SU finds few Y2K system failures

CMS replaces software, prepares for new year

By Kate Stevenson

Asst. News Editor

Syracuse University computer systems passed the new year with only minor and temporary glitches.

To avoid any possible problems, older programs, including MacMainframe and MAN-TIS, were discarded entirely and replaced with newer, more up-to-date software, said James Tompkins, executive director of Computing and Media Services.

SAS, a software program used in statistics classes, is no longer running on Dell GXl and Media Services. The S.C.O.R.E. system was also down until Jan. 4 — not because of a Y2K bug, but in order to avoid one. The Office of the Registrar decided to shut down that system, along with other university computer systems, in order to prevent any problems Y2K may have incurred, said William Kessler, an SU computer consultant.

"It wasn't a big deal," Tompkins said. "Whatever the problem with the e-mail was, it went away quickly and nothing was lost.

"It was a good precaution for the university," said Frank Shultz, a freshman television, radio and film major. "It seemed to make sense on Monday for the Spring 2000 Semester."

State welcomes tax cut

By Emily Kulkus

Asst. News Editor

Consumers in 53 counties across New York state will shop this week without taxes on clothing and shoe purchases. A permanent tax-free clothing law will then begin March 5.

The seventh and final tax-free week that began Saturday and ends Friday applies to all clothing and shoe purchases of less than $500 per item. The statewide 4 percent sales tax cut applies to all counties, however, the counties have the option of not cutting their local tax. The last tax-free week was Sept. 1-7.

The first tax-free week, which was in 1997, has been followed by the Aug. 6, 1999, passage of a law by Gov. George E. Pataki to permanently eliminate state sales tax on clothing and shoe purchases of $500 or less. Neither cut applies to accessories, jewelry or handbags.

The idea of a tax-free week first began when shoppers started going to nearby sales tax-free states to do their shopping, said Brian Vattimo, press secretary to Lt. Gov. Mary Donohue.

"Other states, particularly Massachusetts and Vermont don't have sales tax on clothing," Vattimo said. "This will benefit New Yorkers and encourage them to shop in New York."

Local sales taxes vary from 6 to 8 percent. See TAX page 6

U.Sen examines diversity in residence halls

By Tiffany Lankes

Asst. News Editor

The Syracuse University Senate Committee on Campus Life will further examine a new proposal designed to eliminate racial barriers in the residence halls at a meeting Wednesday night in Maxwell Auditorium.

The proposal, written by a committee of students and faculty, includes a switch to random housing placement for first-year students, said Robert VanGulick, a committee member and philosophy professor.

"The proposal is modeled on the Chancellor's Commission on Pluralism," VanGulick said. "They were looking at a whole range of issues of diversity on campus."

The committee addressed the issue of diversity in the residence halls after receiving numerous complaints regarding the apparent segregation of racial groups into residence halls, VanGulick said. The percentage of minority students residing in Flint and Day halls on Mount Olympus is 10 percent, versus a minority population of 28 percent in Brewster and Boland halls, he added.

"I don't think that the university is at fault for it but the university wants to do something about it," VanGulick said. "De facto segregation is something that has a long history at SU."

Lydia Wasylenko, committee member and Bird Library associate librarian, said students often choose residence halls where they know other people. This method of selection leads to the pattern of ethnic segregation that has been prominent in freshman residence halls in past years, she added.

"All of the minority students who wish to go up on the Mount can," VanGulick said. "But a lot of them want to be in Brewster/Boland. That's where they know a lot of minority students are."

This contrasts the rumor that the university bases housing assignments on economic status, he added.

The proposal will give first-year students a chance to apply for the Mount. See SEN page 3

Sarah Pack, a junior mass communications major, took the Mount Sunday to face Notre Dame. Pack and her teammates rallied in the second half to pull off a 63-60 victory.

"I think we were a little nervous at first," Pack said. "But we really stepped it up in the second half."

Pack scored 10 points in the second half, including two threes, to help pull away from Notre Dame. See Sports.

CIA posits Iranian nukes

WASHINGTON, D.C. — An intelligence report indicating an Iranian official had exchanged nuclear materials with Libya was reported by the New York Times, according to administration sources.

A CIA spokesman on Monday would only say that the agency has had a "long interest" in Iran's nuclear weapons research and has been "watching it on a continuing basis." He added: "We don't want to discount the possibility," he said, "but no one is asserting that there is a bomb." He has made no secret that it has had a nuclear weapons program for more than 15 years, driven primarily by Iraq's program and Baghdad's use of chemical weapons during their war. Another incentive was Israel's passion of possession of nuclear weapons.

Bradley, Gore jar on race issue

DES MOINES, Iowa — Vice President Al Gore and Bill Bradley have courted minority voters in a demonstration of their desire to depict each other as divisive on race and civil rights.

Their closest exchange of the hour-long debate came over racial profiling, with Bradley pointing it out to Gore during a passage in which the administration has not taken action to halt the use of race as a factor in random searches by police.

"I believe," Gore said, "that we should issue an order to end racial profiling if you were president of the United States." Bradley countered: "But we have a president now. I want you to walk down that hallway, walk into his office and say: 'Sign this executive order today.'"

Mission engineers, meanwhile, have been sending the craft a steady stream of new commands to juggle or turn its antennas in hopes of establishing contact. None of it has worked.

Buffet cashes in on Bell stake

LOS ANGELES — World famous investor Warren Buffett has apparently sold his remaining stake in the electronics company, realizing a quick profit on the $3.5 percent stake in the company because his investment goals have been met, a source said Monday. Buffett had sold the shares at or below market value, and learned inadvertently of the sale.

Despite what he did not know when Buffett sold the shares at or above market value, Buffett, chairman and chief executive of the company, had previously sold much of the company's shares. In a telephone conversation last month with a reporter, Buffett had said he had no plans to sell any of the company's shares.

Voting via computer may boost turnout

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Voting by computer, buy stocks by computer, keep in touch with friends by computer. Now, at the dawn of a new century, we are soon have the option of voting online.

Officials in one Northern California county are so gung-ho about the idea that they hope to offer voters the option in November of casting a ballot via the Internet.

"This is something that might rekindle the enthusiasm we've become," said Women's Studies professor at San Mateo's city. He says there will probably be able to vote from home in your pajamas by 2010.

Women prefer taller men

In case there was any doubt, tall men really do get dates, according to a study on 3,200 men age 25 to 65 who underwent medical examinations between 1963 and 1989.

British and Polish researchers analyzed medical records for childless men and found that the average height of at least one child was 2 inches shorter on average than the height of women who had at least one child.

Women prefer men who are about an inch shorter on average than themselves, though childless men were on average 1.2 inches shorter than men who had at least one child.

"We cannot rule out the possibility that other variables are held constant, change in height will consistently be significantly shorter than those who have at least one child," he said. "We are not sure whether this relationship write in the Jan. 13 issue issued 13 issues ago: that taller men are more reproductive success than shorter men.

Asteroid collision risk cut in half

Asteroids may be a safer place for Earth than astronomers have thought, according to a study that could potentially save our planet. That finding is in line with a recent NASA study that showed that asteroids would be a 50 percent chance of causing a catastrophic collision with Earth in the next million years.

"It's a happy day," he said. "Now that we understand the number of potentially devastating asteroids, we can begin to double our efforts to monitor them and work on ways to deflect or destroy them in case of a collision with Earth."

Sa  Malchoff, a freshman in the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications, said the proposal to apply to first-year students, it could eventually apply to all students, he added. Until it is instituted, however, future plans are indefinite.

"I think people are eager to see how it works," Van Gulick said. "It's going to be tricky. This is a new model, but a model that is proving in lots of places."

While racial barriers may not be entirely the university's fault, the percentage of minority students living in various residence halls is ironic, said Melissa Malchoff, a freshman in the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications.

Malchoff said she noticed the scarcity of minorities where she lives in Flint Hall.

"I don't understand how all 600 people in this building could be so similar and all end up together," Malchoff said. "But I don't necessarily see it as racist."

While diversity in the residence halls may help break some racial barriers, cliques will always form based on common interests and situations, she said. Taking away a student's choice of residence hall may not remedy this problem, she added.

However, many students base their hall selection on longstanding stereotypes about the residents, Malchoff added.

"I think a ton of people hear about the stereotypes when they come to visit and pick their halls from there," she said. "This creates a huge boundary. Alike people tend to stick together."

In other USEN news:
Issues discussed at the Dec. 15 USEN meeting were the establishment of new classes for the Spring 2000 Semester, the merging of the College for Human Development with the College of Nursing and the School of Social Work and the awarding of honorary degrees for the victims of the bombing of Pan Am Flight 103.

Sen. Jonathan M. Taylor, a fifth-year architecture major, proposed awarding honorary degrees posthumously to the 35 students killed. The Senate's Committee on Honorary Degrees voted unanimously against the recommendation and explained that the university already awarded the students with many honors and recognitions.

The next meeting of the Senate will be Wednesday, evening in Maxwell Auditorium. Senators will further discuss issues regarding curricula, budget and student services.

MCCAIN

natures to petition the court system in order to appear on the ballots. This is the right he is exercising, said Nancy Ives, a campaign spokesperson. “Despite diligent efforts by a volunteer army, McCain could not surmount the unconstitutional high burdens that New York imposes for a Republican candidate to get on the ballot statewide,” according to the brief McCain filed. “As in the past, New York’s ballot access rules are the most burdensome in the nation. As in the past, New York’s scheme creates organizational, financial, and legal burdens that cannot be overcome by anyone except the state party leadership’s handpicked candidate or by a candidate with virtually limitless financial resources.”

McCain is a viable candidate in New York and he believes voters should have the option to choose between all candidates in the upcoming primary, Ives said. McCain took a 37 percent to 28 percent lead over Republican rival Texas Gov. George W. Bush in New Hampshire, the nation’s first primary state, according to a poll released Thursday by the Quinnipiac College Polling Institute. McCain trails Bush 49 percent to 24 percent in New York, but those numbers mark a 7 percent increase since a November poll, according to the Quinnipiac Institute.

“Senator McCain has demonstrated he is a legitimate candidate in New York state,” Ives said. “He has demonstrated it by the gains he has made in the polls and by the signatures he has gotten there.”

New York’s election laws often keep viable candidates off the ballots, she added.

“The rules in New York are written to keep people off the ballot and to give preference to the establishment,” Ives said. “Sen. McCain believes the voters should have the choice. These tactics should end.”

McCain believes New York election law and members of the Republican Party intend to restrict voter choices, Ives said. Despite the six counties in which McCain did not get the ballot, the senator is optimistic about his chances in New York and the rest of the primary elections, she added.

“He was disappointed that the Republican Party would seek to restrict ballot access to their own chosen favorites,” she said. “But he’s very proud of the gains he’s made in New York.”

The disappointment expressed by the McCain campaign arose early last week when members of the New York Republican Party, including State Republican Chairperson Bill Powers, filed challenges to McCain’s petitions. The actions were a deliberate attempt by Bush supporters to prevent McCain from appearing on the ballot, Ives said.

