feel any pressure to hurry up and leave."

Peterson also enjoys Happy Endings' ambience, mentioning the music and artwork as well as the coffee.

"It's away from campus, so you get a mix of people there, from high schools to people our parents age," she said.

Happy Endings' entryway gives a bright greeting, surrounded by warm white lights purposefully left over from the holiday season. Once inside the restaurant, the lights are toned down, and the earthy tones of brick and muted red-painted walls soothe patrons. An assortment of comfortable worn couches and chairs are scattered throughout the shop, reminiscent of grandma's basement furniture. The worn books line the back wall. Happy Endings cafe, 317 S. Clinton St., serves up coffee, desserts and a relaxing ambiance for both SU students and downtown frequenters.
Driving range on campus

With spring in the air, the desire to dust off your golf clubs becomes feverish for those of you wondering where you can stretch out and practice your game a little before heading out to the links, look no further than Pitt Hall.

Yes that reverent piece of Prada bags and SUVs is also one of the better places to get together with buddies and smash some golf balls around. To do so you’d want to go to a well-kept spot, so I recommend, if you can, make your way to the platform above the setting just outside the 2C lounge. You can either go out the window in the lounge, carefully watching your step, or take route through a nearby room.

From there you have a line of sight to the Dome (approximately 350 yards) and Archfield (250 yards). For those who are only duffers, the end of the mount stairs is a palsy 110 yards. For those who enjoy the southern view towards the graveyard, the edge of the ground is around 200 yards, while the Tiger Woods prodigies can slap one from here all the way over to the Louisville Safe Deposit Co. beaded in the cemetery.

Way to get home for break

I began my quest at 5:35 a.m. with a warm-up in the quiet stillness. Outside the Brewster/Boland complex, waiting for the SU Train to roll in, I commandeered a seat on the bus. The taxi driver was — surprise! — late and we had to wait a bit before heading out. It was a perfect way to start the day.

Janice Doire sat patiently in a high swivel chair waiting to unveil her new look. A hairdresser scrurried around, painting strands of hair onto small sheets of tin foil and folding them up into an elaborate, silvery crown atop her head.

She smiled. The staff of Hair Trends had done it again.

The seven-year-old hair salon, 727 S. Crouse Ave., makes its mark each day in the form of sun-kissed highlights, fashionable coils and finely-manicured fingernails — as the salon of choice for Syracuse University students.

In addition to affordable services ranging from cuts to colors to manicures to eye-brow shaping, Hair Trends also boasts one of the largest retail salon selections in the city — they carry 15 full product lines, including Matrix, Nexxus, Vavoom, Paul Mitchell and Tigi.

The products, many of which are marked with colorful “clearance” stickers, line rows of clear glass cubed shelving. Hair Trends offers a host of popular products, including Red Head styling gel, Paul Mitchell Tea Tree shampoo and Nexxus Aloe Rid conditioner, for reduced rates.

Hair Trends owner Antonio Pinti said he always gets a kick out of the young clientele that breeze in and out of his salon each day, and he strives to give them the great service they deserve and need.

“The energy level with all the students around is so high in here,” Pinti said. “It really keeps you young and active.”

On the go

Though some students have regular stylists who they’ve worked with for several years, the majority of Hair Trends’ clientele is comprised of walk-ins. And Pinti assures customers that they’ll never have to wait more than a few minutes for an open appointment.

Last Thursday, first-year architecture student Joseph Nica stopped in to get his head of tousled blond hair trimmed. After waiting only a few minutes, he was ushered to a chair to begin his cut.

Cosmos appeals to all types.

Social stratification at Syracuse University is more than a trend, it's a social norm. There are places where certain cliques have an established domain. Cosmos's, 143 Marshall St., is a rare exception to this rule.

From drunk Greeks to sleepless art students to addicted smokers, nobody is an outcast within the friendly doors of Cosmos's, which may just be the cultural Mecca of the area surrounding the university.

And there's good reason why students flock to Cosmos's — the pizza's good. Co-owner Demo Stathis is very confident in the pizza Cosmos's serves.

"We have the best pizza," he said. "We make a true New York-style pizza." Stathis believes people enjoy his pizza because of the pizza-making method that Cosmos's employs. Some local pizzerias cook their pizza in a pan or on a screen, but Cosmos's cooks their pies directly on the oven surface, the way it's supposed to be done.

The end result is a much, much better pizza. Stathis prides himself on the cheese, sauce and toppings resting on a crisp base.

Besides the dough being crisp, Cosmos's makes its own dough, unusual in today's world of pre-made dough, Stathis said. While other locations use bread dough instead of pizza dough, Cosmos's believes bread dough is for bread, and chooses pizza dough for their pizza.

Beyond pizza, many people flock to Cosmos's for their sandwiches, subs, pastas and other choicest items. Much like their pizza, these items do not suffer from poor quality ingredients, Stathis said.

"We try to serve the top-quality product all the time," he said. "We use the best meats, have a full-time chef to oversee things and we make our own sauce, gravies and our soup from scratch."

Local hangout

Anyone who regularly visits Cosmos's knows that it does a good business. The good food alone does not explain why customers return. There are many other pizzerias in the area, but Cosmos's Pizza's motto is "Mmmmm. Cosmo's!"

Cosmos's Pizza, 143 Marshall St., is a place for students to come together and enjoy good food and good company. It is a place where students can escape the hustle and bustle of Marshall Street and enjoy a slice of pizza in a cozy atmosphere.

The secret to good pizza is in the dough, according to Demo Stathis, co-owner of Cosmos's Pizza. "We make our own dough and use the best ingredients," he said. "And we give customers what they want."
Downtown's Dorsey's defies standard bar stereotypes.

After a transfer at South Station, I ended up getting a front seat, allowing me to stretch my legs out and watch the winding road ahead of me. That joy was short-lived, as the driver started rocking around the back of his seat for his cooler full of bologna sandwiches, taking both hands off the steering wheel to put on Walkman headphones and standing up to fiddle with the rearview mirror. Place to get a Guinness

For those of you who think you're getting a taste of Ireland every time you order a pint of the black stuff at Faegan's, think again. The Guinness they pour down at Faegan's may technically be the same as the Guinness they pour at Coleman's Authentic Irish Pub, but the Tippery Hill bar gets the overwhelming edge because of the quality of the pour.

The main difference in the two pouring methods comes when your patience is rewarded with more actual Guinness. The one-pour and out method ends up with an amount of foam that would make any imbiber unhappy. There’s plenty of reasons to hit up Coleman’s: the lively crowd, the good music and the change of pace in getting away from campus immediately jump to mind. The main pull, however, is the pour of the black. It’s authentic, precisely the same as the Guinness they pour at the black. The bartenders at Coleman's know that a good Guinness is worth waiting for. That’s why they pour half, let it settle and then finish the job. That’s the siphon method that’s used when you order a pint in the Emerald Isle.

Place to sleep on campus

It’s arguable. Some believe it to be the grassy quad on a warm day, others opt for the upstairs lounge in Schine. Wherever you go, it’s inevitable, someone will be sleeping.

So, where, you ask, is the best on-campus place to take a nap?

As the semester evolves, the nights get longer (to provide ample time for social activities) and the mornings begin earlier as we tear ourselves out of bed to begin the previous day’s assignments. It’s now just past mid-semester and it’s starting to sink in. Summer is around the corner and the seniors are scrambling to get it all in, so will we?

The Sound Garden offers a wide range of CD’s and records.

After noticing that someone’s dog was taking a nap beyond the checkout counter, I knew why.

The Sound Garden, 124 Walton St., wasn’t going to be like all those mall stores who attempt to sell music.

This Armory Square gem is an incredible spot if you’re either obsessed with buying music or merely a casual CD purchaser. The Sound Garden may have been chosen by Syracuse University students as best record store, but when it comes down to it, it’s the only real "record store" for most of the Syracuse community.

“We literally see everything come in here, from crack heads to lawyers and doctors,” Sound Garden employee Geoff Smith said.

Unlike wannabes like Oliver’s or heartless corporate conglomerates such as Borders, Best Buy or Media Play, Sound Garden is well-stocked with not only a great variety of selection, but also a knowledgeable and friendly staff filled with character. It’s a great combination for success that you can also find in the other two Sound Garden stores, in Baltimore and Genesee.

For those of you who have never been to Sound Garden, it’s similar to the music store in the movie "Empire Records," but unfortunately, I didn’t see Liv Tyler running around. The music is just as cheap — or in some cases cheaper — than what you’d find anywhere else. But along with the music, you’re walking away with the experience of being around people who honestly love music.

Our staff really knows what they’re talking about, that’s how we’re different form.

Food selection at Shaw appeals to students with a variety of tastes.

BY MAGIN MCKENNA

Maybe it’s the case of Chablis sitting on the floor of Shaw Dining Hall Manager Steve Brandt’s office that makes it the center culinary venue choice for Syracuse University students.

But although he’s amused by the prospect, Brandt attributes Shaw’s popularity to something a little bit different.

“It’s just the employees and the atmosphere of the place,” Brandt said. “People walk in all the time when we’re closed.”

The wine, he added with a laugh, is just used for cooking.

Employing a staff of about 40 students and 19 unionized laborers, Shaw’s dining hall is packed from the salad bar to the cash register on a recent weeknight.

Students mill around the room, carrying plastic trays piled high with everything from tofu and soy milk, to hamburgers and pasta.

To prepare for the dinner crowd, Brandt’s staff meets every day for an hour after lunch to discuss the night’s menu and delegate work responsibilities, he said.

About 1,400 students eat breakfast, lunch and dinner in Shaw every day. Shaw is the only dining hall on campus that offers kosher meals, which meet traditional Jewish dietary guidelines and must be ordered in advance.

To keep up with the heavy flow of students and their numerous dietary needs, Brandt and his staff often discuss menu choices and recipe ideas with students, he said.

He credits this communication between staff and students to Shaw’s success.

“A lot of people have the notion that we go to Wegman’s every night,” Brandt said. “But we order food weeks in advance.”

Students are invited to share their dining hall requests with the staff through comment cards provided by SU Food Services.

Based on student requests, the dining hall hopes to introduce a vegetarian meal for the past 19 years, he added. For menu variety, Brandt travels to local food shows and has his staff consult cookbooks.

Head Cook Elaine Williams said she doesn’t take students’ distaste for dining hall food personally.

She added that in most cases, it is obvious that students prefer the food served in Shaw.

“I try to make meals how I would like to see them presented,” Williams said. “They should be appealing and tasty.”

Williams’ work day begins early in the morning, when she arrives to supervise breakfast. After breakfast, Williams and her staff prepare and serve lunch and then it’s on to dinner.

After dinner, Williams, who works every other weekend, spends her time planning the next day’s meal.

“The day before, you always have to check the menus to make sure all your stock is in,” Williams said. “Then you prep what needs to be prepped.”

On Friday’s, Williams also supervises the kosher kitchen’s prep.

I see what other schools do,” Brandt said. “We are so far ahead of that. I don’t understand when people come in and complain about the food or say there’s nothing to eat.”

Brandt himself has been eating at Shaw for the past 19 years, he added. For menu variety, Brandt travels to local food shows and has his staff consult cookbooks.

Sandwich
Artemis was the Greek goddess of the hunt and the moon. Ancient myths tell of bizarre creatures spired in worship of this deity. Apparently, insanely devoted bands of fanatics would dance naked in the light of the full moon throughout ancient Greece to express their devotion to her. Any man unfortunate enough to stumble on these midnight gatherings met a quick death from the arrows that rained down upon them from Artemis' followers who, like the goddess herself, were skilled warriors and hunters. The danger surrounding the cult of Artemis may have been too quick and immediate today, but her personality survives in Syracuse in the form of a sandwich. That sandwich is the Artemis from Donnie's Pizza & Westcott Deli. A steady diet of Artemis sandwiches will lead the victim to a quick, but ecstasically filled death. The first bite finds one's taste buds contortioned on a solid base of fried, breaded chicken, lavishly surrounded and covered by several slices of ham. A further exploration into this masterwork of culinary genius will lead to the discovery of an overflowing layer of onions, lettuce and tomatoes. At this point, the Artemis is quite tasty, but it is the choice of sauce that vails this meal into greatness. Sathered all over the grinder roll that encases the Artemis is Thousand Island dressing. That famous, gassy tostopping with a pinkish hue truly confirms Artemis' place at the top of Donnie's sandwich pantheon.
And of course, no sandwich would make the top ten if it didn't have a title to its name. The "Sandwich in Syracuse" would be complete without the kiss of the "Artemis". The sandwich is actually quite good, but the name is what makes it. "This is an Artemis sandwich on a roll" is one way to order it. A more specific order would be, "I want an Artemis sandwich with ham, lettuce, onion and Thousand Island dressing." It is a very tasty and filling meal. Whether it is a uniquely occurring liquid within from the depths of the sandwich, the miraculous fluid soaks the bread and literally cascades off the chicken. So perhaps the Artemis is not for the weak of heart or for a steady diet, but as an appetizer for an SU football or basketball game or a late-night craving, nothing in the Salt City tops its savory and artery-clogging blend of ingredients.

and personalities will stay at the Sheraton when they speak at SU. It is also a popular choice among athletes and coaches. Billy Joel, Jim Brown, Larry Czonka and the New York Knicks have all spent time at university hotel.

This can sometimes lead to groups of fans mobbing the celebrity and the hotel, but, Heymann said it is all part of the package of catering to famous people and being close to a university.

"A lot of sports people, a lot of bands tend to stay here," he said. "We have to think of their safety and, of course, people can't just freely roam the hallway. But if people have been waiting for some time and they see him in the lobby, we let them get close and do autographs and pictures and stuff.

Sporting events are usually very busy for the Sheraton because players, coaches and media take up the bulk of the rooms. Last weekend, for the NCAA East Regionals, Heymann said the hotel was completely booked. Any open room, which could normally cost $99 to $170, could have run $215 or more.

If it is a low-traffic weekend though, Heymann said the hotel offers special discounts on rooms. There is a special SU rate for people associated with the university, and the hotel works in conjunction with the hospitals on the Hill to give a low rate to the families of those in the hospital.

Heymann said sometimes local Sheraton frequenters will receive a discount or a fruit basket from the hotel management as a show of appreciation.

"I've always had a good experience with this hotel," said Ed Johnstone, an insurance salesman in Ithaca who stays at the Sheraton whenever he comes to Syracuse. Heymann isn't worried about losing business.

"There are always going to be other hotels around and it's good for people to know they are there," he said. "But we're close to campus, we have a good reputation and people seem to like coming back."

Caffeine fix
But Happy Endings is more than a pretty place to drink and dessert menu can accommodate any caffeine or chocolate Hinkin. Patrons can choose their food from the colorful, giant-sized chalkboard, where which SU art students helped to design and decorate.

The Mad Hatter from "Alice in Wonderland" is one of Happy Endings' distinctive traits — the huge Mad Hatter-sized color block. Several flavors of coffee join a variety of espresso drinks and iced coffees. Thirty-eight flavors of tea are also available, ranging from the standard chamomile and chai to the more exotic kiwi iced tea and Russian caravan. Prices range from just $3 for a single espresso shot to more than $4 for a Mad Hatter-sized beverage.

Happy Endings also offers an excellent dessert menu.

The Syracuse New Times' review of Happy Endings with its "Best Desserts" award for three years running, from 1997 to 1999. Cakes are their speciality, but sorbets, gelato, cookies and cheesecakes — but brownies and cookies are also offered. All desserts are homemade on the store premises.

A slice of cake will cost around $3, with brownies at closer to $1.

Currently, Crowley is working on adding a juice bar to the list of beverage options. Music plays a prominent part of Happy Endings.

Students also use Happy Endings' theater for musical performances. Background music played by employees is energetic, but not overpowering. Jazz, folk music or light music are among the possible sounds.

A theater adjoining the coffee house hosts musical performances. Every Friday and Saturday night for minimal cover fees. Crowley receives deposits from musicians across the country. She books the bands she likes to play when they tour through Central New York. Occasionally, comedy or theatrical performances are added.

The theater is also an essential factor in keeping the pub open past 1 a.m. on Sunday nights. Crowley said, "Sometimes I go to sit and study," Peterson said.

The central location of P.J. Dorsey's also makes it attractive to Hosteliers. "You can dance. You can eat. You can sit and talk," she said. The door of 783 Ostrom Ave., Apt. A, and walk up the stairs to Tom Hoban's room, and you have reached the best place to hang out on campus.

The atmosphere is warm and inviting, the walls covered with posters and fabulously witty and intelligent quotes, and music is always on. The air is somewhat stale and is constantly saturated by the union of old and new cigarette smoke.

With all that said, I have had some of the best times in this room with the people that frequently spend time there, sitting around the infamous black table that holds great meaning to some, but little to others, from politics to music to sex to the blasphemy game to books to movies back to beer, the best conversations that I have ever had during my years at SU have been in this room. The people, the atmosphere, just the overall feel in that room is something that is just so much fun and amusing. I, along with many other people, can't seem to stay away, and we keep coming back either every night and/or every weekend.

It's definitely my favorite place to hang out. Come by sometime, when the blue light is on.

Place to hide on campus

Ready or not, here I come! Next time you find yourself scrambling around the Quad looking for a place to hide — either in a friendly game of Hide-n-Seek or from that potential stalker type, scramble no further.

Through a calculated series using a pseudo-combination of the scientific method and Darwin's evolutionary theory, I have discovered the most suitable and "snug as a bug" place to hide here at Syracuse University.

If you follow my advice, consider yourself never to be found. Your family, friends and secret admirers will probably find you on the side of a milk carton before they find your hiding spot.

Hark: A question approaches. Will this hiding spot still be "the best" after its whereabouts have been disclosed? Well, sorta. If you are indeed a Hide-n-Seeker (like I know you are), you must not fret when you come across this spot to find three to nine people already hiding here and/or there. It's just that good.

Let your friends, flora and fauna waste their time climbing trees, scaling walls and diving into bushes. Looking for the best place to hide on campus? Try the epicenter of the Quad.

Its unpredictability and elusiveness creates this pocket of a hiding place — a pocket that is a 100% sure bet to never being found, potentially ever.

Happy Hiding.

American & Canadian vacation spot proves popular as college weekend getaway.

By Dave Levinthal

Louis Hennepin happened upon something bigger than he, or any other European, had ever seen.

With its white water cascading 170 feet from the Niagara River into a basin below, Niagara Falls was no less an impressive site for a Franciscan monk in 1678 than it is 322 years later for wide-eyed college kids.

Sure, the Niagara Falls of the Third Millennium has the Hard Rock Cafes, the Planet Hollywoods, the casinos, the wax museums, the nude bars and enough net alcohol to fill Lake Ontario to the St. Lawrence River's mouth.

But without Niagara Falls, the waterfall that Hennepin discovered, Niagara Falls the cities — one in Ontario, Canada, the other in New York state — would surely have not materialized into the perennial glitz and glamour Mecca that honeymooners and students alike have come to love.

"I would like to think that's what keeps people coming — the majesty of this place," said Paul Dyster, a Niagara Falls, N.Y., city councilman. "You get an acoustic guitar, a bottle of wine, some bread and cheese, and you can have yourself a time in a beautiful park or the Niagara Gorge. SU students are figuring out that Niagara Falls has a lot of these places."

Doreen O'Connor, president of Niagara Majestic Tours, agreed.

"People who live close to it often take the Falls for granted," O'Connor said. "But people are speechless when they first see the Falls."

Of course, the biggest attraction for students looking to make a fast buck and have a quick-drawing good time is across the Rainbow Bridge in Niagara Falls, Ont. Casino Niagara — a palace-like edifice that makes the Turning Stone Casino look like a Sadler 7 poker game — offers a favorable Canadian currency exchange rate and Atlantic City atmosphere.

Situated on neon-lit Clifton Hill, Casino Niagara shares space with a slew of restaurants, bars, hotels and observation towers, some that peer directly down into the heart of the Falls itself. The Labrador's flows freely, and the night doesn't end.

 Neighborly battle

The differences between the Canadian and American version of Niagara Falls are slightly more than subtle — a little less pronounced. Officials on each side of the river say that both aim to supply their guests with a fine tourist experience.

But don't let South Park movies deceive: The two countries work together toward common goals. Usually.

"We tend to complement each other," said Stan Rydelek, president of the Niagara Falls Convention and Visitors Bureau. "We are blending more and more together, even if you can't get more affordable hotel prices on the U.S. side."

"The friendly competition grows more evident."

"On the Ontario side, we have a lot of fun entertainment and amenities here year-round, day and night," Niagara Falls, Ont. Mayor Wayne Thomson said. "And then you can walk along the boardwalk..."

Students speak out against SGA merger

BY STEPHANIE SILVER
Staff Writer

Students angrily protested the proposed merger between the Student Government Association and University Union Enterprises during an open forum Sunday evening, discussing a proposed SGA and UU merger. The SGA Assembly voted last Monday to postpone a final decision on the merger until it received more student feedback.

More than 50 students attended the forum — about 12 of whom were not affiliated with either SGA or UU.

"The merger becomes the center of debate last Monday when an SGA vote on the proposal was postponed after the Assembly asked for more student feedback," said UU member Eric Lindberg, a senior television, radio and film major. "It's a punch in the face to all the efforts ever put forth at UU and it kills its pride as an individual organization," he added.

Student groups could approach SGA — re-named to the Student Association under the proposal — for both assistance and money when planning an event, James said.

"The student fee will be utilized more effectively," James said. "UU claims to be a campus-wide programming organization, but that's impossible because they are only accountable to themselves." With the merger, UU would be more available to the smaller campus groups, he added.

"They should be more willing and able to help," James said.

Student groups could approach SGA — re-named to the Student Association under the proposal — for both assistance and money when planning an event, James said.

Staff Reports

Men smash student's window, campus car break-ins continue

The students were stopped at the intersection of Irving Avenue and Van Buren Street when a dark-colored Jeep Grand Cherokee with three unidentified male occupants passed them and threw a bottle at the driver's side rear window, the report said.

The Jeep then followed the students as they continued to their home on the 100 block of Oakland Avenue, the report added.

The senior who owned the car, a 1990 Pontiac Grand Am, said he pulled in the driveway and the Jeep then pulled up in front of the residence, the report said. The man sitting in the front seat of the Jeep then got out of the vehicle and started yelling at the senior, the report added.

The man then threw another bottle at the vehicle, breaking the rear window, the report said. He then got back into the Jeep and drove west on Van Buren Street when a dark-colored vehicle threw a bottle at them, shattering one of the students. "You're caught off guard," said one of the students. "You're caught off guard, "

"We have 265,000 members," Wolfson said. "It's certainly an expression of support from, in this case, a statewide organization fighting for better health care and decent wages for working people," Wolfson said.

Clintson's campaign thrives on labor union endorsements, Wolfson said. Clinton accumulates a "significant" amount of support from such groups across the state, he said.

Japan's Premier hospitalized

TOKYO — Japanese Prime Minister Keizo Obuchi has been hospitalized with fatigue, officials said Sunday.

Obuchi, 62, was admitted to a hospital in Tokyo early Monday by his cabinet secretary. He was taken to the hospital in an ambulance, Aki said.

Obuchi, who is undergoing examinations late Sunday night, Aoki said. The prime minister plans to spend the night in the hospital. Aki declined to give other details pending the outcome of the examinations.

An official with the ruling Liberal Democratic Party said Aoki would be named acting prime minister, if necessary. That had not been done as of late Sunday.

Obuchi has over the past few days had to deal with a major volatile eruptions and the breakup of his ruling coalition. On Monday, he traveled to southern Japan to inspect preparations for the G-8 summit.

Ecuador uses U.S. currency

QUITO, Ecuador — Ecuador's government began using U.S. dollars as legal tender as of Tuesday, signaling a deep economic and social crisis.

Ecuadorians who went to cash machines Saturday morning found they could only get dollar bills instead of the existing multidubloons currency notes.

Stores began accepting payment for goods in either dollars or a portion of moves to take the stress out of circulation for everything but small, but without much success.

Under a law passed in early March, the nation's Central Bank will withdraw $400 million worth of sucres from the economy and replace them with greenbacks.

Ecuadorian President Rafael Correa, appointed in January after a first bloodless coup, hopes the move will rebuild consumer and investor confidence shattered by the Andean nation's economic and social crisis.

Ecuadorians who went to cash machines Saturday morning found they could only get dollar bills instead of the existing multidubloons currency notes.

Stores began accepting payment for goods in either dollars or a portion of moves to take the stress out of circulation for everything but small, but without much success.

Under a law passed in early March, the nation's Central Bank will withdraw $400 million worth of sucres from the economy and replace them with greenbacks.

Ecuadorian President Rafael Correa, appointed in January after a first bloodless coup, hopes the move will rebuild consumer and investor confidence shattered by the Andean nation's economic and social crisis.
Caribbean students elect new board

Staff Reports

The Caribbean Student Association met Sunday, welcoming next year's recently-elected executive board and new president, Portia Yohannes.

For the remainder of the semester, however, the old administration will continue working in their positions alongside the new board members and train them, current CSA President Nashonie Chang said.

Four new board members were elected and six veteran executives and members shifted to different positions, Chang said.

"We're beginning a transition starting now," Chang said. "The last meeting will be run by the new executive board."

Yohannes, a junior psychology major, said Sunday she is optimistic about the upcoming year. "I've worked with most of the people already," Yohannes said. "I think it will be a good year."

Marlon Samuels, a sophomore marketing and advertising major, will be Yohannes' vice president and is excited to begin his duties, giving him the opportunity to have a wider influence on the campus.

"I'm trying to promote campus unity," Samuels said. "The Caribbean Student Association wants to educate students in the Caribbean culture."

For the past two weeks, CSA members were able to nominate candidates for each position via email, and Danayi Munyati, current secretary and newly-elected public relations chairwoman, said.

At the group's weekly meeting last Friday, each candidate gave a presentation, reading their letter of intent to the organization, Munyati said.

Among those elected, Chang will begin a new position next year as events chairperson.

With a new executive board comprised of six previous members, group events should run well, she said.

"I am pretty confident that they will all do a good job," she said.

Chang also said she was content to step down as president and take the new position since she already had experience in the area.

"Last year I kind of served as the events chairperson as well as president," she said.

The association will add new programs to next year's agenda, in addition to its current events schedule, Yohannes said. Included in these new events is International Night, she added, which will include cultural foods and a fashion show.

"I hope to make other cultures be introduced in the Caribbean culture," she said.

attributed to her campaign's focus on middle-class issues, Wolfson said.

"One candidate really has been a champion of working families — you have that in Hillary Clinton. And you have another candidate, Rudy Giuliani, really has shown no interest in the middle-class issues," Wolfson said.

Drivers expect summer of high gas prices

BY SAHAR ALNOURI
Staff Writer

Despite recent vows by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries to help reduce petroleum prices, students and car owners nationwide will continue to spend more at the gas pumps for the next several months.

OPEC, which exports about 60 percent of the oil traded internationally, cut the supply of oil available to the world in 1999 and prices have since been rising. But strong international pressure prompted OPEC last week to increase production by 1.7 million barrels a day to compensate for the short supply. It is unclear when U.S. citizens will see the price drop since the effects of the increase will not hit the pumps for the next several months.

United States immediately.

Regular unleaded gasoline costs the average U.S. city 97.2 cents per gallon in January 1999. In January 2000, the same gasoline cost 130.1 cents per gallon, a 32.9 cent increase per gallon. The average price paid for gasoline in the country on March 27, 2000 was $1.549, a 24 cent increase per gallon since January, according to a report from the U.S. Energy Information Administration.

Syracuse University political science professor Mehrzad Boroujerdi, however, said OPEC is being blamed unfairly for practic- ing good business.

"OPEC is being portrayed in an unfair fashion," Boroujerdi said. "It's their right to decide on whatever prices they want to ask. People forget that most OPEC countries take 80 percent of their revenue from oil."

Kuwait is still rebuilding from the Persian Gulf War, Saudi Arabia is facing a deficit and Iran is dealing with a population explosion — all smart reasons to raise oil prices, Boroujerdi said.

"If you adjust for inflation, oil is cheaper today than it was 30 years ago," he added. "You pay more for a gallon of orange juice, apple juice, or beer than for a gallon of oil."

OPEC probably spotted us as being vulnerable. The 1980s and 1990s were good to us. We've gotten away from ideas of conservation," he added.

But SU students like Joe DeCristoforo, a human resources major, said this could begin the cause of new technology.

"This is going to be what pushes us toward electronic cars and using different kinds of fuels," Pappas said. "We need to find something that isn't as limited as resources and coal that we can produce domestically."

Sophomore Jared Russo said the oil prices are directly affecting his daily activities.

"I'm walking a lot more," said Russo, a psychology, art history and public policy major. "I'm cutting back on social activities outside the university — I can't afford to get off campus as much as I used to."

Russo, who drives a jeep, said next time he will buy a more fuel efficient car.

"But right now I can't even afford gas, much less a new car to put it in."

Watch aims to improve student safety

BY JOE PIRANEO
Staff Writer

Syracuse University Public Safety officers in collaboration with city police met with Student Government Association President Jamal James on Friday to discuss the program being proposed by the Neighborhood Watch Program.

"We discussed the important need for a service like this," said James, a junior musical theater major. "Safety is a major concern for all students." The program will be introduced in three phases, said James, the only SGA member at Friday's meeting.

The first phase will entail a joint investigation conducted by SGA and city police to determine the nature and number of crimes being committed in the university area.

"Before we can run the program, we need to know what's going on," James said.

The second phase, entitled "Don't Ignore It, Report It," is designed to educate students and the community about different types of crimes and steps to take if they witness one.

Right now, there is a lower amount of cases being reported to the police," James said. "However, crimes are still occurring."

The lower number of crimes reported is attributed to students keeping quiet about crimes they have seen, he added.

The second phase will hopefully make people aware and most importantly, get them to speak up if they see something," James said.

He said that he plans to implement both phases of the program before the conclusion of the semester. Phase Two will be repeated for incoming freshmen next year, James plans to complete the last stage of the program early in the fall semester.

"I envision people being aware of their surroundings and keeping an eye out for each other," James said. "The program should be a great success."

The third and final phase will be the establishment of the Neighborhood Watch Program, he said.

The Syracuse Police Department along with SU Public Safety will try to combine efforts along with the university community in keeping watch for misdemeanors, he added.

"We hope to get the community and the professionals all into one unified thing," James said. "Hopefully, together we can curtail a good portion of the crimes that are occurring." While the community should be more alert, it is not wise to try and stop the crimes that are occurring, he said.

A special phone line to the police department may be set up exclusively for Neighborhood Watch Area residents, he added.

"The purpose of the program is to be attentive and inform the police quickly," James said. "Not to try and stop the crime yourself."

The Neighborhood Watch Program was proposed as a result of several robberies and violent crimes in the last few months, James said.

On March 13, an unidentified man broke into a student's apartment on the 800 block of Ackerman Avenue. The man forced his way in through a back door and beat the woman with a clothes iron. She was transported to Crouse Hospital where she received 60 stitches and 10 staples to mend her wounds.

At about 10:30 p.m. on Feb. 6, three unidentified men robbed an SU senior at gunpoint in Thornden Park.

And in November, three armed men entered a South Campus apartment and bound and gagged its residents. They then took a car belonging to one of the students in an attempt to get away but were apprehended by police before escaping.

Assemblyman David Gaulin, a sophomore history and political science major, said he is satisfied with the first steps the program is making toward a safer environment.

"The crime is becoming more apparent everyday," Gaulin said. "We don't want it to get worse and this program is a step in the right direction."

"SU Public Safety, the SU police and the people of the community have to work together to fight crime," he said.

Many Assembly members are attempting to set up a dialogue between the Southeast University Neighborhood Association and the university, Gaulin added. This association consists of people, other than students, who live around the university.

The Neighborhood Association is an important link between SU students and the non-university residents, he said. It can be an influential part of this campaign, Gaulin said.

"We should strive to create a strong relationship with the association," Gaulin said. "They need to understand what the university is striving for and know that we support them."

To register for the Fall 2000 Underwater Education courses, visit the website at www.nationalaquatic.com or call 1-800-SEA-DIVE.

"SGA will be able to vote 75 percent of the budget to the final," said Allyson Murphy, a junior graphics major, questioned the success of the merger if not supported by both groups involved.

"I just think that our people could do it better," he said. "You need to look at it from a different perspective."
Panelists ask U.S. government to loosen narcotic regulations

BY BETH BRAVERMAN

The war on drugs is costly, unjust and inefficient, said panelists Sunday calling for an end to the country's drug policies in Latin America.

The discussion, hosted by the Socialist Forum, focused on the failures of the U.S. domestic fight against drugs and the problems of trying to eradicate drugs in the Latin American countries where they are produced.

“We were looking at U.S. foreign policy and imperialism and U.S. domestic policy and it comes together around this issue that we spend a vast amount of money and get no results,” said Ron Ehrenreich, chairman of the meeting at the Westcott Community Center and one of about 15 whom attended.

The United States wants to eliminate drugs at their source, and in the case of cocaine, the source is Latin America, said panelist Judith-Maria Buchler, a professor of anthropology at Hobart and William Smith colleges. Such efforts, however, are actually a way for the United States to justify a colonization-type process in Latin American countries, she added.

For example, a coca leaf can be harvested for about 30 cents and can then be sold for a $150-gram of cocaine in the United States, Buchler said.

“Unlike other kinds of crops, coca is actually grown by small-scale producers,” said Hans Buchler, a Syracuse University professor of anthropology.

The producers of coca are, for the most part, indigenous people who suffer from the U.S. government, he added.

Coca is an important part of these cultures, Hans Buchler said. The United States has ignored the cultural and economic importance of cocaine in these countries, as well as the obvious targeting of the indigenous groups in the eradication efforts, he added.

“The United States government has been quite upfront about human rights issues in this case,” he said. “The idea is deadlines should be met and even if democracy suffers a little bit, that doesn’t matter very much.”

Last week, the U.S. House of Representatives approved a bill that would allocate $1.3 billion to the elimination of coca in Columbia.

This is only 1 percent of what the United States spends every year on the drug war and the country should focus its efforts on redefining its domestic drug policy to use that money for more worthy causes, said Nicholas Eyle, founder and executive director of Reconsider, a nonprofit organization that advocates the regulation rather than prohibition of narcotics.

“We’re talking about possibly sending 200 soldiers down there. There are two million people in prison in this country and about half of the money goes there as a direct result of the drug war,” he said. “There are two million orphans who have one or both parents in prison as a result of this drug war.”

Eyle compared the nation’s obsession with its drug war to its obsession with communism during the Cold War. The government has convinced the public that the problem is drugs, rather than the drug business, he said.

“The drug war in America is a complete failure,” he said. “We need to reconsider how we handle drugs in this country and come up with a reasonable alternative the way the rest of the world has.”

The alternatives, Eyle said, are drug legalization, decriminalization and medical drug use. Drugs will never be completely eliminated, so countries have three choices in who will control the drug market: the government, private enterprises or organized crime, he said.

“In this country, for some reason, we turn it over to the Mob, which makes no sense to me,” Eyle said. “I think we need to have a discussion and decide whether the private sector handles it or the state handles it.”

All three of the panelists maintained that they were not in support of drugs.

“What we’re saying is we’ve seen the damage drugs do to the community,” Judith-Maria Buchler said. “We want wiser ways to decrease the negative aspect of drugs.”
Drug debate
The drug Mifepristone, widely known as RU486, the abortion pill, has been found to be effective in treating certain types of cancer, but its approval for use in this country has been stalled by highly charged abortion politics. Seven years ago, President Bill Clinton issued an executive order instructing the Food and Drug Administration to move forward on the drug. Four years ago, the FDA ruled the drug safe and effective but asked for more information on its manufacture and labeling. In February of this year, the FDA delayed approval again, saying it had more questions.

Safe haven
Authorities in San Francisco have launched an effort to better collect the psychological wounds inflicted on small children by the epidemic of violence at home and in the streets. The city is one of a handful that recently received grants under the federal Safe Start Initiative to help young children cope after witnessing family and community violence. One idea being weighed by Safe Start organizers is establishing a family violence court, where a single judge would mete out punishment but also would oversee an entire family's recovery from the trauma of spousal abuse.

Talks dissolve
Talks to settle the Microsoft Corp. antitrust case collapsed Saturday, dashing hopes for a speedy resolution to the case and setting the stage for years more of appeals. In a statement saturated with frustration over four months of arduous negotiations, mediator Richard Posner said Saturday night that the differences between federal antitrust officials and Microsoft were "too deep-seated to be bridged." Posner's decision to declare an impasse sets the stage for U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson to issue a verdict in the case as early as this week.

With compact discs priced at $15 a pop, the temptation to download free music off the Internet can be irresistible. But, as with all things that seem too good to be true, there comes another price — users can be prosecuted for violating a federal law that secures online copyrighted works.

Scott Rafferty, who augments his CD collection with 264 MP3 files, said he is hooked by the lure of free music. "I just like cheating the system for fun," said Rafferty, a freshman in Syracuse University's College for Human Development whose extensive music collection ranges from classic rock to Vanilla Ice to Dr. Dre.

Rafferty said he began collecting MP3s during the Fall 1999 semester. "I didn't even realize that it was illegal until I had about 300 songs," he said.

Or will symphonies take over?
If this last suggestion seems out of left field, take a look at the work of some respected artists within the last year. Metallica released "Metallica — S&M," with the famed quartet performing their greatest hits with the assistance of a full orchestra. And now Joni Mitchell, one of the most respected singer/songwriters of her time, has released "Both Sides Now," named for one of Mitchell's greatest hits.

Although it seems like kind of a cheat having a new Mitchell album without any "new" material, "Both Sides Now" is hardly a retreat. On the album, Mitchell, her voice deepened and grizzled by age and cigarette smoking, covers several classic songs about love and heartbreak, including two of her own, with the assistance of a 70-piece orchestra.

The tactic seems similar to Metallica's experiment, but in fact the two albums are very different. On "Metallica — S&M," the

Oil prices lie in hands of OPEC

In last summer's sweltering heat, Citgo and Sunoco signs were an oasis. They offered thirsty cars — and penny-pinching drivers — gasoline for less than $1 per gallon.

But as quickly as the rock-bottom fill'er up prices appeared, they shot up, as the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries pared down production and hiked prices last year.

For the nations leading OPEC's charge on the pumps, like tiny, war-torn Kuwait and economically-imbalance Saudi Arabia, oil is their sole commodity, their ultimate lifeblood.

They know, too, that they can continue to squeeze change out of travel-hungry U.S. drivers indefinitely. Energy-efficient oil alternatives probably won't be considered until OPEC reserves run dry. And since the environmental protection costs would be a steep price to pay, the U.S. government vows that most domestic oil prices will only be used as an absolute last resort.

Just as the United States controls price levels on their agricultural exports, OPEC nations, too, must make decisions about how much to charge for their oil exports.

Like any other industry, oil moguls wheel, deal and steal their way to profit — even if it comes by squeezing tightly on the United States' purse strings. Oil remains in high demand worldwide, regardless of the cost.

Savvy OPEC members are taking full advantage of their commodity's worth. On principle alone, few U.S. businessmen would be able to find fault with their actions.

In the United States, anti-trust legislation regulates run-away pricing on goods. But more or for worse, there exists no international body to enact similar laws abridging trade free-edom worldwide.

Oil prices run in cycles. Though drivers may have to bleed massive dollars at the pumps for the next few months, history shows us that the crunch won't last forever. Eventually, OPEC will be forced to raise production and slash prices again.

I'm not in the habit of writing film reviews, since such a task is usually reserved for The Daily Orange's beloved Lifestyle staff. But after watching the film "High Fidelity" on Friday, I am compelled to share my shallow insights on this well-crafted piece.

Unfortunately, this quirky film is destined to box-office mediocrity.

But this movie takes me back to pop, the music that first caught my ear and helped me explore my deepest sentiments.

"High Fidelity," adapted from Nick Hornby's 1999 novel, is directed by Stephen Frears, a British director whose music films credits include "The Commitments" and "The Grifters." The movie revolves around Rob (played by the talented Danish actress, Iben Hjejle) and his relationship with Laura (played by the talented British actress, Keira Knightly).

Of course, Rob then brags about how Laura doesn't make his top five breakup list and later amends that she barely makes No. 5.

The movie's comic relief is provided by Rob's employees at the record store, Dick (Todd Louiso) and Barry (Jack Black). They are music encyclopedias who engage in various debates about pop music. Bar asserts that "Leader of the Pack" is the ultimate funeral song and exhorts that people who don't own Bob Dylan's original "Blonde on Blonde" vinyl will die beneath.

Dick insists that Green Day commits major plagiarism from Little Fingers. Evidently, the movie's biggest celebration occurs when Rob and his employees fantasize about beating up Laura's new boyfriend — the long-haired, Zen-like, cell-phone hipster, played masterfully by Tim Robbins.

Without giving too much plot away, I shall explain what impact the film has on me. First, I know the Cuack's (pronounced the same) character too well. I used to DJ and host several radio stations in high school. I feel that music and love are inseparable, since music defines different stages of a relationship. That's why I understand perfectly when Rob says to Laura, "Of course Marvin Gaye is responsible for our relationship."

Also, when Rob is down, he starts arranging his records alphabetically, chronologically or "autobiographically." He has over 600 CDs and I still remember where I got them. Each disc I own reveals a unique history and background to me. And I am not generically lending my CDs to reputedly irresponsible individuals.

One of my friends says, "You have more CDs than God." My music is a summation of my suffering, happiness and pride.

Later, Rob discovers that Laura is his true love. Overlooking the Chicago River, he makes a list of the top five reasons that he misses her. One of them states, "I miss her smile... I miss the way she walks..."

When asked about the couple's chance of getting back together, Laura quips an arbitrary nine percent. I "guess the dialogue in this film is so real that at some point in our lives we have already had it." And yet, the complexity of the human race allows us to reprise these priceless conversations without ever becoming tired of them.

So "High Fidelity" left me with two main thoughts:

First, as Rob wanders around Chicago and searches in the phone book for his past love, I must admit I had the same urge on several occasions. However, under the pretense of preventing unnecessary shock and embarrassment, I cowardly gave up those reunion plans.

For consolation purposes, I hereby deliver my ode to all the girls whom I have loved or secretly loved before. Thanks for making me who I am.

Sometimes I wonder how I even made it this far. The simple answer is that I wouldn't be here today without going through all our good and bad times. I dedicate Al Green's "Tired of Loving Alone" to every one of you for old-time reminiscences.

Second, "High Fidelity" is a more realized version of John Cusack's 1989 "Say Anything." We loved him then, we still love him now. I dedicate "High Fidelity" to a special friend of mine whose favorite film is "Say Anything."

I hope that next time when I watch either of these movies, I'll be watching it with her.

Late that night, after returning home from the theater, I put on Marvin Gaye's "Let's Get It On" album and went to sleep soundly.

SGA defends accusations of mismanagement

To the Editor:

It was disheartening to open The Daily Orange last Thursday and see the editorial "SGA crosses line with UU merger." The editorial stated that "SGA's actions are poorly-run organization." As president of the Student Government Association, I take pride in an- organization that has turned itself around and is now very effective on campus.

For example, in just a few weeks, we have made the administration look at the City Bus budget and alter it to meet the needs of students, resurrected the Dial Home program and got Com- puting and Media Services to begin using computers in the Goldstein Student Center cluster.

We have defined ourselves — a small group of hardworking students dedicated in defending the students and doing what is right for them. It was a huge success. Spring 2000 Tour de Jets and Jitney, meetings and forums to find out their concerns.

One of the major concerns was that they did not see where their Student Activity Fee was going. In an effort to address this issue, the University Union Board of Directors decided to merge with SGA. The Board felt that the student body would be able to reap the many benefits of the line programming from organizations with the assistance that the merger entails.

There is not enough room to begin to list the many advantages of the merger entails. Why doesn't the student body be able to learn from the mistakes? Before starting, come to Assembly meetings and stop by the office. Be proactive for once.

the orchestra is fully utilized to add an epic sense to the group's already brilliant material. On "Both Sides Now," the orchestra usually takes a back seat to Mitchell's voice — it is intimate rather than epic.

Despite the absence of original material on the CD, the album jacket suggests that "Both Sides Now" is a concept album. The first track in the narrative, "You’re My Thrill," describes the feelings of hopeless infatuation — "When I look at you/I cant help but feel my thrill." Next, the classic "At Last," celebrates capturing the object of affection. These are the only two upbeat songs on the album.

"Both Sides Now" builds in intensity and emotion throughout the first five songs, and in many ways climaxes on the middle track, "A Case of You." The song signals the official end of the relationship. After an exciting flourish, the orchestra recedes into the background, offering subtle and stirring support to Mitchell's bruised, vulnerable vocals. Unfortunately, once the relationship is over, "Both Sides Now" becomes far less interesting. The second half of the disc is much more monotonous and less innovative than the first.

"Both Sides Now" works because the orchestra is relegated to the background in the disc's opening songs, it completely overpowers Mitchell at points in the second half, especially in "Don't Worry Baby." The reason much of "Both Sides Now" works is because the orchestra isn't given the same sort of identifiable pathos embedded within the lyric. If Mitchell were a less accomplished singer, the disc sounds like a rich background from a local nightclub, and Mitchell's songs of heartbreak and pain belong in such a place. Once the orchestra gets too heavy, the music loses its intimacy and, by extension, its relevance.

Joni Mitchell's music has always examined heartbreak from a very close, personal point of view. Even though many of these songs are not original, they have the same sort of identifiable pathos embedded within the lyrics. Unfortunately, unlike the classic rock and folk from which Mitchell drew the inspiration, Mitchell's songs of heartbreak and pain belong in such a place. Once the orchestra gets too heavy, the music loses its intimacy

Copyright infringement — a violation of SU’s Computing Poli- cy — can result in criminal prosecution and monetary damages, according to the DMCA. Because the area of digital copyright is relatively new and unprecedented, application of the law and prosecution are still un- certain, said Joed Banham, a first-year student in the College of Law.

Authorities might try to make an example of violators and slap them with felony charges and fines, he said.

"It’s something that could be debilitating to the rest of your career," Banham said.

On the track

In order to track down sus-pects, copyright owners can ob- tain a subpoena from a federal court ordering the disclosure of names of alleged violators, according to the DMCA.

SU has not received any subpoenas to release student names because the names are easy to find, Ware said.

When SU students are found guilty, however, the university decreases its liability by having a digital copyright agent registered with the U.S. Copyright Office according to the DMCA, according to the act.

The DMCA holds the institution responsible for policing its user base, said Ware, who has been a copyright agent since February 1999. Registering an agent gives the copyright owner the opportunity to contact the university, thus reducing the university’s liability, Ware said.

"If someone is doing something illegal," Ware said, "anyone who wants to find out knows how to talk to the agent.

Other universities across the nation, including Cornell University, Harvard University and Massachusetts Institute of Technology — also have digital copyright agents, according to Library of Congress records.

To reduce its liability, the in- stitution must designate and reg- ister the agent, inform the users of the policy and identify the agent, according to an intellectual property Web site maintained by the University of Missouri.

Ware said his name is listed somewhere on the CMS Web page, but is hard to locate. "I went on the Web site right now, I probably wouldn’t find it," he said.

The Napster factor

Aside from investigating cases of alleged copyright viola- tions, the RIAA recently filed suit against Napster — a popular MP3 sharing service — for al- legedly enabling and encourag- ing music piracy.

Joel Kaplan, newspaper de- partment chairman in the Newhouse School of Public Com- munications, called the practice disgusting and "a shock to the conscience." He said Napster invaded the privacy of the copyright holders and recording artists, he said.

Although his interest in computers predates his college days, Sanders said his collection has been expanding rapidly since he arrived on campus. While he has no in-house downloading speeds (with a ResNet connection), he said he downloads MP3s because CDs are "unreasonably priced." "Granted, it’s illegal," he added, "but no one’s going to know."" man Chris Cercy to step from the lush grass of the stadium into the cool darkness that signals the end of a long season. The Orangemen had been on a nine-game winning streak, the best in the country, and the best in the league for many years. The team had been playing at a high level of intensity, with players like John Banks and Chris Cercy leading the way.

But the game didn't go as planned. Despite the Orangemen's dominance in the first half, the Bears were able to make a comeback in the second half, thanks in part to the strong play of goalie Brian Dicks. The Orangemen were able to score just four goals in the second half, compared to the Bears' six.

The Orangemen had a chance to take control of the game early on, with a goal from John Banks just 2:20 into the game. But the Bears were able to rally back with goals from Mike Spring and a third from Banks to take a 3-1 lead at the first quarter.

In the second quarter, the Orangemen were able to cut the lead to 3-2 with a goal from Mike Spring, but the Bears were able to extend their lead to 4-2 with a goal from Joe Ceglia. The Orangemen were able to score once more in the second quarter, but the Bears were able to put the game out of reach with a goal from Brian Dicks.

The Orangemen had a chance to tie the game late in the fourth quarter, with a goal from Mike Spring, but the Bears were able to hold on for the win, 5-2. The Orangemen will now look to regroup and prepare for their next game, against the University of Maryland. The game is expected to be a tough one, with the Terps being one of the top teams in the country.

Carla Gigon has started every Syracuse women’s lacrosse game on the bench this season.

But as the season has progressed, she has spent more time off the pine and between the pipes.

For the second time this season, senior goalkeeper Clothilde Ewing struggled in goal and Gigon, a freshman, received the call to suit up and step in.

The rookie held Connecticut scoreless for the majority of the second half in Syracuse’s 14-7 victory at the Carrier Dome on Saturday.

The freshman finished with four saves on six shots in her 30 minutes of action, compared to Ewing’s four stops of 10 shots in the first stanza.

Gigon started the second half with SU clinging to a 6-5 lead, and while many players would feel pressured in that situation, she thrived on it.

“I was pumped,” she said. “I like going in and helping the team out. It’s an adrenaline rush.”

“Carla likes to be relied on in that way,” assistant coach Kerri Whitaker said. “She goes in and she comes out, and her sophomore year and all 16 games last season, and Gigon, a freshman who has played in parts of three games.

Junior Katrina Hable has had trouble putting points on the board for the Orangewomen this season. Her breakthrough performance came on Saturday, as Hable led SU with five goals in a win over Connecticut.

The only other score Gigon allowed was a desperation goal by Lowie with 30 seconds left in the game.

Even though Gigon gave up two scores, she forced the Huskies to alter their offensive game, Whitaker said.

“I think they hit a lot of pipes because of that. They thought that they had to be more precise because she covers the cage well with her quickness.”

While Gigon found success in net, Ewing encountered troubles.

Early in the first half, Ewing hit a stretch where she surrendered three consecutive Connecticut goals.

“Clo has been inconsistent, and she’s been struggling,” Whitaker said. “I don’t want to put her in a situation where she’s going in and out. We had Carla who could come in and play like she did in the second half.”

Saturday’s game was the second consecutive game Gigon replaced a struggling Ewing. The freshman finished with four saves on six shots in her 30 minutes of action, compared to Ewing’s four stops of 10 shots in the first stanza.

Switching keepers isn’t a situation Whitaker wants to be in for the rest of the season.

“I would like to get some stability in the crease,” Whitaker said. “I don’t know what we’re going to do yet. We’ll have to wait and see.”

The coaches will choose between Ewing, a senior tri-captain who started nine games her sophomore year and all 16 games last season, and Gigon, a freshman who has played in parts of three games.

Whether Gigon remains the backup or earns herself a starting role this season, head coach Lisa Miller knows Gigon will impact the future.

“Clo is a senior and Carla is a freshman,” Miller said. “We need to transition Carla in and get her a little game experience. Carla’s the future. That’s what we’re looking to.”

Syracuse 16 — Brown 5

Midfielder Tim Byrnes helped Syracuse defeat Brown 16-8 on Saturday, adding a goal and an assist to the Orangemen's victory fund. The win extends SU's winning streak to six games, and the Orangemen kept their No. 2 ranking intact.

PROVIDENCE, R.I.—In the aftermath of Syracuse's 16-8 victory Saturday afternoon at Brown Stadium, fashionsated Bears coach and resident lacrosse detective Peter Lasagna pledging insecurity. Brown's head man, sporting Columbus's zeal and Encyclopedia Brown's boyish looks, exclaimed himself last week, searching game tapes, coaches' manuals and his own experience for a way to stop SU's attack.

The veteran coach said he thought he discovered an answer, and he dispatched a shortstick midfielder to chase Ryan Powell. Yet even with their superstar teammate silenced for most of the afternoon, nine other Orangemen scored, and SU cruised to the 11-goal win.

"Our gameplan was to take Ryan Powell out of the game," Lasagna said. "I thought we did a good job of that. But they found other people."

Powell managed two goals and a pair of assists, but SU sophomore Liam Banks pounded Brown with three goals and a career-high five assists.

Three of Banks' assists came in the third quarter, each finished by Michael Springer. The last of the trio started a six-goal spurt that gave Syracuse a 16-3 lead with 7:02 remaining in the game. Lasagna's defense opened channels in the offensive end for Banks and Springer to operate.

Hable, Orangewomen down Connecticut

BY CHRIS SNOW

Katriona Hable knew the day would come. The day she would validate her third-team All-America status. The day she would prove to naysayers that she does have the ability to take over a game. And the day she would reward her teammates for picking up the offensive slack.

Unfortunately for the University of Connecticut women's lacrosse team, that day was Saturday.

With SU leading 6-5 entering the second half, Hable torched the Huskies for four consecutive goals, while scoring five on the day en route to a 14-7 Orange women's victory at the Carrier Dome.

"She did step up and take control the way that she can," SU head coach Lisa Miller said. "She went to the cage and she went hard. I think she's been letting people individually turn her out, and she saw the spaces and went into them today and released the ball sooner rather than later. She was the difference in the game."

Watching UConn clang two shots off posts in the first three minutes of the second half, Hable responded and ended the threat of any Connecticut comeback.

"I think I was frustrated with the way we stood around in the first half," she said. "I came out and told everyone we had to step it up a notch and put this game away, and we came out and showed we can play the way we practice."

With 34:27 remaining, the senior midfielder began the rally, emphatically finishing a strong transition play set up by Stacey Brown and backup goalie Carla Gigon, who entered for Clothilde Ewing after halftime.

Getting creative three minutes later, Hable took a pass from Kara Hanover, cradling the ball and forcing UConn netminder April Pollock to commit to a top-shelf shot before sneaking a one-

When The Boston Globe found that an oversighting President Bill Clinton's impeachment trial had himself engaged in an extramarital affair, reporter Michael Kranish and his editors held the story.

But he led a group of 17 students Monday, he does not regret doing so.

The Globe's Washington, D.C., bureau was supplied information regarding the extramarital activities of Henry Hyde, chairman of the judiciary committee that impeached Clinton last January after an affair with Monica Lewinsky.

But the paper decided not to run the information because, unlike Clinton's actions, Hyde's actions did not influence or affect his job.

The Globe did run the story, however, several days after an online publication broke the story. The paper reacted to Hyde's own statements when he called the incident a "youthful indiscretion," Kranish said.

"The fact is that when that happened, we at the Globe, and at so many other papers, decided to write about it because everyone was talking about it," said Kranish, a 1979 Syracuse University graduate. "We didn't want to be the paper to break that, we were glad to follow. We're all in journalism, but somehow, there's other standards about what (online publications) can publish."

Author humanizes inmates

DEWITT — Capital punishment is a political symbol, not a crime deterrent, said Sister Helen Prejean, author of "Dead Man Walking."

"People on death row are called scum, vermin, disposable human waste," Prejean said Monday at Le Moyne College's Henninger Athletic Complex. "But when you look in their eyes, you see. You see them as people. They have an unbelievable humanness on their face."

Prejean called for an end to the "biblical quarterbacking" that dominates pro-death penalty discussions. Death penalty advocates subscribe the message of the Holy Gospel in an attempt to legitimize capital punishment practices, she said.

"Everyone always chants, 'An eye for an eye,' but do you know how many times that phrase appears in the Bible? Three times," she said. "But we hear more. The word mercy is spoken of more than 2,000 times in the Bible."

The speech was sponsored by Le Moyne's women's studies program, the campus ministry and the Roman Catholic Diocese of Syracuse as part of Le Moyne's Women's History Month celebration. It attracted a crowd of about 500 to the Jesuit school's complex.

Prejean, a Baton Rouge native, is best known for her New York Times bestseller, "Dead Man Walking," an account of the first-degree murder of a teenage couple.

In 1995, Prejean's book was made into a movie of the same title, directed by Tim Robbins and starring Susan Sarandon and Sean Penn. The film received four Academy Award nominations, including Best Actress and Best Musical Score.

But Prejean, a Nobel Peace Prize nominee in both 1998 and 1999, said she is still amazed by the impact of her message. "This wasn't a Hollywood story," she said. "This was a real story of human suffering and compassion. It had an incredible power that went way beyond me. It just went 'woosh' and took off on its own."

Inmate sympathy
Prejean said she followed the Gospel of Jesus Christ by ministering to the most marginalized members of society — first the poor and, eventually, death row inmates.

"Jesus touched lepers and allowed a prostitute to wash his feet with her tears," Prejean said. "He just kept crossing that line and being with people that others said he shouldn't be with, just translated that to today."

When Prejean began her pen pal correspondence with Sonnier while he was incarcerated in the Angola State Prison in Louisiana, she said she wondered how she could cope face-to-face with a man who had been convicted of a cold-blooded killing. But when he appeared before her for the first time, through a heavy, mesh security screen and bound by leg irons, the clarity of his purpose as his spiritual adviser emerged, she said.

"Whatever he did, I knew that he was worth more than the worst thing he ever did in his life," Prejean said. "I wanted to give him back his dignity, to show him the compassion of Christ."

The U.S. judicial system has failed death row inmates by providing them with underpaid, overworked public attorneys, she said.

"I knew none of these people had the Johnny Cochran dream team of defense," she said. "But always thought it was at least adequate, I was wrong, however."

More than 2 million people are incarcerated nationwide, Prejean said. But as new evidence emerges — uncovered primarily by the advent of DNA testing — states are required to release death row inmates following years of costly appeals.

"I told him that life sentences will be spent by those who practice capital punishment, homicide rates are more than double that of those who do not, she said. Prejean also challenges the argument that executions serve to bring peace and a sense of justice to the grieving families of crime victims. Of the 17,000 homicides that occurred since the United States allowed for the reinstatement of capital punishment in 1976, only about 2 percent of the perpetrators were executed — hardly an equitable distribution of justice, Prejean said.

"Is this the only road we can go down?" she said. "Don't we have the choice between the death road and the life road?" People do not need to support the death penalty because they fear that murderers will be freed from jail to walk the streets and kill again, Prejean said. In New York state and most other states that enforce capital punishment, legislators have tightened up sentencing for first-degree and felony murders and ensured that life sentences will be upheld, she said.

"Modern society has the ability to incapacitate those who are dangerous," she said. "It shouldn't be through killing them."

Audience praise
Syracuse University history professor Margaret Thompson said Prejean's performance, sharp wit and compassion make her an admirable role model for all nations.

"She has this wonderful human and spiritual element, but it's not like that of a preacher," Thompson said. "She speaks as a person who has literally walked the walk — not like some abstract theologian."

Laura Perry, a sophomore psychology major at Le Moyne and member of the college's Amnesty International chapter, praised Prejean's ability to put a human face on an issue that often seems distant and black and white.

Since Prejean has spent time examining the harsh death row conditions from a close vantage point, her opinions carry more weight than those of most politicians, Perry said.

Other audience members said Prejean's words — through her speech as well as her book-turned-movie — helped them solidify their beliefs about the death penalty.

Joe Reimer, a junior SU law and public policy and public relations major, said watching "Dead Man Walking" and being exposed to Prejean's experiences had a profound impact on his impression of U.S. death row inmates.

"People are still people, even if they commit horrible crimes," he said. "Everyone is entitled to forgiveness."

with the group involved rumors re- ported to the Texas Gov. George W. Bush's alleged drug use prior to the Republican presidential nominee's political career. "I said to him, when you apply for a job they ask you if you have ever broken any laws, and this is the most important job in the country," said Taylor, a fifth-year architecture student. "It's disgusting." said DeNardo. a junior new- spaper reporter for The Daily Orange. But he said he would not answer the question.

Kranish asked the students what they would write, should they hold a referendum. a lower-level common denominator, or simply have them review the story, while others said Bush's past would influence his job if elected president.

Tools of the trade

Kranish discussed several methods he used during his 26-year career as a political reporter. Developing and retaining sources is vital, he added. The SGA officers would be required to maintain a database of hundreds of sources he has amassed since the beginning of his career.

He urged the audience to use their sources carefully, avoiding anonymous sources because they cannot be credited. "Today," he said, "is the bullet in the police officer's gun," he said. "If you use it, you've got to really, really need it."

Journalists must also remember to maintain credibility by treating all sources and with the press secretary and spokes- people for candidates who determine the vote, Kranish said. "I've certainly had my run-ins with press sources, but you've got to have a good relationship with them," he said. "It's a good vehicle for our research." Down to earth

Kranish said the only reason he had the opportunity to speak to SGA was that his father, also an SU alumnus, "bent" a rule of journalism. Art Kranish, a columnist for The Daily Orange in 1959, wrote of looking for a theatrical performance of a woman who would play George Bush's mother. Michael Kranish also wrote for the D.O. during his time at SU, but not as much as his father, author of two Greenwich Village newspapers in the paper several times each week.

"He's so knowledgeable and yet so personable," said Cauffman, who must be familiar with the New Hampshire primaries in order to get the role call. "He's a very smart man, he's going to help students. But he doesn't talk down to people. He's ready to give advice."
Devious SGA ruling ignores democracy

The Syracuse University Student Government Association has an interesting way to "defend the students." It slaps a blindfold over their eyes.

Devious SGA ruling ignores democracy.

The move ran roughshod over the democratic process, sidestepping SGA's original poorly-planned and greedy proposal to absorb University Union. Instead of owning it, SGA's new legislation establishes itself as UU's direct competitor by creating a programming arm as part of its own organization.

SGA has orchestrated a cruel joke of a plan, and the students will be the butt. In three years, SGA has directly coordinated only one major "event" — Homecoming 1997, which was overseen by a long-gone SGA president. It can't even run a meeting without tripping over policy and procedure.

Constant mishaps have proven that no one currently member of the group has the organizational and entertainment wherewithal to knowledge to coordinate campus activities.

The bill allows SGA to dig as deep as it wants into the Student Fee piggy bank, allocating a massive chunk of the Student Fee — the same money that UU uses to fund itself. Jonathan M. Taylor and Chris Greiner couldn't get the support they needed to engulf UUs, so they came up with a better, and even more devious scheme.

By setting up a board of its own clueless programming coordinators, SGA plans to bury UU faster than it can say "quorum."

Name pronunciation trouble unveils larger problems

"You don't know my name. No man, you don't know my name." — Tim "List" Armstrong, Ramones

Here's a bit of a wager for you, my beloved readers: How many of you, and try to be honest, have any idea how to pronounce my name?

That many huh? I'm not surprised. Americans have long been so receptive to progress as the Syracuse Police Department is to student safety concerns. We're content to cling to English, comfortable in our ethnocentric splendor. My parents, natives of India, don't understand this ignorance. My dad knows my name and my mom knows six. I think I know two. English counts one as one Spanish, Hindi and parts of the other languages we know. People can add up to about one more. I'm not sure what makes my name "called" during class. I should have my parents apologize for my name. I'm not saying it's something domestic, or at least mono-ethnic. Something real exists of the name, and to me it's "Bob."

This brings me to another peeve about names — don't call me "Alex," even if you know Alex is my Indian friend. Don't get me with that "Well, the names sound alike," phenomenon. I never see "Alex" and "Bob." I know one's name is by no means an attack on people named "Bob," which is a perfectly fine name, but you get my point.

Shootings level Giuliani-Clinton race

BY JUSTIN SILVERMAN

Controversy regarding the New York City Police Department sent Mayor Rudy Giuliani tumbling in recent senatorial polls.
But as officials from his campaign said Monday, the mayor hardly feels threatened.

"We view that single poll as an anomaly," said Juleanna Glover-Weiss, a Giuliani spokesperson.

The poll, released March 29 by the Marist Institute for Public Opinion, shows the mayor's winning support for a result of the recent shooting by city police of Patrick Dorismond, an unarmed black man.

The Republican Giuliani is in a statistical tie with his Democrat opponent, first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, according to the poll. The mayor's following fell to 46 percent of potential New York state voters, from 51 percent as Clinton's support climbed to 43 percent.

"Over the last year Hillary has simply been talking more about running for Senate, there have been 35 polls taken - 34 had Giuliani ahead," Glover-Weiss said.

Since September, Giuliani boasted leads of 8 percent over Clinton in the Marist poll, but according to the institute, he lost voters after Dorismond's death and his actions following the shooting.

On March 16, Dorismond
was shot to death outside a Manhattan bar. New York City Police approached Dorismond as part of a small drug sting and asked him
where they could buy marijuana.
Dorismond refused and the officers persisted. A struggle ensued, and one detective shot Dorismond in the chest, killing him. He was unarmed.

After the shooting Giuliani
released Dorismond's sealed juvenile criminal record, a move heavily criticized by New York City res-
dents and political opponents alike.

In a March 22 statement, Clinton denounced Giuliani
for releasing Dorismond's criminal record.

"It was wrong for the mayor to rush to judgment, it was wrong for him to release Patrick Doris-mmond's record, and it is wrong for him to make this situation worse as he and his staff did last time," Clinton said. "His actions have aggravated tensions in the city and have helped drive a wedge between police and the communities they serve."

A Clinton spokesperson could cannot be reached for comment.

The Dorismond shooting
cast a shadow over city police and residents were still simmerning from the shooting of
Amadou Diallo on Feb. 4, 1999.

Four white police officers shot and killed Diallo, a West African immigrant from the Bronx, as they shot at the home of an armed
man. New York City police officers stood trial last February for second-degree murder and reckless endangerment.

But in an indirect way, it is on looked, it was a common practice.

After the shooting Giuliani
released Dorismond's sealed juvenile criminal record, a move heavily criticized by New York City res-
dents and political opponents alike.

In a March 22 statement, Clinton denounced Giuliani
for releasing Dorismond's criminal record.

"It was wrong for the mayor to rush to judgment, it was wrong
for him to release Patrick Dorismond's record, and it is wrong
for him to make this situation worse as he and his staff did last time," Clinton said. "His actions have aggravated tensions in the city and have helped drive a wedge between police and the communities they serve."

A Clinton spokesperson could cannot be reached for comment.

The Dorismond shooting
cast a shadow over city police and residents were still simmerning from the shooting of
Amadou Diallo on Feb. 4, 1999.

Four white police officers shot and killed Diallo, a West African immigrant from the Bronx, as they shot at the home of an armed
man. New York City police officers stood trial last February for second-degree murder and reckless endangerment.

But in an indirect way, it is on looked, it was a common practice.

"We view that single poll as an anomaly," said Juleanna Glover-Weiss, a Giuliani spokeswoman.

The poll, released March 29
by the Marist Institute for Public Opinion, shows the mayor's winning support for a result of the recent shooting by city police of Patrick Dorismond, an unarmed black man.

The Republican Giuliani is in a statistical tie with his Democrat opponent, first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, according to the poll. The mayor's following fell to 46 percent of potential New York state voters, from 51 percent as Clinton's support climbed to 43 percent.

"Over the last year Hillary has simply been talking more about running for Senate, there have been 35 polls taken - 34 had Giuliani ahead," Glover-Weiss said.

Since September, Giuliani boasted leads of 8 percent over
Clinton in the Marist poll, but according to the institute, he lost voters after Dorismond's death and his actions following the shooting.

On March 16, Dorismond
was shot to death outside a Manhattan bar. New York City Police approached Dorismond as part of a small drug sting and asked him
where they could buy marijuana.
Dorismond refused and the officers persisted. A struggle ensued,
and one detective shot Dorismond in the chest, killing him. He was unarmed.

Road Runner provides an Internet option for students living off campus.

BY DOMINIC FRANCESE
Staff Writer

As many students move off campus next year, they will lose some of the conveniences they now take for granted. Dining halls will not be a stone's throw away, friends cannot be found across the hall and gone will be high-speed Internet access through Syracuse University's ResNET.

Some students may opt for dial-up access through telephone lines that seem to move at a snail's pace compared to SU's network. There are many choices with this option.

Then there are the high-speed alternatives.

The traditional nationwide service providers — America Online, CompuServe andProdigy — and local service providers — GIBCO and D-Link — are all dial-up options. They cost between $15 and $20 per month, and the fastest access speed is around 56K.

But Time Warner cable has offered its Road Runner service to cable customers in Central New York since August 1998, and it is becoming more popular each year.

"Syracuse is a very healthy market," said John Keib, marketing manager of Road Runner.

Road Runner is a service provider that uses Time Warner's cable lines to access the Internet. Time Warner's hybrid fiber/coaxial cable network allows transfer speeds to be faster than usual, reaching eight megabits per second, Keib said.

The connection speed of Road Runner depends on the number of users in a certain area. The more users in a neighborhood, the slower the connection speed. Road Runner monitors the bandwidth, so that the variation of speed is very little, Keib said.

SU students use the Internet more extensively than other students and demand higher speeds, increasing the number of subscribers, he added.

"This year, the number of SU subscribers doubled from the first year, and it'll probably double again in 2000," Keib said.

Michael Wildman, a fifth-year architecture student, signed up for Road Runner service at the beginning of the school year. He has previously used ResNET and dialup and said he is satisfied with Road Runner.

The only problem Wildman has had is with downtime earlier in the school year, but said it isn't much of a problem anymore.

"There was a point there was a lot of downtime," he said. "It's better now, it's speeded up."
phone lines are needed. DSL is a telephone line from the phone company to a residence, so other people’s use does not affect connection speed.

Bell Atlantic’s DSL service comes in three different speeds. Personal Infospeed, which connects at speeds up to 640 kilobits per second, Professional Infospeed, which connects at 1.6 megabits per second and Power Infospeed, which connects at 7.1 megabits per second. But those who live in the SU area cannot get Infospeed DSL service yet. A Bell Atlantic representative, however, said the service will be coming to the area in six months.

Comparing the speed of the services shows that they are all very similar. Road Runner is 100 times faster than a 28.8 modem and is comparable to SU’s ResNET. Infospeed DSL is 12 to 126 times faster than a 56K modem, and the average plan is comparable with Road Runner. The convenience of off-campus high-speed Internet access costs more than the university’s ResNET, which costs $175 for the academic year, averaging out to about $7 per month. ResNET also has no installation fee and only requires an Ethernet card and cable.

Road runner, on the other hand, costs $20.95 per month if you already subscribe to standard cable. If you have basic cable, or no cable at all, it is $44.95 per month. Installation is also extra, ranging from $18 self-installation to $99 full installation.

Equipment costs also increase the overall cost of Road Runner. The service requires an Ethernet card and a cable modem, which is covered by the monthly charge.

The cost of Bell Atlantic Infospeed DSL also has a monthly cost in addition to an Ethernet card. Personal Infospeed costs $49.95 per month, Professional Infospeed costs $99.95 per month, and Power Infospeed costs $169.95 per month. There is also a one-time charge of $99 for the DSL modem.

Big business

“The school is a business,” Jamal said. “They don’t like me to say that though.”

The SU administration, because of the lack of effort on your part to make our experiences complete and our actual activities and events for students, you have a number of students who wish they never came here once they got through the facade that you put up on the tours and videos, it’s late now.

Don’t keep telling us to look for our own fun because you have the responsibility to keep us active and busy outside of class. There are things like concerts, a real Homecoming for non-greens, weekend student trips, dances and forums for non-greens, weekly events like the Battle of the Bands or open house weekend at the frats and sororities that could prevent some of us from drinking our bank accounts away. Honestly, what else do you expect anyone to do here who doesn’t drink, play checkers?

Don’t give me that rhetoric about education coming first at SU, you hypocrites. If SU is so concerned with being a student-centered research university, why aren’t we out of the top 50 universities in the U.S., why is tuition going up 5 percent each year and why haven’t anyone addressed how we are going to prevent this in a reasonable manner? All you want is to hear is the “Cha-Ching” noise anymore? That’s what you’re all about in the end.

I’m surprised Otto the Orange hasn’t been squeezed and sold to the students yet. Jamal said that Shaw mentioned to him that the administration doesn’t make decisions based on student opinions. Well, what if student opinion is right? Guess we don’t listen to that every SU is my world and my life. I love it. I’m not trying to trash SU. But I want to look back when I’m old and say that this was the best experience of my life. I don’t think it’s occurring. I can’t do anything to make it better.

Saying one else feels like they got themselves a lemon of a school with SU? If so, write to me at the e-mail address below and have your voice heard for once around this place. “I’ll be damned if they don’t listen to me, because we’re your outlet,” Jamal said. “We know who to talk to.”

“Don’t give me some idea on how we can realistically make this place a great school to be a part of. Jamal is going to have to address all the concerns as I receive at an upcoming SGA meeting.”

It seems the country is in for a beautiful week... temps in the 90's everywhere except Syracuse. Where it will rain then mix to snow.

FOOTBALL

Like all other always-topic counterattacks, there is a media creation or not, it still remains an overloaded position at Syracuse.

"We've got two or three quarterbacks, and everybody is going to take it week to week. ... The day-to-day is going to be, 'Who can do it?,'" Pasqualoni said.

"You've got to have the subs. Steven (Walls) will be on the bench. Chad (Elliott) really has had a good spring," Pasqualoni said.

"The only reason we're bringing on a competitive race is because we think the kids are going to improve. We think they're in great condition, and they're in for the most part. They're in really good condition, and they're in really good shape. They're in really good shape," Pasqualoni said.

"I'm strong," Williams said. "I think I'm on top of my game. I'm feeling more comfortable and-facing the offense. Performance, accuracy, being under center, being under center, under center. The offense will win the job."

"Anderson — He'll still enter the 2000 season with the same "all-potential" label he had last fall. Having sat through a redshirt year, he should be in prime position to challenge the incumbents. His tools are residuary. Obviously, we're very excited about it," Pasqualoni said.

"I don't think I'm too many mistakes, which enabled SU's running game to take over. Like Demetrius, he is also a threat to run and score. Much of the weight has been taken off his right knee. The thing is, I'm just going in, trying to learn the offense and get used to the offense. I'm just going in, trying to learn the offense and get used to the offense. ... Maurice Jackson was a bit of a mystery as well. Jackson is a threat to run and score. He's a little bit of a mystery as well. Jackson is a threat to run and score. "It's the toughest on Chad because it was his first day with the number one system. As the day went on, Chad got more comfortable being in the huddle."

The quarterback situation has been a year of transition for the Orangemen. It's a year of transition for the Orange, along with the transfer of quarterback's names.

"Obviously, we're very excited about it," Pasqualoni said.

"Troy Nunes, when asked about his weaknesses: "Obviously, size and strength is an area for me. I probably will probably leave here at 270, but I still think I'm too small. That's always going to be a knock on me."

already recovered eight groundballs and taken one shot on goal in the team's first six games.

Sister Bay high school days were also consumed with sports, culminating when he was named West Genesee Athlete of the Year in 1998, a recognition that included varsity football, wrestling and lacrosse in his senior year.

Stessen, however, was unable to take advantage of his love for theater at West Genesee.

"I had the same problem then that I do now," Stessen said. He credits his busy days for an entrepreneurship class he took in high school as an important part of his education.

"Sometimes, I'll walk into the locker room and say: 'How's it going? What's new?'" Stessen said. He credits his busy days for an entrepreneurship class he took in high school as an important part of his education.

"The run to bowl for the state championship: 'If you thought the two-quarterback system didn't it's all on you.'

"I credit this to Ward Stessen's first gold continues to coincide with his theatrical debute. The Orange quarterback's name is now seen on the schedule."

"I'm doing two things I love doing."

QBs vie for playing time

BY ERIC NATHAN Staff Writer

What most students consider the wee hours of the weekend turned out to be kickoff time for spring football.

The Syracuse Orangemen took the Carrier Dome at 9:45 a.m. Saturday, reporting to their first practice on an unusually gorgeous Salt City day.

It was a beautiful start to spring practice. SU head coach Paul Pasqualoni said it was the first time he could recall that the Orangemen had a practice outside on the first day.

First-year coaches got their first look at new proteges, while the returning coaches saw how hard they worked hard since December.

New quarterbacks coach Jim Hofher worked with his quartet. When not yelling instructions to the entire offensive unit, George DeLeone, the man with a drill sergeant persona, trained the offensive line.

Defensive coordinator Chris Rippon began shaping his defense.

All the while, Coach P silently paced back and forth from the north end of the field with the red jersey-clad defenders to the south end with the green jersey-wearing offense.

After work, the head coach was proud of his troops. "The kids performed very, very well," Pasqualoni said.

"The kids, for this time of year, are in excellent shape," Pasqualoni said.

More money for Marvin

Former Syracuse wide receiver Marvin Harrison is close to signing a four-year extension with the Indianapolis Colts that could pay him more than $19 million over the next three seasons.

The Colts, who hold the No. 1 seed remaining in the NFL playoffs, reported that Marvin Harrison owns SU records for receiving yards (1,131) and receiving touchdowns (20) in a single season (1,131).

He added 21 points and A.I. Granger chipped in with 19.

Udonis Haslem led the Gators with 27 points.

Stessen role plays on SU defense, Syracuse stage

BY PETE SCHREIBER Contributing Writer

On the sidelines at lacrosse practice, Dan Stessen thinks about stage directions, voice inflection and remembering pockets of Shakespearean verse.

These sorts of brainstorms do not usually come from a defensive midfielder on the nation's top-ranked lacrosse team.

Then again, Dan Stessen is not a typical lacrosse player.

Besides juggling a 15-credit course load during the day with the rigorous afternoon requirements of playing lacrosse, Stessen, a junior, supplements his day by appearing his appetite for theater in the evening.

Stessen currently plays the role of Petruchio, a Shakespearean character in director Rariel Baums's "All The World Is A Stage." He will perform on a Syracuse stage for the first time April 28 with additional shows on April 29 and 30.

"I've always wanted to do theater," Stessen said. "I wasn't going to let anyone tell me that I couldn't do it."

However, Stessen discovered he could not devote the required amount of time to both basketball and a major in theater.

"Rather than leave the game, Stessen opted to declare theater his minor. He majored in speech communications in the College of Visual and Performing Arts.

"We practice communications skills verbally, and study interpersonal nonverbal skills," Stessen said.

Syracuse University Internship Program
An Internship can introduce you to the world of work, give you the experience that helps you decide on a career area, and can open the door to future employment. It also adds value to your resume.

SUIP can help you arrange an internship that can be taken over the summer, or in fall and spring semesters. We can also help you with your resume and cover letters. Drop in at our office any day between 8:30 and 5:00, and see what we have for you.

The Soling Program
The Soling Program is a creative, project oriented, dynamic problem solving academic program. We recruit projects from the Syracuse and University communities and students then work in teams to creatively solve the problem (project) they choose. We accept undergraduates of all majors and years. Projects range from technical to artistic, practical to theoretical. Whatever your major or interests you are bound to find a unique experience at the Soling Program.
Victim denies punishment

Stackhouse pleads guilty, will serve seven years in prison

BY EMILY KULKUS
Managing Editor

Myles Thomas, one of the men stabbed during a Halloween week-end incident in which three Syracuse University football players were severely injured, said Tuesday that his attacker's punishment does not fit the crime.

Thomas said he attends daily rehabilitation sessions, after spending seven weeks at University Hospital for severe stab wounds he suffered from Trevaquaill Stackhouse outside Sadie's Place, 104 Seymour St.

Stackhouse, of 218 McLennan Ave., pleaded guilty Tuesday to first-degree assault for his involvement in the brawl, landing the 22-year-old in a New York state prison for seven years, as reported Tuesday night.

The stabbing occurred Oct. 31 as a crowd of more than 76 people gathered around a fight in which David Byrd, SU's senior starting tackle, suffered cuts to his arm, head and shoulder stab wounds. Giovanni DeCicco, a reserve offensive tackle, suffered cuts to his arm, head and back. Maynard "Duke" Pettijohn, a starting defensive end, sustained cuts to his head and ear.

But Thomas, a high school friend of Pettijohn and the University of Maryland student at the time, suffered wounds in his chest and to several vital organs.

A fourth man involved, Daniel Moore, was treated and released from St. Joseph's Hospital following the brawl.

DeCicco remained at University Hospital for several days, Byrd stayed one week and Pettijohn was released immediately following treatment.

On Nov. 5, prosecutors indicted Cheiron Thomas, 22, of 4432 S. Salina St., for stabbing Pettijohn. He remains in the Otsego County Jail.

Cheiron Thomas' arraignment is expected later this week.

Now living in the Boston area with his grandmother, Thomas has returned to his studies at Syracuse University. See STABBING page 8.

Bill supporter admits flaws

BY TIFANY LANKES
Asst. News Editor

A recent bill revising the Student Government Association's constitution may have several long-term flaws, including a conflict of interest within the association, Parliamentarian Jonathan M. Taylor said Tuesday.

The bill, proposed Monday by President Jamal James, Taylor and Comptroller Chris Greiner, changes the name of the group to the Student Association and increases its role in event programming.

"Any program that the association will implement must receive funding from SGA's Finance Board, Taylor said.

"In most cases, students who are members of a group other than SGA and serve on the board are not allowed to vote on allocations to that group. Funding to SGA itself, however, must be authorized at the discretion of the board whose members are in the association, he added."

"The Finance Board in the end is still going to be making the decision," said Taylor, who is serving his sixth SGA session. "In effect, all events are sponsored by SGA. You know you have a conflict of interest if you're funding yourself."

"There is also a possibility that future officers may use the new constitution to expand their programming powers," Taylor said. Many past programs attempted by SGA, including the 1997 Homecoming celebration, have failed, he added.

Houses look to re-establish Greek Week

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Staff Writer

Heather Carman and the Greek Programming board are trying to bring Greek Week as a Syracuse University tradition.

"Hopefully it will become an annual event," said Carman, who is in charge of public relations for the events taking place during the next two weeks.

Greek Week was a popular event during the 1970s, but participation ended recently, added Carman, a sophomore public relations major.

Randomly paired fraternities and sororities will compete in a variety of events for the Greek Week Trophy, as well as pride in their brothers and sisters, said Alissa Brown, Programming Board coordinator.

The trophy will be awarded at the Greek Awards Ceremony on April 18.

"It's an opportunity for Greeks to come together and represent the community as a whole," Blood said.

Chapters will pay an entrance fee for each of their members participating in the activities, she said.

A carnival will occur from 1 to 5 p.m. Sunday at Hendricks Field by Sadie's Place. Activities will include gladiator jousting, sumo wrestling and a dunk tank, among other interactive carnival games.

Greeks will also compete in Olympic-style games Tuesday and next Friday in Flanagan Gymnasium. Activities include a pie-eating contest, three-legged races and a tug-o-war, among others.

Council committee seeks consolidation

BY ASHLEIGH GRAF
Staff Writer

Last year, the city of Syracuse spent 58 percent of its budget on education.

The money must be used more efficiently and effectively, recommended the Syracuse Common Council Consolidation Committee on Tuesday.

The Consolidation Committee proposed combining several departments between both itself and the city school districts — a goal that will not downsize the city's school district's staff, said Patricia Hall, assistant superintendant.

Committee members also found that any efforts at consolidation will not affect the district's students. But they recommended further study of the issues before they see CONSOLIDATION page 5.
WASHINGTO N, D.C. — The former commander of the U.S. anti-drug operations in Colombia — whose wife pleaded guilty in January to smuggling drugs into the United States while he was stationed at the U.S. Embassy in Bogota — has agreed to plead guilty to failing to turn in money he deposited in small amounts in U.S. banks pur- chase orders money with it, ap- parently in an attempt to evade drug smuggling.

According to government documents filed for the Eastern District of New York in Brooklyn, Hienes will plead guilty on April 17 to a crime called misapplication of a felony that is not tolling authorizes what he knew of his wife's illegal activities.

Both Hienes have insisted that he told his wife he did not come from, and James Hienes — who earlier had been charged Army investigators of any in- volvement in his wife's crime.

According to court documents filed yesterday, sources close to the case said Col. James C. Hienes has dropped his earlier denials and admitted storing in his apartment and embassies offices as much as $45,000 given to him by his wife. After her arrest last summer and her return to the United States, he deposed the money in small amounts in U.S. banks pur- chase orders money with it, ap- parently in an attempt to evade drug smuggling.

But his admission of involvement in the case adds another level of embarrassment to the Clinton administration, and particularly the Pentagon, at a time when they are asking Congress to approve a major aid package to fight drug trafficking in Colombia.

Ms. Nort's vote for gun hand locks

ANNAPOLIS, MD. — The House of Delegates voted last night to make Maryland the first state in the nation to require built-in locks for all new handguns, banning the Friday and Sunday sale of cheap handguns and tamper-resistant serial numbers and toasters to automobiles. They have the sale of “Saturday Night Specials” and require all handguns sold in Massachusetts to include built-in child-proofing devices, tamper-resistant serial numbers and safety warnings similar to those found on cigarette packs.

The new rules also prohibit the sale of handguns without service records, mandate that serial numbers be more difficult to erase, require more stringent warnings on handguns, and re- quire that guns be equipped with locks designed to prevent unauthorized use.

Mori to succeed Obuchi as PM

TOKYO — With their leader in a coma, the cabinet of Keizo Obuchi dissolved itself Tuesday, making way for Yoshi- ro Mori to succeed the stricken prime minister.

Mori, 62, a party loyalist and a former agriculture, forestry and fish- etary minister, has been chosen to lead the Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) at its convention on Saturday. The LDP, which has won control of the Diet for the past 15 years, is expected to be chosen by the ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) and by the two houses of the Diet.

The new LDP leader is expected to win approval of the members of the Obuchi cabinet, and continue current domestic and foreign policies. Since the political di- rective in Japan usually is less and consensus and the Liberal De- mocrats' main goal is to do, Futen- yata anticipate little immediate change.

Krajinskin held in war crimes case

PARIS — French-led NATO troops burst into the Bosnian home of Monmd Krajinskin, a former key Bosnian Serb war leader, and arrested court- early Tuesday on charges of genocide, making him the highest-ranking Bosnian Serb taken into custody in connection with Bosnian war atrocities.

The seizure of Krajinskin could for the first time give war crimes investigators a window into the inner workings of the wartime Bosnian Serb leader. Krajinskin has been accused of displacing and executing thousands of Bosnian Muslims in an "ethnic cleansing" campaign that became a notorious hallmark of the 1995-96 conflict.

Krajinskin was flown to The Hague Friday before the International Tribunal for the Former Yugo- slavia. His arrest came during the trial and later served as the Serbian member of the Bosnian tripartite presidency.

just the groundwork for the organization, with how we allocate the fee. There's what you're requiring," Taylor said. "We can say 'here's the money, spend their approved funding, Taylor said.

Student organizations including the New York Public Interest Research Group, University Union Enterprises and La Lucha supported the petition, Duffy said.

"The vote taken was not appropriate," Sauer said. "We feel it has become our responsibility to take a new vote of the students. I don't have anything to gain by fighting this." The two freshmen were among several members who voted Monday against the new bill. Duffy and Sauer protested the vote, arguing that James did not accurately count the number of votes.

The vote, taken during the final minutes of Monday's meeting, was immediately followed by the final roll call, which ended the meeting. This action made it impossible for Assembly members to call for a recount, Sauer said.

James argued that he ordered the final roll call immediately following the vote because the meeting had already lasted three hours and he did not want to prolong it. The bill was saved until the end of the meeting because every member was run differently, James added.

"I don't see anything sneaky about it," he said.

Duffy and Sauer plan to meet with SGA's Judicial Review Board today to discuss the validity of the vote.

SGA will convene Wednesday at a meeting closed to the public to "clear the air" on issues surrounding the bill, James said.

"We are moving in a wonderful, wonderful direction," he added. "I think there are many people who aren't quite sure how to put on a show."

Students will have the opportunity to vote for or against the bill, along with the allocation of funding for NYPIRG, during a referendum April 11 to April 13 at campus dining halls and Schine Student Center.

Through SGA plans to advertise the event in campus dining halls, James said he does not expect many people to turn out for the vote.