The challenges are only an attempt to verify that the people who signed the petitions are registered voters and confirmed members of the Republican Party, Bush Campaign spokesperson Ari Fleischer said. “I don’t think the Republican voters want Democratic voters voting in their primaries,” he said. “It’s hard to understand his criticism.”

Both McCain’s criticism of the Republican Party and of New York’s use of petitions to determine candidates for primary elections are unfounded, Fleischer said. McCain will appear on ballots in several states requiring petitions to appear on primary ballots, including Virginia where he was able to obtain the 20,000 signatures necessary for appearance.

“The other states require petitions to appear on ballots,” he said. “Filing 20,000 signatures in Virginia is no small task and that’s a credit to Sen. McCain’s cause down there.”

Through legal action McCain hopes to appear on the ballot in all 31 counties in New York, Ives said. Despite the setbacks, he did not alter his campaign plan, but will continue his schedule of appearances, events and speeches in all states with upcoming primary elections, she added.

“He believes it’s the right thing for all the party members in New York to have the choice,” Ives said. “He intends to fight for every last vote.”

The tax-free weeks have been met with positive reactions from retailers and consumers, both Morris and Vattimo said. The tax-free periods save retailers paperwork and attract customers, while directly saving consumers money, Vattimo said.

"The consumers know that this exists and they have held back shopping until this week," he added.

Tricia Wede, a Lord and Taylor department store associate, agreed. "There has been a huge increase in business," said Wede, who works in the American Women department at the Carousel Mall store. "If they have to get a bunch of stuff, they wait until this week."

The Carousel Mall store has been offering an additional 25 percent off already reduced merchandise sale, Wede said. Although the tax-free week is after the holiday shopping period, sales are surprisingly high, she added. "With the markdowns and then the coupons and then no tax — you can't go wrong," she said.

Sales in the store's men's department have been high because prices are typically higher than any other clothing department, she said.

"But several consumers are not aware of the encroaching law," she added, noting that when it goes into effect sales will not remain at the same high level.

"I think once it becomes permanent there won't be such a rush."

When writing about my experiences with the Venezuelan girls, I noted how much they enjoyed speaking English. It's not uncommon for people from Spanish-speaking countries to have limited fluency in English, and it was heartening to see these girls so eager to learn and communicate. This experience highlighted the importance of language barriers in cross-cultural interactions and the role language plays in shaping perceptions and relationships. It's a reminder to be open-minded and patient when communicating with people from different backgrounds.

Burl and Earl stood on the streets of Caracas watching the crowds mingle in masses. They both were buttered up, verbally-striped shirts with a pair of doctor's khakis. Earl held on to his leather tight, keeping it close to his body. They were here to do business and they were intimidated. It showed in their confused faces they were.

Suddenly, a young Venezuelan boy ran by and pulled at his wrist. Earl smiled with accomplishment and turned to Burl with an explanation. "I played basketball in high school. Good for grip, you know." Just then, the same boy ran by again and ripped Earl's watch off his wrist.

Burl comforted Earl with a pat on the back. "Come on," he said, "let's get us some healthy Venezuelan girls." And they did just that. Earl stopped open his wallet and specialty Venezuala drink. Earl's wife by this time was perfect for him. Burl and the same when their second trip was; they were both married to healthy Venezuelan girls.

I had the pleasure of meeting my new 25-year-old son, Joaquin David. 'Quin' was abandoned during the time and two screamed out at me. Orange seniors shine in finale

BY CONNOR ENNIS

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — No cap and gown for senior quarterbacks, no visibly being seniors were given. Make no mistake about it, however. Syracuse Orange seniors had their finales on Dec. 29. The seniors turned up on a temporary stage on the field of Adelphia Coliseum to accept their diplomas and be honored by family, friends and the rest of the Syracuse community. Many left their families as the seniors strapped the home MVP honors, but it was the overall play of the seniors that truly carried the day.

Syracuse finished 9-3, including a 20-13 Music City Bowl victory. "It's hard to say for a second-half comeback and a public relations nightmare last week, the seniors aren't the kind of people they are, we're not the kind of people they are," said Sweet.

Led by James Munro's MVP performance, Syracuse's ground game racked up 276 yards in a 20-13 Music City Bowl victory. Mungro burst ahead of two Wildcat defenders on an 86-yard run to set up a touchdown. He was headed for a great game.,

Syracuse’s defense made life difficult for Kentucky, allowing 137 yards of total offense. The Orange defense dominated the Wildcats, holding them to 66 yards on the ground.

Syracuse looks to Y2K after bowl win

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — The final gun sounded, and the Syracuse Orangemen invaded the Adelphia Coliseum playing surface for a short yet jubilant celebration.

Unlike their last three trips away from the comfortable Carrier Dome, Syracuse ventured out of town in familiar spot and escaped with a win.

But cupcake sales fail to rectify national debts, one-ply toilet tissue and seven-point bowl triumphs do little to brighten the outlook for a battered program.

Failing in the most basic of bowl games, the Orangemen leave Nashville and its legion of loyal admirers, SU held every reason to wilt. But the Orangemen fought back, freezing the scoreboard for a battered program.

Yet the win means little more than 60 minutes of solid football, acting as an inspiring tidbit to wrap up a three-month-long gridiron eulogy.

VICTORY

Baniewicz, guard Sean O'Connor and wide receiver Quinton Spotwood, Mungro darts for an SU bowl-record 86 of his 162 total yards.

Two plays later, Kyle Johnson banged off a pair of blue and white defenders and into the endzone for SU's first trip to payday since a first-quarter touchdown Thanksgiving weekend in Miami.

"The offensive line was blocking very well," Mungro said. "We knew we were going to break one. The wide receiver had an excellent block, and I thought I was going to score."

After a scoreless third quarter, Samuel booted his second field goal of the game to give Kentucky a 13 - 7 cushion with 10:35 remaining. Taking the ball at its 23-yard line, SU moved 77 yards on three runs and a throw to take the lead for good.

On the march, Pat Woodward turned a short slant into a 17-yard gain. Dee Brown took a pitch and scrambled left for 22 yards, and Mungro found the endzone for the first time, sprinting 32 yards to the left pylon. A Nate Trout extra point put SU up one with 9:05 left.

"Our kids fought extremely hard," head coach Paul Pasqualoni said. "There were a lot of things that didn't go our way. But we hung in there and found a way to do what we had to do to win."

The Cats' attempt to retaliate late appeared handicapped by the loss of Whalen. The junior college transfer caught 58 passes on the season, setting an NCAA Division I-A record for tight ends.

He hauled in two balls on Kentucky's opening drive, a seven-play, 70-yard burst that put the Wildcats ahead 7 - 0. On UK's next possession, Whalen made an incredible grab down the right sideline, shielding All-American linebacker Keith Bulluck for a 20 - yard gain.

A snap later, Bonner found the tight end and in the left flat. SU safety Ian McIntosh upended Whalen, who tried to break his fall with an outstretched right arm. When hand hit turf, elbow exited socket, and Whalen's outstanding college career screeched to a halt.

"When you lose an All-American, it's tough," Mumme said. "But they kind of took it over in the fourth quarter. I think their maturity showed."

Handicapped with the loss of Whalen, Bonner brought minimal fear to the SU sideline in the fourth. After Mungro's touchdown, Will Allen picked off a wobbly Bonner throw at midfield and allowed SU to milk clock with 1:31 left.

SU missed a two - point try, but a forward lateral on third and four, Brown lined up under center and kept the ball, collecting a big first down.

"With no timeouts," Mumme elected to allow the Orangemen a touchdown. Mungro obliged, darting 20 yards for an insurance score with 1:13 left.

SU forced a punt with 3:23 remaining, clinging to the single-point advantage. On third and four, Brown turned a short slant into the endzone for the first time since the season's second game and led Orangemen receivers with five receiving yards.

"The offensive line blocked well and we ran hard," Pasqualoni said. "Troy was playing well, so we decided to go with him. Everybody played hard and had a lot of fun."

La Niña brings a chilly financial forecast to local businesses.

Old Man Winter took the long road to Syracuse this year. And while Central New Yorkers waited for him, they celebrated a green Christmas and slid down slopes of man-made snow. Not until last week did the characteristic icy, whipping winds begin tearing across the state. Thermometers plummeted to sub-zero temperatures for the first time in a year, cars slid off the roads and red-checked children adorned snowmen with button noses.

As local residents struggle into their down jackets and mittens for the first time this winter, some are wondering why the chilly weather took so long to swing into town. For those who count on the usual piles of fake-effect-induced snow to pad their pockets throughout the year, this season has been particularly harsh.

Mike Panik, an employee of West End Snow Removal, 1513 Erie Blvd. W., is fed up with the dry weather, which he said is taking a major financial toll on his business.

"This sucks," he said, referring to the light dusting of snow covering the ground Sunday. "Look out the window. I'm losing money left and right."

Bills for general operating costs continue to roll in even when the storm fronts don't. Fixed costs of Panik's business include manpower, truck and plow payments, insurance and maintenance, which he said must be paid even if they're not doing the usual amount of plowing. More than half his business is determined on a contractual basis, at the beginning of the season. But since early forecasts predicted a mild winter, some of Panik's usual clients backed away from the business for a whole winter's worth of plowing.

But Panik said he's not worried about the lack of fluffy white stuff so far. Just one string of bad storms — combined with his summer landscaping business — will probably be enough to replace the early season losses, he said.

"Ten days of bad weather make all the money for the season," he said. "We're just waiting, getting ready for the 'motherload' — that's what we call.

It has been said that "The Sopranos" is the television equivalent of the band The Beatles, Peppers Lonely Hearts Club Band — a work that transcends an entire genre of popular entertainment. It has been listed as the best show on almost every critics' "Top" list, and the show's acting troupe has earned the coveted of nearly every major entertainment magazine in the last few weeks. The New York Times went so far as to call it "the greatest work of American pop culture of the past quarter-century." It just may be true.

So to praise the HBO drama "The Sopranos" for its second-year return would be redundant, but I'll do so anyway, just to make sure that it sinks in for everyone out there who chose not to read anything over winter break. The acclaim is well-earned for creator David Chase's saga of mob family life. It's a weekly event worth cooking the pasta and sauce up for each week — even if it's Spaghetti heater up in a microwave.

James Gandolfini beautifully portrays troubled Tony Soprano, Mafia boss and loving father, trying to cope with both raising his son and daughter and handling the family business in New Jersey. Unfortunately, the pressure of dealing with his plethora of life turmoils became too much for Tony and he began to see a psychologist.

the bigeest storms of winter," he said.

Weatherman's report

Much of the unseasonably warm weather can be attributed to La Niña, a phenomena caused by unusually cold temperatures in the tropical regions of the Pacific Ocean, and Dave Eichorn, Channel 9 meteorologist.

During a La Niña year, the northeast experiences unusually warm temperatures due to strong winds moving west to east across the continent. These create a "high-speed highway" of warm winds from the Pacific waters. In contrast, during El Nino years, air masses passing over the Northeast often originate over the Arctic Ocean, bringing cold temperatures of a typical upstate New York winter.

La Niña creates storms and cold blasts in northern Canada during the core of the winter. But since New York lies south of this region, temperatures remain warmer than usual. It also affects the normal patterns of southern jet streams, which are fast, high-level winds, causing warm air from the southern states to be pushed north.

Meteorologists predict that La Niña will continue through the remainder of the winter, but will likely end its two-year run in late May. And for those hoping for a quick transition to summer, Eichorn said the effects of the phenomenon should usher in a warmer spring, beginning in April.

But a cold jetstream from northern Canada recently dipped south, only over the Northeastern U.S., crossing the current cold snap, which Eichorn expects to last for the next several weeks. Nonetheless, Syracuse's snowfall thus far totals only 27 inches, which is nearly 25 inches less than the average amount for this point in the season. And the snow that has been dumped on the region has an extremely low water content, which could cause problems for agricultural endeavors this summer, Eichorn said.

"The precipitation is definitely not where it should be," he said. "We really need some more moisture — a good Nor'Easter would do the trick."

Icicle acclamation

And on the SU Hill, students battle plunging temperatures and fierce winds as the second semester kicks off.

FRIENDS

the show's producers are merely perpetuating the stereotype that all Italians are associated with mob. Instead, they should be praising the show for showing a family that is strong, supportive and realistic. The Mafia side of the story is secondary and exists only to provide some entertainment.

Nowhere else will you see a modern American family so accurately portrayed as it is on "The Sopranos." All of this on television, where new "Real Life" entertainment that has been notorious for the disposable nature of its content. For as much television as we watch on a regular basis, there is hardly anything that we remember — let alone acknowledge as a certified classic.

Look at shows airing on TVLand — "Giligan's Island," "The Brady Bunch" and "Hogan's Heroes." They are examples of past television shows that barely came close to showing real life. Until now, with the help of "The Sopranos," television has been a wonderland that has allowed few glimpses of entertainment that reflects reality.

By airing on HBO without the restraints of the conservative networks, Chase's show runs more like a film. With no commercials, the hour-long drama shows in realistic detail a quality drama without the interruption of advertising breaks. But while a two-hour movie ends and we forever say goodbye to the characters, Carmela, Livia and Dr. Melfi are given hours to develop. Emmy award-winners Edie Falco, Lorraine Bracco and Nancy Marchand make their characters three of the strongest female characters this side of Mary Tyler Moore. Don't worry about what you've missed so far. The first season only consisted of 13 episodes, and the second season premiere will be on April 10. There is just one of the four weekly showings. The $10 you shell out each month for HBO will actually go toward something more worthwhile — the real life of the Soprano crime family.

There's still a chance to catch up with the goings-on of the Soprano crime family, so don't worry — or more appropriately, fugettabout it.

The 22-1 Irish continued to run the game and hold on to the lead. Notre Dame head coach Matt Doherty said, "We have five players on the court that can all pass, handle and shoot. Maybe next time we'll keep him in the game and foul out Shumpert." SU led 25-20 at the half, but Murphy's six quick points keyed a 9-3 run that gave the Irish a 33-29 lead.

After two Thomas free throws made the score 40-39 in favor of the Orange, Shumpert took center stage. The silky smooth swingman drilled four treys in a three-minute span, igniting the game-deciding run and causing the launch of free T-shirts into the Dome crowd of 22,500.

Two 3s by fellow sophomore Tony Bland widened the gap and sent the Dome crowd into a frenzy. The extra-large and quick Bland jumped up and down, exhorting the faithful who braved the bitter cold to watch SU's hardwood warriors.

Despite Bland and Jason Hart rising up the court, Sunday was Shumpert's show. He finished with a career-high 36 points and invoked memories of long-range gunners like Donnell and Steve Kerr. "I kept hitting them and they kept giving them to me," Shumpert said. "I was just feeling like, 'Oh, this is in. These are going in.'"

Throughout the evening, the Orange's successful three-point shooting helped to the game's most pivotal moments. Despite Bland and Hart's scoring, Shumpert led the team with 10 rebounds. The junior guard also added 11 points, five assists, and seven blocks in a game that saw them have some dunks and some layups like they did in the game when we did more of that."

As has been the formula all season, one Orange man stepped to the forefront but was supported mightily by several of his teammates.

Damone Brown tallied 14 points and snatched eight rebounds. Bland and Hart both erupted in 12 points and dished out six and seven assists, respectively. Sophomore guard Kuest Duwyne came off the bench to provide a spark with six points in 11 minutes, including a crowd-pleasing slam.

SU's even-keeled leader, Ryan Blackwell, also played a major role in the win while netting just three points. The senior forward led the team with 10 boards and shared team-leading honors with Hart for his seven assists.

Blackwell's defense was also a major reason for the subpar play of Murphy.

The victory Sunday against the tough Irish squad seems to be a good omen for an SU squad heading into the heart of its Big East schedule.

"This is a good win," Boeheim said. "To play the way we did in the second half just makes it a real good win, in terms of the things that we did."

Syracuse Fire Chief Dennis Coty said that fire was activated between 2:45 p.m. and 4 p.m. by the flow of the second floor. Syracuse Fire Chief Dennis Coty said. Within an hour, the fire department was summoned to SU again when a smoke detector on the fifth floor of the science and technology center activated an alarm, Coty said. Although two smoke detectors were deemed clean, O'Hara said he believes that heat from a bathroom sink in Egger's Hall could have triggered the alarm. O'Hara said, "Today's low temperatures were not to blame for the errors, he said. "It's unusual for us to come here," Coty said. "There are a lot of buildings and a lot of alarm systems on campus. It's part of our responsibility to check everything out." Coty said.

City traffic rerouted for basketball season

BY SARAH OVASKA

City officials are asking basketball fans to drive an alternate route to the Carrier Dome. "This is nothing really new," said Brock LaForty, senior transportation planner of the Syracuse Metropolitan Transportation Council. "It's a reminder to prevent SRX from exceeding a set of air quality controllers, the National Ambient Air Quality Standards. Fans should avoid the Adams and Almond streets intersection, park in the Ontrack lot at Armory Square, and use the train, said the Council in its 1999-2000 Winter Special Events Traffic Management Plan. The plan is revised annually and suggests that fans ride the Centro bus service, carpool or travel to the game by foot.

The plan aims to control air quality and traffic, said Wayne Westervelt, communications director for the Council. By avoiding the intersection at Adams and Almond streets, the level of carbon monoxide emissions will decrease.

crease, LeForty said.
"The Council revises the traffic plan during the basketball season rather than the football season because the effects of carbon monoxides from idling cars are more harmful when combined with the cold winter weather," Westervelt said.
The city of Syracuse exceeded Ambient standards in past years, Westervelt said. But the levels have since dropped, putting the city in a maintenance category of air quality, he added.
The changes in routes were also done to limit traffic flow in residential neighborhoods, Westervelt said.
"We want to keep the flow away from neighborhoods, as part of public outreach," he said.
Pat Campbell, managing director of the Dome, said he rarely gets calls from residents regarding increased traffic during game times. The parking and traffic circulation is typically an issue by the Dome, he added.
"Students are always a concern with traffic — especially with a stadium on a campus on the outside community comes to the area," he said.
Some students said the increase in traffic is merely an inconvenience.
"There are more cars around, but it isn’t a problem," said Jen couombe, a Brewster/Boland resident and freshman in the Collage of Arts and Sciences. "I think it’s good for the university to attract fans."
Other students around campus, however, expressed frustration with the traffic during games.
"The traffic is always bumper to bumper and makes it hard to get around," said Gannon Ginzburg, a junior elementary education major. "The people going to the game should park at Masley (Field House) and walk like the students do."

Hospital, 726 Irving Ave., said there is no shortage of Relenza or Tamiflu, the two available flu drugs, as other areas of the country have.
Central New York is experi-ing blood supply shortages, however, said Dagny Putnam, a spokesperson for the American Red Cross in the New York/Pennsylvania region.
"The flu, combined with the weather and the holidays, has contributed to a national blood shortage," said Putnam, a 1999 SU alumna. "We have less than a 36-hour supply of type O blood."
Putnam said the Red Cross gerally relies on at least a three-day supply.
Donors must be at least 17 years of age, 110 pounds and not experiencing a fever. Any eligible donors can call 1-800-272-4543 to schedule an appointment.
About 10-20 percent of the general U.S. population develops the flu each year. More than 110,000 people are hospitalized from flu-related complications and 20,000 people die from flu complications annually, according to the CDC.
Common symptoms of the flu include the sudden onset of fatigue, fever, severe muscle aches, joint pain, loss of appetite, a dry cough and chills. The virus, which infects the respiratory tract, is spread from person to person by coughing or sneezing into the air.

in the College of Visual and Per-foming Arts.
"I would buy it and maybe sort of neat to have your own ice cream."

Matt Josephs, a freshman broadcast journalism major, said SU’s image would help increase sales.
"I think people will buy it just for the name," Josephs said.
"The product will be popular in other areas besides Syracuse because of an extensive alumni population, he said. Sales will also escalate if the basketball sea-sion continues to go well, Josephs added.
"I would buy the ice cream," he said. "Anyway I can support my school."

Themed housing misses the mark

After months of pondering, University Senate may finally decide today the fate of themed housing in Syracuse University residence halls.

The brainchild of the Office of Residence and Life and the Office of Students Affairs aims to diversify campus housing by letting students live with peers of the same major. The plan responds to complaints that dorm floors are not sufficiently homogenous; lacking racial variety and social variety.

Because of the lack of diversity in campus housing, stigmas have been attached to certain dorms. Some believe the Mount as a breeding ground for fraternities and sororities. Others say Shaw Hall is dominated by art, students who have left and majority boys end up in Brewster/Boland.

Currently ORUs criteria for placing students in housing depends on whether a student applies for financial aid, and if students have paid their room security deposit. Once the university receives the deposit, rooms are reserved. Subsequently, wealthy students live apart from the rest of the student population.

Some students may prefer themed housing. The chance to bond with students in the same discipline may sound appealing. SU owes its students to provide this lifestyle opportunity to its students. But the university should not force students in living with people with the same major— it should be the student's choice.

If SU is truly interested in ensuring housing diversity, the only viable option is random placement.

USen needs to quickly address this issue. Today's meeting will be the ideal time.

While diversity is an important core value to the university, it shouldn't be artificial. College is a time when students venture away from home to learn and make a wide array of people. Themed housing may spice dorm life up a bit, but the proposal fails to solve the problem.

Buddhism intended to make a political statement. But even the Dalai Lama himself denies any such intentions. The administration and the University Judicial Board ad leaves many questions

To the Editor:

Having read the advertisement placed by Dean Barry L. Wells in the December 10th issue of The Daily Orange, I must question Dean Wells on a substantive point.

In his advertisement he states that the Judicial Board does not have unchecked power due to the oversight provided by the administration and the University Appeals Board. Dean Wells however, does not explain why, with an Appeals Board in place, the oversight of the administration is required. That is, in fact, why a process of appeals exists. If the Review Board somehow oversteps a decision deemed inappropriate, it can be appealed. This is where the checks and balances can exist. If the Review Board does not exist, our system is left with one body. When we begin to allow administrators to oversee decisions, however well intentioned they may be, it undermines the entire process. It begs the question of why the process even exists. We do not, in any way, question the sincerity nor the integrity of either Dean Anastasia Ortiz or Dean Wells. We strongly believe they have the students in mind in every action that they take. An argument arises not from a question of interest in the good of the students, but from a misunderstanding of their belief in the best way to serve them. At the same time, we strongly believe that the only way to serve the students is to allow the judicial process to operate with its own checks and balances, to work unhindered.