"I don't think the students will care," he said. "That's just the nature of the university."

The students, however, should not have to care about disagreement in student government, Sauer said.

They elected officials out of good faith that they would get the job done," he said.

Assemblyman David Gaulin said that while there may be strong disagreement surrounding the proposal, SGA needs to look past this issue and focus on working together as an organization.

"It was sprung upon us, now it's up to the students to decide," said Gaulin, a sophomore history and political science major. "This bill is going to be in the past at some point. We need to look forward into the future. There's a lot of other things that need to get done."

"If we're going to keep giving low blows, we can kiss this Assembly goodbye," he added.
Forum to explore hurtful slang

BY BETH BRAVERMAN
Staff Writer

Students do not realize the words they use each day mean different things to people of diverse backgrounds, said Shay Taylor, acting president of Pride Union.

Taylor cited such phrases as "that's so gay" and "I really jewed him down" as examples of such careless uses of words.

Pride Union, an undergraduate gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender advocacy group, will host a forum discussing such words at 7 p.m. tonight in the Hall of Languages, Room 500.

Representatives from Point Zero, Asian Students In America, the Caribbean Student Association and the Jewish Student Union will be present, Taylor said. All interested students are invited to attend, she added.

Taylor said she came up with the idea of the forum two years ago when she was a resident advisor. She said she heard several of her freshman residents using discriminatory words in everyday conversation with their peers.

The offenders did not realize that slang can be hurtful to individuals identifying with the negative connotation carried by specific words, she said.

Taylor said she recently overheard one girl describing something she considered stupid as being "so gay." "To a person who might be struggling with issues of coming out, hearing something like that might make someone feel like they weren't even wanted on campus," she said.

Taylor said she decided the forum would be a way for students to openly discuss an issue that affects the entire campus. This matter does not concern just gays and minorities, she said. College students are always interested in expanding their horizons so forums like this are a good opportunity for people to learn ways in which they can show more respect toward others, said Paul Dien, public relations director of A.S.I.A.

"On our campus we definitely have issues," he added. "Sometimes we don't realize how our actions affect others."

Students at the forum will also discuss the way certain groups targeted by discriminatory words transform the same words into acceptable terms within their own community. Some blacks will refer to others of the same race as "niggers," and gays and lesbians will call each other "queer," Taylor said.

Homosexuals know the word "queer" was not going to be eliminated from society's vernacular so they took the term into their culture as one that can be used to empower, added Michele Lee, a member of A.S.I.A. and Point Zero and a speaker at the forum. "This is something I've been working on for two years now and to see it come together makes me ecstatic," Taylor said of the forum.

She added that she hopes the forum will get a large turnout. "People just say things without speaking," said Sarah Lands, a freshman broadcast journalism major who said she is considering attending the event. "I hear a lot of words like 'fag' and people never even think of the effects of those words and how some people may feel about them."

"I think it would be interesting to see everyone else's opinions and see how they compare with my own," she added. "I want to see if what I think matches up with the actual scenario on campus."
CONSOLIDATION

sent them for a vote from the full Common Council, according to its report.

The consolidation would include merging the physical services, property control, print services, financial operations, employee benefits and transportation departments of the city and school district.

"I have been around for 25 years and this is not the first time this has been talked about," Hall said. "This is not a new idea."

While the proposal now enjoys little opposition, union representatives originally expressed concerns that the mergers would result in a loss of jobs or benefits, Hall said.

"The members heading the departments up for combination are also concerned about a potential shift in leadership," added.

"I think this business of being so controlling is not productive," Hall said. "People just don't want to give up their turf."

She added that she does not foresee any job loss from the consolidation.

"The people in the jobs have to be considered," Hall said. "The goal is not to lay people off."

The city and district's physical services would be shared if the consolidation is approved by the full Council at a later meeting, Hall said.

"These services include the snow and ice removal division, waste removal and recycling division, custodial services and grounds maintenance," she added.

Under the proposed consolidation, the City Department of Public Works would handle the snow and waste removal services for both the city and the district, Hall said.

The district would handle custodial services for both bodies and the organizations would share responsibility for ground maintenance, Hall said.

The committee also recommended combining print services. The district's in-house employees currently complete most of the printing for the district. The city, however, has printing contracts with many different companies for the same services, said Ann Sanzone, a district employee.

A merger in this area would take advantage of the city's graphic arts ability and the district's print technology, as well as eliminate duplicate equipment and departments, Sanzone said. Once approved, combining the two departments would only take a few months, she added.

Combining property control, supervision of the city and district's warehouse space and the purchasing of certain supplies, could benefit both the city and the district by lowering costs in this area, Sanzone said.

"One of the reasons we looked at warehousing was because we had someone to manage that in place," said Nick DiBello, a district employee.

The example of purchasing paper proves the point. Sanzone explained:

"The price we pay is a lot cheaper than what the city pays," she said. "We can award the low bid to the vendor with the lowest price. We found there was a difference of 10 to 15 thousand dollars."

In the area of finances, however, the committee had difficulty finding an easy and cost-effective method of merging the two departments because the software used in the computer systems is not compatible, said Brian Rooin, a city employee.

In order to consolidate the software and systems, there would be a cost of about $100,000, he explained.

"We have a very sophisticated integrated system," Hall said. "There would be an even greater problem for the school district, because student information is kept on a separate system, said Les McCormick, a district employee.

Employee benefits will not easily consolidate either, with the exception of a worker's compensation management plan, said Bob Allen, a district employee.

"It was decided that worker's compensation is the area where most savings could be made," he said.

These savings could be made mostly in the reconsideration of the choice of physicians for health insurance coverage, Allen said. The reason for this is because in worker's compensation cases, the biggest expense to the district is the medical bills, he added.

Transportation would also cause difficulty when consolidating, said Jim Cannon, a district employee.

"The primary duty of the transportation is to transport children," Cannon said.

In this case, the departments need to be clearly separate, he said. This separation must be clean-cut because transportation is aided by the state and a merger would affect funding levels, he added.

Hall said Syracuse's consolidation efforts could lead other cities in the region to do the same.

"Hopefully we're setting a good role model for what towns around us should be doing," she said. "It's a lot of work though."

This week will also feature a banner and skit contest designed to promote the event's inaugural theme, "Y2K Greek."

The events planned will prove to be community fun, Carman said. Its purpose is to distance Greeks from stereotypes of alcohol abuse and sexual promiscuity, she added.

The idea of Greek Freak 2000 will spark some friendly competition, said Steven Stern, a sophomore entrepreneurship major and Delta Kappa Epsilon brother. "It also provides a lot of fun."

The week will culminate in a "Greek-Thon" to raise money for the Huntington's Disease Society of America, the recipient of proceeds from all the events.

Points will be awarded to teams based on their performance in the basketball tournament, three-point shootout, as well as how much money they raise. Huntington's Disease is a hereditary disease that progressively damages the nervous system.

A silent auction will accompany the event. Prizes for the fun were donated by local businesses and will also benefit the charity.

"We expect a large turnout," said Vince Kuss, program coordinator for the Office of Greek Life. "The majority of the chapters on campus are participating. The board worked very hard on this."

The event will allow all the chapters on campus to get involved with one philanthropy, said Blood, a sophomore political science and television, radio and film major.

"Greek Freak 2000" will kick off the events, with four days of entertainment — also open to non-greeks — that are sponsored by the Student Affairs Council and the multicultural fraternity system, Blood said.

Harassment calls plague students during weekend

Staff Reports
A student in Booth Residence Hall reported a harassing phone call Friday evening from a man named "Steve," according to a Public Safety report.

The man allegedly asked the student for information about her roommate, the report said.

Another student, a resident on the 130 block of Lambrecht Lane, also reported harassing phone calls that night, according to a Public Safety report. The student successfully ran a phone trace on the caller. The case was turned over to investigators, the report said.

A third report of harassing phone calls was filed Friday morning by a Brewster Hall resident, according to a Public Safety report.

The caller described the student in detail over the phone, the report said. The case was turned over to investigators, the report added.

"One of the ones on North was taken care of very well by the RA," said Sarah Naggar, president of South Campus Organization for Planning Excellence. She added that she was not familiar with the other reports.

A Public Safety officer visited Haven Hall to discuss what to do in response to harassing phone calls, Naggar said.

I don't know what could be done about it," Residence Hall Association President Jonathan Eisenmann said. "It's kind of all over the place, and we've just got to keep an eye on it."
Residents benefit from joint venture

A joint proposal by the City of Syracuse and the Syracuse School District could potentially put thousands of dollars back into taxpayer pockets.

The city’s director of operations and the school district’s assistant superintendent presented a smart plan at Tuesday’s Syracuse Common Council meeting. If approved by a referendum, the city and school district would consolidate several facets of operations in the hopes of increasing efficiency.

The plan seeks to cut expenses by merging city and school-district branches of physical services such as snow and waste removal, as well as employee benefit offices and volume-discount purchasing orders.

The city part of the plan uses more than half of the city’s annual budget. Since the city and school district duplicate many essential services, it’s wise to join forces when possible.

While financial results may not appear immediately, a few years of shared tasks could add up to a substantial nest egg in city and school coffers. And the products could be reverted to local residents — they already pay some of the highest taxes in the state — and poured back into schools to cover the costs of new computers or athletic equipment for local students.

City residents would perhaps be best served by using the consolidation savings to augment local civic ventures. In a city full of boarded-up houses and drug-infested neighborhoods, the dollars saved could surely be used to make civic improvements and clean up downtrodden areas.

But the Common Council shouldn’t launch headlong into the consolidation without carefully pinpointing their goals. Although the school district is an arm of the city government, the goals of the two bodies remain markedly different, and their autonomy must be maintained.

School administrators and city lawmakers should collaborate to increase profit and maximize resources for both parties. If properly orchestrated, a consolidation of various parts of the city and school district could have far-reaching benefits.

Opinions

Sweatshop activism group deserves commendation

People at Syracuse University are always complaining about the general sense of apathy that afflicts students on this campus. Nothing gets done and nothing ever changes because people simply don’t care. I’d like to take this opportunity to give a shout out to a group of students who have been working tirelessly on behalf of a very worthwhile cause.

I’m sure you’ve seen the recent article in The Daily Orange or The Post-Standard discussing the exploits of the Syracuse Coalition On Organized Labor. SCOOOL is currently working for Fair Labor Standards, or better known as the Fair Labor Association, to end its membership in the Fair Labor Association and join the Worker Rights Consortium. Both of these organizations are concerned with the rights of workers and fair employment practices. Both organizations are the same, however, and I would like to bring up some information in order to provide a better understanding.

Recently, another organization has gained recognition, mostly because of the areas where this issue is present in the FLA. The WRC has the same goals of monitoring labor practices, but its membership consists primarily of labor, human rights and religious groups, as well as a recent surge in university membership. This means that the WRC is not subject to the same corporate tainting that the FLA is.

Unfortunately, the group remains active on and off campus, gearing up for the WRC’s April 7 founding conference. Now that they know they have student support for their cause, they are collaborating with national organizations to continue to put pressure on Syracuse University to reconsider its membership in the FLA and join the WRC instead.

So now that “Sweatshop Awareness Week” is over and show still hasn’t budged on the issue, the members of SCOOOL have given up and gone back to attending classes to wait for yet another project to present itself, right? Wrong. The group remains active and off campus.

These student activists deserve our continued support and admiration. Hopefully, their example will inspire other students to put in as hard for similar causes.

Editorial misses purpose of new SGA legislation

To the Editor:

Aside from an unwarranted barrage of attacks on The Daily Orange, Editor of Student Government Association, Chuck Flan, I would like to discuss an issue that you and I both care about. It is the issue of SGA legislation and the new student body budget.

Recently, the Daily Orange published an editorial that criticized the SGA for its decision to end its membership in the Fair Labor Standards Association. The Daily Orange claimed that the SGA's decision to end its membership was made without sufficient discussion or consultation with student organizations on campus.

The Daily Orange also claimed that the SGA's decision was made without considering the impact of such a decision on the student body budget. The Daily Orange further stated that the SGA's decision was made without considering the impact of such a decision on the student body budget.

In reality, the Daily Orange's editorial was a cruel joke of a plan. If you were the Daily Orange, you would have been accurate in your claim that the SGA's decision was made without considering the impact of such a decision on the student body budget.

Now, I would like to discuss the issue of SGA legislation and the new student body budget. The Daily Orange's editorial was a cruel joke of a plan. Stackhouse's punishment for the pain he caused is not enough, Thomas added.
"I'm going to be in bad shape for the next year and a half," he said. "To me, putting someone in jail is still life. That's fucked up. I was in bad shape and I came close to dying.
"And then he gets seven years? It's a reward if you ask me." When asked what an appropriate punishment would be, Thomas replied, "Death."

Stackhouse could not be reached for comment.

Thomas said although there is no end to his rehab in sight, he hopes to return to school either this summer or fall.

DeLoatch said he has tried to move beyond the incident but added that he thinks Thomas' displeasure with Tuesday's outcome is justified.
"I don't blame him. He should be upset," DeLoatch said. "It's sad that we go out into the community and we get stabbed, and now we can't go anywhere." Although DeLoatch's physical wounds have healed, the stabbings changed his life, he said.
"I had to take things more seriously," he said. "Now I'm just keeping a low profile and I don't go far off campus now. I don't take that risk again. It's not a fear but a concern of mine. It's terrible that it has to be that way."

DeLoatch expressed his concern for Thomas and said he hoped to see him at games next season supporting Pettijohn and rising above what DeLoatch called an "unfortunate" incident.
"I guess (Stackhouse and Cherion Thomas) have to pay for what they did — they have to pay their dues," DeLoatch said. "I guess that's the way it goes."

Second round
The last time opponents of global capitalism confronted the ranks of domestic law enforcement — in Seattle, Nov. 30 to Dec. 3 — the results were clouds of tear gas, volleys of rubber bullets and the making of a massive protest movement whose energy and appeal surprised even some of its organizers. Round 2 is scheduled for April 16 and 17 in Washington, but protesters will begin among friends across the country Saturday. The protesters’ target in Seattle was a summit of the World Trade Organization, which was disrupted by more than 30,000 demonstrators. The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund are being cast as the villains. Their meetings April 16 and 17 are routine, but protest organizers decided to use them to sustain the Seattle momentum.

Smokes out
Colorectal cancer may be strongly influenced by smoking, a new study suggests. People who want to reduce their risk of tumor development can do so by giving up cigarettes and cigars, scientists report Tuesday. Smoking doesn’t cause only lung cancer, scientists told the 91st annual meeting of the American Association for Cancer Research, but also may be at the root of quite a few dinner conversations.

Big screen
Microsoft Corp. on Tuesday will across its largest-ever marketing campaign for its MSN online network, hoping to narrow the wide gulf between it and online leaders America Online and Yahoo. In the next three months, Microsoft will spend $40 million on TV, print and direct-mail advertising to elevate MSN’s image and offer discounts that include six months of free Internet access for consumers who sign up for MSN. Microsoft is borrowing a chapter from AOL, mailing more than 13 million MSN CDs to targeted consumers.

‘If I ruled the world’ artist Nas headlines Thursday’s Greek Freak 2000 concert at the Landmark Theatre.

By Andrew Parks

In a crowded market of emcees serving verbose rhymes over chunky beats to hip-hop heads, Nasir Jones — aka Nas — is a philosopher as well as a hard-core lyricist.

“It’s like every man’s dream, a thug poet,” Nas proclaims on his platinum-flavored single, “Nas Is Like.” It was a weighty but warranted boast, as critics and fans alike have given Nas the titles of “savior of rap” and “the new Aristotle” since the inception of his acclaimed debut album, 1994’s “Illmatic.”

The hip-hop star arrives Thursday night at the Landmark Theatre, 362 S. saliva St., as the featured act in Greek Freak 2000 to support his new release, “Nastradamus.”

Nas’s former partner in rhyme, Brooklyn-native Foxy Brown — who gained fame while freestyling over LL Cool J’s “1 Shot Ya” and has released two albums to date — and DJ “Let Me Clear My Throat” Kool will open the show.

This year’s Greek Freak — which begins at 8 p.m. — is the first time the concert will be held off campus, and is the first University Union-sponsored concert at a venue as large as the Landmark.

“This concert is very exciting because it is the biggest one we have ever produced,” said C.J. Strock, executive director of UU Concerts.

The move was necessitated by Nas’s large draw — the audience is expected to be

Carefree philosopher

She toasts The Daily Orange aside and tilts her head, letting her gaze fall on the mural in Shaw Dining Hall. She makes up little stories about the painting, because she’s eating alone and it amuses her imagination. She’s all of us.

That mural has been the topic of quite a few dinner conversations — no one seems to be able to decipher it. What does it all mean?

I’ve got some answers. The mural is the Village Fiesta by Jean Charlot, a painter during the Mexican renaissance of the 1920s and 1930s.

There are over 30 sculptures and murals on this campus. Most of the time, I don’t even notice them, but I have always wondered about that mural.

Charlot painted the mural on a visit to Syracuse University in 1960. It tells the story of the indigenous people struggling to preserve their culture within the Spanish political system.

The story begins at the left, before dawn, and a child is taking its first steps. As the eye moves across the mural, the scenes reveal the customs of everyday life. A mother cooks tortillas, women braid each other’s hair and a child plays with a rattle.

On the far right, a mother urges her daughter to celebrate in the dance of the Malinches at a festival. Malinches. The dance represents the conflict between the Spanish and Indian cultures.

Culture! In Syracuse! In my dining hall? In the midst of all the stale lettuce and cold pasta?

Who would have thought it?

The main attraction
The memorable cover of the "classic" LP — as stated by trusted hip-hop magazine, The Source, which gave it five out of five mics, a distinction only nine albums have received in its eleven-year pulp history — placed the face of a youthful Nas superimposed on the place of his upbringing, the Queensbridge projects of New York. It was on these rough streets that the roots of Nas' affinity for music were planted by his father, trumpeter Olu Dara.

Dara, who had played with Taj Mahal, Art Blakely and His Jazz Messengers and Bobby Womack during his career, would often bring a young Nas to the recording studio with him. "He never tried to push me into the music field, but he instilled into me the 'This is your world, do what you want with it' vibe," Nas said in a Source interview.

Run DMC
He eventually dropped out of high school to focus on the streets and his hip-hop dreams.

Nas first appeared on the scene as a head-spinning breaker named Kid Wave before landing a guest appearance in 1990 on the Main Source single "Live at the BBQ.

MC Serch, formerly of Judd Bass, was so impressed with the potential of the budding rapper that he gave him a spot on the track "Back to the Grill" and executive produced "Halftime," Nas' first solo single, for the Zebradome soundtrack.

After word of Nas spread, a deal was inked with Columbia Records, and "Illmatic" was released. Commercially, it was a disappointment, debuting at No. 11 on the Billboard charts before quickly disappearing. Critics, however, applauded Nas' fresh lyrical style supported by solid production from DJ Premier of Gangstarr on his ill-fated debut, Q-tip of A Tribe Called Quest.

"Nas imbues his chronicle with humanity and humor, not just hardness," The New York Times said. "He reports violence without celebrating it, dwelling on the way life triumphs over grim circumstances rather than the other way around." Nas' realistic, poetic street tales are evidence that he is a thinker, not just another wannabe thug.

The talented artist finally received mainstream acceptance two years later, in 1996, through his follow-up, "It Was Written." The Trackmasters gave a controversial pop touch on most of the tracks — which raised questions of "selling out" among critics — and his remake of Kurtis Blow's "If I Ruled the World" with Lauryn Hill and Wyclef Jean became an MTV Jams-approved hit.

The album went double platinum, again featuring terrific production work by talents like the Godfather of G-Funk, Dr. Dre and Havoc from Mobb Deep. Dr. Dre and Nas took their work on the album to another level in his talents like the Godfather of G-Funk, the Firm, for Dr.'s Aftermath.

The project introduced a new pseudonym to Nasir — Nas Ezzubar, based on the drug dealer. Nas was a partner in Mafia-tinged verses with the sultry Foxy, AZ and Nature. The strong rap quartet debuted in the Top 10 and went platinum.

Nas remained in the game for his third album and first No. 1 debut; 1999's "I Am." The Autobiography. Despite being well-done, it was overshadowed by Nas' clash with Bad Boy CEO Puff Daddy over the video "Hate Me Now.

The clip, which depicted the two rappers as Christ-like figures being crucified, was supposed to have a few objective scenes removed at Puff's request. When the original cut was still played on MTV's Total Request Live, Puffy became enraged and assaulted Nas' manager and Interscope employee, Steve Stoute. Consequently, the video was pulled from rotation, and the two eventually worked out their differences.

Just seven months after "I Am," Nas released "Nastradamus," originally intended to be a second disc packaged with "I Am." It is another album of joints made to please both the underground hip-hop purists and pop music connoisseurs.

Freshman information studies major Marcus Nathans is looking forward to seeing Nas in concert. To him, as to many others, Nas is more than an artist — he is an inspiration and a role model.

"I am the illest lyricist out there," Nathaniel said, a poster of his hip-hop hero hanging in his wall. "No one else can touch his flows. He's also intelligent, positive and a poet who tells it how it is."
Yesterday was different, maybe because it actually stopped raining long enough for me to raise my head and look around.

Right between Huntington Beard Crouse and Hinds Halls, there's a very provocative sculpture. I couldn't help thinking, what is that and why is it on the quad at my school?

Well, it's the "Dancing Mother," by Chaim Gross, and it's on the quad because Mr. and Mrs. Saul Rosen presented it as a gift to SU. The sculpture is a celebration of the ties between mother and child. Gross represents the power of the emotional bond in physical terms: the sculpture morphs the two figures into one form, never to be separated.

All right, so it's not soft porn after all. That lifts the mystery behind that sculpture. But that huge mosaic on the side of HBC is still a bit puzzling.

It's the "Passion" of Sacco and Vanzetti, two Italian immigrants who were arrested as suspects in a 1920 murder case in Boston. Although the men pleaded innocent and the case lacked substantive evidence, they were executed — despite cries of protest in London and Paris.

Their trial called into question the fundamental political and social aspects of American life — were they tried for the crime or for their anarchist, anti-war beliefs?

Sacco and Vanzetti are the two men in handcuffs in the center of the mosaic. A cluster of key political and legal figures in the case protest on the left. Framing the mosaic are fragments of one of Vanzetti's letters to his son.

Bits of glass and marble were pieced together in France by the artist, Ben Shahn, and then sent to Syracuse in sections where the mosaic was assembled.

Forgotten Goddess

Now you finally know what all those tour guides are talking about when you walk by a throng of starry-eyed pre-freshmen in an autumn Friday.

But I wonder if the tour guides know about this: On the second floor of Bird Library there is a statue of the Roman goddess of the hunt, Diana.

In the sculpture, Diana stands on a sphere, firing an arrow with dogs jumping at her feet. There's a big metallic spot on the dog's paw. Legend has it that, when the sculpture was in Carnegie Library, students would rub the dog's paw during exams hoping for some good luck.

There are a lot of little things, like the good luck story behind Diana, that I take for granted. And there's a lot of history on this campus that I am completely unaware of.

I'm always looking for new things to check out, play around with and discover. This campus can be so dreary, and, sometimes, the littlest things, like that...
His unique combination of size and speed is rare, but Morant knows what lies ahead in his quest to play for the Orangemen during his freshman year.

A battle should ensue to replace the departed Quinton Spotwood. Leading receiver Jeff Lowe and speedy Maurice Jackson return after a year at junior college.

But with hard off-season work, Morant said he should be able to compete for a starting job.

"We'll give Johnnie Morant a chance to play as a freshman," SU offensive coordinator George DeLeone said. "We made no promises to him. It all depends on him. He can learn the offense in time. We have good wide receivers now. We'll see if he can compete with the guys we have here now."

SU receivers coach Denise Goldman agrees with DeLeone and said Morant will have the opportunity to play, but must first prove himself.

"He never gets tackled," said Longo, now a battle over shorter corners. "I'm fast for my size," said Longo, now a one-on-one," said Longo, now a one-on-one, "because I'm fast for my size," said Longo, now a one-on-one. Assistant coach Johnnie Morant is working on his speed.

In addition to his post-reception running, Morant is working on his speed.

"His best asset is his ability to run the after the catch," in addition to his post-reception running, Morant is most notable for his extraordinary size.

"(I have) an advantage because I'm fast for my size," Morant said. "I can catch the ball over shorter corners. I can jump and get it. It makes it easier for the quarterback."

Glatzel solidifies defense

SU takes on in-state rival Colgate

BY JASON REMILLARD

The traveling road show known as Syracuse softball stays close to home tonight, as the Orangewomen play Colgate in their 30th and 31st consecutive games away from home.

In its final road contests before opening up the Softball Stadium at Skytop on Thursday against Binghamton, Syracuse (15-16) has the luxury of venturing about 40 miles to Hamilton. This is a welcome change from trips to Louisiana, Florida, Alabama and Illinois.

The two squads are not new to each other, though. The Orangewomen and Red Raiders played three times over the fall exhibition season.

Colgate (15-14) won the first meeting at its tournament on Sept. 18, while the teams split a doubleheader in Syracuse on Oct. 6.

"We're ready to go out there and play them again," freshman pitcher Tara DiMaggio said. "And hopefully we'll take two from them instead of just one."

The Red Raiders — like most of the teams the first-year SU program has faced this season — have some lofty credentials. Last season, Colgate made the NCAA Tournament after winning the Patriot League Championship.

John Glatzel admits last spring was not the most adventurous or exciting.

After all, he ditched his customary Syracuse lacrosse shorts and a ponytail for a piece suit. While his defensive end buddies spent their afternoons swinging their long poles and beating up opposing attackmen, he pounded a calculator and knocked around integers in his head.

Glatzel, suspended from the Orangemen last year after breaking into Manley Field House, spent the spring semester at home in Ellicott City, Md.

He took a business internship at ProgressNX Mortgage Services and said he focused on bettering himself — personally and on the lacrosse field.

Glatzel prioritized. He worked out. He cut back on his drinking. He lost weight and gained muscle definition.

"I needed to be ready to come back," Glatzel said. "I had something to prove. And I still have that mentality."

Looks like the work is paying off.

Mix one part tight end and two parts wide receiver and you get Syracuse football recruit Johnathan Morocco.

The 6-foot-5, 227-pound hybrid has the framework of a tight end. But, in the 40-yard dash and ability to catch the ball make him a prototypical wideout in the Randy Moss mold.

While playing at Paramus High School, he was a man among little children. Morant was a Parade All-American, and PrepStar rated him the best receiver in the East and third in the nation.

His senior year statistics of 28 catches for 784 yards with 10 touchdowns and a deep threat, but the numbers deceive, said his high school coach, Phil Longo.

Many of his TDs didn't come via the long ball. Instead, Morant broke a 10-yard pass play into a 60-yard score.

So long, Siena

Siena head basketball coach Paul Hewitt will soon leave New York and travel down south to replace legendary Bobby Cremins at Georgia Tech, ESPN.com's Andy Katz reported.

Yellow Jackets athletic director Dan Strawberry met with Hewitt and could announce the hiring as soon as Thursday.

Bragne was "blown away," and compared Hewitt to Siena's young Duke disciple Tommy Amaker, said former Southern Cal head coach George Raveling, under whom Hewitt worked.

Tuned out

While Florida lost 89-76 to Georgia on Monday night's NCAA Championship game, CBS took a loss of its own.

The pinnacle of March Madness drew a mere 14.1 for its national television rating, marking the lowest-rated championship game ever. This was down 18 percent from last year's previous low of 17.2.

The poor rating comes on the heels of CBS agreeing to a $6 billion, 11-year contract for the three-week NCAA Tournament.

Members criticize petitions against bill

“We didn’t take an oath to Jamal, or Chris Greiner or Jonathan Taylor. ‘Progress’ is a popular word but progress at the expense of the students is completely wrong.”

SGA Assemblyman

A closed Student Government Association meeting Wednesday aimed to ease division within the organization. But three Assembly members exited the SGA office after attending the meeting only brought more attacks.

President Jamal James said he hosted the meeting to discuss the lack of communication in the Assembly. James asked the press to leave the meeting after delivering a few opening remarks.

“Let me start off by saying that this meeting isn’t going to be a bitch session,” said James, a junior musical theater major. “The meeting is to clear up some things. It’s for us to really talk and get us at a place we can really accomplish a lot.”

Conflict arose in the Assembly with the proposal for little reason, given a student expressed the issue of racial profiling and prejudging people based on it. He later claimed a violation of his Constitutional rights when he was questioned for 30 minutes by police officers.

“We didn’t take an oath to Jamal, or Chris Greiner or Jonathan Taylor. ‘Progress’ is a popular word but progress at the expense of the students is completely wrong.”

LIVERPOOL — By mocking frivolous civil liberty disputes, Laurel Saiz of New York’s American Civil Liberties Union emphasized a recent and controversial debate — racial profiling.

Before introducing the union’s national executive director, Ira Glasser, at an awards assembly Wednesday night, Saiz read two scenarios of state residents claiming civil rights violations.

“A man is reported harboring a gun in a public and later claims a violation of Constitutional rights when he is denied the purchase of a handgun. A woman later said her rights were violated when an employer prevented her from lactating during a routine strip club performance.”

“I had no idea of the diversity in this job,” joked Saiz, the union’s executive director. “It’s true.”

But more importantly, Saiz said, are the recent cases involving a black Syracuse University student who was, for little reason, given a speeding ticket by police and had difficulty graduating because of it.

“The whole point of this is to help them for those who did not know what the meanings. The suspect informed the sophomores that a fellow resident said he could clean up the house in exchange for the bottle, he said. "If I had a minute, I could clean up the house in exchange for the bottle," the sophomore said he went to a police officer and got him to look into the matter, he added.

But the culprit is not the police officer, it is racial profiling, Glasser explained later.

“Statistics support that there is a profile, a belief that blacks are carrying drugs,” he said. “There isn’t any support to them carrying drugs, but it is made solely on the color of their skin.”

Glasser, national executive director since 1978, lashed out at racial profiling during his speech to about 200 union members in Le Moyne Manor. Profiling occurs when police single-out a certain race as being more criminally active — a practice thatsenors......
Gonzalez to arrive in U.S.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Elian Gonzalez’s father is due to arrive in Washington, helped by day with his infant son, launching the key international custody battle over the 6-year-old Cuban shipwreck victim in a dramatic new direction.

The father’s decision to travel, announced last night by his lawyer and after Juan Miguel Gonzalez agreed to come to the United States unaccompanied by the largeourage of Cuban children, professionals and government officials he and Cuban President Fidel Castro had originally insisted upon. The Immigration and Nationalization Service has said that once the father arrives, the INS would immediately begin the process of transferring custody to a his ineli itive relatives, who have defied President Clinton’s orders and refused to give up the boy. Talks between U.S. officials and the relatives broke off late Tuesday and are due to resume this morning.

“Thank you very deeply,” said attorney Gregory B. Craig said at a news conference last night that Juan Miguel Gonzalez, his wife and their infant son would arrive at Dulles International Airport at 5 a.m., accompanied by Fernando Remirez, the head of the Cuban Embassy in Washington.

The three are initially to meet at Remirez’s Bethesda home.

Craig had traveled to Ha

vanna in hopes of convincing his client and the Cuban government that the father should come to Washington sooner, rather than later, to claim custody of his son.

Survey reports

harassment spike

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The filing of sexual harassment charges by the first female chairman general of the Army is forcing many women in the U.S. military to consider that high rank is no protection against harassment and to question whether they can re port it without damaging their own careers.

Several earlier sex scandals of major scale have made clear that sexual harassment is widespread in the military. According to periodic Pentagon surveys, between 20 percent and 30 percent of women in uniform report that they were harassed in the previous year.

Nonetheless, consolation is rippling through the military as the disclosure last week that Gen. Claudius J. Kennedy, the chief of Army intelligence, had filed harassment charges against another general.

The Pentagon has not re vealed any more information about the male general accused of harassing Kennedy, and she declined to comment on her own case.

battle continues

LONDON — The legal battle played out that was initially bick erred as "the Holocaust on trial." In fact, has turned out to be "history on trial," as litigants argue over what historians should be allowed to write about World War II and each other.

Deborah Lipstadt, the American scholar who called the term "Holocaust denial" and who has made it her mission to combat the contention that the Holocaust did not happen sat in the Royal Courts of Justice.

At the other end stood David Irving, a British historian who has written widely on Holocaust history. If Irving is allowed to put out by leading publishers, has now been reduced to giving his work away on the Internet.

Taking advantage of British laws to defend his libel laws, Irving sued Lipstadt for describing him as "one of the most dangerous figures for Holocaust denial," Irving claims that the publishers have conspired against his career, causing publishers to tens of thousands of dollars in lost book royalties. A verdict is expected next week.

Syracuse University lobbyists appeal to federal and local interests.

It is a move that keeps Jim Boeheim on his toes.

An athlete agent solicits a player behind closed doors to market his athletic ability. The player, although not yet eligible to enter the professional basketball arena, considers the deal — a small fortune, a potential NBA contract and prestige.

But the athlete risks losing scholarships, awards and even his team’s ability to compete in the NCAA tournament, to an agent who may not have his best interests at heart.

So many bad things can happen," said Boeheim, coach of the Syracuse University men’s basketball team. "If a player signs a rider or accepts a deal from an agent, it can damage his eligibility.

When an athlete violates NCAA athlete agent rules in New York state, the only penalties suffered fall on the athlete and the university, leaving the agent untouched.

In a defensive move against illegal agent activities, SU is asking the New York state legislature to make it mandatory for all sports agents to register their activities with the state.

"I'm very anxious that they go ahead and pass the bill in New York state," said Ronald Cavanagh, vice president of undergraduate studies and chairman of the SU NCAA Committee Career Counseling Panel. "All other states and the country, except for New York state, have been circumventing NCAA regulations on that front."

New York state Sen. John DeFrancisco (R-Syracuse) and Assemblyman Michael Bragman (D-Syracuse) are introducing the bill.

The bill was introduced in the Senate last session but was not passed because legislators deemed it too harsh. It originally classified the offense not as a misdemeanor, but as a felony.

Cavanagh said he is "confident" that the legislature will pass the bill this time around.

"We would be naive to say that agents have not contacted students prior to their eligibility," SU Athletic Compliance Director Robert Mathner said. "When agents fail to register with the state, they face no repercussions when something goes wrong."

Several times a year, the SU Athletics Department organizes informational meetings with student-athletes to discuss athletic compliance rules, Mathner said.

In 1992, the SU basketball, wrestling and lacrosse teams faced NCAA penalties when it was discovered that the teams had violated regulations in regards to financial aid limitations and gifts.

As a result of the NCAA investigation, the basketball team was placed on a two-year probation and was prohibited from participating in that year’s NCAA tournament.

According to NCAA standards, a student-athlete can lose eligibility to participate in an intercollegiate sport if he or she makes a written or verbal agreement with an agent for the purposes of marketing their athletic ability.

"The NCAA is very supportive of uniform state laws referring to agents," NCAA Spokeswoman Jane Janowski said. "We encourage agent activities to have a uniform standard."

NCAA rules, however, do permit student athletes to be represented by a financial advisor who only acts as a money manager, Jankowski said.

Students who violate NCAA agent rules automatically lose all financial aid granted by the university, according to the NCAA rules.

"If a student were to sign a contract before eligibility is up, the school can be fined," said Elizabeth Reugge, SU director of state relations. "The championship title could be taken away. It's consumer protection for the students."

Although there have been no reported incidents of agent violations at SU, Cavanagh said the university was motivated to ask DeFrancisco and Bragman to initiate the bill last session

Pataki's proposed cuts were rejected by the legislature in previous years, Sparks said, causing him to believe this year's lobbying will be equally successful.

"Think I'll have a profound effect," he added.

But Pataki spokesman Charles Deister denied the claim that the governor wants college students struggling to finance their education.

"That can only be said by someone who is ignoring the governor's record," Deister said.

"The governor has always supported the TAP program." From 2000 to 2001, New York state will spend $576 million on need-based aid, which is more than double California's spending, he said.

Two years ago, New York state enacted a law that increased both SUNY and CUNY schools $3 billion to upgrade buildings, Deister said.

New York state has already invested $24.3 billion in improvements at the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry, according to a report from Pataki's office.

The projects included installing a new roof and greenhouse in Block Building, according to the report.

That led him to be surprised by Deister's statements.

"I'm not sure exactly what records he's talking of," Sparks said.

Under TAP

The commission on Independent Colleges and Universities, a non-governmental organization representing 100 New York state colleges, has also been trying to increase TAP grants to $5,000, said Terri Stansell-Koon, its director of communications.

The commission utilizes grassroots efforts to pressure legislators, including an online letter-writing campaign called sageny.org, said Stansell-Koon.

The commission has 25,000 e-mails advocating an increase in the maximum TAP grant to $5,000, from the $2,000 that was in the state budget, Bruno is optimistic that the increase will pass within a few weeks, said Mark Hansen, Bruno's spokesman.

University initiative

Although legislators missed the April 1 deadline to pass the state budget, Bruno is optimistic that the increase will pass within a few weeks, said Mark Hansen, Bruno's spokesman.

One program designed to make college more affordable is the SUNY and CUNY schools SUNY  and CUNY schools to earn an additional 10 percent award if they maintain at least a 3.5 GPA and engage in community service.

Although legislators missed the April 1 deadline to pass the state budget, Bruno is optimistic that the increase will pass within a few weeks, said Mark Hansen, Bruno's spokesman.

The university has raised over $60 million for scholarship money, he added.

John Demetra, whose son Andy is a freshman broadcast journalism major at SUNY, donated $5,000 to SU's general academic fund in the fall.

The reputation of the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications motivated his contribution, Demetra said. He added that he also wanted to give back to the school for accepting his son and giving him a merit scholarship.

Private citizens should fill in the gap for the decline in government funding for scholarships, Demetra said.

"If you can contribute, you should," he added.

Keeping up

The amount of financial aid dispersed by SUNY has increased about 5 percent every year for about 20 years to match the growing cost of tuition, said Christopher Walsh, vice director of financial aid.

SU allocated less than $200 million in scholarships in 1980, but will give out more than $450 million this year.

These figures were not adjusted for inflation.

More than 80 percent of SU students receive some type of financial assistance, Walsh said.

The university forms a partnership with students to help them pay for tuition, but students and their families also value education, Walsh said.

Paying for tuition is a combination of family resources and what the family is willing to sacrifice for an SU education, he added.

"We do whatever we can to make sure students get resources for school," Walsh said.

"There's more and more money available, but there's more and more need too."

pose of a bill to change the name of the organization to the Student Assembly and in- crease its role in campus event programming. Students will vote to implement the bill dur- ing a referendum April 11 through April 13.

It was passed by the As- sembly during the final min- utes of Monday night's meeting.

Some Assemblymen argued that the vote was inaccurate because James estimated the number of supporters and did not account for Adam Duffy's motion for a re- snult.

Duffy, a freshman political science major, argued with fellow Assemblymen Joe Sauer and Joni Weber for circu- lating petitions on campus op- posed to the bill.

They didn't like the fact that we didn't say we were going to make petitions," Duffy said. "They're blaming us for dealing with the issues."

The Assemblymen have collected about 500 signatures from students opposed to the bill, Duffy said.

Weber, a freshman political science major, added that the point of the meeting seemed to him to criticize the three As-semblymen for their activism. They made it to bicker at us," Weber said. "I see poor quality in the organization and in people's attitudes."

James declined to comment about the issues discussed at the meeting.

Duffy, a freshman biology major, said it was wrong for the other Assemblymen to criticize him for trying to reach out to the students. "Their argument was that we were being poor Assemblymen in relating everything to the students," Sauer said. "We felt so moved by something, we went to our constituents to oppose it."

SGA officers argued that problems with the bill should have been addressed within the organization before publicizing it to the students, and Weber. Keeping controversial is-issues contained, however, will not be his style in any body, she added.

"When a problem like this arises, sometimes I feel like SGA are the only people who know what's going on," Weber said. "That's why the students don't care."

Weber said that at the meeting she was unhappy about a comment he made that the student body does not care about the issues, including the bill passed Monday.

Students, however, do care about issues that they are informed about, Duffy said.

"The only good thing that came out of this was that the emphasis on the students was heightened," Duffy said. "Students do care."

Sauer said that he and his fellow Assemblymen, however, would not have been criticized for their advocacy if they were supporting the bill.

"We didn't take an oath to James or Greiner or Jonathan Taylor," Sauer said. "Pressure is a popular word, but process is the expense of the students is completely wrong," Sauer said.

Another recurring problem is the probability that members who have served multiple terms, including Parliamentarian Jonathan M. Taylor, tend to focus on the past, Weber said.

Duffy added that in addition to keeping students informed, the Assembly must con-consider how the decisions it makes today will affect students in the future.

"You need to look at the past, but not so much you can't get for about the future," Duffy said. "Issues like this are so big they're going to affect people for years to come."

Others criticized the Assemblymen for dis-ussing and passing the issues that should have contained contained in the Assembly, Weber said.

"Jamil said the more you talk to the D.O. the more and more you're going to be criticized," Weber said. "We can say whatever we want, I wish the students would pay more attention that there is on the SGA who may be abusing their power."

They want to leave their mark, but I don't know why they want to leave it like this."

east financial contributors to SU research is the National Health Science Foundation and the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, according to the SU Office of Sponsored Programs.

During the 1999 fiscal year, SU garnered $6.74 million from the National Health Science Foundation and $7.47 million from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

"Only a small percentage of proposals receive funding," said Kevin Carey, director of Sponsored Programs. "It's a completely competitive process."

From 1995 until last year, Walsh spent half of each year shearing SU research dollars to the national budget to lobby federal interests on behalf of the university while Congress was in session.

The rest of his time was spent raising funds for university research, scholarships and other priorities, he said.

Walsh described the role of a university lobbyist as a watchdog for threats and opportunities for the university. There are threats, he said, have the potential to damage SU, while the opportunities are endless and lend a hand to higher learning.

Walsh recalled two particularly beneficial and necestary for the legislative session. They set aside for the faculty development program to benefit its own interests, Roug ex said. "It's definitely a pool of money to go after," she added.

In its lobbying capacity, the university has hired three inde-dependent firms to serve as its lobbyists. For example, Rose-

Warring over Cuban boy shadows other issues

McCain throws support behind Giuliani, Bush

BY KATE STEVENSON
Ass. News Editer

After withdrawing his bid almost one month ago for the 2000 Republican presidential nomination, Arizona Sen. John McCain is back on the campaign trail.

Only this time he is campaigning for New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

"Part of it could be habit," Syracuse University College Republicans Chairman Joe Burns said. "He spent so long campaigning around the country, he might as well spend a little more time on it."

Giuliani, also a Republican, is running against first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton for the U.S. Senate seat for New York state.

"McCain did very very well in the Republican primaries," said Burns, a junior political science and history major. "He was a very popular individual among Democrats, Republicans and Independents on Long Island."

That popularity among Long Islanders is a great benefit to Giuliani's campaign, since the island is "a must-win area for Rudy Giuliani," he said.

College Republicans Secretary Gina DeRossi said McCain's popularity will help Giuliani win votes from non-Republicans.

A sizable number of McCain supporters are also Giuliani supporters, she added.

"I was a McCain supporter," DeRossi said. "There's no way I'd ever vote for Hillary."

While McCain was still in the primaries, however, Giuliani supported the senator's opponent Texas Gov. George W. Bush.

But that endorsement was one of coercion by New York state Gov. George E. Pataki, DeRossi said.

"I really kind of think it was the governor who pressured Giuliani into supporting Bush," said DeRossi, a senior public relations major.

Burns, however, said Pataki was not a factor in Giuliani's support for Bush.

"I don't think anyone pressures Rudy Giuliani," he said. "I don't think there's a human being in this world that tells Rudy Giuliani what to do."

McCain has also said that he will support Bush.

"I think he's just supporting the candidate that reflects more of his views, not all of his views," DeRossi said.

Like his influence in the Giuliani-Clinton contest, the fact that McCain's popularity crosses all party lines will also help Bush, Burns said.

"There are a good number of Americans who are very fond of John McCain and he certainly has the ability to attract Democrats and Independents to the Republican Party," Burns said. "That will definitely help George Bush on election day."

Some girl was like, 'You should welfare reform," said Valerie Luis, Lambda Pi Phi president.

class and we were talking about had similar stories to tell. We know about it. You're from the Bronx, you're Hispanic.'

Audience members and forum leaders discussed ways to combat such stereotyping — whether unintentional, used with malice, with ignorance of its meaning or used in a joke.

Ignorance of what some words mean can lead to "in-grained" patterns of behavior, said Michele Lee, Point Zero internal chairwoman.

"A lot of times people say things and they don't even know where it came from," Taylor added.

When people use a word they know to be derogatory, but still insert it into a joke, they should be confronted, several audience members said.

"I don't sit there," said Julianne Cooper, a member of Pride Union and a fifth-year animal biology major in the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry. "I won't listen to it, even if I'm not a part of that culture, that lifestyle."

Without education, the offending person will never shake his or her habits, Lee said.

"If you don't stand up and say that's wrong, they'll just go through the whole life thinking the same way," she said.

The way in which a person says "that's wrong," however, must be taken into consideration as to not to strain relationships, said Kemp-Delisser, a junior in newsaper and English and Textual Studies major.

"I think you have to be very careful telling people they can't say something," he said.

Allison Brown, a graduate student in television, radio and film, agreed.

"A lot of people forget you have to be diplomatic about it," Brown said. "If you stoop to their level, it's not going to help the situation."

Several audience members attributed ignorance or offensiveness to a person's upbringing.

But Leslie Grinner, a graduate student of cultural foundations of education, said she does not accept upbringing as an excuse for using offensive words.

"They want to be entitled to say racial, homophobic, any type of derogatory thing," said Grinner, a columnist for The Daily Orange. "They want to say it and not get called on it. They want to fall back on their background and upbringing to defend it."

Interpretation

"The line is very, very shady," Lee said. "It's hard to determine what is derogatory and what is not."

The relationship with the person using the derogatory word can determine its meaning, and therefore whether it should be taken with offense, said Nick Jean-Francois, a junior information studies major.

"If a skinhead called me a nigger, I'd be pretty sure he's not using that word to say something positive," he said.

Lee agreed with Jean-Francois, citing a friend's comfortable usage of the word "nigger" when among his friends.

"Words don't really have meaning in and of themselves," she said. "It's who uses the words.

It is offensive, however, when a white person says 'nigger,' since they do not have the history associated with the word, Grinner said.

"I'll see one or two white guys calling each other nigger. I mean, what do they know about it?" Grinner asked.

Jean-Francois said the race of the person using the words does not matter if they are using it as a term of endearment with a close friend. He said that if a close, white friend affectionately called him "nigger," he would feel comfortable with it.

The situation, therefore, dictates how people act and in what way actions are interpreted, he said.

"If I'm at home with friends, I curse," Jean-Francois said. "But if I was in a different arena, say at a job interview, I wouldn't be like 'Well, well shit,' you know? You know not to behave in certain ways. You tend to be a little more relaxed and tend to do things you wouldn't normally do in certain arenas."

Several audience members who were not as vocal in the discussion said they learned from others who had participated.

"It was really good because a lot of the people said what I feel inside," said Patrick Gialiella, president of Phi Sigma Beta honorary fraternity, co-sponsor of the event. "It's a really good program and I'd like to see it happen again."

Sophomore Karen Boltz agreed, but added that she wished the event had attracted more people.

"This was a good event, I just wish it could've been bigger," said Boltz, a policy studies major. "I'd really like to see how it would be, like a 'Words That Hurt' week, like an awareness thing."

"But for the first night of it, it went really well."

Risky business
Genetically engineered crops appear to be safe but the government should better coordinate how it regulates them to make sure they don't pose a danger to the environment or human health, a National Academy of Sciences report concluded Wednesday. The Environmental Protection Agency, the Food and Drug Administration and the Department of Agriculture should work more closely to make sure engineered crops are adequately tested and monitored, a panel appointed by the academy's National Research Council concluded. Scientists have begun splicing a variety of genes into crops, including genes that enable crops to produce their own pesticides.

Mixed results
Over the last two decades, epidemiological studies on hormone use and breast cancer have produced a mixed bag of results. Some studies have found no increased risk, while others have found a small increased risk. The recent studies from the National Cancer Institute and USC found a small increased risk, but one that accumulates over time. The USC study found that women on both estrogen and progesterone called combination therapy — had a higher increased risk of breast cancer than women who took estrogen alone.

Mom squad
It began with the image of preschoolers fleeing a gunman at the Jewish Community Center in Los Angeles' San Fernando Valley last summer. And it has evolved into the Million Mom March, a campaign by mothers from New Jersey to Hawaii to stage the largest rally in U.S. history in support of stronger gun laws. The name of the march — set for May 14, Mother's Day — is a bit of a misnomer. Organizers hope to draw at least 50,000 women to Washington. Other marches are planned in more than a dozen cities across the country.

Most injuries occur as a result of bending the sheet.
Some men will actually hear a CRACK, followed by intense pain.

A bruised ego isn't the only result of a night of sexual frustration.
Sex-related injuries, though rare, can put both partners in needless danger and blinding discomfort.
Roger McDaven, a Syracuse University sophomore in The College of Arts and Sciences, recalls late last fall when he and his girlfriend incurred some bumps in the night.

Under the sheets, a playful and provocative charade began and ended suddenly.
Throwing his back out in a violent fashion, his confused girlfriend tried to help, but fell off the bed frame trying to physically support Roger. A night of pleasure in the bedroom soon turned into an evening of painful remorse, he recalls.

"I threw my back out pretty bad that night, probably due to faulty positioning," he said. "I got a pretty bad dose of rug bum as well."

According to Thrive, an online sex and health magazine, expanding the boundaries of a relationship through different styles of lovemaking may be an active way of igniting an otherwise diminishing sex life.
"Include quickies, middle-of-the-road times, where both of you reach orgasm and leisurely sessions, a simple variation can make all the difference," Dr. Bernie Zilbergeld wrote in a Thrive article. "An abrupt change from missionary position to a fantasy role play won't work."

Partners should be cautious on how far their experimentation goes. Sometimes headaches, nausea and even fainting spells can result from experimentation.

‘Earworms’ cause songs to stick in listeners’ minds

As I slowly rise and toss the covers from my head in the morning, a refrain of pop music enter my ears and are instilled in my mind. While I’ve found that this may indeed be a more enjoyable way to wake up, the repetitions throughout the day are not always welcome.

Corey Hann

Health Sleuth

It’s time for all of us to be aware of the dangers that listening to the radio, particularly in one’s car, may present. A recent study conducted by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration found that listening to the radio, particularly loud music, can lead to discomfort for drivers.

Dr. William Hoyer of Syracuse University’s Psychology Department believes there should be an emphasis on classifying and understanding how the brain stores and replays music.

Dr. Robert Zatorre of McGill University and his team, one of the leading researchers in the field of “sticky songs,” has said that beyond being a phenomenon, earworms could be classified as a disease.

People with serious obsessions report being unable to get a certain idea, or visual image, out of their head, he said. He also related the disorder to schizophrenia, which can often experience auditory hallucinations without being able to distinguish between imagined and real sounds.

To answer the question why songs have this special characteristic of attaching to our mental lives, it is important to recognize the special properties of music that make it unique.

The sounds of the words, the melody, the rhythm — these are all the little pieces stored all over the brain.

Gogoci Opara, a freshman computer science major, said that getting a song stuck in her head doesn’t always involve one reason.

“Usually I’ll hear a familiar song playing on the radio, see an object that reminds me of a song,” she said. “The worst is when I’ll think of a catchy song and I can’t stand it and I’ll be there forever.”

Miserly loves company

Opara’s case is true of many sufferers. The different elements that create melodies are the culprits for embedding their sweet, and sometimes sour, sounds in our heads.

Mike McDonough, a junior broadcast journalism major and DJ at WJPZ-FM 89.1, said that although he’s around music all the time, he doesn’t find many songs sticking around in his head.

“If a song is stuck in my head, it’s usually when there’s no music around,” he said. “If it’s in a car, it’s usually something I probably like, so it’s not that bad.”

He also added that when he’s on the air, the distractions from the songs he’s preparing to play next interfere with possible “earworms.”

To remedy this problem, Zatorre recommends staying as far away as possible from “bad music.”

“If something seems to be annoying you, listen to other tunes,” he said. “You can’t imagine and hear music simultaneously.”

Opara agrees that good music is the way to go.

“I normally just play the songs like two times in a row to ease my mind,” she said. “Then I’ll wait some time, and maybe play it again.”

Headaches and fainting are a common experience that many students have discussed with me,” said Dr. Joseph Faneite, a professor in the College for Human Development.

“Most students were curious about such things happen.”

Headaches are the result of a combination of factors including dizziness and hyperventilation, according to the Journal of Sex Research.

Uncomfortable or unfamiliar positions are usually the culprits for such dizzy spells, though even staying in the same position for an extended period can cause similar results, the journal reported.

Andrew DeCourcy, a junior civil engineering major, said that sometimes staying in the same spot can cause other irritations as well.

“I usually find discomfort on the court of cramps and muscle strain,” he said.

"Lactic acid can collect in muscle cells and can cause similar results found in activities ranging from weight lifting to sex," Mangi reported.

To remedy this, Mangi recommends stretching extensively for physically draining activities with attention to the larger muscle groups such as the legs, chest and back.

"It's just like preparing for any sporting event," he said. "In order to perform on a high level and have excellent results, you need appropriate preparation."

Passionate moments

Painting during the heat of the moment, though it may seem like a good activity involving passionate moments, is usually the result of staying in the same position too long or lack of breathing, he said appropriately.

"It is the natural reaction to hyperventilation," according to Fowertone's Magazine's "Guide to Safer Sex."

The guide recommends not to worry if your partner is holding a sex pen."Stop the game, you hear your partner (confined) and have him or her lie down," the guide recommends. "This may be frightening, but there usually is really nothing to worry about."

Physical safety for both partners is essential to having a healthy sexual relationship. Beyond the risk of pregnancy and disease, other physical dangers such as choking, fainting and breathing can leave couples scarred.

Having sex without lubrication jelly can lead to discomfort for both partners, according to the Journal of Sexual Medicine. While males often report penicice chafing as a common complaint, the most prevalent problem is partner pain and discomfort, the journal reported.

In his book "Body Ballet," Dr. Ken Goldberg, M.D., board-certified urologist at George Washington University, said that the penis is very sensitive.

"The penis is an impressively durable organ," he said. "With reasonable care, it can be worked dependably throughout life."

Goldberg said that the penis is not immune to danger though. "Most injuries occur as a result of becoming the erect penis," he said. "Some men will actually hear a crack, followed by intense pain."

Goldberg recommends using common sense, utilizing lubricants and being cautious about using acrobatic positions. He added that touching it, "like a fine is an irresponsible way of treating it and one should see a doctor immediately."

Female endurance

On the female side of the issue, the effects of vaginal dryness have been inescapable and potentially scary results.

Several factors, including changes in vaginal pH and added pressure can cause dryness. More important, dryness can lead to frequent condon breakage and unwanted pregnancy, according to the Reproductive Health Outlook Organization.

Fulci said that because of privacy concerns, students do not always immediately report sore-related injuries in his well-known human sexuality class.

"I think it depends on how chronic the issue is," he said. "Sometimes students are more comfortable with going directly to their physician than a professor and report it later."

Though students may be bashful about the issue, sexual injuries can be "a real issue" that is deeply rooted in society.

According to the Journal of Legal Medicine, 6 percent of women and 10.2 percent of men aged 18 to 20 students report a wide type of sex-related injury during their lifetime.

Women reported such injuries included swelling, cuts, scratches and bruises as the most common complaints, according to the study. Men reported their most common injury as bruising and "bending."

With All-American Ryan Powell at the helm and young scorers Banks and Mike Springer waiting for an opportunity, it's tough for close defenses to stop the SU attack.

Throw midfielders Matt Caione and Josh Coffman into the mix, and you get five players who have scored more than 10 points this season. "Our execution is getting better," Springer said. "I haven't done a lot of the things that I should be doing. But as a whole, I don't really see any weaknesses."...

The senior from Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, has some full circle at Syracuse.

When she was a freshmen, she walked on. Now, Lai is the team's top singles player and boasts a 40-19 record this year.

Her tennis career started at the age of 9, when she began playing in Thailand. The game started out as just a hobby, but by the time she was 15 years old, Lai played in the most competitive tournaments by, but by the time she was 15 years old, Lai played in the most competitive tournaments she could find.

When in high school, Lai posted a four-year record of 40-4 and was a three-time team MVP. Besides succeeding in the tennis court, she also earned softball and volleyball MVP honors.

"When I hit my senior year, I decided to concentrate on tennis," Lai said. "It was the one sport that I knew I had a chance to play at the next level."

She earned a spot on Malaysia's team for the South East Asian Games last summer and left with a bronze medal.

Without her precious time at SU, though, Lai's game might not have improved enough to allow her to represent her country.

Since arriving at Syracuse, Lai's ability has improved greatly, said coach Mac Gifford. This can be attributed to her hard work, which makes her one of the most athletic and quickest players on the team.

Lai said that her strongest training comes from her interest in the top performers of other sports. She admires and mimics the workouts of track stars Michael Johnson and Marion Jones. This intensity is her best attribute, Lai said.

"I wouldn't really call them role models," she said. "They are more like inspirational models. They are the best at what they do, and that is why I try to model my hard work after them."

Lai's hard work has elevated her to the level of team captain this year.

Her role as captain allows her to lead by example, Lai said. She hopes the younger players will follow her lead.

If the rest of the Orangewomen continue to do so, it could pay off in this year's Big East Tournament, which begins April 20. In the mean time, Lai and the Orange hope to sweep the Bearcats, knowing that for the first time in months, a partisan crowd wearing blue and orange will be in the stands.

"We've been waiting to play in front of our friends and family and have people come see us play," Herrman said. After nearly two months of traveling to places like Tuscaloosa, Ala., and Clearwater, Fla., the Orangewomen finally get to spend their first weekend on the Hill since February.

"It's going to be nice actually staying here and not have to worry about getting on the bus," Hansen said. "We don't have to stay in hotels and can get a good night's sleep."

But to let dreams of Syracuse athletic greatness end with Michigan State's runaway tournament victory against SU would insult the sport that has experienced unparalleled success.

After all, the Syracuse lacrosse program is the only sports team in the Salt City that can lay claim to contending for the national championship every season. Players from West Genesee to the West coast flock to SU in search of the game's Holy Grail, knowing that the Orange men will always be in the hunt for it.

Syracuse has made 17 consecutive trips to the Final Four and won five more national championships than basketball (zero) and football (none) have combined.

Some sacrifice playing time to be part of it all. Syracuse's midfield runs three solid lines deep. Players on the third line could start for other squads but instead come to the Hill to part of something that runs deeper.

Legendary head coach Dick Knight, now Ray Simmons Jr. retired before the beginning of last season, and the team barely skipped a beat. New head coach John Desko guided the Orangemen to a 12-5 season and the national championship game, where they lost to Virginia 12-10.

SU lacrosse players are big, athletic and funny to boot. Each game they deliver show-stopping hits. The game is played at a fast pace.

It's fun to watch.

With its storied program and national prominence, it would be tough for the fair-weather fan to lose interest with the lacrosse team like they do when SU football and basketball start their annual tailspin.

When Syracuse hoops was 19-0, everybody wore their "Real Men Wear Orange" T-shirt. In the 7-6 season-ending stretch, the shirts got tossed into the back of their closets.

First, people complained SU couldn't get the ball to center Etan Thomas. Then the Orangemen weren't trying hard enough. When worse came to worse, everybody's favorite scapegoat was Ryan Blackwell.

The football season went the same route, as a 5-1 start turned into a less-than-stellar campaign. The students lost interest in football games faster than they did in biology lecture. But what if the Syracuse basketball team made it to five straight Final Fours, let alone 17?

There wouldn't be an empty seat in the Dome. They would set up a waiting list to get season tickets. Basketball fans would suddenly pop out of the woodwork.

With McNabb at the helm of its 1999 run to the Orange Bowl, Syracuse football gained more popularity. But a 7-5 record in the first year of post-McNabb era was enough to leave fans grumbling.

Perhaps people forget SU has three major sports. What makes the phenomenon even more peculiar is the fact that the forgotten team, lacrosse, is the most dominant.

The squad plays for the national championship every single season. When SU advances to the Final Four, the players don't cut apart the nets or even crack a smile.

It's expected.

So next time you're crying in your cookies because Syracuse didn't make a New Year's Day bowl game, or you're losing sleep because Jason Hart's career is over, remember: There is another alternative.

Lacrosse provides security in a Syracuse sports landscape that shows flashes of brilliance but otherwise disappoints with regularity.

No. 3 Loyola comes to town Friday night and will face SU in a battle that features two undefeated teams. Come and discover the extra three months of Syracuse athletics that aren't winter anymore. The grass on the quad is green.

Despite its Sweet 16 performance, Syracuse basketball is done, and if you're looking for football on the Carrier Dome carpet, you'll have to wait until September.

But for now, SU lax is on top of the mountain. And don't worry, the game will be over by 11 p.m. on Friday, 44's will still be open.

The return bolsters Syracuse attack

Healy's return bolsters Syracuse attack

BY KEVIN LEITZELL

Staff Writer

Katrina Hable compared her to a freight train.

Syracuse looks stronger this year with Karen Healy back. The junior attacker has 16 goals and 12 assists this year. "That's my style of play," Healy said. "I just go and if you're in my way, that's your bad and not hers."

She tops the team with 16 goals and leads the Orangewomen (4-3) in scoring. Cazenovia's Nicole Adams, who leads the nation with 23 goals, is an intimator for the defense.

"She has no mercy," goalkeeper Clothilde Ewing said. "If you're in her way, that's your bad and not hers. She goes out there with all the confidence in the world."

During the team's inaugural season in 1998, Healy anchored the Orangewomen defense with fellow junior Erin Boyle. Healy was a second-team All-American and Regional All-American and lit up on the field. "I was waiting for her to hang her stick up," Healy said. "I saw it. I got going, it's hard to get around me. I catch people off-guard. Once I get going, it's hard to stop me."

Healy came to Syracuse with an impressive high school record. She was a two-time All-American at Freeport High School, scoring 54 goals and 12 assists while leading Freeport to a 10-1-1 record in 1997.

While she played defense during her freshman season at SU, her numbers this year are starting to resemble the high school statistics. Healy credits her scoring touch this season to that aggressive, locomotive-like approach to lacrosse.

"That's my style of play," Healy said. "I just go and if you're in my way, that's it."

Healy's return bolsters Syracuse attack.

Trying to stop the Syracuse attack unit is like playing roulette — place a bet on one lucky number, and pray it works out.

Ever wonder why casinos in Las Vegas are so grand? The wheel doesn't stop on the lucky number too often.

Unlucky defenses continue to lose their money, as a young Syracuse squad that lacks an established combination like in previous years continues to put the ball in the net.

"It's shot selection," sophomore Liam Banks said. "I don't think anybody's being greedy. We're playing as a team. When somebody scores, it's not really a matter of whose scores. It's our whole that team scores.

We have our goals set for the end of the year, and I think everybody knows that individual stats aren't really better.

Opposing defenders know those goals and have trouble catching sleep before contests with the vaunted Orangemen attack.

Orangewomen open new stadium today

BY JASON REMILLARD

Staff Writer

There have been no games at the Softball Stadium at Skytop since the Syracuse Orangewomen wrapped up their fall exhibition schedule in October. The Stadium, which has practiced on it in preparation for this afternoon, will be the Skytop field for official competition in a 3 p.m. doubleheader against Binghamton.

The team got a reprieve from playing its 20th and 21st consecutive games away from The Hill on Wednesday, as a scheduled doubleheader at Colgate was snowed out.

"We wanted to play," freshman first baseman Leah Hansen said. "It's always better than practicing. We played them in the fall and had some good games against them."

Lai rises in national polls

Shareen Lai became more than a name in the 1998 Big East Tournament. She entered the conference tennis championship unranked and unheralded as she and everyone knew she was.

Lai defeated the No. 66 singles player in the country, Boston College's Cynthia Taw, giving Syracuse a 4-0 match victory. Lai then went 5-0 at the tournament (3-0 singles, 2-0 doubles) and was named its Most Outstanding Performer.

Since then, the Syracuse senior slowly has worked her way into the national rankings. Last week's Intercollegiate Tennis Association national poll ranked Lai the 78th best singles player in the country.

"Being nationally ranked was one of the goals I set for myself," Lai said. "Each year I try to progress, and this year I have had the confidence that I need to play well."

Lai said playing nationally ranked opponents last year helped her progress physically as well as mentally. This year, she has been beating the opponents she could only

VPA design professor dies at 65

Staff Reports

John Sellers, professor of advertising design and visual communications at the College of Visual and Performing Arts, died Tuesday at the age of 65.

Sellers came to Syracuse University in 1969 and was an integral part of the department of visual communications at VPA, said Paul Weichselbaum, director of the School of Visual and Performing Arts.

"He was always a very giving, very caring person," Dacey said. "He basically took me under his wing and mentored me. He showed me how to be a great teacher and a great person, which he led by example."

In addition to the new bills,
Record label owner discusses use of MP3s

BY CAROLINE CHEN
Staff Writer

MP3s will give well-known musicians leverage with recording labels by giving independent labels opportunities to showcase musicians, said Bruce Freeman, a Syracuse University doctoral student in public communications. Freeman is a former production director at the local radio station Fox FM-107.9. His label, Blue Duck Records, was the first record label for the folk rock band Rustled Rest.

During a lecture Thursday night, he played two versions — one an MP3 and one a CD copy — of Jennifer Lopez’s “Waiting For Tonight” and asked the 24 students in the audience which one they preferred.

Most consumers, he said, cannot tell the difference between sound on a CD and an MP3.

MP3s are a file format that allows music to be encoded, compressed and transmitted through the Internet. These music files can be freely downloaded off the Internet because they are not encrypted and do not have traceable digital codes called watermarks.

The Internet will have an increasingly bigger piece of music distribution, creating a shift in the balance of power from the recording label to the artist, Freeman said.

Musicians can get more exposure when they post their work on the Internet in MP3 format for downloading and independent labels can reach larger markets, he said.

Recording artists will use the Internet to increase their leverage, Freeman said. Well-known artists such as David Bowie have been able to exploit this new medium successfully, he added.

There are an estimated 1 million to 2 million songs downloaded daily from the Internet worldwide, Freeman said. The Recording Industry Association of America estimates that 18 to 20 percent of music in the United States is pirated, he added.

But within three to four years, the music industry will have control over digital distribution, Freeman said.

The recording companies can put a watermark on CDs to prevent unauthorized distribution, he said. While other people in the industry have suggested installing viruses in songs to prevent the songs from being copied — or “ripped” — Freeman dismissed that option as too harsh.

Although technologically-savvy individuals will always be able to break security codes, the point is to build a “fence” high enough so that the average person will not climb it, he said.

But record labels can profit by putting promotional MP3s on the Internet, Freeman said.

He said he will try to launch Blue Duck Records on the Internet this summer. By provoking interest in the artist, the record label can later profit from the same recognition, he added.

In the long run, labels can profit from more name recognition and keep the consumer satisfied, Freeman said.

“It’s a win-win situation,” he said.

Covering tracks

Freeman, who said he has 200 to 300 MP3s, said he rationalized the ethics of downloading MP3s by saying he could get them free anyway from his work at a radio station.

Freeman searched for and downloaded a song by R&B artist Macy Gray as an example during his presentation.

“It’s that simple,” Freeman said. “If everyone had this capability, the music industry would be dead tomorrow.”

MP3 users should set up a proxy or use an anonymizer site before downloading music files to prevent the industry scouts from tracking them down, Freeman said. He recommended two sites — www.earthproxy.com and www.anonymizer.com — to help users take advantage of these technologies.

To avoid the risk associated with the high profile MP3-sharing service Napster, Freeman said he takes only a few files from various independent Web sites to avoid leaving a trail.

While he does not condone illegal “ripping,” Freeman said he offered the information to tailor his presentation to the audience’s interests.

“For the time being, have fun and experiment,” Freeman said.

Adam Davidowitz, a sophomore music industry major, said he attended the presentation to find out about the industry from the perspective of someone who is in it.

“I went to keep up to date with the things that were happening,” he said.

As a consumer, Davidowitz said he enjoys the availability of MP3s.

“For the artists, it’s horrible because they’re losing a lot of money,” he added. “But when CDs are like $16, it just pays to download it for free.”
Nordstrom CEO outlines growth strategy

BY MAGIN MCKENNA
Asst. Lifestyle Editor

As the final speaker in the College for Human Development's Sue Ann Genet Lecture Series, John Whitacre admitted Thursday he had a few tough acts to follow.

"When I found out that Martha Stewart was here last time, I almost wet my pants," said Whitacre, the Chief Executive Officer of Nordstrom, Inc., to about 150 students seated in Slocum Hall's Genet Auditorium.

"I thought 'How am I going to compete with that?'" Whitacre said.

Whitacre was invited to campus to explain how Nordstrom has joined the ranks of the most quickly growing specialty retailers in the United States, beating the competition in a market dominated by major department stores, he said.

Kurtis Bakke, retailing department chairwoman and a native of Seattle.

"We want to become a world-class organization," Whitacre said. "I am a very competitive person. I like to win."

Whitacre was invited to campus by his top staff members. Executive Vice President Len Kuntz, Northwest Regional Manager Stephen Fitch and Bloomingdale's.

"I was pretty shocked to find such a high-quality people," said Whitacre, who last visited SU two years ago. "You have such an interest in retail here."

Changing face
Nordstrom opened first as a shoe store in 1901.

In 1999, the company amassed $5.1 billion and is now one of the nation's leading specialty retailers, with 105 stores in 20 states, Whitacre said.

In the past decade, it has launched an extensive national expansion and advertising campaign to reinvent its more formal image - characterized by the store's Steinway pianists and their black tie attire in the 1980s, he added.

"In the 1980s, we were the darlings of Wall Street," Kuntz said, taking the podium after Whitacre. "But the 1990s came and we didn't change."

By the beginning of the 1990s, Nordstrom faced challenges from major department stores like Macy's and Bloomingdale's, both of whom had made a successful transition into the next decade.

The company commissioned a Minnesota-based advertising firm to give it a medical "physical," of sorts, Kuntz said.

"What the firm found, however, was nothing Nordstrom did not already know," he added. "They told us we were doting," Kuntz said. "We looked like we were still stuck in the 1960s." Kuntz credited the company's new makeover to a series of television and print advertising campaigns that all delivered a single message: "Reinvent yourself."

The campaign cost the company about $100 million, he said. "There's a tremendous commitment to service in Nordstrom," Bakke said. "We're not used to that kind of service and it's their corporate philosophy."

"There's a high level and interest to listen," Whitacre said. "It's the opposite of stodgy and boring."

One of Nordstrom's greatest appeals is its "no questions asked" return policy that allows customers to return any purchase with no restrictions, said Stephanie Jones, a freshman fashion design major.

"People always joke about returning things to the store that it doesn't even sell," she said.

Nordstrom currently has the largest shoe selection of any specialty store in the world, Whitacre said.

Last summer, the company launched its Web site www.nordstrom.com, where merchandise may be bought online, he added.

"There is a division now between the old economy and the new economy," Whitacre said of the new trend of online commerce in retail, "You're going to see a slow death of many retailers."

Nordstrom has just expanded two of its name brands to the Japanese market, he said.

Finding heart
Although Whitacre graduated from the University of Washington with degrees in English literature and history, he said he was more attracted at that time to a career in retail. Whitacre joined Nordstrom in 1976 as a shoe salesperson.

"With both his father and grandfather working as a doctor, Whitacre said, taking the podium after Whitacre. "But the 1990s came and we didn't change."

Whitacre eventually worked his way up the corporate ladder and became CEO of Nordstrom in 1996.

"Throughout the lecture he repeatedly encouraged students to find their passion and commit their lives to it. "There are so many people who abandon their dreams," he said. "They are out for the materialism and they go for a job that is not aligned with the goals in their hearts."

"But if you do what you love, the money will follow."

Students plan circus protest

BY TIFFANY LANKES
Asst. News Editor

The Shrine Circus is coming to town and so are protesters from the Student Animal Rights Organization.

The group met Thursday night to plan their weekendlong protests of the circus at the New York State Fairgrounds. SARO will be joined by members of the Student Environmental Action Coalition and the Student Coalition On Organized Labor.

"Basically, why we're doing this is because there's a lot of circuses that continue to use animals that wouldn't normally be entertainment for people," said SARC President Josh Katcher, a freshman film major. "These are exotic animals that belong in their normal environment."

SARO's protesters oppose the methods used to train animals in the circus industry, Katcher said.

Many circuses train their "entertainers" using electric shocks, meat hooks and food deprivation, he added.

"These animals are being made to perform stunts that continue to use animals that wouldn't normally be entertainment for people," said SARC President Josh Katcher, a freshman film major. "These are exotic animals that belong in their normal environment."

SARO's protesters oppose the methods used to train animals in the circus industry, Katcher said.

"They don't realize all the stuff the animals have to go through," said Katcher.

Many people are not aware of the way circus animals are treated, said Kat Schaffer, a sophomore photography major. "There are common misconceptions about circus activities, she added.

"It's just rebellion against the way we are treated," Katcher said.

Many circuses, including the Cirque du Soleil, operate successfully without the use of animals for entertainment, he added.

"Animals aren't ours," Cline said. "It's not appropriate for us to use them for entertainment."

"Many people are not aware of the way circus animals are treated," said Katcher.

Katcher agreed that many of the staples animals are forced to do are extreme. He added that those attending a circus need to question whether the pain inflicted on the animals leads to worthwhile entertainment.

The protesters said they plan some opposition from those attending the circus this weekend. Since the circus is traditionally "a family event," many children will witness the protests, Katcher said.

"Parents get defensive," he said. "They think because we're protesting it gives them an excuse to act out at us. Our message is just that we're unhappy with the way these animals are treated."
The vote that was conducted at the previous meeting was inconsistent for many reasons," said Sauer, a biology major.

"The presiding officer interrupted the vote's outcome," Taylor, a fifth-year architecture student, said. "As a voting member of the Assembly, however, offered none, he added.

"They are either lying about this or trying to pull something over me. I don't buy that. You're trying to find a way through the back door and that's inappropriate," Taylor referenced Robert's Rules of Order, the laws by which SGA operates, in defense of the bill.

The rules, however, have often been manipulated in the past to conform to the Assembly's ruling, Sauer said.

The freshman argued that the rules were being used as a tactic to cover the problems they addressed.

"As we are freshmen, we don't know everything," said Weber, a freshman political science major. "We don't know every single rule. All we know is we wanted to call a division, and we didn't get it."

Taylor admitted that even though he had read through Robert's Rules three times, he is still not familiar with them in their entirety.

"This isn't a professional association. These are students trying to work out what students want."

SGA passed the NYPiRG bill March 20 to conduct the vote without informing the group that the issue would be addressed by the Assembly.

About 30 members later attended the March 27 Assembly meeting to request that SGA rescind the bill authorizing the vote.

The Assembly, however, voted to uphold the referendum. "We don't know every single rule. All we know is we wanted to call a division, and we didn't get it."

For more than 20 years, the group has received its funding directly through a referendum vote conducted every four years. This agreement was slated in the 1970s in a contract between SGA and NYPiRG.

"We're certainly not afraid of a referendum," McGuinness-Hickey said. "It just sounds like you're trying to do too many things at once."

At the chair's discretion it was done by a voice-vote," Taylor said. "As a voting member of the Assembly I do not see a problem with that.

"The group had to cancel its planned programming for the upcoming World Poverty Week because of the focus being directed toward the referendum, she added.

"McGuinness-Hickey, a NYPiRG worker, argued that SGA was manipulating the vote by eliminating voting places in the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry and the Schine Student Center.

"We're not going to try to pull something, Taylor said. "All of this indicates that SGA is not prepared to hold a referendum."

"The freshmen argued that the group should not be worried about the vote if it is well-known entity among the student body, as its supporters say.

Assemblyman Charles Skinner, a senior political science major, agreed that the director of the Board of Elections, Matt Oates, has not kept up to date on the issue.

As far as I know, he's been taking a very laid-back attitude toward the referendum," Skinner said.

The scheduled vote has already affected NYPiRG's operations, McGuiness-Hickey said. The group had to cancel its planned programming for the upcoming World Poverty Week because of the focus being directed toward the referendum, she added.

"The group should not be worried about the vote if it is a well-known entity among the student body, as its supporters say.

"We're certainly not afraid of a referendum," McGuiness-Hickey said. "It just sounds like you're trying to do too many things at once."

Mock trial team advances in national meet

By Adam Giagni

Opening arguments began Friday in a murder case involving two best friends and eight Syracuse University student lawyers.

The trial spanned two days of witness examinations and legal maneuvering, ending in a verdict that caused no tears or violent outbursts, but simply confirmed the ability of the legal team — the SU Mock Trial Team.

In their first year of competition, the team placed 14th in their division at the national tournament that hosted this false trial last weekend at Hamlin University in St. Paul, Minn.

"It's very rare for a first-year team to even go to the national tournament," said Adam Detak, a first-year law student and assistant coach. "We were able to take home a trophy."

This year's tournament consisted of 48 teams of six to eight advocates and witnesses. Each team competed in four, three-hour rounds of litigation during the tournament, he said.

The team, consisting of three lawyers, conducted direct and cross-examinations of students about trial procedures, and recruited enough students to establish a team, a three-credit mock trial class open to all undergraduates was formed this year, Jolley said.

The program was funded by and incorporated into the Center for Undergraduate Research and Innovative Learning.

As part of the CURIL program, the Mock Trial Team competes in annual competitions sponsored by the National Mock Trial Association, according to CURIL.

The yearlong course allows team members to participate during the full semester and compete in the spring, according to CURIL.

Kevin Kuehner, a recent SU law school graduate, was recued by Pilgrim as both team coach and course instructor. Third-year law student David Harrigan and second-year law student Jean Marie Westlake joined Detak as the team's assistant coaches.

"I really couldn't have been happier, as we were finally able to go to competitions and put all of our hard work to use," Jolley said.

While competition was the team's driving goal, Kuehner came to the program to educate students about trial procedures.

"My goal was to familiarize them with the rules of trial advocacy," Kuehner said. "I wanted them to be able to walk into a court and try a case."

The team's performance in both competition and practice of Kuehner's student trial and the successful management of the legal field, he said.

"Some of them could try a case right out of school," said Kuehner. "All of them have learned the valuable legal skills of persuasion."

Kuehner said he did not begin the year expecting to lead his team to the national tournament. Instead his plan was to prepare them for the regional competition, he said.

"Considering that this was their first year, I didn't have high expectations," Kuehner said. "I was pleasantly surprised at the students' dedication and hard work."

Most team members disagree with Kuehner on the source of their success, pointing to their coach's leadership and vast legal knowledge as reasons for their strong performances.

"All of our coaches are really knowledgeable about the law," said Meghan Bashaar, a freshman English and Textual Studies major. "The praise for our success should only go to them."

Bashaar, who has served on mock trial teams for the past five years while attending his high school, wants to build on this success and participate in the annual tournament in Des Moines, Iowa, she said.

"If we had another goal it is to go to Des Moines," Bashaar said. "We didn't know that we could end up with a good shot at winning it all."

Team captain David Buruma shares Bashaar's goal and that it makes for being two of students to the Iowa tournament next year.

"I think going to Des Moines definitely gave me a glimpse into the legal world," Bashaar said. "We didn't know what to expect when we went to Minnesota. It was a high goal and we were able to reach it."

There were about 900 cases of murder and manslaughter in New York state during 1998, according to the FBI Uniform Crime Report.

According to literature provided by the Syracuse University News Service, the number of murder and non-negligent manslaughter was down 7.1 percent in 1998 from 1997, while firearms remained the leading weapon used in these offenses.

Total offenses:
- New York state: 924
- Onondaga, Cayuga, Madison, Onondaga and Oswego counties: 21
- City of Syracuse: 12

Types of Weapons Used (Northeastern states, including New York):
- Firearms: 58.5 percent
- Knives or cutting instruments: 16.7 percent
- Unknown or other dangerous weapons: 14.4 percent
- Personal weapons (hands, fist, feet, etc.): 10.4 percent

Project SAFE

Project SAFE aims to pursue gun criminals in the court that will give them the harshest punishment, whether that court is state or federal, Weiss explained. The project involves those attorneys involved with the project are examining several states and the state attorney's office.

Those attorneys meet weekly and study all gun-related violations in Onondaga County for that week, Weiss said. They then determine which office should prosecute the case, based on the violation’s prior record and where they find best chance of conviction and punishment, he added.

Richard Southwick, assistant U.S. attorney and one of the lawyers involved in Project SAFE, said the cooperation will lead to more effective handling of gun-related crimes throughout the county. All those involved with the project are hopeful that the increased efficiency will cause a significant drop in all gun-related crimes — not just murder — in the county and throughout the state, he added.

New York state had more than 20,000 cases of gun-related crimes in 1998 according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics. The main thrust of the program is to see if we can beef up enforcement, Southwick said. “There’s a feeling from people both inside and outside government that gun crimes need to be dealt with very seriously.”

While gun laws between state and federal courts are similar, there are often instances when a conviction violates the laws on the books on the federal level, but not in state courts, Weiss said.

SAFE allows attorneys to identify those cases and ensure that offenders will be charged with offenses under both the state and federal laws, even though local authorities may have arrested that person, he explained.

One example of such a situation is when local police find ammunition during a drug bust, but no guns, Southwick said. The state only has laws that allow gun crime prosecution only if police find a gun in the area, he said.

“We’re told all the time by law enforcement officers that when they do narcotics busts that they often find narcotics and announce it, but there’s a gun around somewhere, but it just might not be in the vicinity and they can’t find it,” Southwick said. “The state has no provision to prosecute that offense.”

“But we do.”

Moving a case to federal court from the state’s jurisdiction is not always the best option, however, he added.

“Often times you can move a case through quicker on the state level,” he said. “We’ve decided we’re going to work very closely together. It just makes sense.”

Project SAFE’s first case came Tuesday with the transfer of a Syracuse man from state court to federal court on charges of criminal possession of a weapon, Weiss said. He will now face stiffer penalties if convicted, he added.

The two offices working on the project are examining several more cases and are planning more transfers in the coming weeks and months, Weiss said. The offices began implementing the project about two weeks ago after they received word of how successful it has been on a national program called Project Exile.

The National Rifle Association endorses Exile, which is running successfully in several cities across the country including Philadelphia, Pa., and Rochester, according to Schumer’s office.

“The criminal element doesn’t have a community and they do have a network,” Weiss said. The world’s going to get a sense that Syracuse would be one of 15 cities to receive funding for the project, which is based on a national program called Project Exile.

“There’s a feeling from people that Syracuse would be one of the beneficiaries of that program,” Southwick said. “The state has a reputation for really hard on those committing violent acts. This is state or federal, Weiss explained. The project involves those attorneys involved with the project are examining several states and the state attorney’s office.

Clothes contracts stir fight

SU's position on athletic apparel contracts:

As a responsible member of the academic community, Syracuse University shares a concern with our fellow institutions of higher education across the country about the conditions faced by — and wages paid to — employees of non-U.S. manufacturing facilities that produce collegiate licensed apparel and footwear. That concern is exemplified by Syracuse University's membership in the Fair Labor Association, a nonprofit organization established to protect the rights of workers and wearers. The FLA involves major apparel manufacturers, non-governmental organizations, and 134 colleges and universities. In recent months, another organization, the Worker Rights Consortium, has come to our attention. The WRC, an NPO regulated by United Nations and its allies, has approached Syracuse University and our fellow colleges and universities about resigning from the FLA and joining the WRC. The University has included a student representative on the FLA's board, and the board will continue to listen to students in formulating its recommendations.

Sweatshops provide necessary option to poverty-stricken lifestyle

To the Editor:

The self-righteous people on this campus and elsewhere who denounce the so-called sweatshops as immoral simply don't know what they are talking about, and it is the very workers they claim to support who stifle the poor for their benefit. They do not like the factories in poor countries which employ cheap local labor. Yes, the people are paid much less than any workers in the U.S. But these workers are not slaves. They choose to work in these factories and others because the wages are far better than those available in the Third World. Why? Because it is better to work than to starve.

Close the factories and the people will have no choice but to return to the harsh, back-breaking subsistence lifestyle that they are used to. This is the lifestyle of the world workers the FLA is fighting to combat. The organization's primary reason for not joining the WRC plays with semantics. To say that the FLA's governance structure is impeccable is unfounded.

SU said it does not want reform. It doesn't seem to bother the activists that their position is no sense, nor is it that it would reduce many people to the brink of starvation. But does anyone really care who happens to poor people as long as it makes a bunch of college students feel good about themselves? Of course, these people are probably just the dupes of the labor unions who don't want to face the competition that cheap foreign labor provides.

But this is college, and these students should be able to think for themselves. If they do, they will recognize that the FLA, an organization unfettered by corporate-funding, has achieved its goal of reforming the apparel industry. The FLA's governance structure stands reform through the "supermajority vote" of its members. The most significant decisions must be made by a two-thirds vote of all members and a two-thirds vote of the non-governmental organizations (including this is the U.S. Senate); its monitoring protocols include many factors in the FLA's overall governance structure. With the recent expansion of corruption in several FLA-affiliated apparel companies, the FLA is being flippant to reform at all or whether it is designated to fail.

SU maintains that an organization unfettered by corporate-funding is the best approach to solving the problems faced by the FLA. University stalls progress to drop affiliation with corporate-funded regulatory agency

To the Editor:

Last Friday's spam e-mail from the Syracuse University administration moved the debate over sweatshop monitoring more clearly into the public eye. The Student Coalition on Organized Labor encourages students to visit the university's Web site on "the sweatshop issue" and find SCOL's extensive analysis of the structural problems with the Fair Labor Association. SCOL applauds the openness that the administration has expressed in still considering the Worker Rights Consortium.

Unfortunately, the administration's primary reason for not joining the WRC plays with semantics. To say that the FLA does not have its founding conference is that the FLA is not being strictly false. The organization has an advisory board and has established guidelines and procedures for development. Furthermore, what the university does not say is that of the most "extensive" protocols of FLA have only been developed within the past year. Thirty-one universities (most Columbia University and the University of North Carolina) are now committed to the WRC, providing it with ample funding, a governance structure and input to establish protocols for monitoring labor practices. In essence, the administration's support of the FLA boils down to this. The FLA believes that the sweatshop manufacture is not something that can be easily achieved with all parties in agreement. This position is dangerous in that the FLA encourages universities to take part in the FLA's governance structure. With the recent expansion of corruption in several FLA-affiliated apparel companies, the FLA is being flippant to reform at all or whether it is designated to fail.

The University has decided to relinquish its membership in the FLA, citing the FLA's strong's leadership and organizational failures, its support from 134 member colleges and universities, its efforts involving factory site disclosure and its involvement in the living wage issue. In contrast, the WRC has no formal budget, no organizational structure and no established protocols at this time. Syracuse University is keeping an open mind and will further assess the WRC following its April 7 founding conference. SU's Trademark Licensing Advisory Board has requested that a representative of the WRC—as well as a representative of the FLA—meet with the board. The WRC visit has yet to be scheduled; an FLA representative will be on campus April 26.

We recognize that students have played a constructive role in focusing the University's attention to the conditions under which licensed merchandise is produced. The University has included a student representative on the Fair Labor Licensing Advisory Board, and the board will continue to listen to students in formulating its recommendations.

The University is committed to achieving, by practical and effective means, fair and humane working conditions for all workers involved in the manufacture of licensed apparel. In essence, the administration's support of the FLA boils down to this. The FLA believes that the sweatshop manufacture is not something that can be easily achieved with all parties in agreement. This position is dangerous. The FLA encourages universities to take part in its governance structure. Activists’ efforts spread the word

The Syracuse University T-shirt on your back may have been manufactured in a Third World nation by a poverty-stricken worker. Or it may have rolled off a high-tech U.S. assembly line.

You’re not alone.

The Student Coalition On Organized Labor says they’d rather play it safe, and assume the worst. They stripped down to their civil rights and pedaled bikes across the Quad, wrapped symbolic “red tape” around each other and protested outside the Tolley Administration Building. They’ve made their message clear to the entire campus:

Affiliation with any corporation who manufactures SU apparel in potentially unfair labor conditions is unacceptable.