NEVA AUSTREW/The Daily Orange
SU's lead grew to six in the second half, but BC tied the score at 50 with 11:47 remaining. From there, the Orangewomen went ice cold in the second frame. SU scored just four points in the final nine-plus minutes.

Syracuse's failure to hold a lead cost them a win yet again Jan. 4 in a 76-65 home loss to Providence. The Orangewomen led by as many as 13 points in the first half, but PC stormed back to take the lead for good with 11:10 to play. Record led SU with 19 points on the night.

"We need to work on our endings of our games and continue to play together as well as we do in the first half," Ervin said. "We've just got to finish that last five-to-10 minutes. Execution is the biggest thing."

SU struggled with Atlantic Coast Conference power Virginia in the championship game of the University of Virginia Nationwide Classic on Dec. 30, losing 70-59.

A day earlier, SU stomped struggling Radford 88-60 in the tournament's opening round. Record, who came off the bench in both games, tallied 41 points and 20 rebounds in the two contests, meriting a spot on the All-Tournament team.

Ervin joined her teammate on the All-Volume squad, dishing out 12 assists in the Radford victory.

The win came on the heels of one of SU's most surprising losses this season, a 76-56 setback to Vermont. SU held a five-point lead in the first five minutes, but the America East power pulled away for the easy triumph.

The strength of SU's opponents affected the team psychologically, causing the subpar play, Legette-Jack said.

"I think our focus has been so much on our opponent that we forget about ourselves," she said. "So we've really been talking about Syracuse women's basketball. There are going to be great teams that we are playing against, but they have to defend us, too, because we're a good team as well. We've changed our emphasis and, hopefully, that's going to give us some Ws."

A Tax-Free Hill
Even along SU's Marshall Street, where out-of-state students were not aware of the tax-free week, sales at clothing and shoe stores have jumped.

Upon entering Manny's, 151 Marshall St., store patrons are bombarded with everything from bright orange SU sweatshirts to warm-up pants. Manager Bill Mester said business has tripled as a result of the tax break. Students moving back to dormitories with parents in tow also helped sales, he said. And even on Saturday, when students were not yet back to school, business was booming due to local residents who are more knowledgeable of the state's tax exemptions.

"Local people know about it and take advantage of it," he said.

He added that when he informs customers that it is a tax-free week, about 75 percent of students have heard about the savings.

"There wouldn't have been a dramatic increase if they were totally unaware," he said.

At J. Michael Shoes, 123 Marshall St., Manager Jim Hicks said the tax exemptions have served as an extra incentive for consumers, along with the store's 30-percent markdowns. One area resident ordered a pair of $300 Birkenstock shoes, and would not pick them up until tax-free week started.

"But, most students are not aware," he said. "They are here to buy, regardless."

The Freshman consumer studies major and Manhattan native Blake Elpisig persuaded the counter at J. Michael, noting that the tax exemptions have not influenced his purchasings decisions. But he says he is looking forward to the permanent implementation of tax savings beginning March 1, adding that he often accompanies his friends to shop out-of-state where clothing is already tax free.

"If you are at the malls in New Jersey," he said, "practically every car has a New York license plate."

With many critics silenced and punters eating crow, the Syracuse basketball team now will try to avoid a fate that fortune has dealt to just about every other team in the nation.

Each season, the Orangemen entered the fall with high expectations and, like clockwork, proceeded to lose an away game to an inferior opponent.

Now it's Syracuse's chance to mark the first blemish on its 14-0 record and lead this season, as the Orangemen face the Panthers at 7:30 at Manley Field House.

After jumping out to a 6-0 start last season, Pitt fell flat on its face, losing 16 of its final 20 contests. The hornets became bees, coach Ralph Willard resigned following the year.

"We're looking at it as a chance for an upset. Obviously, we're going to have to play our best game and hope that they're not at the top of their game. We know how good they are," Willard said.

Pitt's best player, Vonteego Cummings, graduated. Then the Panthers lost center Isaac Hawkins to a broken leg.

And as they stand at 8-6 (0-3 Big East), the Panthers and new head coach Ben Howland face SU, the only undefeated team in Divison I.

"We've played St. John's and Connecticut already, so by now we're used to the situation," said Pitt associated head coach Jamie Dixon. "We've lost all the big dogs coming in.

Deadly fire mars basketball games

Staff Reports

A deadly fire at Seton Hall University may prevent Syracuse University's basketball teams from playing later this week. Seton Hall announced Wednesday that all classes and university events are suspended until further notice.

The possible rescheduling of the games is the result of a fire that swept through a university residence hall early Wednesday morning, killing three and injuring more than 50. Seton Hall would not comment further on the fire.

The women's game was originally scheduled for 2 p.m. at Seton Hall but their athletic administration has explored moving the game to Syracuse's Manley Field House for a 7 p.m. tip-off Saturday. The men's game is scheduled for noon Saturday in the Carrier Dome.

SU and Seton Hall were involved in "ongoing conversations" Wednesday following the 4:30 a.m. fire, said Sue Edson, SU's director of athletic communications.

An official decision regarding both games is expected to be made by the Seton Hall administration by noon Friday, Edson said.

"It's probably not going to happen," said Nathaniel Wojciechowski, a student employee in the Seton Hall administrative office.

Late Wednesday night, Wojciechowski said the university could not comment further about the games.

If the men's game is rescheduled, all tickets will be honored on the new date," Edson said.

Edson and SU Athletic Director Jake Crouthamel expressed their concern for the Seton Hall students, faculty and staff.

Assembly reviews applicants

BY CAROLINE CHEN
Contributing Writer

The Student Government Association will conduct elections Monday to fill remaining cabinet positions and appoint a director of public relations.

SGA President Jamal James, a junior musical theater major, will nominate candidates for the director's position, vice president and executive to president. The 70-member Assembly will then vote to confirm his nominations.

James called for applications to the SGA Assembly and began accepting applications immediately after being elected in November. He closed the application Tuesday, he said.

The executive to president is a new position introduced by James during the 44th Session.

"With all the work put upon the president and vice-president — because I plan on doing a lot — I felt the need for an executive assistant," James said. The new officer will help the president and vice-president with various duties and coordinate discussions with students, he said.

Renovating facilities at Manley Field House and balancing the athletic department's budget are among Syracuse University's plans for any surplus earnings from the Dec. 29 Music City Bowl in Tennessee. SU defeated the Kentucky University Wildcats in the bowl, 20-13.

The university is still awaiting final bills and a bottom-line summary, said Kevin Morrow, an SU spokesperson. A financial report will not be available until late March, Morrow added.

"Going in, our attempt was to break even," he said. "And if there is a surplus, it likely will be a very modest one."

Plans are underway to renovate training and locker rooms at Manley, regardless of whether the project receives a boost from a possible bowl payout, he said.

"Those seem to be projects that have been desired to be completed," Morrow said. "And I believe they will be whether or not there is excess money from the bowl game."

Morrow said that any additional money needed to cover bowl expenses beyond what the payout could cover will come from the athletic department budget.

"We do have a reserve fund," he said.

Cayuga land claim moves to trial

BY JEFF DENNIS
Staff Writer

Jury selection began Tuesday in a Syracuse federal court for the compensation phase of the Cayuga Indian land claim trial. The case may have a significant impact on a similar suit to be filed by the Onondaga Nation which could include the Syracuse University Hill.

Lawyers continued the screening of 135 possible jurors Wednesday for what could be a groundbreaking case for other Iroquois nations seeking reparations for land they claim was illegally taken from them by New York state's original European settlers.

The Cayugas claim two treaties from 1795 and 1807 that signed over more than 64,000 acres to New York state were illegal under the federal Indian Trade and Non-Intercourse Act of 1790, which stipulates that Congress must vote to approve such state purchases.

More than 200 later, lawyers representing the Cayuga Nation are asking for as much as $335 million dollars from the state as compensation for lost property.

Ginier will address nomination, controversy

President Bill Clinton, a Yale Law School alumnus of Ginier, withdrew Ginier’s nomination as Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights one month after submission, because of mounting opposition from Republicans who believed some of Ginier’s views were too radical. Democratic senators also called for her withdrawal when it became apparent that she would be nominated. The Senate Judiciary Committee held a confirmation hearing.

The opposition centered around law reviews and articles that Ginier had published suggesting such practices as giving black lawmakers special veto power when adopting legislation affecting black constituencies and requiring legislatures to pay more attention to black issues.

The turmoil Ginier endured during her nomination actually makes her a more attractive speaker for the event, Wolfe said. Many subjected her to harsh criticism for her views, but the experience gave her a unique wisdom, he added.

She brings a perspective of contemporary political analysis, he said. “She’s got a good, keen sense of how to see issues affecting the civil rights movement.”

Ginier will also help remind those in attendance that the civil rights movement is not over, Wolfe said. The event is a chance for people committed to racial equality to come together and commemorate one of the greatest figures in that cause, he added.

“Civil rights movement is a historic movement, but it’s much more alive today than a generation ago. It’s good to feel the energy in one place of all the people that contributed to King’s dream.”

Sunday’s event is not the first time Ginier has been asked to give a speech honoring King.

“I just gave a speech yesterday honoring MLK at Kansas State University in Manhattan, Kansas,” Ginier said. “It was well attended and well received.”

Ginier’s impressive professional credentials also factored in her selection, said Sylvia Martinez-Dalio, co-chairperson of the celebration committee. “Every year we go beyond.”

“We’re going to have an opportunity to say a few words about how she attempted to use that experience, and she’s made her final decisions yet, he said.”

“I think I should have a say in things that affect me and my future.”

“The turmoil Ginier endured during her nomination actually makes her a more attractive speaker for the event, Wolfe said. Many subjected her to harsh criticism for her views, but the experience gave her a unique wisdom, he added.”

“I don’t remember any conversation about it in our committee at all,” said Wolfe, co-chairperson of the celebration committee. “Every year we go through a long process. It takes us six months to decide.”

A sold-out dinner begins at 5:30 p.m. Sunday in the Carrier Dome with a free commemoration program and Ginier’s address to follow at 6:30 p.m.

Nicholas Maccarone. Dorrell and Maccarone are also running for the executive to president position. Sophomore graphics and international relations major Jennifer Dao and sophomore newspaper major Edwin Escobar are running for public relations director.

“Dorrell, Gajjar and Maccarone could not be reached for comment,” said Dao, who was the interim public relations director last semester, and she hopes to continue working with James.

“I want to work integrating SGA with the rest of the organization on campus and creating open lines of communication,” Dao said. “If people want to get involved, they should come to the Monday meetings.”

Escobar, a staff writer for The Daily Orange, said he also wishes to break down barriers between SGA and the rest of the student population.