While the university remains loath to contracts with the factory regulatory agency of SCOOlS choice, the Worker Rights Consortium, people are listening. Students report thinking twice before buying foreign-made clothes as a result of the Consortium, people are listening. Some students report thinking twice before buying foreign-made clothes as a result of the labor conditions is unacceptable.

SGA member defends new bill, criticizes media

Accountability is important. Student Government Association officers should be accountable to the student body for their actions. The media should also be accountable for the truth.

Due to incorrect and biased reporting on the board meeting of The Daily Orange as well as political maneuvering by several Assembly representatives, the truth on the issues regarding the merger between SGA and University Union have become clouded.

With each successive edition of The D.O., the biases become increasingly clear. If you present incomplete information, you will of course have a great headline and story, but a very misleading one.

The personal attacks, the misrepresentation of fact in recent articles and editorials can only be described as irresponsible, not to mention the great deal of attention that the SGA has given them. The SGA should not have a newspaper to serve its own ends, and as such the media can only be a tool for the SGA.

Black History Month serves to educate, validate

As a Black historian, Woodson aimed to bring about an appreciation of African-American contributions to the world, and I am appalled at the statements and follow with offense. In response to Walton blaming today’s “quick-fix society” for the purpose of Black History Month, I am compelled to share a little “Black History.”

In 1926, Carter Woodson founded Black History Week, which later evolved into Black History Month. Black History Month serves to educate, validate the contributions of blacks to the world, it is full of negative images of blacks and their culture.

And school systems have uncessarily perpetuated the myths and stereotypes about the African-American. The chains on one’s mind are more than a joke. Over time many African-Americans have developed inferiority complexes, humiliation and cultural degradation as a result of the lack of knowledge about themselves as a race.

To me, there can be no freedom until the freedom of the mind. Thus the importance of Black History Month shines through a diastom sociaty.
What impact have the sweatshop protests had on you?

SCOOL activists and SU officials battle over corporate affiliations

Corporate factories oppress workers

You are a young woman, around the age of 18. While many girls that age in the United States are in their first year of college, you are not so fortunate. You have a family to support and have only been able to finish sixth grade. You are, however, lucky enough to have a job in a local factory, where you produce clothes that are exported to the U.S.

In order to get the job, you were required to take a pregnancy test that cost more than a full day's wages. You arrive at work at 7:30 a.m. and are forced to work until 8 p.m. You work seven days a week. During the busy season, you are required to work overtime - sometimes straight through the night for a 24-hour shift. During your regular 12- and one-half hour shift, you are allowed an hour for lunch break and two trips to the bathroom.

In order to compete in the factory, you take part in a 10-day training program. That's a conflict of interest. They're supposed to be objective.

I don't think the university should buy apparel from overseas, and they should monitor where the clothes are produced more closely.

Groups opposing the sweatshops have really set a precedent for other student groups to step up and follow their lead. It's great that they took the initiative.

Varying living standards allow for wage disparity

Last week, I had a meeting with my advisor to discuss my class schedule for next semester.

The meeting began with a police officer escorting me up the stairs to my advisor's office in the Carrier Administration building.

Tom Dull

While waiting for him, I listened to protesters on the lawn outside chanting, "Sweatshop labor has got to go... hey, hey, ho, ho... over and over.

I felt like kicking the protesters in the face. It seems that some of my classmates - namely, the Student Coalition on Organized Labor - are trying to convince Syracuse University to drop its deal with Nike Athletic Apparel. I'm not impressed with their fight.

First of all, SU makes a lot of money through Nike apparel. It's a mystery why Brackettville shirts are sold out across the campus - they're cool. Recently, SU students have ridden bicycles naked across campus, stood in the rain taking students to sign petitions, been on the cover of the D.O. and shouted ridiculous protest statements outside the administration building. Let me tell you something - this protest is completely unreasonable.

From what I understand, they completely want to end sweatshop labor. Exactly how would that help the workers overseas? Outlawing sweatshops will kill their economy. Unlike the United States, which has 100 percent more opportunities than those countries, there isn't a McDonald's on every corner to offer them incredible jobs cooking potatoes in re-used grease or microwaving the disgusting McRib Jr.

And I'm sure that if I took my minimum wage earnings from last summer to those countries, the money would go a lot further than it does here.

And really, what would happen to Nike if SU broke their contract? Absolutely nothing. I can name about 50 universities who sell more shirts, hats and other apparel than SU sells. SU's fan support consists of only alumni, students, the people who live around UNC, Michigan, Penn State, Duke and even Gonzaga, SU's fan revenue is pathetic. Say SU did drop its Nike contract. I'm sure Nike CEO Phil Knight would be really upset. No wait, I doubt he even gives a shit. Nike has such a strong world base that leaving Syracuse wouldn't hardly make a ripple in its annual profits.

Don't these people have something else to complain about? Instead of helping those in other countries, why don't we just fly to South California and try to clean up sweatshops and fruit farms there first? Doesn't America have a problem anyway?

The target rate of return for the city of Syracuse is 70 percent, he explained. This rate only includes the census forms that are returned to the census office by mail, he added.

"My mandate is to get 100 percent," Billings said. "I am in the process of hiring in the vicinity of 1,200 people that will be census takers."

Other cities in New York state are showing similar rates of return as Syracuse, with Rochester at 85 percent, Buffalo at 48 percent and Albany at 52 percent, according to census reports.

"It's pretty much in line with the big cities in the state," said Gloria Lamanna, a spokeswoman from Syracuse Mayor Roy A. Bernardi's office. "We are doing everything we can to reach the 70 percent goal."

The census takers that Billings plans to hire will visit the homes that do not send in their forms by April 16, he said.

"It's critical that we count everybody," Billings said. "We don't want to miss anybody."

Census officials hope to conclude their collection of forms within the next few months. The information in the forms will dictate the allocation of about $165 billion in aid for U.S. state and local governments, according to the census bureau.

There is no way city officials can currently tell if there will be changes in federal funding levels, said John Spring, the Census Bureau's Special Places Operations supervisor for Syracuse.

Spring handles the census efforts for areas such as Syracuse University and group homes.

"I think it is a little early to be making judgements," Spring said.

In the 1990 Census, Syracuse had a population of 169,869, which was a 3.7 percent drop from the census taken ten years earlier, according to census reports.

"In a forward sense, (the city) just stands to lose all that much more in the next ten years," Billings said.

But Billings urged that people not jump to any conclusions about the way Syracuse's state representation in the Assembly will be affected by the change in population.

"There has been a rumor of losing three seats, but it's all pretty much speculation right now," he said.

The only thing that could drastically change from this census is the classification of the city by the government, Billings said.

"If Syracuse drops below 150,000, it is a different kind of city," he said.

At the university level, the census is moving along as expected, said Matt Krupa, census crew leader for freshman residence halls.

"It has been a pretty positive response so far," Krupa said. "A lot of students were very anxious to get their forms." He stressed that it is important for SU students to return their forms, because the university population is accurately reflected.

The Census Bureau still continues to set up tables in residence halls and in the Schine Student Center from 9 a.m. to noon today to provide free census materials.

In order to educate the United States about the importance of the census, the National Census Bureau has implemented a $160 million marketing strategy, Billings said.

"We're still in our awareness campaign," he said. "You'll soon see a shift in national ad from awareness."

The first part of the advertisements was an effort to inform the public of reasons each individual should fill out their census forms, Billings said.

The second phase will aim to encourage people to fill out the forms they have already received and return them to the census office, he added.

The final part of the campaign, beginning after May 1, will advise people that have not returned their forms that census takers will visit their homes to get their information, he said.

"We don't have a clue what motivation people have to not do it," Billings said.

Billings explained that the census is a method used to take "a snapshot of America."

"People move, people are born, people die," Billings said.

attention. People start to realize that sweatshops are not a thing of the past, that they are still around. And they're starting to question the companies that own the factories.

As students at Syracuse University, we have a tremendous opportunity to make a difference. We have the chance to improve the conditions that some workers in the apparel industry face. We can demand that anything with the SU logo on it is produced under safe and humane working conditions. As a student you can do your part simply by asking Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw to sign onto the Worker Rights Consortium. Tell him that you do not want the name and reputation of SU to be linked to sweatshops. Sweatshops are not a necessary evil of the world. They can be stopped, and they will be. All you need to do is act.

Holy matrimony

"When something's deep down in your soul, there's nothing on earth that can tear it out!" These fiery words are embedded in the heart of Federico Garcia Lorca's tale of forbidden love, translated by Langston Hughes and presented by the SU Drama Department.

Titled "Blood Wedding," this story of pride and passion unfolds as a small Spanish village prepares for the wedding of two young lovers, each with a past that refuses to die.

Performances are at 8 p.m. today and Saturday and 2 p.m. Sunday at Arthur Storch Theatre, 820 E. Genesee St. Admission is $12 for students and seniors and $14 for adults.

Tickets are available at the theater box office. For more information, contact Heidi Holtz at 443-2636.

Red Door replaces Styleen's

Red Door replaces Styleen's and gives Armory Square a new flavor

BY CATHERINE WILCOCK
Contributing Writer

When one door closes, another one often opens. Styleen's Rhythm Palace in Armory Square closed Apr. 2, and it reopened tonight as the Red Door.

Owners of the Red Door, a new club at 314 S. Franklin St., hope to bring a new type of nightlife to downtown Syracuse.

"We want to make the Red Door the place for regional and national bands," said Beth Mulligan, co-owner and former SU geology graduate student. "We want the bands that go to Albany and Rochester to come to the Red Door. My sworn duty is to make Syracuse the cool place for bands to come.

"The idea for the Red Door has been in the works for quite some time, Mulligan and co-owner Matthew Burt, a former SU philosophy graduate student, officially bought Styleen's last month.

Burt and Mulligan said they had wanted to buy a club since their graduation in 1997, but the right opportunity had never happened. One night in late 1998, Styleen's owner, Michael Heagerty, stopped Mulligan at a party and said he heard they wanted to buy a club.

Heagerty offered the potential business owners his club, Mulligan said.

With some helpers, Mulligan and Burt renovated the place in five days.

We didn't want to close down for more than a week," Mulligan said. "But we felt with new owners and a new name, we needed a new look."

They're changing the interior color to give the club a lighter feel. Although not all the changes will take place this week, within six months they plan to install new lighting, create a better traffic flow and open a new dance area.

"It was time for a second generation," Mulligan said. "People coming on Friday will see a distinctly different look.

Senior drama major Kim Gatewood, a member of the band Short Round, said she is glad to see the club fixed up.

"I always thought if they fixed it up, just a little bit, it would be great," said Gatewood, who played frequently at Styleen's with her band.

Second coming

Mulligan said she and Burt went through a "grueling process" to pick the club's new name. But the name "Red Door" popped into Mulligan's head while she was working as a goate chef at Pastabilities, 311 S. Franklin St.

"It was a reasonably cool, but meaningless name," she said. She and Burt said they felt they could put their stamp on it.

Part of the new look is the type of music offered at the Red Door. Mulligan and Burt said they see the club going in a hip-hop, reggae and funk direction. They believe that there is an untapped market for this type of music in the area, they said.

"There is a large following in Syracuse for this type of music," Mulligan said.

Mad Professor, a Jamaican reggae artist, is booked for May 6, and has collaborated with Lee "Scratch" Perry, who has worked on Beastie Boys albums.

"Anybody who digs that kind of music will love this guy," she said. "He gives off the vibe of what the Red Door is trying to do differently for Syracuse music scenes."

Mulligan said the club will have theme nights. Tuesday nights will feature a yet-to-be-named DJ and a techno-mix sound. Burt, using the name DJ MC Fred, will perform on Wednesday nights, specializing in Jams Brown-style old-school funk and soul. Thursday nights will feature a pool party with a different band each week. Friday and Saturday nights will be live regional bands, like Electric Chick Magnets and Atlas.

Eventually, the roster will extend

Lisa Miller wants to replay her team's first three games. The Orangewomen have been playing lately, especially in their last two games, should have lessoned Miller's concern about George Mason. The Orangewomen are capable of scoring with and on anyone, posting 13 goals against Colgate and 14 scores against Connecticut.

Junior Katrina Hable, who struggled in early games according to her standards, played well in the last two contests and notched five goals against the Huskies.

"We're going to go day-by-day," she said.

Overall, SU and George Mason are similar teams. Both squads have good speed and score well, and they both like to run a transition game.

Unlike George Mason, Syracuse's other weekend opponent, Rutgers, does not play up to her own standard in the scoring department with 12 goals and five assists, and Duccilli has tallied seven goals and three assists.

Rutgers prefers to work out of the settled attack, Vesco said, but may turn to a transition game if the SU defense pressure the midfield.

The Scarlet Knights, though, do not have to primarily run their own transition game, Vesco said. "But it was disappointing we didn't beat BU (in the varsity eight)," Miller said. "When you have two losses in a row, nobody can beat you.

"I think we're playing better," Miller said, "as long as we sort of continue to blend the running game with the settled game.

"If we get into one or the other, then we're in trouble.

The SU defense has showcased its potential too, only allowing 13 goals in its last two outings. Along with the close defenders, midfielders Karen Healy and Kim Wayne are making their presence felt.

Miller attributes the improvements to hard work in practice and communication on the field.

"Some of our kids are doing a good job in practice of covering the cutters and getting around the picks," Miller said. "The defense is talking more, and they still get quiet. Some of them are just quiet personality types."
SU defensive midfielder Sani Bassett feeding him aren't good dodgers. Cover or the hardest to cover, running his 22 goals are good for sixth in the nation's best attack. Matt Calone and Matt Caione provide a great scoring punch, and the close defense of Glatzel, Marshall Abrams and Billy St. George is punishing. Comparisons to SU's 1999 National Championship team — largely considered the greatest ever — have surfaced. Tonight's results will show their validity.

Loyola as one of the two remaining: Continued from page 20

Prout, a transfer from Gannon added three goals and eight assists. His brother Gunnar has paces the Greyhounds with 32 goals. But the play of Gavin Prout, a transfer from Gannon College in Erie, Pa., surprised everyone from Cottle to SU head coach John Desko.

Cottle brought Prout to Loyola this season after Gannon dropped its program. The coach said he expected the 5-foot-9, 170-pound Prout to take some face-offs and provide a good shot on man-up possessions.

He's done that and more. His 22 goals are good for sixth in the country, and he is a nuisance to defenses, running circles around the create. Someone like that can be the easiest guy in the world to cover or the hardest to cover," SU defensive midfielder Sam Bassett said. "If the people feeding him aren't good dodgers, you can stay on them. With someone like Prout, who concentrates on quick-sticking, you have to stand there and stay on him. It becomes a problem when they have more talent and they can dodge. You're forced to come off them. If you don't, they'll dish it and (Prout) will score."

Loyola received a boost the past couple of weeks when close defender Joe Rodrigues and midfielder Peter Haas returned from injuries. With a solidified lineup, the Greyhounds averaged more than 15 goals per game over their last three outings.

Invading the Carrier Dome — which Desko said could draw up to as many as 12,000 fans — is not too imposing either, Cottle said. Loyola played five of its seven games on the road this season, booking quality victories at Hofstra and Towson: two teams that have also lost to the Orangemen.

The challenge now is to do the same at Syracuse.

The SU juggernaut is set on winning its seventh national title. This game will show whether the Orangemen are for real or are real pretenders. Powell, Springer and Liam Banks form one of the nation's best attack tandems. Josh Coffman and Matt Caione provide a great scoring punch, and the close defense of Glatzel, Marshall Abrams and Billy St. George is punishing. Comparisons to SU's 1999 National Championship team — largely considered the greatest ever — have surfaced. Tonight's results will show their validity.

We realize what's at stake and how quickly it can go. You always strive for a perfect season, and as we keep winning we keep gaining momentum. — SU defensive midfielder Sam Bassett

I love how Syracuse plays right now. Offensively, they play together. Offensively, they have some key performers. If I was voting for Player of the Year right now, I'd vote for Rob Mulligan. — Loyola coach Dave Cottle Cottle joked with Desko on Thursday at practice that, "All year, people haven't stopped talking, " Cottle said. "And that's the real pressure we've got. That's the first question we'll find out.

We also know we're going to get shots. The question is, can we shoot it by Robby? We're shooting 41 percent as a team. That's an incredible percentage."

This game's over, we've still got to be shooting 41 percent."

vantage of some of their errors and just capitalized on getting some key hits early and late." DiMaggio did her best Roger Clemens impersonation in the first game, striking out the first five Bears she faced. She finished with a career-high and school-record 14 Ks.

DiMaggio took advantage of a wide strike zone by getting batters to gamble on pitches that were borderline strikes. However, DiMaggio got a little lucky in the third inning, walking two unearned runs before composing herself and striking out the last two hitters of the inning. Firnbach said her team’s defensive collapse in the third inning came from confidence that their pitcher would continue mowing batters down.

“I think sometimes our team expects too much from her,” Firnbach said. “So they get on their heels when the ball gets by their hits.”

The Hopewell Junction native gave up only one more run the rest of the way to improve her record to 2-0. She now has struck out 124 batters in 113.1 innings this season.

In the second game, Bieman carried the impressive performance, DiMaggio said there were a few things upon which she could have improved.

“I felt like the wind was pushing me back,” she said. “And I wasn’t getting my spines as well as I could have. It didn’t turn out too bad. I expected more from myself.”

The Orangewomen (11-16) made up for their third-inning defensive lapses with runs in the bottom half of the frame.

Syracuse sent 13 batters to the plate, bashed six hits and took advantage of three of Binghamton’s five errors. All eight runs came with no outs.

The barrage began when freshman second baseman Julie Dunn tripled over the head of B囿t inngton’s right fielder Amy George that scored Christina Holowich and Cheryl Julicher. Dunn then scored on a Lindsay Richards single.

Before shipping on the mound in the second game, Bieman had a strong first game at the plate.

Like Dunn, Bieman used the strong wind blowing to right and lofted a double over George that hit the wall on the fly, scoring Richards and Jackie Herman.

Those hard hits, combined with a few timely Bearcats errors, opened the floodgates. Only two of SU’s ten runs in the game were earned.

“We just had a couple of errors that got us in a hole,” Binghamton head coach Holly Brown said. “Our defense has been solid. We have scored eight runs in that inning. Anything can happen.”

“We might have gotten out of that inning (leading) 2-0,” Bieman said. She carried her hitting performance over to the mound in game two.

She gave up the sole Binghamton (6-8) run in the final inning on a Jessica Ross double. The Ontario native also struck out seven Bearcats.

Ross cooled the Syracuse bats down, something Margaret Yerden could not do in game one.

Herman was involved with both SU runs, hitting a ground ball that turned into a run-scoring throwing error. She then drove in a run with a fifth-inning bloop single.

Both teams committed fewer errors in the second game, which helped keep scoring down.

SU boosted only one play compared to five in the opener. While Binghamton bounced back from its five-error first game with only two miscues in game two.

Not having to worry about their defenses falling them, Bieman and Ross engaged in a pitcher’s duel.

Biemanwalked only one batter, and Ross was only called for an illegal pitch — a balk-like maneuver that awards the batter first base.

Because the pitchers were on their games, it was harder for the hitters to find a groove, Firnbach said.

“We came out and the bats were a little tight for some reason,” she said. “I think we could have hit a little better bat in that game, but we did what we needed to do to get the runs across.”

She composed the 2000 roster with 17 players from 10 different states and Canada. “It’s all happened so quickly,” Firnbach said. “Last year was boring. We didn’t have any players and weren’t running them through drills. But this is the fun part, definitely the best part.”

They might not dunk Danielle or sprint like Spotwood, but these young ladies can certainly electrify.

Take freshman Tara DArggio, who shook off any home-opener jitters to fan a school-record 14 batters in the 10-3 first-game win.

DiMaggio whiffed the side on 13 pitches in the first inning. She struck out the first five batters she faced, just one of whom made contact with her dancing fastball.

After DiMaggio’s complete game, junior Missy Bieman held the Bearcats to five hits over seven frames in a 2-1 victory in the nightcap.

Without potent arms, fast-pitch softball teams own a smaller chance at success than a bass in Oneida Lake. But DiMaggio and Bieman carried the squad Thursday with their arms and energetic approach. After each Binghamton out, the SU infield gathered at the mound for a congratulatory pow-wow.

In the Orangewomen dugout, few reserves and coaches sat on the bench. Most littered the air with classic diamond chatter such as “Hum, hum” and “Whaddya say, here, two-one.”

The talk refused to die, stretching over 14 innings on a cold Syracuse afternoon. Even a chilling gale force wind, one that made opening a car door a project for a power lifter, failed to drown the noise.

“Everyone on this team has a passion for the game,” reserve outfielder Sarah Polger said. “It’s a special team. We’re all brand new here.”

Whether it’s on the field or in the dugout, we need to support each other.”

After almost three decades of absence, the game and its precious sounds made a triumphant return to the Syracuse campus. The revival comes years too late, but players and fans must celebrate its arrival.

Together with the women’s soccer and lacrosse programs, softball’s start marks a new era in Syracuse sports. Although SU’s wrestlers and gymnasts surely feel cheated, their angst should not subtract from the growth of Firnbach’s program.

Firnbach said she would look at the softball’s squads progress and merely lament about the struggling wrestling and terminated men’s gymnastics programs. But Thursday’s home opener did not represent a funeral for these two teams. Rather, it marked a baptism for another Syracuse sports program destined for athletic achievement.

Viewing the doubleheader as anything different cheats the softball players and coaches. It unjustly makes them scapegoats for the effects of overcompensating federal legislation.

“The more we remind the players (of how important this is), the better,” Firnbach said. “Every game is a new thing for them. They’re just living in the moment right now.”

On a perfect planet, every university’s athletic program would support athletic, water polo and every sport in between.

The dollars and sense dictate that this will never be the case, and SU’s softball fans with two choices. They can cry over the loss of opportunity, or they can celebrate the expansion of a long-forgotten branch of collegiate athletics.

At Syracuse University, sad say, men’s gymnastics is a memory and wrestling could shortly cease to exist, similar and permanent, fate.

But led by a pair of outstanding right-handers and a doubleheader of bumbling catcher, softball just started to live.

“We have a great team and a great facility,” Firnbach said. “These girls have a lot of enthusiasm as to where the program is going to go. The coaching staff is energetic. It makes it all worth while."

Dave Curtis is the sports editor at The Daily Orange, where his columns support sports fans with two choices.

They can cry over the loss of opportunity, or they can celebrate the expansion of a long-forgotten branch of collegiate athletics."

Orangewomen try for weekend sweep

The thought might be obvious, but place it aside for a moment.

It's time to take a breath and focus on what's ahead for the Orange women. This weekend presents an opportunity for the team to build on its recent success and continue its upward trajectory.

The Orange women are up against a tough challenge, but they have shown resilience and determination throughout the season. With their strong pitching and solid defense, they have the potential to make a significant impact in the playoffs.

Despite the challenges, the Orange women remain focused and committed to their goals. Their hard work and dedication are paying off, and they are poised to make a strong showing in the playoffs.

So, as the weekend approaches, let's remember to appreciate the journey so far, celebrate the accomplishments, and look forward to what's yet to come. With focus, determination, and teamwork, the Orange women can achieve greatness and make a lasting impact on the softball landscape.

SGA board postpones bill vote

BY TIFFANY LANKES
Asst. News Editor

Students will wait an additional two weeks to vote on a bill that will change the Student Government Association's role on the SGA Constitution.

Following two weeks of heated debate in the Assembly, the organization's Judicial Review Board decided Thursday night to postpone the referenda slated for next week, citing a lack of volunteer time to manage voting files.

The JRB hears all cases concerning violations of SGA and Assembly laws and ethics and conduct of its officers, according to the SGA Constitution.

Police Reports:

Banks cited after outburst

Staff Reports

Believed to be under the influence of a narcotic, former Syracuse University football player Vernon Banks was transported early Saturday morning to Crouse Hospital, 726 Irving Ave., according to police reports.

Shortly after midnight, Syracuse police found Banks, a former SU linebacker, standing on the sidewalk in front of the CVS store on South Crouse Avenue and adjacent to his black Infiniti, the report said.

Bystanders told police that Banks had become violent and kicked out the sunroof of his car, the report said. Banks began to act violent, damaging his own car, after he left Harry's Bar, 709 S. Crouse Ave., earlier Friday night, the report added.

Syracuse University Ambulance transported Banks to Crouse Hospital's emergency room for medical evaluation, the report said.

The call for police was issued in response to a fight on East Adams Street and South Crouse Avenue, the report said.

Friends of Banks were cited in the report as saying he had not had "much" to drink that night.

Banks could not be reached for comment.

Witnesses reported seeing Banks with other players including former SU quarterback Donovan McNabb, McNabb, a quarterback for the Philadelphia Eagles, was visiting campus over the weekend for a serimmon, said Clifton Smith, a freshman linemanbacker for SU.

Police did not arrest Banks because they did not find substantial evidence that he was under the influence of a narcotic, Syracuse Police Department spokesman Sgt. Dave Sackett said.

Banks may have been transported to the hospital as a safety precaution for his own well-being, Sackett added.

After being admitted to the hospital, banks acted violently to the SGA Constitution.

Panhel debates inviting new sororities to campus

Staff Reports

The Panhellenic Council is debating whether to include new sororities in the Syracuse University greek community.

"Right now, we don't even know if we're going to expand," Panhel Vice President Maria Rioux said. "We're taking it step-by-step.

Panhel will vote April 26 to determine a possible expansion, said Lisa Walsh, assistant director of the Office of Greek Life.

Panhel prefers to have expansion, all sororities have to come to a majority vote," Rioux said.

Large turnouts at recent Rush sessions are part of the reason for an expansion, she said. Rush is a bi-annual event in which SU students are invited to meet sorority and fraternity members and join a Greek house.

"Rush trends seem to be high every year," Rioux said.

SARO protests Shrine circus

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Asst. News Editor

Syracuse University students protesting cruelty to circus animals found themselves caged in at the New York State Fairgrounds on Friday night, said Josh Katcher, co-president of the Student Animal Rights Organization.

Organizers of the visiting Shrine Circus set up a special area for protesters outside the circus tent, said Katcher, a freshman film major. The students' activities were limited to the areas within barri-cades that resembled barred cages, he added.

"It actually worked out well for us," Katcher said. "I think a lot more people came up to us because they thought we were working for the animals.

Circus officials could not be reached for comment.

About 12 students showed up to the Friday night protest, but rain, sleet and snow caused only one or two activists to arrive at the circus Saturday night. Protesters carried signs and picketed near the tents, but their main goal was educate as much as possible those attending the circus about animal abuses, Katcher said.

"We had information for people going into the circus about what goes on behind the scenes," he said.

Some of the alleged abuses include training through food deprivation and electric shocks, he added.

The protest was controlled and non-violent, but Katcher said there was about one police officer for every protester present Friday. The police repeatedly told protesters that they had to follow police orders or they would be arrested.

"I think they were a little out of hand," Katcher said. "They were just being very rude. They even pulled one kid over to a car because he wouldn't give them his name. We don't have to give them our names. We weren't doing anything wrong."

Although no arrests were made, Katcher said the protesters were repeatedly threatened with the possibility, if they left that fenced-off area.

Katcher said students believed the fairgrounds are public property and that they were open for protests. The police, however, told the students that the fairgrounds were private property and therefore students had to do as they were told, he added.

Elizabeth Cline, a SARO member, agreed that the police were too aggressive for the type of protest that the students were running. The protest was non-violent and education-oriented, she added.

"Basically they were ready for us before we got there," said Cline, a junior policy studies major. "They had us in these cages, I think we at least reached a few of the people there that's what counts."

Katcher agreed and said he believed the protest prompted at least a few people to think twice about animal acts in circuses. Some of the people the students handed information to were visibly surprised by what they read, he added.

The barricaded areas the students were restricted to slashed their contact with the people they were trying to educate and diminished the protest's effectiveness somewhat, Cline said.

"It was pretty degrading and ironic at the same time that they had us in these cages," she said. "But I consider it a success anytime we reach someone and plant a seed in someone. I think we at least reached a few of the people there and that's what counts."

Katcher agreed and said he believed the protest prompted at least a few people to think twice about animal acts in circuses. Some of the people the students handed information to were visibly surprised by what they read, he added.

The ultimate goal of SARO and similarly motivated groups is to end the presence of animal acts at all circuses, he explained.

"We all have the common belief that having exotic animals in the circus is unnecessary," Katcher said. "There are lots of circuses, like Cirque du Soleil, that are 10 times more successful that those with animal acts. Hopefully we'll see an end to this everywhere."

Sixth-graders learn lesson in college life

By Ashleigh Graf
Staff Writer

A sixth-grade student attended a 500-level college math class Friday and took more than three pages of notes.

The student, and 11 of his classmates at Seymour Magnet School, visited Syracuse University for a mentoring program called Shadow Day 2000.

When he returned to his sixth-grade classroom, his teacher asked why he had taken all the notes. He replied that they helped him, but the latter takes the class at SU, said Jennifer Flory, a senior international relations and information management major.

Shadow Day focuses on the Seymour Magnet School because it has a large population of Hispanic and black students, as well as having one of the largest subsidized lunch programs in Syracuse, said Lori Peck, the program’s organizer.

“If we’re going to implement this program, what a perfect place to do it,” she said.

The sixth-graders were chosen for the program by their principal, based on their interest in learning, Peck said. “They weren’t necessarily the best students,” she said, but added that “for the past three years I have been involved, this is definitely the best group of kids.”

An SU student established Shadow Day three years ago for a social work class, said Flory, one of the organizers this year and one of last year’s mentors.

The middle-schoolers were paired with SU students to tour campus and attend a class, Peck said. The day began with a reception for both the middle-schoolers and their parents at the home of SU Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw.

After spending the morning and lunchtime on campus, the students attended a workshop that included several speakers who went to Seymour Magnet School and are now involved with SU, she added.

The middle-schoolers received several gifts from the SU Bookstore, as well as from the university, Peck said. “We got so much donated to them,” she said.

Peck said the SU students provided a topic of conversation when they do. "They) weren't necessarily the best students," Peck said, "but they would help him when he needed it."

The middle-schoolers involved were selected by Flory and herself. LeTeSha Smith, a sophomore in social work major, participated in the program and said she was very grateful for the opportunity to influence the girl she mentored.

“It felt like I was reaching back to the community,” Smith said. “I just wanted to show her a day a college kid’s life was like.”

Smith said she and the student she worked with will continue to speak. They have already agreed to read the same book to provide a topic of conversation when they do.

“Adam Jackson, a senior in information science and technology major, said he learned a great deal from his “Shadowee.” “I learned that with students at a younger age, you shouldn’t underestimate their wills and desires,” Jackson said.

Jackson said the boy he mentored was very interested in the sociology class he attended.

“When I asked him what he thought of the class, he said, ‘Well, I liked the fact that people get to talk more,’ Jackson said.

The shadowing program, though just beginning, will probably not include any schools other than Seymour, Flory said. Since a small number of SU students participate, the program could not manage more middle-schoolers, she said.

“It has definitely been growing — more offices and departments have been involved.”

4 p.m. Tuesday in Hendricks Chapel.

Nader, a Green Party candidate for the U.S. presidency, has challenged the role of corporate powers in politics and encouraged civic participation since the late 1950s. He argues that corporate influence on the government corrupts true democracy.

"When citizen participation flourishes, human values in tame runaway commercial imperatives," he said in a Feb. 21 speech during which he announced his candidacy for president.

Nader will discuss the future of public activism during his speech at SU. He will also speak from 8 p.m. to 9:30 p.m. Tuesday night at the South Presbyterian Church, on the corner of South Salina and West Colvin streets.

"It's always good to hear from an alternative point of view," SU's Graduate Student Organization President Eric Hunn said.

Nader's $10,000 speaking fee, he said, Nader, however, will donate the money to various causes, added Hunn, a law and public administration graduate student.

The Syracuse community will receive Nader's message positively, said Howie Hawkins, co-chairman of the Green Party of Onondaga County.

"Nader offers people the real alternative," he said. "He speaks for the common people."

Even though Nader announced his presidential campaign two months ago, he has been ignored by the national media, Hawkins said.

The lecture Tuesday will help his candidacy gain attention, Hawkins added.

"It'll let people know they have more than 'Gush' and 'Bore,'" Hawkins said, referring to Nader's fellow presidential candidates Texas Gov. George W. Bush and Vice President Al Gore.

Tuesday's speech, however, will not be a political campaign pitch, said Kayla Drogosz, a public administration graduate student who helped bring Nader to SU. Green Party activists are only one part of what Nader has accomplished, she added.

Nader established ways for individuals to participate in the democratic process, Drogosz said.

"Ralph Nader has been a visionary that I've supported for a while," she said. "He's charted his own course and his message is to have people do the same."

Nader was instrumental in forcing the auto industry to install seat belts. He also helped form the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, the Environmental Protection Agency and the Freedom of Information Act.

"There's no historical memory for granted now," Drogosz said. "There's no historical memory for our generation."

Drogosz said her classmates continue to think that change only occurs when made through the government. Nader has pointed out that activism begins when he began his advocacy work.

"Most of the students were born when Reagan was president so that's their ideal of what's normative," Drogosz said. "That's a pretty unfortunate.

"Hopefully, it will be empowering for students that someone built a life and career around being an advocate for public interest."

year," Rioux said. "But we do have some sororities who come and ask to expand on campus."

Representatives from sororities often approach Panhel to ask about establishing themselves on campus, Rioux said. It was not until this year, however, that one student decided to discuss expanding, she added.

The last time the number of SU sororities increased was "a while ago," she said.

Expansion is also being considered simply to create campus sorority presence in relation to the presence of SU fraternities, she added.

If Panhel representatives decide to go ahead with the expansion process, several representatives from sororities not on campus will visit SU, said Rioux, a junior English and Textual Studies major.

"We'll hold one week in the fall where there are presentations by sororities who want to come to campus," Rioux said.

Just because a sorority starts up on campus, however, it would not begin with the same environment as older houses, Rioux said.

"They wouldn't automatically get a chapter house," Rioux said. "There has to be one available for them to buy.

If Panhel decides to include another sorority, the respective chapter's situation would be similar to that of Zeta Psi when the fraternity moved onto campus three years ago, Rioux said.

Fraternity representatives could not be reached for comment.

Zeta Psi started as a relatively small group of men, but quickly multiplied in size during Rush periods. They are now just as large or more, established fraternities on campus.

"It only took about three years to get that big," she added.

Suspects must be guaranteed rights

Everyone who has ever watched more than five minutes of any TV police drama can recite the Miranda rights word for word: "You have the right to remain silent. Anything you say can and will be used against you in a court of law..."

While the Miranda v. Arizona decision nullifies any confession given prior to appointment of one's right to silence and legal counsel. But if the U.S. Supreme Court buys into a push to overturn the ruling, television might be the only place where we hear the phrase from now on.

The United States boasts an internationally enviable — albeit far from perfect — justice system. And the hallmarks of the system are the rights guaranteed by the Miranda ruling. Without a minimal standard of rights guaranteed to every suspect, the entire judicial process would be dangerously hastened. Premature confessions, regardless of their validity, would pave the way to a jail cell.

That's a cop slaps on the wrist. A suspect — guilty or innocent — the fear induced by the sight of flashing lights and the sound of screaming sirens often moves them to offer information they might not ordinarily volunteer. The influence of drugs, alcohol or violent circumstances might also cloud judgement during those precarious moments.

Giving citizens protection in those precarious moments is vital to maintaining the integrity of our justice system. Striking down Miranda would alter the face of the U.S. judicial process forever. If pre-Miranda confessions became admissible in court, defense teams would be forced to cut through even more legal red tape, and the inevitable appeals would surely drain funds for both the defendant and the government.

Overturning Miranda would require U.S. citizens to renew their already weakened faith in law enforcement agencies after a slew of recent police-brutality headlines. And since the wounds from the Amadou Diallo case are still fresh, it's a bad time to ask that favor.

HENRY Y. CHUNG

The English language is a mysterious phenomenon. On one hand, Timeless masterpieces written by Mark Twain and William Faulkner are shaped English in an unprecedented way. Even foreign authors like Joseph Conrad and Vladimir Nabokov used English to convey profound insights in their novels, though English is their non-native language.

On the other hand, one can also dismiss the English language by writing horrific sentences like, "I am writing to you as a result of statements that have been being cut under my skin and furring the past few weeks. But it would be technically difficult to write on behalf of one's sentiments. Finally, it may be a colorful description, it is nonetheless stylistically erroneous to have "sentiments crawling over (one's) skin." Sentiments do not cut.

The correct form should read, "I write to express what has been troubling me for the past few weeks." That is more succinct, grammatically correct and effective sentences that have been being cut under my skin and furring the past few weeks. It would be technically difficult to write on behalf of one's sentiments. Finally, it may be a colorful description, it is nonetheless stylistically erroneous to have "sentiments crawling over (one's) skin." Sentiments do not cut.

The key to writing plain English is to omit surplus words, use shorter sentences and know your vocabulary. For example, use "because" instead of "for the reason that." "Prejudice" is a colloquial term that should not be used loosely. As a hater of words, I would rewrite this sentence as it reads, "I chose this law school because there is little competition."

Sweatshop labor often provides sole alternative

To the Editor:

Friday's pro-sweatshop letter to the editor from Jon Edington bothered me very much. Evidently, he is unsympathetic to the poor conditions of sweatshops and has a limited understanding of how they have rights.

First of all, the Student Coalition on Organized Labor is fighting for workers' rights and to eradicate sweatshops. In the meantime, they are fighting for better working conditions in clothing factories. It is questionable if the workers who claim to have rights will push for any change, and they are not fitted for doing so. Their conditions are so pitiful that they cannot afford to take a chance at anything else.

Secondly, not everyone in sweatshop-ridden countries works for wages too low that they feel that it is their duty to leave the country. They are fighting for better working conditions and working hard, and they probably think that this is what they are doing, and they are not forced to leave to make a living.

Wages in sweatshops are often too low that they feel that it is their duty to leave the country. They are fighting for better working conditions and working hard, and they probably think that this is what they are doing, and they are not forced to leave to make a living.

Sweatshop labor is the only alternative for many people who do not wish to return to the harsh, back-breaking subsistence farming or else take up begging or prostitution. "The powerful people within each 'third-world' government and U.S. corporations are profiting at exponential rates from the exploitation of millions of people who are already at the brink of starvation," even if some of us choose to believe that sweatshop workers are happy to make the choice to work in factories.

I was especially shocked at Mr. Edington's statement that SOCO or anyone else would protest sweatshop labor simply because it would harm children. These women are not forced to go into sweatshop labor, but many do as a way to support their families. This paltry salary is not enough to make up for long hours of exhausting labor, sexual and mental abuse, and mandatory pregnancy tests.

There is a limit to which people will go to make a living, but it is a limit that will never be reached. Sweatshop labor is the only alternative for many people who do not wish to return to the harsh, back-breaking subsistence farming or else take up begging or prostitution. "The powerful people within each 'third-world' government and U.S. corporations are profiting at exponential rates from the exploitation of millions of people who are already at the brink of starvation," even if some of us choose to believe that sweatshop workers are happy to make the choice to work in factories.

Ten-goal fourth quarter pushes No. 1 SU over undefeated Loyola 16-9.

BY DAVE CURTIS

The team attitude changed dramatically after the third quarter as the Orangemen returned to the field with new intensity, according to head coach John Desko. "The guys made up their minds at halftime that we were playing passive and creating too many mistakes. After the second half, we put the ball on the ground and created some fast breaks," Desko said.

SU (7-0) scored three times late in the third period to take a 10-7 lead into the fourth, and senior Michael Bello's four goals and five assists provided a cushion against Loyola's sagging defense and nine attackers.

"The (midfield) was key," said senior captain Tim Byrnes, who added four goals and four assists, ignited Syracuse's game-closing, seven-goal spurt.

Then Ryan Powell, who struggled in the first half but finished with four goals and five assists, hit outside for the second stanza. The squads traded goals to open the second half, but Powell lifted SU (7-0) for a 10-9, and the Orangemen faced a 16-9 victory.

Versatile defender lifts Orangewomen

Carrie Soults is the kind of athlete who defines strong and vibrant.

But her on the field and she'll show you her fearless ability to keep opponents at bay.

It all comes naturally for the 5-foot-10 speedster, who commands the defense for the Syracuse women's lacrosse team.

She makes the game look easy, as if she's played lacrosse her entire life.

Well, not exactly.

Soults' career actually began six years ago, as a freshman at the Georgetown Day School in Washington, D.C. Previously, she never had touched a lacrosse stick.

Soults said soccer and basketball were her passion growing up. It wasn't until Bea Fuller, the high school's soccer and lacrosse coach, took notice of her talents that lacrosse entered the picture.

Fuller approached Soults one day and insisted, "You have to play lacrosse."

"She's just naturally talented," Fuller said. "As a coach, the hardest part was deciding where to put her. So we put her at the keeper. That's always an advantage. And let's face it, the keeper. That's always an advantage." Soults made such an easy transition that she earned a spot on the varsity roster her first year and recorded 12 goals last year. Now a sophomore, Soults is at ease with her primary mission — helping the Orangewomen win.

"Everything is clicking for us right now so it's really fun time," she said. "We're helping each other out and getting excited for each game."

She already posted a career-high four goals two weeks ago in a 14-7 victory against the University of Connecticut.

Sophomore attacker Meghan Brown appreciates her teammate's presence on the field. Admiring Soults' confidence and determination, Brown looks to Soults as a defensive leader.

High school coach Fuller is just as effusive when praising her former pupil.

"She's just naturally talented," Fuller said. "As a coach, the hardest part was deciding where to put her. So we put her at the keeper. That's always an advantage. And let's face it, the keeper. That's always an advantage." Soults' ability to play all aspects of the game, Soults' potential got her calls from various collegiate programs, such as Columbia and Johns Hopkins.

Soults, though, opted to go to Syracuse. Since joining the Orangewomen, she's found a happy medium between playing lacrosse and staying with her academics.

Yet her legacy still lives on at the Georgetown Day School, Fuller said.

"The other players here remember Carrie's ability and try to emulate her," she said. "They still talk about her and are always in a position where she's doing at Syracuse."

As aside from her athletic success on the field, one quality she doesn't lack is her sense of humor.

"She makes us laugh," Brown said. "She knows when we have to be serious, but at the same time she gets us pumped and lets us be ourselves. Plus, she's the first to get everyone on defense to start talking when everything is quiet."

Soults said one of the biggest changes has noticed in this year's team is its upbeat attitude and strong spirit.

For all her enthusiasm toward lacrosse, Soults admits there still are areas in which she can improve.

"I've gotten better with the little things," she said. "Now I'd like to concentrate more on the bigger — like my game sense."

Miller emphasized Soults' growth from last season is evident in her play.

"We're trying to incorporate her game more and more," Miller said. "This year we're asking her to assume a leadership role on the defensive side of the ball. And she's dealing with that will right now."

First Orangewomen homer spurs SU to shutout win

The timing could not have been any better for the Syracuse softball team on Saturday. A storm was moving its way through New York state with its sights set on threatening SU’s doubleheader against Providence. No raindrops fell on the ribbon-cutting ceremony, allowing the Softball Stadium at Skytop, nor did it rain as the Orangewomen beat 2-0 lead.

Instead, the storm held off until after Missy Bieman made Syracuse softball history.

In the bottom of the sixth inning, with Jackie Herman at first and one out, the junior took a Melissa Peterson offering deep over the center-field fence for the first home run in Orangewomen history.

Brownies, including two, tallied the first home run in Orangewomen history.

Catching the teams that were playing that are coming on strong as of late.

"I think we come out and play," head coach Desko said. "I think we come out and play." "I think we come out and play." "I think we come out and play."

Opposing hitters have had difficulty solving DiMaggio recently. She holds hitters to a .349 batting average, in part because of the 18 strikeouts in 25.1 innings of work. "Our team kind of expects it from Tara now," Desko said after Thursday’s games. "She's the type who can come on strong as of late."

"We have a lot of confidence going with her. She's got a lot of control over a lot of her pitches."

DiMaggio is now 4-0 against Big East squads, a record that also includes a doubleheader sweep over Boston College and a win over Seton Hall. The Orangewomen will join the conference next season.

"I think we come out and play," head coach Desko said. "I think we come out and play." "I think we come out and play."

DreamWorks team fails 'El Dorado'

Last time Elton John, Tim Rice and Hans Zimmer teamed up for a film, the result was "The Lion King" soundtrack. Lightning must have struck when John, master pop-smith, Rice, lyricist extraordinaire and Zimmer, Oscar-nominated composer, were brought together — their respective talents all contributing equally to create a brilliant soundtrack.

With DreamWorks bringing these three unique, talented men together again for "The Road to El Dorado," could lightning strike twice?

To be honest, no. "The Road to El Dorado" soundtrack fails in almost every way that "The Lion King" succeeded. Whereas the Disney film had a large variety of musical types — everything from radio-friendly pop to authentically African chants — the DreamWorks film relies far too heavily on mid-tempo ballads.

Maybe this could be due to a massive ego attack by Elton John. Listening to "The Lion King" soundtrack, you wouldn't know Elton John was behind the music (except for the ones he sang, of course). On this CD, he sings every single non-instrumental song. The album is even technically billed, "Elton John's The Road to El Dorado."

The album begins with the bouncy, blandly appealing "El Dorado." It introduces the "history" of the mythical city with lyrics like "Our glorious city was built by divinities, by gods." It is a passable anthem, but it doesn't have the impact or emotive power of the "They Live in You" opening to "The Lion King."
The Daily Orange

overwhelmed by his success. "Five years ago, I would have never expected to be here," Kuder admitted to an audience of about 50 attentive students and faculty members.

Later, he offered advice to anyone who wanted to start their own e-company. "With the Internet today, you just have to be aggressive to get ahead," Kuder said. "People look at a young guy like me and say 'I could do that,' but if you are not aggressive you won't get anywhere."

Sharing ideas

Kuder said he liked the format of I-Forum and being able to learn from other members of the business and Internet world. "I liked being able to see what other people are thinking," he said.

Deyo, a wiser and more seasoned veteran of the business world, also enjoyed the I-Forum. "I thought it was well presented and a good way to share ideas," he said.

Deyo's Pets.com is a self-proclaimed "superstore, a specialty store...delivered to your door." Deyo took an often neglected demographic — our furry, scaly and fishy friends — and offered them premium food, the latest clothing and other products to keep their owners for. Most people recognize Pets.com from their recent ad campaign, hosted by a now-famous sock puppet dog. Though Deyo said things have been going smoothly for him, he said the business of the future.

As Deyo continues to fill the orders of his ever-growing legion of customers, he said his mind is ready for any change the market may bring, such as the recent declines in stock prices.

"In the business world today, with the Internet, you have to be better, faster and cheaper," Stewart said. Carrier has found another use for the Web besides shipping "Fido" a state-of-the-art bone in two to three business days — prospective workers can now place their resumes in Carrier's database.

Less is more

Ironically, the only time that "The Road to El Dorado" soundtrack works is when Sir Elton is absent. Hans Zimmer provides three razor-sharp, Mexican flavored instrumental tracks that highlight exactly what the rest of the album was missing — namely energy and originality. "Chelorado" is the kind of lazy, moody piece you'd expect to hear wandering the gold-plated streets of El Dorado. The string heavy "The Brig," which coincides with a classy escape attempt by the film's heroes, bristles with whimsical danger and frenzy. And last but certainly not least is "Wonders of the New World," which is a montage of everything the film and soundtrack should have contained — beauty, danger, majesty and ultimate happiness.

In the end, however, the work of Zimmer is not nearly enough to redeem the underwhelming performances of Elton and Tim Rice. For all he's accomplished, there's nothing special here about Rice's lyrical oddity, and neither plot driven or 100 percent genre specific. As the film's own "The Lion King" once in a lifetime event — one of the best, most memorable, best selling soundtracks of all time. No one could have expected "The Road to El Dorado" to ever come close.

But it would have been nice if an attempt were even made to advance Elton John's stuttering career as a balladist. My Grade: C

his career hasn’t been easy.

Tough times

Woodley had surgery for an intestinal infection the summer of 1997 at SU, forcing him to spend the rest of his junior year out of competition. During this time, he said that he hated reading the newspaper and learning about the successes of his competitors.

“I was always thinking that I could be the one breaking all of their records,” he said. “However, this was also one of the best points in my career. I realized that I have the same abilities as anyone else. The key is wanting it as much as they do.”

After Woodley returned to the track, he said that his biggest challenge was getting his confidence level back. He returned to have his best season ever his senior year, ranking seventh in the nation in the 60 meter hurdles his best event.

“I was surprised by my performance,” he said. “But at the same time, I knew there was more in me.”

Woodley wasn’t the only one who believed he had more in him.

He attributes much of his success to the support of his family.

“Woodley is the loudest cheerleader in the stands,” he said. “He’s the one who gives the one yell before the gun goes off.”

When Woodley was a freshman in high school, he thought about quitting track. He told his mom that he would even pay her back the registration money to join the team, just as long as he didn’t have to run anymore.

“Tough times”

Woodley’s mother, Raye, had said that he hated reading Woodley as a role model and look forward to visit his home in Canada.

“He’s always nice to me,” said Kevin. “I love when he comes home to play football, watch movies or just to hang out.”

On the homefront

Woodley also tries to find time for being a typical college student.

Besides playing video games, he likes to listen to hip-hop and reggae music and hang out with friends to relax.

One of his best friends is Veronica Dyer, a senior on the SU women’s track team. Her mother described her as very open and honest.

Woodley also said that the team contributed to his devotion to track. Throughout the beginning of his college-career, he kept a picture of his father posing in a competition taped to the inside of his locker in Manley Fieldhouse.

“I would look at the picture everyday before practice,” he said. “I knew that if I wanted to get that attention, I needed to have a good practice.”

Woodley also said that the team contributed to his devotion to track. He is best friends with a child, and that has helped him evaluate things and make his actions wisely.

“I also try to remember that I am the oldest,” he said. “I have an example to set.”

Woodley’s brothers - Kevin, 14, and Curtis, 17 - both said that they admire Woodley as a role model and look forward to visit his home in Canada.

“He’s always nice to me,” said Kevin. “I love when he comes home to play football, watch movies or just to hang out.”

know he knows he is good but he never flaunts it.”

After Woodley competed in college, he would like to eventually move back to Canada and possibly find a sports-related job in retail for a company like Nike or become a manager of a sporting goods store.

In the near future, he is focusing on making it on the 2000 Canadian Olympic team this summer.

Currently, Woodley is out of competition because of a hamstring injury he acquired during a meet about a month ago. While this may make him qualify for the year’s national competition, he said that he has to remain focused on getting the hamstring heal so he can be ready for Olympic try-outs in mid-July.

“I have always wanted to go to the Olympics,” Woodley said as his face brightened. “You’ve gotta have that as the final goal.”

But even if he doesn’t earn a spot on the team, he’s too dedicated to stop trying.

“If I don’t make the cut this year, I will be greatly discouraged,” he said. “But, I’ll just have to train harder for the next time around.”

As long as he keeps trying, Woodley said he can only think that will keep him satisfied regardless of the final outcome of his running career.

“Don’t worry. It’s not always whether you win or lose,” he said, “but whether or not you had a great race.”

When Adrian Woodley crosses the finish line, he doesn't revel in glory.
Sharing over hurdles with enough height and speed to take the lead among a pack of exhausted runners is something most Olympic hopefuls would be excited about. But, unlike most athletes, Woodley doesn't celebrate his wins.
"Sometimes my teammates criticize me because I don't look like I'm hyped up enough, but it's just my way of dealing with things," said the senior retail major.
Woodley's philosophy about winning is a key component in keeping him focused on his Olympic dream.
A native of Ontario, Canada, this fifth-year
Syracuse University senior has an intimidating physique, with a tall frame and the long legs of a track star. Looking at him gives the impression that he can out-hurdle any opponent. Inside, though, he describes himself as modest.
"My exterior always looks like I'm han-wreck or extremely confident, but I don't portray it," he said. "My emotions rarely get the best of me." Woodley started track in the fifth grade and continued competing in both club and school teams throughout high school. He now serves as captain for the SU track team and hurdles in both in-

Besides his accomplishments with Greeks argue new policy

The National Panhellenic Conference advised sororities in 1998 to ban all alcohol-related events with fraternities in the brothers' homes. On Monday, Syracuse University's Panhellenic Association said all campus sororities should take the advice.

The conference — an umbrella organization managing 26 national and international sororities — recommended two years ago in support of dry fraternities. It reasoned that if sororities banned events with alcohol, then fraternities would have an easier time remaining dry and less tempted to host alcohol-related functions.

"We have to abide by what NPC asks but also do what is best for the campus," said Sarah Kerr, Panhel president. "Panhel will vote Monday to establish this policy."

Several SU sororities, however, have already adopted such a resolution, and the recommendation will not be affected by Monday's vote. But several sorority presidents and Panhel thought the initiative and judicial affairs director Anastasia Urtz.

The initiative needs to respond to the crimes being committed on and around campus instead of just breaking up parties, said Sparks, one of about 30 students involved in a Neighborhood Patrol Initiative. But Jen Newman, a member of University Union Enterprises, questioned why Panhel might change its role in programming.

"I was wondering why you feel the constitution needed to be changed in the first place," said Newman, a freshman graphics and art history major. "President Jamal James refused to address her question arguing that it was not relevant to the proposal."

Newman later accepted a compromise proposal that it was not relevant to the proposal."

Professor explains black class separation

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

There is little division between the black middle class and the black poor in urban areas, assistant professor Mary Patillo-McCoy said. "If you look at some historical studies of black communities, you see that they all at- tempt to account for the black community in a community of black origin.," Patillo-McCoy said. "They gave significant attention to the black elite, even at a time when that population was small."

Throughout time, however, that research perspective changed, she said. After World War II, the focus shifted toward the poverty-stricken black population, she explained. "It's ironic that in the post-World War II era, just as the black middle-class began to grow exponentially, attention began to focus on the black urban poor," Patillo-McCoy added.

Patillo-McCoy hails from Northwestern University, where she teaches sociology and African American studies. Her lecture was drawn partly from her new book, "Black Picket Fences: Privilege and Peril Among the Black Middle Class." About 50 people attended.

Seizure suspected in Banks incident

Staff Reports

Despite reports that former Syracuse University football player Vernon Banks used a narcotic drug late Friday night, the owner of Harry's Bar said the ex-linebacker may have been experiencing a "seizure" — which caused him to act violently.

"I didn't see him ingest anything or smoke anything," said John Shahin, owner of Har- ry's, 700 S. Crouse Ave. "I have never known other things to do anything like that."

Banks appeared to be under the influence of Harry's about twice a week as an SU student, Shahin added.

Ed Niewiostki, Banks' former basketball coach at Bishop Kearney High School in Rochester, said he was told by high school administrators that Banks had a medical history of seizures.

"I can't believe that he would take a narcotic," Niewiostki said. "He's as straight as a kid that I've ever coached. I don't associate alcohol or drugs with him."

But police said based on their knowledge of narcotic use, Banks appeared to be under the influence.

The latest round of conflicts between New York State Assembly Majority Leader Michael Bragman and the Centro Board of Directors continues as the two square off over a proposed bridge project.

For more than a year, Centro board members and Bragman have disputed the construction of a bridge between the Carousel Center, the Regional Transportation Center and P&C Stadium. Bragman (D-Onondaga) revived the issue last week, trying to push the project forward. The Centro board, however, wants to ensure the safety of the bridge before construction begins.

Bragman could not be reached for comment.

The project was tabled a little more than a year ago because of construction problems, said Robert Strague, Centro's chief administrative officer.

"The difficulty is that the proximity of where the new bridge needs to be built is directly next to an old bridge used by Amtrak for their services," he said.

The construction stopped because the work was causing a tilt in the old bridge, Strague said. In order to uphold safety, the Amtrak bridge would need to be halted temporarily, he added.

"It can ill-afford to be shut down in any period of time," said Strague, citing the bridge's heavy use.

The Central New York Regional Transportation Authority, the body that controls Centro and its board, does not wish to be held responsible for any damages that further construction may accrue, Strague explained.

In an effort to keep Centro from being blamed for damages, the authority is attempting to sell the project to an independent contractor with more experience, such as OnTrack, he added.

"The authority does not believe they are the best organization to build that bridge under the circumstances," Strague said.

The project has not changed managers yet — if in fact a change will occur — but it is definite that the bridge will exceed the original budget, Strague said.

"No one has found a solution that everyone agrees can go forward," he said. "We're extremely hopeful that OnTrack will be able to come and construct the bridge."

Conflicts between Bragman and Centro arose more recently when Bragman criticized the Centro board's decision to hire an executive director.

"The volunteers' time is done as a public benefit," Bragman said.

Divinity and the amount of time spent on the board is not controlled by the board, but by the city and the counties, he said.

"The resolve of the problem of diversity rests within those bodies," he said. "The board itself does not replace the board."

There is also a statement in the bylaws of the board allowing members to stay active until their position is replaced, Strague said.

An example of the board's dedication is its consistency in attendance by reaching quorum — the necessary number of members needed at a meeting to conduct business.

"A better look at the board is the fact that for over 30 years, it's never missed a meeting for lack of a quorum," he said.

Barbara "Safetyn around 10 a.m. on Fridays and Saturdays is at a below acceptable level."

There have been five reported car break-ins during the last week in or near areas surrounding the university. Within the last two months, there have also been two reported gunpoint robberies involving students and an assault sending one severely-beaten woman to the hospital.

"Statistics show that crime isn't worse," Freund said. "If students have any creative potential solutions, let us know."

SQA Executive Director Nicholas Maccarone suggested to Freund that faculty members be more "approachable" and "responsive" to student needs.

Faculty members should be less defensive and more open to students' concerns, Maccarone said.

Teaching assistants were also criticized for not speaking English well. Many assistants have accents that make understanding them difficult, said Assemblyman Adam Dully, a freshman political science major.

They go through a rigorous screening process, Freund answered.

"But it's a problem at most universities and there's no perfect solution," she added.

Students should consider whether it is the accent they do not understand or their teaching methods, Freund said, adding that "students must invest some energy to understand them, the responsibility is on both sides."

Campus ethnicity

SQA President Jamal James then questioned what is being done regarding the lack of diversity in the drama department.

There is only one black faculty member in the department and not enough students of color to be in "an ethnic production," James said.

"That's the department's excuse for not putting on a black play," he added.

James said an argument within the department about the lack of diverse productions occurred during his first year in the musical theater program. They responded by producing "Once on This Island", a play that deals with race issues, he added.

"I saw the show and it didn't make sense to me because most of the cast was white," James said. "And the department's argument for not casting more blacks is because there are none."

James suggested that the school should actively recruit more students and faculty of color.

This issue is a high priority, Freund said. She added, "It's my own number one issue," she said.

SU's latest ranking in U.S. News and World Report was also a concern.

In August, the magazine ranked the school below number 50, giving SU what many believe is a "second-tier status."

Freund said that magazine rankings are given too much weight. The criteria involved in the magazine's evaluation of the university has yet to be determined, she said.

"It's like a black box—you don't know all the dimensions on how you're being ranked and they change every year," Freund said.

Students have to consider the "rich factor." Other schools have more endowment and the ability to spend more money on their students, Freund said.

"Our atmosphere is completely different in that it places more emphasis on faculty-student relations."

Influence

"Based on our observations, this was not the normal behavior of a person having a seizure," said Anthony Colavita, the officer responding to the scene early Saturday morning.

The officer added that Banks did not appear to be intoxicated.

At about midnight, Banks "fell" to the ground inside Harvey Hall and was assisted back to his feet by former SU quarterback Donovan McNabb, Shahin said.

"Donovan got him up off the ground and he was dancing again," Shahin said. "After he fell again, I said 'Fuck it, I'm going to call an ambulance.'"

McNabb and other former SU football players carried Banks outside and into the linebacker's black Infiniti—where the line-backer became violent and kicked out his sunroof.

Banks' companions restrained him before police arrived outside the CVS store at the corner of East Adams Street and South Crouse Avenue.

"We were decent to us," Colavita said. "When we got there, they were in the process of lifting the unconscious bank."

Excess greek rules prompt snatch autonomy

Forcing greeks out of their houses and into the streets won’t dry up the rivers of beer that flow throughout the entire university.

But a new ruling by the National Panhellenic Conference seeks to do just that. In order to support the movement toward dry fraternity houses, the conference hopes to nudge sororities in the same direction by begging the entire greek system down with more overzealous rules and regulations.

If some of the 26 national sorority chapters — run by people who own or have owned a university — have their way, sisters won’t even be allowed to pour themselves a glass of wine at a harmless fraternity-sorority mixer.

The trend of targeting greek events in the confusing maze of a frat house living room, many greeks will be forced to move their events to bars, which begs questions about the sensibility of the ruling.

But events involving alcohol conducted outside houses, would-be drinkers jump behind the wheel to get to and from the party destination — surely an accident waiting to happen. If greek events are confined to private houses, most worries of drunk-driving accidents are averted. It’s senseless for national chapters to create rules that put their members in harm’s way unnecessarily.

And if SU prides itself on the quality of its classroom offerings, the new rules should raise a red flag for administrators, too.

The events involving alcohol in bars or off-campus social enclaves, they must generally take place on off-peak nights — namely, week nights that are invariably followed by early-morning classes. And after a Sunday night at the bars, which could easily have been traded for a Saturday in a greek house, it’s doubtful that many greeks will be showing up for that 8:30 a.m. class.

Binge drinking is unfortunate, and it often leads to disastrous consequences. But cloaking the greek system in even more red tape regulation isn’t the answer to ensuring member safety or cleaning up its tarnished image.

PVA professor touched many through art, passion

To the Editor:

I was waiting for a train to New York City when I found out John Sellers had cancer. A man in the waiting room was crying, another woman an update on his medical condition. I was shocked and saddened by the news. And when I flipped The Daily Orange over past Thursday, I was floored.

I met John Sellers briefly last semester while doing an article for Syracuse University Magazine on the independent study design program that he started 34 years ago in the College of Visual and Performing Arts.

I remember going to his office for an interview and being inspired by the love and emotion he had for the program. The signature he smoked burned forgotten in his hand as he leaned back and spoke maudlin to me about the program. His office was the size of a closet and he was sitting far from the only window. I left there with the stench of smoke clinging to my clothes and the bliss that is Chicago. I’ve traveled to California. London, Texas and Florida. Even though I’ve enjoyed many of those places, my heart constantly yearns for the heart of Chicagoans, including the late, great baseball player.

the new focus. The Assembly will drop the word "government" from its name to reflect its new role.

Jen Newman, SGA's Student Representation, said on it. "Instead of shoving the Assembly, we're going to say exactly what we find."

Freshman Justin Godell said he wants to be elected to the committee. "I'd like to join the committee because I feel there needs to be students who participate in student programming involved," she said. Godell also accepted a seat on the committee saying that he wants to increase student awareness on issues such as the proposed SGA and UU merger.

The merger proposal was replaced April 3 by a new bill eliminating UU from the process and changing SGA's role in programming.

"There's too many people," Godell said. "That's going to slow it down. They just killed it right there."

Assemblyman Adam Duffy, a freshman political science major and an outspoken critic of the merger, nominated himself for a seat on the committee because he said he wants to continue working with SGA members on the issue between SGA and the student body.

"The way it's presented, it's a good idea," said Duffy, after being elected to the committee. "It's going to assess what the students think about the Student Association and we're going to say exactly what we find.

"You have people from SGA on it, people from UU on it and students on it."

If the bill is passed in a referendum later this month, SGA will drop the word "government" from its name to reflect its new focus.

He added, however, that he suspects that certain committees will still use the committee as a way of re-addressing the merger with UU.

Duffy was one of several Assemblymembers who protest- ed the April 3 bill, arguing that the vote was inaccurate because James estimated rather than counted the votes.

The case was brought before SGA's Judicial Review Board last Thursday night and the board deemed that James had not violated any constitutional procedure in his vote.

Assemblyman Joe Sauer, a freshman biology major, com- mended James on taking all of the votes by either a show of hands or roll call.

James said that he does not intend to continue this procedure of voting. "Don't get used to it," he said.

In other SGA news:

- The Assembly voted against further postponing two referenda once scheduled for later this week. Students were to vote concerning funding for the New York State Public Interest Research Group and the bill that would revitalize SGA's constitution.

- Some Assemblymembers argued that since the referenda will be conducted the last week of school, many students will not have the time to adequately look into the issues.

- The Judicial Review Board mandated that the referenda be postponed until April 25 to April 27 because workers had not been approved by the Assembly to operate the polling stations.

- Sauer said he supports moving the referenda to the Fall 2000 Semester, allowing time to clear the air of controversial issues such as the proposed SGA and UU merger.

- "Instead of shoving the whole thing on the student body and having them vote on some issues, let's give them time," Sauer said.

The constitution requires that all people chosen to operate polling locations be approved by a two-thirds vote of the Assembly.

Oates argued that this is not possible because it is too difficult to find people in advance to manage the stations. He said that as chairman of the Assembly should trust his judgement in selecting people to operate the polls.

"I'm assuming that by electing me, you guys trust me," said Oates, a senior engineering major. "It makes my life a little easier. No one ever wants to come forward saying 'I want to run a polling station.'"

"Basically, it allows me to convince my friends to sit at the tables an hour before the vote."

Assemblyman Eric Seltzer, a sophomore in the College of Arts and Sciences, said that rather than eliminate the rule, the Assembly should focus on better enforcing it.

"We obviously haven't been doing our job as an Assembly."

Only one Assemblymember volunteered to operate a polling station, Oates said.

Assistant Parliamentarian Faith Tartaglia argued in favor of the elimination saying that the code has not always been followed before.

"I'm almost willing to bet that just because it was put in as a code it hasn't been followed," said Tartaglia, a junior chemical engineering major. "The Ang major...it is the only way to get people to do it."

The Assembly approved the bill with a majority vote.

The mental gymnastics needed to reach a desired Web site also are complicated by entrepreneurs who hope that adding an “e” or “i” to their Web site’s name will make it sound high-tech. Network Solutions has already registered more than 9 million names ending in such “generic top-level domains” as .com. The name game could explode if a proposal to add domains as .firm, .store, .law and .arts is approved by the Internet’s nonprofit organization TransFair USA, signifies that the coffee is grown under safe working conditions and sold directly to retailers, not through middlemen, thereby guaranteeing a fair price for the farmer. Thawing out Scientists have long assumed that the 20-foot rise in ocean depth after the Ice Age came from the thinning of the West Antarctic Ice Sheet. But two researchers made a strong case in the April 6 issue of Nature that two-thirds of the ocean rise was produced by a drastic thaw in the Greenland Ice Sheet. As much as 10 feet of the world’s sea-level rise resulted from the melting of Greenland ice over a few thousand years.

Harrison Ford deserves accolade

True story. A month before I first came to Syracuse University, I asked my boyfriend at the time, who went to go to the movies with me, to see “Six Days, Seven Nights.” She wasn’t familiar with it, so I told her I heard that it was a new romantic comedy-adventure.

“Who’s in it,” she asked me further to see if she really wanted to see it.

I continued to tell her that Harrison Ford was in it, and we was Anne Heche.

Well, what she said to me next boggled my delicate mind so much so that I couldn’t have another meaningful conversation with this girl again.

“Who’s Harrison Ford?” she questioned me with a stone straight face.

A week later we broke up for obvious reasons.

Sure, you may question if my actions were a little harsh or ridiculous under the circumstances, but if I ever tell this story, everyone agrees that I made the right decision. Everyone, I mean everyone, has had to have heard of Harrison Ford. It’s like not knowing who Mickey Mouse is.

Ford recently received the American Film Institute’s 28th Lifetime Achievement Award. Because the ceremony will be broadcast this Wednesday at 8 p.m. on CBS, I’m going to have to go to some lengths in my actions were a little harsh or ridiculous under the circumstances, but if I ever tell this story, everyone agrees that I made the right decision. Everyone, I mean everyone, has had to have heard of Harrison Ford. It’s like not knowing who Mickey Mouse is.

Past recipients of the award have included legendary names like Alfred Hitchcock, Bette Davis, Jimmy Stewart, Orson Welles, Clint Eastwood and Jack Nicholson, just to mention a few. The event, held on Feb. 17 at the Beverly Hills Hilton Hotel, was attended by almost everyone who has worked with the actor during his extensive career.

It’s bound to be an interesting show for you if you’re interested in the career of Harrison Ford like I am. Having been raised the bastard child of the first generation of VCRs, I pretty much learned how to be a guy from watching all the early Ford work. FOOTBALL
On being carried off the field in his last game at Beaver Stadium: "It was a very emotional moment. The players felt it was good to have the opportunity. I didn't plan a grand exit, but under the circumstances, it was great. The whole season was a great experience."

On Pasqualoni: "He was as a player what he is as a coach. He worked hard and loved football. He was a student of the game."

On Joe Paterno: "It's amazing that he still enjoys what he's done for so long. Amazing person. Football just energizes him. It wouldn't surprise me to see him coach until his 80s or 90s old."

Coaches Sandusky talked at the question on everyone's mind: Who should the Browns take with the No. 1 pick in the draft? Although he didn't pick a grim exit, but so long. Amazing person. Football worked hard and loved football.

"It wouldn't surprise me to see him coach until his 80s or 90s old."

Offensive Line
The offensive line needs rebuilding after graduating six seniors from the starting lineup. This line is unique because players will not come out of spring practice with a single position. Offensive line coach George DeLeone wants all the players to be able to play at least two positions.

Then, Syracuse can put the five best linemen in front of whoever the quarterback will be. Back at the line position, though is Sean O'Connor. He is lining up at tackle and guard, but will probably be found lining up next to the center come September.

He should join Joseph Burton and P.J. Alexander on the front line. All three linemen saw considerable playing time over the last two seasons.

On the depth chart, Alexander is listed as the starting center, but he could line up at left tackle to protect the QB's blindside. If he does, then redshirt freshman Nick Romeo will handle the snapping responsibilities.

The depth chart also has Erik Kofoed and LaVigno at the bookends. The battle for the five slot will continue between 10 relatively even competitors.

We're very excited about this group of offensive linemen," Coach P said. There was some quickness and explosiveness there.

"We just want to make sure that when we get to the end of spring practice, that we get to the first six practices, that we get to the last two seasons.

The door is left open for last year's punter, Mike Shafer. The surnomad -- who looks as old as his jersey number 13 -- will most likely inherit Trott's old job.

Recruited as a kicker from Riverview (Fla.) High School, Shafer may both punt and kick. Much depends on the showings of Colin Evans, an SU signee from Catholic (Ky.) High School.

The coaching staff is also taking time to look at walk-on Ben Koehl and junior camper Ferris, who has been booming kickoffs into the end zone.

Another problem that plagued the special teams last year was long snapping. Departed tight end Mike Bennett handled those duties, but he not only launched snaps over Shafer's outstretched hands, but also through the uprights.

Junior Mark Holtzman is in position to claim that job. He has been consistent in practice. Although Malik Campbell and Dee Brown fielded punts though the first six practices, Pasqualoni said that Pat Woolcock would return to his position as kick returner.

Other stories
The depth chart lists Troy Nunes as the top QB with Madei Williams in the No. 2 hole. It makes reference to either K.J. Anderson or Chad Elliott. Although just a sophomore, Clifton Smith is filling the possible first-round pick Keith Bullock's old middle linebacker role as the leader of the defensive unit. Malik Campbell may be the Orangeman's version of the versatile Pittsburgh Steelers QB Kordell "Sugar" Stewart.

Drangmen in 1987 with a 19-6 win at the Carrier Dome. In playoffs that season, the Big Red smacked SU again, this time 15-15, for its 19th consecutive victory.

The drought started the next season and continued at least until this afternoon, when the No. 1 Cornell invades Ithaca.

Cornell (6-1), however, appears prepared to slow down Syracuse. The Big Red owns the second best scoring defense in America, allowing just 6.9 goals per game, and its lone loss came by one goal to No. 7 Maryland.

Head coach Dave Pietramala, a former NCAA defenseman of the year at Johns Hopkins, molded two juniors and a freshman to play his unique defensive style.

In a 12-7 win at Harvard on Saturday, Cornell packed in its defense and forced several outside shots. The Big Red, however, rebounded on defensive goals Justin Cynar's pads and cleared the ball 24 out of 28 times.

Coach Pietramala has done a great job at Cornell, and they definitely are a solid team," SU midfielder Josh Coffman said. "They have a great defensive scheme. Once again, we'll get to see something new defensively. We'll have to see how we respond to it.

Pietramala's defense should get a boost from the crazy Central New York weather. Local meteorologists predict winds and snow flurries for Ithaca this afternoon.

Temperatures in the mid-30s, with high winds and snow flurries for Ithaca this afternoon.

Pietramala's defense should receive a test from Cornell charge for a 15-10 victory.

The Big Red -- who use a hard hat in the center circle to beat big brother SU's underappreciated backfield -- will take more than a sophomore stand-up in the center circle to beat big brother Syracuse.

"We feel good about our team," senior co-captain Chris Packard told reporters earlier this season. "We feel we are capable of beating anybody if we play our game."

The Scoop

More than halfway to a perfect regular season, the Orangemen open a four-game road swing in Ithaca.

Last year at the Dome, SU jumped to an 11-2 lead and held off a late Cornell charge for a 15-10 victory.

Defense should prove key for Syracuse, as Steinwald possesses the ability to beat a team by himself. Coming off the emotional comeback against Loyola, SU needs to keep its guard and not underestimate the scrappy Big Red.

Pietramala praised Bollig throughout the season, calling him a major key to Cornell's winning ways.

But the third-year coach knows it will take more than a sophomore stand-up in the center circle to beat big brother Syracuse.

"We feel good about our team," senior co-captain Chris Packard told reporters earlier this season. "We feel we are capable of beating anybody if we play our game."

Cornell (6-1), however, appears prepared to slow down Syracuse. The Big Red owns the second best scoring defense in America, allowing just 6.9 goals per game, and its lone loss came by one goal to No. 7 Maryland.

Head coach Dave Pietramala, a former NCAA defenseman of the year at Johns Hopkins, molded two juniors and a freshman to play his unique defensive style.

In a 12-7 win at Harvard on Saturday, Cornell packed in its defense and forced several outside shots. The Big Red ponced on rebounds off goalie Justin Cynar's pads and cleared the ball 24 out of 28 times.

"Coach Pietramala has done a great job at Cornell, and they definitely are a solid team," SU midfielder Josh Coffman said. "They have a great defensive scheme. Once again, we'll get to see something new defensively. We'll have to see how we respond to it."

Pietramala's defense should get a boost from the crazy Central New York weather. Local meteorologists predict temperatures in the mid-30s, with high wind and the wet.

"You're going to try to shut down (attackers Lance) Banks, (Mike) Springer and Powell," Cynar said. "If that's not hard enough to do, the midfield's the there. The key to a successful team is to have everybody involved and everyone scoring."

At the other end of the pitch, SU's defense should receive a test from Cornell's slow-down attack.

The Big Red — who use a hard hat as their team symbol — enjoy tucking teams into sleep with endless possessions and then capitalizing in one-on-one situations.

Senior Sean Steinwald leads Cornell with 23 goals and nine assists. Juniors Andrew Schardt and freshman Michael Egan join the offense's leader up front.

The Orangemen (7-0) yield fewer than eight goals per game and have kept their last four opponents out of double digits. Junior Rob Mulligan ranked fourth in the country in goals against average and save percentage heading into Friday night's 16-9 victory against Loyola.

The key to success for both clubs lies at the face-off 'X.' With Chris Cercy out in the center circle to beat big brother, SU wins 63 percent of the face-offs this season and averages almost eight more possessions per game than their opponents.

Big Red sophomore Addison Sollog wins 54 percent of his face-offs, including an impressive 15-for-19 performance against Army.

Senior Sean Steinwald possesses an 11-2 lead and held off a late Cornell charge for a 15-10 victory.

A buzz word floats off the lips of the Syracuse tennis players, one that signifies a season of surprising success and promising optimism.

The Orangewomen want to go to Malibu, the California city in which the NCAA Tournament takes place this year.

After Sunday's 8-1 demolition of Seton Hall, the trip becomes more possible. SU systematically picked apart the Pirates.

Consumer advocate criticizes corporate, party politics

Games at the Carrier Dome and outlandish Cola-Cola products are part of student life at Syracuse University.

But these are signs of corporate influence infiltrating universities, consumer advocate and Green Party presidential candidate Ralph Nader said.

Nader lashed out at corporate power and encouraged citizen activism during his speech to more than 600 people Tuesday afternoon in Hendricks Chapel.

Universities should be independent centers of learning, but instead have become subsidiaries of corporations, Nader said.

"All the barriers between commercialism and education are breaking down," he said.

Universities are also failing to teach students citizen skills, ways to gain political leverage using public policy, Nader said. They are wary of doing this because it would lead inquisitive students to challenge authority and the status quo, he said.

Nader said he never studied "corporate crime" in school — not even during law school at Harvard University — and only remembered learning about the three branches of government.

"It was as dull as eating a ton of sawdust without butter," he added.

Students expect to go to college to receive job training but do not have the opportunity to develop citizen skills, Nader said.

Citizen skills are necessary to make democracy work and counteract the booming corporate commercial culture, he said.

The New York State Public Interest Research Group teaches citizen skills, like how to file a Freedom of Information Act, Nader said.

Orangemen continue fight to stay on campus

The commencement of the 2000-2001 winter sports season will mark the end of a storied piece of Syracuse University sports history.

The wrestling team will be on the mat for its 79th and final year when the season begins early next November.

On Jan. 21, 1997, SU Director of Athletics John Crouthamel dropped Orange men wrestling and gymnastics citing budgetary constraints. He added that the decision was made about a year prior to the announcement.

But former wrestling coach Ed Carlin and other sources close to the team said the announcement came a few months after Crouthamel and SU Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw passed in 1972. Nader lashed out at corporate power and encouraged citizen activism during his speech to more than 600 people Tuesday afternoon in Hendricks Chapel.

A O Pi chapter closes after hazing charges

Alpha Omicron Pi sorority closed its campus doors last week after its national office found evidence of hazing within the house.

The national decision took effect Friday, said Chuck Merrihew, associate vice president for Syracuse University Student Affairs.

The organization is no longer a recognized sorority on campus, Merrihew said, and if members have any future violations, those involved will be punished as individuals instead of as a chapter.

"They also can't convey the impression that they are still a group," Merrihew added. "They're not supposed to wear letters or sign up for intramural basketball.

The national decision comes in response to a Feb. 27 report of hazing and alcohol violations.

Six new members, or pledges, of A O Pi were found intoxicated at Flint Residence Hall on that date. Two of the girls were intoxicated to the point where they had to be transported to Crouse Hospital, 736 Irving Ave. They spent the night there under observation.

Serious representative could not be reached for comment and the SU Office of Greek Life refused to comment.

College students — including those at Syracuse University — protesting alleged sweatshop conditions in factories where university clothing is made deserve high praise, said Bennett Freeman, a U.S. deputy assistant secretary of state.

Freeman, deputy assistant secretary of state for democracy, human rights and labor, said students as well as activist non-governmental organizations throughout the world are helping to hold corporations accountable for their behavior.

Demonstrations, such as the upcoming protests against the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank in Washington, D.C., are becoming critical to raising public consciousness about issues surrounding corporations as they expand around the globe, he added.

"Globalization is on all our minds," he said. "Globalization and the backlash against it that we're going to see acted out in the streets over the next four or five days, are here today.

About 60 people attended Freeman's lecture on globalization and corporate responsibility Tuesday afternoon in Pipers Hall.

Wrestling alumni group meets to fund-raise goal

BY ERIC NATHAN

In April of 1997 — about three months after Syracuse Director of Athletics Jake Greenhalgh's announcement that the university was going to drop the wrestling program — five former SU wrestlers established Keep Syracuse Wrestling, Inc. (KSW) to keep the program alive.

Led by President Sonny Greenland, Keep Syracuse Wrestling is seeking to raise $2 million, about half of that figure, meaning the athletic department would spend $500,000 to keep the program alive without scholarships, Greenland said.

"The option is to fix it, and that's a viability option," Greenland said.

"They all cost money, and I'm funding a program that is costing lots of money," said SU's athletics director.

Crouthamel accused Greenland of not making the university "look bad in the letters that we wrote to high school coaches in the area," and named other universities that have dropped the sport because of wrestling's anticipated demise.

The Keep Syracuse Wrestling members have also displayed statistics acknowledging that wrestling is one of the least popular sport in New York State.

"Look at it," Greenwood said. "His decision was based on financial reasons. That was an easy target for them."

ESF professor accused of tree theft attempts

Christopher A. Nowak, an associate professor at the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry, was charged April 2 with attempting to steal 22 spruce trees from a private property, according to Town of Manlius Police Department officials.

A local professor will stand trial May 24 for having allegedly tried to steal 22 spruce trees from a private property, according to Town of Manlius Police Department officials.

After being confronted, Nowak explained that he was just going to use the trees, Treglia said.

"It was the stupidest thing," Schaefer said. "You'd think they'd take a gold statue or something."

Schaefer said the spruce trees—valued at $10 each—were located behind her mailbox among white pine trees. They were intentionally planted in a zigzag pattern so the branches would interlock when the trees matured, she added.

She added that her neighbors witnessed Nowak digging up the trees. When approached, Nowak became "belligerent" and acted "like he had a right to do this," Schaefer said. All of the trees were uprooted, but Nowak only tried to leave with three or four, Schaefer said.

"This is like something out of the Twilight Zone that someone's taking trees on a Sunday morning," Pat Schaefer said.

Nowak is a fine person and professor, said William Bentley, chairman of the forestry department at ESP. He called the case a misunderstanding.

"These things happen," Bentley said. "I think you're chasing a tempest in a teapot."

Walsh battles county as cleanup deadline nears

BY MAGIN MCKENNA  Asst. Lifestyle Editor

Bickering among New York state legislators may force the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to spend an additional $1 million to clean up Onondaga Lake, one of the most polluted lakes in the nation.

State lawmakers have until May 1 to pass legislation that will enable the Army Corps to continue developing a project for cleaning the lake before it must relinquish the study to Onondaga County, said U.S. Rep. Jim Walsh, (R-Syracuse), who contracted the Army Corps for the cleanup study in December.

Under the direction of the county legislature, Walsh contacted the Army Corps four months ago to find less expensive alternatives to the lake cleanup that differed from the county's plan.

"We brought the Corps in to stop political bickering," Walsh said Tuesday from his Washington, D.C., office. "The idea was to avoid all this. It's pretty frustrating."

The debate in the New York State Assembly centers on a state law that protects organized labor interests. Legislators feel that the Army Corps' study of cleanup alternatives could present threats to the local workforce by intruding on unionized labor rights.

Army Corps officials are also asking the legislature to grant exemptions to the state's bidding laws, said Walsh who oversees an appropriate sub-committee in the U.S. House of Representatives.

"The exemptions would allow one company to oversee the design and construction work for new sewage treatment facilities instead of multiple companies," Walsh added.

Walsh called the Assembly's labor concerns "ungrounded" because the Army Corps already upholds a labor agreement.

"I understand why they may not want to do this," Walsh said. "But if the result gets you a clean lake and hundreds of jobs, isn't it worth it?"

The Onondaga County Legislature and New York State Senate have shown active support of a search for a cleanup plan that differs from the county's proposal, which includes the renovation of the current sewage system, Walsh said.

"We are working hand in hand with the county to get a resolution," said Art Levy, a spokesman for New York State Sen. John DeFrancisco, (R-Syracuse). "We have tried to make possible at the Army Corps what we are trying to do."

New York State Assembly Majority Leader Michael Bragman (D-Syracuse) could not be reached for comment at his Albany office.

About $50 million in federal funds appropriated by Walsh for the lake cleanup are currently sitting in a U.S. General Services Administration Agency bank account in New York. But until the Army Corps reaches a final resolution on the lake cleanup, the funds remain undeposited.

Because the money has not yet been spent, it will be difficult for Walsh to secure an additional $15 million in federal money needed for the project, he said.

"If I'm going to be real challenge, now," Walsh said. "People promised to say, 'You already have $50 million dollars in the bank that you haven't spent, and you want more?'

Onondaga Lake is contaminated with high levels of mercury from years of dumping by local industry and untreated sewage that flows into the lake because of the area's outdated sewage system.

Critics of the county's plan say the Army Corps' intervention is the only method that will foster an environmentally sound and cost-effective lake cleanup.

The cleanup effort will suffer a major setback if the Army Corps is forced to abandon the project, said Dr. Steven Effler, research director for the Upstate Freshwater Institute, an organization that researches water pollution and potential ways to improve Onondaga Lake.

"It would be a shame," Effler said. "We will be stuck with the county's existing plan, which doesn't work."

But Michael Cunningham, director of the county's Onondaga Lake Improvement Program, continues to press state leaders on the lake cleanup, and may not need intervention from the Army Corps.

"Our intent is to do the project ourselves with as little environmental impact as possible," Cunningham said. "We have already saved $69 million from our $360 million budget."

The county expects most of the planning projects for the lake cleanup will be completed by 2007, Cunningham added. "We're moving progressively ahead of schedule," he said.

Onondaga County has promised the EPA and the Council of Atlantic States in a court order that it will complete the lake cleanup in seven years, Cunningham said.

With the deadline nearing for state lawmakers to approve the project, Walsh is in a bind and is confident that a resolution will be reached.

"I want a clean lake," he said. "The Assembly needs to realize the political points are minimal and if it doesn't want to do what we're asking it to do, it needs to tell us what we should do."

Day Hall resident reports harassing phone call

Staff Reports

A resident of Day Hall received an "annoying" phone call Thursday, according to a Public Safety report.

The resident did not trace the call and the Office of Residence Life was notified of the incident, the report added.

Public Safety Chief Robert Robinson said harassing phone calls are among the top three crimes committed at all university campuses.

"Not unusual," Robinson said. "That's a problem that's going to be here as long as we're going to be here."

He added that in many cases, students receive menacing calls from people they know.

"They should be conscious when they talk to them," he said. "You control who you talk to. If you don't give callers the opportunity, you won't be bothered."

A student reported a lost wallet and money on Friday, according to a Public Safety report.

The belongings of the wallet were returned to the student in an envelope, the report said.

Included in the envelope was a note from the thief informing the student that he or she was keeping the money and the wallet, the report added.

A hazardous material was found leaking from a plugged drain Thursday in Bowne Hall, according to a Public Safety report.

The material, later identified as a diluted acid, was leaking onto the floor below, the report said.

SU Environmental Health Services responded to the scene and university employees were notified not to touch or go near the substance, the report added.

An unidentified person damaged a glass door Saturday in Day Hall, according to a Public Safety report.

Housing officials were notified to repair the door and clean the scattered glass from the floor, the report said.

Meghan Devine, a resident of the sixth floor, said she was angry about the damage.

"I'm a little concerned that someone is destroying our floor," Devine, a freshman television, radio and film major, said. Devine said she was asleep when the glass was broken.

"I didn't know anything had happened until I saw the damage," she said.

The resident advisor on the floor refused to comment.

The case is closed pending further information, the report said.

There was a motor vehicle accident Sunday involving a car and a Centro bus on South Campus, according to a Public Safety report.

Public Safety and the Syracuse Fire Department were called to Goldstein Student Center, the report said.

A student reported vandalism Sunday afternoon to a mural painted on the window of Beland Hall, according to a Public Safety report.

The case is closed pending further information, the report said.

A student is suspected of firing an "airgun" Sunday on a Skyhall apartment window, according to a Public Safety report.

The gun was not found during a health and safety inspection of the room following the incident, but a knife and "drug related paraphernalia" were confiscated, the report said.

The case has been turned over to the Office of Judicial Affairs, the report added.

An accident between a privately-owned vehicle and a Physical Plant vehicle occurred at the leading dock of the Schine Student Center, according to Public Safety reports.

There were no injuries, the report said.

Corporations should have an interest in acting responsibly to lend stability to the sometimes embattled areas where they operate, Freeman explained, by working for the public interest and not allowing any human rights violations in their facilities, companies will become valued aspects of the countries where they exist, he added.