“My primary aim would be to improve SGA relations with the SU community,” he said. “In that the past few years, SGA has become alienated from the student body to a degree. I want to participate in improving the university community. SGA is in a position where it can make a lot of change.”

James will present the candidates and offer his recommendations for each of the three positions at Monday’s meeting, he said that the Assembly’s vote is just a technicality.

“I believe the student body had their say when they elected James. By electing me, you elected a person who can make thoughtful decisions,” James said. “I’m looking for candidates that are interested in making SGA a technicality, but I’m looking for people who will take an active role to help him out.”

Optimal officers would also think differently and need to hire us, Brodsky said. Jamal has a lot of ideas, so the vice president should be someone who will take an active role to help him out.”

Five-Year Budget Plan

Where the 2000-2001 tuition increase will go:

• 45% Faculty salaries and fringe benefits
• 34% Student financial aid
• 13% Academic and student affairs and add-ons
• 8% Physical plant operations

Additional expense budget add-ons:

$100,000 Honors Program
$400,000 Unspecified academic initiatives
$100,000 - $200,000 SU staff training programs
$200,000 - $500,000 Student affairs

Five-Year Budget Plan

Even with the omission of some needs, SU is projected to be in debt for the first two years of the budget's run, before breaking even in the 2002-03 school year, the report said. Donald Carter, director and associate professor of the Honors Program, said SU decided that it was worth going into debt in order to obtain the desired programs.

Graduate student Darryl Smith suggested that SU decrease tuition to spark what he said would be an increase in enrollment. He said that with the reduced tuition cost, SU would also not have to distribute as much money for financial aid since a greater percentage of the student population would be able to foot their entire bill.

Smith said that decreased tuition could solve University College's waning enrollment, which the report projected at 8 percent over the next 5 years.

Admissions Dean David Smith, however, said that drops in tuition at other universities have received mixed reviews.

"Some institutions have regretted reducing tuition deeply," Smith said. "That action can be taken the wrong way — it can be interpreted as desperation. Price is not the only thing that drives students to enroll."

Price is not the only thing that can be interpreted as desperation, Smith said. "What action can be taken to solve the problem?" he asked. The plan also calls for an increase in faculty salaries, plus library book and periodical budget increments of 5 percent per year.

Additional expense budget add-ons include $300,000 for the Honors Program starting in the 2000-01 scholastic year and $400,000 for unspecified academic initiatives in 2002-03. One hundred thousand dollars will be given to SU staff training programs, an amount that will double by 2002-03, the report said.

The committee's report also allot $200,000 starting in 2000-01 to student affairs. That amount will grow to $500,000 by 2002-03, the report said.

Amanda Brown, a USEN representative for SU's part-time teaching staff, also noted inadequate salaries for the part-time faculty members and called for an increase.

"We have teachers, good teachers, who are not getting compensated," Brown said. "I think it reflects poorly on the value given to teaching at this university."

Brown and Carol Lipson, both part-time faculty members for the Writing Program, asked the committee to take another look into the need for part-time faculty salary increases.

The issue will be discussed in April when more complete figures will be available.
Cayugas deserve compensation

The Cayuga Indian Nation and the state of New York have fought over land rights for years, but a resolution may finally be in sight.

On Tuesday, jury selection began in a Syracuse federal court for the Cayuga Indian land claim trial. The trial’s outcome will likely be a precedent for all other Indian nation land claim trials in the state of New York.

The state has offered $120 million to the Cayugas who have politely refused the offer, hoping a court payday will be much higher. The Cayugas’ claim goes back to 1807, when they say the state broke treaties and sold the land without notice. The trial’s outcome will likely send the area into complete chaos. Two wrongs don’t make a right.

The Cayugas may receive land for a casino, much like the Oneida Nation has with Turning Stone Casino. There is speculation that the Cayugas may receive land for a casino, much like the Oneida Nation has with Turning Stone Casino, forty-five minutes east of Syracuse.

If this is done, casino money and any other monies given to the Cayugas should be used to improve the livelihood of the Nation’s people. And the courts best give to the Cayugas and the other nations affected would be the money they deserve so New York state can put this ugly chapter of American history behind them.

21st century depends on unconditional love

We have all survived the changing of millennia, but have we learned anything from it? The events of the last millennium and in particular the events of the 20th century, have definitely taught us something. The key to this millennium is the love that everyone has for themselves.

Every year, we make ideal promises to ourselves (called resolutions) saying we would make ourselves a little better than the year before. To become an acceptable amount of weight, we have to fit a profile. Once we remove the conditions and standing by them. You’ll feel confident about who you are, not because of positive feedback from others, but from what positive self-validation.

This self love will translate into an unconditional love for others. We usually love others when they fit a certain set of criteria. While I agree that we must be faithful to our love, there are many ways of doing things. We usually love others when they fit a certain set of criteria. Suspension not needed for Braves’ pitcher

The Editor:

As a black man and New York Mets fan, I was personally offended by the comments made by Atlanta Braves pitcher John Rocker in “Sports Illustrated.” However, I disagree with the editorial in the Daily Orange asserting that he should be suspended.

While I understand Rocker represents the Braves, I don’t believe his comments will hurt their reputation. I think most fans realize Rocker’s comments do not represent the views of the team. Besides, Rocker is entitled to free speech. Now we all know he’s a racist and sexist. Big deal. I’m sure there are other baseball players with similar leanings, but no one knows about them because they didn’t make the views known in a national magazine. We have to stop putting putting athletes and other celebrities on a pedestal. Just because they possess unique talents doesn’t mean they should be expected to model citizens. No one is infallible, even if they can throw a baseball 98 mph.

Rocker doesn’t need a suspension. The real responsibility of his comments. No suspension will be worth working seven more starts. They will make sure he’s fired and fans once the siren goes off.

Burns announces endorsement, meets criticism

BY JOY DAVIA
Asst. Lifestyle Editor

In an effort to rally campus support for presidential hopeful Steve Forbes in the upcoming primary elections, Syracuse University's College Republicans Chairperson Joe Burns announced Tuesday his endorsement of the magazine publisher.

Burns said the endorsement is only to spark activism among Republican supporters and is not meant to reflect the opinion of the College Republicans. Some students, however, find the endorsement a statement on behalf of the group nevertheless.

"It's important to stay behind the person you think should be president, congress, whatever," said Burns, a junior political science and history major. "Maybe some students now will want to be involved in the Forbes campaign." Burns said he will soon announce his endorsement over the group's listserve.

On the Democratic side of the ticket, SU's College Democrats president Christina Hinchey said she questions Burns' decision to vocalize an endorsement separate from the College Republicans.

"He is so vocal," Hinchey said of Burns. "Everyone associates him with the College Republicans. With him coming out, it is good to say the College Republicans did."

Burns said his motivation is to encourage those who are normally politically apathetic to becoming involved in the upcoming election.

Chris Ryan, the College Republicans' former second vice chairperson who is heading SU's Youth for Forbes group, said Burns' support will only help bolster Forbes' image on campus.

"Burns is one of the most influential people on campus," said the sophomore political science and broadcast journalism major. "It will certainly make those Republicans on campus take a much closer look at Steve Forbes."

Ryan, who stepped down from his post so his pursuits will not conflict with the interests of the College Republicans, said Burns has not actively participated in Youth for Forbes, aside from friendly advice.

The majority of College Republicans are in favor of Forbes, including the student organization's first vice chairperson Timothy Grossular, Burns said.

One member not supporting Forbes' run for the presidency is Secretary Gina DeRossi, who said Arizona Sen. John McCain is the Republican contender capable of burying the Democratic opponent.

DeRossi, a junior public relations major, said she is not surprised by Burns' endorsement because he has been an ardent supporter of the two-time presidential candidate since the onset of the primary races.

"Anyone who knows the College Republicans well enough knows we have our own opinions," she said.

DeRossi added that Burns has a right to endorse the candidate he prefers.

Although it is hard to estimate what percentage of members are in favor of specific candidates, she said that about half of those students heavily involved in the organization support Forbes.

"Brooke Schifflie, head of the newly formed SU for Bill Bradley campaign group, remains skeptical.

"I don't know how he made his decision," said the junior. "To support a group you need cohesion."

Burns' decision to support Forbes also surprised her, noting that Forbes' less than encouraging results in his past two presidential elections. But Burns said the Republican presidential candidate's role as a Washington outsider and as the only Reagan conservative with a chance of winning the country's top office led to his endorsement. Burns' stance as a committed pro-lifer and his position on social security also enticed Burns.

A straw poll commissioned by the College Republicans in September asked students if they would vote for their preferred Republican presidential candidate. With 3 percent of the student population voting, Forbes garnered 31 percent of the vote, with his closest contender being former Red Cross President Elizabeth Dale at 17 percent and Texas Gov. George W. Bush at 16 percent.

Ryan was also present at the straw poll, soliciting students to vote for Forbes in front of the voting table. Burns said in a Sept. 7 article in The Daily Orange that the student organization's support helped propel Forbes to the winners' circle.

Burns said his support for Forbes was not influenced by the straw results. A recent CNN/USA Today/Gallup Poll revealed that McCain is maintaining his lead in the Republican race with 63 percent of potential votes. His closest rival is McCain with 18 percent. Forbes garnered 5 percent of the vote.

SEAC, Greens host WTO protest discussion

BY SHELBY HEALY
Staff Writer

Syracuse University seniors Kelly Nagy and graduate Steve Penn spoke of their experiences during November's World Trade Organization protests at a meeting Wednesday night in the Westcott Community Center.

More than 20 people attended the discussion co-hosted by the Green Party and the SU Student Environmental Action Coalition.

More than 120 countries were represented at the Seattle Convention Center to discuss the principles of free trade. Demonstrators who disagreed with the conference protested for four days in the downtown area, suspending city services.

Green Party members Howie Hawkins and Yvonne Rothenberg also shared their thoughts and feelings about the protests and events leading to the WTO shutdown.

"I think it's the beginning of a new kind of movement," Hawkins said. "This is undermining our democracy."

The Seattle protest shut down WTO's Nov. 30 meeting, proving to demonstrators their attempts were successful, Hawkins said.

"We were there because we were against corporate power taking over our cultures, our lives — everything," Rothenberg said. "It wasn't just against trade."

After seeing film footage of the protest, Penn explained what it was like during his four days in Seattle. The protesters continued with non-violent behavior demonstrations despite being attacked with pepper spray, tear gas and rubber bullets. Penn was arrested by Seattle police after marching down the streets in a "no-protest" zone, he said.

"When we were in one of our lock-downs, two cars within 15 minutes of each other drove right through our chain," Penn said. "The only violence was from police and a few angry people trying to get through."

Penn explained the strategies demonstrators used to close the convention center.

The protesters divided themselves into "pie sections" around the center in order to block off major intersections and prevent delegates from reaching the center. Police eventually broke through the barricades, Penn said.

"People would fill in when someone needed medical attention because they were so outraged when they saw the police doing that," Penn said. "They could break our lines, but they couldn't break our will."

Nagy described many of the same scenes, adding she had been cold and wet for over 10 hours like many of the other people shown in the film, but kept spirits up.

"I got beaten a few times and got tear gassed," Nagy said. "But we kept protesting."