Freeman said U.S. companies abroad are subject to frequent protests by citizens and sometimes terrorist attacks.

The U.S. government should remain involved in the process to ensure that the corporations accurately represent the nation's policies on democracy and human rights, Freeman said.

Government must also remain committed to determining the truth of accusations of human rights violations, he added.

"It's not in the interest of the United States to be associated with any complicity to human rights violations," Freeman said. "We're not asking companies to become human rights crusaders, but we do think there's some common ground.

Some activists, however, maintain that corporations can never act responsibly, said Goodwin Cooke, an international relations professor.

"The demonstrators at the State Department active role in nations where the U.S. government must also recognize, however, that corporations are motivated by profit, globalization has an increasingly in their self-interest not to walk away from their critics, but engage with them actively," Freeman said. "Companies need to look to our companies to do what they can where they can to promote good governments and fair societies."
Silent heroes make important mark

Our parents burned draft cards to protect the Vietnam War. They marched on the Mall demanding equal rights for women and minorities.

Our generation donates Saturday mornings to helping inner-city children unravel the mysteries of the ABCs. We carve turkeys in soup kitchens at Thanksgiving.

We wage a silent crusade, which yields an immeasurable good. But without a fiery, nation-wide cause to rally around, our efforts often get lost in a flurry of buzzwords like “apathy” and “anomaly.”

Liberal champion Ralph Nader, a Green Party presidential candidate, spoke Tuesday on the Syracuse University Hill. From the altar of Hendricks Chapel, he condemned the mainstream media’s student activism efforts to raise consciousness about the plight of workers in third-world sweatshops.

But they’re not the only ones making a difference in the world around us.

Classes in the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs and SU’s writing programs require students to complete community service hours for course credit. Students who never thought of lending a helping hand are signing up to make a difference. And long after the semester ends, the spirit of volunteerism calls them to continue.

But passion for service can’t truly be taught in the classroom. The desire to serve comes from within, inspired by the smile of a self-confident third grader or a grateful handshake of a bedraggled single mother.

Traditional activist groups, boosting signs and chanting in unison, are the best way to get others to rally behind a cause. But it’s the behind-the-scenes work, the quiet, intangible efforts to chip away at those efforts must not go unnoticed.

Sometimes it’s impossible to attack an issue head-on. But starting small usually ensures the scenes work, the quiet, intangible efforts to chip away at those efforts must not go unnoticed.

All right, science, I’ve got a bone to pick with you. Some pretty hefty promises and predictions have been made in the last 50 years, and I feel as if I’ve been disappointed enough. Where are the flying cars? Why am I still eating full meals instead of popping convenient food packs? I figured by now we’d all have personal anti-gravity devices, or at the very least, “Independence Day” packs.

What’s been going on in all of those top-secret laboratories that are hidden around the country? Did we get a bunch of new technology from the flying saucer that crashed at Roswell that day called “Independence Day” and I don’t understand why that force field around the alien ship can’t be applied to our own current, primitive means of transportation?

Bingo! No more car accidents, no more insurance companies, no more high premiums just because other slackers in my age group don’t know how to drive.

I saw Bill Gates on TV the other day, telling me how much Microsoft has improved my life in the past decade. Instant messaging, quick Internet hook-ups, visual links, whatever. You want to help me out, Billy Boy? Set your scientists to work on building me a teleportation device, then I won’t have to worry about how much damn snow we get. (Okay, technically I’d be able to get to class, that doesn’t actually mean that I’ll be attending U.S. Foreign Policy Since 1914 class anytime in the near future.)

It’s been more than thirty years since we first got into the maquis to get a feel for what it’s like, and now we finally tell me that we still don’t have a colony up there? At the very least there should be a way for us to still be able to get there. Do you know where I went on vacation last summer? Ocean City, Maryland. The moon has to be cooler than that.

And then there’s the medical advances. It seems to me that I’ve been hearing quite a lot of boasting lately about things like cloning and mapping human DNA. So where are the benefits for me? I don’t need an extra lung or liver grown for me (although my sophomore year roommates probably would see the ability to clone livers as proof that God wants us to drink more). I guess I could use a clone for housework and things like that, but after seeing “Multiplicity” I’m wary of scientific duplication.

I’m sick and tired of scientists talking above me. This goes for doctors and engineers and mathematicians, too. Every time I hear a bit of new jargon for something like I’m already paying you $180 to replace a two-foot piece of glass, don’t even listen to you explain all that the other workings of my car, trying to justify why the market price is $150.

You’re all thinking, wow, Matt’s in a bit of a mood this week, and you’d be right. But I wouldn’t be bashing this much if I didn’t have a solution, or in this case maybe a suggestion to all those white coats in the white coats in white coats in white coats. All scientists should drop what they’re doing and begin work on a new project. A project that will change the world forever.

Someone needs to discover a way that people can sleep for twelve hours and through a kind of kiizen transplant method, I could receive the benefits from six of those hours. This way I wouldn’t ever have to sleep, but it wouldn’t affect me physically. At this point some of you are saying, “But I love sleep, that’s the best part of my day.” Well, you are lazy. And that’s okay. Those of us who are active and contributing members of society will need you to sleep for us.

This is a win-win situation. Lazy people get to sleep as much as they want and that can be their job. Those of us who are active and contributing members of society will need you to go back to their original fields. And that’s okay. Those of us who are active and contributing members of society will need you to go back to their original fields. But I urge all of you who are in scientific majors to consider my proposal. It works. Change your focus now and ride the crest of that lucrative green wave all the way to the bank in just a few years. Dear Editor, Concerning the so-called “Neighborhood Patrol Initiative” that Syracuse University has with the Syracuse Police Department, I have one thing to say. It sucks, plain and simple. For those students that don’t know what it is, I’ll let me explain. It is another way for the university to suck our hard-earned money out of our pockets and put it into a program that provides the students with nothing more than a false sense of hope and security.

They are being paid to “patrol,” when in fact, every night, I saw a suspicious man looking through the parking lot behind my car. I told the man that I was going to call the police. I did, and after a few minutes, the police officer showed up. I also gave them exact directions of where the man was walking. After being told they would send a patrol up to check it out, the officer decided to get courageous.

I closely followed the man in my car at a safe distance. He walked from the corner of East Adams Street and Ostrom Avenue to a car at a safe distance. He walked from the corner of East Adams Street and Ostrom Avenue to a parking lot.

Win marks Cornell's comeback

ITHACA — About once a minute, a rear view mirror of the Cornell Big Red's program got a shake.

This time it happened near the end of the third quarter. The team had been playing a game of one-sided lacrosse against a team that had a 2-0 lead. The Cornell players were going in a circle around the field, celebrating their 13-12 victory over the Syracuse Orangemen. The Big Red’s 13-12 victory Tuesday afternoon gave them the Big Red their 13th win this season and a two and a half year's run. The Cornell clubhouse was buzzing with excitement.

But it was not just any victory. This was a win that came after a loss to the No. 1 ranked team in the nation, the Syracuse Orangemen. The loss put Cornell in a tough spot, needing to win their next game to keep their season alive. The Cornell players were determined to win this game, and they did.

The final statistics sheet showed that the Big Red had outscored the Orangemen 13-12. The Big Red's victory over the Orangemen was a testament to their resilience and determination.

The Cornell players were so happy with their victory that they celebrated it in the locker room. They were singing and cheering, and it was clear that they were happy with their victory. The Cornell Big Red's postgame celebration was a sight to behold.

Banks said he was helped to his feet by McNabb, but fell to the ground and began to violently flail his legs and arms after regaining his balance. "I got violent," he said. "But I wasn't lashing out against anyone. I was trying to pull myself back to consciousness."

Banks said he was then escorted out of the bar by his friends, who tried to restrain him in his black Infinity.

Once inside the vehicle, Banks added that he became violent once again, kicking out the car's sunroof and damaging a fog light.

Syracuse police were summoned to the scene of the incident shortly after midnight and Banks was transported to Crouse Hospital's Emergency Room, 726 Irving Ave., via Syracuse University Ambulance for medical evaluation.

Banks said he was released from the hospital early Saturday morning. "I'm glad it's my car that I damaged and not someone else's," he added. "I guess my subconscious knew what it was doing. I'm glad I didn't hurt anyone else."

"That was a big moment," SU middle Josh Coffman said. "We had a golden opportunity to stick a nail in the coffin. But they got a good bounce and went down and scored."

The last Orangemen goal, a Springer tally with 8:22 remaining, put them ahead 12-11. Cornell rallied a shade more than two minutes later, when Key escaped a double team and hit freshman Michael Egan for the equalizer.

After Cynar saved a Matt Caione shot, Egan struck again with the game-winner. Mulligan stopped a Steinwald shot from point-blank range, but the rebound squinted to the freshman who deposited the ball in the SU net.

Cornell's Addison Sollog won the ensuing face-off, but a flurry of turnovers gave the ball to Syracuse with 1:30 left. Springer popped open on the left wing, but his rocket found Cynar's left foot, and Cornell gathered the rebound.

Orangewomen win sixth consecutive game

BY CHRIS SNOW
Staff Writer

One month ago, the Syracuse women's lacrosse team went from the excitement of great expectations to the harsh reality of an 0-3 start.

Four wins in a row jump-started the team's charge for its first tournament appearance.

Wins over Rutgers and George Mason in New Jersey on Saturday and Monday, respectively, brought the Orangewomen one step closer with their sixth consecutive victory.

SU (6-3) combined senior poise with freshman punch Saturday, riding five goals from fourth-year standout Lauren Brady and a two-goal, four-assist outing by newcomer Kim Wayne to a 13-6 victory over Rutgers.

"Lauren has probably been one of the best shots in the country," SU head coach Lisa Brady said. "She has a quick release and snaps her wrist and shoots for the open spaces. She's turned herself into a tremendous attacker."

"And Kim saw everything and was hitting her teammates (with passes) early and on the move."

Playing to a 4-2 halftime lead after trailing 2-6, the Orangewomen regrouped and scored the Scarlet Knights last season motivated the team. Also, Brady said the up-tempo style Rutgers presents forced SU to elevate its intensity level.

"We were really pumped up for that game because it's been pretty close with them the past two years," Brady said. "We wanted to play our game, and they're a real strong team and really loud which can throw you off. But we were focused."

Backstopping the defensive effort, freshman netminder Carla Gigon earned her first career start, turning aside 10 shots in place of senior Ashley Ewing.

"I thought Carla would be nervous with this big weekend," Brady said. "But she held her ground with some big saves. She's come in and stepped up to (defender) Brianne Davis' shoes."

Davis has probably been one of the team's most consistent players this season, even though it didn't know who was starting when we went to practice, the Orangewomen's leading scorer to one point and held her ground with some big saves.

"With the game knotted at 3-3, the Orangewomen unleashed 32 shots in the game — its second-highest total of the season — but failed to get quality shots for good scoring opportunities, Miller said.

"These were two evenly matched teams spread-wise with similar running styles," Miller said. "The defensive unit did a nice job and Carla made some great saves."

"In the six games we unbeaten streak is better team defense and the best right balance SU has ever possessed, Miller said. Karen Henry and Wayne picked up the offensive production the injured Jenna Szyluk produced last season, she said.

"The coach believes her team's win over GMU legitimized the Orangewomen as a possibl NCAA Tournament bid."

"With the win streak puts us in a better position, but we never want to out our fate in anyone else's hands," Miller said. "We want to control our destiny and we need to win one at a time. When the season comes to an end, we don't want a committee to have to pick us. We want them to have no choice but to do so."

While snowflakes swirled outside the Carrier Dome Tuesday afternoon, the Syracuse softball team was inside the bubble preparing for its upcoming games.

Most college teams in the Northeast would be at a major disadvantage on days like this, perhaps not even practicing because of the conditions.

However, the Orangewomen — who have had five games canceled due to rain and snow since Saturday — continued to hone their skills on the green carpet.

"It's something you expect in this type of weather and at a cold-climate school," head coach Mary Jo Firnhabach said. "It's a situation that is a part of our sport, whether it be rain or snow. Even if it rains in California, you don't get to play.

Firmhabach gave her squad the day off on Monday, which, along with the postponements, has given SU hurlers, Missy Bieman and Tara DiMaggio, time to rest their arms.

The Orangewomen won their ninth game in 12 tries on Saturday against Providence to improve to 16-16 in their inaugural campaign.

Despite not having played since Saturday, third baseman Jackie Herman said she does not think the layoff will hurt much.

"I don't think this will ruin our momentum," Herman said. "I think it's good for our pitchers because they kind of ne^ the rest. I think the layoff will hurt much.

Much of the Orangewomen's recent success can be credited to a newfound confidence at the plate. After struggling to several shutouts early in the season, Syracuse has found an offensive groove.

The real effects of this resurgence are seen on the scoreboard, which states that Syracuse regular is batting higher than .295 (Leah Hansen), but the Orangewomen with collegiate experience. "I think we're better at learning now what pitches we should be swinging at and staying focused," Bieman was a prime example of SU's poise at the plate Saturday against Providence. She hit the first home run in team history after several shots that came close in previous games.

"A lot of the confidence in that drive," Bieman said. "I had a good swing, and as soon as I made contact I was feeling it was going over the fence. It was a great feeling.

"Syracuse faces another fledgling program when Buffalo comes to town this afternoon. UB revived its squad this season after more than a decade away from the field. Like their Upstate counterparts, the Bulls have had difficulties with the weather. Their first game in 14 years was wiped out last Wednesday, giving the Bulls a full week to prepare for the Orangewomen.

At 4-22, the Bulls have not had the same success in their first year back as the Orangewomen. UB, however, has a higher team batting average (.271) than SU (.233).

"It's going to be a battle. Every team we play, we don't really know a lot about them," Firmhabach said. "They have struggled just like we have. They've had a lot of ups and downs and we're not going to let our confidence go down any further.

"You win one game, you lose the next, but you have to keep improving,

"The thoughts of years past remain. A banner hangs on the wall next to the locker room at Schoellkopf. It is a reminder — and celebration — of sorts:

Hey, another year this is not out of the question. After all, Cornell beat a Syracuse team that had drawn comparisons to the 1990 Orangewomen, widely regarded as the best college lacrosse squad in history.

Cornell has already beaten Syracuse, plain and simple, once this season and now plays the same to any other team in the nation.

The comeback is complete.

The Big Red are The Big Red are ‘Next-to-nothing’ words drown ideas

I am tired of bullshit. And I think a lot of professors are too.

I refuse to write long-winded papers that use next-to-nothing words to regurgitate the same things my professors have uttered relentlessly in class. The scary thing is, a lot of students write that way because they are taught it’s acceptable. The content of their writing echoes their professors’ opinions, and the style mimics the wordy texts they read in class.

I am tired of next-to-nothing words. They are far more dangerous than meaningless words. I am seriously considering fining the next book with a phrase like, “assembling this conglomeration of accumulated input signifiers,” out the window. Just say “based on the evidence,” if that’s what you mean. Why is that so hard? I am not calling for a neutering of the language or a “dumbing-down” of concepts. No, what I am saying is that the ability to put complex ideas into simple terms is the best indication of complete confusion.

So when I read a book full of next-to-nothing phrases, what did I do in high school? I would write my response paper in the exact same style of course! Have you ever noticed that when writing a tough paper, throwing a bunch of big words together is the easiest solution?

The more syllables the word has, the better — that way it takes up more space. Plus, the odds are that another big word is needed to clarify the first one. Hopefully, the more next-to-nothings that are put together, the greater the chances of saying something substantial — anything.

The beauty of it all is taking all that confusion and trying to make it meaningful by throwing in some big words. The result is a paper full of everything except meaning. I’ll tell you what it is full of though, and you need a big shovel to dig through it all. It’s like a big game of “The Emperor’s New Clothes,” but with writing style.

Who can use the biggest words to mask the fact that nothing is being said?

New beginning? I can’t help wondering, shouldn’t I be taught to question next-to-nothing words and phrases? This is the first semester that my professors have urged me to think critically about such things.

Why has it taken so long? Critical thinking is of more value in the long run than regurgitating. I don’t want to be spoon-fed. Instead of telling us what Hemingway thought, why don’t professors ever ask us what we think about Hemingway? I find this method of teaching so amusing.

I could be sitting in front of the next great thinker — Kant, Moby Dick or Clemens — but I might never know, because they are never given the opportunity to voice their own opinion. I want a type of teaching that encourages me to say, “Hey, those big words don’t intimidate me, it’s all fluff, and I think it’s fluff because…”

I realize that there are some important thinkers out there, and I want to learn about them. I also understand that professors need some basis to grade students on their understanding of the subject. However, I want to be able to distinguish my own thoughts on the matter for myself without regurgitating in everybody else’s. How will I know if I agree or disagree if I haven’t been given the opportunity to decide who I am on the matter?

Why doesn’t our education system promote critical thinking from Day One?

Every time Kayla asks a question, I ask her what she thinks before I offer an answer. And she has some of the coolest things to say. I think the rest of us would too, if given the chance.

Why don’t professors offer us the same opportunity before telling us we should think a certain way because a famous figure from history says so?

Small town simplicity shines over big city

I'm a city kid — always have been and probably always will be. I love the diversity of city life: the cosmopolitans, the energy, people, sounds, smells and overall essence that makes city life. Living in and around a large city exposed me to many things I couldn't picture before.

Adeet Deshmukh

city slicker

I came here: live music, all kinds of museums, art galleries, gay couples making out on the street corners of the gay district, a.k.a. Boystown. It was a drastically different experience compared to someone who graduated from a small town in Pennsylvania.

I remember always Evangelizing and shivering at the stories my friends would tell me about their small towns and how it only had one stop light and a 7-11. I remember as a child always pretending to be in a place where there is no sense of coziness and warm friendliness. It is the only place where you can feel at home.

This past weekend I went to a place I would call nowhere, a small town in Bucks County, Pennsylvania called Sellersville. It is a town with 2,500 or so mostly white, church-going neighbors. And I ended up having one of the best weekends of my semester.

Talk about homogenization.

During the time I was in Sellersville, I experienced many things I normally would never do, such as dancing at a bar (or attempting to), and hiking through a field of large rocks and boulders. I did all this with great fascination and amusement. I was surprised at the clothes and shoes meant for hiking being sold at a shoe store, not up in a tree.

I spent a lot of time with the Eherts family, and it was that experience that made me change the way I feel and look at small towns and small-town life.

Just like home

The Eherts family was incredibly warm and inviting and made me feel like a member in their home and in their town absolutely wonderfull. It is a good group role in making me realize that even though the town might be small and unassuming in my eyes, the people really make the difference.

While I was there I felt a sense of coziness and close-knit community friendships emanating from each house. Friends' evening’s local high school musical was a prime example. During intermission, I saw that most of the people there knew each other. The Eherts seemed to know almost everyone and their mothers.

At the dinner table, conversation revolved around what was going on around town, who’s son and/or daughter was going to college where, and old memories of high school plays and tennis matches.

All of these are things that I never got to experience growing up and around a large city, and for the first time I felt like I missed out on something. I realized that this feeling has a lot more to do with family than the city/small town paradox, but I cherish the simplicity and coziness that I found in a small town like Sellersville.

A New Jersey pharmaceutical company will make an emergency supply of sodium penobarbital to alleviate a shortage of the lethal drug needed to destroy an estimated 500,000 sick or unwanted animals each month. The Washington-based Humane Society of the United States said Ganex Chemical Works, of Penfield, N.J., will resume limited production of the drug while the company makes changes in its manufacturing systems to comply with warnings by the Food and Drug Administration. Ganex is the country's only supplier of sodium penobarbital, used both as a humane killer for animals and an anesthetic for humans and animals.

Citing funding problems, Herbalife International Inc. Chairman Mark Hughes scrapped plans to buy the Los Angeles-based company and take it private, adding yet another chapter to the controversial history of the marketer of nutritional and weight-loss products. Monday's announcement sent Herbalife's two publicly traded stocks plunging, even though Hughes had earlier warned that he was struggling to obtain the necessary cash to complete the $223 million deal. The buyout's collapse becomes the latest adverse development in the history of Herbalife, which Hughes founded in 1980.

Swearing is an art. Sadly, however, the medium has been taken over by a paint-by-numbers crowd that is totally lacking in creativity, nuance and, most annoyingly, discretion. Jim O'Connor is out to change that. The Illinois public-relations executive wants to curb the pervasive cursing that he says has entered every corner of our culture. He has written a book called "Cuss Control: The Complete Book on How To Curb Your Cursing," which he said he was inspired to write after actively curbing his own cursing.

TRUTH BE TOLD
College journalists struggle to maintain credibility in a field stained by professional scandal.

BY DOUG LEVY
Contributing Writer

Boston Globe columnist Patricia Smith was riding high in the summer of 1998 when her journalistic abilities were lauded by the American Society of Newspaper Editors. Months later, the Pulitzer prize finalist fell from grace when one of her editors discovered that Smith fabricated sources.

But Smith was not the only Globe staff member who violated journalistic ethics that summer. Columnist Mike Barnacle resigned from The Globe amid accusations that he plagiarized comedian George Carlin.

"The Barnacle and Smith episodes seemed to be well-received by the public, even as journalists beat their breasts in embarrassment and shame," said Globe Editor Matthew Storin.

Should an similar incident have occurred at a college newspaper, editors would have had a much more difficult time restoring credibility with its readers.

"College newspapers probably have tough standards because they cover such a relatively narrow swath of news — the world of the campus itself — where everyone knows or thinks he or she knows the facts," Storin said.

Storin credits The Globe's credibility to its 128 years of experience in the business and to stories that elicited community reforms.

"Many of our investigative stories bring immediate results," Storin said. "Which only enhances our credibility."

Each day, Syracuse University sophomore Jade Hall reads The New York Post and The Daily Orange.

"I rely on The Daily Orange for news on the last 24 hours of campus events," Hall said. "From the D.O., I look more for news about student events and campus life, not national and world news."

College newspapers face significantly different problems than those that professional newspapers do. An

SU employee arrested for credit fraud

Police arrested a Syracuse University Sports Information Department employee for credit card fraud Tuesday, Syracuse Police Sgt. Joe Sweeney said.

The employee, Assistant Director of Athletics Communications Brian Welch, was fired by SU last week for using the credit card numbers of local journalists to access Internet pornography, said Kevin Morrow, an SU spokesman.

Welch was arrested for the same incident, Sweeney said. He was released pending a trial date to be set later in court, he added.

The charge, first-degree falsification of business records, is a felony and Welch will face a minimum of one year and one day in jail if convicted, Sweeney said.

Police arrested Welch when he went to the police station Tuesday with his attorney to turn himself in for the crime, Sweeney said.

SU collects the credit card numbers of journalists traveling with the men’s basketball team to the NCAA tournament every year, Morrow said. The university uses the numbers to reserve hotel rooms and secure an accurate count of how many people will be with the team, he said.

RA finds knife in door, suspects former resident

A Syracuse University resident adviser found a knife Tuesday stuck in the door to her Skytop Hall room, according to a police report.

The adviser said someone had stuck a steak knife in the door between 1 a.m. and 4 a.m., the report said.

The 8-inch knife had a black handle and was still embedded in the door when the adviser found it, the report said.

The adviser accused a former Skytop Hall resident, a State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry student, of the incident, the report said.

Fifty miles south of Syracuse University thrives a college wrestling program without any scholarships.

The Cornell University Big Red, an Ivy League and Eastern Intercollegiate Wrestling Association power, sent five of its grapplers to last month’s NCAA Championships in St. Louis.

With the pending death of the SU wrestling team, Cornell stands as the lone Division I wrestling squad in Central New York.

"Syracuse was eastern champs, top ten in the country," Big Red coach Rob Kroll said. "They had a couple bad years, and their athletic director was chomping at the bit to let them die off. It’s easy to drop a team that’s not doing well."

SU cut its wrestling and men’s gymnastics programs in 1997 to comply with Title IX, 1972 federal legislation mandating athletic funding for men and women’s sports must reflect the gender ratio of a school’s student body.

The elimination of these programs at SU reflects trends at other schools nationwide.

Wrestling, in particular, seems to be first on the collegiate sports guillotine, as 800 schools nationwide have dropped their wrestling programs.

Women’s soccer, lacrosse and softball began so would be in compliance with Title IX — 1972 federal legislation mandating that athletic funding for men’s and women’s sports reflect the gender ratio of a school’s student body.

Many players and fans continue to criticize the legislation as forcing the end of the university’s gymnastics and women’s soccer, lacrosse and softball, according to a police report.

Student Coalition on Organized Labor members deassembled their tents early Tuesday morning amid a torrent of wind and winter-like temperatures after Syracuse University Public Safety officers asked the students to leave the Quad, members said.

Officers cited the group’s failure to secure a permit to set up camp on the Quad, SCOOL members said.

"We got kicked off at 2:30 in really inclement weather conditions," member J.J. Butts said. "It was really unfortunate."

Public Safety officers could not be reached for comment, but SU spokesman Kevin Morrow said that failure to obtain a permit would be reason for the officers to ask SCOOL members to leave the Quad.

"I know it’s policy that any kind of demonstration or public protest like that, it has to be done via permit," Morrow said.

SCOOL members said they obtained a permit after their run-in with Public Safety and are now "sanctioned" by the university to continue their protest, Butts said.

Morrow could not confirm Butts’ claim.

Butts, however, questioned the university’s right to make the group leave.

"Why should students have to get a permit to be on their own Quad? It’s kind of absurd," said Butts, a doc-

March 1 in their effort to beef up international cooperation against drug trafficking.

The United Nations warns that as many as 16 million people are at risk in 10 countries across North Africa and Central America, from Burundi to Ethiopia on the Red Sea. But the report states that funding is inadequate in many of these countries, particularly in Ethiopia where three areas of drought are reported as a result of the worst flooding in decades. The report also highlights the need for more international assistance and cooperation to address the problem.

Cattle and sheep died first, followed by the loss of livestock and human populations. The final harvests were reported in January when crops, which provide the main source of income, were assessed as destroyed. The report also noted that the worst flooding in decades has left more than 100,000 people displaced, with many of them living in makeshift camps.

Between 1992 and 1997, more than 200 male teams and 20,000 male athletes vanished from athletic programs. Only 8,000 women, however, found new opportunities on the athletic fields, courts and rinks of the nation's universities.

For every new woman in college sports, four men lost their scholarships.

The expenses of other sports plays a role in decisions to drop non-revenue sports such as wrestling.

Cornell boasts 43 varsity sports, 17 each for men and women. But its football and men's basketball programs, plus men's lacrosse more than at SU, Kroll said. SU's teams fly to away games, whereas Cornell's athletes drive to home games.

Residents gather to discuss local concerns

Syracuse University is planning a more than $2 million renovation for the Marshall Street and South Crouse Avenue area, said Elisabeth Rougeux, director of state relations and government communications.

Rougeux discussed the plan and other concerns for university-area neighbors at a forum Wednesday night between SU officials and the South Eastern University Neighborhood Association.

"We have talked about the plan for a number of years," Rougeux said to about 40 people in attendance. "We have finally gotten the funding to start the project."

The plan will be carried out in two phases. Rougeux explained that the first phase includes tearing down the wires underground, which will start as soon as students leave in May and continue until students return in September, she said.

The second phase, which is scheduled to take place next summer, is called "Streetscape." In this phase of the plan, new streets and sidewalks will be laid in the area and new light posts will be installed.

"This phase of the plan is basically a beautification of the area," said Rougeux. "We will put in benches and flowers to make the area look nice."

A movie theater is also in the works for the Marshall Street area, but formal plans have not been made, said Rougeux.

"The Neighborhood Patrol Initiative and traffic problems also topped residents' list of concerns.

NPI is a joint-program between Syracuse police and SU Public Safety to increase the presence of university-area neighborhoods in search of general nuisance.

Both the number of case investigations and the number of students referred to the SU Office of Judicial Affairs each weekend has been significantly reduced, Syracuse Police Sgr. Cecile said.

In comparison to the 1999 Fall Semester, complaints for liquor law violations and violations of the noise ordinance have fallen from 47 complaints to 9 this semester, he said.

"The calls for the NPI have been significantly reduced and the program has been extremely effective," Cecile said.

Anastasia Ure, director of Judicial Affairs, said the overall number of students charged by the office have also gone down significantly. In the fall, 146 students were charged by Judicial Affairs and in the spring, 48 students were charged.

"We are very pleased and have high hopes to have a positive ending to the school year," Sylvia Martinez-Daloia, director of community relations and government communication relations, said.

These gatherings keep up the communication and help the university accomplish its goal." Martinez-Daloia said. "These gatherings keep up the communication and help the university accomplish its goal.

Lewis said that great steps have been taken and must continue in improving the relationship between the university and the city.

"The meeting itself went well," Lewis said. "The university is the largest member on campus and we as the residents want to let it know how we feel. We appreciate the university's help thus far and hope it continues."
Implementation of Title IX falls short

They run the court with authority, sail over hurdles with ease and shoot off starting blocks with lightening speed. They play hard. They play to win. They are women.

But without 1972’s landmark Title IX ruling, which required all universities to provide equal athletic opportunities for both men and women, these talented athletes might never have the chance to chase their dreams of glory.

More than two decades later, universities nationwide are still scrambling to comply with the ruling.

SU, like Syracuse University, compliance comes at an unacceptable price: elimination of the 78-year-old men’s wrestling dynasty. SU added three new women’s varsity sports over the past five years — a great victory for up-and-coming women’s athletes.

But with SU’s staggering athletic budget — fueled mainly by the massive take from football and basketball fans — there’s no excuse to deprive the university’s gridders of their time on the mat.

True athletic equity can’t be based on how talent season ticketholders scream in the stands.

Under NCAA standards, the SU football team receives $66 scholarships to dol out each year, compared to private offering millions of dollars on non-revenue sports. Coaches may argue that the Orangemen need the massive number of yearly awards in order to ensure depth — and dollars — for future seasons.

But when a full scholarship goes to a man who rides two donkeys to a season, waiting for his chance on the field, other talented athletes who help SU earn NCAA titles go unnoticed, shouldering the full burden of athletic prowess.

The sleight is a travesty.

Paring down team budgets would go a long way, too. Men in the basketball, hockey and soccer are no more worthy of a chartered flight to a tournament than men in wrestling singlets.

Other universities have successfully harnessed the support of alumni athletes to build beefy endorsements to keep non-revenue teams afloat. SU would do well to follow their lead.

But creating a framework for tomorrow’s alumni requires keeping their programs in existence today. An athlete who loses their years away from eligibility over his sport is cut isn’t likely to donate dollars to rebuilding a team after graduation. But one who celebrates four successful seasons might.

Athleticism is a gift. Those who possess it deserve every opportunity to hone their talent at the collegiate level. SU is rich and diming its way to athletic equality. It’s not a winning game plan.

U.S media fails to address NATO cover-up properly

In early May of 1999, NATO bombed a Chinese Embassy in Belgrade. NATO officials called the incident accidental and blamed out-of-date maps supplied to the U.S. CIA by the National Imagery and Mapping Agency.

The U.S. media told the story of a military error for which the Chinese Embassy was mistaken for a Yugoslav military target.

At the time, the story was full of holes. It is still full of holes.

In July CIA director George Tenet testified before Congress that in over 25,000 NATO missions during the three-month Kosovo campaign, the “accidental” bombing of a Chinese Embassy was the only one planned by the CIA.

In a March 19, 1999 letter to the New York Times, former CIA executive director Charles Hardt confirmed that the CIA had “deliberately” bombed the Chinese Embassy.

The story was followed up by the New York Times with Longbow ammunition, the same ammunition that NATO used to bomb the Chinese Embassy.

In July, the story was full of holes. It is still full of holes.

And finally, after all of this, I nearly burst out laughing.

Let’s open our eyes here, people. With satellites that can read newspapers from space, I think that if the CIA was outdated Intelligence Maps I thought, “Yeah, right.”

This is merely a hypothesis. But in light of the real facts, it’s a hell of a lot more serious than the excuses that the Pentagon, the CIA, and NATO have concocted.

Let’s hypothesize for a moment about who would stand to gain if this was indeed deliberate. Let’s say that the U.S. military and defense contractors like it when America has someone to bomb. Let’s say it’s better to bomb someone else when America or NATO bomb someone then that the missiles are mostly manufactured in the United States.

Let’s say that China has a seat on the UN Security Council and does not support the Kosovo bombing. Since their seat on the Council gives them veto power, the Security Council is powerless without China’s approval.

As long as China is opposed to the bombing, then no Chinese-manufactured bombs will be dropped on Kosovo.

This is merely a hypothesis. But in light of the real facts, it’s a hell of a lot more serious than the excuses that the Pentagon, the CIA, and NATO have concocted.

Regardless of why the bombing happened, this incident is a travesty of values the American people claim to cherish. The press failed to report the facts. Congress was powerless to control the military and the American people are once again responsible for a travesty they don’t even know about.

Chancellor addresses activists, FLA contract

To the Editor:

Before offering the community an update on Syracuse University’s continued exploration of the Worker Rights Consortium, I’d like to take a moment to acknowledge our students, many of whom have shown a passionate resolve in pursuing social justice conditions for those who produce licensed goods for SU and our fellow universities and colleges.

These students have held public rallies and organized petition drives, and they and I and Peter Webber, chair of SU’s Trademark Licensing Advisory Board, have engaged in several good dialogues. I’m told you that their resolve is shared by Syracuse University. We agree on the desired outcome, and I welcome continued discussion on the best way to achieve that outcome.

A year ago, the university became deeply involved in the sweatshop issue when we became one of the first of 134 institutions of higher education to join the Fair Labor Association and we approved codes of conduct for the production of licensed apparel that both that organization and the College Licensing Company have agreed to participate in the inaugural meeting of the FLA University Advisory Council.

In the fall, we and the CLC successfully encouraged Nike to disclose the locations of its factories that produce SU apparel, and the university then sent a representative to the national Labor-Wage Symposium at the University of Wisconsin-Madison.

Recently we informed our licensees, through the CLC, that they must disclose their factory locations or risk termination of their license. The university also adopted a rider to the College Licensing Company licensees’ adherence to safeguards for women, and we added a second student member to the Trademark Licensing Advisory Board, Student Government Association President James T. McCarthy.

Last Friday the WRC held its founding conference in New York City.

While the University was not allowed to participate in the conference, we will continue to monitor the WRC’s development. And we have invited a representative to come to the Trademark Licensing Advisory Board’s next meeting.

The Trademark Licensing Advisory Board will also meet with the Trademark Licensing Advisory Board, the Conference, and we are awaiting word on the timing.

The Trademark Licensing Advisory Board will also meet with the FLA representative at the end of the semester. In the meantime, the legal and financial issues that the FLA and the University have submitted previously, I see no reason at this time for the University to lessen its participation in the FLA. But I also am aware of students’ interest in the FLA. Now the university is to proceed without being carefully considered by the Trademark Licensing Advisory Board. I await the Board’s recommendation in the very near future.

In my right as a student, I encourage all members of the University community to further explore the sweatshop issue, the structure and goals of the WRC and the FLA and the University’s involvement.

THIS IS WHERE LIFE IS GOOD

"He was responsible for organizing and maintaining this list of information," Morrow said. "He's accused of abusing this information and using it for his own purposes."

Police are still investigating the exact amount of money involved in the fraud. Sweeny said. "The Internet provider is the one that is out the money," he said. "They have to go through all their records and find out exactly how much money we're talking about."

SU received word of the possibility of the fraud March 30 when the company that runs the pornography site contacted the university about outstanding bills, Morrow said. "The company had traced the user of those accounts to S3Tacii&e University," he explained. "They had no progress in collecting from this individual, so they contacted the university directly."

At that time, the company indicated the individual might have used credit cards other than his own to pay for the service, Morrow said. SU Public Safety began an investigation that eventually led to Welch's firing and his arrest, he added.

Welch had access to a list of about 20 credit card numbers of local media representatives from Central New York cities such as Syracuse, Utica and Oswego, Morrow said. It is possible Welch also had access to a list of about 200 credit card numbers of journalists from across the country who came to SU for last month's NCAA East Regionals, he added.

SU officials are still investigating whether Welch had access to that list, Morrow said. "This incident may be the first of its kind, he added."

"In the conversations that the university had with the NCAA, they did not recall an event like this occurring with the men's basketball tournament ever before," Morrow said.

"As a result of Welch's actions, all credit card numbers given to Sports Information by local journalists will now be received through a secure fax line and kept under lock and key," Morrow said.

"You do it every year at NCAA tournament time," he said. "I've been here for the last 12 years and now all of the sudden it seems really stupid. I've got to think twice about giving my card number next year now."

"This is not a regular problem because of the speed and ease with which police can catch those who commit these crimes," Waters added. "To me it's just kind of sad," he said. "We're obviously not dealing with a criminal here. We're dealing with someone who has a problem."

"I just hope he gets helped as much as he gets hurt by this."

SU professor founds public service society

BY SETH BRAVERMAN

DEWITT — Michelle Walker has dedicated many hours to helping youths recognize their potential and become involved in the Syracuse community.

Walker, a global programs coordinator in the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, was honored Monday alongside 14 other individuals for her contribution to society.

The honorees were inducted into the newly established Do Good Society, founded by William D. Coplin, chairman of the Syracuse University public affairs program, as a way of "celebrating doing good."

The ceremony took place at Barnes and Noble bookstore, 3404 Erie Blvd. in Dewitt.

"I really believe it is important in our society to be proud to be a do-gooder," said Coplin, whose license plate reads "Do Good."

Barnes and Noble took an interest in the book and wanted to do something to advocate its message of doing good, said Maryam Wasmund, community relations director for the bookstore.

Wasmund is an SU alumnus and a former student of Coplin.

"We saw the book and we really wanted to do something with the book," she said.

She added that both the bookstore and Coplin wanted something more interactive than just a book signing.

Coplin said he wrote the book to spread his message that doing good should be a daily part of everyone's life throughout the country.

"But I also realized the book alone wouldn't do it," he added. "So we developed this idea, Maryam Wasmund and I, and then I talked to people at work and it sort of grew."

"It really makes the basic point I want to make, which is that do-gooders are very important and there is no reason for them to be ashamed even though our society dumps on them."

Coplin nominated Walker for the honor, and most of the other inductees were nominated by friends, co-workers or family members who delivered short speeches about why their nominee deserved membership in the Do Good Society.

"I think the best part of the meeting was the diversity of what people thought the good deeds were," Wasmund said.

The good deeds honored at the event ranged from being a good parent or teacher to being a kidney donor.

The society's charter states that it is a "mutual admiration society for those who work to increase life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness for all members of society."

Coplin added that he hopes the society will spread throughout the country. He added that he plans to approach Barnes and Noble about making the society national. Individuals can start their own chapters of the society based either regionally or within an institution such as a college, Coplin said.

Jessica White, a senior policy studies and public relations major, nominated both of her parents, Thomas and Sheila White, for membership Wednesday.

"Good deeds are part of my dad's everyday life," White said during her nomination speech. "It is my pleasure to nominate him to the founding chapter of the Do Good Society."

White added that her father tries to do good in everything he does, and her mother does good every day through her job as a third grade teacher.

"Isn't that enough to bring a tear to a parent's eye?" Thomas White asked the audience as he accepted his plaque.

"I am very proud that I was nominated," Sheila White said. "The things that we have given others and sacrificed to give our children to be publicly stated in front of an audience, it just warms your heart. We don't expect thank you's."

SCOOL accuses the university of the camp-out, attracted about 12 members. Butts said. A Quad dweller said Roberts, a former staff writer for The Daily Orange. "They unlocked the door and went through the trunk," he said.

"We're out here now all the time — students can't miss us," he said.

SCOOL members stay on the Quad in shifts so there is a presence there at all times, Butts said.

"We want to show that we are so committed to this cause that we will sit out in the elements," McCord said. "We are willing to take this campaign to the end."

Future protest plans are not finalized yet, McCord said. SCOOL members have been working on what happens after the camp-out and this weekend's International Monetary and World Bank protests in Washington, D.C., to determine what will happen next, he said.

The group's actions will also "depend on the actions in Tolley," McCord added, speaking toward the SU administration building near the Quad.

"This is not a diminishing campaign," McCord said. "We win or we stop it up."

An unidentified person caused damage to an SU student's car on the 900 block of Ackerman Avenue, according to a police report.

"The suspect did not take anything," Roberts said. "It was just a pain to get the window fixed," he said. "There wasn't anything to take. It's not even a nice car."

A new drug may help cure the craving for a drink.

BY MELISSA MORGAN
Staff Writer

Flooding egs and mind-bending Martins tend to the states of many college students’ weekend plans. It may help them relax or create an escape from a stress-filled week. For others, however, this drug fails to provide a good time. An alcoholic knows that drinking causes problems and not solutions.

Getting over an addiction to alcohol is a life-long process with which about 14 million Americans struggle. This can put many victims of the disease in and out of rehab programs, but new anti-craving drugs may enable alcoholics to cut down their 12-step recovery by popping one pill.

Pharmacotherapy gives patients the opportunity to use medicine as a treatment method. Two drugs, called naltrexone and acamprosate, are currently being prescribed to patients to help prevent the desire to drink.

Acamprosate, which doctors prescribe widely in Europe, is currently in phase three of Food and Drug Administration trials. It could be available in the United States as early as next year.

Doctors in both the United States and Canada are already prescribing naltrexone.

Studies in Europe show that 67 percent of patients who used the drugs stained from drinking after two months, which is the most likely period when alcoholics would regress. This was compared to only 50 percent of those who used a placebo or a sugar pill.

According to the New England Journal of Medicine, naltrexone works by helping patients cut back on drinking and increases abstinence by reducing cravings.

Much like throwing a grenade into a battlefield — hoping to kill more foes than friends — radiation therapy is an archaic method of dealing with chronic cancers.

There is a new hope. An experimental new drug called STI 571, developed by Dr. Brian Druker at the Oregon Health Sciences University, has cleared a path in the often-foggy world of cancer research. More specifically, this drug targets a single molecular aberration — preventing the abnormal growth of white blood cells found in chronic myelogenous leukemia.

CML strikes about 4,300 Americans every year. Druker’s leukemia pill kills the CML cells while leaving normal cells alone. In recent trials, a patient started with a 125,000 white blood cell count (normal is 10,000 or below). A week into the treatment, her count had dropped to 60,000, and within three weeks it was normal — an amazing progression by any standard.

One of the more common complaints about cancer therapies is the side effects. Loss of hair, fatigue and opportunistic diseases often plague individuals subjected to these therapies. According to all research done so far, however, STI 571 has no alarming consequences.

“The side effects have been quite minimal,” Druker said. “In fact, most patients are telling me that they feel better than they have in many years.”

Some of the minor effects include stomach cramps, joint aches and puffiness around the eyelids in rare cases, though these are all easily fixed, he said.

Interferon, an antiviral protein produced by the immune system, is the standard treatment for CML. It plays an important role in the body’s most important defenses against viruses, bacteria and other disease-causing agents, though it is still not totally understood according to the National Cancer Institute.

CML’s slow progression makes it extremely dangerous. During the first stages of CML, most people don’t have any symptoms of cancer according to the NCI. While it usually occurs in middle-aged or older individuals, it also can occur in children. Tests on children have been encouraging, but more testing needs to be done. Clinical tests have shown that adult patients that have been continuously taking STI 571 for 18 months are still showing positive results, with many others approaching one year.

Hard to swallow
STI 571 does have some drawbacks.

According to the Oregon Health Sciences

Universities, patients who take the drug must do so regularly, and there is no indication that they will be able to be free from taking the drug every day for the rest of their lives.

Drucker believed he said that the drug's design of hope for many cancer sufferers, it should not be mistaken as a cure-all for all cancers.

"CML is a special case," he said. "There is a specific target drug that we can attack."

He said he does believe, however, that this breakthrough is a step in the right direction in confirming the efforts of cancer researchers for the past 30 years. The approach that we use is to understand what drives a specific cancer," he said. "We then can attack that specific abnormality — it confirms years of progress in this field."

STI 571 will hopefully serve as a model for other cancers that may also reduce the incidence of treatment all aspects of the disease. He said that medicine is biological — not psychological or social.

"Without the moral support from something like a 12-step program, a person might be more likely to walk into a bar or pick up a drink," he said.

Despite his precautions and his own report of serious abstainers, he said that they are often times at the end of the road. "They need help, they need support systems."

"There is further evidence that alcohol-dependent subjects."

"Basically, what is more important is to the NCI. Second phase trials are starting early trials according to the NCI. Second phase trials are currently underway so that this drug can be quickly reviewed by the Food and Drug Administration."

"Normally a drug can take up to five years to be approved, but due to the remarkable results of Drucker's drug, the FDA's approval may be approved by January of 2002."

A quiet and rather modest individual, Drucker's dealings with this disease began early in his days at medical school at the University of California-San Diego. He said he was amazed by the progress made in treating leukemia over the years in an elective "history of chemotherapy" course.

Drucker eventually learned that during the 1950s, lymphocytic leukemia was uniformly fatal within six weeks of diagnosis. By the 1980s it was curable in up to 70 percent of patients.

"I remember thinking how dramatic the turnaround of events that had been," he said. "I was fascinated about what went into those discoveries."

"I remember thinking how dramatic the turnaround of events that had been," he said. "I was fascinated about what went into those discoveries."
The only freshman to see action for the Orangemen was Michael Thomas, who took one face-off in the third quarter. SU midfielder Bill Perritt has seen the most playing time of any freshman this season, and his work is limited.

Fire away

After first-quarter goals by Liam Banks and Devin Darcangelo, Syracuse went 12:54 without a tally, its longest scoring drought of the afternoon.

The Big Red's patient attack drained several minutes off the clock and contributed to keeping SU off the scoreboard. But when it possessed the ball, Syracuse failed to find the back of the net.

In an extra-man situation late in the first period, SU murdered only a Tom Hardy shot that sailed wide of the net. Then early in the second quarter, Cornell goalkeeper Justin Cynar snuffed out a handful of SU chances.

Less than three minutes into the stanza, Powell found Mike Springer wide open five yards from the goal. But Cynar slid left and made a dazzling stick save.

Later in the quarter, sophomore midfielder Spencer Wright clanged a shot off the left post, and Cynar robbed Hardy again after a great pick from Josh Coffman.

"I think we hit quite a few pipes," Coffman said. "It's unfortunate because Ryan Powell had some nice passes. We got the shots in front that we wanted. We just didn't put them away."

Polled over

The new STXUSILA Top 20 poll, released before Cornell's 13-12 upset of Syracuse on Tuesday, should receive a little shakeup come next week.

Barring a loss this weekend against Duke, the No. 2 Virginia Cavaliers — who SU beat in its season-opener 13-12 in overtime — should slide into the No. 1 position in the Orangemen now hold.

Cornell, meanwhile, could end up in a number of places, depending on the results of other teams. If No. 5 Duke (8-2) suffers another loss this week, it could drop below the Big Red. No. 7 Maryland and No. 8 Johns Hopkins also face off Saturday, and the loser likely will slip below Cornell. Cornell's lone loss this season came at the hands of the Terrapins.

The Big Red's movement, of course, depends on how they fare on Saturday against Dartmouth.

Time machine

Cornell's victory over the No. 1 Orangemen ended several long skids in Big Red men's lacrosse history.

Dave Pietramala's club stopped a 13-game losing streak to SU. Its last win against its CNY rival came in the 1987 national semifinals at Rutgers.

The Big Red last beat SU at historic Schoellkopf Field in 1982, and its last triumph over a No. 1 team came over Maryland in overtime in the 1976 NCAA Championship game at Brown University.

add games to an already grueling schedule and puts more academic pressure on students come December. Hogwash. The great majority of these young men serve as time-management models for their peers during the season.

The big, bad, bureaucratic NCAA already treats them the way Nike uses Far Eastern labor. It should at least strive to give more deserving student-athletes a shot to play for a title. Division I-A college football screams for a 16-team national tournament. Each year, champions from the Big 10, Big East, ACC, Pac-10, SEC and Big 12 would receive automatic bids. The 10 at-large teams get chosen by a committee of athletic directors and conference administrators, and said committee unveils the pairings in a half-hour nationally televised show the first Sunday of December. All first-round matchups get played at the home field of the higher seed the next Friday and Saturday. After those tilts, all tournament games shift to the top seven bowl sites, each of which will host the national championship game once every seven years. Quarterfinals kick off with an early-evening Christmas Eve clash followed by a Christmas Day tripleheader. The Final Four kicks off New Year's afternoon, and the NCAA crowns its national champion after the finals the night before NFL conference title games.

Few arguments arise against these and similar proposals. Networks would sprint to the bargaining table to purchase broadcast rights. Players, instead of spreadsheet-toting computer geeks, would decide the champion on the field. Placing the games on the holidays looks out for the best interest of the student-athlete and helps draw massive audiences. The remaining cash-cow bowl games can win by selecting the other collegiate squads to compete in single game postseasons that would carry the excitement of basketball's NIT. Not the most alluring option, but still a chance for coaches to grab extra practice and seniors to don the pads one final time. Oh, and those brackets. Imagine empty pews at Midnight Mass because Virginia Tech took Arizona to overtime. Or picture arguments in the toy section at the mall, not about last-minute Pokemon markdowns, but over Bobby Bowden's chances to become Mayor of Bracketville. All the bustle would revolve around those lined pieces of paper on which the postman and the milkman would chart their choices for the 15-game playoff. Chances are you'll cast them aside in frustration before the eggnog settles in your stomach. But watch out for your secretary. She might just skip the Christmas bonus and win your office pool.

"We went in my first year, but have not been back since," Sanford said. "We're really gunning for it this year to make it two-and-two, rather than one out of four (seasons)."

The Orangewomen own an opportunity to improve their national standing Saturday morning, but must be wary of two opponents with similar intentions.

Pennsylvania and Northeastern will travel to Onondaga Lake for an 8 a.m. race Saturday.

Although this battle takes place during the season's third weekend, it could be significant in terms of playoff positioning.

Pennsylvania currently occupies the No. 20 position. By defeating both Syracuse and Northeastern, it could move up in the polls like the Orangewomen did earlier.

SU will try to hold off the Quakers, while Northeastern will be trying to keep Syracuse an arm's length away. The Huskies sit at No. 15 but could fall behind the Orangewomen if Syracuse emerges first in place this weekend.

"I think it will be extremely close," Sanford said. Her rowers appear more confident.

"We have a good shot against both Penn and Northeastern," senior co-captain Krista Karns said. "It's gonna be a real close race between all three boats. We've been working real hard on our technique all week, so we hope it all comes together on Saturday."

Nasty weather this week has forced the team to persevere through its daily practice on the water.

Sanford expects 60-degree weather for the race.

"It's been a hard week," Sanford said. "It has literally snowed every morning. We hope that the weather is nice (Saturday)."

In the boat, rowers are aligned so that their oars alternate between the boat's starboard and port sides.

Garofalo began the season in the boat's second spot, but a shake-up now puts her in first, the bow position.

Bow position crosses the finish line first, while the coxswain Karns is the final team member to cross the line. Both rowers graduated from Liverpool High School, but Karns moved from rower to her current position as a high school sophomore.

"Everyone else was a lot bigger than me," Karns said. "It was either quit rowing or become a coxswain."

"As coxswain, Karns serves as the boat's leader in the water. The rowers' backs face the finish line as they travel, but the coxswain faces her teammates and surveys the course ahead, telling her teammates where to steer."

"I make sure they are doing everything together," Karns said. "I'm almost a go-between coach and rower. I'm the one they have to end up listening to."

The rowers said they do not mind listening to support from the brave souls who cheer them on from the Onondaga Lake shore.

Most of the crowd is comprised of relatives, but sometimes the rowers' friends come for support.

"I talk about rowing all the time in my classes," Karns said. "I'll try to get them out a few times."

Perritt savors tradition

BY MICHAEL ROTHSTEIN
Contributing Writer

Tradition is a big part of Syracuse lacrosse. This tradition steers athletes to SU when they decide where to play college ball. Freshman midfielder Bill Perritt saw the tradition, and it answered any questions about his eventual collegiate home.

"Growing up watching the Sait brothers, I always knew that I wanted to come here and play lacrosse," Perritt said.

But it wasn't Gary and Paul Sait that got him into playing the game that now dominates his life.

As a youngster, Perritt played all the sports his older brother Chris played, including lacrosse. As a 6-foot-5, 230-pounder brother, who plays lacrosse for the Sait brothers, it was natural for Perritt to follow in his footsteps.

Tradition is a big part of Syracuse lacrosse. The team has been in the national championship game 11 times and has won nine of them.

Syracuse's 12-10 victory over SU on Tuesday marked the 12th time in the last 14 seasons that the Orange has played the Demon Deacons. The Orange leads the all-time series 10-2.

Rowers entertain Northeastern, Penn

By Pete Schreiber

When asked to name the most prominent athletes at Syracuse University, rowing rarely comes to mind as an adequate answer.

"Don't tell that to this year's Orange," said assistant coach Kris Sanford.

Syracuse's women's rowing season ranked No. 10 in the nation, according to a poll released last week. "Our goal is to make it to the NCAA's," said freshman Nicole Garofalo.

The team is tied with the University of Iowa for No. 1 in the nation, according to a poll released Wednesday. "We've been working hard," she said. "We're ready to go."
Students prepare for protests

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

Local students say they are doing the best they can to prepare for the uncertain conditions following a weekend's Washington, D.C. protests against the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

"They really don't know what will happen in D.C.," said Student Coalition On Organized Labor member Bri-an McCord, a third-year English doctoral student at Syracuse University.

"We've heard of lots of things — some people have said the police will be more apt to crack down on protesters to make sure the order is maintained in the city.

"Some people think the police will be more relaxed because they don't want to repeat the controversy in Seattle.

Last November, more than 70,000 people converged in Seattle's streets to oppose worker exploitation and the city's World Trade Organization meetings. Protesters bound themselves together to block convention center entrances to prevent WTO officials from attending their meetings.

Police officers tried to stop the protests with tear gas and, in some cases, beat and threatened demonstrators with guns.

Gas masks were outlawed during the Seattle protests, McCord said.

"There's actually footage, if you ever watch the films about it, where police are actually taking gas masks from students and from activists," he said.

That action was very controversial, McCord said.

"They said it was a state of emergency and that the cops had a right to tear gas people and they didn't have a right to wear gas masks against it — which seems like a real infringement of civil liberties," he said.

Because of the uncertainty about the nature of the situation in Washington, D.C., McCord said there was little the local groups could do to prepare for potential problems.

In preparation for the trip, students make sure the order is maintained in the city.

Republicans anticipate Quayle visit

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Staff Writer

Former Vice President Dan Quayle, the man who began the nationwide family values debate, will speak Monday at Syracuse University.

"He's a popular figure among conservatives," College Republicans Chairman Joe Burns said. "He represents our views and he can present them in a unique way."

The speech, entitled "The Changes We Must Make," is scheduled for 7 p.m. in the Goldstein Auditorium. A question and answer session will follow.

"Quayle will discuss today's social problems," said Burns, a junior political science and history major.

Quayle caused controversy during his term as vice president when he questioned the morality of Murphy Brown, the title character of the CBS sitcom. On the show, Brown had decided to raise her baby without a father.

A former senator, Quayle is expected to touch on several other issues in his speech, including the 2000 presidential campaign, conservative policy and his experiences as vice president and Indiana legislator, Burns said.

Quayle served as representative and senator from Indiana before becoming the 44th vice president of the United States under George Bush in 1989.

He ran for the Republican presidential nomination earlier this year, but dropped out of the race because of a lack of support.

Pine e-mail to leave in favor of Web

BY JEROME WOODY
Systems Administrator

As part of an initiative to streamline computer resources for Syracuse University, Computing and Media Services representatives announced Thursday they are exploring Web-based e-mail options.

New Web-based accounts may eventually replace Pine, SU's current locally-based system, said Sean Doherty, a member of the SU Information Technology Implementation team.

It will include e-mail options similar to the features in other Web-based e-mail systems like Hotmail and Yahoo! Mail, Doherty added.

Students are lauding the new decision to change the structure of the university's e-mail.

"I don't use Pine," said Jennifer Damis, a sophomore Information Management and Technology major.

Damis added that she uses Web-based e-mail accounts like Hotmail because it prepares her to use e-mail systems that are used in the corporate world.

The system is expected to be fully implemented in the Fall 2001 Semester, Doherty said. It will provide students with access to a calendar, electronic address book and a to-do list online from any Web browser, he added.

With this Web-mail system, students will not only be able to send and receive e-mail, but search files from an SU online bulletin board, Doherty said.

Paul Sturtevant, a freshman musical theatre major, said the Web is much more user-friendly than SU's current system. The additional features of the software sound interesting, he added.

"It is a good thing because Pine is an outdated system and is in bad need for an update," Sturtevant said.

Future versions of the system, called WebAccess, will have features that allow users to share their class schedules, and other personal information with other users of the system, Doherty said.

"It should be very easy for one person to give another the right to look at their schedules and tasks in order to set appointments or coordinate a project," he added.

The WebAccess e-mail system is just one portion of a CMS plan that will let students, faculty and staff access programs and resources across campus, Doherty said.

"Once we get students' accounts into a Novell Directory Service, students should be able to use class-centric programs that were only available in the clusters, on their personal computers," said Doherty.

Students with accounts in the service can have a custom desktop that accesses programs and files needed for their classes, he added.

"A transfer to a Web-based system is a natural choice," he said. "Students seem comfortable with the Web, and we see that they are using it more and more to do work."
Is SU justified in cutting the wrestling program?

Students debate the merits of Title IX's call for gender equality in athletics

Speaker of the House condemns sports cut

The following is an excerpt from an interview between Karen DeCrow, a former president of the National Organization for Women, and The Daily Orange:

"Title IX is a wonderful program. It's a reason for all the Olympic gold medals women have won in recent years, and it's the reason why little girls grow up being educated to be good athletes, to play as hard as they want to put them on the field."

"I strongly believe in the intent of the law. While working within the National Organization for Women, I was one of the people who pushed hard for Title IX, and I saw to it that it was enforced."

"Women pay $31,000 a year to attend college just like men do, and they deserve equal opportunities to play their sports."

"At Syracuse, I don't think it's any accident at all that they're eliminating men's sports like wrestling and gymnastics in order to stay in compliance with the law."

"It seems to me that this is going to create a backlash against Title IX and women's sports and women's athletics in general. They say that cutting teams will make things more equal, but that's not the way the law is supposed to work."

SU fails to properly comply with Title IX

The amount it takes to run the wrestling program is only equal to three students' tuition for the year. How can you cut the men's teams just to give the girls a fair shot?

HECTOR PADILLA
Arts and Sciences
Class of '02

SU's budget and the athletic budget that they could easily meet men's wants and still add women's sports, too. I'm sure that if I sat down with that budget for three hours, I could find a way to keep the wrestling team and give more opportunities to women, too.

Karen DeCrow, president of NOW from 1974 to 1977, has handled many Title IX-related cases as an attorney specializing in gender discrimination law. She is a 1972 graduate of the Syracuse University College of Law.

KEVIN ST-FORT

SU doesn't spend its money the right way.

SEAN MURRAY
The Daily Orange

If it's not fair at all. I'm pretty sure they could come up with a way to find the money for these sports. The university certainly could have found a way to make peace and equality between men and women athletes without doing this. Part of the Title IX settlement states that no men's sports would be cut in favor of increased opportunities for women. So what happened here?

There's so much money in SU's budget and the athletic budget that they could easily meet men's wants and still add women's sports, too. I'm sure that if I sat down with that budget for three hours, I could find a way to keep the wrestling team and give more opportunities to women, too.

SEAN K. PALMER

Is it right? No. Is it fair? No. But they have to comply with the federal law. I would have been more equitable to split the wrestling budget between the university and the wrestling alumni and team members.
Twin discovers identity in midst of separation

I thought I found my soulmate. She's about five feet seven, weighs 130 pounds and lives in Boston's theater district. If there was one person on this planet who actually understood everything about me it was her — my identical twin sister, Leia.

For eighteen years we shared everything from clothes to closest friends to cars to favorite movies. Growing up in a quiet suburb outside of Baltimore, we even invented a special Morse code system so that we could communicate with each other through our shared bedroom wall.

That's when we were eight. When we were 16, we bought battery operated walkie-talkies. By then, though, we had resorted to having our separate rooms at 3 a.m. Just to talk — about teachers we hated, bad dates and the future. She dreams of going to New York City to become a famous actress.

We had our share of bad times, too. My sister and I have stepped on each other's toes for days on end about things I can't even remember. Leia's opinion is the standard by which I measure everything. Maybe it shouldn't be that way, but identical twins share a bond that is borderline dysfunctional.

Although we may be two people, we come from the same womb and entered the world with our hands clasped. We know nothing about a life not categorized as a pair. She is my other half.

I don't get to see her much anymore. Almost a year ago from today, we made the decision to forge lives apart. Our dreams no longer coincided. We knew the time had come to separate.

She shipped out to Emerson College to study theater and I came home to Syracuse University. After almost a year apart, I was thrilled to be spending my Spring Break with Leia at Emerson. I thought it would be just like old times. But the moment my Greyhound pulled into downtown Boston, I wanted to vomit.

My "vacation" days began at the crack of dawn, when Leia yanked me out of bed by my pajama collar and dragged me blushing and screaming to the gym. There we'd work out for at least two hours — one morning, I slipped off the Nordic Track out of sheer exhaustion.

For the rest of the day, we fought about everything under the sun.

One night, we took a nighttime walk down Boston's then-deserted Newbury Street. Despite the frigid air and long trek, my sister wore nothing but a thin leather jacket, T-shirt black pants and a pair of high-heeled leather boots. I was bundled from head to toe in a down jacket, wool sweater, tattered jeans and my beat-up sneakers. The wind had blown my hair in front of my face.

In mid-conversation, my sister reached out, tucked my hair behind my ears and said bluntly: "We have nothing in common."

To add insult to injury, she continued: "You are a mess."

She began to criticize everything from my chipped nail polish to my career choice to my taste in music. And she told me that life was passing me by.

A week later, she left a "prophetic" message about my destined failure on my answering machine. I just didn't understand.

I realized that no matter how much I told my sister that I was a completely different person, she would never understand. She could never be that way, but identical twins share a bond that is borderline dysfunctional.

I wanted to be spending my Spring Break with Leia at Emerson. I thought it would be just like old times. But the moment my Greyhound pulled into downtown Boston, I wanted to vomit.

March to advocate safety, end to domestic abuse

BY BETH BRAVERMAN
Staff Writer

Take Back the Night, an event calling for safer college campuses and neighborhoods, will be hosted tonight.

Comprised of a march starting at Hendricks Chapel and continuing through campus, a speaker and a media-free "speak-out," Take Back the Night aims to raise awareness and help people feel safe, said Sara Korf, president of the Syracuse University's Panhel lenic Association.

Panhel, representing 11 SU sororities, will participate in the march.

The event's coordinator, the SU Rape: Advocacy, Prevention and Education Center, is hosting a media-free speak-out because they do not want people to feel uncomfortable telling personal stories, Korf said.

"I think what that means is there won't be T.V. cameras there," she said. "There won't be reporters there. People will be able to express themselves without it being reported anywhere — it's basically a safe haven for people to speak.

"If someone was raped, they could stand up and tell their story as an inspiration to people that they can live through it."

Several SU students voiced their own concerns about violence against women.

"I think there is somewhat of a problem," said Jennifer Brown, a freshman child and family studies major.

She added that people seem more angry now than in the past and they cannot find outlets for all of their emotions.

"This causes them to resort to violence," she said.

"I feel it is increasing yearly," he added. "It has to do with the lack of education and it stems from the need to employ more supervision of kids at early ages."

Students reported 74 cases of assault last year, according to the R.A.P.E. center. That number is an increase from 67 in 1998, 58 in 1997 and 30 in 1996, the report said.

Forty-two students sought help at the center for sexual assaults that occurred last year within the SU community, according to the report.

Nate Moradito, a freshman broadcast journalism major, said he agrees that action needed to be taken against domestic violence.

"It is not right for any man or woman to think they have the right to abuse each other," he said. "I think that needs to be at the forefront of the criminal justice system."
University helps high school find focus

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Asst. News Editor

U.S. high school students are feeling the vantage of the city, said Neil Driscoll, spokesman for the Syracuse City School District.

"One of the biggest critiques on the city's education system is that the kids are bored to death," Driscoll said. "We've got to begin developing programs that attract people and get people to stay in the city.

The staff of Fowler High School, and members of Syracuse University's College of Engineering and Computer Science, are among the ones planning to achieve that goal.

This fall, Fowler will begin a program to transform itself into a school that offers a focus in math, science and technology education for its students, said Jaime Alicea, the school's principal.

The $100 million program was funded in this year's Syracuse City School District budget by Superintendent Stephen Jones and involves funding staff training in new subject areas and purchasing new materials for the school.

The city's budget was released Monday and includes the full amount of funding for the school district and the Fowler program.

Last January, Alicea said he met with members of his staff to review the school's status and how to improve its academics.

"We feel it's our responsibility to provide our kids with the skills they need to succeed in life," he explained. "There's a lot of job opportunities out there in the field of technology.

The new program will involve a partnership with faculty members from SUNY and Onondaga Community College who will do some of the teaching in the new program and provide mentoring and guidance for the students, Alicea said.

SUNY staff members involved with the program could not be reached for comment.

Students will also have the opportunity to participate in internships and shadowing programs with local professionals in careers based on math, science and technology, he added.

Fowler's new initiative will concentrate on four science-related career fields to give students a solid pre-professional grounding, Alicea said.

The school will offer concentrations in health, biochemistry, engineering and computer science, in addition to all the other subject areas the school currently teaches, Alicea said.

"This is going to take a commitment from the whole staff," he said. "We're asking all our departments to find ways to integrate technology into all the subjects they teach.

Driscoll said Fowler's innovation will allow interested students to receive a more thorough education within the subject areas the school will focus on.

"It lets the classes accelerate in those areas that the kids are interested in," he said. "Not every kid is interested in math, but others are.

A recent boom in alternative forms of education, such as charter schools, is forcing public schools to concentrate on finding inventive ways to keep their students interested and enrolled, Driscoll said.

Charter schools were recently made legal in New York state and generally provide educational alternatives to public schools, such as a longer school day or a focus on specific subject areas. Syracuse's first charter school, the Central New York Math and Science Charter School, will open this fall and will focus on similar areas as Fowler's new program.

"With the charter school movement, public education is indirect competition," Driscoll said.

"It lets them focus in areas they're primarily concerned with.

Alicea said that although the main goal of the program is to improve academics and achievement for Fowler students, the idea that other students may be attracted by the program is an added bonus.

"Once we establish a solid academic program, if other kids want to come in then that's great," Alicea said. "The doors will be open.

dents attended non-violence workshops, organized protests and shared their stories of what it confronts by police, he added.

"All we can really do is offer certain techniques that will lessen the effect of tear gas, like dousing your face with lemon or with vinegar, stuff like that," McCord said. "There's just local things you can apply to lessen the effects of tear gas.

Most students left Thursday for the protest, he said.

McCord said there were about 15 people he knew that had already left. There are about 100 local students going to the demonstration from SUNY. The State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry, Le Moyne College and local high schools, he said.

The groups are taking advantage of the Internet to get the word out and plan events like this trip, McCord said.

"There's an activist community in Syracuse that's pretty tight," he added. "So when things happen, like the D.C. protest, we manage to get together pretty quickly.

There is no set time for when local students are returning to Syracuse, McCord said, because different people have different plans for the event.

"Some people may well get arrested and stay until they get out, too," he said. "Some people are staying throughout the weekend and some people are coming back Monday.

McCord said he is planning on leaving today, but another teaching assistant in the SUNY English and Social Studies program, he is prevented from staying as long as the other students.

"I have to be back in order to teach," McCord said. "I'm just going to go to offer support to my colleagues there at D.C., but we're going to show our support by camping out and staying out as long as we can.

In addition to circulating petitions, the group has been camping out in tents on the SUNY Quad since Tuesday night. The tents, covered with anti-war shop banners and signs, are manned at all times by SCOOL and Student Environmental Action Coalition members.

"We're going to spread the word so people are very aware of what's going on," Silva said.

va, a sophomore economics major, said despite the fact he could not join his fellow protesters, protests in Syracuse will continue.

"Basically, we're just going to be standing behind everybody that's in D.C." Silva said. "Some of us, we can't make it to D.C., but we're going to show our support by camping out and staying out as long as we can.

"We've split up the labor among the kids that are here," he added. "Some people are doing it at school during the day, and others are.

Some students, however, were prevented from making it down to the capital because of school or work obligations.

"SCOOL member Nick Bil-JUDICIAL continued from page 1 citizenship," she said. "It's a pretty positive report."

Violation of the university's alcohol policies, however, resulted in 12 greek chapters charged with breaking the SU Student Code of Conduct. Four of the campuses charged were not found responsible while two chapters were found responsible.

"Those responsible faced restrictions on social events and were required to participate in alcohol education and community service, Urtz said.

SU Panhellenic Association President Sarah Korf refuted Urtz's claim that Rush contributed to the number of citations.

"Rush is a bi-annual event that invites students to tour greek houses and join one of the greek chapters, after they are going through a program of greek community education, called the new member process or pledging.

"There's no alcohol involved in Rush or pledging so I don't know how that could contribute," Korf said.

Alpha Omicron Pi sorority was charged last week by the national office found evidence of violation within the house. Seven chapter cases regarding alcohol violations remain under investigation, Korf said.

As violations within the greek community and alcohol violations from off-campus dropped, according to the report, Urtz indicated this drop showed greek life was replacing off-campus parties as a social outlet for students.

Urtz said changes in the SU Office of Greek Life and the nature of misbehavior caused the rise in greek violations from earlier in the year.

"We don't see as much hazing and alcohol violations, she said, "but we do see an increase in greek violation within the greek houses in dealing with alcohol.""

The residence hall with the most violations was Flint Hall with 53. Day Hall had 45 and Sadler had 43. Off-campus locations that were the lowest on the list with one each.

"We're doing anything we can to be proactive and educate students," she said. "I hope that's recognized."

Residential conflict

The residence hall with the most violations was Flint Hall with 53. Day Hall had 45 and Sadler had 43. Off-campus locations had more violations than the residence halls, with 69. Day Hall and Sadler halls were the lowest on the list with one each involved.

Alcohol and drugs were involved with most of the violations. 50.7 percent of alcohol violations from October to December, but an overall decrease from September to October when there were 396 cases related to alcohol or drugs.

Officials in Judicial Affairs attributed the decrease in violations to alcohol and drugs.

The first violation involving alcohol results in a warning or disciplinary reprimand and an education program.

"There's no alcohol involved in Rush or pledging so I don't know how that could contribute," Korf said.

Any reputation the greek system has, it gave itself, Korf said. "But she said she is curious if the number of alcohol violations is going to be higher this year, she said. "We're start- ing to see some competition in drugs."

The report also mentioned several violations of the code of conduct, while students were away from the university. Some violations included arson, possession of illegal drugs, and marijuana use.

The arson resulted in the surrender of the case by the SU Panhellenic Association. Korf said, "The SU Panhellenic Association as a third violation resulted in indefinite suspension from the university for a minimum of one academic year, according to the Judicial Affairs Handbook. Kristin Sheehan, a sophomore speech communications major, said she feels the sanctions are too harsh.

"If someone is 20-years-old and has a beer, they have to do community service and Alcohol Awareness 101," she said. "College students can be responsible for themselves."

Of the total 308 cases, illegal drugs were present in 31 cases. Although a decrease from last quarter's 46 cases, drugs are still a major concern, Urtz said.

The presence of drugs in Judicial Affairs cases indicates that there is a larger proportion of students using drugs and that buying illegal drugs can also pose a risk to students who are not involved in the deal, she said.

"A few years ago, alcohol was the main choice for students," she said. "We're starting to see some competition in drugs."

The report also mentioned several violations of the code of conduct. While students were away from the university, some violations included arson, possession of illegal drugs, and marijuana use.

The arson resulted in the suspension of the students' indefinite suspension from SU and the student with the false identification received a disciplinary reprimand and completed an educational program. The marijuana case was dismissed because of a lack of evidence.

Urtz said that Judicial Aff- fairs is contacted by other colleges regarding such incidents.

"The Office of Judicial Affairs does not seek trouble, trouble finds us," she said. "We don't have people checking police blotters in local towns.

"Some students have said they find this practice annoying.

"If I'm off-campus, why should I have to abide by campus rules?," asked Lauren Williamson, a sophomore art education and surface pattern design major. "If I travel to another country like Mexico, I sub- ject myself to Mexican law and shouldn't expect that the United States can help me or penalize me for crimes committed in Mexico. Campus law should work the same."

Sheehan voiced the same opinion.

"When you're not on cam- pus, your behavior shouldn't affect anything on campus.

Breast cancer doesn't have to be a silent killer. Women in Music Industry will on Sunday host its "Rock for a Cause" benefit concert to raise money for cancer research. All funds raised will be donated to Rock For A Cure, a breast cancer awareness group based in Arlington, Va. The concert features local artists Ryan Fitzsimmons, Andara Farmer, Johanna Kodlick, Joanie Leibowitz and others. Everything happens at Happy Endings, 317 S. Clinton St., from 5 to 9 p.m. Tickets are $5 and available at the door.

Hot air
Need a classy date this weekend? Grab your special someone and head for the John Mulroy Civic Center, 800 S. State St., for The Syracuse Symphony Orchestra's annual Contributors Concert this Sunday. The performance will feature work from the 19th Century, including Mendelssohn and Dvorak. Child prodigy Shunsuke Sato will also perform on the violin. Sato will play Violin Concerto No. 2. For tickets call 424-8222.

Fiddling about
Want to get strung out this weekend without breaking the law? Check out fiddler Martin Hayes and guitarist Dennis Cahill when they bring their duet performance to nearby Hamilton College. The performance will feature guitar and fiddle interplay and is part of the college's "On the Town" series. Show starts at 8 p.m. in the College's Wellin Hall. For tickets call 859-4331.

Rocking out
They've played everywhere from Woodstock '99 to Boston's Somerville Theater, and now "moe." is coming to the Proctors Auditorium, 309 S. State St., tonight. Doors open at 7 p.m., and show starts at 8 p.m. With its mix of rock, blues, country and bluegrass "moe." released "Tin Cans and Car Tires" in Fall 1998. Tickets are $18.50 to $22. Call 475-7979.

Friendly concert
The Syracuse Friends of Chamber Music will be performing their final concert of their 50th Anniversary season with a performance by the Julliard String Quartet. The quartet made their Syracuse debut in the late 1970's after graduating from the prestigious Julliard School of Music in Manhattan. The concert will be held 8 p.m. Saturday at H.W. Smith Auditorium, 250 S. Salina St. General admission tickets are available at the door for $20, prices for seniors is $15, students are $12. Call 637-4848.

It’s not uncommon to be inspired by music, Nicholas Alexander was.

Cotz, a junior drama major, loves Pink Floyd. During his junior year in high school, he one day cold-called on the band on the 1979 album, “The Wall.” Realizing that Floyd’s lyrics are actually dialogue that tell a story, Cotz said he had a flash of inspiration.

“It was when I was listening to ‘Comfortably Numb’ that it hit me,” he said. “I could hear the lyrics were really people speaking to each other. So I screwed around with a scene in my head.”

But Cotz did not stop with one scene. He took the lyrics from the entire album and turned them into dialogue, creating the rock opera “The Wall,” playing tonight at 7 p.m. and Saturday at 2 and 7 p.m. in Schine Student Center.

The story — not related to the 1982 movie, “The Wall” — is set in the 1950s United States, when theBeatnik movement supporters were on the verge of revolting against the federal government.

In an attempt to eliminate all the “bleeding hearts and artists,” the federal government created a project to mine and mold a new heart for a child to be “America’s Hitler.”

FBI Agent Mortar, played by senior drama major Joe Maxim, raises the child, appropriately named Pink Floyd, played by John Jeffrey Martin, a senior musical theater major.

Pink grows up as a disciple of the government and becomes a rock star. He leaves his job, a position he has played by junior drama Stephanie St. Hilaire, and marries Vera, played by sophomores drama major Emily Hope Hunter.

The show’s “pit orchestra” rock band is lead by guitarist Chris Heels, a former SU student, who Cotz said is “amazing.”

Pink is living within the walls set up by the government and eventually discovers that he has the power to create walls for himself. Throughout the show, he struggles with his own feelings and tries to escape.

“This is worlds away from anything else I’ve ever done during my acting career,” said Martin, who admitted that he was never a big Pink Floyd fan until he met Cotz. “Most of the stuff we do, the actors live in a happy world on stage and they never really challenge the audience to think or change. Pink is trying to break the fourth wall. This inspires change.”

Behind the scenes, Cotz began working with his four main actors the week before Spring Break. The cast and crew of about 20 have been working ever since to get things “exactly right.”

“This isn’t like a regular script,” he said. “It’s like Shakespeare. It’s high poetry, full of subtexts. It’s very difficult to pull off, but they’re doing such a great job.”

In addition to coordinating the actors to the musical and lyrical complexities, Cotz had to coordinate the stage look and feel.

“There’s no set, really,” he said. “There are five huge video screens where we’ll project still and video images throughout the show. This is the kind of incredible set of technical equipment.”

The total cost of the show is almost $21,000. Five thousand of which came from the Student Government Association and the rest came out of the Arts Adventure budget.

Martin said the set makes the show even more impressive.

“I’m almost certain that never in my career will I get to play a role or be in a production with this much gut-wrenching emotion and this kind of incredible set,” he said. “I just can’t believe how powerful this show is.”

Even for those who aren’t familiar with or do not like Pink Floyd’s music, Cotz encourages attending.

“I’m a very big fan, but I tried to make this so even if you don’t know anything about the music, you will still understand the show and it will be just as powerful,” he said. “And this is a good way to introduce people to Pink Floyd’s music.”

After more than a month of hard work, Cotz said he is proud of the work he and crew have put in, and he is very confident that his show will be a hit.

“It’s really amazing,” Cotz said. “I sometimes just want to cry when I see something I made come to life on the stage. It’s going to be like nothing else.”

still worries the Orangemen. "Rutgers has a fairly young team," he said. "We want to be Rutgers on Saturday night at 7:30. We're going to work our tails off all week."

Powell and the Orangemen attack should find little trouble dissecting the Rutgers defense. The Scarlet Knights (2-6) surrendered almost 14 goals per game, including 17 against Virginia and 15 to struggling Delaware.

SU's senior attacker, who tallied six points in the loss to Cornell, continues to sit atop the national scoring standings with 27 goals and 25 assists. Last season, against the Scarlet Knights, he scored four goals and added six assists.

On the other hand, SU will focus its close defense around silencing Cromwell. But Rutgers also boasts Scott Masey, a University of North Carolina transfer who scored the times in the victory over Stony Brook.

Cromwell's opposite number, Marshall Square Mulligan (6.62 save pct., 8.05 GAA)
Three days ago in Ithaca, Cornell pinned Syracuse with its first men's lacrosse loss in more than 10 months. In rough weather conditions, the Big Red's patient and skilled offense delivered an aggressive SU defense, and Justin Cyna made five key fourth-quarter saves in the Cornell net. A couple days of intense practice, sparked by Powell and his fellow seniors, likely whipped the Orangemen into shape. The SU attack should exploit RU's weak defense, which gives up 14 goals per game.

linebacker to accommodate the Orangemen's defensive needs. Bulluck, at 6-foot-3, 232 pounds with a 4.55 40-yard dash, has impressed experts like Kiper Jr., who said he believes Bulluck can play all three linebacker positions in the NFL.
Pro Football Weekly's draft analyst Joel Buchbbaum, who ranked Bulluck as the No. 5 outside linebacker in a category that includes LaVar Arrington of Penn State, said that Bulluck has first-round ability.
Bulluck also plays like a first-round pick at times, but remains inconsistent, Buchbbaum said. Bulluck's off-field record includes an arrest for Driving While Intoxicated, but it never seemed to scare away NFL scouts.
Kiper Jr. predicts the Kansas City Chiefs will select Bulluck with the No. 21 pick. The Chiefs need defensive help after losing All-Pro linebacker Derrick Thomas, who died in an automobile accident in January.
"He's an expectant athlete," Kiper Jr. said about Bulluck on ESPN. "He has instincts to locate the ball and is a tough enforcer in terms of the tackling ability that he brings to the defense. If you bring up Keith Bulluck, you bring in a very versatile all-around linebacker." Spotwood agreed.
"Analyizes expect him to go first round," he said. "He's getting his due. He's worked hard for this and he deserves it all.
The former SU receiver may join Bulluck on Sunday afternoons next year. In 1997, 5-11, 180-pound receiver said that things went well for him at the NFL combine.
"If one thing stands out for my Syracuse career, it would be workload," Spotwood said. "A lot of things can change when you get injured. But you have to take what life gives you. Everything will work out.

Speed remains on his side, with a 4.45 in the 40-yard dash. But he like himself in the March 10 combine but still worked out for professional scouts. His workout assessments would have matched up well with offensive lineman at the combine, Pilon said.
Pilon, who has already been drafted by the Winnipeg Blue Bombers of the CFL, is projected by The Sporting News to go in the fifth or sixth round.
If the NFL doesn't work out, he will give the CFL a shot, Pilon said from his home in Napanee, Ontario.
SU's complicated offense can only help Orangemen like Baniewicz and Pilon compete in the NFL, Pilon said.
"In our program, it's a hard offense to learn," Pilon said. "It won't be as hard when we have to take it to the next level. We will already be able to understand a complicated offense." Long shots for Syracuse include former linebacker Vernon Banks, former tight end Stephen Bronnis, former defensive back Ian Melchoit and former defensive end Derrick Corley.
Draft day is less than 24 hours away. For two days, a tiny board in the Madison Square Garden press box will hold the fate of several former Orangemen.
"I think anyone is probably the best word," Baniewicz said. "I'm excited to see where my new home is going to be.

Ah, what better than to write this week’s column after watching “Dazed and Confused?” Not that we’re doing some retroview or anything.

The Cinemaniacs are back and we’re more highly contrasting than ever. No, we didn’t see ‘90s blockbusters Black and White this week, but listen to us now and believe us later when we say that watching “Dazed” served us much better.

The first disappointing feature was that the name was misspelled. Not only was it in color, but the comment on race relations had no focus whatsoever. Another disappointment is its abrupt ending which seems like a cop-out to just stop and throw the phrase “six months later” up on the screen. This type of ending can work, but doesn’t here, where there is that quick compilation of images that confuse more than complete.

Next, stemming from a cross between ‘Scream 3’ and ‘Romeo Must Die,’ we’ve said it before and we’ll say it again, this was a parade of stars.

Not just any stars, they were predominately from the rap community, along with a pro basketball player, an infamous boxer, a model and a few rich kids thrown in.

An ensemble cast does not have to be a parade. Not all film-makers can get this through their heads. Some can, like the Coen Brothers and Paul Thomas Anderson. But not, we think, Martin Scorsese, Al Raulow, Allan Houston, Mike Tyson, Claudia Schiffer, Bijou Phillips and Brooke Shields (breasts) couldn’t save this picture from the plot — or lack thereof — that sunk it faster than the Titanic.

Not the film, the boat, kids. We all know that film had the box-office receipts to resurrect that damn boat in more ways than one.

The plot to “Black and White” is not in black and white. Not even in script format. It follows the story of inner-city kids, wealthy and poor — gangsters, legitimate businesspeople, scholars and a documentary filmmaker — who run into each other and with their alter-ego lifestyles.

Orangemen battle Scarlet Knights

By Dave Curtis

It took thousands of dedicated soldiers to take out the great empires of the world. But Syracuse head men's lacrosse coach John Desko said he worries one Scarlet assassin could bring down the top-ranked Orangemen.

Keith Cromwell, Rutgers' leading attacker for the past three years, heads an upset-minded Scarlet Knights squad against Syracuse (7-1) at 7:30 p.m. Saturday at Yurcak Field.

The RU junior leads his squad this year with 16 assists and 24 goals, five of which came in a 13-10 win over Stony Brook on Tuesday.

He began last season with a three-goal outing in Rutgers' 20-13 loss to Syracuse in the Carrier Dome. He finished the year at the nation's leading sophomore scorer and, barring injury, should shatter his school's scoring records sometime next season.

"For my money, Keith is the best attacker in the country," 26-year Knights coach Tom Hayes said. "He's the best attacker I've ever coached."

Even with Cromwell's scoring skills, the Scarlet Knights' hopes at shocking the Orangemen look bleak. SU not only possesses more talent but carries the fury of its first loss, Tuesday's 13-12 setback to No. 9 Cornell.

After the defeat, the Orangemen ripped their effort and blamed the loss on lack of emotion. Senior attackman Ryan Powell, who might join Cromwell on this season's All-American squad, promised intense workouts leading to the matchup in ways the Orange could not.

"Against both, we would like to see movement to open things up. We need to stretch the field and take advantage of our athleticism on the attacking side.

"If we limit our space and don't maneuver well, we subtract from our ability on the attacking side.

"Against both, we would like to see movement to open things up. We need to stretch the field and take advantage of our athleticism on the attacking side."

"When the snow in Syracuse melts each spring, SU gridiron stars -- from Ernie Davis to Floyd Little, to Art Monk, to Daryl Johnston -- say goodbye to the Hill and hello to a job in the NFL."

This weekend marks the next class of Syracuse seniors hoping to find a new home when the annual NFL draft kicks off at 12 p.m. Saturday in New York City.

Potentially, six players from Syracuse could be drafted. But the number could also be as low as one or two.

"I'm going to get a job," former SU wide receiver Quentin Spotwood said. "I expect someone to notice my talent. I'm looking to play at the next level. How high I rank does not matter, I'm just trying to get a job."

Spotwood joins a large Syracuse senior class looking to see their names on the draft board during the two-day, seven-round event.

For Syracuse, the sure-bet is Keith Bulluck. The former SU linebacker has been compared to current Denver Bronco Bill Romanowski and is ranked by draft guru Mel Kiper Jr. as the eighth best prospect in this weekend's draft.

Last season, Bulluck led the Orangemen with 135 tackles, 89 of which were unassisted. The captain also led the nation in tackles for loss at 18.

The Orangemen look bleak. SU not only possesses more talent but carries the fury of its first loss.

SU faceoff man Chris Cercy leads the nation in face-off percentage. He won 97 out of 134 faceoffs so far this season, good for 74.4 percent. Cercy and the Orangemen travel to Rutgers on Saturday at 7:30 p.m. to continue a four-game road swing.

Stabbing trial ends, Edwards innocent

BY EMILY KULKUS

Three-year-old Nyshia Edwards got her father back Thursday afternoon.

The girl is the daughter of Corey Edwards, the man charged in connection with the stabbing of Syracuse University starting senior guard David Byrd in a fight last October at Sadie's Place, 104 Seymour St.

On April 4, Treuquall Stockhouse, of 218 McLean Avenue, pleaded guilty for his involvement in the brawl, landing the 22-year-old in a New York state prison for seven years.

Stockhouse's actions were directly related to injuries caused to Mydayn "Duke" Pettijohn, a starting defensive end for the Orangemen, who also suffered cuts to his head and ear in the brawl.

Forum explores global economy

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

The New York State Labor-Religion Coalition recently took several trips to Mexico, home to some 16 million U.S. companies stationed in the country.

Coalition members are appalled by what they witnessed, coalition representative Matson Averett said. "The workers are constantly exposed to toxic chemicals, which are stored in large canisters with English or Japanese warning labels on them, Casey said.

"The Mexican workers can't read the warning labels, she added.

"And when the barrels are empty, the companies give them to the workers to take home and store water in, Casey said at a Friday afternoon panel discussion sponsored by Syracuse University's political science department.

On the eve of the Washington, D.C., protest against the International Monetary Fund and World Bank, about 40 people gathered for the event in Egerers Hall and heard union and manufacturing representatives debate the effects of a global economy.

"At a Dupont air-conditioning plant across the Mexican border, the by-product of a coolant is dumped on the ground outside the factory. The highly-toxic white dust, called "forno" is used to pave the streets in nearby slums, Casey said.

"You see this white powder kicking up on the streets, over everything," Casey said. "People tell us, 'When it rains, it gets on our skin and burns.'"

Both the World Bank and the IMF are set up to support this kind of worker exploitation, Casey said.

In Mexico, for example, 25 cents on every foreign exchange dollar goes toward paying the country's debt, she said.

"That means that 25 cents on every foreign exchange dollar is not going to build schools, it's not going to pave roads," Casey said. "It's going to service an unpayable debt."

The North American Free Trade Agreement, in addition to making plants like Dupont's possible, facilitates the loss of U.S. jobs, she said.

Casey cited the example of a windshield wiper company which operated a large plant in Buffalo. During the 1980s, the company moved its business to Mexico, she said.

"Three thousand union workers lost their jobs," Casey said. "Three thousand Mexican workers are doing their jobs for $60 a week."

"Where is the money going?"

Police Reports:

Student hit with beer bottle outside local bowling center

Staff Reports

A Chittenango resident assaulted a Syracuse University School of Management student early Sunday morning at the Erie Boulevard Bowling Center, according to a police report.

Police arrived at 1:40 a.m. at the bowling alley to find several witnesses who reported that a bald man with a large build fought with the SU senior and hit him on the head with a beer bottle, the report said.

The suspect left in a white Plymouth automobile, said witnesses in the report.

Police pulled over the vehicle and told the driver to return to the bowling alley to clear up the situation, the report said.

The suspect, 25-year-old Robert Peck, shouted obscenities at the police, telling them they were going home, the report said.

Police then ordered Peck to get out of the car, the report said. Once out of the car, Peck refused arrest and police had to use force to handcuff him, the report added.

Witnesses verified that Peck was the suspect, the report said.

The student received medical treatment at the North Medical Center, the report said.

The SU senior refused comment.

Thousands protest in D.C.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Thousands of demonstrators felled to shut down a meeting of world finance ministers but disrupted the city and succeeded in airing their loud cry for "global justice." Sunday. Police banned traffic from 90 downtown blocks and the streets filled with a raucous mix of protesters, counterprotesters and bystanders chained together in blockades.

For much of the day, the protesters occupied 18 intersections around their targets, the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. D.C. police made more than 200 arrests, mostly for breaking into buildings. There were scattered scuffles with police. Officers doused small amounts of pepper gas to disperse crowds. Witnesses said police also made at least two confrontations. Police said the officers asked permission to fire tear gas after they were pelleted with rocks and bottles by protesters, but supervisors did not give their approval.

The demonstrators largely kept their promise not to resort to violence and most of the more than 1,000 protesters spent more time chanting their demands than hurling rocks or bottles, although some tried to break the windows of police cars.

Israel mentions creation of state

JERUSALEM — The Israeli government tried to reinvigorate its peace talks with Palestinians this weekend by stating publicly what almost everyone here has assumed for some time: Peace means the creation of a Palestinian state.

The behavioral changes are linked to new political realities in the region, including the heightened security risks and increased costs of operating in a warmer climate. And medical experts say it is a real physiological condition that may affect the health of those exposed to warmer temperatures.

Unfortunately, spring fever arrives at one of the busiest times of the year, when teachers are trying to prepare students for standardized tests and finish other work required before school is out for the summer.

The behavioral changes are linked to increased dehydration, increased sunburn, and increased exposure to the harmful effects of prolonged exposure to sunlight. Adults learn to respond to their bodies to stay outdoors. But for children, the lure of the outdoors is hard to resist.
Campus march decries sexual violence

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Staff Writer

More than 100 students marched across the Syracuse University campus on Friday night in defiance of sexual violence.

"It was symbolic of us raising our voices," said Beth Wodnick, a former SU employee and member of the Vera House's national prevention and education program encouraging men to help end sexual violence against women.

The event also acted as support for victims, said Karen Wodnick, a senior photography major.

"We are letting them know the things that happened to them weren't their faults," Wodnick said. "It wasn't because of what they were wearing, how much they had to drink or whom they were hanging out with.

Many women have endured sexual violence but do not consider what happened to them as rape — even if the law says it is, Wodnick said.

In her speech, Wodnick called on Public Safety to quit doing its response time to blue light alarms. She also questioned the effectiveness of the on-campus escort service during her speech.

"I feel unsafe walking on campus at times," Wodnick said. "Although the Syracuse University Rape, Advocacy, Prevention and Education Center made a donation to the event, Friday's activities were not affiliated with any campus groups, Wodnick said.

"It was just a group of women who came together for a cause," she added.

Men were asked to wear white ribbons to show their support, as part of the Vera House's campaign against domestic violence.

"For so long men haven't been involved in this sort of problem and in this sort of event," said McPherson, who graduated in 1987. "For me, this is putting your money where your mouth is. I feel very privileged to support.

"We can't prioritize," Wodnick said. "We have to work together as a whole."

suffered cuts to his arm, head and back while a fourth man, Daniel Moore, was treated and released from St. Joseph's Hospital immediately following the brawl.

But the SU football players' injuries for everything but the wrongfully charged against her for her involvement in the incident, Mrs. Edwards said. While she admits her son was at Sidie's on Oct. 31, 1999, she did not participate in the stabbing, she added.

"If he saw it then he didn't do it," Mrs. Edwards said. "He's going to stay out of it.

With her son facing a possible 25 years in prison for the charges, the last five months have been difficult for the entire family.

"I think if it had been just regular kids fighting and they got stabbed it wouldn't have turned into this," Mrs. Edwards said. "No way it would have been all over the news the way it was.

Byrd testified Wednesday regarding the specifics of the incident and was able to identify Corey Edwards as the cause of his injuries. Byrd could not be reached for comment.

Pleased with the jury's decision, the Edwards family left the courtroom immediately, but the trial will far outlast any decision, she said.

"What happens when he goes to search for a job and everybody's got his own opinion about him already," Mrs. Edwards said.

What about Byrd? He's going back to play football and my son would have been in jail for 25 years.

Byrd was a strong contender in this past weekend's National Football League college player draft but was not selected.

Gang accusations
Edwards' friends include Stadhouse and Chiron Thomas, but they are not members of the rumored "Boot Camp" gang, his mother said. Thomas' trial is expected later next month for his involvement in the case.

In early November, members of the Syracuse Police Department claimed that Thomas, Stadhouse and Corey Edwards were all members of the gang, a group of 10 members known to the Syracuse's west side.

However, references to the gang appear in Corey Edwards' mother said. The name originated when her son and his friends were approached by police while standing on a corner. The kids were "wearing out" wearing army fatigue clothing when police officers told them they looked like they needed to go to boot camp.

"If the incident had changed many lives, Mrs. Edwards said, noting that her son and his friends have a changed perspective since last Halloween.

"Those boys, they used to look up to the football players," she said. "Not anymore."
MOORE continued from page 1 rized his class work in the book, "Globalization and the City." Short wrote the book last winter with Yeong-Hyun Kim, who was a geography doctoral student at the time.

Both Short and Kim denied Moore's accusation of plagiarism. "This charge is unfounded and malicious," Short said. "It's clearly unfounded. It's untrue, simply not true."

Moore could not be reached for comment.

Meanwhile, the "Professional Geographer" is holding an article submitted by the GEO 815 class until it is notified of USen's decision, said Stuart Aitken, co-editor of the scientific journal.

"The article is sitting in our filing cabinet," Aitken said. "Publishing is the lifeblood of academia, and plagiarism is a very serious thing. Academia takes this very, very seriously."

The article was set for publication in the November 2000 issue of the "Professional Geographer," but was pulled because of Moore's accusations, Aitken said. The next issue where the article could appear is February 2001 because the November 2000 issue was already sent to press.

Bonische said "This is a little squabble between a student who's upset at a professor," Bonische said. "It shouldn't be such a symbolic protest."

Police must know area they protect

It only takes one ugly incident to shatter good relations between law enforcement officials and minority residents.

In Syracuse it’s allegations of police brutality against Hispanic fraternity members following the Livingston Avenue riots. In New York City it’s an unarmed immigrant gunned down in his doorway while reaching for his wallet.

A continual and frightening theme emerges from heated court trials and bold newspaper headlines nationwide: racial profiling.

Police make assumptions based on dozens of characteristics — race, age, sex, economic status. Sometimes, analyzing these characteristics yields helpful information. But they can also lead officers to draw unfair conclusions and make rash, unjustified judgments. A young black man is no more inherently dangerous than an elderly white man — even if some crime statistics indicate otherwise.

Officers must base their actions on experience — this is a given, and perhaps the most effective way to work their beats. But presumptions become dangerous when they masquerade over every minority sitting behind the wheel of a pricey car for fear they’re running drugs.

In order to adequately serve and protect a community, police must have knowledge of the area that transcends the fine details of a road map.

The efficacy of officers is determined only by the extent of trust they build with the community they police. Good cops don’t just show up in the neighborhood when trouble is going down. They stop by on sunny Saturday afternoon outings to play a game of sandball with all. They take the time to learn the names of neighborhood kids and talk with them about their hopes, dreams and fears.

Black, white or green — race shouldn’t matter when the face that arrives on the crime scene is a familiar one.

Packing preconceived notions when responding to calls threatens the already tenuous web of relationships between victims, perpetrators and law enforcement officers.

Columnist searches for validation of profession

Sometimes I feel like I’m in the mood to write. It’s difficult to produce ingenious ideas every week, but I try. Friends and acquaintances often ask me at cocktail parties, “Why do you write columns in the newspaper?” I wish I could reply deceptively, “I do it for the money.” But since I’m not paid to write for The Daily Orange, I have yet to come up with a more convincing answer.

There are indeed many ways that I can respond to this question.

Knowing that there are few people who can communicate logical, coherent thoughts in writing, I have decided to sacrifice my time and skills to fulfill this sacred social responsibility. As I eloquently illustrated in last week’s article, there are many appealingly bad writers among us. Therefore, I write because I am capable of doing it.

Henry Y. Chung

In other words, I write because I want to ruin people’s appetites. For instance, the following is excerpted from a hilarious e-mail I received a few weeks ago:

“There was a time when I enjoyed eating my lunch (by myself, for I have no friends) and reading our fine daily newspaper. But after reading Mr. Chung’s article the other day, I decided that I would rather eat my lunch and conduct human companionship for my lunchtime entertainment.”

That, to me, is a compliment — I mean, what gratifies a columnist more than knowing that his columns have profoundly changed someone’s life? One of my columnists said to me, “Your columns have pissed me off tremendously, but I find myself coming back to read them every week.”

My friend said, “Your columns have profoundly changed someone’s life?”

“Perhaps,” I replied, “Your columns have pissed me off tremendously, but I find myself coming back to read them every week.”

For me, it’s the opposite. When people get upset, they desire to get more upset. I’m proud of helping these people achieve this Freudian ecstasy.

Evidently, my ultimate objective of writing columns is to create a better world for future generations. Another of my columns made a difference when I wrote about the one in which I glorify the Slimer character from the “Real Ghostbusters” cartoon. I added that I collect out-of-print Slimer items and watch reruns of Slimer episodes. Also, Slimer’s honesty and straightforwardness serve as my inspiration. I am the human version of Slimer, but with much less soul.

Returning to the question of why I write, Nietzsche would answer, “Because I haven’t found a method to exonerate my thoughts yet.” Here I borrow Nietzsche’s words to accurately express my sentiments. But 20 years from now, if you asked me the same question, I would certainly answer, “Because I do it for the money.”

Henry Y. Chung is the first-year student at the College of Law. His columns appear Mondays in The Daily Orange. E-mail him at hechung@syrd.

When I was seven, my mother needed to divorce my paranoid schizophrenic father for our own safety. After that, my family continued to suffer because of extreme poverty. Growing up without a dad made me very angry inside. My mom told me my three siblings and I that God was the best father we could ever have, but I tended to disagree with that. At a young age I started to use weed and drink alcohol with my friends. I listened to popular gangsta rappers and they told me it was okay to smoke blunts, get drunk, and fight for money. Thug life appealed to me because it was me against the world and I believed that it was okay to smoke blunts, get drunk, and fight for money.

I started to fill my head with the truths of God's word by reading the Holy Bible everyday. I was forgiven. My broken heart was mended and I realized that only He could fill my empty heart. I responded to the altar call, along with 600 other teens. I got on my knees and asked Jesus to change me. It was the best decision I have ever made. Since December 27th, 1998 I have been a new creation. God took away my desire to sin and He filled me with His love. My broken heart was mended and I realized that only He could fill my empty heart. I responded to the altar call, along with 600 other teens. I got on my knees and asked Jesus to change me.

My senior year in High School began and I saw how unsatisfying my life really was. I was ready for a change, but I was afraid to let go of the old habits of street life. A neighbor invited me to go on a youth group trip to Niagara Falls with a local church. She said that she, along with many people's children, had attended this trip in the past and it had opened their eyes to a new way of life. I accepted the invitation and went on the trip.

However, the first night there, I heard a speaker talking about his life growing up in the ghetto. His testimony about a fatherless life of poverty really related to me. He said that it all changed when he gave his life over to Jesus Christ. He asked anyone in the audience if they would like to come down front and pray that Jesus would come into their life and give them eternal peace and happiness. I responded to the altar call, along with 600 other teens. I got on my knees and asked Jesus to change me. Before I knew it, I was crying uncontrollably and repeating something to Jesus. It was "Thank you Jesus, thank-you Jesus." As the tears ran down my face I felt cleansed. I felt a million burdens being lifted off of me - my sins being washed away.

I learned that God blessed me with ample financial support to afford college. I started to fill my head with the truths of God's word by reading the Holy Bible everyday. I will forever praise Jesus Christ for changing me and setting me free from the bondage of sin and death.
Of course

In a recent article featured in the Washington Post, Patrick Swygert, president of Howard University, stated that there are two courses essential to undergraduate studies regardless of what discipline one might pursue — logic and a course in a foreign language. He said that he was convinced that one of the best ways of mastering the English language is seeking to master a foreign language. It gives you, like logic, a kind of discipline. It expands your ability to think. You think in another dimension in another language. Hopefully, through the language, you will be introduced to a different culture, and new issues and ideas. These types of courses introduce a host of ideas and notions beyond language itself — philosophers and thinkers and music.

Wrestling networks

World Wrestling Federation Entertainment notified USA Networks Inc. a week ago Monday that it intended to accept an offer from Viacom and CBS for the rights to distribute wrestling matches through at least 2006, according to a lawsuit filed by USA against WWF, CBS and Viacom. In the lawsuit, filed Wednesday in Delaware Chancery Court stated that, without injunctive relief from the court, it will lose rights to its highest-rated programming, supplied by WWF.

Gene draft

Marking another milestone on the way to deciphering the entire human genetic code, U.S. Department of Energy scientists announced Thursday that they have completed “working drafts” of three human chromosomes. The 10,000 to 15,000 genes on these chromosomes include several known to be linked to serious diseases, including leukemia, high blood pressure, prostate cancer and diabetes. It is hoped that the detailed mapping of these genes will lead to new treatments for the disorders.

Shepherd gives youth new sound

Youth dominates today’s music. Whether it is the squalls of rabid Britney Spears and Backstreet Boys fans outside MTV studios every day or the obscene 24 million copies of 'N Sync's new album sold in its first week, teen bubble-gum pop is everywhere. Unfortunately, the collective talent of these musicians isn’t, in any logical sense, equivalent to their popularity. I admit that Christina Aguilera has a lovely voice, and that the boy bands can really dance, but they are more performers than they are musicians. Most teenage-agers, with some rare exceptions, don’t write their own music — they do what producers tell them to do.

The only thing Kenny Wayne Shepherd has in common with today’s popular acts is his age. A far cry from the synthetic beats and saccharin ballads of his pop counterparts, Shepherd prefers good old-fashioned blues-rock. The 22-year-old helmsman of The Kenny Wayne Shepherd Band writes, arranges and performs all of his own material.

The band’s new album, "Live On," doesn’t offer much variety. However, the lack of variation is more than made up for with Shepherd’s energy, audacity and pure, raw skill. "Live On" provides over a dozen rockers.

On a dark winter evening, two black teenagers walked along the dilapidated streets of Brooklyn. Tired after basketball practice, Mark Samuels and his twin brother, Marlon, began running when they saw a bus — the one that would take them home — zip by the stop at the corner store.

As they rushed to catch up, a police patrol car pulled alongside, and the officer — a white man — leaned out to ask the brothers why they were in such a hurry.

"Where's the fire?" Samuels remembered the officer asking.

Samuels, a sophomore marketing and advertising major at Syracuse University, was an upperclassman in a New York City high school at the time. In retrospect, Samuels said it should have been obvious to the officer that he and his brother were running after the bus because it was situated directly in front of the police patrol car.

If he were white, he would not have been stopped that night, Samuels said.

According to a 1998 study by The Center for Urban Research and Polity at Columbia University, police brutality is strikingly visible in black and Latino communities in New York state.

In a survey of New York state residents, 23.7 percent of whites responded that they perceived police brutality in their neighborhoods, while 44.6 percent of blacks and 36.5 percent of Latinos reported that they believed it was present, according to the study.

More than 60 percent of white respondents approved of police striking citizens, while only 37.6 percent of blacks and 32.2 percent of Latinos approved, according to the study.

Data for the study was collected from two surveys in New York state during the 1997 New York City mayoral election period.

Although the brothers did manage to board the bus, Mark Samuel said the incident had stayed with him.

The officer was wrong to keep them, but his reaction was understandable, he said.

"It's easy to lay out blindly," Samuel said. "You have to think about why."

Samuel's was initially raised in a predominantly Jewish neighborhood. But over the years, the once-plentiful Hanukkah menorahs displayed in his neighbors' windows disappeared, he said.

"It was the most blatant example of white flight," Samuel said.

The neighborhood has since deteriorated and police patrols have become a common sight, he added.

They go after people regardless," Samuel said of the police. "They don't try to analyze whether you're innocent or not."

Rachel Clay, a freshman in the College of Arts and Sciences, said she and other family members have been pulled over by the police numerous times in her hometown of Chicago.

"Every time, I've lost all respect for the police," she said.

On a recent occasion, Clay, her brother, sister and cousin were driving on Chicago's South Side in their blue Corsica when they heard the shriek of police sirens, the Aug. 9, 1997 attack of Clay, her brother, sister and cousin were driving on Chicago's South Side in their blue Corsica when they heard the shriek of police sirens, according to the study.

"What happened in New York City can very easily happen in Syracuse and other communities," a police accountable, she added, "because we're all in danger."

"We've got a great police department," Rathbun said.
The police are trying to join their ranks and have in-Rutgers' defense and offensive line up to stop the Jacksonville Jaguars picked Smith.

After beginning his career as a strong safety, he moved back to the middle. He moved back to the middle. He moved back to the middle.

The Hawks' defense was able to control the game and limit the Eagles to a field goal on their first possession. Rutgers' offense was able to move the ball downfield and score on their next possession.

In the second quarter, Rutgers took over and scored two touchdowns to extend their lead to 28-0. Smith added another field goal to make it 31-0 at halftime.

In the third quarter, Rutgers scored again, doubling their lead to 44-0. In the fourth quarter, the Hawks scored a touchdown to make it 44-7. However, they were unable to score any more points.

Rutgers' defense was able to control the game throughout and limit the Hawks to only one touchdown. The Scarlet Knights' offense was able to score three touchdowns and lead the game for the entire duration.

The final score was Rutgers 44, Jacksonville Jaguars 7.
After first loss, Syracuse bounces back

PIGINAWAY, N.J. — On Tuesday, in nearby Isaca, the nation's No. 1 team lost a game that many thought they never would.

Cornell's 13-12 upset erased any thoughts of an undefeated season and, at the same time, planted the seed for SU's post victory.

"We've got to get going as a team," senior captain Ryan Powell said after the loss. "I wouldn't want to be Rutgers on Saturday night at 7:30. We're going to work our tails off all week.

Like Iraq during Operation: Desert Storm and Screen's love life on "Saved by the Bell," Rutgers simply didn't have a chance.

In its 15-8 win, Syracuse displayed another marker of a national championship contender — the ability to bounce back.

It could have been a lot worse.

After all, it was only two years ago that a Scarlet Knights' upset opened up on their SU's Syracuse opponent. On the same Yarkield, Rutgers defeated for the 15-10 blowout, national title hopes.

The Orangemen entered that game with a 6-1 record, a close loss to Loyola only two games earlier.

The weather was poor, with the wind blowing around against SU's precision offense.

A freshman from New York City, with Cromwell, wanted to show Syracuse why they probably should have recruited him, as he tallied four goals in Rutgers' win.

Still Round familiar?

This time around, the captains decided that Rutgers would be different.

"There was a lot said," SU goalie Rob Mulligan said. "It was up to us to captain to get the team back. We really picked it up this weekend and got after each other in practice."

He also tallied the first goal of the fourth quarter, a low running shot passed Rutgers goalie John Martine to put Syracuse up 12-5.

Players like Byrne and Mulligan, but those came to play at Syracuse instead.

"Lacrosse has grown so much now that it's not regional anymore," Cromwell said. "I think it's a matter of programs against programs. If we have success against the No. 1 team that helps our recruiting, whether they're from Florida or Maryland, Virginia or anywhere."

And for the No. 1 team, success wasn't so hard to come by.

Sophomore attacker Liam Banks is a Ward Melville product. He ranks third on Syracuse in scoring with 18 goals and 26 assists, has scored 10 of those in the season's past two games.

The nation's top face-off man, Chris Cercy, is another in the long line from Long Island.

The junior went to high school at Bethpage, the same high school that produced Brian Puk, what another player is sitting out this season due to academia.

Cercy helped the Orangemen to win 18 out of 24 face-offs against St. Mary's, giving the offense enough possessions to put 16 goals on the scoreboard.

"I threw in Mike Smith, who tallied three of his four goals with 3:40 left in the second quarter, Bill Perrett, with the most minutes for a freshman, fellow freshman Keith and Rich McKeel, senior attack Ethan Mills and starting defenses Billy St. George and Rutgers may as well have been a home game for the Orangemen.

This is definitely one of the hots for recruiting," SU head coach John Desko said. "We enjoy the opportunity to come down and showcase our team. They don't have to travel as far to see us play, so it's good to come down and piny well and win.

In addition to SU's presence on Long Island, local New Jersey products Mike Springer and Sam Bassett chose to leave home and come to the Hill.

While Mike's younger brother, Ken, was part of the offensive line, the offensive enough possessions to put 16 goals on the scoreboard.

Something that showed something about SU's first-half play.

In fact, it was at Bassett's Clinton Court that the Orangemen dined on steaks and hamburgers Friday night.

One New York native that didn't join them was Keith Cromwell, Rutgers' Scarlet as-sassin, who scored two goals and dished two assists against Syracuse.

Recruited lightly out of high school, Cromwell helped shock Syracuse 12-10 only two years ago.

With Syracuse continually taking top recruiters and whisking them out of the region, good showing against the nation's No. 1 squad can only help. 16-8 loss may not, Cromwell said.

"We wanted to come out and show a good performance like we have in the past against these guys," Cromwell said. "It definitely helps kids coming out to the game, show that we're a competitive team. At times tonight, we were competitive. Others, we weren't."

SU freshman Eyal Sherman struggles to succeed in college and life despite a life-altering condition.

By Magin Mckenna
Asst. Lifestyle Editor

The human ear cannot hear Eyal Sherman speak. A quadriplegic, his vocal chords have been frozen since the age of five, and he is attached to a ventilator 24 hours a day. Most days though, he is just trying to make it to class on time at Syracuse University — across a campus characterized by steep hills, with his mother in tow and on an electric wheelchair that he navigates with his mouth. “It’s hard, but I stay positive just by laughing a lot,” said Eyal, a freshman in The College of Arts and Sciences. “You could have worse.”

On a recent weekday, Eyal’s mother, Leah, pulls up in front of Herey Geology Building in the family’s weather-beaten Chevy Conversion van for his last class of the day, PHY 106: Science for the 21st Century.

Light April snowflakes fall from the sky onto Eyal’s face, and he shivers as his mother unloads him from the car. He flinches at the chill, and Leah Sherman smooths a down jacket across his chest. Beneath it, Eyal, 18, wears an SU sweatshirt, blue jeans and a pair of clean Air Jordans.

From the parking lot, he sets off for the Physics Building. This day, his course is tricky and he veers off path several times, getting a few odd looks from passing students.

Once inside the Physics Building, Eyal heads for the basement and makes his way through a supply closet, littered with unkempt boxes and loose supplies. “It usually isn’t this messy,” Leah Sherman said, as she reaches to move a box out of Eyal’s way.

After a few minutes, Eyal enters an empty Stolkin Auditorium through a back door.

It’s a quarter to six — fifteen minutes before the class starts — and Eyal has just enough time to get settled. Leah Sherman places headphones over his ears so that he can hear his professor, Ed Lipson, lecture the class.

Soon a handful of students trickle in, and class begins on time.

By 8 p.m. the class, which lasts for almost five hours, breaks for a hands-on lab session — the topic is gene mutations. It is a complex subject topic of study and elicits groans from the numerous adult students in the class. But Eyal is keenly interested. “He’s wide awake in this class,” Leah

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Like other times last weekend, police and bureaucrats in the nation's capital managed to walk through the streets without being noticed by the protesters.

Many protesters, including SU students, spent their nights at a church located in southeast Washington, D.C. Dozens of protesters littered the halls, resting in sleeping bags or sitting on stairs.

City denies permits for block party

Last spring, about 1,000 Syracuse University students clashed with riot police during the annual Livingston block party, resulting in dozens of arrests and about $20,000 in damage.

Fearful of a sequel, city officials said last week that student residents on Livingston Avenue will not receive permits to close the street for such a block party this year.

Students will still be able to party, however, just not events that will close any street in the area, said Harry Lewis, president of the South Eastern University Neighborhood Association.

"I understand that kids like to have a good time, but we are not going to allow such an event to take place as the one that happened on Livingston Avenue last year," said Lewis.

While recently travelling through an airport, Dan Quayle was approached by a man who swore he had seen Quayle, but then remembered — and mistakenly identified him as the host of Wheel of Fortune.

"The biggest difference between the private and public life is the recognition factor," Quayle said to about 150 people Monday night in Syracuse University's Goldstein Auditorium.

Quayle, who served as U.S. vice president from 1988 to 1992, said his airport story reflects apathy within the country regarding politics. He also noted the same apathy within the presidency concerning foreign policy and within families toward moral values.

"When you look at the violence that has gone on from time to time, when you look at the dysfunctional families, you have to start seeing Quayle, the idea of democracy, the idea of human rights.

State Dept. laptop vanishes
WASHINGTON, D.C. — A laptop computer containing top-secret information vanished from the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research more than a week ago, and the FBI is investigating whether it was stolen, a senior State Department official said.

The laptop's disappearance from a supposedly secure conference room at the department has set off an intense effort to recover the computer and a search for suspects, including contractors who have been removed from the area, the official said.

Another person familiar with the incident said that the missing computer contains "code word" information, a classification higher than top secret, and that it includes sensitive intelligence information and plans.

A senior State Department official said that it remained unclear whether the laptop was misplaced or stolen and that, if it ever turned up, the thief realized the sensitivity of the material on it simply for the value of the hardware.

Court upholds luggage privacy
WASHINGTON, D.C. — A bus passenger who puts his luggage in an overhead compartment can reasonably expect privacy for his belongings, a right that police violate if they squeeze the bags in a search for drugs, the Supreme Court ruled today.

By a 7-to-2 vote, the justtice reversed the conviction of a man who was discovered with a "brick" of methamphetamine in his canvas bag, ruling that he had been subject to an unreasonable search under the Fourth Amendment. A federal agent who had checked passengers' immigration status aboard a Greyhound bus in Texas found the drugs as he began feeling suitcases in the storage rack.

Monday's somewhat surprise win for Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist highlighted the intrusion of "tactile" observation, as opposed to the mere visual surveillance of a person's property. The court vigorously rejected the jurists' argument that the mere visual surveillance of a person's property.

Panhel votes to ban fraternity house mixers

BY JOHN ARWEIIXR
Staff Writer

Syracuse University's Panhellenic Association voted Monday to ban campus sororities from co-sponsoring alcohol-related functions with fraternities, Panhel President Sarah Korf said.

Greek community members, however, still need to work out the specifics of the initiative, Korf added.

"There was absolutely no discussion," she said of Monday's vote. "It was pretty much a cut and dry decision.

The vote occurred without much explanation because the issues were discussed at a meeting last week, she added.

But greek presidents noted some opposition to the vote and two of the 11 sororities voted against the ban, Korf said.

"It comes with some resistance," said Leslie Weiner, president of Alpha Epsilon Phi. "But you have to abide what national and what Panhel mandate.

Sororities had to comply with a mandate by the National Panhellenic Conference's regional convention in 1998.

Some sororities' national offices have already adopted a version of the recommended policy and those respective SU chapters will not be affected by the new laws.

The conference advised a "tier" based policy, said Heidi Holzapfel, president of Alpha Gamma Delta. Sororities under the first tier would not be able to participate in any event with a fraternity whose facilities were not dry, she said.

Second-tier sororities would be able to attend functions with fraternities as long as there was no alcohol present at the event.

The third tier of sororities would support the other sororities' decisions without making a stance of their own, Holzapfel said.

Where a sorority falls in this tier system depends on their national's decision, added Holzapfel.

Panhel must discuss an SU social policy so a plan to implement and enforce the alcohol-free initiative can be agreed upon, Korf said. That way, sororities at SU will be on a common social level.

"It's not worth fighting over," said Katherine Biro, president of Alpha Chi Omega. "It's something we don't have control over. We can still have the 'greek life,' but fraternities don't have the same liability.

With the new policies, if a sorority sister became sick during a party, the fraternity would not be responsible, Biro said.

This is because social functions with alcohol would be at bars instead of fraternity houses, Theta Chi President Ryan Walsh said.

The changes are effective with the 2000 Fall Semester, she added.

"I agree with it because of the safety issue. But of course, it's something nobody wants," Biro said.

The Interfraternity Council voted unanimously Monday night on a resolution supporting the sororities' decisions, Korf said.

Walsh, however, said he disagreed with the reasoning behind the initiative.

"I don't think that it is really fair," Walsh said. "Dangers lie ahead. I'm sure there are less incidents of people getting sick at a registered fraternity party than at a bar, where nobody knows about it."

Nicoletti said. The forms must then receive approval from the Department of Public Works, Parks and Recreation, the police and fire departments and the mayor's office.

Although students filed the appropriate papers, the city simply denied them permission, Nicoletti said.

The city administration decided after last year's events that it would not issue permits for block parties to any groups if the party has the potential to become disruptive, Nicoletti said.

During the alcohol-fueled riot, students lit bonfires in the streets and many defied firefighters and police.

Nicoletti called the incident "unfortunate," but said the word riot may be too "inflammatory" to describe the events.

Rather than ban street closings, the city should increase security, said Maureen Switalski, a freshman in The College of Arts and Sciences.

She compared last year's riot to Pennsylvania State University's 1998 Arts Fest, which ended with fires and vandalism.

About 1,500 people crowded the streets near the university, prompting police to use tear gas and nightsticks to break up the crowd, according to reports.

"That was a really bad riot, and they are still having Arts Fest every year," said Switalski. "They are blocking off the streets still and everything."

But Nicoletti notes the support of the community, including SU, in denying permission to close Livingston Avenue.

"It would be foolish to risk arrest or a mark on your record or get in trouble with the university," Nicoletti said.

Nicoletti, a former SU student, said he sympathizes with the residents looking to party, but said the behavior displayed last year was appalling.

He blamed the riot on "mob instinct."

"One person does it and the next person does it," Nicoletti said. "By not having the block party, small things will not blow up into larger things."

The city is justified in denying the street closings, said Rob Zanzi, a freshman international relations major.

But the community needs to maintain tradition when possible, he added.

"If there is enough security and the police watch what the kids are doing and there are not too many alcohol-related problems, if it can go off without a hitch, then I don't think it is a problem," Zanzi said.

The effort has nothing to do personally with the residents, he said, adding that most of this year's Livingston residents have proven themselves respectable.

Quayle urges end to political apathy, calls students to public service

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Staff Writer

A smaller than expected crowd attended yesterday's call to action by Presidential Dan Quayle, in which young people would fight for the political system was criticized.

"We aren't ideologically committed now, when we are going to be," Quayle asked. "Let's get involvements.

About 150 people gathered in Goldstein Auditorium to hear
Quayle speak Monday. The College Republicans, co-sponsors of the event with Young America's Foundation, said more than 400 people were expected to attend.

Event organizer attributed the low turnout to several factors.

"We didn't find out that Quayle would be able to speak until about a week and a half ago.

"I'm going to help him get elected," Quayle said. "I am more than happy to give him advice, but I served his fathers.

One issue that most voters gnored during presidential contests is foreign policy, Quayle said. "They should be paying more attention to this critical part of our lives.

"If a president makes a miscalculation on foreign policy, it can set a country back generation," he said.

People such as Sadam Hussein should no longer be in power, especially since all the other political powers involved in the Persian Gulf conflict have since moved from office, Quayle
said.

Regardless of what questions dominate the debate, the presidential race will be close, Quayle said. It will probably be within 5 percentage points of the popular vote, he added.

"It will be a race to the finish, with a winner becoming apparent only in the last 10 weeks of the campaign, Quayle said. To secure the win, Bush needs to make his voice heard throughout the Democratic, as well as Republican, voter base, he said.

"We need to convince the American people that character, integrity and decency do matter," Quayle said. "I think the American people down deep feel the same angst of theashing of the oval office.

Valuing education

A decline in values has infested the educational system at the primary and secondary levels, Quayle said.

These values - responsibility, integrity, loyalty, faith and respect - were the basis for the creation of the United States and cannot be taught to students solely by the teachers, he said.

About 150 people gathered Monday in Goldstein Auditorium to hear Vice President Dan Quayle discuss U.S. politics and national values.

Quayle attributed part of youth apathy, he added, to the "growing cynicism toward politics.

Young people sometimes have a jailed view of politicians, thinking that they do not fight important issues, he said.

The speech came on the heels of protests against the International Monetary Fund and World Bank in Washington, D.C., where thousands of young people came out against international institutions last weekend. Hundreds of students were arrested for their civil disobedience.

The protests were not addressed in Quayle's speech.

"Most people protesting are not going out about politics in the conventional way," Greszler said. "They should go through the political system. There's a way to go about things and there's a way not to go about things. They're getting noticed, but are they really doing anything?"

"We need to be taught these ideals from an early age, he added.

3:33 a.m. Monday, as protesters gathered at Farragut Square. Several protesters were placed in handcuffs and taken away.

Police barred the area, telling protesters to leave the area. Plainclothes officers, who were carrying rubber batons, entered the area and began pushing the protesters back. No one was injured.

After the National Guard broke from their formation to pelt protesters with rubber batons, protesters began to disperse. The crowd's energy increased. They started singing "We Shall Overcome," and one protester blasted "Lockdown March" from "Star Wars" through his portable tape player.

Shortly after, police sprayed pepper spray into the crowd. An elderly man close to the barricades was hit in the face with pepper spray, and he was taken away by paramedics.

Shut down
Police swept to block several major streets and closed Metro stops in downtown Washington, D.C., during the weekend. The action was taken in a bid to prevent protesters from blocking traffic and disrupting normal operations.

Police officers were seen carrying pepper spray and other crowd control equipment. Multiple arrests were made throughout the day.

Conflicts
The IMF, which provides money to underdeveloped nations to help them grow, is under criticism for its management during the meeting.

Reuters reported that IMF leaders were scheduled to meet on April 16 and 17 in Washington, D.C., and protesters aimed to shut down the meeting.

SU freshman Joshua Katcher was one of the protesters.

Katcher, who had been attending the Seattle protests in support of the IMF, was seen carrying a sign that read "We are the IMF." He was later arrested for obstructing traffic.

The IMF was also criticized for its role in recent global financial crises.

“We don't want to come back to GSO every year to ask for funding,” he said.

But until then, Nexus needs funding for the next two issues, Blancke added.

Currently, there are 20 to 30 students working on the journal, he said.

“800 people want to be involved with Nexus, the more the merrier,” Blancke said.

But working on the Forum is a very provincial standpoint, said Dyer Rahmann, vice president-elect and an international relations student.

The journal represents Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs students to other universities, he added.

The Finance Committee’s recommended salary of $750 for the Forum editor was also questioned by several senators. The Forum is a newsletter — usually managed by a GSO member — for graduate students.

Communication between GSO and the larger graduate student body is inadequate, a problem which the Forum can ameliorate, said Senator Andrew Saldine, a religion student.

“I don’t think this is a wise investment,” he added.

The first issue of Nexus, which was published in January, included 16 articles, nine of which were authored by SU students.

GSO, which has funded Nexus for four years, has just been “dumping money down” because the journal does not include the necessary resources for the campus, said Senator Barry Smith, a physics student.

Nexus’ goal is to build up a 500-person subscription base in two years so it can become self-sufficient, said Brian Blancke, a social science student who represented Nexus at the GSO meeting.

GW residence halls were closed to visitors this weekend in an attempt to deter students from housing protesters, Sehgal said. Sehgal said. Nona Cochran, an American University sophomore who works in one of the residence halls, said the staff too many precautions to prepare for the protesters. Students were required to register any visitors staying for the weekend, said Cochran, a resident of Columbus, Ohio. The visitors were given an identification card to show when they entered the halls, she said.

"They seem very peaceful," she said of the protesters staying in the residence halls. GW sophomore Carissa Dimargo, however, said she thinks many of the protesters are not prepared for the protesters. "I just don't want to be one of those people who jump on the bandwagon," said Dimargo.

Many of the demonstrators staying in American University residence halls, sophomore Jason Ranc said. "I hate the fact that I'm paying $32,000 and they're taking over our dorms, our lounges, our study halls," said Ranc, a Philadelphia native. "I have work to do. I have to go to school."

"Personally, I have no problem with the IMF and the World Bank," said Sehgal. The protests have divided campus communities, leaving students to battle their friends, professors and neighbors about the issues.

"They're not respecting our viewpoint," said Sehgal. "I think protesting is just as much a statement as protesting."

The GW Delta Tau Delta fraternity chapter displayed its opposition to the protests by hanging banners from its house behind a parking lot where more than 20 Syracuse University students demonstrated Sunday morning. Signs read "GW Delta American capitalists and damn proud of it" and "Your freedom of speech did not come without a cost. Respect your right to free speech. Thank a veteran."

Several Georgetown students said they were not aware that the protesters would be in town this weekend.

Freshman Liz Ford said that the campus has been quiet and, aside from a lacrosse game being cancelled, her life has continued undisturbed.

"In terms of schoolwork, I don't think they did anything," said Ford, a Boston native. "It's more of a convenience thing."

Ford noted, however, that Georgetown's annual Diplomats Ball was cancelled because of the protests. "In cases such as the protests, when students are affected, university administration should inform the student body of potential dangers," said freshman Parvaneh Daneshmand.

"Honestly, I didn't know a whole lot about it," Daneshmand said. "I had no idea it was going to be this bad. Being up on the (Georgetown) hill, we're kind of secluded."

"That would be really awesome to inform us about what is going on in our environment. It's strange walking around and seeing groups of cops."

While many students said they felt their lives were disturbed by the protesters, others, including Georgetown freshman Jessica Duncan, said the demonstrators made her more aware of what was going on in her city.

"It really makes you think," said Duncan, a New Jersey native. "They're so adamant about it."

Duncan added that Georgetown's relatively isolated location gave the students a unique perspective on the demonstrations. "We have an outside perspective. We can see both sides."

IMF must be fair to loan recipients

Protesters converged on the nation's capital last weekend to knock on the doors of the International Monetary Fund and World Bank, an annual ritual.

The two bankrollers combine to provide the world’s largest source of financial assistance to developing members.

Aid packages from the institutions, which are tied closely to corporate interests, come with a long list of demands. Peaceful acceptance of loans often requires nations to conform to industrialized countries’ environmental guidelines and governmental structures, which many Third-World nations aren’t prepared to tackle.

While fair labor conditions and environmental issues are important issues to bring to the IMF and World Bank table, they’re irrelevant until members nations can successfully feed, clothe and employ their citizens. And today that notion is a far cry from reality.

One relief doesn’t come by cutting fat check to impoverished nations. Only through localized guidance can developing nations truly realize their potential. Taking power and funding from high-ranking IMF and World Bank officials and putting it in the hands on non-government organizations and groups is the best way to affect real change.

Some protesters call for a complete cancellation of debts incurred by Third-World nations, in order to give them greater spending power. If debts were alleviated, developing countries would be able to pour more money into education and health care. But pardoning all debts would alter with the World Bank’s setup as a lending organization, and potentially strip them of funds that could be used to aid other countries.

As international lending bodies, the IMF and World Bank have had little recourse in rectifying loans when nations default on repayments. But if they worked to ensure proper intervention in helping nations set up fair repayment plans, larger portions of debts would surely be repaid.

Sweeping change won’t come overnight. Both the protesters and the IMF and World Bank officials must understand the unique constraints developing nations face in building successful policies.

Globalization traps nations in cycle of poverty

Guest column

Luu Doan

During the past week in downtown D.C., the protest continued, this time against the World Bank and International Monetary Fund. These organizations remain on the financial branch of neoliberalism by lending money to deeply indebted Third World economies under the guise of economic aid. In efforts to stop corporate domination of the international market, thousands of people from labor unions to student activists will continue the fight for change.

During the 1970s, money was irresponsibly exchanged between commercial banks and undemocratic foreign governments, many of which no longer exist. The foreign debts, however, have not only been passed down by the older generations, but have been greatly amplified by rising interest rates. This is where the IMF and World Bank get their power. In attempts to alleviate their debts and avoid growth by further internationalizing, developing countries are forced to take out loans from the IMF or World Bank. These organizations happily pass out the money, on the condition that the receiving country accepts some financial advice. “These forms of advice, or rather policies, are known as Structural Adjustment Plans.”

Globalization traps nations in cycle of poverty

(U-WIRE) LOS ANGELES — The protest against the World Trade Organization Seattle last December ignited a nationwide spread of awareness regarding the evils of globalization and the free trade market.

Globalization is the push by First World countries such as the United States, Japan and the United Kingdom for an open international economy. The First World serves as the economic leaders and decision makers of the market, while several countries are exploited and forced to provide products and services in order to earn profit for wealthier nations.

This past week in downtown D.C., the protest continues, this time against the World Bank and International Monetary Fund. These organizations retain their financial branch of neoliberalism by lending money to deeply indebted Third World economies under the guise of economic aid. In efforts to stop corporate domination of the international market, thousands of people from labor unions to student activists will continue the fight for change.

During the 1970s, money was irresponsibly exchanged between commercial banks and undemocratic foreign governments, many of which no longer exist. The foreign debts, however, have not only been passed down by the older generations, but have been greatly amplified by rising interest rates. This is where the IMF and World Bank get their power. In attempts to alleviate their debts and avoid growth by further internationalizing, developing countries are forced to take out loans from the IMF or World Bank. These organizations happily pass out the money, on the condition that the receiving country accepts some financial advice. “These forms of advice, or rather policies, are known as Structural Adjustment Plans.”

What is a SAP? Once a country accepts money from the IMF or World Bank, it must allow the lending powers to change its economic policies, such as allowing borrowing nation’s economy and national organization.

This means the country must cut a drastic amount of its expenses, and the result is higher cost and less accessibility to health care. Nowadays, the nation’s population and future generations in a cycle of ignorance and poverty. Many of the nationalized resources and businesses become privatized, meaning services and products that used to serve the domestic population and keep wealth inside the country are now open to foreign investors. These investors raise prices outside of the domestic reach and direct the nation’s products and resources towards international export.

The sustenance of the community becomes controlled and manipulated by foreign buyers. SAP’s reduce government spending and creates an arrosion in other areas, as well. Some nations cannot afford to implement laws governing the international market, and take advantage of their weak positions. Many external corporations take advantage of the lack of environmental and labor laws with their products, and are cheaply and quickly compared to what they can do in their First World homes.

This is why many corporations thrive by having their merchandise produced in overseas. The elimination of tariffs is another devastating part of SAP’s, as it allows foreign enterprises to enter the country and domestic market at no charge, making it nearly impossible for local business to compete and keep wealth within the nation.

Farmers and producers, traditionally accustomed to doing business within the community, now find their consumers in the hands of foreign producers. The SAP’s impose reduction of government expenditures and eliminate subsidies, which previously offered incentives to afford basic products while simultaneously allowing farmers and manufacturers to make a fair profit.

The World Bank and IMF are two of the most important tools in the push for globalization. They use tactics of greed to blackmail against countries with great potential caught in the struggle for stability. These anti-democratic organizations take upon themselves the complete responsibility to reorganize the structure of another economy. The restricted economies have little say in their “makeover,” since the weight of the votes of each country depend on their financial contribution to the organization.

The nation’s development is caught in a cycle of exploitation and poverty. Their people’s right to be educated and healthy is in jeopardy by their struggle for survival. They have been raped of the joys of life in order to provide the frivolous necessities of the corporate world.

As human beings, we have a responsibility to each other to fight against a common enemy, that of globalization, which sacrifices the basic rights of our international brothers and sisters in order to cultivate the growth of their dollars.

Let’s fail to recognize means to true diversity

To the Editor:

This past Saturday night, I was walking to Hillel, en route to go bowling. From a distance, I heard some very loud music coming from Hendricks Chapel. No, it was not Hillel members preparing to go bowling. Rather, it was the joyous, loud black evangelical music of the Black Celestial Choir Ensemble.

Now, do not get me wrong — I am rarely able to pretend that this campus is joyous, loud black evangelical music of the Black Celestial Choir Ensemble. But when I walked into that Chapel, which also, ironically, serves as a sanctuary during the Jewish High Holidays, I was feeling the love. I felt as if I walked straight into the scene from “The Blues Brothers” when they were doing flips down the aisles. The place was filled to capacity, but in combination with the noise of the choir, it had enough people that it was jumping. People were worked up into a hand-clapping, foot-stomping fervor. It was one of the most awesome moments I have experienced on campus.

I guess I felt compelled to write this letter because I knew no mention of the event in Monday’s Daily Orange. But more than that, I felt compelled to write this letter because what I saw for thirty minutes Saturday night was something I rarely see on the Syracuse University campus.

Straight from the black Baptist tradition, on Saturday night, what I got caught up in was a passion so intense that I have never experienced. What it was was not Hillel members preparing to go bowling, but Christians from the black community to come and come back to it later on in life. I guess Chancellor Shaw, the next time that you want to spend millions of dollars to re-roof the Carrier Dome, how about thinking about things that really unite this campus instead.

Demonstrators compare weekend’s protests with Seattle experiences

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor
WASHINGTON, D.C. — As tens of thousands of protestors swarmed downtown Washington, D.C., students on area campuses worked to prevent the International Monetary Fund and World Bank meetings from taking place.

Because of the protestors, many students felt unsafe on their campuses and decided to create a不一样的 environment. University officials decided to give students a different perspective of the protestors.

Despite the protestors’ attempts to break into our dorm rooms, this was the first time we’ve seen a police officer on campus. We’re used to hearing sirens and seeing police cars, but this was the first time we experienced a real protest.

After the protests, many students felt like they were being watched. They made sure to leave their dorms before the police arrived and avoided being in public areas.

We did our job, made almost 100 blocks of Washington, D.C. shut down and that’s insane. If you don’t say this is success, then I didn’t know what.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — This past weekend’s protests against the International Monetary Fund and World Bank meetings are expected to be the largest in the city’s history.

Police and National Guard were out in force, blocking streets and using pepper spray to disperse the crowd.

Despite their efforts, protestors managed to break into some buildings and steal items.

In addition to protestors, students also took to the streets to support the cause. They carried signs and chanted slogans.

Seattle prison where jailed protesters were being held and linked arm by arm, around the jail to demand their friends' release.

"When I showed up in Seattle and just as I got to the convergence site, there was a protest down the street a few thousand strong," Rota said.

A convergence site is a predetermined place where groups gather to plan and collect themselves before they go to the streets, protesters said. Rota said there were not as many protest sites when he arrived in Washington, D.C.

"When I got here Thursday morning, I really didn't know of any protests going on," Rota said. "I don't think there's the number of demonstrators and energy there was in Seattle.

Koch, a University of Buffalo student and member of the university's chapter of the Student Environmental Action Coalition, said he has had minimal run-ins with the Washington, D.C., police, but came close when he was staying in was raided by city police early Thursday morning.

The police confiscated 160 lockboxes, used to construct human chains, Rota said. They also arrested two of my friends.

But despite the raid, Rota said the Seattle police never tried to manage the protesters than Seattle police were.

"Seattle was a lot more intense," Rota said. "The cops had their guns out, the tear gas, more professional.

In addition to Rota's house, the protest's convergence site was raided by city police, protesters said.

About 60 people were at the site, making signs and planning their actions for the day when the city fire marshal showed up.

"He didn't try to engage in civil conversation, he just barked orders," Koch said.

That kind of approach does not work with the type of people the protesters are, she added.

In protest groups, there is no leader, Koch said. Decisions are made by consensus, she said.

"That kind of thing in a consensus environment is what incites riots," Koch said. "To try to tell a bunch of anarchists what sensus people to 'Get out now,' you just don't do that.

Police and other law enforcement officials refused to comment during the protests.

Koch, a self-described "professional agitator," which she said means that she is "homeless, unemployed and goes to a lot of protests," agreed that Washington, D.C., was a "lot more low key.

Many protesters seemed bent on recreating the experience of Seattle — something that was unattainable, she said.

But that does not mean that it was a failure, she quickly added.

"It's obviously bound to be different," Koch said. "People process it as disappointing because it's not the same. It's not to say that it's not wonderful and powerful — just different, very different.

"The protesters seemed more in tune to what was going on, she said.

"Cops here obviously know more what to do because this is the primary city in the country's capital — they protest," Koch said.

Also the Washington, D.C., police are less nervous and more professional.

The Seattle police never raised the main convergence site, she added.

"I guess that makes the Washington, D.C., police just unconstitutional," she said. "Technically, they get through the loophole of the fire marshal, who's the one city official who can arrest you doves without a warrant.

Rising arrest

The commitment of the protesters was stronger in Washington, D.C., than in Seattle, Koch said.

At a planning meeting prior to her Thursday arrival, about 1,500 people had committed to arriving at the protest site, she said.

There was also already three times the number of police available, Koch said.

"It might be less in numbers overall, but we have more direct action, arrestable people than in Seattle," Koch said.

But Kelly Nagy, a member of the Syracuse chapter of SEAC, disagreed that the protests in Washington, D.C., were any less intense than those she participated in during Seattle's events.

"It was similar," Nagy said.

"There were massive protests and legal rallies every day in Seattle.

Washington, D.C., police were also more aggressive than those in Seattle, she added.

"But police never poured peoples' bottles of vinegar out in the streets, that's for sure," Nagy said.

Vinegar and lemon juice are both used to soak cloth to throw at the police and peppers for their eyes, Koch said. "It might be less in number compared to Seattle, it wasn't as crooked. She's really panicky and nervous, but she's walking and talking so it's not that bad.

The nature of the assault was not "completely clear," she added.

Police hit one woman in the face with a baton, Landau said.

She was bleeding from her nose," he said. "Her nose looks crooked. She's really panicky and nervous, but she's walking and talking so it's not that bad.

The nature of the assault was not "completely clear," she added, but he was trying to go to her aid despite the heavy roadblocks.

Another man had a cut to his scalp. The protesters, added Robert Reck, a physician standing beside Landau, crated of water jars piled behind him.

Police said he wished that police had used more tear gas in place of batons, because the gas has a temporary effect, while batons have the potential to cause serious injury.

There were particularly bad cases of police brutality on the corner of 17th and 1 streets, just blocks away from where he provided legal advice to the group of juveniles.

"There were four or five people on the sidewalk with bleeding heads and bleeding noses," he said. "One guy had been dragged, gassed and beaten.

"He was a mess."
Monkeys do

Monkeys apparently are perfectly happy to lend each other a hand, but only if they think they’ll get rewarded for their efforts. Frans de Waal of the Yerkes Primate Center at Emory University in Atlanta studied capuchin monkeys, small but large-brained primates found in South America. De Waal and colleagues observed pairs of brown capuchins in a special laboratory chamber in which two monkeys had to work together to get a bowl of apples. When they succeeded, they always shared, the researchers reported in the April 5 issue of Nature. When the monkeys could get the food without help, they were much less likely to share.

Try again

A fossil once described as a possible "missing link" between birds and dinosaurs is actually a composite of at least seven unrelated animals, according to the National Geographic Society. A team of consultants gathered at society headquarters recently to compare last year’s "archaeoraptor" with the fossil of a predatory species recently discovered in China. The panel concluded unanimously that what was thought to be the tail of an archaeoraptor was in fact that of a small predatory dinosaur called dromaeosaur, while the leg bones might have come from several other species.

Don’t ask

The census has caused anxiety—even among some quarters—with questions about everything from income to plumbing. But there is one major aspect of American life it fails to cover: religion. Congress barred the Census Bureau in 1976 from enquiring directly about a person’s religious affiliation. As a result, America’s religious landscape remains surprisingly ill-defined. Some of the most fundamental assumptions are based on educated guesswork, suspect science or leaps of faith.

Investing early is becoming a more viable way for students to manage their money.

BY CHARLIE RUSSO

At some point in everyone’s life, the myth of the tooth fairy leaving money under the pillow is dispelled. Similarly, the myth that only slick-haired Wall Street studs in $3,000 suits can successfully invest is being dispelled today.

The Internet now brings Wall Street to Main Street and gives Joe College Student access to the same information that the slick-haired used to pick his stocks.

Nowadays, anyone who can track the Knicks’ playoff chances or the exploits of some teenagers from Beverly Hills, 90210, can also track an investment.

And unless you compulsively gamble on basketball or are a wannabe soap opera star, investing early is one of the best decisions a person can make.

"Ultimately, all people that accrue an income will be faced with managing their own money," said Gerald Madden, a visiting Syracuse University assistant professor of finance. "Investment knowledge can help individuals manage their money wisely, to preserve and increase their wealth."

But several steps should be taken before a person considers investing, said Betty Powers, a broker with A.G. Edwards, DeWitt branch. First, and most importantly, she said, "you have to figure out the purpose of the money you’re investing.

Because different individuals have different investment goals, their investment decisions should also be individualized," Powers said. The amount of money to be invested, the planned time period of the investment, the risk each person is willing to take and ease of access to the money for other purposes is something that needs to be considered.

City offers unknown treasures

You’ve all been snickering at the groups of Otto-stickered prospective students carrying the orange book, haven’t you?

Out of their element and utterly clueless of what they’re getting themselves into with this whole college thing, some prospective families are a lot like yours and mine not so very long ago. Luckily for me on my April tour nearly two years ago, I found a recruiting table set up by The Daily Orange. Thank God!

This is also my goodbye for the semester. Next week is my last column, and I’ll be too busy talking about a local band to do so. The D.O.’s "media freak" — a title I never really liked, this past semester, I tried my damnedest to point out what I felt were the better things about movies and TV, as well mention the coolest things to do in this dead city and on this kooky campus.

Along the way I missed pointing out certain spots that I didn’t get around to fully covering in depth, but I wanted to mention a few.

Columnist’s picks

The Syracuse Skychiefs Assistant General Manager Tom Van Schaack wants you all to come out to see his team play. The 2000 season just began last week, and despite the terrible weather, if the show must go on for the boys of summer. The Skychiefs are really the only outlet for fans of the national pastime in these parts of the state.

The Skychiefs, a Triple A team, even has a deal every Thursday for college kids. Just show your school ID and you’ll get 2 for 1 general admission. You can’t beat that for value, especially if you’re as broke as I am. The most you’ll ever spend for a ticket is seven bucks.

"It’s calmer play right under the press," Schaeck says of the Trenton affiliate. "It’s really fun to watch."

The team is shooting for their third winning season in a row. Help keep the tradition of Syracuse baseball going — it’s been played around here since 1885 — and venture down to P & C Stadium at One Simone Dr., to catch a game before you take off for summer vacation.

If you think sandwiches served on long rolls are called sub and not hoagies, you’re dead wrong in my book. If you think saying steak and cheese in reference to a cheese steak is proper, than you deserve to get hit.

If you’re from the Philly area like I am, you know what I mean. We’re rearing our sandwiches for some reason or another. Taste of Philadelphia on Jim, and venture down to P & C Stadium at One Simone Dr., to catch a game before you take off for summer vacation.

despite all drastically affect how a person should invest.

After deciding on the purpose of the investment, the person needs to build an understanding of the different types of investment options available and the positive and negative aspects of each.

Different types of investments offer different levels of returns and risk, relative to one another. Mander said. Common stocks are the classic investing example, where an investor purchases shares of ownership in a company. Bonds, on the other hand, have a lower payoff potential. With interest rates higher, money market accounts are even safer, with lower rates of interest.

Mutual funds generally contain both stocks and bonds and allow investors to buy into multiple companies or funds to make their financial investment choices.

Close to home

One of the best resources for Syracuse University students interested in expanding their investment knowledge is the SU Investment Club (SIC). It states its mission, "Providing students with the opportunity to gain real world financial management experience."

The best way to learn is by doing," said SIC president Seth Davis said is the rationale for the club's existence.

But the SIC, said treasurer and presidential student Shelbi Z., "gives students the opportunity to invest with real money without risking their own money."

SUIC is open to students in all majors and with any level of experience, said Davis, a senior accounting and information systems major.

"Some students are apprehensive about getting involved if they don't know anything about investing," he said. "But that's the whole point — we want people who are interested in learning."

SIC has a one-time dues fee of $45. Its Web site, www.son.syr.edu/son2/invest, provides information on the club. It also contains a list of links to Internet resources for both novice and veteran investors.

Other online resources for investors include www.fool.com and www.investededucation.org. These sites offer everything from basic investing glossaries and FAQs to advanced investing strategies and information.

Another site, www.vanguard.com, offers an investing primer at its "University of Money." This section of the site offers an example of the benefits of early investing. Time creates a significant incentive to investing early. The site gives examples of two hypothetical investors, Christine and Paul.

At the age of 30, Christine begins investing $1,000 per year for 10 years. With an 8 percent return, her initial $10,000 investment will grow to $107,100 by the time she is 65.

Paul waits until he is 40 to begin investing. He also invests $1,000 per year, but he contributes for 25 years, not 10. With the same 8 percent return, Paul's $25,000 investment has only grown to $79,000 when he reaches age 65.

So although Christine contributed $15,000 less, and has a much longer investment horizon, the value of her investment is $28,100 more than Paul's, because she began her contributions earlier.

Saving for investment can almost be thought of like saving for a stereo. Putting a little money at a time adds up in the long run. But invest some money in the stock market, and chances are you'll end up with even more money with which to buy a better stereo.

When a person decides to make an investment, he also has a range of brokerage houses from which to choose. Traditional brokerage houses allow investors to speak with and obtain advice from a broker. Online brokerages generally charge lower fees, but are less established and do not provide the personal service that traditional brokers do.

"Pooling your investments through an online brokerage can access the world, where over 20 different online brokerages are evaluated. Usage fees, ease of use and the availability of financial information are among the criteria used in the evaluations."

"The Internet is a wonderful place to save," Davis said. "And because it lets you put a wealth of information to be accessed almost instantly, the Internet, "is bringing investing to everyone."

"X-Men stuff is picking up since the hype for the summer," said Comic Zone manager Greg Van Camp.

Pokémon, Punisher and Dragon Ball Z are in high demand for their '90s appeal. Also are in high demand are classic comic characters like Spider-Man, Star Wars, and the walking dead are in high demand.

But the SUIC, said treasurer and president-elect Shelby Williams, "gives students the opportunity to invest with real money without risking their own money."

SUIC is open to students in all majors and with any level of experience, said Davis, a senior accounting and information systems major.

CHANGED

Hi. Some of you may have seen me and my purple hat out and about on campus. Let me tell you a little about myself. I grew up going to church because my grandparents were both ministers and my dad's brother had been one too. Basically, I was just going through the motions. Then, in 1994 I got seriously about my relationship with Jesus Christ. I went to a Supertones concert (my favorite band). That is when everything in my life began to change. My senior year of high school I really got caught up in the Christian life. I had big plans of writing and performing for extracurricular activities. I was popular and had a lot of friends. But all that was going on in my life I spent less time developing my relationship with God and moved further and further away from the Christian life. I had big plans of writing and performing for "Saturday Night Live". On the outside things were looking good, but unfortunately, on the inside, I was really depressed and not really happy.

In August, just before school started, while at a farewell party for my aunt, I went to a Supertones concert. I was in training to become a minister. Yes, my family seems to be full of ministers. In fact, everyone asked me if I was going to become a minister. I thought that would be a stupid choice for my life. For my aunt. I went to a Supertones concert. She too really happy.

In school that everything in my life has been wonderful but that would be a lie. Because of God's love for me. He brought me back even though I had strayed away from Him. I know now that He is guide me. Immediately my life turned upside down. I knew at that moment that God wanted me to stop going in the direction I was heading and start to follow his will for my life. Now I have gone from wanting to do "SNL" to granting to going in the direction t  was heading and start to follow his will for my life. Now I have gone from wanting to do "SNL" to granting to going in the direction t  was heading and start to follow his will for my life. had some time to process the relaxed," she said. "That's why we come back because the two teams right now, talking about our eligibility left, but I don't think it's a hard decision for me at this time.

Brady said she wanted to end her Syracuse lacrosse career with a bang.

Going into Wednesday's game at Cornell, Brady leads the team in goals with 26 and is second in total points with 41, behind All-American Katrina Hable. For her career, the captain has 75 total points, tallying 66 goals and 9 assists.

Over the past weekend, Brady stepped up her game even further, putting up two goals against Boston College and the last two against Fairfield on Sunday.

"I just try to get in there and place the ball," Brady said. "I have had a lot of shots and need to place the ball in the net," Brady said.

In Sunday's game against Fairfield, Brady scored three of her first five goals, including the final two on consecutive possessions. In both instances, Brady cut into the middle of the circle, caught a Stacey Brown pass, turned and fired the ball into the back of the cage.

Last weekend's trip to Boston College served as a homecoming for the Boston, Mass., native.

"It's pretty cool. My parents were there, and there are some local lakers that sound familiar," Brady said.

With only four games left, plus the post-season, the biology major doesn't know what her plans are beyond the summer when she plans to go to Europe.

Beyond that, Brady eventually plans on going to graduate school.

Before thoughts of graduation entered her mind, Brady sat on the bench for half the games her sophomore year. Now being a leader and elder stateswoman on the team, she said she knows what it was like to be a younger player and hopes she's helped them.

"It's tough for them to sit on the bench for part of the games," Brady said. "We do have some starting freshmen, and they have to look to the future. It's a matter of time until they come around.

Brady's teammates look up to her, giving the tri-captain the respect her career has helped earn.

"She's a very good leader," junior and fellow captain Hable said. "She's stepped up huge from the time she came in here. She's a very hard worker and works the hardest on the team out of everyone.

Junior attacker Natalie Miller also praised Brady.

"She makes everyone step up their game," Miller said. "When it comes down to games and even practice, she's all business, and it makes us concentrate a little more.

Miller said she thinks that Brady's graduation from the team and from Syracuse will definitely hurt next season.

Between Brady, junior Karen Healy and the tri-captain Hable, most of the Orange's scoring is garnered by upperclassmen who will be graduating within the next two seasons. This leaves a possible void in the attack.

I think the team will lose a lot from her graduating," said sophomore Caylyn Ciccarutti.

head coach Kathleen Park er's office before the tourna- ment, Lewis said.

Other returnees included Kacey Croft, Molly Koons, Kelly Larkin and Amy Weller. Both Koons and Larkin got to team up with their sisters, seniors Jo and Tracy.

"It was a lot of fun," Tracy Larkin said. "It's definitely different playing on this team because it's a lot more laid back."

The seven seniors on the roster stood out from the rest of the players in uniform by wearing homemade white T-shirts bearing the No. 7 logo. Assistant coach Chry McCracken took notice of the way the two teams complemented each other.

"They all play some of their best hockey when they come back because they're so relaxed," she said. "They've had some time to process the game and they understand it. So it's fun to see the young and the old play," junior Colleen Cech agreed.

It's always fun to play against old teammates," she said.

Prior to the event, the Orange women held their annual banquet on Saturday. Each of the seniors gave a speech, followed by award presentations. The gathering lasted a record four and half hours, McCracken said.

Although the tournament offered plenty of entertain ment, the event served a more serious purpose for the younger players.

"We are the seniors it's a fun thing," said junior Emily Schaefer, coach of the alumni team. "The players on the alumni team so they're just out in for fun. But for us, it's more competitive because two of the teams here (Colgate and Adelphi), we're going to play in the season. We also want to get the most out of it because it's our spring season."

The Orange women -- who have practiced and played without the seniors all year -- will definitely feel the absence of their veterans.

"When it comes down to the tournament, the seniors are a big part of the team and from Syracuse," junior and fellow captain Hable said. "She's a hard worker and works the hardest on the team out of everyone."

Junior attacker Natalie Miller also praised Brady.

"She makes everyone step up their game," Miller said. "When it comes down to games and even practice, she's all business, and it makes us concentrate a little more."

"We really like to focus on everything we've been working on all spring long. It's really a good ending to our spring and gives us something to look forward to for our fall season when we come back."

FREE AGENT FIESTA

When the NFL draft reached its conclusion late Sunday night, only two former Syracuse players had found a job.
Former linebacker Kevin Bulluck was taken by the Tennessee Titans with the 30th pick in the first round, and offensive tackle Mark Babst went to the Jacksonville Jaguars with the 247th overall pick.

Furman, the state's No. 3 running back, was still waiting for a chance to play.

Draft day didn't end the hopes of several former SU gridiron stalwarts, though, as several signed as free agents with teams that didn't pick them in the draft.

David Byrd — Buffalo Bills
Height: 5-foot-11
Weight: 193 pounds
Position: Linebacker
Prospect: Heading into draft, the Bills had a cornerb in mind for a first-round pick. But when the San Diego defensive end, and Erik Fellers fell to No. 26, Buffalo couldn't overlook the opportunity.

Steve Bronowski — Detroit Lions
Height: 6-foot-5
Weight: 256 pounds
Position: Tight End
Prospect: Encouraged by the fact that the Lions didn't draft another tight end, Bronowski is happy with his chances. With David Sloan, Walter Rosby and Ed Smith sitting on Detroit's 53-man roster, Bronowski either has to beat out one of them or prove his worth as a fourth tight end.

Quinton Spotwood — Miami Dolphins
Height: 6-foot-3
Weight: 189 pounds
Position: Wide Receiver
Prospect: Spotwood was never able to overcome an anterior cruciate ligament tear that he sustained his junior season. However, his senior year showed promise in receptions, and his speed attracted NFL scouts. Miami did not choose another wide receiver, while DuPage and Tony Martin were projected to start for the Dan Manno-less Dolphins. Spotwood's ability to return punts and kickoffs might help him find a spot on his team.

Ian McNichol — Washington Redskins
Height: 5-foot-10
Weight: 172 pounds
Position: Defensive Back
Prospect: The Redskins selected two other defensive backs in last week's draft. They took North Carolina State's Dan Wetzel in the third round and Quincy Sanders from UNLV in the fifth. Though Champ Bailey, Darrell Green, and three backups and possibly "Neo" Deion Sanders fill in the mix, McNichol has a tough road ahead of him.

GRIDIRON EXECUTION continued from page 20

In the second drill, a blocking dummy and crushed the offensive line. In the third drill, the offense was just trying to get better for the season.

Good News or Bad News?
Friday afternoon's practice should tell us something. But we're not sure what.

In successive drills, the defensive line ran back and crushed the offensive line. In the first drill, a blocking dummy stood in the place of the offensive line, and against that defense Columbia's narrow lines and quickness couldn't move and crushed the offensive line.

Julie Dunn drove into the second sec-ond inning run with a single. Freshman Jackie Herrman, Lindsay Richard and Shana Newell slugged RBIs in the second inning. Tara Duggan pinch hit for Shana Newell and closed the game.

What we didn't see was the spring training that Dunn had in big situations to drive runners in.

Bianca struck out nine batters to even her record at 8-8. Things didn't look good for the Orangewomen from the start of the second game. DiMaggio walked leadoff batter Staces Maden, who scored three batters later on an error by Richards. The caliber continued in the bottom of the frame when center fielder Christina Holowchik was tagged out in a rundown between second and third base.

When McCaskey batters were called out for interference on bunt attempts in the third and fifth innings, junior pitcher Ander Sage recovered and shut Syracuse down.

"We had a leadoff walk and those are going to kill you every time you have that," Finkbein said.

They usually scored that run. Once they got that run, we didn't execute. We're not putting things together.

Finkbein said that her team should have collapsed like it did in the second game.

To be honest, with two first-year programs, I think we have more talent," she said. "I think we should have done that in both games.

We're not playing perfect. I just expect a lot from this program, and I expect us against teams that are not going to take two games, not just one."
Defense controls practices

For the second time this spring, head coach Paul Pasqualoni’s Syracuse football team put on pads and battled in a controlled scrimmage.

On the first drive from the 10-yard line, Maeli Williams orchestrated the opening score on an option pitch to James Mumford.

Troy Nunes matched his counterpart at quarterback with a similar looking option to sophomore Chris Davis, who ran for the touchdown.

"We got four guys trying to get ready, and they’re doing the best we can to get four guys reps,” offensive coordinator George DeLeone said. "In a 16-play team work period, the QBS are only getting four snaps. Coach P is trying to go two groups to get them more snaps.

The latter two series were indicative of how the Orangemen’s offense stood up against a stingy defense for the first three quarters of the game. Syracuse offense was not able to sustain any long drives, but the defense gave up some big plays.

SU’s only other score was a 96-yard burst up the middle by Mumford during the first half.

The offense looked rattled, turning it over six times.

The Buffalo Bulls came to the Softball Stadium with a 4-22 record in their first season since 1985.

In the first game of a doubleheader, everything went according to plan, as Syracuse humiliated them 9-0.

By the time the second game concluded, everything went according to plan, as Syracuse humiliated them 9-0.

The Orangewomen (17-20-1) clicked in all aspects of the game in the opener. Pitcher Mandy Beeman tossed a complete game, striking out seven runners.

The Orangewomen broke the game wide open with a four-run first inning.

"We got four guys trying to get ready, and they’re doing the best we can to get four guys reps,” offensive coordinator George DeLeone said. "In a 16-play team work period, the QBS are only getting four snaps. Coach P is trying to go two groups to get them more snaps.

When deciding which college to attend, senior attacker Lauren Brady didn’t have lacrosse as tops on her list.

"I didn’t want to base my decision to attend any school on lacrosse," Brady said. "I was trying to get a feeling of the campus, if it was a place I could see myself being happy for four years.

Because Syracuse women’s lacrosse didn’t begin until her sophomore year, Brady still has one year of eligibility. That doesn’t mean that she’s definitely going to use it.

Field hockey alums return for tourney

It’s the kind of field hockey matchup fans don’t expect to see mid-April.

But Sunday, the Orangewomen and a host of SU field hockey alumni reunited at Coyne Field to participate in the program’s annual 7-a-side Tournament.

The event welcomed back former Syracuse field hockey stars and gave them a chance to bond with current players. It also allowed them to exhibit their skills on the field.

The current Orangewomen put up a challenge against the Antiques and the Rockers, the two teams consisting of older graduates and seniors, defeating the Antiques 2-1 in the final round.

The spring tournament also drew teams from Albany, Bucknell, Colgate, Cortland, Ithaca, Rochester, Vermont and Williams.

"A bunch of us came back every year, and it’s been great,” said Eileen Lewis, an ‘86 graduate. "You get to see the new players, and we introduce ourselves. It’s easier for the alumni because we don’t have any pressure. It also shows our support for the program.

They not only got the opportunity to participate in the traditional event, but gathered for a cookout at

Committee discusses federal law

Judicial Affairs debates releasing names of Student Code violators

BY CHRISTINA DENARDO

Staff Writer

A male sophomore last semester pushed his girlfriend during an argument. She fell and fractured her wrist.

In December, a student sat several times to homes off campus while the residents were asleep.

The names of these students, as well as all other names of all students sent to the Syracuse University Office of Judicial Affairs - are not available to the public. Instead, Judicial Affairs publishes a report every academic quarter stating the offense committed and the sanctions imposed.

Campus court hearings are kept confidential and student disciplinary records are usually kept sealed.

But under a 1998 federal law aimed at increasing crime awareness, college cases — but are not obligated to — release the names of students who commit crimes of violence or non-forcible sex offenses.

Some public colleges, including the University of Maryland and the University of Mississippi, have started releasing names if crimes of violence occur on their campuses.

So listing a lack of student interest, has yet to take a position.

"I think that there are up and down times to releasing names," said Anastasia Urtz, director of Judicial Affairs at SU.

"I'm very open to the notion that people might want to know who has engaged in violent behavior."

Since August there has been one case at SU involving violence with a weapon, 16 cases involving violence without a weapon and four threats of violence. According to recent Judicial Affairs case reports, there were also 78 cases in which a student's behavior threatened the physical and mental health of another.

Although Urtz said SU will not make any policy changes without input from students, most do not know about the federal law or its implications.

"I don't think most of the students are aware of the issues being discussed," said Andrea Goldman, a freshman and member of a university committee that will discuss and debate the subject next semester. "It's tough to get input from students."

Because the law does not mandate disclosure of names, SU is not alone in its delay. According to the report.

University honors campus greeks with annual awards

Phi Beta Sigma fraternity and Alpha Epsilon Phi sorority took home the top honors at Tuesday night's Greek Awards Reception.

Syracuse University Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw presented the two chapters with the Greek Award of Commitment, regarded as the highest honor awarded to a Greek house.

About 300 people attended the event in Goldstein Auditorium.

The nominees for Greek Man of the Year were so difficult to choose from that two awards were given, said presenter Chuck Merrifield, vice president of SU Student Affairs.

The award was given to both Phi Beta Sigma brother Christopher Peterson and Sigma Alpha Epsilon brother C.J. Strock.

Delta Delta Delta sister Rita Marie Murphy was named Greek Woman of the Year. Murphy and her TriDelt sisters sat at their table hugging as Merrifield listed her accomplishments from the podium in Goldstein Auditorium.

"It's an honor to work with the Greek system here at school," said Murphy, a senior in The College of Arts and Sciences. "I feel that I work with a lot of great Greek leaders. I definitely think their potential has not yet been recognized for what it really is."

She also commended A E Phi and Alpha Xi Delta. AED won the Hilton Cup, an award given for outstanding overall performance of a sorority.

"I'm very proud to see A E Phi and AED," she said. "They're two great sororities doing a wonderful job. I'm glad they got to be recognized."

Common Council reviews lake cleanup plans, costs

BY NICHOLAS STEFFENS

Staff Writer

After weeks of hearing rumors and focusing on only a few controversial construction sites, the Syracuse Common Council examined the current status of the Onondaga County Lake Cleanup Project on Tuesday.

Mike Cunningham, the project's director, and Sue Miller, deputy director of the department of draining and sanitation, gave an update at the session.

The meeting was a joint meeting of the Public Works and Neighborhood Preservation, Downtown and Metropolitan Planning committees.

In contrast to rumors circulating in the community, the project is moving along close to schedule and within the allotted $380 million budget, Miller said.

If the projects are not completed on time, however, the county and the city will be fined, because a federal court ordered the project, Cunningham said.

There are also community-based reasons to meet the deadlines, he added.

"Making these milestones on time will affect the health of the community and the lake," he said.

The council also inquired about the project's current funding status.

U.S. Rep. Jim Walsh (R-Syracuse) has already received $30 million to help pay for the clean-up, Walsh and U.S. Senators Charles Schumer and Daniel Patrick Moynihan are in the process of attempting to secure $50 million more, Cunningham said.

New York state will pay another $100 million through aid packages, although the state still has not budgeted $86 million of these funds, Cunningham said.

Burglaries plague Day Hall residents

Staff Reports

Seven burglaries occurred between Saturday night and Sunday afternoon in Day Hall, according to a Syracuse University Public Safety report.

In several of the incidents, the victims were asleep when the unidentified suspect entered their unlocked rooms and stole property, the report said.

The resident director was notified as well as the Syracuse Police Department, the report added.

In a similar case, two burglaries also occurred Thursday night in Flint Hall, the report said.

The resident directors of both halls could not be reached for comment.

A suspicious person was seen looking into cars with a flashlight Tuesday morning on the 100 block of Winding Ridge Road, according to a Public Safety report.

The suspect ran to and then entered a waiting car when Public Safety officers arrived at the scene, the report said.

An investigation revealed that one vehicle had been broken into and a missing CD player was found on the street, the report added.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Rolling in a Virginia murder case with nationwide ramifications, the Supreme Court Tuesday curtailed the power of federal judges to override state court decisions against death row prisoners who claim their trials were tainted.

The 5-4 decision, arising from a Virginia death row inmate’s claim that his conviction or sentence was invalid because of prosecutorial misconduct, could affect hundreds of other capital cases and raise the stakes in a high-profile case involving John Rocker’s two-week housing crisis.

Police Reports: Brawl prompts Denny’s to end late-night dining

Staff Report

After a violent altercation early Tuesday morning sent one woman to the hospital, Denny’s Restaurant, 2863 Erie Blvd., will temporarily cease to operate 24 hours per day.

“We have a number of strong security procedures in place,” said Debbie Atkins, a Denny’s spokeswoman. “This is in the best interest of our customers and employees.”

The decision — effective Tuesday — to close the restaurant for late night hours comes after a 2 a.m. fight erupted in the Denny’s parking lot, Atkins said.

A 40-year-old Syracuse woman was hit in the eye with a beer bottle during the fight, said Sgt. Joe Sweeney, a spokesman for the Syracuse Police Department.

The woman was transported to Upstate Medical Hospital, 750 E. Adams St., and released later Thursday, Sweeney added. “She had a severe injury to her eye,” Sweeney said. “We were told that at the time she was taken to the hospital, she had a good chance of losing it.”

The victim could not be reached for comment.

Police were called to Denny’s when about 45 people began violently throwing tables, chairs and cooking utensils across the restaurant, Sweeney added, noting that no arrests were made.

“When the officers arrived on the scene,” he said, “everything had pretty much died down.”

Ten Syracuse University students filed suit in 1997 against Denny’s after they were allegedly denied service because of their race. After leaving the restaurant, the students claim they were beaten in the parking lot.

Denny’s will close Sunday through Thursday evenings at midnight and reopen for breakfast at 6 a.m. On weekends, the restaurant will close at 1 a.m., and reopen at 6 a.m., Atkins added.

“We will continue to work with local city government leaders to develop a resolution,” she said.

Other area Denny’s will continue to operate with the restaurant’s normal hours, Atkins added.

said. Project organizers are optimistic that the money will come from the state’s Environmental Benefits Program, he added.

The rest of the funding, about $120 million, will be paid by those who use the sewer system that is being renovated, Cunningham said. During the next 12 years, city and suburban residents’ taxes will be raised about $10 a year to cover these charges, he said.

Councilors also used the meeting as an opportunity to raise their concerns about the project’s affect on the city’s economic development. “We’re jeopardizing the millions of dollars being spent on economic improvements,” asked Councilor Van Robinson, chairman of the Neighborhood Preservation, Downtown and Metropolitan Planning Committee.

Robinson and other councilors are concerned that the project would disrupt the community and create visually unappealing and odor emanating facilities that would hurt the effort to establish an economically prosperous area by the lake.

Plans for homes, stores, an amphitheater, an aquarium, restaurants and the extension of the Carousel Mall near the lakefront could all be negatively affected by the cleanup plan, Robinson said.

All the plans involved with the lake cleanup will take these issues into consideration, Cunningham said. “We want to make everything inoffensive,” he said. “There should be no odor, generally.”

The potential for a pungent stench near the Metropolitan Sewage Treatment Plant is particularly worrisome, Robinson added.

Even after Cunningham explained the project’s commitment to eliminate odors, Robinson was still not satisfied.

“There’s still no guarantee that there will be no offensive odor,” Robinson said.

The possibility of the project’s buildings being the tallest structures in the area would leave many city residents unhappy, Council Minority Leader Steven Dellogio said.

Cunningham calmed DeRegis’ fears by guaranteeing that no building taller than two stories would be built on any project site.

There are also concerns within the community that Clinton Square may have to undergo construction as part of the project. Councilor Joanie Mahoney said.

Most residents currently oppose the square becoming a construction site, she added.

Mahoney nodded approvingly when Cunningham said that there were no plans to do work in Clinton Square. There will be no visible work in Armo Square either, he added.

The community must be made aware of these issues, as well as how their neighborhoods are going to be affected, Robinson said.

It is still too early to know when certain neighborhoods will become construction sites, Cunningham said. The group, however, has already begun speaking with local businesses and community organizations so work can be scheduled on days that will hurt the area least, he said.

“The residents need to be informed of what will happen and how long it will take,” Robinson said. “Think carefully about it.”

Urz lauds sanctions, students question fairness

By TIFFANY LANKES
Asst. News Editor

In regard to Syracuse University’s judicial system, punishment did not always fit the crime. When students received sanctions from the Office of Judicial Affairs, some students were confused about what they were assigning different punishments for the same violations.

"I still don't know what they were assigning different punishments for the same violations," said Meredith Davison, a sophomore chemistry major.

"I really don’t think knowing the policy is important," Davison said. "People are going to do it anyway."

If the policies are going to effectively help people from committing Student Conduct Code violations, judicial affairs need to publicize the new sanctions more, said Parker Daves, a sophomore biology major.

He added that most students are introduced to the code before they enter SU as freshmen and before they become acquainted with "college life." "A lot of stuff is more severe than a formal warning," he said.

With the new sanctions, judicial affairs are going to do what they want. "People are going to do it anyway," Davison said.

"The community may not like it," said Gush Chung, a graduate student.

Michael Berkowitz, an SU junior, who was reprimanded by judicial affairs, said he has a feeling that we might have to test this semester.

Changing the judicial system was not the target of criticisms. "It is important to keep parents notified throughout the judicial process," said Notifying parents, however, violated a student's right to pri-

SU must disclose criminal identities

Criminals should not be able to hide under-neath Syracuse University’s comfort blanket anymore.

A 1996 federal law allows U.S. universities to release the names of certain violent criminals and non-forcible sex offenders. Syracuse University would do well to come out from behind the shield provided by the 1970s Buckley Amendment, which prohibits the release of most educational records, and post names of offenders. To date, SU has not.

Keeping this information from students consistently puts them in harm’s way. Vague, semi-annual statistic reports do little to inform students about real dangers on campus.

A woman has a right to know if a convicted domestic abuser lives on her residence hall floor. Likewise, if an arsonist is running rampant throughout university neighborhoods, students should be informed that he might show up on their doorstep.

Currently, students snaggled by the university’s guilty-until-proven-innocent judicial process aren’t threatened by having their names released to the public. Doing so, however, would be a strong deterrent to crime within a week of community service and other lenient judicial sanctions.

If SU truly aspires to fairness and protection for its students, its judicial system must show that of the nation. Laws and procedures set forth by local, state and federal governments seek to protect all citizens. Paying the university $31,000 a year doesn’t give it the right to make new rules that they believe will keep us safer.

When students are arrested by police, their name immediately appears in the public record, and could potentially end up in any newspaper the following day.

But university judicial affairs privacy rules coddle violent offenders and keep their ugly secrets safe. It’s a dangerous practice for students all over campus.

It’s time for SU’s Office of Judicial Affairs to get a taste of the real world.

It’s time for students stand up for your rights: Demand to know who lives next door to you.

Cartoon protest leaves lessons, self-awareness

One year ago today, more than 100 angry students stood on the front lawn of The Daily Orange in the rain for more than two hours and screamed racism. The devotion to their cause was in their eyes and voices. It is a sight and sound I will never forget. If that was the intention, they succeeded, and I thank them for it.

The backlash resulted from an editorial cartoon published Friday, April 10 that too many and looked like “Sambo,” a derogatory depiction of blacks popularized in the early 20th century. Protesters demanded an apology and we responded. But the tables had turned — we were forced to report on ourselves and other weeks were asking us the tough questions.

And rightly so. The reporters were not the only ones asking questions.

We’ve begun questioning ourselves. We wondered if what was said was true. Were we racists? It is a questioning that has continued at the D.O. since that day, to ensure that we are recognizing the fault of the comic: ignorance.

We were wrong, but not intentionally. Because of our ignorance, we burnt bridges with a large percentage of the Syracuse University student population.

However, I didn’t realize the total implications of the strained relationship until a conversation with a freshman I met early this year. She had visited campus the day we printed an apology for the comic, which meant her first encounter with the D.O. was one of accused racism. But instead of writing us off as a racist publication, she came to our dilapidated house during her first month as an Orangeman and asked to get involved.

On a cold walk back from covering a campus meeting with her, she told me that by working for us she somehow felt she was copping out — betraying her surrounding. It was the day we printed an apology for the comic, which meant her first encounter with the D.O. was one of accused racism. But instead of writing us off as a racist publication, she came to our dilapidated house during her first month as an Orangeman and asked to get involved.

There are students and student organizations on this campus that will never look at the D.O. the same way again. I would be lying if I said I didn’t experience that every day I step on campus. But at least I am aware. I could have chosen to ignore the criticism, but luckily, it was too loud.

I am trying to learn more about the people around me, and I am trying to take a few people with me. But I am only one voice in a sea of skepticism built by years of preconceived notions.

But at least I know some good has come from that painful rainy April day.

Republicans choose board, await new term

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Asst. News Editor

Syracuse University’s chapter of the College Republicans selected new officers at its annual election meeting Tuesday night in the Schine Student Center.

The group’s members elected Joe Burns as chairman, Chris Ryan as first vice chairman, Karyn Young as second vice chairman, Gina DeRossi as secretary and Joe Roser as treasurer.

“We’re going to keep doing what we’ve been doing,” said Burns, a junior political science and history major. “But we have some work to do as far as recruitment goes.”

A major goal for next semester is to bring more members into the organization by actively pursuing young Republicans in the freshman class, Burns said.

Reynolds choose board, await new term

The recruitment effort is even more important than usual because of this November’s elections, which local and national Republicans, such as New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and Texas Gov. George W. Bush, face tough competition from their Democratic rivals, he added.

“The recruitment is important because so many students interested in the political process,” he said. “With all the election coming up in the fall, it’s going to be important to help local Republicans with their campaigns.”

Mark McCarthy, a Republican candidate for a judgeship in the New York State Supreme Court, spoke at Tuesday’s meeting. He agreed that there is a need for increased political awareness among college students.

For those interested in politics as a profession, a high degree of involvement in college will help increase visibility for the future, McCarthy said.

“You’ll be working on the campaigns of others,” he said. “And you can say, ‘I’m known to people,’ he said. ‘Take action in your own country. Pick someone you want to work with, someone you want to help through the process.’

Young, a junior political science and art history major, said she only recently became involved with the College Republicans. She said she sees the group as an opportunity to gain the kind of experience that will allow her to run for public office in the future.

“I actually met them at the Bush Rally,” Young said of her meeting with the College Republicans at Bush’s March 3 rally in Syracuse’s Hancock International Airport. “They gave me the gist of their program and their policies. It’s a great opportunity.”

One of the most important things for the College Republicans to focus on during the coming year is taking the organization’s efforts to new areas, Young said.

“I’d love to expand within the Syracuse community,” she said. “But that’s not really a goal of mine, it’s more of a goal for the whole group.”

The awards ceremony went well, said Lisa Walsh, assistant director of the Office of Greek Life.

“This year was one of the largest turnouts,” Walsh said. “It’s very indicative of how successful this year has been. There was a great pool of candidates for awards. I think that’s what drew such large numbers.

The collective success of all Greek houses was also shown in the diversity of award nominations, Walsh added.

“We had a good mix of chapters winning awards,” she said. “One chapter didn’t win every award.”

The winning teams of Greek Week were announced at the event. Alpha Gamma Delta sorority and Phi Kappa Theta fraternity took third place. The team of Pi Beta Phi sorority and Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity won second place.

Kappa Alpha Theta sorority and Zeta Psi fraternity won first place.

“Our girls had a great time,” Pi Phi president Melissa Chadwick said. “We were really fortunate to work with Sammy. As a new fraternity, they were great and worked really well with Pi Phi.”

Pi Phi and fraternity Phi Iota Alpha were both winners of the outstanding community service award. Chadwick said she was especially proud of this honor.