Rothenberg said she urged the group to eat, shop and cooperate with small businesses to help prevent large corporations from becoming overbearing. Taking action against the large companies, even in small numbers, was an important step, she added.

"I think that people don't realize how important this is," senior environmental studies major Chad Mason said. "I think it is important to educate myself so I can inform other people and make them aware."

Panel examines discrimination

Staff Reports

A panel discussion led by Syracuse University faculty members met Wednesday afternoon to discuss nationwide discrimination against Latinos.

"Employers hire non-Hispanic whites before Hispanics no matter their credentials," said Alejandro Garcia, a professor in the School of Social Work.

Psychological repercussions from this discrimination plague the Hispanic community, leading to domestic violence and substance abuse, Garcia added.

Garcia also spoke of widespread stereotypes, a prime reason for the job discrimination that many Hispanics must endure.

"The stereotypical Hispanic is set under a cactus taking a siesta. There are questions of honesty, work effort, commitment and ability," Garcia said. "We cannot allow these stereotypes to affect us."

The stereotyping and discrimination of Latinos stems partly from the poor education that many members of the community receive, she said.

"Educational attainment is considerably low in Hispanic communities. Schools are doing a poor job of keeping Hispanics enrolled and there are no role models for inspiration," Garcia said.

School of Social Work professor Gertrude Schaffner Goldberg stressed that livable wages are the key.

"Livable wages are the key," Goldberg said. "In the year 2020 one-fourth of the work force will be Hispanic, most expectedly with jobs at the bottom. The solution is to raise that bottom."

The benefits of these stereotypes to affect us.

"The benefits of these stereotypes to affect us.

One hour a week of paid work is considered employment and the number of officially unemployed workers in 1997 was 6.7 million. In October 1999, unemployment numbers were the lowest in three decades, she said. "Just a job is not enough. Livable wages are the key," Goldberg said. said Jake Crouthamel, SU athletic director.

Many of SU's recent bowl games, including the Fiesta Bowl in 1997 and the Orange Bowl in 1999, earned large dividends for the university, Morrow said. Participation in last January's Orange Bowl, in which Miami University defeated SU, yielded the university $4.68 million, which contributed to student scholarships, various academic programs and buying vans for the Office of Residence Life, he added.

"The benefits of these stereotypes to affect us.

"The benefits of these stereotypes to affect us.

"The chancellor determines where that money goes," he added. "Recently, it's gone to help pay for new classrooms and advances in technology all over campus."

The Music City Bowl offers a payout of $750,000 per team, but that will go to the Big East Conference for distribution to its members. Syracuse did receive, however, $1.35 million from the conference for travel and ticket expenditures, $550,000 of which was spent on tickets alone.

Bowl participation is always beneficial to the university for a number of reasons, Morrow said.

"It gives the seniors one more month together and an extra month of practices," he added. "So it's a great send-off. It gives the coaches the opportunity to look at more of the up-and-coming players and the national exposure is great for the team and for the school."

State lawyers contend that the claim area could be worth as little as $31.5 million, based on the condition of the land in 1790, the date of the first treaty. The figure includes $6.5 million in rent.

The state reportedly made an offer to the nation of $110 million and 4,500 acres of land last June. But the offer was rejected by the Cayugas, who opted instead to take the case to court.

U.S. District Court Judge Neal McCurn ruled in 1994 that the Cayugas had a legitimate claim to the New York land and had a right to compensation since the state unlawfully acquired the property. Now, in the second phase of the trial, a jury will decide how much the state owes the Cayuga Nation, but will not be restricted by limits set by appraisers from both sides.

The outcome of the trial could have a significant impact on other land claims currently being made by members of the Iroquois Confederacy. Including the Oneida, Mohawk, Seneca, and Onondagas, as well as the claim to be filed in the near future by the Onondagas. About 93 million acres are included in the Iroquois land claims.

The Onondaga Nation will wait to file its land claim until after the Cayuga claim is resolved, said Joseph Heath, an attorney representing the Onondagas.

The Cayuga land claims raised stiff opposition from homeowners, especially in Seneca and Cayuga counties. Though the settlement will not result in the eviction of any property owners in the land claim area, homeowners are concerned that the Cayuga Nation will use the award money to buy up parcels of land which would become part of their reservation, eventually encircling small property owners, said Mel Russo, Seneca County chairperson of the Upstate Citizens for Equality, a homeowner's association fighting the land claims.

"What the tribes have traditionally done is called checkerboarding," Russo said. "They buy strategic plots of land here and there and force smaller landowners out."

Representatives of the Cayuga Nation could not be reached for comment.

The Cayugas have been adequately compensated for land that was sold with "good intentions" on both sides, Russo said. "They're landless because their ancestors sold their land and they have not used the money to buy land anywhere," Russo said. "The Cayugas should probably be suing their ancestors, not the state of New York and particularly not the landowners." The Cayugas have received some payment for their land, although the exact amount is in dispute. The Cayugas and the U.S. Justice Department have argued that the issue of past payments should not be heard by this jury since any such payments were based on illegal treaties.

McCurn has also ruled that a Toronto historian who was an expert on the Cayuga Nation will not be allowed to testify for the state — a move that prompted sharp criticism from Russo, who said the history of the Cayuga Nation should be taken into consideration when determining the award owed to the group.

The Cayuga Indians fought against the U.S. during the American Revolution and they burned Buffalo to the ground in the war of 1812," Russo said. "This is twice they asserted themselves as enemies of New York State. Are we bringing this up in the trial? No."

In a letter circulated by UCE, Russo contends that the Cayuga Nation was compensated during a 1926 international arbitration between the U.S. and Great Britain on behalf of the Cayugas, a ruling which should invalidate the current land claim. Other legal problems also complicate the Cayugas' claim, he added.

"The Cayugas were 200 years late in filing this claim," Russo said. "This is a precedent setting case and so far it has been built on a frivolous lawsuit." Ultimately, it is likely that whatever decision is reached by the federal court will be appealed to the U.S. Second Circuit and later the Supreme Court. At present, both sides in the dispute seem to favor a jury trial to an out-of-court settlement.

Russo and UCE plan to fight the claim all the way to the high court if necessary, Russo said. "Nobody wants a foreign nation with different rules and regulations in their backyard," he said. "They can put a trailer in a place where it is not zoned and they can go hunting and fishing anytime they want."

We’ve all heard the horror sto-

Sleepsex disorder perplexes, disturbs couples

She slowly turns to her side to see the inviting smile and securely closed eyes of her boyfriend. He becomes playful, reaching out to her from across the bed. Though it’s late in the night and only a few seconds ago he was fast asleep, she goes along with the midnight merriment. But the nocturnal escapade turns sour quickly. He overpowers her and becomes more aggressive than ever before — almost as if he’s possessed.

Surprised, she notices that his eyes are still closed and she can still hear his snoring under his breath.
Frightened, she asks him to stop. But his aggression drowns out her pleas, and she reluctantly concedes. Within thirty seconds, it’s all over, and he falls to his side and returns to dreamland — but was he ever actually awake in the first place?

"Sleepsex," as it’s most commonly referred to, is a sleep disorder that affects an estimated 2.6 million people, sometimes costing relarelationships and sexual confidence.

Sleepsex disorder perplexes, disturbs couples

"I remember getting molested mid-sleep by my boyfriend," wrote one woman in the Archives of Sexual Behavior. "I kept pushing him away because I was dead asleep at 3 a.m.
Eventually he stopped, but he didn’t have sex, just touched me. I made fun of him the next morning, but he didn’t remember."

"It’s confusing for both partners to be involved in such a situation. A study conducted by Dr. Saul Rosenberg, published in the Archives of Sexual Behavior, sheds some light on the issue. Rosenberg sought to distinguish what was the driving factor in the sleepsexer’s loss of control. He questioned who or what is actually in control of the body if the sleepsexers aren’t fully immersed in their dreams.

"It would be easy and tempting to say that sleepwalkers and sleepsexers are acting out behaviors that are suppressed by their conscious minds, but there’s no evidence to support that," said Mahowald, a contributor to the study. But he does concede that the individual may be acting out their dreams.

These fantasies are most often acted upon
known as the non-rapid eye-movement stage, or N-REM. This is the stage in which mental acitivity continues in the nature of thinking rather than dreaming. Motor functions dull and one’s heart is slowed, preparing the body to move into rapid eye-movement sleep or REM. This is the stage where dreams may take place, though they would not be realized because of the deep sedative state the individual is in.

The N-REM is a perfect environment for acting out these dream-like thoughts and offers another perk: Although it's only an optical illusion, a golden-bronze tone can also make a person look between 10 and 15 pounds thinner, Barker said.

Before tanning, clients at Tropical Sunsets must complete a computerized survey that determines how much artificial light their skin can handle. To avoid burning, clients are not allowed to tan longer than their recommended limit — even if it means they pay less money.

The only difference between tanning indoors and outdoors is that there's no control involved. To avoid burning, clients are advised to tan at their own risk, without employee meddling, said owner Louise Prosoni.

From time to time, employees will warn fair-skinned clients about the dangers of baking too long in a tanning bed, but clients may do as they wish.

You're allowed to go in there for 15 minutes,” Prosoni said. “If they want to go for the whole half hour we tell them ‘Don’t complain to us if you burn.’ It’s not our responsibility. Our bad burn was enough for State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry freshman to make her first tanning visit her last.

“I got burned because I’m fair-skinned,” she said, laughing. “I never did it again.”

For most clients, however, when it comes to tanning it’s all about sex appeal, Barker said. That’s why Flo Firpo, a freshman in the School of Management and College of Human Development, started tanning as a high school junior.

"I don’t think we were ready for how quick they were," Villanova guard Shannon Perry said. "Our team is too slow. They cut down everything. They jumped back and forth through the lanes. They outran us on the break.
"They were quicker than we were in every aspect. They just played a much bigger game. It wasn’t a game."

Syracuse limited the 'Cats to just 30 percent shooting during the game. Villanova (9-6, 2-2) hit only 26 percent in the first half on 6-for-23 shooting. The Cardinals were unable to get passes down to the low post. The Syracuse guards pressured the Villanova backcourt as forwards Beth Record and Tara Trammell clogged the lane and cut off passes from the inside passes to Wildcat forwards.

"We went through it for a couple of days," said rookie guard Shannon Perry, who pitched in 15 points and a career-high seven rebounds in the game. "Because we were working on it, we knew that we had to be a lot more of a team effort. So we just played like they play. We went right to it. We just played it tough but we just knew what we were trying to get at.

Record’s game high 28 points was eight points better than the combined effort of the entire Nova frontcourt. Villanova’s leading scorer, Jenessa Sanders, scored only 14 points, averaging 14.6 points per contest but scored just 11 on the night. Seven of Shakeeta’s points came in the second half when Syra- cuse slowed the game down and in hand.

Without much of an inside game, the Orangewomen forced the Wildcats outside. The Wild- cats’ inability to knock down open shots hurt them in the second half.

The Wildcats failed to make their first backdoor cut to the basket until point guard Katie Davis fed Skeeters on the right side until the first minute of the second half. How- ever, Villanova’s night of mis- ery continued as Skeeters missed an easy layup.