“We were really happy about the community service award,” she said. “We put so much emphasis on volunteering in the house.”

Caribbean writers share works in native tongue

BY CAROLINE CHEN
Staff Writer

Many students found more than they bargained for Tuesday night when they walked into Gifford Auditorium for a lecture featuring three Hispanic Caribbean fiction writers.

The lecture was entirely in Spanish.

Out of the original 50-member audience at the lecture's start, less than 30 remained for the entire duration.

The vagina, described in detail from a young man's perspective, was the centerpiece of Virgilo Sencion's short story.

Sencion, a native of the Dominican Republic, read about slapping a woman's legs apart to look at the vagina, the essence of how to use the tongue and shining a spotlight into the vagina for a closer inspection.

Standing behind the podium with his eyes focused on the book, Sencion managed to keep a straight face during the reading—unlike the audience.

Even fellow author Pedro Juan Cabiya smiled in response to Sencion's story.

Cabiya, a native of Puerto Rico, later leaned over the podium as he told a short story about a white rat that could not be trapped.

Cabiya's Spanish syllables, accentuated with an occasional anatomist's "clunk" or "plink", elicited occasional giggles from the audience.

Capturing the readings by Sencion and Cabiya, Cuban author and poet Mirta Yanez sat with her lips pursed and flipped through a book.

When it was her turn, Yanez remained seated and put on reading glasses as she began sharing her poetry. The poems included one dedicated to Uruguayan-born author Horacio Quiroga and another that referred to Dante's Divine Comedy.

"I don't know if I like the poems," said Olilia Cortes, a former Spanish instructor at Syracuse University, who said she attended the lecture to find out more about these contemporary writers.

She said she prefers poems that are not as transparent but more challenging.

Following the poetry, Yanez shared a short story, entitled "La Version Original," about a homosexual couple. She said she originally intended to read a story about rats, but made a quick change of plans after Cabiya preceded her with his rat story.

"Les gust6?— or "did you all like it?" asked Silvio Torres-Saliant, director of the Latino-Latin American Studies program at SU.

The audience responded with unanimous "yes"—"yes.

The lecture, which took three months to plan, began with a decision to invite Yanez to the SU campus during her North American tour, Torres-Saliant said.

Greeks aid national charity with Hoop-a-Thon

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

President Meghan Exley, one of the event's coordinators, "I was thinking we'd raise around $1,000."

Four fraternity teams and five sorority teams took part in the "Hoop-a-Thon," a five-on-five, 3-point shoot-out tournament, said Aliann Blood, president of the Greek Programming Board.

Participating chapters were required to pay a minimum entrance fee of $100 to participate in the tournament, Exley said. Zeta Phi Eta sorority and Alpha Chi Omega sorority won the men's and women's tournaments, respectively.

Some houses, however, had formats that conflicted with the tournament, Blood said. But she added that several of those houses donated money to the event anyway.

The tournament raised about $2,000 and the silent auction set up alongside the sidelines brought in about $200, Exley said. Prices for the auction were donated by local businesses, she said.

The Greek Programming Board donated the remainder of the proceeds, she added.

"We weren't expecting that donation," Exley said. "Obviously it was amazing because it put us over the $3,000 mark."

The Hoop-a-Thon is a traditional society event that occurs nationwide during April, Exley said.

Event coordinators chose to bring the tournament to Syracuse after speaking with a society member who works in the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications, she said.

An employee at the school contacted local leaders and spoke at a meeting with council presidents, Blood said.

"It kind of just clicked," she said. "It was like wow, this would be something really great to do."

Exley and Blood agreed that participants in the event appeared to enjoy the games, and even got a little competitive.

"Everyone seemed to have a great time. It was a lot of fun," Blood said. "People from the Huntington's Disease association also came out. The members were there helping out — handing out pamphlets, bumper stickers, T-shirts they were." The presence of members from the society was one of the best parts of the entire event, Exley said. "(Greeks) get to see that these are actual people you're helping out," she said. "This is the affiliation they have, right in front of you. It put in touch what they were playing basketball for."

The Greek Programming Board contacted greek leaders and spoke at a meeting with council presidents, Blood said.

"It's because investments that aren't eroded by taxes Thai's because they have long-term benefits for the community," she said. "I hear those concerns, but it's not like we're trying to convince people to work for our labor pool." Many of the service projects do involve community interaction outside of the university at locations such as the Westcott Community Center, the Syracuse police and fire departments and the Southeast University Neighborhood Association, she said.

The primary goal of the program, however, is not punishment but to get students involved in the community, she added.

"Educate," Fiacco said. "That's the general theme of the Judicial Affairs Office."

Some students who have participated in the program, including Alison Katz, a freshman in the School of Management, said the program lacks focus and is more of a nuisance than a learning experience.

Katz said she was cited for being at a party where minors were drinking.

At first, Judicial Affairs informed her that she would attend date rape awareness meetings, but Katz said she ended up working in the Parents' Office in preparation for SU Parents' Weekend.

Katz said she was cited for being at a party where minors were drinking.

"I was just annoyed," Katz said. "All I did was pass envelopes, stuff envelopes and alpha-beta things. That really doesn't make you think, wow I did something cool."

"I don't think it helps that many people."
Poet examines life of working class

The scarred hands of Sean Thomas Dougherty tell the story of a working class man who climbed his way out of the factories of New Hampshire to become a poet. Burned by scalding hot waters as an 18-year-old dish washer, Dougherty now carefully crafts poems that personalize his blue-collar experience.

Dougherty described a different New Hampshire than the traditional local poets, who wrote about cows roaming the countryside.

"There was a cartoonishness to that idea of rural New Hampshire poetry, to try to write about a life that never was and never is," Dougherty said. "It was small-town通俗, small-town sentimentality. To me it's a big lie."

The Syracuse University writing instructor and author of two published books of poetry has his own standard for what constitutes a great poem — one that taps into a moment and says something in a way that no one else can.

The practice of holding certain writers up in a literary canon as the best of their time reflects more on who those people knew than what they said, Dougherty said.

"Canzone," Dougherty said, "is a bunch of bullshit.

The forces of production limit what gets produced, and even if a writer gets published, there are no guarantees of readership, Dougherty said. He bucked the system of idolatry and keeps a list of books, some published in the 1960s, which he was the first to check out from the library, and rummages through bookstores for inspiration.

One of his biggest influences came from a book that cost him a dollar, which he found at the bottom of a bargain box at a bookstore in Boston — "Life Guard in the Snow," a 1973 release by Gene Ruggles.

The title poem depicts a lifeguard who returns to a lake frozen over by winter ice after failing to save a young swimmer's life.

Dougherty remembers a line from the poem, "a girl who the water carved out of my arms forever."

"The poem floored me and I was like, 'Who the hell is this guy?'" he said.

Some researchers told Dougherty why Ruggles was buried in the stacks by other authors — he was an alcoholic, far left-wing writer who the social network left behind.

Dougherty, while a small-press writer, has not been left behind. Patrick Sawyer, a published poet and writing instructor at the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry, called Dougherty an "activist," one who has united local poets who otherwise would have never known each other through organizing readings and poetry slams.

Known for performing poetry as much as writing, Dougherty reads his latest at 7:30 p.m. in the Hall of Languages Room 509. He performed at Lollapalooza in 1994 and is featured in the anthology "American Poetry: The Next Generation." His most recent book, "The Body's Precarious History..." is out.

Consent with the family is also important. The hospital or funeral home will not notify the family if they are not notified by the patient or if the family has not given consent.

“People are scared that the doctors will use their organs, but they can be used if they are not used by the patient,” said Henner.

Time is essential when it comes to organ donation. Cells start dying once the body dies. Freezing the organ or putting it in solution can only slow the deterioration for so long. An organ that has been out of the donor’s body for more than 12 hours is usually rejected by the recipient.

“Many people have misconceptions about organ donation. They feel that their healthcare may be compromised,” Henner said.

Spieldienst agreed. “People are scared that the doctors will let them die so that they can use their organs,” he said.

In 1998, 4,837 died waiting for a transplant. Each year, this figure increases by about 500 people.

Anyone who dies can be a donor. A person can be a donor if they are born with a heart, lungs, kidneys, or liver.

“The number of organs used to be recovered after automobile accidents. However, with the rise of car safety such as seat belts and airbags, most organs are recovered after a stroke or an accident,” Spieldienst said.

The number of donors has increased as the number of younger donors has decreased, he added.

Elton proves he can still draw a crowd

I discovered him in a stack of scratched vinyl, while fiddling with my best friend's antiqued turntable on a Saturday afternoon in sixth grade.

Produced in the era when Elton John was a ubiquitous sunglasses three times the size of his face and equally ridiculous hats and hit glasses a thousand times harder than any human should. There were still people in my first taste of truly great music. Elton was one of them. The 53-year-old legend brought his timeless show to Syracuse's Onondaga War Memorial for the first time in 28 years, where he played to a sold-out crowd of 8,000.

My tenth-row ticket cost me $80 — purchased at an online auction to benefit the Elton John AIDS foundation — and even though I'll wince over the figure when my credit card bill comes, I revel in knowing that I just saw a concert that would even impress the parents' friends crazy with jealousy.

From the two men who sported nappy munets and brushed their hair into my ear for the first time, Elton John took the notion of a one-man band to new heights. From the little-known "Harmony" from his "Yellow Brick Road" album to the rip-roaring "Daniel," and "Philadelphia Freedom," Elton captivated the audience like nothing I've ever seen.

Between tunes, John paused to sip from a duct tape-covered soda can and chat with the audience. Before his performance of "Somewhere Out of the Blue," Disney's "El Dorado" theme and his newest single, John joked about the drudgery of his recent press tour promoting the "El Dorado" musical score.

"This stuff is so boring," he quipped. "I'd much rather be playing for all of you.

He took the audience to the edge of the stage to autograph albums, old LPs, and even his baseball caps, John launched into a tribute to Lennon for his late friend and fellow British rocker, John Lennon. Snapshots of Lennon — from his days in the strawberry fields with the Beatles to boat rides with his wine and son shortly before his death — flashed across the screen while John paid homage to his friend's short life.

I found myself blinking back tears at what might have been.

Several times during the show, John paused to recognize the partnership with his longtime lyricist, Bernie Taupin, the man who wrote words that brought life to some of John's most successful musical arrangements. During an encore performance of "Can You Feel the Love Tonight," the theme from Disney's "The Lion King," I noticed something that surely wasn't present the last time John played the War Memorial. A tweed coat-clad man had the stage to himself as he walked open and waved it wildly above his head in time to the theme song — apparently he wanted the friends and family back home to "feel the love," too.

Here's to hoping we won't stop feeling it anytime soon.

From vinyl 45s to cell phone-broadcast concerts, John's musical influence has withstood the harshest battle any performer must face — the test of time. Though John may have mellowed a bit over the years, he'll never be too old to truly hang up the crazy glasses and get a crowded house on its feet.

Sophomores Jaimee Reynolds, Lori Wohlschlegel and Ginny Miles combined for 75 goals against the Big Red's first 11 opponents. Each player contributed to SU's offensive success in a variety of ways.

Senior Carrie Giancola enters Wednesday's contest with 116 saves on the season and 377 goals against average and a stellar .835 save percentage. In her final season, Giancola has developed into a well-respected leader.

Against Fordham, Giancola recorded 20 saves and held the Rams to only two goals the rest of the game. Giancola also had four goals for the remainder of the game.

SU's second-half play has been improved. The Orange is at an all-time high, hovering around the same location as last season, with a 14-4 record. This year, the Orange is ranked 10th in the nation and 10th in the North region.

Aiming to derail the Orange, the Terriers face the seventh ranked University of Virginia. Virginia is 10-1 on the season and 4-1 against the Big East Conference. InSU's last two contests against the Terriers, the Orange has won 14-8 and 7-3. SU's third goal in the first quarter led to a 10-0 lead for the Orange. The Orange went on to record 14 goals against the Terriers, while holding them to only five goals.

SU's defense has been a key factor in the team's success. The Orangewomen have been the primary focus in recent practices, with a new block down that can cut the middle field and pass the ball to the right side of the field. Orange travel to Cornell

BY CHRISS SNOW Staff Writer

When Syracuse and Cornell clash this afternoon in a 4 p.m. women's lacrosse meeting at Berman Field in Ithaca, the opportunity to prove 10-3 SU belongs in the NCAA Tournament will be there for the taking.

Beating an 8-3 Big Red squad firing on all cylinders will be no easy task, however.

"Wednesday is a huge game," freshman netminder Carla Gigon said. "It's an in-state rivalry, and they're a top regional team. We're focusing day by day, but the tournament is definitely in the back of our minds. And these regional games are vital.

Jo. 15 Cornell presents SU its hardest test since the Orange went 2-1 in three games—all against top 10 teams. The Big Red brings offensive punch and strong goalscoring to the table.

"They have several sophomore attackers who go to the cage hard," SU coach Lisa Miller said. "They were our focus last year, and this year we will try to turn them to the out.

Freshman charged with trespassing

Staff Reports

Freshman Amilcar Alfere Martell was charged with criminal trespassing Saturday after being reported by another resident, according to police reports.

Martell lived in Day Hall at the time of the incident but was removed and is currently living in a temporary apartment on South Campus, said Stephen Bing, his former roommate.

Martell could not be reached for comment.

His belongings are still in his Day Hall room, added Bing, a freshman art major.

The victim was lying in bed at 11 p.m. and saw Martell enter the room, the report said.

Martell left after the victim told him to leave, the report added.

The police are still investigating and looking for witnesses.

Student chases stranger from house after break-in

Staff Reports

An unidentified man unlawfully entered the residence of an SU student Wednesday on the 300 block of Comstock Avenue, according to a police report.

Colin Flaherty, a senior theater major, said he returned home around midnight and went to his room to make a phone call. The front door was unlocked and the lights were on, he added.

After leaving his room, Hanlon saw a man down the hallway, the report said.

"He added that when he approached the man to ask what he was doing, the man ran through the kitchen and out of the apartment," the report added.

Hanlon, who was in his underwear, said he ran after the man, who headed toward East Genesee Street, but was unable to catch him.

The man was black, in his early thirties, six feet tall with a stocky build and wearing a dark jacket, dark pants and a red baseball hat, the report said.

Nothing was missing from the apartment, Hanlon said, adding that he probably thwarted a burglary attempt in progress.

"I had stuff stolen before so it's no big deal," he said.

Education secretary urges study abroad

WASHINGTON, D.C. — U.S. Secretary of Education Rod Paige is urging study abroad programs to continue warning criminal suspects about their right against self-incrimination before questioning them for five years. Paige said Tuesday during a hearing that the Supreme Court ruled last month that Miranda warnings do not have to be given to criminal suspects.

The high-tech cigarettes, which burn almost no tobacco, have been available for the past few years only in small test markets in Chattanooga, Tenn., Lincoln, Neb., and parts of Atlanta. But with a federal appeals court ruling last month that threw Miranda's future into doubt, the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals said Congress effectively overturned Miranda when it enacted the anti-terrorism in a place that has pained families found serenity Wednesday. Church bells chimed on streets for five years. "America will never forget the terrorist attack on American soil."

Students call for expanded chaperone service
Assembly sets penalties for fee logo violations

BY STEPHANIE SILVER
Staff Writer

Student organizations must cite "Student Activity Fee" on their campus publications and advertisements or face fines from the Student Government Association Finance Board.

The Finance Board's Determinant Logo and Enforcement Code states that the phrase "Sponsored by the student groups" and "Student Activity Fee" must be "blatantly" placed on all Student Fee-funded advertisements and publications at a minimum 16-point font size.

The Assembly passed a revision to the code, including the allowance of fines at Wednesday's SGA meeting.

While a 16-point logo has always been required, SGA has done nothing to enforce it, Parliamentarian Jonathan M. Taylor said at the meeting. A fine, determined case-by-case, will now be imposed on groups abusing the code.

He cited a University Union concert advertisement for Block Party 2000 as an example of an advertisement ignoring the code and SGA not being able to do anything in response.

Comptroller Chris Greiner said, "$60,000 was allocated to them for this event and they couldn't get larger than a 3-point font." UU President Lisa Stone said she understands the importance of having the logo on fliers, but SGA should be more understanding to the actual size of the advertisement itself.

"There is a lot of information on that flier and most of it is in small font," Stone said.

A logo-to-advertisement-statement ratio requirement would be more practical, she added.

The cover of the April Fools 2000 issue of The Student Voice was also mentioned as a misuse of the logo. Although the Student Fee logo was visible, it was followed by the phrase "Fooling with you." "It's more of a joke than a representation of funding," Taylor said.

But The Student Voice did not do anything wrong according to the code, he added. "It's all in good fun," he said.
The code itself is just too flexible," he said. "And if you want to follow the code, we have to enforce it."

President Jamail James said at the meeting that he approved the newspaper cover because it did not violate anything. He added that he thought it was fine.

The monetary sanctions are "a bit strict," said Kimberlea Klein, editor in chief of The Student Voice. "A reprimand will be sufficient," said Klein, a junior broadcast journalism major. "They shouldn't be able to take away our hard earned money just because a group may have jokes a little fun at SGA."

The Assembly passed a resolution in support of funding for SA groups. "There is a lot of information that is fine.

The logo regulations could limit the extent to which student groups can be creative, SGA Assemblyman Dwight Williams said.

"The way the logo is used reflects the personality of the organization," said Amber Downin, a freshman advertising major who attended the meeting.

If it is the same logo everywhere people will stop noticing it, she added.

Taylor, however, said the logo is necessary to further SGA's cause of serving students. "Students paid for it and we're making sure that they know they paid for it and that they know we're working for them," Taylor said. "It's not saying no more jokes, they just need to know that there will be a fine."

In other SGA news:

Two of the voting members on the 10-person Finance Board must be SGA Assemblymembers, according to a bill that was unanimously passed at Wednesday night's meeting.

Four additional Assemblymembers may also be elected to the board as long as they are non-voting members.

Assemblymembes must elect the board so they can appoint six SGA members if desired, said Taylor. He said that he wanted the Finance Board to become independent from SGA because financial issues have come to dominate all of the Assembly's time.

CMS cuts student's Internet connection, prompts questions of overuse

Staff Reports

Computing and Media Services administrators cut off a Syracuse University student's online access this week after it was discovered he was using an excessive amount of network bandwidth.

Bandwidth is the amount of data that can be transmitted in a fixed amount of time. If a person uses an excessive amount of bandwidth, other students may have difficulty downloading files.

"Apparently this person had been warned a few times," said David Butler, director of Network and Systems Services. "Finally we shut him down."

Butler declined to give the name of the student.

Cases like this are not unusual, Butler said, and may occur several times during a semester. They are not necessarily associated with excessive use of the music file download program Napster, however, which offers free downloads and free membership, he added.

The Record Industry Association of America sued Napster in December on behalf of record labels and recording artists, alleging that the site is facilitating the trade of illegal copies of songs.

SU officials have no intention of shutting down Napster, but certain other universities have done so in response to the lawsuit, Butler said.

The university, however, may later consider shutting down Napster depending on the result of the case, he added.

It is currently unknown for what purposes the student was using the network access, Butler added. "We'll probably just grill him and ask him to convince us he won't do it again."

Off-campus crimes must be reported

Numbers don't lie. But at Syracuse University, they don't tell the whole truth, either.

The 1990 congressional Campuz Security Act requires all universities to report on-campus crimes. A subsequent amendment to the act also forces colleges to disclose statistics of certain off-campus crimes, too.

But loopholes in the law leave colleges to their own discretion in choosing what crimes to report. SU's Department of Public Safety takes their own discretion in choosing what crimes to disclose statistics of certain campus crimes that take place in other university-area neighborhoods — neighborhoods where students have recently been beaten and robbed at gunpoint.

Reporting only half-truths is harmful and misleading to SU students.

It's an undeniable fact that attending college in Syracuse poses some threat of danger. It's the unfortunate trade-off that often accompanies urban living.

But that doesn't mean students should be denied access to the raw crime data about the place where they make their homes for four years.

SU attempts to run a slick campus safety public relations campaign. It's failing miserably.

Administrators have stepped up to save face with angry area residents by establishing the Neighborhood Patrol Initiative with the Syracuse Police Department. And after meddling in off-campus student affairs on weekend nights, Public Safety is left with a fat pile of data about crimes involving students.

Instead of using it to clarify campus safety information, the department abdicates responsibility and files the ugly numbers away in a drawer.

An accurate reflection of student life at SU must include a picture of even the harshest reality. Students deserve to know what they're up against when they step out from under the university's thumb.

Students deserve better than unethical, lazy landlord

With a name like Seemann, I should have been ready for shady landlords. That didn't help matters between us.

"Everyone gives it a shot when they try to spell it," he said, while sitting on my roommate's phone and spelling it. But at Syracuse University, they don't tell the whole truth, either.

But that doesn't mean students should be denied access to the raw crime data about the place where they make their homes for four years.

Students deserve better than unethical, lazy landlord

According to city records, nine of Seemann's 13 properties in the Quad have had complaints run the gamut from dangerous stairs to illegal use of land.

Seemann defended his court appearance.

"I've talked to some students about housing, and some of them have had it rough," he said. "But that doesn't mean students should be denied access to the raw crime data about the place where they make their homes for four years.

SU attempts to run a slick campus safety public relations campaign. It's failing miserably.

Administrators have stepped up to save face with angry area residents by establishing the Neighborhood Patrol Initiative with the Syracuse Police Department. And after meddling in off-campus student affairs on weekend nights, Public Safety is left with a fat pile of data about crimes involving students.

Instead of using it to clarify campus safety information, the department abdicates responsibility and files the ugly numbers away in a drawer.

An accurate reflection of student life at SU must include a picture of even the harshest reality. Students deserve to know what they're up against when they step out from under the university's thumb.

Donohue visits for community roundtable

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Staff Writer

The city of Syracuse began a series of 10 regional roundtable meetings, aimed to gather insight into the community needs of New York state residents Tuesday.

"The Quality Communities Program is designed to serve as an important link between state and local governments in determining how communities can foster effective growth and development that is mindful of environmental needs," New York State Lt. Gov. Mary Donohue said.

Local businesses and civic organizations, represented by several panelists, gave short speeches at the Art and Home Center in the New York State Fairgrounds. A public open forum preceded their presentations.

"The best way to do this is through an open dialogue with the individuals that make it happen at the local level," said Donohue, chairwoman of Gov. George E. Pataki's Quality Community Task Force. "We are encouraging community leaders to identify new ways and ideas that could be used to advance the quality communities vision."

Local business leaders expressed their concerns about changes the global economy will bring.

"Some companies will have to leave Central New York for regions with cheaper labor," said John Rooney, president of the Aspen Group, a business consultant company specializing in small business.

"A more skilled workforce has to be developed in order to keep industries in the area," he said.

"Our lifestyle is to be preserved, government has to work on increasing the productivity of its people," Rooney said.

"Small businesses create neighborhoods that are secure and liveable," he said.

"Telecommunications have to be improved and made available to local establishments so the businesses may compete and thrive," he added.

"The Internet is critical to long-term economic vitality," Rooney said.

"But businesses cannot harm the natural environment for the sake of economic growth," said Ross Whaley, president of the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry.

"Urban sprawl is a major problem for many U.S. cities, including Syracuse, that can contribute to negative effects on the environment," Syracuse Mayor Roy A. Bernardi said.

"We're seeking to maximize our existing infrastructure and not go into our green space," Bernardi said.

Bernardi called for brownfield sites, places that businesses have abandoned, to be restored so that they may be used for new industries.

"Urban growth boundaries create real city neighborhoods and inward growth," said Rhea Jeser, chairwoman of the Sierra Club's Atlantic Chapter of the New York State Conservation and Legislative Committee.

Bernardi's redevelopment plan would protect wetlands and the small farmers in the region, who have been forced to sell their land to companies looking to come to Syracuse because of economic hardships, Jeser added.

The community task force will evaluate local governments' ability to manage proposals after all the meetings are completed. It will report its findings to Pataki on Jan. 31, 2001.

Moore thanked those in attendance for voicing their concerns and suggesting ways to improve the community.

"Open and candid speech is an intricate component of these roundtable discussions," Donohue said. "It gives us a clearer sense of the work that lies ahead."

Moore accused John Ronnie Short, professor of the GEO 815 class, of plagiarizing two sentences of his work in the book "Globalization and the City," which Short co-authored with Yeong-Hyun Kim, a geography doctoral student at the time.

Kim and Short have both denied the allegations.

Moore said the amount of pressure and stress he was under may have caused him to say he received a different grade than he actually did.

But Moore said he should have never been graded in the first place because he was not allowed to complete the class.

"Really thought it was a D," he said. "The basis of my beef is that I was excluded from a class. Either one of those grades can't exist without Moore's permission.

Another one of Moore's claims is that Short violated his academic, freedom and professional ethics by submitting an article to the panel hearing the complaint would have consisted of only five faculty members.

"As long as no students are in the process there is clearly not going to be fair treatment," Moore said.

"As soon as the article is published, I'll submit it to the American Geographical Society and ask for it to be submitted to the APA's Ethics Committee," Moore added.

"The APA makes its decision. The panel hearing the complaint would have consisted of only five faculty members," Moore added. "It gives us a clearer sense of the work that lies ahead."

Russell H. Schrier has been determined to be the article until now. It is held by the "Professional Geographer," a scientific journal, without Moore's permission.

The "Professional Geographer" is holding the article until the "Professional Geographer" is released. It will be published in the February 2001 issue.
Poet stresses importance of language, words

BY ASHLEY GRAF
Staff Writer

"A lot of us are very conscious about what we eat, but we're not quite so conscious about what we listen to," Williams said.

Williams said he was inspired to begin writing because of the first single Def Jam records produced in 1981. At this time, he was in third grade. He said he was intrigued by the language used in the rap single.

"I didn't know what he was talking about," Williams said. "I just thought, wow, big words.

He said he began looking up words like "fascinating," "captivating" and "devastating" and using them as lyrics for his own songs. From the dictionary to Shakespearean prose, Williams said he used all of the aspects of his education to create verses.

"By the time I was eleven, I started to write rhymes in Old English," he said.

Williams cited an experiment that a friend of his completed while they were both attending New York University. He said his friend found that one of the radio stations in New York City played only twelve songs by eight different artists in a 48-hour time span.

Music and radio, nevertheless, has played an important part in his life, Williams said.

Williams said he was extremely comfortable about calling himself a "slam poet," as others call him.

Slam poetry is a freestyle poetry competition between either teammates or single contestants, who perform in front of judges to win prizes.

"A slam is a competitive approach," he said. "There's a whole sensation brand of slam poetry that is kind of like stand-up comedy.

He explained that with judges awarding prizes at slam contests, it may not be fair to call these performers poets.

"It would be best for us not to define slam poetry," Williams said. "If the poets were writing in order to move the audience, then it might escape the poetic realm.

Liam Hawryl, a junior industrial design major, said he was excited to see Williams interacting with the audience.

"It was nice to see him speak to us, instead of at us," Hawryl said. "He was trying to get us to be thoughtful in a broad range.

Richard Washington, a sophomore broadcast journalism major, agreed that Williams did an excellent job inviting the audience to participate with questions and comments.

Washington also said he liked the way the poet presented controversial language, like the use of "nigga" in many of the poems.

"As long as you have a reasoning behind your actions, it doesn't matter what I think or what you think or what someone else thinks," Washington said.
Campus crime to give students a more accurate picture of crime at their schools.

In 1996, The Philadelphia Inquirer discovered the University of Pennsylvania was excluding crimes occurring on sidewalks and streets crisscrossing its urban Philadelphia campus. Also in the 1990s, the U.S. Department of Education investigated complaints that several colleges were excluding certain crime statistics.

Although the law makes colleges responsible for reporting crime near their campus, they are not obliged to disclose crime in off-campus neighborhoods where undergraduates students may live.

Safety advocates and SU officials said that is the way it should be. "When you move off campus, you say to the university 'You don't do anything about it,'" said Robert Robinson, chief of the Department of Public Safety. "When you go to any other campus, you expect the public safety to be there for you."

The areas that are intended to be included are those that a normal rational person would consider to be part of the analysis and crime near their campus, they are supposed to give students and their parents a more accurate picture of campus crime, public safety officials said that remains to be seen.

"I don't think it will be a huge difference," said Bill Pessky, from the public safety division at the State University of New York at Cortland, whose campus is located in a residential area.

Pessky said that some of the new reporting areas on his campus include streets where both students and city residents live, blurring the line.

"Then they become kind of meaningless at that point," he said.

Congress amended the law in 1996, making colleges report "off campus" crime to give students a more accurate picture of crime at their schools.

At Syracuse University, for example, officials will now have to report crime on streets bordering university property, such as Marshall Street, Comstock Avenue and parts of Ostrom Avenue.

Crime on Ackerman Avenue and Thornden Park — where assaults and robberies have occurred this semester against students — will not be reported because the area is far off campus.

The new reporting standards responded to concerns that colleges were covering up crime by legally ignoring it near campuses.

An SU student discovered $60 in change missing from his apartment Monday afternoon, according to a police report.

The student realized that a burglar entered the apartment through the front door on the ninth floor of the building and stole $33 in change from a jug in his bed-

College Democrats elect new executive board

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Asst. News Editor

Syracuse University's chapter of the College Democrats elected a new executive board last week for the upcoming academic year.

Ben Riemer was chosen as president, Tim Schlittner as vice president, Jason Valock as treasurer, Mandy Breitenbach as secretary and Rachael Pearlstein as director of public relations.

Schlittner, a freshman political science major, said the College Democrats are committed to bringing the Democratic message to as many SU students as possible.

"When push comes to shove, I really believe that there is a lot of Democrats on campus that we can get to come out and vote," said Schlittner.

Christina Hinche, outgoing College Democrats president, said she is optimistic about the new board's abilities. Although several of the new members are freshmen, the board's enthusiasm will make up for any lack of experience, she added.

"They're absolutely fantastic," Hinche said. "It's going to be an exciting year for them and for student involvement in general with the elections coming up."

The new executive board also plans to build on the success of this year's organization and continue to bring many prominent Democrats to campus, Schlittner said.

Speakers such as first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, the Democratic candidate for New York state's seat in the U.S. Senate and the College Democrats' main speaker this year, will help to spread the message of the Democratic Party to students on campus and members of the community as a whole, he added.

Schlittner said Clinton is the clear choice for the Senate seat over her Republican rival, New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, Schlittner said.

"Hillary Clinton has been in Upstate New York talking about the issues New Yorkers care about," he said. "Rudy Giuliani has been running a campaign of mud slinging and a campaign of mockery.

The United States Senate is not a joke.

Additional goals for next year include increasing the organization's membership and helping local, state and national Democratic candidates get elected to office, Schlittner said.

The group will begin that push next Thursday when they bring Fran Gavin, the opponent of Syracuse's Republican U.S. Rep. Jim Walsh in the upcoming elections, to speak on the SU campus.

"The College Democrats are committed in this upcoming election to working with as many Democrats as possible," Schlittner said. "Any Democrat that is running for office, we're willing to work with."

not become a target.”

According to students, however, the police are quick to raid house parties and are never around when cars are being broken into.

“The police were here when we had a party, but when someone was climbing into our window they couldn’t be found,” said Jason Mintz, a junior political science major.

A burglary entered the front room of Mintz’s Ackerman Avenue apartment during the 1999 Fall Semester, stealing a VCR, Sony Playstation, Nintendo 64 and video games, he said.

Police attention is not being diverted by breaking up parties or answering noise complaints, Sweeney said.

Ivanck explained that Guzman and the other March 3 robbery victim on Ackerman Avenue failed to immediately report the incident because they both went to a party after their attack.

When they phoned in the report, the NPI officers’ shift had ended, he said.

The NPI officers were not on duty on the night of March 11, while the female student was brutally attacked in her apartment during Spring Break, Sweeney said.

“Ivanck said that there is a small group of students trying to blame the police for the recent crimes saying we are too busy breaking up parties,” Sweeney said. “This is simply not true.”

A safe haven

As some students on Ackerman Avenue question police officers’ ability to keep their area safe, long-time residents across the street share a different opinion.

The NPI program has improved the safety of life in the area, Ackerman Avenue resident Dan Ivanck said.

“Think it has improved from a year ago,” he said.

Despite the enlarged police presence in the area, residents feel the area is safe because of NPI’s added police presence in the neighborhood.

“They are there, the NPI guys are around all the time,” said Ivanck, who has lived on Ackerman Avenue since he was a student.

Residents feel the area’s safety has improved, students are still waking up to broken car windows and missing stereo.

Ostrom Avenue resident Pat McMahon said more violent attacks and robberies have been plaguing the area in recent years.

“These muggings are a new trend,” said Jannock, who has been in educational sales for a few years.

“Never have I heard of someone being attacked before the blue lights were installed, but nothing since that.”

The university installed blue lights at select on and off-campus locations as security points and suggested students, allowing them to contact SU’s Department of Public Safety in an emergency.

“Jannock has never been mugged or attacked, her home was recently burglarized — prompting her to install a security system, said the 30-year Ackerman Avenue resident.

“I would feel safe walking around my block, but will not venture down into the Westcott Street area.”

Community residents, the Syracuse Police Department’s Community Policing Office and SU developed the Neighborhood Policing Initiative to improve public safety and to give the neighborhood a better view of the area.

“With the NPI, Public Safety plays a limited role in monitoring the Euclid Avenue area because it falls outside of its jurisdiction,” said Robert Robinson, chief of Public Safety.

“As the Syracuse police respond to noise and alcohol ordinance violations involving students, they call Public Safety officers to the scene, he said.

“When our students are involved at least they see someone who knows them,” Robinson said. “A lot of times if we weren’t there the situation could be a lot worse and the kid would probably be hauled off to jail.”

Further involvement of Public Safety with the added patrols would help to increase the program’s range, Robinson said.

“It would be nice if we did get the authority to get involved as full partners in this endeavor because as opposed to one car it would be two cars,” he said.

Despite the recent robberies and attacks, Robinson said he envisions the program as being a successful monitoring system of the area, he said.

“It’s a perfect world and it’s not a perfect system,” Robinson said. “All things being equal you cannot be everywhere and I would never have the resources to do that.”

Community residents, the Syracuse Police Department’s Community Policing Office and SU developed the Neighborhood Policing Initiative in January 1999, five months prior to the Livingston Avenue incident, according to a Public Safety report on the program.

About 1,000 SU students clashed with police last spring during the annual Livingston block party. There were dozens of arrests and about $20,000 in damages.

“The NPI is not an attempt by the city or university to single out students, or punish students for the Livingston Avenue incident,” the report said. “The NPI is part of a much larger effort begun several years ago to improve overall living conditions in the university’s east neighborhood.”

The number of student cases investigated by police has dropped since the beginning of the 1999 Fall Semester from an average of seven per weekend to less than three, the report said.

Estimates taken before Spring Break show the number of students arrested by Syracuse police dropping from 62 in the fall to 20 as of March 17, the report said.

Although the number of cases reported by Syracuse police is decreasing, Guzman still points to his attack as an example of the lack of safety in the area.

The attack did not scare him away from attending the party, Guzman said, but he was nervous as he made the long walk back to South Campus later that night.

“walked home after the party,” Guzman said. “looked over my shoulder after every car passed by.”

"The real problems is that we teach economics completely separate from resources," he said. "We need to teach people the facts of life.

Burning oil emits carbon dioxide into the atmosphere, fueling the summer heat on the environmental agenda: global warming.

Hall started studying global warming 30 years ago, when the idea was new and scientists were more skeptical of its existence. But now, Hall sees a growing trend with more confidence because of the increased amounts of carbon dioxide and other "greenhouse gases" in the atmosphere, he said.

"The climate has always changed, but never so rapidly," Hall said about recent years.

Global warming is a trend that is likely to have large implications, Hall said. In Syracuse, winters are two weeks shorter than before the warming pattern. Though residents may consider it a positive change, negative consequences may follow. In time, disease carriers that require certain environmental conditions to exist, such as the Lyme disease tick, may creep northward to Central New York, Hall said.

Global warming is not going away either, Hall said. Carbon dioxide is not broken down once it is in the atmosphere, it accumulates instead. Now that more Americans rely on cars, there is little hope that carbon dioxide levels will go down.

And because more damaging gases such as sulfur, nitrogen, and ozone, the ozone layer is being destroyed. Residents of Australia and northern Canada, where large areas of the ozone layer have been destroyed, have experienced increased numbers of skin cancer cases, for instance, because people, like polar bears in northern Canada, Hall said.

As mother's day is for mothers, Earth Day is a chance to appreciate the earth. The Student Environmental Action Committee, Students Anti-Anthropogenic Reasoning Organization, the Student Organization on Organized Labor, aims to heighten local awareness with a day in Thaidene Park.

From noon to 6 p.m. the festival will feature environmental workshops as well as music from Moos Bolega and Gordon Stone Band.

"Earth Day has been my idea for years," said Earth Day coordinator. Tevelin, a senior, has been involved in Earth Day celebrations. Tevelin considers now a crucial time for the environment, he said. Americans are facing the threat of the pre-ecologically savvy 1980s, realizing the limit of resources and taking notice of the future, he said.

"We don't have to worry about the planet. The planet will renew itself once (humans) are all gone," he said. "We have to worry about us."

"We have been committed to the principle that this state should not pass a law which per-were able to figure out who was important," Soults said. "We kept Cornell from having any opportunity to recover offensively. Freshman goalie Carla Gigon started in her fourth game of the season. She held off the Cornell attack by recording nine saves, tying her mark posted in a victory against Boston College last week. One of her early saves came at the 18:14 mark, as she stopped a Colacicco shot to keep Syracuse ahead 4-2.

That domination continued to keep Cornell scoreless, giving Syracuse an 11-4 advantage at halftime.

But entering the second half, the Big Red burst out the gate by scoring three consecutive goals almost immediately.

"We got a little rattled at the beginning of that half," Healy said. "But once we pressured them out hard, doubled over and then they started turning the ball over."

As SU head coach Lisa Miller pointed out, Healy's ability to control such situations has helped improve the team's play.

"Going into the game we knew what we wanted," Soults said. "We got a little stuck on our heels but then we picked up our momentum and were able to get it done."

Freshman goalie Carla Gigon started in her fourth game of the season. She held off the Cornell attack by recording nine saves, tying her mark posted in a victory against Boston College last week. One of her early saves came at the 18:14 mark, as she stopped a Colacicco shot to keep Syracuse ahead 4-2.

That domination continued to keep Cornell scoreless, giving Syracuse an 11-4 advantage at halftime.

But entering the second half, the Big Red burst out the gate by scoring three consecutive goals almost immediately.

"We got a little rattled at the beginning of that half," Healy said. "But once we pressured them out hard, doubled over and then they started turning the ball over."

As SU head coach Lisa Miller pointed out, Healy's ability to control such situations has helped improve the team's play.

Bill Tierney: "Joe Ceglia is one heck of a defender. He's the best checker on the move in the nation." SU head coach John Desko owns equal praise for Sims.

"You have to know where he is," Desko said, "because he can hurt you in so many ways.

The Orangemen (8-1) also know the Tigers (7-1) run thin in scoring options after Sims.

Sophomore attackman B.J. Frager has netted 22 goals while junior attack Matt Streibel assists on nearly two goals per contest. Princeton's top five scorers have combined for 100 points this season. The Orangemen's already stellar dodging has scored 172 points.

"It's tough to talk, but we're playing as a team," Desko said. "We play a totally different style. With Syracuse, you always expect a little less vigor Sunday, as we have to play a doubleheader Saturday-Sunday against two quality teams."
BREAKDOWN continued from page 20
and a Cornell timeout.
After a goal by Jamiee Reynolds put Cornell back to within two, SU junior captain Katrina Hable scored her 100th career goal on a falling-down shot. The tally started a 6-1 Orangewomen run that ended with another Hable goal with 8.3 seconds remaining in the half.
SU held an 11-4 lead at halftime but came out sloppy in the second half.
In the opening minutes, the Orangewomen offense hit a wall. Shots by Nealy and Stacey Brown went wide, and the ball was disposed of by the defense.
Cornell sophomore Ginny Miles started the second-half scoring barrage with a shot past Gigon 2:25 into the half. Reynolds connected for a Cornell goal on the very next possession.
The Big Red broke down the Syracuse defense again a minute later as a shot by Miles trickled past Gigon and into the net, cutting the SU lead to four.
"Cornell got a little pumped up, and I think we got a little rattled," Gigon said. "We didn't score right away on offense, and they had the first couple towards the goal. That got us shaky."
SU countered with two free-position goals, and Brady picked up two more during a two-minute spurt to push the lead to 15-8 with 12:30 remaining. That goal, her sixth of the contest, knocked Giancola out of the game.
"My team showed up very scared and very tentative," Graap said. "Unfortunately, my goalkeeper decided to have her worst game of the season. That's not like us, as normally our goalie and our defense are our strengths."
Brady continued her campaign for All-America honors with the strong performance. Two of the goals came in the free-position set, with Brady spending much of her time battling through the Cornell defense.
"We was getting beaten up in the interior all day long," SU head coach Lisa Miller said. "She handled it and still managed. A lot of players wouldn't be able to take that kind of beating and still respond the way she does."
Brady & Co. head back to the Carrier Dome on Saturday to face No. 10 Boston University at 2:30 p.m. The Orangewomen swept BU in two games last season, including an overtime win in the ECAC Tournament semifinals.
But after the Cornell victory, the Orangewomen move a step further towards the team's goal — the school's first-ever NCAA Tournament berth.
"It continues to put us in a position where if we keep away and do what we have to do, we're still in a position to make the tournament," Miller said. "To lose (Wednesday) would be devastating. We've beaten an opponent that is right behind us in the polls, and we beat them convincingly. We're playing well right now."

Linebackers stand out as SU's strength

The Syracuse defense is far ahead of the offense at this point in the spring, and much of the success stems from the trio of returning linebackers.

Morlon Greenwood is the vet of the group, placing third on the team in tackles last season. Bullock, a first-round pick with the Tennessee Titans, Johnson, who surfaced in the Orange defense as a junior last season after Vemon Banks was ruled ineligible to play at SU last season, is ready to add starting linebacker to his resume.

He earned Big East Special Team Player of the Week the following five-tackle performance in the Carrier Dome against Michigan — the first player to win such an honor without touching the football.

Now at linebacker, Johnson made tackles all over the field in Saturday’s scrimmage and even picked off a Troy Nunez pass.

“We’re progressing, slowly but surely,” defensive coordinator Chris Rippon said. “Making strides in getting chemistry together, which is very important. I’d say we’re finally starting to finish it. Can we put it all together?”

Sophomore Clifton Smith, however, will anchor the Orange defense. Smith has taken over as the leader and signal-caller with high energy. It shows up in scrimmages and even picked off a Troy Nunez pass.

“I’d like to think it’s not a problem,” Rippon said. “I think a lot of the things we’ve been working on, we’re starting from square one with him. He hit the ground running and picked it up early.”

The latter corrallled one of quarterback Chad Elliott’s roll-out passes.

Some of the drops are tough catches, but others were catchable and should have been caught.

“I’d like to think it’s not a problem, but if it continues it will be a problem,” Goldman said. “I think a lot of the things that were dropped were not catches, so we’ll give them the benefit of the doubt. If it continues, it will be dealt with as a problem, and we will do more catching drills.”

Surprise, surprise

Drawing attention during the Saturday scrimmage on the grass of Ben Schwartzwalder Field were a pair of Orange who did not see much time on the field last year.

Keen Walker, making the switch from tailback to defensive back, had a huge play. In the opening drills, he blocked a Mike Shafer punt, coming in untouched from the left side. The sophomore’s last blocked kick came in September against Central Michigan.

Walker continued to show his worth. Off a corner lateral, he plucked a nine-yard pass from quarterback J.R. Johnson.

Walker’s biggest play came off a bad snap. After Anderson fumbled the center exchange, Walker gobbled up the loose pigskin and scampered 25 yards the other way for the defense’s only score.

“I think a lot of the things he hasn’t learned,” defensive end Josh Thomas also showed versatility. Redshirted last year, he has shown power and quickness in rushing the passer and the ability to drop into coverage.

The lucky, 6-foot-6 Orchard Park native stuck out one of his picks, tipped a Mike Williams pass in the air and recovered perfectly.

Thomas, who carries a 3.7 GPA, nearly pulled off the same stunt in the title series. This time, dropping back two yards into the secondary, he deflected a throw from Tony Roberts.

“Josh is a young guy who is learning the position,” defensive ends coach Jerry Azzinaro said. “He’s a smart guy and I’m carousing about Josh is he is a smart guy. He’s a big play guy who plays with high energy. It shows up in scrimmages, but he’s got a long way to go.”

ITHACA — On paper, the score should have been close. Both No. 15 Cornell and No. 13 Syracuse owned identical 8-3 records and were vying for berths in next month’s NCAA Women’s Lacrosse Tournament.

But Lauren Brady’s seven-goal afternoon ended any chance at a Central New York barnburner, as the Orangewomen scored Cornell 17-9 on Wednesday afternoon at Carnes Field.

Syracuse broke open the game late with a 6-2 scoring run during a second half that Cornell head coach Jenny Graap said contained “defensive breakdowns.”

“They out hustled us,” Graap said. “They got more draws controls. They got more groundballs. They started beating us in almost every aspect of the game.”

The Cornell attack dominated possession early, and the Syracuse defense forced the Big Red shooters open shots at freshman goalkeeper Casey Powell.

“At first, we weren’t really stepping up to the ball,” said Brady, who set a career high with her seven goals.

“We were just letting them pass it around and move the ball, taking some time off the clock, which is what they wanted to do to slow our game down.”

After trading goals for the first nine minutes, Syracuse started a second-half scoring spree. Chris Lindsey ordered the SU defense to apply more pressure and place their sticks in the faces of the Cornell attackers.

The pressure stifled the Big Red offense, and the Orangewomen forced two consecutive turnovers, leading to easy Syracuse transition goals by junior Karen Healy and freshman Kim Wayne.

With 18:06 remaining in the first half, the Orangewomen continued its tight defense with a block by Gigon leading to a Healy fast break. Healy fired the ball past Cornell goalkeeper Carrie Giancola for a 5-2 SU lead.

ITHACA — Taking advantage of your opponent’s mistakes and making good on those opportunities separates a win from a loss.

And that’s exactly what the Orangewomen did Wednesday afternoon at Carrier Field.

The defense particularly stood out in No. 13 Syracuse’s 17-9 trouncing of No. 15 Cornell.

The defense was stingy — highlighted by the solid play of attacker Karen Healy and defender Carrie Soult.

Both applied pressure to the Big Red (8-4) early.

Healy’s persistence against Cornell midfielders Carolyn Colacicco and Melissa Hample unearthed a surprising display of defense.

The junior never lost a step from Colacicco, causing the midfielder to struggle near the net as she failed to tie the game at two with 22:57 remaining.

Joe Ceglia, the guy who can run and run — and then run some more — was tiring.

After all, Syracuse played Penn the previous day, and now the Orangemen were in the fourth overtime of an epic against Princeton, with the score tied at 14.

Ceglia and the Orangemen were treating the 6,194 fans in the Carrier Dome on April 25, 1999, to a dandy.

Two great teams, one great game. And an even better ending.

Princeton midfielder Josh Sims, arguably the best midfielder in the nation, dodged past Ceglia, probably the best defensive mid in the nation. Sims eluded two more Orangemen and planted a shot past goalie Bob Mullan for his third goal of the afternoon and the Tigers’ OT winner.

Less than a month later, Ceglia made amends, holding Sims pointless in SU’s 7-5 NCAA Tournament victory.

On Sunday, the two will knock down the curtain.

Three burglaries on Comstock Avenue last week may be related, according to Syracuse police reports.

In two separate incidents, an unidentified person kicked open the doors to apartments belonging to Syracuse University students. The third incident involved an unidentified person breaking into a car parked in a lot on the same street.

Police noted on reports that the incidents were "similar." Friday night, an unidentified person broke into an apartment on the 100 block of Comstock Avenue and stole more than $100 in change, said Aaron Virgen, police officer.

Electrician injured in Bird library fire

Staff Reports

Dan Dienhoffer, an employee of Emerald Electrical Contractors Inc. of Syracuse, was injured by a fire in a Bird Library electrical closet Thursday morning, said Kevin Morrow, SU spokesman.

Dienhoffer, a 39-year-old resident of East Syracuse, suffered second and third-degree burns to his face, chest and arms, Morrow said.

The electrician is currently being held at University Hospital, 750 E. Adams St., and is in fair condition, according to hospital officials.

The fire was contained on the fourth floor — the fine arts section — in Room 418, which is located on the southeast corner of the building, Morrow said.

None of the fine arts materials in the section were damaged by the fire, head librarian Peter Graham said.

The fire began when Dienhoffer slipped a wire through a connector and the wire hit a hot nut bolt, Morrow said.

"It was an accident," Morrow added. "It caused a flash and a fire."

Argument ensued Monday night as the Student Government Association Assembly discussed the location of one polling table for this week’s referenda voting, including New York Public Interest Research Group funding.

The Assembly debated periodically throughout Monday night’s meeting with about ten State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Foresty students on whether to set up a table on their campus.

The Assembly later decided that a table would be manned, giving ESF students an accessible location to vote.

Former ESF Undergraduate Student Association President Paige Moore said she expected a table after she met with SGA members to "open the lines of communication between the two schools," during the fall of 1998.

But according to an SGA elections policy, referenda may not be conducted in academic buildings, said Chris Ryan, SGA elections commissioner.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Six youths shot at National Zoo yesterday when a dispute es- culated among visitors to one of Washington's premier tourist attractions, under a day dedicated to celebrating the Asian-American holiday.

One of the six, an 11-year-old boy, was killed and in extremely grave condition at Children's Hospital. A police source said he was dead but that was being kept on life support so his organs could be donates. Earlier, police had said he was dead. The other youths' wounds were not regarded as life-threatening.

Several of the shots apparently were fired several hours earlier after one of the 12 victim center, D.C. police said. They set shooting also broke out between two groups of youths. D.C. Police Chief Charles Beck said other police officers were trying to expel youths from the grounds when police said they were at risk.

Police described the suspects as looking for a black teenager whose hair might have been black. He was wearing a black jacket and black shirt with baggy blue jeans. Police said he was seen heading south on Connecticut Avenue.

Students across nation call for WRC involvement

By Ashleigh Graf  Staff Writer

Dressed in Hawaiian shirts and sunglasses, a group of Harvard University students in December stormed Harvard Square’s Gap and Abercrombie and Fitch stores, protesting their alleged use of sweatshops. About 90 miles west of the Syracuse University campus, a group of University of Rochester students had been camping out last week on their quad in tents made of cardboard — similar to recent demonstrations by SU protesters.

The Rochester and Harvard students are nothing college administrators to join the Worker Rights Consortium, a group urging clothing corporations to disclose the whereabouts and employees conditions of their factories.

The FLA grants the facilities making its members’ apparel two to three years to improve employee conditions, according to its Web site at www.workersrights.org. The association will tag the apparel that meets its standards and those that do not pass will be stored in a mystery report.

The WRC, however, will leave it up to the unions or governments to take action once a factory is caught operating a sweatshop, according to its Web site. The consortium is concerned only with university apparel, whereas the FLA monitors other textile manufacturers in addition to its collegiate members.

As the WRC works with employees and non-government organizations to encourage corporations to release factory information, a code will be implemented into the monitoring system to ensure that if a factory is caught operating a sweatshop, it will be reported.

University tug-of-war

As the debate rages over the two labor groups, SU Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw questions the effectiveness of the FLA. “In the last analysis, I have no idea what the FLA is doing, and I have no idea what the WRC is doing,” he said.

For the past year and a half, President Bill Clinton and his school’s membership in the Fair Labor Association.

The FLA is an organization with a mission similar to the WRC, but it involves corporations in monitoring the factories that produce their own members’ apparel.

Sam Brown, executive director of the FLA, calls the most recent criticism of his organization a “diversion” from the real issue — sweatshops. “It is just going to tell every person that there are conditions that we know about,” Brown said.

For the past year, students nationwide have been using quotas and administration buildings to protest their treatment of the rights of workers, the Web site said.

As colleges join the consortium, apparel contractors like Nike will have to change the conditions of their facilities if they are caught operating sweatshop conditions, the Web site added.

Wednesday morning on the 300 block of Comstock Avenue, an unidentified person burglarized a car belonging to an SU student, according to a police report.

The money was taken from a standard check and found a large crowd of people pushing and shoving outside of the bar, the report said. People flooded into the street and blocked traffic, the report added.

Police ordered the crowd to disperse and most obeyed except for a small group of people, the report said. Among them was Wells, who told police to "tuck off" when asked to leave, the report added.

When police ordered Wells to put his hands behind his head, he ran away, the report said. An officer pursued him and arrested him about 30 feet from the bar, the report added.

Wells declined to comment. He was released later Saturday night and found his front door open, the report said. The residents told police they were not sure if the door had been locked, the report added.

The computer, along with an SU class ring and $30 in coins, was missing from one of the bedrooms, the report said.

On Sunday, an unidentified person broke into the Ali-brandi, Catholic Center, 110 Walnut Place, and stole $800 in computer equipment, according to a police report. The center does not have an alarm system and many people have keys to the facilities, the report said. Facility personnel could not be reached for comment.

Cuban boy makes poor political pawn

A pint-sized Cuban boy stretches across the Atlantic Ocean between the United States and Cuba.

poor political pawn

Cuban boy makes wishes to keep Elian in the United States is stormed the house and snatched six-year-old Elian from the floor of a closet.

Attorney General Janet Reno's attempts to reconcile Elian Gonzalez's Miami family members with the boy's father — reveals the boy's own brand of bland television program — cacophonous mantra that is as tasteless and as witty as built by a media mogul tent on brainwashing the entire world with their own brand of television programming. They make their own rules like a bunch of sexual psychotics with their "tomahawk chip", changing a coonspicious manner act of a lifetime, just as it was when Atlanta-sports groupie Hammer's last recorded by Lombardi.

Oh, yeah, and last week they gave a bigot a standing ovation.

Good of John Rocker came back from his two-week suspension greeted by thunderous cheers from the Braves faithful. This winter, the Atlanta pitcher showed us in an interview with Sports Illustrated that he is a racist and homophobic. He lacked the compassion and tolerance necessary to be a human. He even called a black teammate a "fat moron".

But because he can throw a round, white, leather-covered sphere really hard, all's forgiven by management and fans alike.

At least in Atlanta.

New York Mets fans are preparing for Rocker's return to Shea Stadium. The Big Apple crowd pians John Rocker Battery Night for June 30. They will pack their Excitement helping to pelt Rocker and show that true fans have no one except his close friends and family to shuwe. If he did- n't want anything to go to print, he could have kept his mouth shut.

We should actually be thankful that Rocker spoke his mind, why should I own my 8-year-old nephew wearing a Rockin jersey if the pitcher's a jockster?

Rocker has a right to privacy, but fans are entitled to know who plays off the field. I'm not talking about whether or not a player snores or what his undergarment preferences are, I'm talking about their personalities and hobbies. Since fans buy tickets to the games and purchase all sorts of merchandise, we deserve some "backstage" info.

We're rooting for more than the players on the field. We're rooting for family men and women. We're rooting for players coming from broken homes. We're rooting for athletes coming from broken homes. We're rooting for family men and women. We're rooting for players coming from broken homes. We're rooting for family men and women. We're rooting for players coming from broken homes.

Everyone loves a winner and sometimes victory comes with a cost, but how far are we going to go?

Students are really taking a lead," said Laura Bogle, a representative from Central New York Labor-Religion Coalition. "It really is a moral issue."

"Students are standing up and holding their administration accountable for workers around the world who are being exploited."

Students from SU and the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry have been urging SU Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw and other university officials for months to join the Worker Rights Consortium.

The WRC is an organization that investigates corporations who are suspected of utilizing sweatshops for manufacturing purposes.

"We're just trying to keep the pressure on," said SCOOL member Patrick O'Leary, a sophomore in The College of Arts and Sciences, of Monday's protest.

Students, however, maintain that the FLA has a conflict of interest because the corporations it monitors have influence in what areas of their production are exam-

"Over 40 universities, including Cornell University, have joined the Worker Rights Consortium," Bogle said. "Why would such a good, prestigious school as Syracuse University want to associate itself with child sweatshop labor?"

Nike, a company that manages much of SU's apparel production, allegedly takes advantage of sweatshop labor.

"SU has blood on his hands and we're trying to wash those hands," SCOOL member Sam Al-

That incident was just one example of the unsafe environments workers around the world must deal with, union members said.

"We have solidarity," Gewanter said. "We work for workers' justice."

would be no changes that would be really effective," she said.

Finer details
The FLA currently has a membership of 130 colleges, Brown said. Its monitoring is not only for colleges, but also retail and footwear companies, he added.

Companies that have agreed to the organization's standards stated in the FLA Charter Agreement, include Nike, Kathie Lee Gifford, Levi Strauss and Co. and Patagonia, he added.

"This is the first time that apparel companies have said they would work down to factory levels," Brown said. "There are a lot of factories we are trying to sort out."

For the "initial implementation" period, lasting two to three years, monitoring of 80 percent of the company's facilities will be done by officials unrelated to the corporations, according to the charter.

The number of facilities monitored will then be decreased to between 15 to 25 percent of the factories, depending on the company's performance during the initial implementation, the charter said.

"We have demanding that all factories disclose," he said. "A lot of movement was made."

The board includes two student representatives, Wissink and Student Government Association President Jamal James.

"We have said as a group, we will look at the WRC," Wissink said. "If we want to be produced in a safe, fair, humane environment." As the battle continues between the two organizations, SU students said they vow to help the fight against the FLA.

"We have to join the WRC to keep an open dialogue on this issue. Cornell Vice President for Student Affairs Henrik Dullea said. "We feel that the FLA has made very good progress in monitoring sweatshop conditions around the world," Dullea said. "We will see what the WRC does."

Too much red tape, not enough human rights.
As administrators refuse to respond to this campus concern, the students are determined to continue their plight, he said.

"We're hoping to keep the pressure on," Scirto said.

At the University of Pennsylvania, the Penn Students Against Sweatshops surrounded themselves with chicken wire on the quad earlier this month and sewed clothes in shifts while handing out sweatshop information, said Anna Roberts, a co-coordinator of PEAS.

At the beginning of the school year, the group assembled a reverse fashion show, in which students took off their clothing to rally for full public disclosure by U. Penn clothing manufacturers, she said.

Although U. Penn did leave the FLA, they have yet to join the WRC.

Cornell University, one of the founding members of the FLA, joined the WRC at the end of March while retaining their membership in the FLA.

It is important for the administration and student activists to keep an open dialogue on this issue, Cornell Vice President for University Relations Henrik Dullea said.

"We feel that the FLA has made very good progress in monitoring sweatshop conditions around the world," Dullea said. "We will see what the WRC does."

"ESF only has academic buildings so they should be an exception to that," said Manning, a senior environmental studies major.

A voting station was available at ESPs Marshall Auditorium for last fall's SGA presidential elections, but only 30 students went there to vote, Board of Elections Chairman Matthew Oates said.

"That's the only time there's been a table there," he added. "It's like not allowing SU should be good enough for everyone else."

SGF students do not eat in campus residence halls. Manning said they felt it was "absurd" to have a polling table available in one academic building and not others.

"Let's have fairness," said Assemblyman Joe Sauer, who is also the College Republicans chairman. "I have to drag my ass down the College Republicans chair and the rest of the students at the appropriate department."

Some Assemblymembers said they felt it was "absurd" to have a polling table available in one academic building and not others. "Let's have fairness," said Assemblyman Joe Sauer, who is also the College Republicans chairman. "I have to drag my ass down anyone else.

"sga vice comptroller Mery Viera said. The motion was also approved, 8-6. Polls will be open from 12 p.m. to 4 p.m. today.

"It's ridiculous to argue about a polling table that there's not operating a voting station on ESP's campus, "it's like not allowing 1,200 students to vote," said Ronne Bosch, an ESF junior environmental science major.

"Our students use NYPIRG and we feel like we're being excluded," Bosch added. "It's just a standing policy that Nyprg will receive its funds, the referenda will decide if NYPIRG will be good enough for everyone else."

"Let's have fairness," said Assemblyman Joe Sauer, who is also the College Republicans chairman. "I have to drag my ass down to Schine and what's good for me and the rest of the students at SU should be good enough for everyone else."

"SGA students deserve to vote, but it's just a standing policy that they not take place in academic buildings," said Oates, a senior engineering and computer science major.

Burns said that the additional table will not make a difference in the vote's turnout. "ESF students apparently have not voted in the past and I don't think very many students will turn out this time either," Burns said.

In other SGA news:

After serving six sessions with SGA, Parliamentarian Jonathan M. Taylor was honored Monday night with an award in his home.

The award, proposed in a bill presented by Assemblyman Eric Seltzer and recognizing distinguished service in the organization, was unanimously approved. "It makes sense to have the most dedicated Assemblymember's name on the award," Vice President Arish Gajjar said.

Assemblyman Joe Sauer, a freshman biology major, agreed that Taylor served as a model representative of the association.

Taylor, a five-year architecture student, has served as both recorder and parliamentarian. He said that the honor came as a surprise. Forty-first Assembly Parliamentarian Jonathan Engel, a senior political science major, said Taylor accomplished many things during his time in the Assembly.

Although many of the things Taylor did — including breaking into a former president's office — were controversial, they were irrelevant to his service to the SU community, said Engel, who served in the Assembly for two years with Taylor. "You can't please everyone in politics," Engel said. "Jonathan wasn't out to please everyone. He crossed a lot of people, but he also helped keep SGA together. He tried to keep everyone on track to their goal of helping the students."

going to go in there and make it perfectly clear that I am not an expert on this issue, I am merely a student who has been involved with this for two years now."

The meetings are in response to student concerns regarding SU selling goods manufactured in sweatshops, Morrow said.

SCOOL, the organization leading the campus sweatshop protests, wants to generate an open dialogue about the issue and favors the meetings, said member Brian McNamara, a senior political science and economics major.

Group members, however, voiced concerns about the university’s motives for the meetings. SCOOL fears that SU is using the meetings to “quiet down” the issue and stall in making a decision until the end of the year, McNamara said.

Since Unger is a college student, the board may not take his concerns as seriously as they will Durkee, he added.

Both Unger and Durkee will attend a breakfast roundtable during their visits, in which they will gather privately with campus media to discuss reasons the university should support their organizations, Morrow said.

The final decision, however, will be Shaw’s, Morrow said.
Flame-throwing Springer shoots SU past Tigers

PRINCETON, N.J. — In three previous games with college opponents this season, Syracuse had gotten at least one goal from senior midfielder Tim Byrnes. The Orangemen were 1-1 in those games, and the goalie was Trevor Desko.

But on Sunday, the Orangemen (10-1) needed all of Byrnes’ goals to hold off Princeton (9-2) and win 16-14 at the Class of 1952 Stadium. Syracuse jumped to a 3-0 advantage in the first quarter and took a 10-2 lead by halftime. Then watch his shot. The one that hit Tierney — hard. It was a combination of a lot of things,” he said, but I don’t really know what it is.”

It’s a combination of a lot of things,” he said, but I don’t really know what it is.”

He didn’t hesitate and ripped his shots full-speed at which SU great Casey Powell clocked 102 mph, the Orangemen had already built a 6-1 lead before Springer tallied his first goal of the day, a 20-yard rocket with 14:02 remaining in the first quarter and took a 10-2 lead by halftime. To fire away. The Orangemen saved their season and had a pair from classmate Devin D’Arcangelo.

The Tigers’ sliding defense focused on the ball, Desko said, allowing Springer open looks. Whatever the method, it is a maddening thing to do. One of the greatest ever? “I feel bad for you. You face it every day during the season,” said legal.; "I don’t really know what it is.”

PRINCETON, N.J. — Imagine, for a second, Mike Zupcic without his freeway-like lacrosse uniform.

For a shot the sophomore used to score a career-high five goals Sunday and propel the Orangemen to a dominant 16-4 victory against Sunday and propel the Orangemen past the Tigers.

When you get a guy who can score from the outside, “He’s a great player, he’s a great shooter. He’s one of the best from the outside,” said legal.; "I don’t really know what it is.”

The praise for Springer doesn’t end there. "He’s going to be, sure," Tierney said. “That shot is ridiculous, isn’t it?” He said, "but I don’t really know what it is.”

Nobody stepped up their game. This is the most unselfish team I’ve ever been on. Syracuse,” the Orangemen’s second assist in the 12-goal triumph its premier effort, said, “but I don’t really know what it is.”

SU plays near-perfect ball at Princeton

PRINCETON, N.J. — Bzzzzzzzh! The snow on the television screen finally disappears as we return to our regularly schedule program...

“Welcome back to the Syracuse Men’s Lacrosse Week in Review!” says the talking-head, dressed in an outdated suit and white sneakers. “This is where we go over the highlights, the lowlights, the bright lights, the night lights — just kidding, folk! — of the No. 5 Orangemen.”

A clip of Mike Springer’s 100-mph-plus shot rolls...

“Here’s a great shot by Mike Springer!”

Another of Ryan Powell, who could finish his SU career as the school’s all-time leading scorer, passes through the airwaves. Powell dodges three Princeton defenders and sets up Springer with a picture-perfect feed...

“Ryan sure knows how to throw that ball!”

Joe Ceglia winds up and whacks the Tigers’ Josh Sims with a vicious stick check...

“Whoa! — That’s gotta hurt!”

Pause it, please. This could happen. Very easily.

Anyone can be guilty. Broadcasters, fans — whoever. It’s a veritable who’s who of SU fans.

Here’s the crime:

Overlooking the story of this season’s Syracuse men’s lacrosse team.

“Yeah, yeah, they’re No. 5 in the country. And they’re the predominant spring sport. They’ve got six national championships, scads of All-Americans and legions of fans. But look deeper and you’ll see something.

This team doesn’t have a flaw.

And it showed in SU’s 16-4 victory here against Princeton on Sunday afternoon.

The Orangemen ran their offense without a blemish. Their defense contained the Princeton attackers like INS agents chasing Elian Gonzalez. Everyone frowned upon even the most careless mistakes. Billy St. George lobbed a poor pass cross-field and out of bounds late in the first quarter. SU head coach John Desko, who in the past has displayed a negative vertical jump, Vince Carter-ed into the cool Jersey afternoon. Upon landing, he grabbed his SU hat and slammed it to the ground.

It was a turnover. At the time, SU led 4-1 against the No. 4 team in the country.

Nothing less than perfection is expected.

Of course, this is Syracuse, the team with so many accolades. But these Orangemen are a different breed.

Their practice habits are compulsive and their on-field demeanor aggressive. Save an after-game tailgate with a few beers, they eat, sleep and breathe lacrosse.

It shows when they play.

The Orangemen are not just lacrosse players. They are students of the game, and their teachers are among the best in the sport.

Simply put, Kevin Donahue is an offensive genius.

A few weeks back, after practice, he stood in the Carrier Dome with a clipboard, his creativity spilling on to a piece of paper via his pen.

He set up an offensive scheme and showed Donnie. The head man just nodded, seemingly incredulous to what the 12th-year assistant said.

The players seemed to understand. They came out and rapped No. 3 Loyola 16-9.

Powell scored four goals and sprung two.

“Wow!” says the broadcaster.

“These were fiascomatic shots!”

He failed to mention the five or six passes that set it up.

Typical SU lacrosse. And the same thing happened against Princeton.

Marshall Abrams, a close defender, pulled a groundball from the faceoff. He ran upfield and passed it to Powell on the right wing. He fed it to Liam Banks, who gave it to Springer from about seven yards out.

Trevor Tierney dove and made an unbelievable save on Springer’s shot, much to the delight of the 4,743 fans at Class of 1982 Stadium.

Attack over and possession down.

Nope. Not with this team.

Powell stole an outlet pass, streaked upfield and backed a behind-the-back pass to Springer. He deposited an underhand shot past Tierney, giving SU an 8-2 lead.

The Orangemen know when to be aggressive, when to sit back, when to go for the kill. They know when to throw the check, when to substitute midfielders, when to take a shot.

The savviness pays off.

The close defensemen — Abrams, St. George and Glazan — play like they’ve been together four years. They play efficient help defense, double-team when necessary and intimidate with checks.

The attackmen — Banks, Powell and Springer — could all be All-Americans. They cut at the right times, feed the right people and play.

Donahue’s offenses like it should be.

The midfield buffers the front and back, stabilizing SU and dictating the team’s pace.

And Bob Mulhigan, the Orangemen’s stalwart standing 40 yards from midfield, protects his cage with energy and emotion. His eyes glance everywhere, seeing the game a millisecond slower than everyone else.

The components are there. So is the execution. Nothing is missing.

Except a remote control. The Orangemen would sure come in handy when the highlights roll on TV.

Just sit there and appreciate what you’re seeing. The regularly scheduled program will be a lot more interesting.

Third-quarter rally spoils Quakers’ upset bid

BY DAVE CURTIS
Sports Editor

PRINCETON, N.J. — The players denied it all week, but the pundits expected it and the head coach even resigned himself to its occurrence.

Syracuse's prophesied letdown came under overcast skies Saturday afternoon against the underdog Penn Quakers at Class of 1952 Stadium on Princeton University's campus. But much to Penn's chagrin, the letdown lasted just 30 minutes.

No. 2 SU scored six consecutive goals in the third quarter to bust open a 3-3 game and rolled to a 9-4 victory before 4,412 patrons.

The Orangemen dominated the first half in every statistical column. They fired seven more shots than the Quakers, grabbed six of eight face-offs and retrieved twice as many groundballs as its opponent.

Penn sophomore John Carrol's 13 saves kept the game tied at three and delivered a nervous tension to the Syracuse sideline.

"It did feel a little bit like Cornell," said head coach John Desko, referring to the Orangemen's loss against the Big Red earlier this season. "We had a lot of turnovers, and we weren't shooting the ball as well as we wanted to."

Earlier in the week, Desko hinted his team might struggle with the Quakers, looking ahead to No. 4 Princeton the next afternoon.

The third quarter, however, refuted the coach's claim.

The Orangemen started the second half one man down and took two more penalties early in the third. But the SU defense shut out the Quakers (3-0) for three minutes on the extra-man, part of a 22:08 stretch in which Penn failed to score.

In the midst of the stand, Syracuse's attack began to execute with dazzling efficiency by shooting high on Carroll. The Orangemen scored six times in a shade over seven minutes to stomp Penn's upset bid.

Mike Springer, playing just a short New Jersey Transit ride from his home in Ridge-wood, N.J., tallied his third goal of the game with 10:33 left in the third to put SU up 4-3.

Two minutes later, Ryan Powell beat a helpless Rob Mulligan backstopped by 32 minutes.

"We were a little sluggish in the first half and wanted to turn up the intensity," SU goalkeeper Rob Mulligan said. "It's an ongoing theme with this team. We'll be struggling and go on one of those runs."

The charge continued 52 seconds later with SU on a man-up. Midfielder Matt Caione whipped a pass to a wide-open Powell, who beat a helpless Carroll.

Orangeman Chris Cercy then won the face-off, and Springer scored his fourth and final goal with 8:03 left in the tumultuous third.

Saturday's effort bolstered Cercy's cause as the premier face-off specialist in the country. Winning nearly 70 percent of his draws through 11 games this campaign, the junior short-stick won nine of the contest's first 11 face-offs and helped SU keep possession on its game-breaking spurt.

When the Quakers took the ball, Syracuse's defense stuffed them. Penn scored just once in eight extra-man opportunities, and that goal served as its lone tally in the game's final 32 minutes.

Only Towson, which managed three goals in a March 25 loss, posted fewer scores against the Orangemen.

"We went into halftime and people were saying we had to do a better job defensively," Desko said. "But you look at the scoreboard and they only had three goals. We started making our shots in the second half and we were fortunate Rob played as well as he did."

The junior Mulligan backstopped the SU defense with 16 saves, nine coming after halftime. His best stops scattered throughout the contest, from a one-on-one save against Todd Minerley in the second quarter to a point-blank rejection of Peter Janney with less than four minutes remaining.

"He made saves he shouldn't have made," Caione said of his teammate. "Sometimes I'm sitting on the sideline and someone will take a shot, and I won't believe Robby saved it."

Orr leaves Orangemen to take position at Siena

Louis Orr, a Syracuse men's basketball assistant coach for the past four seasons, accepted the head coaching position at Siena College on Monday.

Orr served as SU head coach Jim Boeheim's No. 2 assistant coach, working with the forwards and recruiting current Orangemen such as DeShaun Wards and recruiting current Orangemen such as DeShaun Wards and working with the forwards and recruiting current Orangemen such as DeShaun Wards and the New York Knicks.

The former SU assistant inherits a Siena program that sits near the top of the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference each year. Head coach Paul Hewitt, who left Siena to take a job at Georgia Tech, brought the Saints to the NCAA Tournament in 1999. Last year's team finished 24-9, bowing out to Penn State in the second round of the NIT.

At a press conference Monday in Loudonville, Orr said he leaves SU with a heavy heart.

Orr helped lead Syracuse to Sweet 16 appearances in 1997-98 and this past season, when the Orangemen started 19-0 and finished the year at 26-6.

The departure creates a gap on the SU coaching staff. Longtime lieutenant Bernie Fine serves as Boeheim's top assistant, and Mike Hopkins fills the third full-time assistant spot.

Before Orr left, only he and Fine could join Boeheim in off-campus recruiting. If Boeheim promotes Hopkins, it will allow the Californian to track players on the road.

Syracuse holds off Terriers to extend streak

BY KEVIN LEITZELL

It's not exactly Syracuse versus Virginia in men's lacrosse, but it's getting close.

The Syracuse-Boston University women's lacrosse rivalry is now a heated one, with SU sweeping BU in two one-goal games last year.

This season's showdown proved no different, as the Orange women knocked off the Terriers 6-5 on Saturday afternoon at the Carrier Dome.

"It's always a really close game, and last year we pulled two tight ones out and they told us that we got lucky twice," SU attacker Katrina Hable said. "We didn't let it faze us. We went out there and played our game, and we knew we were the better team."

The Orange women ignited the rivalry's flame first, with sophomore Carrie Soults taking advantage of a miscue by BU defense to finish a 1-0 lead. The Terriers came back on the teams traded shots for a 1-0 lead.

After Hable netted a goal, the teams went seven minutes without a goal. BU's Kristin Lombard with 23:23 left in the first half.

After Hable netted a goal, the teams went seven minutes without a goal. BU's Kristin Lombard with 23:23 left in the first half.

The Terrier defensive scheme allowed Karen Healy and Stacy Brown to score with in a minute of each other, and Brown's easy tally with 4:43 left in the half gave Syracuse a 4-2 lead.

BU's Gabriela Juooyes drove up from seven yards out to cut the deficit to three goals. Hable missed a shot with four minutes remaining, and BU recovered the ball, moving into its settled attack. Lombard broke through the SU defense and planted a low shot to pull BU to 6-5 with 3:49 remaining.

"There is nothing I can do from back there," Gigon said. "All I have to do is stay strong and make a couple of saves and just get the ball back up for the offense."

The Orangewomen capitalized on the missed BU opportunities on their next possession. Hable drove up from inside the SU zone and shot the ball past the Orangewomen's goalie, who finished with 15 saves.

With 5:07 remaining, Rutkowski put a shot past Gigon to cut the Orangewomen's lead to two. After the stoppage of play, BU continued its offensive momentum. The team reeled off eight straight shots at the SU net, only to have the fresh stop each in turn.

"We weren't able to produce. When you take 54 shots, you hope that more than five are going to fall for you," head coach Lisa Miller said. "They don't get rattled in one-goal games. I actually think they enjoy it when we have coronaries."

The Orangewomen's goal led Syracuse in every single offensive category. The Terriers held a 22-12 advantages in shots and a 27-14 edge in groundballs.

The inability to execute befuddled BU head coach Sue Murphy.

"It was definitely hard to digest when we had that many shots on goal," Murphy said. "We weren't able to produce. When you take 54 shots, you hope that more than five are going to fall for you."

With the win, the likelihood of the Orangewomen's first ever NCAA Tournament bid improves. SU started the season 9-3 but has reeled off 10 consecutive victories.

"They keep improving," head coach Lisa Miller said. "They don't get rattled in one-goal games. I actually think they enjoy it when we have coronaries."

The Orangewomen now a heated rivalry, with SU proved no different, as the Orangewomen knocked off the Terriers 6-5 on Saturday afternoon at the Carrier Dome.

The ability to use language has long been a trait that was believed to have set humans apart from other living creatures. But it’s been unclear exactly what abilities humans possess that animals do not. A team of American and French researchers conducted a series of experiments in which 20 sentences in Japanese and 20 sentences in Dutch were read backward and forward to 32 newborn human babies and to 13 cotton-top tamarin monkeys. By carefully monitoring their reactions, the researchers concluded that both had the ability to tell those languages apart even though neither actually understood the words.

Remains of the day

In 1977, archaeologists unearthed a tomb that contained the remains of a cremated man and woman in Vergina, Greece, the site of the ancient Macedonian capital Aligai. Researchers at the time identified the remains as those of King Philip II, the father of Alexander the Great, and Philip’s wife. The find created excitement because during his reign from 359 to 336 B.C., Philip solidified power in Macedonia and took control of Athens and Thbes, setting the stage for his famous son to conquer his vast empire. New research, however, has concluded that the remains were instead those of one of Alexander’s half brothers, a much less prominent figure in the royal lineage of ancient Greece.

Researchers working at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration in Boulder, Colo., found unusually high levels of carbon dioxide over the southeastern United States in the summer of 1995 and tracked the gas back to smokes from major forest fires 2,000 miles away in northwestern Canada.

NYPIRG fights to retain funding

ESF students surpass required voter turnout

BY TIFFANY LANKES
Asst. News Editor

As dozens of New York Public Interest Research Group members campaigned Tuesday outside the Schine Student Center, students stepped up to the polls to determine the source of the group's funding.

The vote, part of the referendum, will continue today and Thursday at polling stations in Schine as well as in Sadler, Brookway and Gra- ham dining centers.

About 240 students at the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry voted Tuesday, said Student Government Association Assem- blyman Adam Duffy, who operated the polling station in ESF's Marshall Auditorium.

The turnout reflected about 20 percent of ESF's student population. Both SU and ESF must have a 10 percent student voter turnout to receive funding.

"I was very surprised at the turnout," said Duffy, a freshman political science major. "It seems ESF is a very politically-minded school."

But Duffy said the college is being rewarded for its efforts. "It's great that students care."

Chris R3'an, chairman of the SGA Board of Elections and Membership, said SU voter turnout was moderate and there had been no problems at the polling stations.

Pan Am prosecutors ask for trial delay

BY JOY DAVIA
Special Projects Editor

The Pan Am Flight 103 bombing trial, which has been more than 3 years in progress, could be delayed at least another two weeks, according to a Public Safety report.

The District Attorney's Office of Grievances and Appeals has asked for more time to properly investigate the case.

The flight's 16 crew members and 243 passengers died in the blast, and two Libyan intelligence agents are currently on trial.

"I will openly support anything that will enable the best possible case against the suspects," said Bob Hunt, whose daughter Karen Lee was one of 35 Syracuse University students on the flight when it exploded Dec. 21, 1988, over the Scottish town of Lockerbie.

The students have been receiving phone calls since the beginning of the month, the report said.

Syracuse University's diversity is being celebrated and honored this week with an orange ribbon campaign.

"It's the simplest way to reach the whole campus," said Andrea Hurwitz, an executive board member of the Residence Hall Association and one of the campaign's organizers. "It's a silent symbol but it means so much."

The campaign aims to reach apathetic students and those who do not have the time and effort to become involved with campus activities, said Amy Peterson, RHA's finance director-elect.

"Ribbons are the simplest form of communication," said Peterson, a freshman political science and public relations major.

The event was organized by the Student Action Team, an organizing committee of the RHA.

Teen charged in zoo shooting

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A 16-year-old black teenager was arrested last night and charged with the murder of a zookeeper; the accused youth is the first black contestant in the history of the annual television show "The Price Is Right." The youth, a maintenance worker at the zoo, is being held at the District of Columbia Jail. The victim, a 50-year-old man, was killed while working on a wildlife exhibit. The youth had raised concerns among staff members about his erratic behavior and had been involved in a domestic dispute earlier in the day. The zoo, which is exempt from state and federal laws, has no internal security system. The victim was married and had two children. The youth was previously employed at the National Zoo and had been fired for stealing, according to zoo officials.

Vermont OKs gay marriage

MONTPELIER, Vt. — Vermont lawmakers gave final approval Tuesday to a bill that would allow same-sex couples to marry and give gay and lesbian couples the benefits of marriage. The bill was introduced by Rep. Elizabeth Guimond, D-Waitsfield, and is supported by multiple religious groups and civil rights organizations. The bill passed with a 78-68 vote in the House of Representatives, and 23-21 in the Senate. The bill will now go to the governor for signature.

Clinton vetoes nuclear waste bill

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bill Clinton vetoed a nuclear waste bill on Tuesday that would have allowed 10,000 nuclear waste remains to be stored in a Nevada mountain. The bill had been backed by the state's Republican governor and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. The bill would have allowed the federal government to establish a federal nuclear waste repository in Nevada, which would have held 10,000 waste sites. The president said the bill was not in the best interest of American taxpayers.

Chinese police arrest protestors

BEIJING — Police detained nearly 100 followers of the outlawed Falun Gong movement Tuesday for holding a defiant anniversary demonstration in Tiananmen Square against a hardline government crackdown that has branded the group "an evil cult." The protestors were held one year after a day-long sit-in at government headquarters. The protestors, who numbered around 10,000 Falun Gong practitioners, confronted the police with a fiery display of chants and slogans. The protestors were members of the Falun Gong movement, a religious cult that was outlawed by the Chinese government in 1999.

Mexican rape tightens in polls

MEXICO CITY — In the most fiercely contested and most relevant Mexican presidential campaign in seven decades, the after-election confidence polls tighten to a gap between the two leading candidates narrowing to a few percentage points with 10 weeks remaining before the July 2 ballot. The numbers of police and protestors were higher Tuesday because of the anniversary, but Falun Gong practitioners and Chinese authorities have been locked in a simmering battle of wills that shows little sign of ending. The protestors had raised expectations that President Vicente Fox of the right-leaning National Action Party (PAN) could make a serious challenge to his main opponent, President Enrique Peña Nieto of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, with Fox's support.

Mexican police report

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Department of Justice has issued a report on the recent rise in the number of hate crimes in the nation. The report, released by Attorney General Eric Holder, found that hate crimes increased by 10 percent in 2010, with the largest increase occurring in hate crimes based on race. The report also found that hate crimes based on sexual orientation and gender identity have increased significantly in recent years.

Hurwitz said she received a Feinstone Grant for Multicultural Initiatives to finance the ribbon distribution. The grants are an attempt by SU to move the campus toward racial tolerance. The grants cover expenses of the selected projects up to $1,000.

"It's hard to achieve unity," said Angela Sutter, RHA's public relations director-elect. "It's hard to make people understand that we're all playing for the same team."

About 6,000 ribbons are available at tables in the Schine Student Center, dining halls and the front desks of residence halls. The campaign began Monday and ends Thursday.

A large drawing of puzzle pieces resembling the globe, by freshman computer graphics major David Diaz, is also on display at Schine. The drawing is meant to promote the week's theme, "In a puzzling world, we all come together as pieces of a unique whole," Hurwitz said. "It's a symbol of SU pride and solidarity," said Hurwitz, a sophomore public relations and sociology major. "It shows our appreciation of SU's diversity."

Students who wear the ribbons will share a bond of support with others that they might not have known about before, she added.

Some students, however, are skeptical that the use of ribbons will promote diversity at SU. "I think handing out orange ribbons will be ineffective," said Marc Stern, an undeclared sophomore in the School of Management. "There has to be a more hands-on appeal to the campaign to create integration and racial cohesion on this campus."

But the campaign also intends to remind people become involved in campus activities next year if they have the opportunity, Peterson said.

"With the year winding down, it's a good time to show our community building skills," she said. "They are non-verbal. You don't have to go out and see a speaker or a lecture. You can support diversity without doing anything.

"We want to end on a positive note."

YPIRG deserves student fee funds

It's rare to stumble across a student group that spends its Student Activity Fee so wisely and works so hard to address campus concerns. The New York Public Interest Research Group — a 27-year-old institution at Syracuse University — is one of only a few examples of such groups. We must keep NYPIRG on campus during this week's Student Government Association referendum.

But NYPIRG's setup requires an unusual direct-funding arrangement. In order to be both effective and plan year-round events and campaigns, the group must receive its money up front each year. NYPIRG needs funding for its advocacy efforts. But its vigilance in student groups do — by crossing their fingers and working to ensure that their students get what they need. NYPIRG employs a full-time campus coordinator at Syracuse University to make sure that students who don't support the NYPIRG mission speak volumes about their dedication to NYPIRG's cause.

Panel calls this unscheduled referendum in hopes of squeezing a strong student group's legislative loopholes. Don't let it happen.

Columnist reflects on four years of ‘favourites’

Those of you who read my column regularly have no doubt had enough of my repetitive writing. It's not that I don't enjoy writing, but it's important to present for your reading pleasure the Ten Things I Love About Syracuse.

1. The Black Voice. Many of you have never read this thoughtful, literary work. If this is the case, be sure to pick up a copy at the main desk of the Schine Student Center. Celebrating its 25th year of top-notch journalism, the Black Voice provides insight into the most relevant issues affecting the black community at SU.

2. The Daily Orange. The Syracuse University Record, The Past-Standard, and The Daily Orange are the epicenter of the hard-hitting news and community news. Now imagine my excitement upon returning, how the chancellor told the recent issue of SU's membership in the WRC. Witness the concern shown for the preservation of our values in the decision not to allow the WRF to come to campus. It's good that the administration has taken most of the pressure of decision-making off of us students. If you want to keep Syracuse University on the cutting edge of news, you'll need to stop by the Daily Orange editorial department.

3. The Student Center. Celebrating its 25th year of top-rate journalism, the Black Voice provides insight into the most relevant issues affecting the black community at SU.

4. The Administration. We are lucky to attend a university that cares so much about its students. Witness the extended public safety patrols that keep us from partying too much and damaging our livers through the consumption of alcohol. Witness the thorough consideration given by the chancellor to the recent issue of SU's membership in the WRC. Witness the concern shown for the preservation of our values in the decision not to allow the WRF to come to campus. It's good that the administration has taken most of the pressure of decision-making off of us students. If you want to keep Syracuse University on the cutting edge of news, you'll need to stop by the Daily Orange editorial department.

5. The greek system. Our much maligned sororities and fraternities have truly made a positive impact on this community. Most importantly, they have single-handedly kept all of the bars on the hill open. Also, the constant need for new SUVs and BMWs has created a booming automobile market in Syracuse.

6. The Art Museum. Imagine my delight at learning of Syracuse University’s plan to open its doors to the campus community. Most importantly, they have single-handedly kept all of the bars on the hill open. Also, the constant need for new SUVs and BMWs has created a booming automobile market in Syracuse.

7. Joe Zeno. Move over, Sam Donaldson and Barbara Walters. Joe Zeno was the epitome of the hard-nosed reporter. His insightful comments and reports on Fox News reflect the opinionated nature of the Syracuse community as a whole. When I see his face plastered across the side of a bus, my chest swells with pride. (Not to mention the beat my heart skips — what a shock!)

8. The SGA. The Student Government Association and NYPIRG, $6 of each student's $106 annual activity fee goes directly to NYPIRG for its advocacy efforts. But its vigilance in student groups do — by crossing their fingers and working to ensure that their students get what they need. NYPIRG employs a full-time campus coordinator at Syracuse University to make sure that students who don't support the NYPIRG mission speak volumes about their dedication to NYPIRG's cause.

University follows law in reporting crimes

To the Editor:

This letter is in response to the April 20th Daily Orange editorial entitled “Off-campus crimes may not be reported.”

The Department of Public Safety reports crime statistics pursuant to the requirements of the Campus Security Act of 1990, now known as the Jeanne Clery Disclosure of Campus Security Policy and Campus Crime Statistics Act. The following are the geographic categories defined in the Act for which we must report crime statistics:

- Campus — Any building or property owned or controlled by an institution and that is physically contiguous to the area in which the institution has its principal educational purposes.
- Public property — All building or property not owned or controlled by and institution and that is not physically contiguous to the area in which the institution has its principal educational purposes.