Villanova’s slow-down style bucked them in other ways. Trailing just 25-20, the Wildcats’ last shot opportunity of the half as Davis held the ball for a good portion of 20 ticks of the 20-second shot clock.

Villanova wasted two more opportunities in the second half. They turned the ball over on two consecutive possessions due to questionable shot clock management. On both at- tempts, the Orangewomen forced the Wildcats to make poor last second shots before the clock hit zero.

Villanova slowed down with the first possession. "No. 6 Rutgers in Saturday’s 66-65 upset of the Scarlet Knights in Piscataway, N.J. The Orangewomen, however, were just too quick Wednesday night.

"We knew that we couldn’t afford to let the Villanova Head Coach Harry (Perretta) stand on the sideline and dictate the tempo," Freeman said. "I think that’s what happened with Rutgers when they were late to them the other night.

The Orangewomen played without their leading rebounder, Leigh Azis. The junior for- ward is nursing a sprained ten- don in her right foot and is listed as day-to-day. Without Azis in the lineup, reserve centers SU's Preston Shumpert canned a 3-pointer 20 seconds later, but a 3-pointer by Derrick Worrell gave the Panthers a seven-point lead.

Williams maintained his hot hand, hitting a 3-pointer with 20 seconds left in the first half to put Pitt ahead 35-23.

SU's Preston Shumpert led the Panthers with 18 points and 10 rebounds.

Williams leads Syracuse

BY JEFF PASSAN
Asst. Sports Editor

PITTSBURGH — Six minutes into Wednesday’s showdown against Pittsburgh, DeShaun Williams quietly entered the Syracuse lineup. The freshman, hobbled by an ankle injury over the last three contests, stepped onto the hardwood in the midst of a 12-2 Panther run. Assuming his usual offensive position on the outside wing, Williams spotted up and popped a 3-pointer two minutes after coming into the game. He then canned another triple, and the half was over with two more for a total of 14 points. His five 3s and career-high 23 points saved the Orangemen from their first loss of the season in a sloppy 82-72 victory at Fitzgerald Fieldhouse.

And in doing so, Williams continued a trend vital to SU’s 15-0 (5-0 Big East) start — a different player stepping up every night and scoring clutch buckets. “Each night it’s going to be different,” Williams said. “It doesn’t make a difference whether it’s me or anyone else. We’ve got a great bench and a great (starting) five, but tonight I was the one making the shots.”

SU pummels Villanova

Syracuse women’s basketball coach Marianna Freeman decided to try something new during practice this week — working out at the other end of Manley Fieldhouse.

Instead of running their plays at the near end of the court, the Orangewomen shot at the far basket during practice. "We had been shooting there because the other basket has not been kind," Freeman said. "The last few days we have executed our stuff at (the far end). It’s almost like it was foreign to us, and I think that had something to do with it.”

Quick pace brings first league win

After practice on Tuesday afternoon, Jakia Ervin compared Villanova’s offense to Princeton men’s basketball — slow motion and lots of backdoor cuts.

But during Wednesday night’s 66-42 win over Villanova at Manley Fieldhouse, the Orangewomen made the Wildcats look more like a high school junior varsity squad.

The Orangewomen (8-7, 1-3 Big East) employed pressure man-to-man defense and an up-tempo transition game to confuse Villanova and take the Wildcats out of their slow style of offense.

Walsh favors Bush

BY KEVIN TAMPONE

Rep. James Walsh (R-Syracuse) addressed topics ranging from U.S. foreign policy in the Third World nations to his endorsement of a presidential candidate Thursday during a discussion at Drumlin Country Club.

The event is part of the Thursday Morning Roundtable program at the club on 800 Nottingham Road.

While Walsh’s comments during his speech focused mainly on the United States’ role in the Northern Ireland peace process, a question and answer period allowed audience members to probe his views on a much broader range of topics.

“It’s pretty clear that American military forces are being dispersed all over the world,” said Martin Sheehan-berger, 74, of Manlius. “They’re involved in missions that have no part of their original charter.”

While U.S. involvement in unstable areas and in nations experiencing crisis periods is important, the military cannot perform their duty without adequate funding, Walsh responded. The situation of some American troops bordering on poverty, he added.

Sending American troops abroad to keep the peace does little good if they do not have the materials and resources to accomplish their missions, he said.

“Last year’s budget was the first increase in real dollars for the military in 11 years,” Walsh said. “We have some people in the military on food stamps today.”

While 2000 is the first election year where new military spending was considered, Walsh said, “We have to ask ourselves of appropriate representation, but more importantly, bringing in federal money,” said Judy Schmid, Southeast University Agreement Advisory Committee, will receive a share of $290,000 from the City of Syracuse Fund for 2000, probably a chance you’ll get to meet Bradley,” said Schiferle, a senior political science major, to the group members.

City welcomes Census bureau

BY CAROLINE CHEN

A ribbon-cutting ceremony launched the Syracuse branch of the Bureau of the Census Wednesday morning in preparation for the 2000 Census.

The standing-room-only crowd gathered at 2 Clinton Square to listen to remarks made by several community leaders, including Onondaga County executive Nicholas Pirro. Pirro spoke about the value of an accurate census and the responsibility of every citizen to fill out the questionnaire.

“The census is the way we ensure ourselves of appropriate representation, but more importantly, bringing in federal money,” Pirro said, urging the public to participate in the census. “It’s not going to be glamorous, but there’s probably a chance you’ll get to meet Bradley,” said Schiferle.

Clinton advises Arafat

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With John Stoll's bid to blanket the Middle East in turmoil, President Bill Clinton urged Palestinian Authority President Yasir Arafat to refine his priorities for peace talks with Israel, concerning that his vision is important and preparing to complicate negotiations.

Clinton's White House meeting with Arafat came less than a month before the deadline set by Israel and the Palestinians to complete work on a "framework agreement sketching a resolution for all the main points of a comprehensive treaty to be negotiated in detail later.

"In any process like this, there must be intense negotiations and diplomacy," Clinton told Arafat during a brief public session.

"No one can get everything that they want," he added.

Although it might seem evident that negotiations require a "tough and long time," he said, he said, "but you say they are not to be important and preparing to complicate negotiations.

The two women, Marjorie Gonzalez and Raquel Rodriguez, received visas from the U.S. Immigration Service in Havana last week, according to the State Department. They are expected to fly to New York to be with their daughter, a National Council of Churches, which has been active in supporting demands that he be returned to Cuba.

Pope pleads for clemency

LOS ANGELES — Pope John Paul II has appealed to Republican President Ronald Reagan to commute the death sentence of a Texas man convicted of murdering a pregnant woman.

Reagan is scheduled to meet with the pope later in the month.

The pope's intervention, just a few days before the Iowa caucuses, has put the death penalty issue in presidential race.

The sentences have been conducted in Texas during his five years in office, with no other governor in the United States since the Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1972.

Moreover, the pending execution of Glen C. McGinnis, 26, who shot and killed the owner of a dry cleaning shop near Houston nine years ago, also focuses attention on the fact that the United States is one of only five nations in the world that provide the death penalty.

The other four are Iran, Nigeria, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia — some of whose regimes are frequently criticized by the United Nations.

stands overseas. That's sad. If we're going to put these people in harm's way, we need to support them."

Walsh also expressed a commitment to working with the Irish community to resolve the issue of their status as a world power. Walsh said. However, if the U.S. continues to focus on countries to continue to "devalue their money," it will only cause larger problems, he said.

Election 2000
In addition to addressing issues in domestic and foreign affairs, Walsh endorsed Texas Gov. George W. Bush for the 2000 presidential election. During his political career, Bush has demonstrated that he is a capable leader and the best candidate running, Walsh said. "I happen to think that governors make the most decent presidents," he explained. "He has experience as governor of Texas, he was re-elected and he has done a pretty good job down there. It's a big state and a difficult state." Bush can also help expand the Republican Party's voter base with his theme of compassionate conservatism because the Republican Party leadership is often reflected as too conservative for the country, Walsh said. Bush has a broader appeal, he added.

Bush also deserves endorsement because he proved he is a strong candidate in the Syracuse area and throughout New York state, Walsh said. Unlike his rival, Arizona Sen. John McCain, Bush gained enough support to appear on the ballot in all of New York's 31 congressional districts, as opposed to the state's demanding election laws. McCain was only able to gain the necessary number of petitions signatures to appear on the ballot in 25 districts.

"Our laws are awful," Walsh said. "They make it next to impossible for someone to get on the ballot here, but until they are changed, that's the way it is. If he was more organized, he would be on the ballot."

Walsh's Irish connection
TMR takes place every Thursday from September through June, according to Dulaccie Barrett. The program, sponsored by Syracuse University Continuing Education and University College, celebrates its 35th anniversary this year, she said. yesterday's edition of TMR only drew 70 of the group's 200 members.

The weekly TMR speeches, which begin at 6:15 p.m., are open to TMR members, who include community leaders and concerned citizens from the Central New York area. Barrett said. Each Sunday at 4 a.m., 91.3 WCNY-FM broadcasts the week's full TMR program.

The TMR executive board invited Walsh to speak about peace in Northern Ireland because he is an active proponent of the United States' involvement and travels there regularly. Walsh is chairperson of the Friends of Ireland, a congressional group working for peace in the area. He was also present in Northern Ireland for some of the most significant events in the peace process, including the swearing-in of the region's new, independent National Assembly.

"The war is over. The politicians listened. The paramilitaries listened. The world listened," Walsh said. "The fight in a sense still continues, but the real war is over. The families in Protestant and Catholic neighborhoods in Northern Ireland spoke loudly and demanded peace."

Despite the remarkable process that has occurred in the area, the new assembly has a difficult task in forging a lasting end to violence, Walsh said. Both leaders in the troubled region and in the United States are optimistic, however, that the recent progress marks a permanent peace, he added.

The major problems facing Northern Ireland now rest with the leaders of the various political parties and their willingness to learn to work together and compromise for the good of all their people, Walsh explained. Even in the earliest stages of the peace process, however, leaders began to trust each other and engage in productive discussion, he added.

"In order to get where we are, the Republic of Ireland had to drop its constitutional claim to Northern Ireland. Great Britain also had to drop it's claim. That was not easy for either of those countries," Walsh said. "For the first time in its history, a majority of the people living there will decide its fate."

millennium by making sure we're all added?"

Although the bureau officially opened today, preliminary operations began a year ago, Bureau Census Manager Clark Billings said. "The census is conducted once every 10 years and data tabulation takes place from April to June, said John Rogers, assistant manager of recruiting at the bureau. The staff prepared for the 2000 census by verifying addresses and training employees.

Special populations
Students will be counted at school, not at their permanent addresses, said Emilie Sisson, assistant manager of administration, because "college kids are in the area using that area's resources." Questionnaires will be delivered high to students' homes however, permanent residents will receive the forms in March and are asked to complete them by April 1.

Students are traditionally a difficult demographic group to count, said Special Places Operations Supervisor John Spring, Jr., a 1987 Syracuse University graduate. He said he has contacts in the housing office and is working closely with university officials to make sure the count is as accurate as possible.