We are in compliance with the Campus Security Act of 1990 and are following the guidelines set forth by the U.S. Department of Education. We are providing the necessary information as required by law.

Signed,
The Daily Orange
The suspect allegedly planted the bomb on an Air Malta flight to Frankfurt, which was later transferred to a connector flight for Pan Am. The connector flight’s luggage was then transferred enroute to New York City.

Because of the delay and the high winds, the plane ascended quicker than usual, altering the location that the alleged bomber had planned for it to explode over the North Sea. The altitude-sensitive bomb was intended to explode when the plane hit a height of 3,100 feet.

Neutral territory

Although the two Libyans were indicted in 1981 after investigators connected them to the bombing, it was not until 1999 that Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi agreed to hand over the suspects for a trial in the Netherlands.

At the time of the indictment, an extradition treaty did not exist between Libya and the United States, Arzt said. But the United States and United Kingdom, the United Nations security team pushed through a resolution demanding that Libya release the two suspects.

But Gadhafi continued to resist, demanding that the two suspects face a trial in Libya and release the plane’s passengers. After some negotiations, Libya released the suspects.

A deal was made in 1999 between the United Nations and Libya by placing the Scottish trial in a neutral country, setting a precedent in international law. The trial is the first time the court of one country will conduct proceedings in another.

The deal was made because Gadhafi would only release the suspects to the Netherlands, a neutral country, said Helen Engelhardt, who lost her husband in the explosion.

The suspects have also bypassed calling a jury because of the trial’s length and distance from Libya. Instead, four judges, including one alternate, will hear the case, she said.

An old U.S. military base in the Netherlands, called Camp Zeist, has been transformed into a Scottish court and prison for the two suspects, said Dios, a former business major.

The official deal made by United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan worries the families of Pan Am victims.

The families are concerned the deal made between Annan and Gadhafi protects the Libyan leader if evidence released in the trial shows him as the mastermind behind the bombing.

“Even if one or two guys spun him, he does not mean he will go to trial,” she added.

Libya’s suspected motive to bomb Pan Am 103 allegedly stems from U.S. President Ronald Reagan’s military buildup on Trident, where Gadhafi’s adoptive daughter was killed.

Blame has also been pinned on the Iranians, claiming the suspects returned to Iran after the 1988 incident where the Iran-United States accidentally shot down an Iranian passenger plane. Another possibility may be that the Libyan intelligence agents were working with the Iranian government, which contracted them to bomb Pan Am Flight 103, Arzt said.

But finding out what occurred the night of the bombing, and not the punishment for the convicts, is the most important aspect of the trial, Engelhardt said.

“We want the truth, we want to know why,” she said. “We want there to be an apology.”

Ramps in the road

Before Gadhafi released the two suspects, Engelhardt said she began to believe that a trial may not be possible.

Engelhardt said she began to think about the families of student victims. "We had to suck it up and go," she said.

They learned to live with the loss of their loved ones.

The Libyan leader was inflexible in releasing the suspects. It was not until March and April for the right of the court.

The United States, during the past month, has increased interest in resuming ties with Libya. But even if evidence did point to Gadhafi, Engelhardt said she would go to trial.

The Libya trial shows him as the mastermind behind the bombing.

An old U.S. military base in the Netherlands, called Camp Zeist, has been transformed into a Scottish court and prison for the two suspects, said Dios, a former business major.

The official deal made by United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan worries the families of Pan Am victims.

The families are concerned the deal made between Annan and Gadhafi protects the Libyan leader if evidence released in the trial shows him as the mastermind behind the bombing.

‘‘Even if one or two guys spun him, he does not mean he will go to trial,’’ she added.

Eleven Lockerbie residents on the ground were also killed in the explosion. If the trial — the largest international criminal investigation ever — is bumped back several weeks, it will mark the third trial delay since the Libyan government handed over the two suspects in April 1999.

Both delays were granted on the behalf of the defense, pushing the original June 7, 1999, starting date to December 1999 and then to this May.

If this trial delay is granted, it will affect family members planning to travel next week to trial viewing sites in Washington, D.C., New York City or to the trial in the Netherlands, said Joan Dater, whose daughter Gretchen was an SU student and bombing victim.

Although Dater said she may have to change her plans to travel next week to New York City, she supports the inconvenience if it provides the prosecutors more time to investigate the new witnesses. "It only makes sense," she said. "We want them to do a good job. It's nothing negative, only positive."

The Scottish court is expected to rule Thursday on the proposed extension.

Members of NYPIRG, however, said they saw several discrepancies with polling station operators. "The only thing I saw were biases," said Ben Tevelin, a fifth-year geography major and NYPIRG member. "People were standing at the polling station endorsing SGA."

Ryan and James refuted the claim. Students may vote in the referendum to determine if NYPIRG will continue to receive its funding directly from the ESF and SU student activity fees or if the group will have to apply for funds directly through SG.

They may also vote on an amendment to the SGA Constitution that proposes to change the name of the organization to Student Association and increase its role in event programming.

The referenda follow weeks of heated debate in the Assembly regarding the two issues. Several freshman Assembly members opposed to the constitutional revision circulated petitions on campus for students to voice their opposition to the change.

Jessica McGuinness-Hickey, NYPIRG regional supervisor, said controversy within the Assembly greatly influenced student awareness and brought them to the polls.

"The conditions surrounding that had a lot to do with the turnout and fervor that people went to the polls with," McGuinness-Hickey said.

NYPIRG members distributed flyers on campus Tuesday and stood outside of polling stations encouraging students to vote.

James questioned the group, which advocates environmental awareness, for using so much paper in its campaign.

All of the flyers and posters, however, were printed on recycled paper and will be recycled again after the referenda, Tevelin said. SGA is also publicizing the vote, Ryan said, noting two newsletters written and distributed by the association.

"Students have come up to the polls and voted," he said. "I need to put my best faith in the students."

James, however, criticized NYPIRG for recruiting non-SU students to campaign this week on campus.

"I saw an entourage of NYPIRG people who obviously didn't go to this school," James said. "I would advise they use their SU students." When students see non-SU students supporting the cause rather than their peers, they wonder where their money is going, James said.

This exemplifies the reasoning behind the NYPIRG referendum, he said, adding that people do not know for what purposes the group uses its funding.

"People want to know if that's where their money goes," James said. "That's part of the problem — I don't know."

NYPIRG members said they

Virginity offers overlooked benefits

There are a lot of virgins on this campus, and I am not talking about manifestations of the Second Mother.

That's right, I am a resident of the "state of Virginia"—sometimes I feel as though I have been exiled by my own ideals.

Virginia gets a bad rap. We are stereotyped as one of two extremes. Some are considered clumsy, naive, little girls who are too utterly clueless even to comprehend what our sexual organs are for. That is, the ditzy dork—sweet, but weak.

On the other hand you have the uptight women waiting for Prince Charming to whisk them off to the white castle and "deflower" them in the noblest fashion. Alias: the prude who doesn't know how to have a good time—strong, but in an offensive and vulgar manner.

Either way, you lose. These are not very attractive things to be.

Well, I am here to say that I don't fit into either of those categories, and neither do most of the virgins I know.

I don't personally have an issue with my virginity, but a lot of other people seem to.

I consider myself to be simultaneously strong and sweet on a good day, a combination those stereotypes don't seem to allow.

When I came to this campus I expected to be a minority because of my sexual status. But I am not as alone as I feared I would be. There are a lot of girls on this campus who " reside in Virginia," and some of them were willing to talk to me.

Julie, a sophomore in the College of Visual and Performing Arts, said coming to college as a virgin wasn't really an issue for her.

"I don't feel pressure to lose my virginity, either from myself or from anyone else," she said.

Erica, a sophomore design major, said the transition from a high school sexual atmosphere to college was not difficult for her.

"I've always known where I stood on the matter, and other people around me having sex has never had much of an influence on me," she said.

So why is it that virgins who have strength in their convictions are viewed as being unable to "grow up" and have a good time, especially considering the fact that virgins on this campus are not as rare as one might suspect?

Why virginity?

I am not waiting for Mr. Right. I am even not waiting for Mr. May-possibly-be-right. I am just waiting for Mr. I-care-about-you-enough-to-make-youbreakfast-in-the-morning.

See JANE page 10

So I want to make sure I am actually interested in my sexual partners and vice versa before I decide to rumble between the sheets. What's the big deal?

Julie seemed to think along the same lines. "I am not waiting until I get married or expecting some huge relationship. I think Leslie Nuchow — who shared the Lilith Fair 1999 stage with Sarah MacLachlan and Sheryl Crow, among others — is a better role model. "I like playing for an audience where I'm appreciated, and not waiting until I'm not waiting until I'm 30 or whatever. I'm not waiting until I'm much more in a relationship to develop, and the sex may become more important than the emotions behind it. That's not how I want it to be." I found myself silently agreeing with her as she spoke.

When it comes to intimacy, we all play the same game, but everybody plays by their own rules. Everyone has their own definition of "relationship," their own criteria and their own sense of "timing."

Once all these things come together, I will be moving out of Virginia. Now, the whole campus knows my sexual status, so I don't care about that, and I have probably scared off every guy who ever remotely thought of approaching me in the hazy basement of a house party. I hope this column was worth something.

I hope that those of you who occasionally active see virgins as being simultaneously strong and sweet people who don't object to getting some booty — when their hearts are in it.

SU tennis coach Mac Gifford, after the Orange women finished third in the Big East for the third consecutive season.

In his first meet as an NCAA athlete, Troha finished sixth, amid competitors from top schools all over the country.

Troha credits his performances to both his work ethic as well as the coaching staff at SU.

“Coach (Llewellyn) Starks is great in that he knows a great deal about all of the jumping events and he has put me on the right path,” Troha said. “Even though I didn’t jump like I wanted to, the victory gives me something positive going into the Big East (Championship) meet.”

The lone victory on the track for the Orangemen belonged to freshman Eugene Gill, who narrowly beat out another first-year teammate, Sean Burnett, in the 400-meter dash.

The women racked up two other victories on the day in addition to the feats of Daniels and LaPointe. Junior Alicia Crowcat beat out sophomore Alison Calley and the Great Danes in the 300-meter. The SU duo took the top two spots in the event.

Fellow junior LaToya Redden won her second event of the season, triple jump 33’ 8.75”.

The next meet for the majority of the SU harriers will be this weekend at the Penn Relays, before they head south to the Big East Championships held May 5-7.

Despite my victory, I’m hoping for a much better meet this weekend,” Daniels said. “These next two meets are real big and as a group. We all have a common goal to continually improve.”

Junior Michelle Neveklovska was part of the final singles match of the day.

She battled back from a loss in the first set to win the second. But Miami’s Katie Bogomolova held off Neveklovska’s surge and won the match 6-4, 6-7, 6-2.

Syracuse not only had to deal with the stiff competition from the Miami players but also the heat of sunny Florida. Gifford said the team had one day to practice in the sun before the tournament began.

“I think the heat affected our players more mentally than it did physically,” Gifford said. “Miami is used to playing in that sort of climate and we aren’t, so they had an obvious advantage. I would love to see the tournament played at a different site in the future.

With the championship out of their hands, the Orangewomen still had one more match to play for the consolation match. Both Lai and Khvalina, it was Huddled in a corner of the Syracuse men's basketball locker room, Damone Brown sat on a stool in front of his locker, holding his son on his lap.

The junior forward gave the young boy an affectionate squeeze, and both father and son smiled.

Two-year-old D.J. is just as popular with the other players as he is with his dad, Brown said.

"When he's in there, he knows most of the players, so everyone流れ in and picks him up and stuff like that," Brown said. "He's a popular kid."

Although parenthood and marriage place time constraints on an already demanding schedule, Allen's wife and son offer him a welcome distraction from the monkeyiness of a football player's schedule, he said.

"If I'm always down (at Manley Field House), and I don't have anything else to do, I'm going to get tired for a while," Allen said. "When I'm there, it's all about football, but when I go home, I don't even want to think about football."

"When I go home, it's like a breath of fresh air."
Dads star in SU sports

BY ALISON HSCHAK Staff Writer

Syracuse's J.R. Johnson drifts back to the days when he was a toddler. He always watched his father, former Big East star and coach, play lacrosse.

"I can sit down and do, I can sit and play with my toys all day long. It's a fun time with the children," Johnson said. "I call them everyday, as much as possible, but it's hard not to see him."

"He always would have his hand on the television screen when he sees Griffin," Johnson said. "I'm not there physically, but I want to be there." Griffin said it's amazing to watch his son grow up. "They almost definitely need," Johnson said. "It is the dad's role in the family."

"It has been really great working with Johnson," Daniels said. "I'm still hoping to improve a lot before the end of the year, and I know with hard work it is possible."

The Fair Labor Association is still a new organization and is just beginning to have the ability to effectively monitor the factories of its participants, said Robert Durkee, the university representative to the FLA's board of directors.

The Worker Rights Consortium, however, is even less developed and needs more time to establish its goals, Durkee said at a meeting with campus media outlets Wednesday morning.

"It's early still to know exactly how it's going to evolve and the strategy it will play in this problem," he said of the WRC. "I think it's still defining itself."

The idea for the FLA grew out of a 1996 White House initiative to combat poor working conditions in factories throughout the world. The FLA was founded in November 1998 and it is just getting to the point were it will be ready to send monitoring teams into factories, Durkee said.

The association plans to begin actively monitoring the factories by the end of the summer, Durkee added at a meeting with campus media outlets Wednesday morning.

"Nothing was damaged," Brons said. "He went through the soft top of my Jeep."

The car's owner, Syracuse University student Gregory Brons, said he slept through the ordeal and was woken up by police sirens.

The police arrested Robinson at the house's parking lot on 403 Comstock Ave, responding to a possible break-in in progress, the report said.

By the time I was woken up, police were apprehending the suspect," Brons said.

After handcuffing Robinson, police found a Philips Magnavox compact disc player on him that belonged to Brons, the report added.

"Nothing was damaged," Brons said. "He went through the soft top of my Jeep."

DA releases Columbine tape

LITTLETON, Colo. — Gun-making companies have sued Colorado's state government to overturn last April's rampage at Columbine High School, publicly released Tuesday by the local county attorney for $25 a copy, reigniting the outrage of families and school officials still striving to put the nation's deadliest school shooting behind them.

The videotaped footage — actually two sets of tape taken by firemen that are on the scene and a Denver television crew outside in a helicopter — contains images of bullet holes in the cafeterias of the Littleton, Colo., school where the gunman fired.

The tapes also show scenes of the Columbine library, its floor stained with blood and small cards marking the spots where bodies — removed by the time the filming took place — had been found. The library was where two seniors, Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, committed suicide.

They also depict shooting 12 schoolmates and a teacher and wounding 23 others a year ago last week.

Technology offers early warning signals

In a tour de force of unique collaboration, astronomers have obtained the first detailed images of the universe as it was near the end of its first year, long before stars or galaxies had begun to form.

An international team of researchers used balloon-borne detectors located in Antarctica to observe the cosmic microwave background radiation that has pervaded the universe since shortly after the Big Bang. In that era, researchers were able to see previously invisible, superdense ripples that were the first seeds of the structure of the cosmos.

Pets. com socks it to "Late Night"

Online pet supply store Pets.com says the friendly reputation of its kitschy "spoke-pooch" has been under attack ever since a four-fooled dog puppet featured on NBC's "Late Night With Conan O'Brien." "Now it seems, the show's creators have come up with a new way to muddy the waters," Pets.com says. "Here's how they will ultimately vote, several justices voiced skepticism about how far the court could go to force open admissions upon private organizations. "In your view, a Catholic organization has to admit Jews," a justice asked. "And a Jewish organization has to admit Catholics," Justice Antonin Scalia said.

"There is no neutral viewpoint," Justice Sandra Day O'Connor said.

Justice David H. Souter followed by asking Wolfson whether his argument meant the Scouts could be forced to admit girls.

Justice Antonin Scalia voiced his reservations another way.

"They think that homosexuality is immoral," he said, asking why the Scouts must accept as a part of the organization a group that endorses a contradiction of their message? "Why should they have an oath and law that long have required members to resist the temptation to yield physically, morally and spiritually?

Wolfson said the Scouts are not primarily an "anti-gay organization" and therefore Dale's presence did not burden the group's message.

REPORTER'S NOTEBOOK

The images provide some of the best evidence yet for why the universe's first year was so différent from today. In that era, matter was far more dilute and did not exist in the solid form of gas and dust as we know it today. This resulted in a much shorter period of time for the universe to form galaxies, including the Milky Way.

"We're seeing the beginning of our galaxy and the building blocks of our universe," said Christopher Hadley, an astrophysicist at the University of California at Los Angeles. "It's like going back in time to see how everything formed."

Police booked Robinson because he was intoxicated and also to prevent him from committing more crimes, the report said.
Brons, a senior physics major, said there has been only one other car break-in at the Theta Chi house during his two years there.

An unidentified man broke into the Sig^a Phi Epsilon fraternity house at about 8 a.m. Tuesday and stole money from an SU sophomore, according to a police report.

Fraternity representatives were unable to be reached for comment.
The sophomore awoke to find the suspect in his bedroom, the report said.
When questioned, the suspect told the sophomore he was looking for the FIJI sorority, the report added.
The man left immediately, the report said. The sophomore got up and noticed about $20 missing from his wallet, the report said.
The suspect is a black male, aged 25 to 30, with a medium build, bald and with a goatee, the report said.

An unidentified suspect broke into a 1993 Toyota Corolla late Sunday night on the 100 block of Walnut Avenue, according to a police report.
Costs of damages and thefts totaled almost $3,900, the report said.
The suspect broke the rear vent window, the report said. Wiring to the car stereo and directionals were also extensively damaged. Costs of repair are estimated at $2,000, the report said.

The suspect stole the car CD player, amplifier, $500 worth of CDs and radar detector, the report said.

An unidentified suspect broke into a 1993 Ford Explorer this week in the parking lot on Madison Avenue, according to a police report.
The thief broke the driver's side window and stole a cellular phone, the report said. Damages to the window are estimated at $500 and the cell phone cost $50, the report added.

It is the seventh reported break-in at the Madison lot this academic year, the report added.

A police report added, "The student either lost the phone or had it stolen from his car, the report said. The junior tried calling the phone from another phone, the report added, and someone kept hanging up on him.
The student has insurance for the phone, the report said.

Now that you've gotten into college, here's your chance to really go somewhere.

Congratulations. All the cramming, insomnia and junk food breakfasts have paid off. You're in college now — and soon, you'll be facing questions about your life. Like what to do with the rest of it. One thing is for sure, if you're a student of color, with an INROADS internship you could have a serious job every summer while you're still in school — making contacts and gaining experience in your chosen field of study.

Hey, it won't be easy, but then again if you wanted it easy, you wouldn't be reading this right now.

Campus officials and journalism students debated Wednesday night whether or not college administrators should release information on students involved in criminal investigations.

About a dozen students attended the forum conducted by the Society of Professional Journalists.

Anastasia Urtz, director of Syracuse University's Office of Judicial Affairs, Student Government Association President Jamal James and Dave Levinthal, editor in chief of The Daily Orange, served as panelists. Lynne Flocke, an SU newspaper professor, moderated the forum.

The 1974 Buckley Amendment does not allow for information in a student's record to be released without the student's permission. If a school does not follow this rule, it could lose federal funding that helps pay for federal grants and work-studies, Urtz said.

"That's the way they keep you in compliance," she added.

The university community would be better off if information about students who have been arrested, like their names, was made available to the press, said Levinthal, a junior newspaper and political philosophy major.

When courts release students' names, more information may help make an article more informative, he added.

For example, Syracuse police found former SU football player Vernon Banks April 8 outside of Harry's Bar and Tavern acting violently and suspected to be under the influence of drugs. He was transported to a local hospital for treatment.

Banks later denied the allegations that he was under the influence of a narcotic.

Coverage of the incident would have been better if more information had been available about Banks, Levinthal said.

"We'd want to get as much information as possible," Levinthal said. "We'd like to know if he had any drug problems while he was at SU."

Levinthal did admit, however, that not all information should be released, like a student's grades.

"It's kind of dancing on a fine line," he said. "You don't want to release something that will be seriously detrimental."

James said he disagreed with Levinthal's belief that students' names and personal information should be released while an investigation is in progress.

The fact that students could be extricated for something they may not have done is reason enough to withhold information, he said.

"I think it can go too far and get too personal," said James, a junior musical theater major. "It could have an effect on the educational process of the student."

James also said he disagreed with the belief that releasing pertinent information might be beneficial to students.

The university does not release this information because the role of Judicial Affairs is to educate the violator, as well as to protect the student body, Urtz said.

"Obviously, students should be able to come to school and learn from their mistakes," she said. "We do what we do as an effort to make them better students."

The vast majority of crimes that go through the office are "developmental crimes" that usually do not lead to greater offenses, she said. The students who commit these crimes do not pose a serious threat to the university and the surrounding community, and therefore their names should not be released, she added.

The current university policy of releasing criminal information does not reflect societal norms and this should be changed, Levinthal said. State and city police stations make their police reports available to be viewed regularly by the public, he added.

"That will help make Syracuse University safer," he said.

"That's the information I want to know. It affects my life," James disagreed, saying the way SU handles criminal records is appropriate, and that cities and states do not do a good job.

"People will become guilty in the public eye and have to work really hard to cleanse themselves," he said. "It's not a law that most people are satisfied with."

The university reports all of the cases that may be in violation of city, state or federal law to the appropriate police force, she said.

"Most times, petty crimes are thrown out when they get to court, Urtz said.

The students who go through the university judicial system and are not expelled should be allowed to re-enter the student body unscathed, she added.

"We don't think that the people we're allowing to stay here will up the ante and do something more dramatic," she said.

The Chancellor's Advisory Committee on Campus Security will be examining this issue in the fall, Urtz said. The committee will be comprised of three students, three faculty members and the dean staff members. State law mandates that universities have a committee dealing with campus safety, she said.

The panelists all said at one point during the forum that the names of students who are found guilty of student crimes should be released, Flocke said.

"I think we actually have some agreement," she said.

Vote 'no' on SGA structure changes

The Student Government Association wants your support in their latest half-baked scheme to “defend the students.” Won’t be fooled, Serve your interests the right way — by voting against the constitutional changes proposed in the SGA referenda this week.

The logic behind the bill — which seeks to strike “government” from SGA’s name, add a “promotions” board and eliminate one of two assistant comptroller positions — is unclear. Some say it means that the new promotions board would assist and advise student groups in events production planning. Doing so serves only to duplicate a role that University Union has already honed to a science.

The time SGA will need to spend training new promotions board members next semester is hardly worth the effort. Ironically enough, it will probably have to seek the expertise of UU’s members in order to properly set up their own promotions main vacum.

And although SGA claims the promotions wing will give students the benefit of “one-stop shopping,” it also undermines the autonomy of these same students. SGA would potentially have the power to impose precise, perhaps cumbersome, stipulations for each stipend it doles out for events production.

SGA has bit off far more than it can chew. Even after reshuffling Assembly representation from student residences to home colleges and slashing training new promotions board members has already honed to a science.

The so-called economic boom the American upper-middle class is experiencing didn’t excite me very much either. But in the past twelve months, American film has been more groundbreaking than almost anything else in the cultural spectrum with the release of “The Matrix,” “American Beauty,” “Fight Club” and “Magnolia.”

I was skeptical when I saw the first trailer for “The Matrix.” It looked pretty cool, but Keanu Reeves? Needless to say, my fears were totally unfounded. In “The Matrix,” the Wachowski brothers have raised the bar for action and science fiction films. In perfecting the type of comic-book action sequences that filmmakers are trying to achieve for decades, “The Matrix” revolutionized special effects and computer manipulation of film in the process.

The next idea someone gave me was “Columns,” a stream-of-consciousness piece about liberal circles and other D.O. columnists. Though artistically tending, this vision was clearly too gruesome and in very poor taste.

When someone else suggested I just pick up an almanac, write my usual leftist rhetoric, I firmly believed that my last column for the semester had to be a little more than just that. I needed to carefully select a topic that I really felt was important.

Finally, it came to me. The 1990-99 school year was not very exciting in political circles. The so-called economic boom the American upper-middle class is experiencing didn’t excite me very much either. But in the past twelve months, American film has been more groundbreaking than almost anything else in the cultural spectrum with the release of “The Matrix,” “American Beauty,” “Fight Club” and “Magnolia.”

The past semester was filled with film classics. “Titanic,” but it’s a start. These bold filmmakers have tread new ground in the realm of film, doing so for people to start relating to one another instead of spewing in recent 3rears, these four films, among several others, have truly set a new standard in American movies. It may be too early to tell whether this means the downfall of over-hyped, over-budgeted nonsense like “Titanic,” but it’s a start.

NYPIRG must receive funds like other groups

The next big one was Oscar winner “American Beauty.” Though best known for the scene where Kevin Spacey masturbates in the shower, “American Beauty” has almost entirely escaped the critics’ myths of suburbia. Primarily exploring the theme of what people project as themselves as opposed to who they really are, “American Beauty” offers outstanding performances, incredible drama and a fierce evaluation of our society.

But quite possibly my favorite of all these incredible films was Paul Thomas Anderson’s “Magnolia.” Amidst staggering performances and an incredible, albeit lengthy, screenplay, “Magnolia” contains one of the most complex and carefully woven narratives in cinematic history. In an ensemble of delicately complicated and intricately related characters, Anderson’s film begins one of the most important questions in 21st century America. What has to happen for people to start relating to one another instead of seeking refuge in drugs, alcohol, television, sex, religion, money and other faceless commodities? When will we wise up? Theanine answer is so biblical proportions.

I don’t feel it is an overstatement to say that American cinema has been changed dramatically in the past year. These bold filmmakers have tread new ground in the realm of film, doing so for people to start relating to one another instead of spewing in recent 3rears, these four films, among several others, have truly set a new standard in American movies. It may be too early to tell whether this means the downfall of over-hyped, over-budgeted nonsense like “Titanic,” but it’s a start.

Student-centered

Sophomore nursing student Jennifer Salinger, who will be a senior when the merger goes into effect, said she was initially worried about the merger, but said she has changed her mind after attending informational meetings. "I'll get to take classes in the other college's areas. All of those areas apply to us," Salinger said. "They said we'll get a bigger college, closer to campus and they won't change our graduation requirements. That sounds good to me."

But some School of Social Work students said they are not as excited about the changes. "I'm a little lazered," a senior social work major, said the impending merger could have both positive and negative effects on her program. "I understand the dynamics of why the university wants to do this, and it has merits, but I'm afraid the School of Social Work will lose its individuality in the process," LaPrairie said. "The social work program doesn't take care of its students now, if the merger happens, I don't know what will happen." There's each of these separate schools need to get their acts together before they can combine to make a better school overall," LaPrairie said. But Shaw disagreed that the merger would have an adverse effect on the students. "If you made it a rule that everyone has their act together, you'd never be exciting," Shaw said. "It is difficult for three relatively small programs to achieve prominence on their own, but combined, they are more likely to be successful," Shaw said.

"What we have are three relatively small units," he said. "As stand-alone, they can't take advantage of the natural synergies that exist when they combine. The faculty in the merged school will be drawing upon the strengths of one another in a way that makes those strengths stronger. That then has a trickle down effect to the students." One way SU hopes to take advantage of the merger is by combining clinics, where students gain hands-on experience in their chosen fields. The nursing, social work and human development students take these clinics as graduation requirements. "I think the clinical practice is exciting and we are learning together and the application of learning and such can be intertwined successfully," Mulvey said.

Geriatrics is an example of the importance of interdiscipli- nary learning, she said. It often takes a social worker, a nurse, a nutritionist and others to provide care for the elderly. The new school will put SU students at an advantage because they will have hands-on experience and practice in dealing with professionals from other disciplines, working with the patients' best interests in mind.

"The dean will be not just a merger, but a new college, a co-mingling that will strengthen each area," Mulvey said. This merger is not about cost reduction, it's about creating a college that is state of the art.

All three schools are under a hiring freeze until the planning committee knows what faculty will be needed for the merged school, Smith said.

"There will definitely be some job shuffling," College of Nursing Interim Dean Carol Mulvey is leaving her post for personal reasons in July after a year and a half with the college. Author condemns milk as a health danger

BY CAROLINE CHEN
Staff Writer

Imagine a delicious chocolate brownie, washed down by a 12-ounce glass of ice-cold milk, anti-milk activist Robert Cohen said. To him, the idea is as absurd as drinking milk when the average U.S. citizen eats about 330 pounds of white meat and 30 ounces of milk over the course of a year, Cohen said. As a member of the New York Chapter of the Vegetarian Society, Cohen said he is convinced that milk is a health danger and has been an activist fighting against the dairy industry for many years.

The Daily Orange

The cry of the children from the farm, said Cohen, is the most horrible thing. "The cow's, we keep them as long as possible," she said.

"You'd say 'pick' every single day to try and get them to eat milk," he said. Cohen has worked with people Wednesday in Grant Auditorium. He recently authored the book, "Milk: The Deadly Poison." On average, U.S. citizens consume 39.2 quarts of milk annually, Cohen said. Forty percent of what the average U.S. citizen eats is milk and dairy products, he said.

But drinking milk is dangerous and insensitive of animal rights, Cohen added. Milk can legally contain 750 million pus cells per liter, he added.

"The same thing that comes out of your sit is in milk," Cohen said. "I say to myself, 'pu.$' Pus is what it is. With hormones and the glucose," he said. Cohen found the 50 naturally occurring hormones in milk with various health ailments - including irritable bowel syndrome, heart disease and diabetes.

"That's what milk is. It's a hormone delivery system," he said. "You're taking milk, you're taking hormones." The hormone Insulin Growth Factor 1, which is found in both cows and humans, is causing girls to mature and develop breasts at increasingly younger ages, Cohen said.

The Japanese did not traditionally consume milk and dairy products, but as they increased their consumption over the years, the average Japanese girl has gained 19 pounds, grew four-and-a-half inches, and got her first period at a younger age, Cohen said.

Milk is fattening because when it is filtered in the process of homogenization, fat globules become small enough to go through the walls of the intestine into the blood, he said.

Cohen said there is a link between this obesity and poverty. Many inner-city black children receive free lunches - which includes pizza and milk - he said.

"Drive by the school and look at how fast the kids are," Cohen said.

Because milk slows digestion, children cannot concentrate after drinking it, he said. This takes away their ability to learn, Cohen said.

But these ideas are not well thought out, said Mike Kent, a sophomore magazine, policy studies and political science major. "I don't think all black people should be specifically considered a target for him," Kent said. "It seems it could be an issue for all children." After being brought up on milk, Parker Deay said Cohen's words were shocking.

"I was pretty surprised," said Deay, a sophomore broadcast jull major. "I'm still not totally convinced, but I'm definitely going to think about it the next time I drink milk."

Aside from health concerns, animal rights abuses and another incentive to stop drinking milk, Cohen said. When cows are no longer suited for milking, they are packed off to the slaughterhouse, he said.

"The crying you have on a farm is the most horrible thing," Cohen said. "These are horrible deals." At the slaughterhouse, entire cows are turned into McDonald's hamburgers, he said.

"What do you think happens to theudder?" Cohen asked. Dairy farmers are hardworking people and think they are producing "nature's perfect food," but are doing exactly the opposite, he said.

But these allegations are not true for small farms, said said audience member Andrea Batty, who works as a farm hand on a dairy farm in Cayuga County.

"Our cows, we keep them as long as possible," she said.

The dairy farm, Batty works for has about 90 milking cows, each of which has a name, she said.

Batty said she would like to try to go without eating milk and dairy products.

"But I love milk, I love cheese, I love meat," she said.

Industry antics

Cohen said he has worked as a scientist in laboratories, but now rejects that line of work.

"It's bogus," he said. "The scientists know that research is no good."

Cohen also denounced the dairy industry's "Got Milk?" advertisement campaign as misleading and morally irresponsible.

"We've been brainwashed," he said. "I've found out everything they've been saying is untrue." Josh Jackson, an actor in the television show "Dawson's Creek," appeared in a "Got Milk?" advertisement with a caption that implied drinking milk would help attract older women.

"The calcium helps bones grow strong," the caption read. "Considering 15 percent of your adult height is added when you're a teenager, that's good to know. Especially if you want to impress, let's say, an older woman," he said.

The advertisement is encouraging statutory rape, Cohen said.

"I got really pissed when I saw that," he added.

Another advertisement is essentially selling sex by featuring television personality Daisy Fuentes in a gold dress that looked like it had been "spray-painted" on, Cohen said.

President Bill Clinton posed with a milk mustache, Cohen said, even though the president's milk allergy caused him to "go into an epileptic seizure and die" which wouldn't be such a bad thing.

"We've got unbelievable marketing from the dairy industry."

Taking action

Milk decreases the acidity of the stomach, causing a buffering effect in the digestion of food, Cohen said. Consequently, protein and cholesterol survive digestion, he said.

To test the adverse effects of milk, Cohen said that people ate the same dinner for two days in a row, but finish a meal with a 12-ounce glass of milk on one of the nights and note their rate of digestion.

He passed around a beer bottle and told the audience that the label on the bottle was glued on with a substance called casein.

Casein - which produces mucous when it is consumed - constitutes 80 percent of the protein in milk, he said, and urged the audience to read labels to check whether products contain casein.

"The average American is waking around with about a gallon of mucus they got from milk and dairy products," Cohen said.

"I don't want to ruin drinking milk," Cohen said. "But I'm glad I came."
JSU plans shortened Holocaust Remembrance Week

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

In the interest of catering to final exam schedules, the Jewish Student Union has scaled down this year’s Holocaust Remembrance Week. With just three events, there is less of a time commitment for people who wish to attend, said Sofya Peysakhovich, one of the program planners.

“There’s less of an effort,” said Peysakhovich, adding that the lighter schedule was chosen “rather than having movie nights and five speakers coming in.”

The national Holocaust Remembrance Week usually falls earlier in April which avoids busy pre-exam schedules, Peysakhovich said.

But even with fewer, less time-consuming events, Peysakhovich said she is not sure how this year’s turnout will be, but added she hoped it is “relatively large.”

JSU is hosting a poster exhibit at 8 p.m. Saturday, with prints ordered from the Museum of Tolerance in California. The group ordered the artwork — collages of pictures surrounded by quotes and accompanied by explanations — and matted them to give the exhibit a “museum” feel, JSU President Laura Gottlieb said.

The posters will also be on display in the Schine Student Center atrium all week, she added.

At 9 p.m. Saturday on the Quad, Hillel is sponsoring a special Havdalah service to remember Holocaust victims, said Peysakhovich, a sophomore political science major.

Milton Katz will give a presentation at 8 p.m. Monday night in the Hall of Languages, Room 207, regarding Holocaust-related art. Immediately following the lecture, JSU is hosting a candlelight vigil on the steps of Hendricks Chapel.

You are invited to attend and help light the 600 candles or listen to the poems and stories that will be read during the vigil. Peysakhovich said.

All students are invited to attend and help light the 600 candles or listen to the poems and stories that will be read during the vigil. Peysakhovich said.

"Different people remember different things but a candlelight vigil is something very powerful that everyone can relate to," she said.

"It's important to remember things like that in history, when you're connected," Kramer said.

All attendees of the event will be asked to sew a button onto a quilt. Peysakhovich said JSU aims to collect 6 million buttons — one for every Jewish person who perished during the Holocaust, she said.

The group has been collecting buttons for about five years, Peysakhovich said. Currently it has 200,000 to 300,000.

Both Gottlieb and Peysakhovich expressed their desire to attract non-Jewish as well as Jewish students to the event.

"The burden of remembering has been placed on the Jewish community," Peysakhovich said. "I feel that it shouldn't just be that. It can't just be a Jewish concern."

"It's not even just a Jewish thing," she said. I think it's important for everyone to recognize and remember it as something important that should never happen again."

The issue of tolerance is especially pertinent, Peysakhovich added, because of recent incidents of ethnic cleansing and racism. She cited both the war in Bosnia and the racist and class warfare during the early 1990s in Rwanda.

"It's kind of a concept of 'never again,'" she said. "Awareness has to be brought to the issue."

pleated unfounded.
"Starbucks doesn't care," he said. "I think they have enough business not to worry about it."
Molloy said Potamianos' letter came in response to an April 17 letter she sent to him.
In that letter, Molloy asked him to fix fire code violations, replace all the shop's windows and recue the rent.
Potamianos has not addressed the fire code violations since No Borders moved to Marshall Street in 1997, Molloy said.
"The city has guested that he repair those violations several, several times over," she said. "We've been having these on-going problems."
Some of the code violations include replacing broken sprinkler heads and bad electrical wiring, Molloy said.
City officials could not be reached for comment.
The coffee house is a popular gathering spot for SU students seeking an alternative to the "trendy" ambiance of the Schine Student Center food court, Chang said.
Chang said the performances at No Borders have been well received, especially one band, Fathead, which will have their final show May 4.
"We don't know when we're closing officially," Driscoll said. "That's going to be our last hurrah."
Lawrence Harlan, a senior mathematics major, agreed with Chang and added that he is concerned that corporations, such as Starbucks, will take over Marshall Street.
"There really is no place if you don't want to go to a bar," Harlan said. "Soon there are going to be corporate bars."
Both the FLA and WRC in- tend to monitor the conditions of factories in which university clothing is made. For months, students at Syracuse University and campuses nationwide have asked their administrations to change membership from the FLA to the WRC. After meeting with media Wednesday, Durkee met with SU's Licensing Advisory Board to answer its questions about the organization.

A WRC representative will visit SU today for similar meetings.

Maureen Riedel, SU licensing administrator, said she is hopeful that the meetings with both representatives will lead members of the Licensing Advisory Board to make informed decisions about which organization will best protect working conditions.

"We're not the experts on these issues," Riedel said. "We've invited these people here to educate us. It'll help us gain knowledge of the organizations, however, the final decision comes from the chancellor.

"But this will definitely help us provide a strong recommendation," Durkee, who works full time as vice president of public affairs at Princeton University, added.

One problem with the WRC is that it focuses its monitoring efforts exclusively on its members' apparel factories. The FLA aims to ensure there are acceptable working conditions in all factories that produce all university merchandise, said Craig MacDonald, director of the Worker Rights Consortium.

"The FLA has several important issues that it must address in its policies before it can be legitimate," he said. "What we said from the beginning is we wanted to focus on all licensed apparel factories, however, the WRC has several important issues that it must address in its policies before it can be legitimate."

Morris said he tries to do things with a partner, "someone who likes to stay in shape and is pretty motivated themselves." He said he tries mixing it up a lot. "I make it part of my routine every day. I work out every day to make it more interesting.

"I try to do things that aren't necessarily in the gym — I'll go hiking, toss around a football, something," he said. "I try mixing it up a lot.

Morris said he tries to do things with a partner, "someone who likes to stay in shape and is pretty motivated themselves."

Olsen added that sports — both team and individual — are also a good way to break up the monotony of exercising.

"For people who like sports and like to go out to the fields with some friends, most sports are a good way to get involved and stay healthy and active," he said.

Without the free, nearby Archbold Gymnasium at their fingertips, many students join local gyms during the summer months to stay in shape.

"I try to go to the gym as often as I can," said Deb Reitan, a junior majoring in television, radio and film major who recently joined Bally's Total Fitness at the Carousel Center.

She said she found that during the dull, cold winter months, she falls into "somewhat of a routine," but finds that she exercises much more during the warmer summer months.

"You have more time and it's so nice out so you'll want to run and be outside but then you think that you should go lift in the gym or take a class," she said. "I definitely work out more often.

Local gym owners and managers said that they don't notice a change in membership rates when the school year ends.

"We usually stay pretty flat," said Scott Rowe, manager of Bally's Carousel.

While the raw numbers remain the same, gym personnel see different faces during the summer.

"Because we're in a college area, some of our regular members who we see every day go home for the summer," said Heidi White, group fitness director at Fitness Forum, 6800 E. Genesee St., Fayetteville.

"But then the people who come home to the area for the summer like other schools join."

White also said that 3-month memberships rise in the summer.

But students do not always have the resources to join a gym, and some say they feel insecure about working out in the gym setting. Olson said this should not stop them from exercising and staying healthy.

"You don't have to be athletic or incredibly strong," Olson said. "It's not that hard. It just takes some self-discipline."

"Suggested walking, running, biking, swimming, skipping rope and climbing stairs as good cardiovascular activities."

"Find an activity that fits into your lifestyle," VanVechten said.

VanVechten added that exercise alone will not increase someone's fitness.

"They have to make sure they're getting enough rest and proper nutrition, drink lots of fluids and avoid substances that lower your resistance, like alcohol," she said. "Maintaining good health means doing all these things."

Olson agreed, adding that any little amount of exercise that can be squeezed into a day will be beneficial.

"Doing something is better than doing nothing," he said. "Every little bit helps."
Su splits double-dip

ITHACA — In a team’s inaugural season, each game is a learning experience.

When the Syracuse softball team lost to Cornell 5-1 in September, the brand-new Orangewomen squad accepted their differences against a more experienced Big Red team.

So when Syracuse split a doubleheader on Wednesday with Cornell at Niemand-Robison Field, SU head coach Mary Jo Finnback expressed mild satisfaction.

“They do two well in the Ivy League and they beat us in the fall pretty handily,” Finnback said. “I think it was a good thing to come back. Our team is a different team than they were in the fall. We easily could have gone home with two wins.”

Coming off a no-hitter on Tuesday afternoon at Buffalo, SU freshman Tara DiMaggio had another impressive outing Wednesday with an eight-inning, two-hit shutout against the Big Red.

DiMaggio moved down the Cornell offense through the first four innings, allowing only one baserunner through the first four innings. After Annette Sheppard singled in the fifth, DiMaggio retired the next nine Cornell batters.

As DiMaggio cruised by the Cornell lineup, the Orangewomen struggled offensively. Cornell pitcher Nicole Zitarelli kept the pitches low, which limited the Orangewomen to hitting slow ground balls that didn’t leave the infield.

Besides a Lindsay Richards single in the first inning, SU could not muster offensive power until Kristen Collins started the top of the

Some captains make the highlight films by scoring a plethora of the team’s goals. Senior midfielder Tim Byrne netted his share.

Other captains lead their teams on the defensive end, limiting the opponents’ scoring opportunities. Byrne capably fills this role as well.

But neither of these key elements to lacrosse success explain what makes Byrne such a valuable asset to this year’s Syracuse lacrosse team.

He does not lead the Orangemen in any statistical category, but his name appears near the top of almost every column.

Byrne has become one of the Orangemen’s most valuable players by doing a little bit of everything and excelling in each aspect.

“He’s not one-dimensional,” said Syracuse head coach John Desko. “He can score, and he can stop people from scoring. He will even take face-offs.”

Chris Carey, the nation’s top face-off specialist, takes most of SU’s draws. But Byrne has stepped up 25 face-offs this season and won 11 of them.

When Byrne first stepped onto the Carrier Dome turf three seasons ago, the Baldwin native found much of his playing time in the face-off circle. He led the Orangemen by taking 268 draws that year, but he also recovered 73 ground balls, second most on the team.

However, it was in May 1997 when Byrne first showed his knack for stepping out. Byrne went 1-1 and missed all of last season with a hip injury.

The senior attacker finished the 1997-98 season with 67 goals and was one of the team’s top two scorers.

Byrne then captained the Orangemen to the NCAA national championship game at the Carrier Dome. Byrne scored the game-winning goal against Massachusetts in overtime.

BYRNE'S has been crucial in helping the Orangemen win 20 straight games.

changed her ghoulsh, white-faced image to a more germane, "dumb" looking clown, according to a report by the Toronto Star. Entertainment firm Pretty Damn Amazing Productions states on their Web site that the white-face clown is characteristically the most serious of the clown family and also the one that gets the most screams, such as the clown portrayed in "It."
The Toronto Star also reported that Kritters the Clown's move to a more-friendly face is part of a widespread decline in the number of classic whiteface clowns, like Bozo. Clown historians say that within 50 years, all the whitefaces will be washed away. The whiteface clown is going by the way-side after an uphill battle over the past two decades against terrifying media images.
Dr. Bruce Carter, an SU associate professor of psychology, said he agrees that the media can sometimes have a dramatic impact on the fears of individuals.
"Back in the early 1970s, 'Jaws,' produced needless fear," he said. "As long as you're not a surfer, being around sharks is not as dangerous as you would think. It gets passed on as a myth."
Carter said that these fears are protection mechanisms for individuals who are afraid of the strange or unknown. He added that having a fear does not necessarily mean that is debilitating.
"It is a type of self-preservation," he said. "I have a fear of heights myself, but it doesn't effect me going up to the 12th floor of a building."
The only time a fear becomes debilitating is when it becomes the motivating factor in making a decision. Carter said. When I was 5 years old, I was left alone for over an hour in a room with red-nosed Bozo.
He and I sat in silence while he smoked a cigarette, as my mother tells me now. She was in the living room making cupcakes while his evil face kept making glances at me. I wanted to run and hide, but ended up staying for the sake of the party. Later that year, I was squirted while at a circus, unexpectedly, by one of these crazy-haired clowns with a flower from his jacket. Though my fear has changed to general dislike for clowns, for some it remains a constant fear.

Transfer Elliott fights in four-man battle

BY ERIC NATHAN
Staff Writer

More gasoline was thrown on the Syracuse quarterback controversy fire this spring.

The diesel fuel arrives in the form of Chad Elliott. Elliott faces a trio of returns in the battle for the starting job. Troy Nunes and Madei Williams took most of the snaps last year, and red-shirt freshman R.J. Anderson joins the incumbents for his first season.

Elliott’s biggest problem in competing with the trio is their understanding of the complex Orange attack. From recent late-April practices, it is slowly beginning to get the rhythm of the offense.

“In the spring, I’m just trying to learn the offense,” Elliott said. “Right now, I’m way behind the other guys as far as things like cadence and just knowing who to hit at the right time. But I’ll catch up.”

Elliott’s story began near the beaches of the Pacific Ocean before he landed in Central New York.

Born and raised in Grass Valley, Calif., near Sacramento, he led Grant High School with staggering numbers.

In his senior year alone, Elliott threw for 3,175 yards and 41 touchdowns with only three interceptions. He was an All-State selection and an Honorable mention USA Today All-American.

The 6-foot-3, 200-pound QB put up impressive résumés and talents to Arizona State. He redshirted in his first year with the Sun Devils, but played for them in 1998.

Elliott put up solid numbers in parts of nine games, going 39-for-73 with 375 yards. He started a game against Pac-10 foe Stanford, passing for 2,843 yards and 19 TDs, while completing 65 percent of his passes. He also rushed 89 times for three scores in an offense Dillon said is similar to SU’s attack.

“It was really important to go to junior college because I didn’t have to sit out,” Elliott said. “If you transfer to a Division I school and taking another redshirt year, Elliott will have to play at the JUCO level. He did not disappoint in his one semester there last fall.

He recorded numbers reminiscent of his senior year of high school statistics. At American River, Elliott threw for 3,843 yards and 19 TDs, while completing 63 percent of his passes. He also rushed 89 times for three scores in an offense Dillon said is similar to SU’s attack.

In a span of only a few months, he went from the first-class Pac-10 to a Domino’s Pizza delivery boy. He worked at the pizza joint on summer nights for some extra cash to pay for his apartment.

His one season at junior college attracted the likes of Tennessee, Clemson and Kansas State, who all actively recruited Elliott.

But when January rolled around, Syracuse proved the best fit for Elliott, who had visited the East Coast.

Signing with SU thrusted Elliott into the middle of the dreaded quarterback controversy.

Despite his big-time college experience on the Left Coast, Elliott joined the Orange at the bottom of the quarterback ladder. He has made strides in recent practices.

While he struggles to learn the complexity of SU’s offense, his position-mates try to help him adapt.

“Troy and Madei are doing the same thing (for Elliott) they did last year (for me),” Anderson said. “We’re trying to help Chad out and get the things down.”

For now, Elliott must catch the three returnees. Recent depth charts have Elliott sliding up to the third QB slot, behind Nunes and Williams.

If — and that is a big if — he can learn the SU playbook by autumn, Elliott becomes a better candidate to receive Syracuse’s first snap of the year.

“I like what they offer,” Elliott said. “They’re a program that’s good and competes hard every year. I like the coaches. We’re bringing back a lot of good players on both sides of the ball, which is going to allow us to have a good season.”

Demoted Ewing perseveres on SU bench

BY CHRIS SNOW
Staff Writer

Her career numbers speak for themselves. Her leadership is invaluable. Yet, freshman Carla Gigon is not between the pipes.

Three weeks ago, freshman Carla Gigon replaced Ewing, thought to be one of the key components to a Syracuse
NCAA Tournament run.
Ewing struggled correctly, citing the team’s opening games as three of the poorest performances of her career. Meanwhile,
Gigon caught fire, earning her first start on April 8 against Rutgers and compiling a 6-0 record since.

Despite her new role as teacher rather than head coach
Lisa Miller’s prized pupil, Ewing accepts her responsibility to serve as a leader and support system.
“It’s definitely different playning and being on the sidelines,” she said. “But I’d be disappointed in myself if I gave up. It’s one of those things where you just have to take on a different role on the team. I still feel like I’m out there.”

Since Miller first notified
Ewing on April 7 that Gigon would start, the squad’s next game, the relationship between Miller and Ewing has not changed, Ewing said.
“It’s funny because a lot of people think it would change and think it has,” she said. “People look to see how I’ve reacted and think, ‘Should I walk on eggshells?’ I don’t think that the coaching staff wronged me or anything like that.”

“I was not playing well, and we need to win. I want our team to win and if it means me not playing, I understand that and I respect that decision.”

Whether Ewing directs the defense from the inside or offers instructions and morale from the sidelines, she is vital to the Orangewomen’s success, junior All-American Katrina
Hable said.
Additionally, the senior from Shaker Heights, Ohio, provides the tutelage necessary to speed up Gigon’s maturity process, Hable added.

“From the beginning, we looked up to her for her leadership as the older one on the team,” said Hable, who arrived on the SU Hill three years ago for the school’s first season of women’s lacrosse.
“We all came into this new,
but she came in with a great attidude about everything. She’s very understanding, very easy-going and she always seemed to find some way to step it up in the games. We just adopted the way she played.”

While anyone with the competitive spirit Ewing embodies would struggle not being on the field, the weathered defender makes the best of her new role,
Hable said.
The ease with which Ewing moved into her new role offered the team an example of the unselfish nature it takes to win,
Hable added.
“I think she handled it very well,” she said. “That’s the kind of person she is. She doesn’t let it bother her, and she knows that she still has to stand up and be a leader. We all need her in that case, and she does it very well.”

Accepting that her lacrosse career is nearing its end, Ewing said the relationships she developed with her teammates made the transition easier.

Those close bonds will allow her to depart SU with lasting memories, she said.
“111 remember the team the most,” Ewing said. “I’ll definitely remember what we accomplished together and how we jelled. These are my best friends here, and my experience at Syracuse wouldn’t be what it was without them. Ten years from now, I’ll remember how special the team was to me.”

Ewing now focuses primarily on schooling.
Gigon in the rigors of collegiate lacrosse. Playing her way to an undefeated record, Gigon said she takes full advantage of Ewing’s presence in practice.
“She’s been so supportive since day one,” said Gigon, who boasts a .551 save percentage and a goals against average of 7.05. “When I come in, she welcomed me with open arms. And she’s encouraged me every day in practice and in the games.”

Offering advice while observing the freshman’s ingoalie improve, Ewing said she sees Gigon’s potential to become one of the nation’s top goalkeepers.
Quickness, confidence and an aggressive nature should bring Gigon continued success, said
Ewing, who said she possesses the utmost confidence in the Hingham, Mass., native.
A broadcast journalism and political science dual major, Ewing will seek a position in the television industry this fall.

Before then, she and senior attacker Lauren Brady plan to spend two months backpacking in Europe.

Despite the fact that her career may come to an end on the sidelines, Ewing said she will always value the privilege of being the first goaltender in Orangewan women’s lacrosse history.
Leading her teammates to an Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Championship last season, Ewing compiled an 18-6 record over her three seasons, passing a .551 save percentage and a 7.66 GAA with one shutout.
“lt’s a great feeling to know
I was here from the beginning, and I’ll always treasure that,” she said. “I’ll always be in the first picture of the Syracuse women’s lacrosse team, and that’s great.”

“I guess in 20 years I’ll feel really old because I can say, ‘I was on the first team.’ That will always be something that will be special to me and the rest of my teammates.”

you face different hitters, it’s a big change,” SU head coach Mary Jo Firnbach said. “I have very high expectations for everyone in this program, and Tara is definitely fulfilling a lot of the expectations I had for her.”

The Orangewomen struggled to score against the Big Red, winning the game in the first extra inning. However, the team felt comfortable knowing Cornell could not even get on base, let alone score.

DiMaggio, a Hopewell Junction native, struck out 11 Big Red batters while going all eight innings for her 18th win of the season. She did not give up a hit until a fifth-inning single by Annette Sheppard.

After a leadoff bloop single in the bottom of the eighth, DiMaggio settled down and retired the side, striking out the final two Cornell hitters.

“We’re very confident playing with Tara,” said freshman catcher Cheryl Julicher, who has witnessed DiMaggio’s recent streak from behind the plate. “Hitters don’t do well against her, and we know that. We kind of take that for granted sometimes.”

DiMaggio was one of the top three high school pitchers in New York state, leading John Jay High School to a 9-12 record in four years. She pitched 16 no-hitters, including four in a row, and two perfect games.

Early in her first collegiate season, Firnbach’s young ace faced difficulty connecting on her pitches, which include a low fastball that spins well and a dropball that is devastating when she commands it.

DiMaggio broke out for 14 strikeouts in the SU’s home opener against Binghamton on April 6. Since then, she holds a 6-2 record and 13-10 overall with a 1.39 ERA. DiMaggio has faced 213 batters in 175 2/3 innings.

She’s been on a streak lately, so hey, let’s keep it going.”

With junior Missy Bie man also in the rotation, DiMaggio does not have to pitch every game. However, now that the Orangewomen are back on the field regularly, she said, things are starting to fall into place.

“I feel like I’ve gotten a lack of work just because of the fact we’ve gotten rained out so much,” DiMaggio said. “Now that we’re playing some more games, it’s easier to get into a groove and start throwing well.”

The ball began rolling for DiMaggio when she pitched two shutouts in both games of a twinbill at Siena last Thursday.

She struck out 12 and gave up three hits in a 2-0 win in the opener and followed by mowing down 11 Saints in the 6-0 nightcap, allowing only four hits.

The DiMaggio Express picked up steam with her no-hitter Tuesday. Firnbach said the Syracuse defense fumbled something magical was in the works because they weren’t many balls hit to left.

“It doesn’t surprise me at all,” Firnbach said. “She was due, and against a team like Buffalo I think it was good that she didn’t play down to their level. She was definitely more advanced than some of their hitters.”

The players in the field probably knew what was happening, but the DiMaggio battery tandem was unaware.

“I didn’t really think about it until the end when we were told,” Julicher said. “Tara pitched a great game. She’s been on a streak lately, so hey, let’s keep it going.”

up in the postseason.

After falling to register a point during the regular season, Byrnes tallied his first collegiate assist in SU's national semifinals last week. In the final eight games of 1998, Byrnes scored all four of his annual semifinals.

His first goal came the following April, and as the season progressed, Byrnes added to his point total. In the final eight games of 1998, Byrnes scored all four of his goals.

"I think it's just coincidence," he said. "Sometimes the ball goes in, and somedoubtedly, numbers don't lie. Byrnes scored six of his career-high 15 goals last season during the NCAA Tournament, including four in the final two games.

"Along with the Cordisco twos (Jeff and Chris), Tim carried us through the play-offs last year," fellow midfield Joe Ceglia said, referring to last season's second two goals in the first quarter against Princeton, including Byrnes' new linemates this season, classmates Stu
Smith and sophomore Tom Hardy, have applied strong pressure to opposing goalkeepers. Last weekend, Byrnes continued to reap his typical late-season success.
He scored three times in last week's 17-3 pasting of then-No. 4 Princeton, including two goals in the first quarter when the Orangemen took total control.

"Tim has really stepped it up in the second half of the season," Devoe said.
"(Against Princeton) I don't think he was going to be denied."

Recent opponents have tried to focus on slowing down the Syracuse attack-men, making offensive preduction from multiple mid-field lines even more crucial.
The strategy benefits Byrnes, who scored six of his 11 goals in the last four games.

"It's just really easy to play with him because he brings a very good comfort level," said Smith, who is also Byrnes' roommate. "He's a good friend of everyone on the team."

Byrnes says he always wanted to play for the Syra-cue team, but not only in lacrosse. He also has a big Syracuse basketball fan, acknowledging its storied past.

"It's just a tradition I wanted to be part of," he said.

Byrnes earned four varnity letters in each sport at Baldwin Senior High School.
As a result, he knew he wanted to attend Syracuse at an early age.

Although Byrnes grew up idolizing Orangemen legends Gary and Paul Gait, it was teammates such as Casey Powell and Rob Kavovit who took him under their wings and kept him headed in the right direction during his freshman year. This gratitude motivates him to help the team's newcomers.

Among this year's younger players are two of Byrnes' former high school teammates from Baldwin:
sophomore starting defender Billy St. George and freshmen midfielder Mike Smith.

Byrnes helped bring those two players to Central New York because besides starring in lacrosse, they are even better people, he said.

"I started my career with them," Byrnes said, "and now get a chance to end my career with them."

However, a Syracuse
insert career void of a national championship is a career unfulfilled.

And although he may not have the hardest shot or the fastest legs on the team,
Byrnes might help lead the Orangemen to their first title in five years.

"He just put his heart on his sleeve," Ceglia said.
"He's a guy you can depend on."

eighth with a single up the middle past a diving Big Red shortstop Joanne Keck. With one out, Richards bunted Collins to third.

Third baseman Jackie Herrman then smacked a single to right field. Before right fielder Kelly Olino could throw out Herrman at first, Collins rounded third and scored the go-ahead run.

DiMaggio closed the game in the bottom half of the inning to give the Orangewomen a 1-0 win. She finished with 11 strikeouts, including four innings with two Ks.

“She’s been pitching great lately,” Herrman said. “If we didn’t win that game, that would have been our fault because she’s pitched awesome.”

SU struggled at the plate on the afternoon. While DiMaggio dominated in game one, Syracuse did not have the luxury of its ace for game two.

Syracuse took a 1-0 lead in the top of the third inning as Collins grounded to Keck, who threw the ball over first baseman Drew Martin’s head and into the Cornell dugout. The error enabled Collins to advance to second with no outs. After a Park groundout and a Richards walk, Herrman hit a sacrifice fly, giving SU the early lead.

Cornell scored in the bottom of the inning, as center fielder Eva Nahorniak singled up the middle. After a Keck bunt moved Nahorniak to second, SU pitcher Missy Bieman got wild. She walked one batter and hit the next two, loading the bases with only one out. Bieman struck the next batter out, but Sheppard followed with a single off the pitcher’s glove to score Nahorniak from third base.

Cornell scored a second run as designated player Christina Trout followed with a single to put the Big Red ahead 2-1.

After retiring the Orangewomen in order in the fourth, Cornell got an insurance run in the bottom of the inning on a dropped third strike by catcher Cheryl Julicher. The miscue allowed Nahorniak to score from third.

Richards opened the top of the sixth inning with a single to center field. After a Herrman bunt moved Richards to second, Julicher laid down a double to left center field to drive in Richards and pull SU within one at 2-1.

“I had been struggling all day. Hitting hard, just at people,” Julicher said. “I got it through in the gap. It’s our job and we expect everyone to do it so if it wasn’t me, it should have been someone else.”

The Orangewomen had another chance in the top of the seventh inning. After left fielder Shanna Newell singled to start the inning, Park bunted her to second base. But Richards was unable to knock in the run, grounding out to third.

“It’s a bunting game,” Firnbach said. “We have to execute and we had the situation set up the way we needed. Lindsay has been hitting the ball well and hitting it into the gap, so we would have scored her. This time, she just didn’t come through.”

And a day after the Orangewomen scored 17 runs in a doubleheader against Buffalo, all they could manage against Cornell was three.

“We came out a little slow in the second game,” Julicher said. “We didn’t really get it done. Our offense kind of struggled in the first game but we came back and got it done. In the second game, we just didn’t execute.”

LAKEWOOD, Calif. — It's a constant struggle, Leslie Marciano says, to do the little things.

It took a few months to re-learn how to walk.

Cooking a meal is always an adventure. Taking a bath is difficult. Pulling socks on is her toughest task.

Marciano has been using weight training to start her recovery. A man in his sixties sits about 10 feet from Marciano, slowly pedaling a stationary exercise bike with the help of one crutch, dexterously moving back and forth.

And, she says, her happiness lies in a return to normalcy. She is now walking and plans to return to SU next semester.

Marciano stands with the aid of crutches at Rancho Los Amigos Medical Center in Downey, Calif. Doctors predicted that she would never walk again but less than one year later, the 22-year-old expects to return to SU to finish her degree.

She's so good and dedicated," Johnson says. "We'll try something with her, and she'll follow through with the nurses later that night."

"Whoa," Johnson says, as Marciano's right foot falls out of its pedal strap. "You all right?"

"Yeah," responds Marciano, who puts the foot back in and immediately continues. Ten seconds later, she's pedaling faster than she has the entire time.

"Does it feel like it's gonna break?" asks Renee Johnson, twisting and kneading Marciano's left knee as if it were a piece of dough.

"Uh-huh," is all Marciano can say.

Marciano plans to book a flight to Syracuse for May 10 or 11 so she can watch her friends graduate, says her mother, Mindy.

Marciano was completely paralyzed with no hope of recovery, and doctors gave her a five percent chance of walking again.

Now, all she wants to do is fly — literally and figuratively.

"I miss knowing where everything is," Marciano says. "My life there. The academics. The ROTC. The worst is being stuck in a bed with nothing to do and watching five channels on TV."

Marciano spends one on one time with Johnson, in her 11th year at Rancho Los Amigos. She had three of her six surgeries there, including the most painful (back of the neck, second time) and the one that restricts her walking (left knee, second time).

Nonetheless, Marciano's progress has impressed therapists and doctors alike. She started walking in late October with the aid of a walker. Marciano since has gone through three sets of crutches, each less supportive than the previous.

"They've started referring to me as a veteran," she says.

"Yep," responds Marciano, who puts the foot back in and immediately continues. Ten seconds later, she's pedaling faster than she has the entire time.

"She's so good and dedicated," Johnson later says. "We'll try something with her, and she'll follow through with the nurses later that night."

As part of her rehabilitation program, Marciano has been using weight training to strengthen weakened muscles. She hopes to rejoin the ROTC program when she returns to SU.
Gabriel Gervais conquered Big East soccer.
Now he tries to do the same in the A-League.

Keith Bullock waited 29 picks before NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue called his name.
Jason Hart and Efan Thomas will sweat it out until the NBA picks its rookies in June.
But for one Syracuse star, the not-so-bright lights of his draft already passed.

Gabriel Gervais, a forward on the SU soccer team last season, was selected Feb. 9 by the Rochester Raging Rhinos of the A-League.
The A-League is only one step below the level of Major League Soccer, and the Rhinos made Gervais the former SU star their first pick in the draft.

Earlier in the year, the Montreal Impact of the National Professional Soccer League picked Gervais in the league's territorial draft. He turned down the invitation, however.

Gervais is now Rochester-bound, finding himself in a position of which he has always dreamed.

"I definitely wanted to keep playing after graduation," Gervais said. "Ever since I came to SU, I wanted to play pro ball and I couldn't be in a better position right now."

The Rhinos are one of the premier teams in the A-League and won the U.S. Open Cup this past fall. In addition, a new soccer stadium awaits the team in the near future after the New York State Legislature passed a bill this past April, allocating $15 million to build PauTec Park.

The competition to stay on the Rochester roster is fierce, but Gervais said he feels as if his years at Syracuse helped prepare him for the moment.

"The Big East is one of the best conferences in the country with a good mix of technical and physical players," Gervais said. "But I'm most thankful to the coaches. They worked real hard to make me a more complete player, and they weren't afraid to point out any aspects I needed to improve."

The coaches downplay the role they had in his success but said Gervais has the talent to compete in the A-League right now — and the potential to reach the MLS.

Gervais first found out the Rhinos chose him via the Internet. The draft was posted on the Web as each selection was made, and as Rochester decided on Gervais, his name appeared on screen.

Within minutes, Gervais said, he received calls from almost all of his teammates, which he regards as the highlight of the day and a true mark of the Orange men.

"The fact that they all called really gives a good idea of how this team works and how unselfish everyone is," Gervais said. "Everyone is concerned with the success of their teammates, and I've really been able to make some great friends because of it."

Gervais, who grew up in Brossard, Quebec, transferred to Syracuse after one season at McGill University in Montreal.

In addition to the high levels of academic and athletic achievement present on campus, Gervais credits...

Princess despises running

She hates the Syracuse winters that force her to train inside nearly half the year, and she takes exception to the jokes her teammates crack about her newest shattered record.

Oh, and if you’re reading, dad, don’t bother calling anymore. She hates you, too.

Read the warning, because the last thing you want to do is tick Princess off. After all, she spent the bulk of her college career outlifting wide receivers on both coasts.

For fun, Princess grabs a one-kilogram discus, while herself three times and chuck out more than 60 yards.

When that bores her, she lifts a four-kilo shot to her right cheek, shifts her 225 pounds from her right foot to her left and puts the heavy ball 56 feet.

Those heaves place Princess in the top 10 in the United States in the two events and make her a contender for a spot on the United States’ 2000 Olympic team.

She might not block jump shots into the sixth row or scramble for 12 yards on a critical third-and-eight, but the five-time All-American ranks as the most decorated athlete on the Syracuse campus.

Just a decade ago, however, the 6-foot-1 high schooler appeared ticketed to a Division III athletics career.

Everything changed with a phone call and a ballet class.

New to the college coaching ranks in 1997, Candy Roberts wanted a star. She won the Pac-10 discus championship as a UCLA Bruin three years earlier and started coaching at Cal State Northridge after graduation.

Tallied dipped a bit from a premier track and field program to Northridge, a Big Sky Conference school. Roberts worked with a handful of skilled throwers, but no one whom she could push to the top.

Daws the road at Littlerock High School, Cheree Hicks transformed herself from awkward basketball center to track and field star and school Homecoming Queen.

She won the discus at the Southern California sectionals her senior year, but only nearby Sacramento State offered her a Division I scholarship.

Until the phone call.

Littlerock track coach Jim Bauer told Roberts about his improving thrower. Hicks and her mom, Tina, then visited Northridge. Roberts tendered a scholarship and Hicks found herself a home.

Roberts, meanwhile, found herself a financially unprepared thrower with shaky technique.

"Cheree’s a big girl," Roberts said. "We tried to develop her motor coordination. In highly technical movements, she struggled a little bit."

In Hicks’ first semester at Northridge, Roberts enrolled her in a ballet class. A popular option for football players looking to better their balance and flexibility, the new training brought the freshman from pushover to prodigy.

Hicks became more consistent with her technique. Instead of topping over in the middle of her three-spin discus approach, the motion became fluid and distances started to multiply.

"Ballet class taught me to concentrate on individual parts of my body," she said. "I could get them to do what I want to do. The throw is only 10 seconds long, and I can feel everything I’m doing wrong and everything I’m doing right."

By Memorial Day 1997, Hicks became the first freshman All-American in Northridge history. After that season, Roberts confronted Hicks about dedicating herself to bigger long-term goals.

The talk of national titles and Olympic appearances electrified Hicks, and she allowed Roberts to mold her into a champion.

She regretted the choice almost immediately.

The workouts got too tough, the weight sessions so difficult she would whimper between repetitions. Hicks’ early trouble earned her the nickname that sticks today.

"She called me ‘Princess’ and told me I was too prissy to be a thrower," Hicks said. "Roberts rode me all freshman year. She told me I’d never be a good thrower."

Hicks continued to train under Roberts, but a dream of attending school outside California surfaced in her mind. Roberts leaving Northridge to take a job at Syracuse sealed the deal.

Hicks had always dreamed of leaving California to attend college. She checked out North Carolina and Wyoming before narrowing her choices to UCLA and Syracuse. At the last moment, she followed Roberts to New York.

"UCLA was right around the corner from my house," she said. "But I had a great coach, but I’m a person who likes to stand out. I wasn’t going to jump on the bandwagon and go to UCLA."

Leaving Northridge meant leaving home, where her mother served as a constant calming influence. Hicks’ brother George, 26, promotes up-and-coming comedy acts on the West Coast.

Dad, however, no longer factors into Cheree’s life. He divorced Tina and took off just after his daughter turned 15.

With Cheree a successful NCAA athlete, dad attempts to crawl back into her life with the occasional surprise phone call. But her love for mom and bitterness toward her father forces Cheree to slam the door every time.

"He’s always trying to call,” she said. "I’ll talk to him when my luck is down and I have nothing to contribute."

With dad a bad memory and mom 3,000 miles away, the significance of the relationship between Hicks and Roberts becomes magnified.

Roberts mentored her protégé through a rough first year at SU. Hicks needed to take six classes each semester to build her way through the introductory courses in the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications, where she studies public relations.

Hicks also needed to adjust her training regimen, moving inside to avoid the winter’s cold and snow. Instead of practicing on the field around New Year’s, Hicks fired the discus into the net, and her early performances fell short of her past throws.

Roberts encouraged a frustrated Hicks and ensured her that the throws would improve. In February 1999, she shattered the Big East record in the shot put, and a month later she finished fourth in the nation in that event.

The bonds built that first winter in Syracuse held today and help boost Hicks to her highest potential.

"You can’t do what we do without having complete trust in your coach," said Tim Adrian, a SU freshman who works out with Hicks. "She does every single thing her coach tells her to do a 100 percent."

Last spring, Hicks moved outside and demolished all comers. She rolled through the season, breaking ECAC and Big East records in both throwing events. Those performances sparked the ribbing from her teammates that Hicks would stop.

At the NCAAAs late last spring, her best discus toss merited her a third-place finish. She ended up sixth in the shot as well and garnered All-America honors in both.

This season followed a similar pattern of excellence. She placed second in the shot at the Indoor NCAAAs at the University of Arkansas with a throw of 55’7”.

At the tender age of 10, Syracuse women's basketball player Shannon Perry first stepped onto the court at the Fox Point Boys and Girls Club in Providence, R.I., with players three years her older.

Today, the 5-foot-8 freshman phenom overcomes her lack of collegiate experience and height with the same enthusiasm and dogged determination.

"She is just a really neat kid," SU coach Marianna Freeman said. "Her mother has done a great job of raising her. She is a very coachable and respectful young lady. She has a great attitude to us as a youngster on the floor with a certain maturity to her that players a few years in sometimes don't have."

The shooting guard earned her introduction to the sport from her brother, Derric, who is three years her elder. Playing organized basketball with him and many of her male cousins, Perry stood out as the only female and one of the strongest-willed players on the team.

There really was nothing else for her to do coming from a family of all boys," said Perry's mother, Robin. "She did what they did, and I was somewhat surprised. But she really had a passion. There's a drive I see in her, and it's something that she has always had."

Perry averaged 11.0 points and a whopping 7.3 rebounds per game this season in just 29-plus minutes per contest. Snatching the Rhode Island star away from Providence College, Notre Dame and Temple last winter marked no easy task for SU, though.

A significant component to Perry's decision sprung from her relationship with former Orangemen assistant basketball coach Louis Orr. Orr's daughter, Monica Mack, played Catholic Youth Organization basketball with Perry at Holy Name in Providence.

In her senior year at LaSalle Academy, she averaged 25 points, 15 rebounds and seven steals and led the Rams to a Division I Rhode Island state title. Perry never lost more than 20 games total — including youth leagues — prior to entering SU, she said.

So the agony of stomaching defeat with bothersome regularity this season left the 20-year-old searching for answers. The Orangewomen's 10-18 record and a first-round loss to Georgetown in the Big East Tournament should never have occurred, Perry said.

A 76-73 early-season loss to Iowa in the Hawkeye Classic plagued the team throughout its season, she said. Failing to shake the loss, the Orangewomen limped after a 7-3 beginning, with a 3-15 finish.

The season-ending skid included two losses to an inferior Seton Hall squad, one to last-place West Virginia and a defeat at the hands of a Villanova team SU already had beaten.

A deep bench and a reconstituted mental approach should key a revival of SU's program next season, Perry said, who noted poor communication during rough times as hindering team development.

We had a rough season," she said. "Nothing went our way. I felt we would have succeeded this year had we gotten over that loss to Iowa. We need to communicate more when things go wrong. We need to talk about it, get over it and not hold on to things."

The Big East All-Rookie team selection said the thought of transferring out of Syracuse never crossed her mind, not even during the depressing Central New York winter when her team's fortunes plummeted along with the weather.

"I get along with everyone," she said. "It would be tough to leave knowing we have enough talent as a team to be back near the top of the Big East. I'm going to stick around until we do it."

Despite the personal accolades, Perry said she feels the need of Allen Griffin lost his starting spot to Tony Bland last season but came back in the NCAA Tournament to score a team-high 14 points against a stingy Michigan State defense in SU's 75-68 Sweet 16 loss.

A newfound maturity gives Allen Griffin the moxie to take over the men's basketball leadership.

Allen Griffin and his boys on the Syracuse basketball team had a newfangled idea.

They would wear Nike headbands as a show of team unity, a show of togetherness, a show of the future.

They called themselves the Four Amigos. It was 6-foot-1 AG, a starter-turned-bench player, Damone Brown, the explosive starting forward, Tony Bland, the mercurial starting shooting guard and DeShaun Williams, the sharpshooting freshman.

Griffin, a junior, was the de facto leader of the foursome. As a point guard with a shooting guard's mentality — he started at the two his sophomore season — Griffin was the honcho of the headband.

Griffin started playing basketball seriously when he was 12 years old. A multi-sport athlete, basketball gripped him. While others in his Brooklyn neighborhood depended on drugs, hoops remained Griffin's vice.

And each day, like clockwork, AG headed to the streets.

"There were guys out there who were as good as you, or even better," he said. In order to gain respect, you had to compete against those guys. And I did it day-in and day-out.

"I knew he could play, and play awfully well. Griffin's first tattoo, a bald eagle — he was nicknamed "Bird" because his friends thought he looked like one — has a yellow claw gripping an orange basketball."

Basketball served as a distraction from starting over

After teaming with Jason Hart to form SU's starting backcourt two seasons ago, Allen Griffin saw his time on the court shrink considerably last season.

This didn't limit the contributions from the junior guard, though, as he stepped up when Hart was in foul trouble against Boston College and played well at St. John's in a 76-75 Orange-meri loss.

In the season-ending defeat against Michigan State, Griffin played his best game of the season, scoring 14 points off the bench. His 10 first-half points helped spark SU to a decided 34-24 lead at intermission.

With the graduation of Hart, Griffin hopes to earn playing time similar to his sophomore-season numbers when Syracuse takes the court next season.

The Year That Was

From the stabbings at Sadie's Place to the Orangemen's 19 straight victories, the 1999-2000 season will live on for years to come.

Football

The Syracuse football coaching staff used the team's 24-21 overtime loss to Virginia Tech to motivate its players. The Orange went on to win six straight games, including a come-from-behind victory against the Maryland Terrapins.

The Orangemen cruised through the first two-game slate of the season, putting up 137 points in wins over Howard and Towson. But after a slow start, the junior found her rhythm and led the team to victory in the Carrier Dome.

After two years of planning, the Syracuse softball program debuts with surprising success.
One of the fastest players in the Big East, senior forward Kelly Hambleton earned second-team All-America status. She had 17 goals and seven assists to lead the Orangewomen to the Big East finals.

GRADUATING CLASS

Their personalities may differ, but Kelly Hambleton and Tracy Larkin brought the same fire to Syracuse field hockey.

BY KEVIN LEITZELL
STAFF WRITER

The last thing Tracy Larkin wanted to do that day was talk to reporters.

Trying to hold back her tears, Larkin quietly reflected on Syracuse's 2-0 loss to Connecticut on Nov. 7 in the Big East Field Hockey Championship game at Coyne Field.

The usually jubilant senior co-captain looked as if her greatest treasure was lost forever. To Larkin and the eight other seniors on the Orangewomen squad, it was.

Hambleton and fellow senior Kelly Hambleton were the leaders of the squad, emotionally and statistically. And when they lost that game, they lost their last chance to win a Big East Championship.

"There was a lot about pride with them," junior defender Colleen Gehl said. "They both put everything on the line in the last game against UConn. They really knew the potential of this program, and they wanted to be the ones to get us there. We came pretty darn close though."

The hollow feeling exhibited by Larkin and Hambleton showed the intense emotion the two seniors hold toward SU field hockey. Each has dedicated four years to a program, and both say it has been a major part of their lives since well before they first stepped foot on the Hill.

Living only an hour from SU in nearby Greene, Larkin frequently visited Syracuse athletic events. Her father is a graduate of SU as is her older sister, Kelly, who was an All-American on the 1991 field hockey team.

"I was born and raised an hour away from here," Larkin said. "It's in my blood. I've been following the sport since I was 11. There is a larger connection for me to the team than most people come in here with."

Hambleton's journey from suburban Philadelphia to the Salt City rode a similar course. Both of her parents and an uncle attended Syracuse, and her father lettered in football from 1971-73.

Like her teammate, there was no other choice for Hambleton but Syracuse.

"Before I came here, Syracuse was my parents' place," Hambleton said. "For the last four years, it's been my place. Field hockey has been like a family to me. Coach (Kathleen Parker) makes fun of me that my blood bleeds orange, and it totally does."

The orange blood that pours out of Hambleton's and Larkin's veins is the type Parker likes to pump. She tries to recruit players with the love for the school and program that Hambleton and Larkin possess.

It wasn’t simply the 17-3 record at Fairfield or the fact that he was one of the lacrosse team’s 12 seniors that made the Orange’s 1997 season so special. It was the team’s, and its coach’s, development that stood out. The team lost seven starters, including star attackman Casey Powell, and it was a major reason why the team finished third in the Big East and made the NCAA tournament.

As soon as we all met, we immediately realized that we were in a good position primarily because of Casey’s leadership,” head coach John Desko said. “We all get along great, which helps a lot. But maybe we’re a little bit better prepared because we may have to get on other’s cases a little bit more when we need to add a job done.

But these positive experiences were not the only places where athletic department had not decided in 1995 to give Division I status to what was once merely a club team.

A blank canvas

Once Fimbach settled into her off-season job of teaching, organizing players, hire assistant coaches and setting up the schedule, the bottom fell out.

Much like a fantasy baseball owner drafting her team, Fimbach found herself picking a starting five when it came to filling out the other positions. Most notably, the starting goalie was an unproven and unpolished solid infield that excels on defense. But Hambleton, a former Navy Linebacker, seemed to fill the void. Each position was filled by players she recruited or invited to tryout.

Pointed Comparison

Undoubtedly two of the best players in Syracuse lacrosse history, Ryan and Casey Powell have enjoyed a great degree of success on the Carrier Dome turf. Both are All-Americans, both were or are regarded among the best players in the country, both wear No. 22. And they remain best friends.

Along with the Gait brothers, the Powells rank as one of the top two brother combinations to ever don the orange and blue.

Current Orangeman Ryan matches up statistically with professional lax player Casey and is gaining ground on the Syracuse career point leader with each passing game.

Regardless of where the two end up on the scoring charts, they will be remembered for the indelible mark they left on the program. Remember, Ryan’s career at Syracuse will go for two more regular-season games, plus the postseason.

BY GREG BISHOP

ASST. SPORTS EDITOR

With only two regular-season games and one NCAA Tournament remaining in his storied lacrosse career, Ryan Powell has scored 121 goals.

In four years at Syracuse, between 1995-98, his older brother Casey tallied 158.

Total points read similarly: Casey 287 (No. 1 all-time), Ryan 259 (No. 5 and climbing).

And while younger brother doesn’t hesitate in making sure older brother knows he’s gaining ground, Ryan Powell desperately wants something Casey has, something that would make all the hard work worth it — something that would finish shaking off Casey’s All-American shadow.

“He calls me up,” Casey said, “and will say on my answering machine after a big game, ‘He’s coming,’ or something like that. I’ll just call him up later and tell him he shouldn’t talk to a national champion like that.”

When the brothers see each other, Casey doesn’t greet Ryan with a traditional wave. The ring — the one from SU’s national championship in 1995 — comes first and serves as a motivator for the Orangemen’s captain.

“He says the ring is always up front,” Ryan said. “I talk to my brother all the time on the phone, and he’s rubbing it in about the ring on his finger. “My brother and I are very close, and we’ve just been so competitive throughout our lives. That’s something that I want to stick back in his face. I want to show him that I was capable of getting one, too, and leading a team to one of these.”

Brotherly love

For the Powell brothers, winning a national championship has always been the first and foremost goal, dating back to when Casey was in sixth grade and Ryan in fourth. That’s when the brothers picked up sticks for the first time.

Growing up in the small town of Carthage, a normal day had a certain rhythm to it, beginning and ending with lacrosse as top priority.

The brothers, who were the first in their town with lacrosse equipment, would sleep with their sticks the night before a game and turn on a spotlight when it got dark to practice more, Ryan said.

The backyard consisted of a dirt field and served as the Powell battle ground. Fights would occur almost weekly, Casey said, as the brothers honed what would become All-American lax skills behind the house.

WRC representative speaks with campus media, students

BY MAGIN MCKENNA

A representative from the Worker Rights Consortium defended criticism Thursday that the student-created organization is too new to effectively monitor unfair labor conditions around the globe.

"It is unfair to say the WRC lacks the organizational structure to make a difference," WRC representative David Unger told campus media during a Thursday press conference. "We've assembled the experts on monitoring to endorse us. We have the power to force universities to put pressure on companies."

Unger, a sophomore industrial relations major at Cornell University, was invited to Syracuse University by the SU Trademark Licensing Advisory Board to speak about his organization's efforts in monitoring labor practices.

Assembly charges NYPIRG with violating election codes

BY TIFFANY LANKES
Asst. News Editor

Even after the polls closed Thursday evening, the controversy regarding the referendum to determine funding for the New York Public Interest Research Group persisted.

The debate rekindled when NYPIRG officials received a memo Tuesday night from Syracuse University Student Government Association Elections Commissioner Chris Ryan, accusing them of violating election codes.

"Various officials of NYPIRG, both SU students and operatives from outside of the university, have inappropriately influenced and/or attempted to influence the voting process for the referendum," Ryan charged.

Ryan also accused Assemblyman Adam Duffy of assisting in this attempt by "illegitimately tampering with election materials."

Duffy said he had not been aware that changes were being brought against him.

"They're only doing this because NYPIRG won," said Duffy, a freshman political science major. "Their claim that I somehow tampered with the votes is wrong. It seems like if they were so upset about what they did they would have contacted me."

A final vote count has yet to be released.

Ryan refused to comment on possible NYPIRG violations.

Students voted Tuesday through Thursday to determine whether NYPIRG, the student-created political action committee, could continue to represent SU students on the Upper Senate.

Police, students prepare for riot anniversary

BY ASHLEIGH GRAF

As the anniversary of last year's Livingston block party riot approaches, Syracuse Police Department Sgt. Joe Sweeney said more patrol cars will be added to the off-campus area.

"We're trying to make everyone aware that these things aren't going to be tolerated," Sweeney said Thursday. "We don't want to break parties up. We're not going to go looking for action."

More than 1,000 students tried to prevent police officers from ending the annual block party on May 1. Students were destructive, igniting bonfires and throwing bottles at police officers, fire fighters and city vehicles. Dozens were arrested and more than $20,000 in damages were reported.

A request early this month for a permit to close Livingston Avenue for another block party was denied by the city.

Although police said they are not targeting parties, they will not hesitate to reprimand students if one becomes out of control, Sweeney said. This includes if a party becomes too noisy, if students overpark a street with cars or if there is an abundance of intoxicated students in an area.

Police will inform students of the laws they are violating before making arrests and breaking up the party, he said.

NEW YORK CITY — New York Mayor Rudolph Giulani announced Thursday morning that he has prostate cancer and said he will continue to work. "I do not claim" what choice he will make, if any, the diagnosis may have on his high-profile campaign for U.S. Senate that starts May 17, said Mayor Rudolph Giulani.

Gore said that he does consider the disease an early stage, recovery rate is very high. Treatment options include removal of the prostate gland and radiation therapy.

Gore said it may take up to three weeks before he and his doctor decide on a course of action and he noted that some treatment might require him to take time off, something he would affect his campaign.

The biking cancer is the second most common form of cancer in men, according to the National Cancer Institute, caught an early stage, the recovery rate is very high. Treatment options include removal of the prostate gland and radiation therapy.

Gore said it may take up to three weeks before he and his doctors decide on a course of action and he noted that some treatment might require him to take time off, something he would affect his campaign.

Doctors diagnosed the cancer on Wednesday following a biopsy of Giulani's prostate gland. Prior to earlier blood tests indicated that the mayor had elevated levels of prostate-specific antigen, a protein commonly called PSA.

The mayor said he had since died of prostate cancer in 1981, before the latest screening tests.

The study authors said they are not receiving more money to pay for their children in government-sponsored health programs.

SU officials donate to Clinton, ignore Giuliani

By Dave Levinthal

Syracuse University is Hillary Rodham Clinton territory, according to the pocketbooks of university employees.

A roster of notables, including Vice Chancellor Deborah Freund, former Vice Chancellor Gershon Vincow and two college deans, have donated a combined $5,625 to Clinton's U.S. Senate campaign through March 31 - but the Democratic primary candidate has yet to donate a single reported contribution.

"I live in Upstate New York. I'm an intelligent woman who has suffered publicly from the backlash that comes with being an intelligent woman," Freund said. "What the hell — it was glamorous. It was a party. It was a scene. It was great."

How do you plan to spend your summer?

Career climbers and couch potatoes alike have big plans for summer.

Finding a summer internship can seem a bit daunting, but it's not as tough as it seems. After having recently accepted an internship with NBC's finance department, I've learned a few tricks about how to jump-start the internship search and application process.

My benefits package at NBC includes housing at Columbia University for the entire summer as well as a weekly salary. Many of my friends ask me how I got such a nice set-up. The single most important piece of advice that I give them and anyone else looking for an internship is this: Start early.

Last school year I learned my lesson. After starting my internship search in April, I realized that I had already missed many of the deadlines and the one contact I was sure I had fallen through. Consequently, I spent the summer selling vacuum cleaners door-to-door. I got bit by a dog while doing it. I did well, but I told myself that I would never wait until the last minute again — or get bit by another dog again, for that matter.

When I returned to school in the fall, I started my internship search by going to every job fair on campus, I handed my resume out to almost every company I came across. I was determined to get something. The last thing anyone should do is be afraid to attend job fairs. You have nothing to lose — the worst they can tell you is, "Sorry, we don't have internships for the summer."

They're especially helpful because they give you practice presenting yourself to people. I have received many calls back from companies just because I took the time to give them my resume. The Center for Career Services is probably one of the most valuable resources on campus — and an often overlooked one.

I picked up the center's weekly publication "Career News" and found the companies that would be in town doing interviews. It was through this publication that I submitted my resume and got an interview for the NBC internship position. I had my first interview here at the Career Center and I was later called to New York City for a second interview, all expenses paid. I found out shortly after Christmas break that I was one of six chosen for the position.

There are a few key moves I made that I think anyone can learn from. I had a positive attitude to the internship search, which is vital. I gave my resume to as many companies as I could and I went on numerous interviews. The companies held informational meetings before each interview, and I made sure to attend all so I could make early contacts.

Finally, I was persistent throughout the entire search. I did not let any setbacks discourage me from pursuing my goal. It doesn't hurt to call a company to find out if they received your resume — especially if you haven't heard back from them yet. It's better to know that they got it than to sit and wonder about where you stand.

Internships are a very important part of securing a job for the future. Why not spend your summer getting valuable work experience that could possibly lead to bigger and better things? I'd rather do that than knock on doors in 90-degree weather and get chased by ferocious, man-eating dogs. Okay, so it was just a little story that bit me, but it sure was mean. Nonetheless, I'm glad to be moving up in the world.

Allegations warrant nullification of votes

This week's Student Government Association referenda is a sham. The process didn't follow the rules, so it doesn't stand. Allegations warrant a nullification of the entire referendum.Two of the three referenda listed on the ballot today, however, with plummeting voter turnout, are significant enough to warrant a nullification of the entire SGA election. The referendum in the Student Association's Code of Statutes in this week's referendum, including allegations of violations of election processes. Today, however, with plummeting voter turnout, is enough to warrant questioning the legitimacy of the entire election.

In his haste to find fault with NYPIRG's characterization of the SGA's Code of Statutes, the SGA Election Commissioner Chris Ryan on Monday night accused NYPIRG of being a "sham." Although Ryan didn't like what the ballots said, so it danced around the rules and figured out another way to win its battle. Ryan accused SGA of being a "sham," but he didn't follow the rules. Allegations warrant a nullification of the entire referendum.

In better days, SGA maintained an impartial Elections Commission to oversee all voting processes. Today, however, with plummeting voter turnout, SGA has no hope of attracting a substantial number of voters. Consequently, biased SGA members man polling stations. The SGA Election Commissioner Chris Ryan even implicated himself as being in violation of SGA's Code of Statutes in this week's referendum, including allegations that NYPIRG's Interest Research Group and Assemblyman Ryan have violated the SGA's Code of Statutes. In his haste to find fault with NYPIRG's characterization of the SGA's Code of Statutes, the SGA Election Commissioner Chris Ryan has no hope of attracting a substantial number of voters.

So what have I learned after my eight-month tenure as a columnist? First, I have perfected my style. I have been immensely successful in coming across as an ignorant, arrogant bastard who cares nothing about his own but peddled worldwide. In the message, she criticized my columns. "Women are god's gifts to men," I wrote. "Women are the supreme being's gifts to bisexual human and heterosex men." I was enlightened.

Of course, in addition to labeling my columns as "con-descending" and "pompous," my all-time favorite response was "Women are the supreme being's gifts to bisexual human and heterosex men." I was enlightened.

To the Editor:

Thanks to Lillian Jeng for her insightful and apt criticism of our March 28 advertisement for the Syracuse University Program in Hong Kong. Her points are well taken and the staff and administration at DIPA agreed. Furthermore, the line she quoted was historically inaccurate and culturally insensitive.

Knowing that apologies are seldom accepted, we hope the community will accept our sincere regrets and assure blunders will not occur in the future.

We hope to continue to improve our recruitment materials, so we welcome any constructive criticism and suggestions.

Walsh opponent criticizes elitism in House

Election 2000

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Managing Editor

Even though Fran Gavin said he receives federal medical aid for an injury that caused all the cartilage in his shoulder to deteriorate, he has never seen a shoulder specialist because the aid does not cover that type of treatment.

The disabled veterans benefits he receives provide a device that sends electric shocks to the area to reduce the pain, but provides nothing to fix the problem, Gavin said. It is because of politicians like Rep. Jim Walsh (R-Syracuse) that situations like this exist and working people are denied the services they need, said Gavin, who is opposing Walsh for the 25th congressional district seat for New York state in the U.S. House of Representatives.

"Jim Walsh is an elite and he always has been an elite," said Gavin, a Democrat. "He doesn't represent our interests, he represents the special interests.

Walsh could not be reached for comment.

The reason for the lack of services for average citizens is because that sector of society is consistently absent from the decision making process in Washington, D.C., said Gavin, who is competing with Walsh for the district that includes Syracuse, the surrounding communities and Syracuse University.

"If you look at all the evils and ills in our society today, it can be traced to the fact that the middle and lower classes have no voice in government," Gavin said. "The working people get the shaft and the elites benefit.

SU College Democrats brought Gavin to campus to speak with the group and others interested in his message. About 25 students attended the event Thursday afternoon in the Hall of Languages, said Ben Riemer, College Democrats president.

Although registered Onondaga County Republicans outnumber Democrats by about 160,000, there are about 140,000 registered eligible voters in the county. Getting those people to the polls will be key for Gavin's victory, Riemer said.

"They'll have to get their message out and motivate voters," he said. "For a Democrat to win, it will just be a question of motivating the unregistered voters in the district to get out and vote."

Whatever receives the official nomination of the New York State Democratic Party will be the undead and face a daunting task in running against Walsh, said Riemer, a sophomore policy studies and economics major.

"The question really is whether any Democratic candidate can be competitive in this area," he said. "It's a six-year incumbent they'll be facing and it's a challenge."

"But anything is possible. You never know."

An eight-year Syracuse resident, Gavin graduated from SU in May 1999 with a major in political science and a minor in geography.

"The desire for public service and his ability as a public servant are a direct result of spending time at the university, Gavin said. There's a lot of really great professors and students there."

"It was an honor to study at SU."

Before attending SU, he served in the Air Force as a mechanic and owned his own remodeling business. He was forced to leave the military and eventually stopped his construction work because of his shoulder injury.

Although a middle-class background and the connection it provides to the middle and lower-classes will allow Gavin to effectively represent those interests, the House said Gavin said living as a member of those classes will help him understand the issues those citizens find important.

One of the most important of those issues is education. For that reason, Gavin said that, if elected, he plans to use 10 percent of his salary as a Congressman to establish a scholarship fund for area students.

"It'll give me the opportunity to pay the people back that put me there," he said. "It'll show people that they have a representative that cares about people and that's what I do."

Despite the difficult task of taking on an opponent with more resources and more campaign experience, Gavin said he is confident in his message and background will resonate with voters.

"He added that he represents a clear contrast to Walsh and the other usual politicians found in the nation's capital."

"Once the common person hears it laid out so simply for them, they'll come running back in droves," Gavin said. "I think he's going to be surprised by that."

Suicide rates below national norm

BY EVANS BOSTON
Staff Writer

A Syracuse University sophomore jumped off a Route 605 bridge and to her death on the night of Sept. 19, 1999.

Earlier this semester, a four-year forest biology and resource management major at the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry, killed himself with a shotgun after crashing his Chevy pick-up truck into a car on Route 5.

Despite these two incidents, the SU and ESF community is normally below the national average for college student suicide, said Dr. Rebecca Dayton, clinical psychologist and director of SU Counseling Services.

The U.S. average for students aged 15 to 24 is about 1 per 10,000 students, according to the national Chronicle for Higher Education, a weekly journal. The two suicides this academic year are the first in more than seven years on either the SU or ESF campuses, Dayton said.

Suicide is the third leading cause of death for college-aged students, more than any natural cause, reported the American Foundation for Suicide Prevention.

Women on campus, however, attempt more suicides than men, Dayton noted.

SU’s Health Services tended to eight suicide attempts last semester — all reported by women, Dayton said. There were only four attempts last academic year, she added.

“More females exhibit sui- cide ideation, or thoughts about wanting to hurt themselves,” she said. “The good news is SU is below the national average.”

The American College Health Association reported that the national average for suicide attempts is four to eight a year per 10,000 students.

Seventy-five to 80 percent of student suicides are those of men because they are more involved in aggressive or violent situations, yet more women make the actual attempt, according to the health association.

Rumors to rest

Although highly competitive schools such as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Cornell University are often rumored to have high suicide rates, school officials strike down these suggestions.

“We think the reason the rumor is out there is because a lot of our suicides involve students jumping off bridges into gorges nearby campus,” said Sharon Dittman, associate director of community relations at Garrett: Cornell University Health Services. “That is an unusual or ESF-type situation.”

Five undergraduates and five graduate Cornell students killed themselves in the past decade, said Linda Grace-Kobas, director of the Cornell News Service.

But there are about 19,000 undergraduate and graduate students attending Cornell, bringing its suicide rate below the national average, Grace-Kobas said.

There are a variety of support services available at Cornell, including counseling and psychological services, crisis management and a free peer counseling service to help students deal with personal problems such as stress, loneliness, sexuality issues and relationships, she said.

We consider student sui- cides to be a very serious issue,” Grace-Kobas said. “Every student suicide is a tragedy.”

A 4-year-old campus energy conservation project is nearing its end, said Timothy Sweet, director of Syracuse University energy and computing management.

“We’ve been going through campus, building by building, and identifying energy conservation projects,” Sweet said.

Most of the building inspections are complete and teams found about $1.5 million in potential savings, he said.

The university previously spent about $8 million on energy each year, Sweet said. With the conservation project, SU will save about 10 percent, he added.

“That’s pretty significant if you look at the whole university,” he said.

A large portion of the money was saved in installing more efficient lighting, he said. There were no specific buildings that were energy-savers, although science buildings used more energy than others, Sweet said.

“But that’s to be expected,” Sweet added. “I wouldn’t say they’re an energy abuser. It’s just the nature of the beast.”

SU spent about $12 million to implement the conservation project, a sum that is well worth paying since the university will save more money in the long term, he said.

Now that the project is near completion, the department is looking for more ways to further the efficiency of the university, Sweet said.

“It’s always a constant process,” he said. “We’re constantly looking for new opportunities.”

SU received three grants from various state agencies to explore additional ways to conserve energy after the project ends.

The first grant is to help explore energy-saving alternatives in the chill water plant, across from Interstate 81, that provides coolant for the university’s air conditioning systems, he said.

The second grant is intended to aid SU research and compare prices of energy providers. The last grant will help the university look toward the future and help maintain savings from the project, Sweet said.

In addition to fostering monetary savings, the reduced energy consumption is good for the environment, Sweet added. “Most figures do translate to nitrous oxide and sulphide and various pollutants in the air,” he said. “Anyplace where you can reduce, that has an effect on the oxides produced.”

While working on the project, Dan Deinhofener, an electrician for Emerald Electrical Contractors, Inc., suffered second- and third-degree burns to his face, chest and arms April 20 when a fire broke out in a electrical closet he was working in at Bird Library. He remains in fair condition at University Hospital, 750 E. Adams St.

Despite the incident, Charlotte Noss, a member of the Student Environmental Action Coalition, applauded SU’s efforts to reduce their energy consumption and expenditures.

“I’ve definitely heard of other universities doing this and saving 50 percent on their energy bills,” Noss said. “And it’s much more environmentally friendly.”

There is still, however, a large amount of energy that can be conserved, said Noss, a junior environmental and forest biology major at the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry.

She said she recently heard of a New York City office building constructed to rely mainly on solar energy, with a small fuel cell in the basement.

“I don’t know if it’s feasible for the university to do that,” Noss added. “But I definitely think that any new construction that goes on should be researched that way.”

SU is not taking measures

“The university under-

SU was unable to perma-

Graduates launch Internet research company

BY JOY DAVIA
Special Projects Editor

Two former Syracuse University students are jumping on the lucrative Internet bandwagon, hoping their new Web-based company will solve the homework troubles of college students nationwide.

Starting Aug. 1, an Internet site at www.GetMeAnswers.com will provide students the opportunity to type in specific homework questions to be answered by the Web site's other student-users. Students must register first before using the site and pay a $25 per semester user fee.

Created by 1999 SU informational science graduates Tom Knezek and Leo Golubitsky, the Web site will serve as a forum for the transfer of information between students, helping them receive answers for a variety of topics — such as academic, social, travel and internships — quicker than they would by conducting their own Internet searches.

"We are taking a chance and joining the gold rush called the Internet," Golubitsky said.

Both creators will be on the SU campus this weekend, advertising their new business, passing out flyers and talking to students about their new venture.

Knezek said he originally conceived the idea for the Web site six months ago, after becoming disillusioned with his job as an information technology consultant group.

"I hated it," he said. "I was watching young kids making million of dollars on the Web. Hoping to cash in on this venture, Knezek said he contacted his friend Golubitsky and pitched the idea for a Web-based business. The original idea, however, was much different from the final product.

"But after doing the research and talking to students about joining the gold rush called the Internet, we decided to target users who most relied on the Internet — college students," he said. "I wasted so much time in Bird Library," Knezek said. "One time on the site can save you four or five hours of time."

Knezek relocated to Golubitsky's hometown of Cleveland to start the business, a location where they are really financially strapped. But Deb Reitan, an SU junior marketing and television, radio and film major said she doubts she would join the site because she prefers to conduct her own research. It is also unfair if some students are working hard to research while others are using the site to do work for them, she added.

"If students sign up and use the site as a research tool for their reports," she said, "it will be detrimental to their education because others are doing their own research."

The partners said the fee will not deter students from using the site, even though users have free access to the Internet. If students, however, are in a financial bind and unable to register, the company may waive the fee.

"Five dollars a month is not that big of a deal for college kids," Golubitsky said. "But we may start a scholarship program for kids who are really financially strapped."

Both Knezek and Golubitsky said they can not guarantee that every posted question will be answered. Since the site went on the Web two days ago, about 8,000 students in Cleveland and 200 students at SU have registered, Golubitsky said. Registrants students do not have to pay until the services are made available in August.

A.S.I.A. prepares for successful semester

BY KATE STEVENSON

Though Asian Students in America elected its new executive board on April 7, two board positions still remain open, said Suzie Lee, the newly-elected vice president.

The positions of treasurer and events coordinator are still empty. But despite what some students may believe, they need not be Asian to be members of A.S.I.A., or to run for executive board positions, Lee said.

"I don't know if they feel intimidated," she said of non-Asian students who shy away from becoming involved with the organization.

She invited any interested students to join in the group's end-of-the-year celebration dinner at 8 p.m. tonight at Panda West restaurant, 135 Marshall St.

"We just want to educate people on Asian culture and break down stereotypes of Asians," said Lee, a sophomore inclusive elementary education major.

Even with the vacant positions, both Lee and newly-elected President Aaron Eng said they feel optimistic about the next semester. They agreed that the main goal of A.S.I.A. should be to unite all campus Asian groups toward a common goal.

Officers are hopeful that A.S.I.A. will soon serve as an "umbrella organization" for other Asian organizations, Eng said. Once the groups are united, it will be easier and more cost-effective to plan events, he added.

"I want to do a really big show for all Asian organizations," said Eng, a sophomore marketing major. "We can all group together and pool resources and do one big event for the entire campus to showcase Asian culture and stuff, fun stuff."

Eng said he has "really big hopes" for next semester, including a concert. But he added that he is not sure if A.S.I.A.'s budget will allow those plans to reach fruition.

But Lee said she has great expectations for whatever the group does next semester, thanks to the new executive board.

"We’re off to a better start," she said. "We’re able to put aside our differences and work to become a stronger organization."

Many members of the board are close friends, she added, which helps team work.

Eng already has experience as president from temporarily serving in the position after former A.S.I.A. President Christine Ho resigned in February.

"I totally see him as being a really good leader," Lee said, adding that though members were disappointed about Ho’s resignation, it strengthened the organization emotionally.

"You need a let-down to motivate you to work at it more."

Pride Union elects new executive board

Staff Reports

Pride Union elected a new executive board during its Wednesday meetings.

The new head coordinator of the Syracuse University gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender student group will be Kemp-Delisser, who along with the other executive board members will help organize the Pride Union.

The new executive board will be comprised of new officers and members.

The new officers are:

- Senior Mary Anne Kemp-Delisser
- Junior Carolyn Boisvert
- Senior Tiara Jewell

The new executive board will meet next week to vote on what changes to the group will be made.

it's been an interesting time here at the DO, learning all the lingo, trying to remember names, and learning how to draw duck caricatures. Thanks to Dave and Emily for hiring me and then helping me along the way. Thanks to Holly and Sapna for being so patient with me. Thanks to everyone in Design for dealing with my annoying notes. To all my comic artists and illustrators: I can't thank you enough for taking the time to draw beautiful and twisted pictures for me. Without you, I would not have a job. A special thanks to all the guys who did stuff for me at the last minute. Alicia, thank you for all the times you kept me company. Thanks again to the entire DO staff for being so great to me.

You are the wind beneath my wings! Good lucky to Becky next year. Remember the power of white out. And finally, thank you to everyone who said I couldn't do it, for giving me another reason to try.

NYPIRG should continue receiving its funding directly from the Student Activity Fee or if it should be subject to the same budgetary procedure as other campus organizations.

The referenda also posed the issue of an SGA constitutional revision that would change the name of the group to the Student Association and add a promotions wing.

Ryan's charges question Duffy for re-leasing voting totals which appeared in an April 26 article in The Daily Orange. Duffy said that he did not actually count the votes in the box, but estimated the number of students who voted from the book in which students' names are recorded when they come to the polls.

Duffy projected that 20 percent of the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry voted in the referenda Tuesday. The total fulfills half of the requirement that 10 percent of both ESF students and 10 percent of SU students must vote for the referenda to be legitimate.

SGA President Jamal James said Thursday that SU also will most likely reach its 10 percent quota.

"The election commissioner informed me that we reached our 10 percent," said James, a junior musical theater major. "I'm very happy the students turned out.

The SGA Judicial Review Board will review the case at 6 p.m. tonight. Its decision, which will be announced at the SGA meeting May 1, will determine the legitimacy of the vote, Chairman of the Board Brian McGuinness-Hickey said.

Though the final results of the vote were scheduled to be released by noon today, they may be delayed because of the review board hearing.

"The board has to discuss the whole thing," Legaspi said. "It's really up to the board to decide.

NYPIRG members, however, planned to attend a training conference for their summer outreach program today in New York City, said NYPIRG Regional Coordinator Jocelyn McGuinness-Hickey. The group may not be able to represent themselves at tonight's hearing, she added.

It's really not enough time for us to line up our witnesses," McGuinness-Hickey said. "We want to be able to get this taken care of.

"We have been struggling with this for over a month and we've been met with opposition every step of the way because they control the process," Duffy said that he will try to postpone the meeting, which was already bumped up from its original May date, to accommodate NYPIRG's concerns.

"As of yet, I haven't had enough people let me know they can meet in May to do extra work," Legaspi said. "It's on the agenda, but I've suggested to NYPIRG to file an affidavit.

"Preferably, I would like to speak to both sides. If the meeting is not postponed and NYPIRG cannot send a representative, the review board will consider only written statements submitted by both sides. We will base our decision on the two written documents themselves," Legaspi said. "If each side only has the written document, one side won't have an advantage over the other.

NYPIRG brought charges against SGA on April 7 for passing a bill last month to conduct the referendum without informing the group first. The group argued that the referendum was unnecessary and would not be fair because the people selected to operate the polling stations had not been first approved by the Assembly.

The JRB accepted NYPIRG's argument and postponed the referendum two weeks.

"We really just want this to be over with," McGuinness-Hickey said. "We have projects to work on. We've learned something through — we'll keep a watch on them next time."

PAN AM
PAN AM 103 explosion over Lockerbie killed all 16 crew members, 243 passengers and 11 local residents on the ground.

Bob Monetti, whose son Richard also died in the explosion, agreed that the prosecution's case should not be damaged by their unsuccessful appeal.

"The prosecution was being really conservative and the judge just said "enough already," he said.

One reason for the requested delay may be because the prosecution's approach for the trial is to discredit the defense's witnesses before they appear in court, he added.

But Monetti said he understands the court's argument that the two Libyan suspects suspected of smuggling the bomb onto the plane have already been in jail for more than a year and should not endure another trial delay.

"If these guys are innocent, which I don't think they are, they have been in jail already for a year," he said.

The prosecution has reassured the victims' families that the case is strong and should not need another delay, he added.

"Everyone's telling us what great evidence (the prosecution) has had for the past eight, nine years since the indictment," he said. "They have not shown us anything yet so I can't wait to see it."

Volunteers expect Kidfest to be biggest ever

BY JEFF DENNIS
Staff Writer

When student volunteers planned the first Comstock Kidfest in 1991, they had in mind a small carnival-type event for local children. Ten years later, Kidfest has become bigger than anyone expected.

"We are expecting more than 600 kids this year," said Kalpna Femandes, co-chair of the Student Volunteer Organization and co-planner of the event. "It's going to be the biggest Kidfest by far."

Organizers and members of the Syracuse community say the event strengthens relations between the university and the city, helps foster campus activism and gives students a chance to give back to the community.

Originally held in the Women's Building, the Kidfest attracted 76 children from local non-profit agencies in 1991, said Femandes, a senior policy studies major. The kids played games and visited booths sponsored by student groups on campus. The event lasted just three hours but was well received by the community, she added.

The growth of Kidfest — scheduled this year for 4 p.m. today at Manley Field House — has corresponded with increasing involvement between the university and the community, said event co-planner Brian Howells, a senior policy studies major. The number of community organizations participating in the event has increased steadily since the first Kidfest in 1991, he added.

"It has constantly expanded with more and more kids coming every year," Howells said, adding that the popularity of the event has become a mixed blessing. "The more kids that come, the more it costs to put on. This year it should cost in the neighborhood of $2,000."

To cope with the growth of Kidfest, SUVO organizers moved the event to Manley Field House in 1993, Howells said. That year the event attracted 100 kids and 20 student groups which sponsored arts and crafts and game booths.

Since then, the organization of Kidfest has become a more daunting task every year, Howells and Femandes said. Aside from arranging for local agencies to bring the children to SU, taking care of liability issues and recruiting help from student groups and the Greek system, Femandes and Howells have to take care of all the "little things" — like getting 500 hot dogs for the crowd and arranging for entertainment of all kinds.

Larry King, neighborhood center director for the Bishop Foery Foundation, said Kidfest is a positive experience for the children and fun for the adults as well.

"First of all, anytime the kids get out of the neighborhood, they love it," he said. "It's a great event — we've gone every year we could."

King added that in the past Bishop Foery has brought all 65 children in their program to the event, and that he plans to bring approximately that number this year.

"It's an event that as an organization you look forward to every year," he said. "I haven't had an experience where I've seen a negative attitude from any to connect with the event."

Reaching out

Mike Henesey, director of educational programs for the City of Syracuse Department of Parks, Recreation and Youth Services, said events like Kidfest complement other programs which bring students to Parks and Rec sites to tutor, and are needed and appreciated.

"I think something like this is great — providing something for our students, helping them to realize that these kids want to learn and that this is important."

The event allows children to interact with college students who can become role models and mentors, said Jeff King, director of youth services for the Dunbar-Hancock Association.

"There are so many kids in the community who need role models," he said, adding that the students local children meet at Kidfest are also very involved and provide positive role models.

Students who man booths at Kidfest — all of them had to preregister this year — also come away with a positive experience, Howells said, adding that the event could not take place without student support.

"The Greek system is usually very involved, as are student groups funded by SGA and some of the off-campus groups," he said.

Rachel Liebman, a junior policy studies major who worked at a booth sponsored by Alpha Phi Omega at last year's Kidfest, said she enjoyed her volunteer experience.

"Everybody was really laid back," she said. "It was lots of fun!"

Jennifer Johnson, a senior policy studies major who attended the event last year with Stand for Children, said she enjoyed the opportunity to meet the children, adding that the event was more than just a good time for some of them.

"They run up and give you hugs and tell you stories of the things they probably shouldn't," she said. "But they give uncondi-tional responses. Any opportunity they have to get involved with the university they take it."

Bascue completed her work in her knitting and weaving class. "It was such a joy to work on."

The concept of a piece can change as you work on it. "Sometimes during constructing the piece you don't want to change it, but then you just have to."

Bascue's goal is for her garments "to read well on stage. I want people to see where I am in my fashion science." For Bascue, fashion means "it's more about having a good body or brand names."

Style is essential to fashion, Obata said. She described style as something that makes you feel like you are part of a group. "I want people to see where I am in my fashion science." For Bascue, fashion means "it's more about having a good body or brand names."

She said that style doesn't come from fabric, but from the way you wear it. "It's more about having a good body or brand names." For Bascue, fashion means "it's more about having a good body or brand names."

"I never thought about having a good sense of color, being comfortable, or looking like you aren't trying too hard." Bascue gives the following tip to keep in mind: "Always buy the whole outfit from head-to-toe on the rack."

Field Hockey

Two words could possibly describe this year's Syracuse field hockey squad — senior leadership.

The nine seniors dominated, from the top defensive player to the team's leading scorer.

The Orangewomen received much of their offensive production from senior Megan Keegan, who despite missing parts of the first three games because of an injury, was third in points and goals scored.

Senior defender Meredith Keegan helped guide the defense with Tracy Larkin, Martin Hand and Kristin Halley provided veteran leadership on a young bench.

And while they were injured for much of the season, co-captain Gemma Ormendroyd and senior Laura Fitzpatrick provided the Syracuse bench with charm and leadership the younger Orangewomen could follow.

Staff Writer Kevin Laetzel covered the SU field hockey team during the 1999 season.

Volleyball

Most teams can pinpoint a loss that sets them in motion toward a season around.

For the Syracuse volleyball team, the loss came in the swamps of New Jersey against Rutgers on Oct. 10. It cast a shadow of doubt over the Orangewomen's Big East Tournament hopes.

The setback sparked a five-game winning streak, including a weekend homestand sweep over Connecticut and St. John's two weeks later. Head coach Jing Fu's team improved what was once a dire situation into a comfortable one.

The hustle and determination with which the Orangewomen played during this stretch was characterized by Noreen Carroll's effort at home against St. John's.

The sophomore setter knocked a near-impossible get back into play into an instant before crushing into the stands. The Orangewomen reset their attack and slammed the ball past the Johnnies' defense for a sideout, and Carroll brushed herself off and went back to her spot on the floor.

In their first Big East tournament appearance since 1997, the Orangewomen fell to Georgetown in the semifinals. But Fu loses only two players to graduation, and a strong core will return.

Staff Writer Jason Remillard covered the SU volleyball team during the 1999 season.

Track and Field and Cross-Country

With all of the greed and corruption in sports, it has become increasingly difficult to remain a die-hard fan.

Players are traded on a daily basis, arrested almost as often and championships have become a bargaining tool in negotiations.

But just as I was ready to throw in the towel and trade in my Mark McGwire memorabilia, I found myself falling in love with the aspects that first attracted me to the games and their stars: the tradition, the competition, the desire, the dreams.

And I found them in all their glory as I covered the Syracuse cross-country and track and field teams throughout this year.

I watched Adrian Woodley take home two Big East Indoor titles in his last competition inside the Carrier Dome.

I watched the incomparable Cheree Hicks, as she constantly outdistanced competitors in the discus and shot put, striving toward Olympic dreams.

And when I watch the Olympics this winter, hopefully I will see many of the faces I came to know over this past year. I want to wish them well and thank them.

Staff Writer Josh Lublin covered the SU track and field and cross-country teams during the 1999-2000 season.

Tennis

It wasn't as long as the basketball or lacrosse teams' winning streak, but it was a winning streak nonetheless.

When it was over, it left a bad feeling in the stomachs of all involved.

The Syracuse tennis team's six-match winning streak was snapped when it lost to Miami 5-1 in the semifinals of the Big East Tournament. Following this loss, the Orangewomen defeated Seton Hall 5-2, which gave them a third-place finish in the tournament for the third consecutive season.

This is not quite how the Orangewomen envisioned their season ending, but what they did accomplish this year was something to be proud of. When they walked off the court for the final time, they were the No. 64 team in the nation.

Once Syracuse started to put together its streak, the squad moved in the rankings, this time jumping to their season-ending ranking and earning a No. 3 seed in the Big East Tournament.

Senior Shareen Lai, at one time a walk-on, finished her fantastic four-year career ranked for the first time, as the country's No. 94 singles player.

Staff Writer Jason Sacks covered the SU tennis team during the 2000 season.

He played with Doc, Wheels Noodles and Fudge, With Prince and PK, Tree and RTW. He played a role out Chief and drove past some guy they called the Trimmer for an easy deuce. Some scored more points than you. But no one beat him. No one outworked him. Soon nine strangers stroll on to the court for a nervous shootaround. Few talk, and no one cracks a smile, as if the notion of enjoying the game were stripped picked up basketball chivalry. Five of the nine sink foul shots, and play commences. He meets his defender, a tall ogre named Bruce. With lackluster shaving skills who smells worse than an exhumed corpse. The man mutters something, and he replies with a cold stare.

It says you won't beat me tonight. You'll never outwork me.

From the first check at the top of the key, the game takes on a life of its own. It boasts a culture and a language found nowhere else in the world, save a 94-by-50-foot court with hoops at either end.

AND THE GLOBAL AFFAIRS INSTITUTE

I really wish I would have started at The Daily Orange sooner, but I'm glad I spent part of my last year at SU here.

I just hope that wherever I work next has a concept of the word DEADLINE!

Boyce- Should I thank you or tackle you for telling me about the job here? Always remember. "I'm a little rusty..."

Ron and Paige- Thanks for hiring me.

Dave and Em- Thanks for rehiring me. Em- I enjoyed our little bout of what a bottle Brett is. Keep scooping him out for me.

Dave, Brendan, Ron and the BUFFALO RULES!!! I'm glad that there were other people around that understand the crap up here is not reallly Buffalo wings. One of these days, our sports teams will win a championship.

COPY! I hope the porch doesn't fall off the house. Even though few people recognize and appreciate us, I remember that this paper wouldn't exist without us. It was fun to be always bangin' til 4 a.m.

Foeke- You definitely added some life (and the smell of stinky feet) into the copy porch. There was never a dull moment with you around that understand the crap up here is not real!

Bill- Here hell. Oh wait, you made this whole semester.
Freeman's girls need to produce, stop talking

There's something wrong with the Syracuse women's basketball team, and nobody wants to talk about it.

Every year, expectations give way to disappointment, and the results on the floor never seem to change.

Recently, the Syracuse players wrote a letter, addressed to head coach Mariana Freeman, that outlined what the players want to do better next season. A grading forward Lorna McPhee said:

"The letter was an attempt to erase communication problems that ensued last season before next season begins," McPhee said.

After a 7-3 start last season, the Orangewomen dropped 15 out of their last 18 games en route to a 12th-place Big East finish.

"Nobody likes losing," junior Beth Record said. "Worst of all, nobody likes talking about losing. It's hard to explain how frustrating it was. You know you have enough people. You just can't seem to get in a rhythm or get anything going. It was just really, really frustrating."

At media day in October, the team seemed upbeat, ready for next season.

Scientists take a long time to talk about potential. They talked about beginnings. They talked about change, but never take it a step further," McPhee said.

One step would be a win over any of these teams.

Last season, Syracuse had a chance against Rutgers. With three minutes remaining in the game, the Orangewomen led the Scarlet Knights 51-40. RU then demolished the Syracuse quicker than Virginia Tech beat up on the football team.

"The frustration comes from four seasons where we talk about change, but never take a step further," McPhee said.

One step would be a win over any of these teams.

Since Freeman's reign began, Syracuse is 2-7 in the conference. Since Freeman's first season, Syracuse has gone 2-26 against the big four.

Since that win, Syracuse has gone 2-26 against the big four, with its two wins against Boston College.

"The frustration comes from four seasons where we talk about change, but never take a step further," McPhee said.

SU's defensive unit only allowed eight goals in last weekend's doubleheader against Penn and Princeton. And the close defense unit, consisting of Marshall Ahlheim, L eclair, Glatzel and Billy St. George, kick started SU's vaunted transition game in New Jersey.

"Everybody talks about their offense," Cannella said. "But their defense is really strong. Guys like Abrams and St. George are great at breaking and setting up the break. We have to stop them from doing that on Saturday."

Thus there's no way around it: St. John's is the SU offense is run through the midfield, and the sophomore Josh Coffman serving as a premier playmaker, Cannella said. Hold your horses. Ceglia's position on the field is not one to achieve individual glory. On defense, he marks the opposition's best midfielder, checking stars such as Virginia's Jay Jaibert, Johns Hopkins' A.J. Haugen and Princeton All-American Josh Sims. Ceglia also works with Chris O'reary and Sam Bassett on the nation's best face-off unit. The senior has scooped 57 ground balls, good for second on the second-ranked Orangemen.

Former lacrosse coach Roy Cechini called him the "junkyard dog" because he "doesn't have the measurable heart have left a legacy with 87 goals. But the statistic that matters most to Ceglia is losses. And the most important win would come on Memorial Day weekend in Maryland at the national championships. That's his last chance to complete the collage. "As long as we win," Bassett said, "that's all I really care about."

Ceglia's trademark in practice tends to be his intensity and desire, his teammates said.

"He was a great leader at Herkimer, and he's exhibited that at Syracuse," Werhum said. "It's really a remarkable thing to go from a community college into a four-year school setting and be named captain as a senior."

Bassett, the blue-collar player with a gold heart, isn't afraid to get dirty. The human vacuum cleaner is not ranked in the nation with 107 groundballs this season. To put things in perspective, the next closest on the squad is Joe Ceglia with 57.

"The thing that sets Bassett apart is his underappreciated groundball skills," said he isn't worried," he said. "I get the job done."

When it was time for women’s lacrosse to gear up for the 2000 season, the Syracuse Orangewomen were confident but not cocky about their chances. Getting past second-ranked Dartmouth in the first round of the NCAA Tournament would be their goal, and they knew they had the talent and experience to make it happen.

But getting there wasn’t going to be easy. The Orangewomen faced a tough challenge in the form of the Blue Jays, who were coming off a shutout loss to Harvard in the opening round of the tournament. Despite the loss, the Blue Jays were still a formidable opponent, and the Orangewomen knew they had to be at the top of their game to have any chance of advancing.

Syracuse took an early lead and held a 3-1 advantage at halftime. However, the Blue Jays fought back in the second half, tying the game on a goal by senior midfielder Joanna Daly with 8:01 left in the game. The Orangewomen then scored a power-play goal with 2:38 remaining, courtesy of junior attacker Shannon Wilson, to take the lead back.

Despite the Blue Jays’ best efforts, the Orangewomen held on to win 11-10, advancing to the second round of the NCAA Tournament. It was a hard-fought victory, but one that solidified the Orangewomen’s place as one of the top teams in the country.

The Orangewomen’s next opponent would be the Dartmouth Big Green, who were coming off a loss to the Harvard Crimson in the first round of the tournament. Dartmouth was a tough team, and the Orangewomen knew they had their work cut out for them.

The game was a close one, with the Orangewomen holding on to win 11-10. Despite the loss, the Big Green were still a competitive team, and the Orangewomen were grateful to have come out on top.

In the final round of the tournament, the Orangewomen faced off against the University of North Carolina Tar Heels. It was a tough match, but the Orangewomen emerged victorious, winning 11-10 to claim their first NCAA Tournament title.

The Orangewomen’s success in the 2000 NCAA Tournament was a testament to their hard work and dedication. They proved that they were one of the best teams in the country, and their victory was well-deserved.

The Orangewomen had a great season, and their success in the NCAA Tournament was a fitting end to their season. They had proven that they were a team to be reckoned with, and they would be remembered as one of the great Orangewomen teams of all time.
Syracuse to host Minutemen

It was the middle of an away game last season when the Syracuse lacrosse players looked around and noticed that something was falling from the Amherst, Mass., sky.

It wasn't raindrops or even cats and dogs, but oranges being hurled at the Orange from a hostile University of Massachusetts crowd, and SU escaped from the Bay State with an 8-6 SU victory.

Syracuse is counting on the Minutemen's more storied tradition to provide another distraction for the Orange on Saturday, but the Orange is looking to momentarily rattle the Orange with an 8-6 SU victory.

One hit Liam Banks. Another hit Ryan Powell. They flew from all angles as an orange grove pelted the Syracuse sideline.

Needless to say, some SU players didn't take it kindly.

"I picked that thing up and chucked it right back at somebody and juiced them right in the chops," Powell said, a sly grin slowly spreading across his face. "It was awesome.

While the fans were able to momentarily rattle the Orange, two Syracuse extra-man goals came after penalties were assessed to the UMass crowd, and SU escaped away game last season when he realized playing lacrosse was in his immediate future.

"I had no idea what I wanted to do," Bassett said. "But that trip made me focus on lacrosse and focus on getting to the next level."

Bassett, a wide-eyed 18-year-old at the time, just completed a journey to the land of kangaroos and koalas with a group of lacrosse all-stars formed by Wehrum.

The group of 20 players included former SU stars and Eric Unenge, an All-American at Salisbury State.

The team competed in the Australian National Championships, and Bassett's teammates tabbed him 'pup' because he was four years younger than anyone else on the team.

"He was such an impressive kid, and he asked if there was a chance that he could go," Bassett said. "Sure, he could come along for the ride."

Local businesses thrive on the influx of people during graduation weekend.

The city of Syracuse braces for large crowds and packed businesses during graduation weekend. Each year, local store and restaurant owners and managers say the big numbers give them a much-appreciated financial boost.

During certain times of the year, the city of Syracuse becomes what some might call a tourist attraction. Tons of people pack the area, cramming restaurants and crowding hotels. With Syracuse University's 146th Commencement only a few weeks away, local businesses are preparing for an onslaught of friends and family members to give them a guaranteed business boost during graduation weekend.

Joe Nicoletti, the director of operations for the city of Syracuse, said that there will be a visible police presence throughout the weekend.

"The city will do what it takes to control traffic and protect the community," Nicoletti said.

He explained that preparation for graduation is similar to other Carrier Dome sporting events. The difference is in the number of people, but the type of crowd, he said.

"The city will do what it takes to control traffic and protect the community," Nicoletti said.

He explained that preparation for graduation is similar to other Carrier Dome sporting events. The difference is in the number of people, but the type of crowd, he said.

"Graduation is a lot more family oriented," he said. "The get-togethers are smaller. We don't have to prepare for large rallies or things that may happen after a game."

Nicoletti said that the city plans to have police direct traffic and ensure that the airport is prepared for increased departures, arrivals and parking. He said that the city's job is fairly simple, and the smaller businesses, like restaurants and hotels, are the venues that have to make the most of the preparations for large crowds.

The Sheraton Syracuse Hotel and Conference Center, 801 University Ave., receives so much business during graduation weekend that it uses a lottery system to book rooms.

David Heymann, the general manager of the Sheraton, said that 90 percent of the rooms in the hotel are reserved a year in advance.

"Previously, we used a first come, first serve method," he said. "But we started getting so many reservations at once that we basically just have to put all the names in a hat and pick them out."

Heymann said that because the Sheraton is in such high demand, the room prices are inflated and can be as high as $225 per night. During other busy times of the year, they use a waiting list for customers who are turned away, but this is not an option during graduation.

"Not a lot of people cancel their reservations at graduation time," he said. "They are sure that they are coming, and we make them put down a room deposit as soon as they make the reservation."

Heymann said that the best thing he can do is to refer people who didn't get a room to other area hotels. However, he added that most people like the Sheraton so much because of its proximity to the graduation festivities held on campus.

"Without the university, the hotel wouldn't exist," said Heymann of the Sheraton's dependency on an SU-based clientele. To prepare for a hotel booked to capacity, Heymann begins work in advance.

He holds in-house meetings with Sheraton staff members and makes sure everything is "up-scale" for the guests. This includes having an arrangement of cookies and See CIFY page 9
Commencement speaker
Ted Koppel offers graduates some good advice.

BY MAGIN MCKENNA

Ted Koppel almost missed out on his college graduation.

The night before Syracuse University commencement ceremonies in 1960, Koppel had a run-in with campus safety officials after he and a group of male friends fled the Chi Omega sorority house through a second-story window.

"Back in the wonderland days, young women had to be in by 12:30," Koppel said from his Nightline desk in Washington, D.C. "The campus police didn't nab me that day, but I came pretty close not to graduating."

While Koppel said he's kept the incident a secret for the past 30 years, he will return to campus May 14 - not in handcuffs, but to deliver the 146th Commencement address.

He said he still won't confess to what he was doing after-hours in an all-female house.

Koppel was chosen as the commencement speaker by a student committee made up of representatives from every school or college on campus, said committee leader Kitty Lev.

The group selected Koppel because of his accessibility and SU alumni status, she added.

Or as Koppel puts it, "They held a gun to a puppy's head, and I didn't want to watch it die."

The real reason he decided to accept the commencement invitation is because this year's ceremony coincides with the 40th anniversary of his graduation, Koppel said.

"I thought it would be a lovely chance for me to bring my wife up to see some of the old haunts," he added.

Koppel lives in Potomac, Md., with his wife Grace Anne and hosts ABC's "Nightline." During his 35 years at ABC, Koppel has covered 16 presidential elections and won five Emmys.

Back on the Hill

The last time Koppel made it up to the Hill was in 1982, when he gave his first SU commencement address.

But a month before this year's commencement, Koppel had to decide on a speech topic, he said.

At that time, however, he said he was tiring with the idea of speaking on the timelessness of basic human
The tests are over. The computer is turned off. Even the money from what you got for selling your books is dwindling.

The only thing left to do is fire up the grill and get dressed for Marshall Street.

It's senior time at Syracuse University — when SU's oldest bunch finishes the last of their academic schoolwork and anticipates commencement. But Orangemen typically have to wait a week from the time they finish their schoolwork before they walk across the proverbial stage in the Carrier Dome.

This week is traditionally chock-full of barbecues, happy hours, sentimental memories and an occasional naked tromp through the Quad. But it is more than just drunken fun, said Steve Scamecchia, an SU senior television, radio and film major.

"I don't feel like I'm getting off easy though because I've worked really hard up to this point," Scamecchia said of his plans for the coming weeks. After taking a semester consisting of four classes, only two of which Scamecchia said he really "cares" about, the senior is ready to put a few back down. Scamecchia planned his semester and his work schedule so he would have little to do for his classes and the funds to back his extracurricular activities, he said.

"I might have one final and one paper, but even that's a joke. So other than that I'm done," Scamecchia said. "I'm just going to go to the bars every night."

"It's a good time to catch up and see everyone you haven't seen in a couple of years."

The change of pace from a college atmosphere will be the hardest adjustment — an adjustment Scamecchia said he is not yet ready to make. Having not yet started looking for a job, he said he will take it easy this summer.

"A lot of my friends from last year got jobs just weeks out of college and now they're so miserable," he said. "That's not going to happen to me. I think it's going to be an extended party until next fall."

And although he walks by the senior countdown on the steps of Hendricks Chapel daily, Scamecchia said he still cannot believe he is a senior.

"It hasn't really set in yet, but I think it will the last week," he said.

The realities of leaving SU might come a little sooner for Juliet Bock, a senior chemistry major, who will have to move out of the house she and her roommates have lived in for two years.

"It's a good time to catch up and spend time with friends. Her excitement for graduation, though, has grown into anxiety for an impending career," Bock said.

"I was excited, but now I'm just nervous about getting a job and stuff," she said.

Manley mayhem

Bock said she plans on attending Senior Celebration, a video dance party for seniors on May 15 at Manley Fieldhouse. The annual Student Activities Office-sponsored event includes food, drink and cigars and champagne for sale. The sale of alcohol is limited to four drinks per person throughout the dance, which runs from 9 p.m. to 2 a.m., said Chris Johnson, an organizer of the event.

Senior reflects on four years of friends, work, bad weather and good times.

Three and a half years ago, I was terrified of leaving my hometown to come to school at Syracuse University. The few hours I slept the night before I left home for the first time were filled with nightmares of social ostracism and academic failure.

Now, as I prepare to leave SU for a professional life, I feel no fear of the future. I have to wonder why. Maybe I’ve grown older and more mature. Maybe I’m confident my education here has prepared me for the rest of my life. Or maybe I’m just sick of the Syracuse weather and can’t wait to get out of here. I don’t have an answer.

But, just weeks before graduation, it’s difficult not to wonder about such things and become sentimental about them. My life right now is filled with countdowns to the last this, the final that. For readers who find this column trite or superficial, I apologize, but please bear with me.

Life consists of a series of graduations. It’s a race against yourself, and there is not a finish line — only mile-markers. Whether moving from high school to college, or from college to the “adult” world — or even if it’s moving from Milwaukee’s Best to Killian’s — it matters not, there’s always another step to take. But graduating from college is a big one.

“Education is an admirable thing. But it is well to remember from time to time, that nothing that is worth knowing can be taught,” Oscar Wilde wrote many years ago. I believe this statement is just as true today — life’s most important lessons are learned outside the classroom.

SUI track's Dylan Malagrino juggles academics, athletics and activities.

BY DOUG LEVY

Four years ago Dylan Malagrino wasn’t even sure that he was going to Syracuse University. But he is now in his final year running for the Orange men’s swimming team. He is also a communications major for the Newhouse School. Malagrino has won a long way from his hometown of Long Island.

Before he arrived on campus in the fall of 1991, young Dylan was very unsure of what he wanted to do. His parents thought he would be an engineering major but at the last minute Malagrino decided to major in communications. He has enjoyed the variety of courses and has grown into a communications major.

Office of Residence
Life makes room for parents in residence halls during graduation weekend.

BY SHEYLY HEALY
Staff Writer

Even though they don’t have swimming pools, room service or “magic finger” beds, five Syracuse University residence halls will be moonlighting as five — or fewer — star hotels for family and friends attending Commencement 2000. The Office of Conference Services estimates that over 500 visitors will be reserving rooms for commencement weekend, and students should expect to see a few new faces sliding their IDs through card readers beginning Friday, May 13, at 5 p.m.

"Parents can sign up for the room by mail, over the Internet, through cash operations or here in Conference Services," Sheryl English, Office Coordinator for Conference Services said. "We’ve had a tremendous response on the Internet — about 75 percent have done their reservations online with a credit card."

Each year, different dorms are picked for incoming guests. This year, Flit, Dellplain, Sadler, Haven and Shaw halls will be opened for family and friends. Conference Services originally allotted 510 beds, but now expect to exceed that number.

"Let’s say we’ll be getting about 550 this year," English said. Families are required to pay for their stay at the rate of $24 dollars per person, per night, she added.

"We have an option of two nights. Around 60 to 65 percent will stay both nights, maybe even 75 percent," English said. Accommodations are available in single and double occupancy with bed linens, pillows, blankets and towels included. Freshmen are out of the dorms by that time, so no one will be kicked out, English said. During the course of the weekend, resident directors will be living in the halls to check in visitors and generally watch over the building. "This is my first year doing this," Sadler Resident Director Dave Rosch said. "I think it’s a good idea."

Rosch and resident advisers staying during commencement expect somewhere between 80 and 120 guests.

"The visitors will have free linen services — a service that the students do have, but not free," he added. "Just like students, they will have keys and temporary IDs that will work in the card readers during the week.

Rosch added that the five residence halls will close for everyone on the 14th at 6:00 p.m. "By then, everyone must be gone," he said. "That’s after the graduation ceremony, and it gives everyone enough time to go out to brunch afterward."

Making room
Flint will be opening its doors to more guests than in previous years thanks to a new sprinkler system that will be installed into the adjacent Day Hall over the summer, said Flint Resident Director Rachel Alidis. Despite an overflow of visitors, Alidis and Fluent RAs said they are not concerned with the heavy weekend traffic flowing into the building. Alidis expects to check in and distribute keys to around 200 parents. "It’s not really a hassle to us, it’s more of a hassle to housekeeping," she said. "By the 14th, parents have to leave by noon as RAs can check the dorms so they can be cleaned and then close them for the summer.

Housekeeping Services is looking forward to the commencement craze, said Manager Kay Farrell. Compared to last year, Commencement 2000 weekend should go smoothly. "Last year, we had 750 parents," Farrell said. "That’s a little bit more than we can handle. We see it as kind of a challenge, but we enjoy it. It’s the least we can do after four years to make graduation special."

Last year, Syracuse and the surrounding cities suffered a hotel shortage due to the Onondaga Community College commencement, the Golden Glove and bowling conferences. Reservation numbers have gone well over 450, Farrell said. Despite the numbers, she said housekeeping will be ready for the flood of newcomers.

perspective. Personal growth can't be graded on a 4.0 scale — numbers and letters are less important than smiling through life. Four years of college, or 22 years of life, can't be summarized on a single sheet of resume paper. And questions are more important than answers.

It's one thing to say these things, another to believe them. But senior year is a magical time. If you believe in yourself, no matter what, anything can happen.

Life lessons
The most important thing I've come to understand is that the only limits in life are self-imposed. All the mistakes I've made, all my failures, rejections and defeats, I've learned from them — more from my successes. And I'm proud to say that, while living in the most consequence-free environment possible, I've never made the same mistake twice. I think.

Luckily, my friends have bailed me out during all my screw-ups. Over the past four years, I've had friends tell me truths about myself that I would never have discovered on my own. I'll dearly miss those random chats you have at 2 a.m. on a Tuesday just because. In one year, you'll forget about your 8:30 a.m. statistics class, but you will remember that conversation. So screw the class — priorities.

There are relationships I wish I had developed more — whether with a friend, a professor, classmate or that girl from freshman year. But this only means I'll remember more closely the relationships I have built. They, along with my fuzzy alpacas and my coffee thermos, enabled me to make it through the past four years without succumbing to madness.

You'd be crazy not to take full advantage of as much as possible.

Many professors' best lessons have nothing to do with the subject they teach in the classroom. That's why office hours exist. Every time I've walked into a professor's office, I've walked out better for having done so.

Some of the classes I went into the least about are the ones I'm most glad to have taken. Art history and economics are two such classes. On the surface the two are opposites, but both shape your everyday life and I believe both should be required. Remember that your tuition pays for six classes worth of credits. And you don't have to be ambitious to "claim" classes, wine appreciation or karate. If you're feeling specially inspired, check out the fifth floor of Bird Library. That's where you'll find all the best books.

I won't miss the monotony of Marshall Street snow in April. To those remaining, I recommend a pint of Guinness at Coleman's on Tiptop Hill to solve both problems.

I will miss the Dome. Even though overwhelming amounts of beer, poor air circulation and the orange T-shirts invariably left me nauseated by the end of each game, I'll miss Wegmans. I'll especially miss vacations, but sacrifices must be made.

"The journey of a thousand miles begins with one step," wrote the Chinese philosopher Lao-tze. I've traveled further through life over the past few weeks than I have at any other time or place. And as fast and as far as I've come, I know the journey has only begun.

In addition to ORL and SGA, Sacchetti was the undergraduate member of the Vice Chancellor Search Committee which named Deborah Freund to replace Gertrud Vinch in August 1999. During this process, he and Freund got to know each other, and the vice chancellor and provost of the university said she was very impressed with Sacchetti.

“He’s poised, intelligent, thoughtful,” she said. “I could go on and on about how wonderful he is.”

Freund said she thought highly of Sacchetti that she asked him to baby-sit for her 3-year-old son several times last semester.

“He was a great baby sitter and an excellent role model for Willie,” she said. “To this day, anytime I say I’m going out and I’m looking for a baby sitter, he’ll say ‘I want Dana.’ It’s remarkable the effect Dana had on Willie.”

From earning the Barbara Baker Outstanding Leadership in Residence Life Award and several other awards for notable resident advisers, Sacchetti must have also had a remarkable effect on Tom Elliott, director of residence life. When a senior staff member of ORL, the university in January 1999, Elliott asked Dana to fill the role, a position never before held by an undergraduate. Elliott even renamed the spot “community adviser.”

“A great guy and an excellent RA,” said Alldis. “I would hire him for any job if he ever wanted one.” He added, “He could really take on just about any role he needed to. He really had his pulse in the voice of the students.”

Sacchetti also was a University Senator, a member of the Academic Council, part of the Internet Substance Abuse Prevention and Campus Security, and was a member of Phi Kappa Alpha, an honorary fraternity for the eight most outstanding senior men at SU.

“I loved my time at SU and felt that I accomplished all I set out to do,” he said. “It was such a phenomenal time in my life, and Syracuse afforded me opportunities I’m not sure I would have had the chance to explore at other schools.”

Sacchetti said he hopes to eventually return to the East Coast but, for now, he has settled into his new life and routine in California. He currently lives with his mother but once they graduate, several of his friends will be moving to San Francisco and he will move in with them.

“It will be great — hanging out with my buddies in California, we’ll all be doing our thing,” he said. “This place really is such a wonderful place to be.”

While Sacchetti seems to have already moved on, he will be back at his alma mater for all the commencement ceremonies.

“It really is quite an honor,” he said.

Farrell, who has worked for SU for 15 years short of when the program was first introduced, said that it has gotten easier every year.

“We very rarely get complaints,” she said. “We plan so far ahead, it makes it a lot easier. We’re here from 6 a.m. to 10 or 11 p.m. taking care of everything and are prepared for both Friday and Saturday nights. We really put our best foot forward.”

Although Shaw is no Ritz-Carlton and Dellplain is certainly not the Four Seasons, guests should expect four-star service for a minimal cost.

“I think it’s a good service to offer,” Alldis said. “There are not enough hotel rooms for everyone. It’s also nice for the parents to see their students have lived for the past four years.”
"They marched into the stadium in conventional street clothes or in bizarre costumes," Luther Bliven reported in the Post-Standard in 1970. "One even wore a gladiator outfit and held aloft a red rose."

To avert any possible tension between war supporters and opponents, no military color guards marched into Archbold Stadium to raise the American flag in front of the commencement platform. Bliven reported. He also noted that ROTC graduates did not march to center stage to take their traditional oath of office to their respected military branch.

The menorah
The next decade of commencements proved to be fairly subdued. until 1981, the first Dome ceremony, at which then-Secretary of State Alexander Haig gave the commencement address. Again, instead of donning traditional robes, some students decided to express their concerns with the university's choice of graduation speaker with other garments.

"Some came dressed as nuns covered in blood," Bliven said.

These students were especially angry with the university's choice of awarding Haig with an honorary doctorate of law. There was an immense feeling of distrust for this man who claimed helped in the Watergate cover-up of 1968 and also directed the secret bombing of Cambodia during the Vietnam War.

"More than 100 students walked out during the speech," according to the New York Times. "At least three fist fights erupted in the crowd as some students shouted 'We need Haig like we need the plague.'" Approximately 500 additional faculty members turned their backs in disgust as Haig was awarded the degree, the Times reported.

But a large contingent kept their seats. Charles Bussey, a 1941 graduate, said he did so for good reason.

"There were so many photographers around," he said. "The last thing you want to do is to get photographed turning your back on a government official — especially when you may be trying to secure a government job later on." Nathan noted that this year's commencement ceremony should be the most out of the norm, due to decorum and respect for the graduates recognized by all who attend.

"This is the day we all look forward to," she said. "It would be wrong, for me, to ruin it by doing petty things."

values, like "honesty, loyalty and being faithful to your principles."

"The advice I'd give to this year's class," Koppel said, "is that you will have 20 years ago or 20 years from now. Human virtues are timeless. The past are still important now.

He advised this year's graduates not "to be distracted by the easy way out, and to understand that we all make youthful mistakes.

During his last campus visit, Koppel said he was most impressed with the newly-constructed Carrier Dome, where commencement ceremonies have been held since 1981.

Koppel emigrated to the United States from Great Britain when he was 13 and enrolled at SU at the age of 16 — a time when he said he still had a lot of growing up to do.

While at SU, Koppel played varsity soccer for two years and was the vice president of the Phi Kappa Alpha honorary fraternity and formal organization that recognizes the eight most outstanding men on campus.

But most of his time was dedicated to campus radio station, WAER 88.3 AM, where he served as a program director. When Koppel was an SU student, WAER was housed in a quaint — temporary wooden structures built to house the major influx of students after World War II.

This was before Newhouse was even a thought," Koppel said. "Cars didn't have FM radios, and it was very difficult to get the station signal off campus.

Like many students who got caught up in extracurricular activities, Koppel said he skipped class to work on stories for WAER.

"It was a close call," Koppel said. "We were always wonderful. We spent an awful lot of time at the station, and I've never regretted that. It gave me a chance to realize that my childhood dream of becoming a broadcast journalist was not a figment of my imagination."

At WAER, Koppel said he is most proud of introducing an adult education course that allowed city residents to study Russian through a radio program, he said. Students enrolled in the class only had to travel to campus for tests.

Today, Koppel can't recall his commencement speaker or much of the ceremony, he said.

"We weren't paying a whole lot of attention," he said. "I remember passing around a bottle of an 'adult' beverage. We were all thinking 'Okay, we've made it, there's not much you can do to us now.'"

"I won't be the least bit disappointed," he added, "if people don't remember me."
Memorable moments in commencement history

1872 - Syracuse University's first commencement.
1907 - 25,000 seat Archbold Stadium opens.
1943 - Outbreak of World War II forces university to have spring, winter, and fall graduations.
1957 - Former President John F. Kennedy speaks at commencement.
1960 - Valedictorian and future novelist Joyce Carol Oates is determined not to give the traditional student address at Commencement. SU officials tell her rain will be her only excuse for not speaking at the outdoor ceremony in Archbold Stadium. Commencement arrives, and so does the rain.

1970 - Commencement occurs earlier in the semester than ever. The protest of hundreds of students demanding SU pay $100,000 to the Black Panther Defense Fund to bail out jailed president Bobby Seale. After more than 24 hours, the demonstration ended quietly. Administration officials cancelled the final six weeks of classes as a result, forcing commencement to be about a month early.

1981 - The Dome becomes the traditional venue for commencement ceremonies. Alumnus and host of "Nightline," Ted Koppel, speaks for the first time at SU.

1972 - Beth Wyszowskia, a 1978 graduate, designs and creates 17 sets of banners representing each school and college.

1994 - Tradition of moving tassels from one side of graduate's motorboards when degrees are deferred is introduced.

2000 - Class flags, carried in by a class marshal, becomes a regular event.

Change has become the usual state of affairs at Syracuse University's commencement ceremonies, and this year is no different. Aside from the usual procession, this year, one of the class marshals will carry a flag representing their class, Mary Jane Nathan, director of special events at SU, said. Each entering freshman class will be presented with their own flag during their fall convocation from now on, to be hung alongside the Class of 2000's during their graduation.

"The flag represents all members of the graduating class," Nathan said. "It will be then hung high on the third tier of the Dome during future commencements."

SU commencement ceremonies have proven that they change with the times.
MAY
Families prepare for trial

BY JOY DAVIA Special Projects Editor

One parent of a Pan Am Flight 103 bombing victim described the first week of the trial as an emotional roller coaster.

"It was quite a moment more than 11 years for the world's largest criminal investigation to come to the trial phase, victims' family members were elated by the May 3 opening at Camp Zeist in the Netherlands, said Bob Monetti, whose son Richard was one of 35 Syracuse University students killed in the crash.

"We fought like hell for this trial," he said. "And it's finally happening.

But a more subdued atmosphere prevailed once prosecutors began to present their case, he said. Monetti and his wife, along with about 50 family members of the bombing victims, viewed the first days of the trial from a satellite site in New York City.

During the opening days of questioning, Scottish air traffic controllers testified about the airplane disappearing from their radar screens before the crash and eyewitnesses described the resulting horrific scene throughout Lockerbie, Scotland.

One Lockerbie resident also described the fallen American embattled in the same yard - the same yard where Monetti's son landed after Pan Am 103 exploded.

"It was kind of gruesome," Monetti said of the eyewitness accounts. "The elation was off once the story was in how they died."

The Dec. 21, 1988 explosion killed all 259 passengers and crew members of Pan Am 103 and 11 people on the ground of the small Scottish town. The Libyans accused of the bombing, allegedly working for Gadaffi, will face trial in a courtroom in the same yard where Monetti's son landed.

"It's kind of ironic that it gets to this point," he said. "But I'm just glad it's finally happening.

A power outage Sunday brought down the Syracuse University computer network and darkened 10 buildings for several hours, frustrating students who were writing papers and preparing for final exams.

SU Vice Chancellor and Provost Deborah Freind issued a campus-wide e-mail Monday asking faculty to be understanding of students because of the inopportune timing of the outage.

"I am confident that the aftermath of (Sunday's) event, faculty will remain sensitive to students' needs," she said in the e-mail. "And I leave it in the hands of individual instructors to use their good judgment in determining whether extensions should be granted to students."

The cause of the power outage has not yet been determined, said Kevin Morrow, SU spokesman.

"I didn't take it into account because no one made it an issue," he said. "Nobody even told me about it."

The northeast quadrant of the main campus, which includes Machinery Hall, five other academic buildings and four residence halls, went without power from 6:30 p.m. to 9 p.m., Morrow said.

The SU computing network went down when the back-up power source for Machinery Hall, the brain center of university computer systems, failed to activate, he said.

SU Computing and Media Services technicians worked throughout the early hours of Monday morning to restore the network and fix minor damage to software, Morrow said.

The system went back up between midnight and 3 a.m., said Pat Morley, a senior consultant in the Kennedy computer cluster.

Of the students working in the cluster before the outage, most were understanding of the situation, but others reacted angrily when the 80-computer cluster was closed, said Morley, a senior engineering physics major.

"It was pretty basic," he said. "It affected a lot of people. I was just lucky I [See OUTAGE page 7]
Microsoft pleads for hearing

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Microsoft Corp. today asked a federal judge to summarily dismiss the government’s plan to break the computer maker into two companies, saying at least six months of scrutiny and hearings if it instead decides to consider a breakup.

The software giant also said it would not appeal an order by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that the divestiture plan be struck down. The government’s proposal to create two competing companies, Microsoft and Novell, would be too costly and would hurt the economy, the company said.

Laws for the Reformed, Wash., corporation said the limits on company conduct — ranging from giving computer makers more flexibility to change Windows software to offering a version of Windows without access to the browser — would be enough to address a judge’s verdict that it violated antitrust law.

Government reaction to the plan was “delayed.” In a speech yesterday, Joel I. Klein, chief of the antitrust divi- sion of the Justice Department, defended his breakup plan in front of an audience of AT&T, which created the local Bell telephone companies. Klein noted that the gloomy predictions that were made about the AT&T breakup are now being used to support a Microsoft breakup.

Tech stocks provoke fall

WASHINGTON D.C. — The stock market took another front-page fall Wednesday, trashed again by the computer and communications stocks which have become crucial to the health of both Wall Street and the nation’s economy. Intel Corp. took down both the Dow Jones industrial average and the Nasdaq composite after the big chip maker disclosed it is building a tech gap because of faulty computer components.

Cisco Systems continued to weaken. Investors are still dig- ning in a Barron’s magazine story calling Cisco shares overpriced, and the company itself acknowledged that shortages of parts could hamper its growth. Hewlett-Packard and IBM helped pull down the Dow.

The Dow slipped 169 points, with the Nasdaq last just a shade under 2,000. The S&P 500 was down 29 points.

Fire prompts evacuation

LOS ALAMOS, N.M.— High winds drove a week-old fire into a canyon today, forcing the evacuation of the entire town of Los Alamos.

Fire spokesman Jim Paxon said there was time for a calm, orderly evacuation of the town’s 11,000 residents. He said police and fire depart- ment officials were going door to door helping people get out as quickly as possible.

The fire raging out of control after the National Park Ser- vice set it last week to clear an area of the Bandelier National Monument. The Los Alamos National Laboratory, Los Alamos schools and county offices have been closed for three days.

Five hundred homes in western Los Alamos were evacu- ated Sunday night, and 3,700 acres had burned by this morning.

Today’s wind was clocked at 30 to 35 mph, presenting the wildfire with a major wind from the south. But no additional homes have been burned.

U.N. fears war in Sierra Leone

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone — The presence of rebel leader Foday Sankoh during an attack on his home Monday has raised fears of wider bloodshed, as diplomats and U.N. officials described him as an unstable man who can stop his heavily armed followers at a moment’s notice. The former Sierra Leone back into civil war with the return of Sankoh, the leader of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF), was last seen in the town of Kailahun in February.

The air base is the essen- tial link between the besieged army garrison and govern- ment forces to the south.

Guerrillas bomb Sri Lankan city

NEW DELHI, India — Led by waves of suicide bombers, the Tigers burst into Trin- dias, reached the gates of Jaffna on Wednesday, squeezing thousands of Sri Lankan troops and setting the stage for a climactic battle in the country’s long civil war.

The rebels, who are seeking an independent homeland, claim to have captured an important bridge that is with- in artillery range of the gov- ernment’s Palali air base.

The Tigers appeared to be preparing for a final push into the city.
York City.

But Monetti said the defense is attempting to squeeze a Syrian-backed Palestinian extremist group, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command, of carrying the bomb on the doomed flight.

One senior police officer confirmed under defense cross-examination Friday that the Palestinian group was initially suspected in the bombing.

"You can just tell by the kind of questions they’re asking," Monetti said. "But we have been told by the prosecution that they have the evidence. So we just have to wait and see.

"If they don’t have the evidence then they’ve been lying to us."

As the prosecution continued to build its case this week through its evidence, the defense challenged the validity of testimony from detectives and police officers involved in gathering the evidence.

The defense contends that the methods used to classify the more than 18,000 pieces of evidence were unreliable, with police witnesses admitting that the volume of debris from the explosion sometimes left experts guessing where the evidence was found.

The evidence expected to prove the two suspects’ guilt was also introduced Wednesday. These items included bits of a suitcase believed to have contained the bomb, pieces from a two-foot section of the suitcase, and a frayed cassette recorder instruction manual that appeared to have been blown apart by the blast.

The prosecution, however, for the past week has been merely setting the stage for the crux of its argument, said Chester Phillips, whose son Frederick was an SU Pan Am victim.

Under Scottish law, the origins of all evidence must be established above all to family members, Greenberg said.

The Dec. 21, 1988 explosion over the small Scottish town of Lockerbie killed all 259 passengers and crewmembers of Pan Am Flight 103, including 38 SU students returning from a semester abroad in London. Eleven residents on the ground were also killed.

"Our job is to translate all that ‘legalisms and ‘Scottishisms’ into a language that is understandable to all the family members," Greenberg said.

The Scottish government’s cooperation in releasing the trial transcripts is a “huge step” in revealing the trial’s intricacies to families, Greenberg said.

He noted the contrast between Scotland’s closed-door judicial proceedings and the United States’ open court system, where television cameras are often allowed in court rooms.

Melissa Doss, a freshman who lives in a separate house on the campus, said she started consulting the Lockerbie Trial Families Project Web site for trial information when it went online several months ago.

"It isn't even as exciting as the O.J. Simpson trial, and even that got pretty dull at times," she said.

"The general media is going to stop talking about the trial in about a week, but we’ll be there providing information for the whole trial, no matter how long it goes on," she said.

"The Scottish government’s cooperation in releasing the trial transcripts is a huge step," said Greenberg.

"The general media is going to stop talking about the trial in about a week, but we’ll be there providing information for the whole trial, no matter how long it goes on," he said.

"The general media is going to stop talking about the trial in about a week, but we’ll be there providing information for the whole trial, no matter how long it goes on," Greenberg said.

"If every single detail is released to the media, they’ll eat it apart and find all these holes in it," she said. "We want the straight facts and we want them daily. TV and newspapers aren’t necessarily tell us the truth, but that’s what we need."
Flemma will not teach, appeal pending

Staff Reports

The music industry class formerly taught by Jay Flemma will be offered again during the 2000 Fall semester, but under the instruction of another professor.

The College of Visual and Performing Arts, however, has yet to select a new instructor for the course, said Jo Goss, assistant dean of the college.

Flemma was removed from his position as an adjunct professor Jan. 13. Syracuse University officials said Flemma's removal was because he neglected to follow certain administrative procedures, not specifically stating the violations.

An SU senior, however, filed a report with the Syracuse Police Department on Feb. 6. accusing Flemma of harassing her with repeated and unwanted e-mails and phone calls.

In response to the compli-tant, Flemma, who is a 1995 graduate of the SU College of Law and an associate lawyer with Smith, Sevil, Kendrick and Sagnit, P.C. in Syracuse, said Flemma appointed to the university's Department of Hum-

Flemma declined to comment.

Flemma's appeal focused on the sexual harassment allegadations and failed to address any other concerns. It was postposed because it did not address the vilations referred to, but not named, in his notice of removal.

After Human Resources inquired of Flemma's appeals of the administrative procedures allegedly vi-lated, he appealed a second time in response to these issues.

Neither Human Resources nor Flemma would name the violations.

Two months later, the apell is still being considered.

Sometimes these things don't dovetail, said Mary Morrow, an SU spokesman. "In this particular case there were two appeals involved."

The time schedule of classes next semester lists Flemma as the class's instructor, but the listing is the result of an administrative error, Morrow said.

"The course is being taught but it's obviously not being taught by professor Flemma," Goss said.

Real World leaves imprint on students

The dreaded “Real World” came to visit Syracuse University this year. It landed with a thud on top of the SU Hill and pierced the protective bubble that seemed to surround us. The Real World carried a mixed bag of lessons for students on the Hill.

It brought an impressive handful of notable political figures to the university and the city around us. From first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton to Ambassador Alan Keyes to leaders of the Worker Rights Consortium and the Fair Labor Association, students didn’t have to walk far to listen to political ideology from all sides of the political spectrum.

Not all college students are so fortunate. SU students are better prepared to vote in this autumn’s election than some of the most educated adults in the nation. Choose wisely.

It was a decent year for SU athletics. The football team finished the season with a string of impressive victories over Kent State and Pittsburgh. The Orange hoopers played in the NCAA’s Sweet Sixteen, and the campus rallied fiercely around their success.

As the year slipped away, silent predators lurked in the shadows that zapped the feisty spirit from SU fans. It stole away their attention to the game and made them realize how precious each second really is. Last fall, football players David Pivec and Giovanni DeLoatch were stabbed outside of Sadie’s Place, a South Side bar. Even SU’s athletic stars aren’t immune to the world’s horrors.

And as the year slipped away, silent predators crowded the streets of off-campus neighborhoods. They assaulted, beat and robbed our friends and classmates. It seemed no one — not the Syracuse police, not the university public safety — could stop them.

It frightened us to watch. No one invited the Real World to come. But we must be aware that it did. It brought us some priceless lessons — ones we’d never have learned in any classroom.

It’s human nature to never be satisfied. When I’m at Syracuse University, I want to be back home. When I’m at home, I wish my college friends were sharing the Windy City with me.

Now my eyes quiver looking squarely at the barrel of a gun labeled “graduation.” My heart skips a few beats and my palms perspire — even Peter Pan needs to learn Never Never Land sometime.

After waiting what seemed like an eternity in Shaw Hall’s parking lot, a wide-eyed teenager emerges from her parents’ car with suitcases in hand on a sunny day in 1996. He stretches his legs and cracks his neck, eyeing his new surroundings.

He hasn’t a clue of the bumptious four-year voyage that will follow. He has heard oxymorons like “greek unity.” Tell that to the rest of us “goddamn independents.” I won’t skimp on the elitist musings you won’t.

For this years, this cynical “journalism/bastard has seen black students forced to act “black” and white students forced to act “white,” leading to a diverse band of jerks acting like a variety pack of assassins.

He’s felt the pulsating member of the administration bending him and it’ll follow suit now. I’ve guessed $30,000 a year won’t buy compassion or a ticket to a Dome event in the land of composition. All of us were taken.

The four years of toil are up and I suppose it’s time to move on, but I was finally getting used to the routine.

My head spins as images and emotions rush through my skull. The presentation of a piece of paper that reads “I am educated” will supposedly ease my mind.

Over four years some have developed a new fashion sense. Some have found and lost companionship. Others have survived the never-ending Syracuse winters, yearning to pursue some vague notion called a “career.” Others are still left alone, while others don’t care.

Gone will be the Sunday afternoon ritual of picking up the pieces of a lost weekend, aided by the sizzle of Cosmopolitan in the background. Gone will be riding those female clowns wearing too much makeup and black pants while wasting away a rare sunny day on the Quad. Gone will be those caffeine-laden late nights typing at the cluster laboratory to be a professional procrastinator.

We’ve bared the eye of the “derecho.” We’ve seen home run champ Roger Maris relegated to last place and the Temple of Zuul from “Ghostbusters.”

What I have personally seen has been a few scribbles, but nothing was drawn in permanent ink. Four years have passed, and recess is over. We now come armed with experience at the expense of innocence, glowing through apple cores instead of orange pellets on the way back from classes. Our pencils have dissolved like grains in an hourglass. We’re more careful on how we use our strokes, fearful that without an eraser, without time to retrace our steps, that we’ll create a path we don’t want to be on.

After only a blink between ice ages, I wonder selfishly if that’s ample time to leave a mark. My thoughts continue to trample over each other. Will I miss SU Public Safety patrols for no good reason? Maybe the men in blue are just following good orders, but so were Streicher, Doenitz and Hess. Maybe I’ll miss the comfort of Carousel Center, a shining consumer mecca.

I’ll probably miss that stuff as much as dining hall food. Do you know how hard it is to mess up rice? I guess I won’t be doing that. My dear country bumpkin referring to Brewster/Boland as the “ghetto” again....

I will however miss some of my friends, professors, and that whimsical, creaky structure at 744 Ostrom Ave. Sometimes that house reminds me of the Temple of Zuul from “Ghostbusters.”

I’ve seen Slimer, Vigo and the Stay-Put Marshmallow Man. Just don’t let that know-it-all Egon cross the streams or I’ll return and issue a series of beatdowns. We don’t want to see that.

I hear the glass shattering and I’m going headfirst. I wave goodbye to the biodome lifestyle and comfort. I wave goodbye to you, the one holding this paper.

What I have tangibly replaced the desire for what could have been, what might have been. Perhaps in another life, perhaps if we had more time. But fear not — the freedom of the unknown beckons.

As I take another look at the sweet debris of yesterday, the wood and debris once more. I’m not sure what path I’m on or what path I’m going to take. I’m not sure if I’ll be satisfied. But I wasn’t sure four years ago either.

It’s funny how things work out.

Hillel awaits construction of new center

BY HOLLY AUER
Editorial Editor

With a new name to come, the 2000 Summer Semester Student Association will welcome two new executive members.

The association plans to address the lack of participation in campus student groups with plans to improve communication with other student organizations.

The building has been designed by Fred Babcock of the Babcock Design Group in Salt Lake City, Utah. Babcock has become known as the nation's "de facto" Hillel architect, after having worked on nearly every Hillel building project nationwide in recent years. Kaminsky said, "If you're building a Hillel and you don't at least speak with him, you might be making a big mistake," Kaminsky said. "He is really able to translate student needs and their language into beautiful buildings."

The best thing about SU's new Hillel, said Brian Cohen, former president of the Jewish Student Union, is that it can be whatever students want it to be. If people want a religious haven, it will be that," said Cohen, a senior advertising major. "And if they want it to be a social place, it's that, too. It can be anything and everything, really."

The 1999-2000 academic year will be remembered as one of action and activism, tragedy and controversy. These are several of the stories and pictures that made for the biggest headlines during the last two semesters.

Hazing charges bring end to A O Pi, uncertainty lingers with its return

As members of the Alpha Omicron Pi sorority face complaints of hazing, the women’s chapter on campus is rethinking the future of their organization.

Several women were accused of hazing during the fall semester, which then was followed by an investigation by the university. The investigation found that the hazing occurred, and the university imposed penalties on the sorority.

The women’s chapter has announced that it will not be recognized as a university organization and that it will cease all activities.

Although the sorority is facing uncertainty, the university's investigation has brought attention to the issue of hazing on campus.

University computer systems suffer hacker attacks, security questions arise

Several attacks targeted the university computer systems, including the Syracuse University network, which was hit by an unknown hacker.

The attacks were believed to be linked to an Internetdenial-of-service attack, which targeted several websites.

The university is currently working to improve its security measures.

No Borders looks to move in lieu of owner-landlord quarrel, Starbucks protest

A new coffee shop, No Borders, is planning to open in the space of the former Starbucks.

The shop has faced opposition from the owner of the building, who is demanding a higher rent.

The owner has also threatened to sue the shop if it moves in without his permission.

Surprise drug raid forces Ziggy’s Wagon off campus

Ziggy’s Wagon, a student-run coffee shop, was forced to close after a surprise drug raid.

Police found drugs in the shop and arrested the owner.

The owner is currently facing drug charges and the shop may be forced to close permanently.

The committee is comprised of student, faculty, and staff members, including the Quad and Vice Chancellor Deborah Freudenthal’s office.

Moore said he was upset that not enough students sat on the committee. He added that student presence could be much greater in all university forums and decision-making.

According to the committee’s report, Moore’s absence and failure to produce written materials on time were disruptive to the class, which was a small seminar on producing a paper for publication.

He claims that he should never have been graded because he was not allowed to finish the course. He originally claimed he received a failing grade of D in the class, but his official transcript later revealed that he received a passing grade of C. "I'm glad everything is clear now," said Yeong-Hyun Kim, who was a senior in the class. "Now everybody should know we didn't do anything wrong."

According to the committee’s report, Moore’s absences and failure to produce written materials on time were disruptive to the class, which was a small seminar on producing a paper for publication.

Moore said he was only absent twice, but Short claimed he missed a class on regular attendance.

The committee found that the available evidence supports Short’s version of Moore’s attention to class, and recommended that the committee not find a violation of academic freedom or professional ethics by Short.

Moore’s second complaint was that Short, Kim, and the other two graduate students in the class used some of his work from the class for the paper they produced and then submitted the paper to a journal, the Professional Geographer. The committee did not find a violation of academic freedom or professional ethics.

Moore claimed that the students and professor had no right to publish his name on the paper without his permission, which was denied. The committee found that Moore’s lack of participation and authorship, the collegiality was an error in judgment but not a violation of professional ethics.

Moore said it was "outrageous" that the committee said putting his name on the paper out of collegiality but without his permission was not a violation of professional ethics.

The committee also recommended that the chairperson convene the committee to discuss the "Professional Geographer," to inform them that Moore’s allegations that the people have been investigated and the committee's report found that they have no basis, according to the report.

Aitken was holding the article under the committee’s consideration until the decision on the case. The article was set for publication in the November 2000 issue, but it was removed because of Moore’s allegations.

Aitken said he heard about the committee’s consideration on the paper with a sense of foreboding. "It’s great to see it on its way going ahead with the article. It’s great to see it on its way going ahead with the article. It’s great to see it on its way going ahead with the article.

The committee could not confirm Moore’s third complaint that Short and Kim used two sentences from his written comments on the class in their book. The book was published in 1999 and it claimed he wrote his paper containing the disputed text shortly after the spring of 1999.

Moore refused to comment about why he could not prove his paper was written before the book was published.

Moore also claimed that the paper was written before the book was published. According to the report, which would have been before Short’s book was published in 1999.

Rupert remembered reading the paper and giving Moore comments, but he said he remembered seeing the paper. The report said Moore’s copy of the paper contained written comments on the class that Rupert said were Rupert’s.

But Rupert told the subcommittee that he did not get to look at the paper on the class, not according to the report.

Moore said he was not sure if the committee showed Rupert the paper or the draft of his paper, which would explain why the handwriting on the paper was not his.

Rupert said he had trouble recalling the details of the incident because it was not an assignment for one of his own classes. He said he could not remember what class Moore told him the paper was written for.

Rupert declined to comment on his discussions with the committee.

The country's last Bonwit Teller closes Saturday

BY MAGIN MCKENNA
Asst. Lifestyle Editor

What began nearly 100 years ago as a major specialty store designed to meet women's changing apparel needs at the turn of the century ends Saturday as the nation's last Bonwit Teller closes its doors.

All that remains now of Paul J. Bonwit and Edmund B. Teller's dream to create one of the first major fine women's specialty apparel stores in the United States are dozens of picked-over sale racks, as the Syracuse store has its going out of business sale through May 13.

Citing a failure last month to successfully market the store's upscale image to a working class Syracuse community, The Pyramid Companies — which owns both Bonwit and the Carousel Center — made the decision to close the store.

Bonwit will be replaced next fall by "The Courtyard at the Carousel Center." I think that Syracuse is on the verge of tremendous growth," said Bonwit Chief Executive Officer Murray Daichman, who is optimistic about his store's closing. "There's a great potential to enhance the climate for business between state and federal government."

The Courtyard will keep Bonwit's original interior, while providing space for an array of small specialty retailers to come to Central New York.

"It's upward for the area," said Daichman.

Stiller rejects her unwavering His religion, her job, his mom, all With pressure all around.

In Syracuse, Bonwit offered designers like Burberry, that could not be found anywhere else in the city, Corbett said, while still trying to appeal to Syracuse consumers.

"But the name scared everyone," she said.

Most Bonwit employees have been placed in new jobs by the store, Corbett added.

When the store opened at the newly constructed Carousel Center in 1991, pyramid hired Daitchman to lower the store's scale to the Syracuse market so that it differed tremendously from the other Bonwits, located in Boston and Buffalo.

"The writing was definitely on the wall that it would require a tremendous capital infusion," Daitchman said. "It would have been the plan to change direction, had we the resources to do it."

Prior to coming to Bonwit, Daitchman and his wife owned an operated a J.W. Rhodes store at a Pyramid mall in Ithaca, that was similar to Bonwit, he said.

Daitchman's first step as CEO, he said, was to implement a "creative" credit process that allowed the store to market retail based on credit from designers. Designers received a commission off the sale, ranging from 40 to 70 percent, he added.

"Looking back, Daitchman said he would have liked to expand the store's scope beyond just women's apparel and cosmetics, making it a place to shop for mens' and children's clothes, as well as home furnishings.

"The whole designer business has disappeared into small retail," Daitchman said. "We just didn't have the capacity to change our whole structure."

Changing markets

Since the early 1990s, the growth in popularity and accessibility of small retail chains has forced many major specialty stores to either change or completely revamp their markets, Daitchman said.

"When you went in, there was never a soul in there except on sale days," Bakke said. "It was great because you had the store to yourself, but that's not a good sign."

Given Bonwit's failure to succeed in Syracuse, Bakke said she doubts that similar specialty or department stores, like Nordstrom, Inc., or Macy's would be successful if they open during Carousel's proposed expansion to make it like Minnesota's Mall of America. "Syracuse can support a regional mall," Bakke said. "But it can't support that level of high-end retail."

Regardless, Saturday will be a very sad day for longtime Bonwit sales associate Rosemarie Slingerland, as what she calls one of the best times of her life, ends.

Slingerland worked at Bonwit store's opening.
"I fell in love with it when I first walked in," Slingerland said. "It was like going home. This has been the best 10 years I've ever had."

Slingerland added that she has not yet found a replacement job that can match Bonwit.

"I think the customers in Syracuse will miss it," she said. "They may not realize it now, but they will."

Chris Davis alone and confused against the tough pass rush.

"I left it in the air too long," Anderson said. "You got Will Allen out there, and Will Allen is so quick to step back to it. I was throwing better, and I think I did a good job." Sandwiched between the two blue series, Troy Nunes led the orange team onto the turf. Following suit, his first snap was not a good one for the offense.

He scrambled right, looking sideline to sideline for an open receiver. Defensive end Duke Pettijohn caught him stripped the ball, but Nunes' mates recovered.

His troubles continued a few plays later. On an option, Nunes led running back James Munro too much on the pitch, and strong safety Willie Ford pounced on the loose pigskin. Nunes later gave the orange squad its first score. The junior QB faked the option to the right and snipped the ball to a trailing Woodcock, who streaked up the left sideline for a 65-yard touchdown. A huge Sean O'Connor block on linebacker Clifton Smith aided Woodcock's run.

"He caught everything that was thrown to him," Anderson said. "I was a little shaky and timed better and better," he said. "At the beginning of the spring, I've been working to get better and better," he said. "At the beginning of the scrimmage, I did not feel comfortable with the offense. nearly a second. Early in the second half, the Orangemen rattled off four goals in the first 1:11 of the quarter.

Virginia coach Charles Cerezo — the nation’s leading face-off man — won a 50-50 face-off to start the game, and the Orangemen managed to control possession for the first five minutes. However, the Hoyas struck first, with a goal from Alex Englehardt in the second minute of the game.

Following that, the Orangemen took the lead with a goal from Steve Thompson in the fourth minute. The game continued at a fast pace, with both teams fighting for control of the ball. However, the Hoyas were able to maintain their lead, scoring goals in the fifth, sixth, and seventh minutes of the game.

The game remained tight throughout the first half, with both teams trading goals. The Orangemen were able to find the back of the net in the 13th minute, but the Hoyas responded with a goal from Matt Caione in the 15th minute. Despite this, the Orangemen were able to maintain their lead, scoring goals in the 18th and 19th minutes of the game.

Towards the end of the first half, the Hoyas regained the lead, scoring goals in the 25th and 26th minutes of the game. However, the Orangemen were able to respond with a goal from Jordan Loup in the 30th minute. The game ended with the Hoyas leading 8-7 at halftime.

In the second half, the Hoyas continued to dominate, scoring goals in the 31st and 32nd minutes of the game. However, the Orangemen were able to respond with a goal from Steve Thompson in the 33rd minute. The game remained close, with both teams trading goals. However, the Hoyas were able to maintain their lead, scoring goals in the 35th and 36th minutes of the game.

Towards the end of the game, the Hoyas were able to pull away, scoring goals in the 37th, 38th, and 39th minutes of the game. Despite this, the Orangemen were able to fight back, with goals from Steve Thompson in the 40th and 41st minutes of the game. However, the Hoyas were able to maintain their lead, scoring goals in the 42nd, 43rd, and 44th minutes of the game.

The game ended with the Hoyas leading 15-7, their most lopsided victory of the season. The Orangemen did not score in the final five minutes of the game, allowing the Hoyas to pull away and secure the victory.

After the game, Hoyas coach Mike Coughlin said. "Our team played well, and we were able to execute our game plan. The Orangemen fought hard, but we were able to maintain our lead throughout the game. We are pleased with the victory and look forward to the next game."

They take as few as seven seconds and last as long as five minutes.

Lightning-quick scoring bursts, the ones that thrust Syracuse men's lacrosse team into the national spotlight decades ago and have kept them there since, still exist and are potent as ever.

And with the NCAA Tournament starting Saturday afternoon and the top-seeded Orangemen drawing a first-round bye, the winner of the Cornell-Georgetown matchup will have an extra week to prepare for SU's ever-present attack.

Cornell handled it earlier this season and handed the Orangemen their only loss, a 13-12 defeat at Schoellkopf Field. SU (12-1) tounched the Hoyas last Saturday at the Carrier Dome 24-16.

"It's always been a trade-mark," Georgetown coach Dave Urick said. "It's one of those things coaches always try to stay away from, because when they bring a team here, those three- or four- or five-goal spurs. We full victim to.

Staff Reports

After Louis Orr left the Orangemen basketball staff to take the head coaching position at St. Joseph's College, Syracuse assistant coach Jim Boeheim last week hired a replacement for Orr and shuffled his staff to get younger recruiters on the road.

Troy Weaver comes east to the Orangemen from New Mexico State, where he worked last season under Fran Fraschilla.

Before helping the Lobos to a 16-14 campaign and a win in the NIT, Weaver worked under Ralph Willard for three years at Pittsburgh.

At Pitt, Weaver recruited the Washington, D.C. area, bringing in center Alonzo Mixon, guard Robert Brown, who started for the Panthers the past season.

Boeheim said Weaver's biggest asset might be his ties to the nation's capital. In 1989, Weaver coached the D.C. Assault, an amateur Athletic Union squad that pulled high school stars from Maryland, Virginia, and the surrounding area.

Weaver coached former Cincinnati star DeMarc-Johnson, former Temple forward Mark Karchner and Kentuckey's Keith Bogans.

In the mid 1980s, the Orangemen grabbed point guard Sherman Douglas from the D.C. area, and in the early 1990s, a Cleveland Indian.

Sometimes during Syracuse's 12-game, 59-day unbeaten streak, Katrina Hable's swagger returned.

In her first two years as an Orangewomen lacrosse superstar, the All-American neither took up valuable numbers nor played with flair and grace.

Hable glistened past the nation's best defenders and set up teammates with behind-the-back feeds even her most curvy avenues couldn't convert.

But the junior wideout hauled in a 16-12 home decision to George-town. In the loss, Hable failed to score a goal, one of only two games this season in which she went 60 minutes without a tally.

That small hiccup past the Inn Complete with her team on Sunday night, Hable wanted the Hoyas one more time, and the NCAA selection committee granted her wish.

The Orangewomen (12-3) meet Georgetown in a first-round tournament game at 4 p.m. today at GU's Kehoe Field.

Minutes after the pairing announcement, Hable and her swagger skipped complementing the higher.

The Syracuse football team held its 16th and final practice of the spring season on April 29. Butch Davis' normal practice filled with drills, drills and then some more drills.

The team shed its green and red practice jerseys for game attire and participated in the annual Spring Game, the lone chance of the season for locals to catch a glimpse of the Orangemen.

None sustained a long march to the endzone, and all suffered from a porous offensive line.

Early in the game, Williams, working with the blue team against the orange squad, took a crunching backside hit from junior defensive end Dwight Freemyer. After the sack, he settled down and made Malik Campbell a favorite target.

The junior wideout hauled in three passes on the day for 30 yards, including a 20-yard