Spring added that he is hoping to put together a special census assistant at the Schine Student Center to encourage students to fill out questionnaires.

Ethnic and language differences can be found in many areas, said certain groups in past censuses, said Fanny Villanueva de Camar, a representative of the Spanish Action League. Community leaders are determining the best means of filling out questionnaires.

"Getting counted is important because it means federal funding is channeled to the right places," said Ms. Villanueva de Camar, a representative of the refugee community of Syracuse's South Side.

There is also difficulty in accurately counting the Latino community, said Villanueva de Camar.

"The center will provide one-on-one confidential assistance to help overcome language barriers, putnam said.

One of the biggest challenges of the bureau is not just to make sure the public share information, which has resulted in underrepresentation in past censuses, Sisson said. She added that the bureau is sensitive to the needs of special populations and will work as a partner with the community.

As the only female manager at the bureau, Sisson also approaches her work in a manner to ensure they feel comfortable filling out the questionnaires. Although the questionnaire does not allow for total anonymity, individuals cannot be identified because

Seminar with

Lani Guinier

Announcing a "call and response" seminar with this year's MLK Celebration Keynote Speaker, Professor Lani Guinier. Professor Guinier, the first black woman tenured professor at Harvard Law School, was propelled into the limelight as President Clinton's controversial first nominee to head the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department. Cut through the media soundbites and come hear what this thoughtful and energetic scholar really has to say regarding representative democracy. The seminar is free and open to the public:

"I don't understand the selection process," said Jim Elliott, a technician for the Urban League computer center. "We weren't even contacted by UNSAAC."

The center is a conduit of educational opportunities for the inner-city youth, said Elliott. It is a positive place where children, adults and senior citizens can turn, he said.

Recommended fund allocations included $8,000 to East Side Soccer for the improvement of Barry Park, Schmid said. Elliott disagreed with the committee's criteria for grants.

"The people in the Urban Community tend to give their money to athletics," Elliott said. "Our computer centers prepare the mind."

UNSAAC is a committee made up of six volunteers and two elected officials who represent the Community Council. They recommend funding based on SU-related issues in neighborhoods, Schmid said.

"The Urban League application did not address a problem caused by the university," Schmid said. "We didn't recommend the Urban League because their application didn't address the legislation."

Dove II, the second of three Dove computer centers, opened last February and is located in the United Baptist Church on Beech Street. The center has been closed since last May due to technical problems, said Elliott. The other two Dove centers in Syracuse are still open, he added.

Heads of the center were planning to use the city funding to hire a full-time coordinator to run the center and a computer maintenance repairperson. Goals for 2000 also included the opening of at least four more centers, said Elliott.

"We have been collaborating with the Urban League staff and students and professors at SU to get the technical end of the system up and running," Elliott said.

The parties are meeting on Tuesday and hope to have everything working by 2:30 p.m., he said.

"It's a real shame to have that equipment sit there," said Yvonne Tasker-Rotherburg, who funded the Dove II center. "The Urban League requested money so they could get a technician to fix the problems and to reopen the center, she said.

"It's right there in the neighborhood, servicing the neighborhood. I've been trying to reopen the center for a long time," she added. "It's very upsetting to me."
Exhibit questions ancestry, human race

BY NICK SERRANO
Staff Writer

Fresh off a worldwide tour, an exhibit questioning the concept of race and presenting scientific evidence that all humans share a common ancestor, returned Monday to Syracuse University's Schine Student Center.

The exhibit, "All of Us Are Related; Each of Us is Unique," consists of 15 panels of graphics, photos and text, a 27-minute documentary film entitled "Six Billion Races" and a promotional video at the door. The panels and video, on display in room 227 of Schine, present the theory that just because people from different parts of the world have different physical traits, all people are fundamentally the same.

The thing that struck me most was the dramatic and convincing evidence that there is no such thing as race," said Marshall Segall, an SU professor who saw the exhibit in Europe and then translated it into English. "It's an illusion. That's got to strike you as quite a remarkable fact."

The original exhibit, "Tous Parents, Tous Différents," is still on display at the Musée de l'Homme in Paris, Segall said.

After being displayed at SU, the English version traveled to Bellingham, Washington; Cleveland; San Francisco; Winnipeg, Canada; Hong Kong; and now, Syracuse.

"The exhibit is expected to get a good response from students this year because of its success two years ago, said Roland Shelton, event supervisor for student programs.

"It's an important message we need to hear year-round," said Grodans, a television, radio and film major. "It's a great message and certain people are ignorant to race relations and the way we view people who are different from us.

But Ben Gabriel, a senior film major, said he knew most of the information given at the exhibit already. "It's nothing really new," Gabriel said. "I already understood that we were all related, but I definitely think the exhibit is a nice gesture."

The Office of Student Affairs will hold a panel discussion and open forum about the exhibit Feb. 1 in the Schine Underground.

"If you're talking about meaningful lobbying reform, there are three goals that should be accomplished," she said. "There should be tougher disclosure laws, tougher penalties and tougher campaign finance reform."
Did New Year’s Eve live up to your expectations?

Students react to the Y2K hype, media coverage and celebrations.

"What are you doing for New Years?" I've been asked this question a thousand times, but this year it seemed even more important. This was the Y2K, the start of a new millennium. I just knew it didn't really start until next year. So I had to decide: was I going to spend a quiet night in my Y2K prepared shelter with a couple of cases of water and some cans of Spaghetti-Os? Or was I going to party my butt off and go out with a bang. Since I don't have a shelter and I hate Spaghett-Os, I chose the latter.

Matt Kaiser is a senior advertising major.

"I was in Wisconsin and was embarrassed by a bunch of overzealous Bears' fans who were happy because I wasn't a Packer fan. I had no expectations for Y2K, but I had a good time." Matt Entin is a Class of 2001.

"I went to a little get together to watch the ball drop and people got messed up. It was strictly just a ploy by companies to sell stuff at higher prices." Andrew Fitting is an Engineering Class of 2000.

"There was a little trouble in New Zealand, but we were prepared. We expected tragedies, but they didn't happen because we knew about the problem." Maggie Huang is a Class of 2001.

"Companies just want to turn out a profit. Look at how many people bought food and water, and nothing happened." Kendra Hearington is a Class of 2000.

"I was at bed. I got that flu that was going around the country." Neva Austrew is a Dairy Orange Class of 2000.

Armageddon fans missed out this year

We missed out. Sure, the media talked about how the millennium celebration was a complete success, how nothing went wrong, but those nearsighted reporters weren't seeing what has become painfully clear to me. No sooner had I yelled "Happy New Year!" when it hit me like a skydiving missile. I realized that for all of the hype, for all of the articles, countdowns and twenty-four hour extravaganza, one thing was being badly overlooked. With the passing of the new millennium, God threw his sense of drama timing right out the window.

"I fell asleep during the party. People wanted to do something different, but there wasn't anything different to do." Jennifer Petrillo is a Human Development Class of 2003.

"I just stayed in with my family, the same thing I do every year." Latisha Smith is a Social Work Class of 2002.

New York City fails Y2Khaos compliancy

New Year's Eve itself, it was a let down. This craziness builds and builds until the stroke of midnight happens. Everyone toasts their horns and screams "Happy New Year!" you toast with some overpriced alcoholic beverage called champagne and you kiss everyone around you. Then 10 after midnight hits and the party is just like any other. And now that everything is said and done, I just hope to never hear the phrase "Y2K" again.

Much to the dismay of many Y2K concerned elders, I spent my New Year's Eve in New York City. Although I wasn't among the masses penned up for hours waiting to see the ultimate crystal ball fall, I did manage to scan my way past the road blocks and fine NYPD to see the crazy madness they call Times Square. At five to midnight, I slightly inebriated but went up to the roof to await the midnight hour. The countdown began and my usually skeptical side started to wonder; would the fateful Y2K happen?

So the Y2K arrived. My lights were still on, my water is still flowing and my computer works and I have to ask was Y2K all just a bunch of hype? My answer from the clear vision of hindsight is yes. Like quotes compiled by Ashok Selvam
Seton Hall fire raises SU issues

Every Syracuse student has suffered through the head-splitting inconvenience of a fire alarm, and each student reacts differently. Some leave their dorm rooms and head for the staircases without hesitation. Others need a little coaxing and prefer the warmth of their beds and could hardly have been hurt — or killed.

Like the Cornell fire, students from Seton Hall were slow to evacuate their dorms. This was the eighth Seton Hall fire alarm in two months, with the prior disturbances false warnings. A few students thought Wednesday’s alarm was like the rest of them and decided to stay put.

SU students are subject to the same false alarms. Many of us know someone who was caught by a fire drill.

SU’s Office of Residence Life says that resident advisors are issued master keys to dorm rooms so they can unlock a dorm room and be certain no one is sleeping through an alarm. In fact, resident advisors are supposed to check on students and knock at dorm rooms to ensure every resident is accounted for. Unfortunately, RAs are often waiting outside the dorms for the resident and finding them in bed.

As evidenced by last October’s fire at the Brewster/Boland Complex, ORL needs to make sure both students and RAs alike know how to use fire drill procedure. The first fire drill last semester at B/B had students leaving the complex far too slowly, but students weren’t notified of this fact. The next time to “practice” was Oct. 26, the first actual fire.

ORL needs to establish and reinforce a clear procedure and make sure RAs follow it and pass the information down to students.

Salt City discrimination exists on many levels

Though most people refuse to talk about it, there is a serious problem that infects our society today. Salt discrimination based on the amount of body salt content plagues each and every one of us. The worst part of this discrimination is that it is done so inadvertently that the problem has never been raised in public debate. Whether you know it or not, there is a conspiracy to pump millions of gallons of salt into the air each and every year. Everyone you go, people are pumping salt into the air in huge quantities for their own personal benefit. Baseball stadiums, malls, amusement parks, rodeos and historical museums all do it. Have you ever wondered why you get so thirsty at the ballpark?

It may simply be to find out that your beloved university does this as well. Place large chunks of soluble salt into air vents and pump it through each and every classroom, dining hall and dormitory in the school. The effects of this practice are two-pronged. First, the salt tastes, refreshing beverages increase so many beverage stations throughout the school reap enormous profits.

The other effect is much darker. People like myself with High Body Salt Content (HBSC) suffer in devastating ways from salt in the air. A simple beverage does not do the trick. My skin cracks, my lips shrink up and my hair gets frizzy. The salt-pumping tactics are a way to keep people like me off campus.

Further discrimination measures were taken recently at a gathering of the Marxist Teachers against Democracy (MTD) at the chancellor’s house. The highly-talented Syracuse University High Body Salt Content (KBSC) Ensemblé, a group I started, was invited to perform at this function. The university decided that the function should be denied to KBSC because of our high body salt content. This ensemble has been invited to perform at every event at Syracuse University.

In a memo I have obtained through belligerent actions, the chancellor himself tried to accommodate the ensemble. The chancellor asked that the ensemble be given a bus that could provide salt-free air where the members will rest during the dinner. The letter only got worse as he went on to say that “the ensemble will enter the facilities after the dinner through the bathroom window. The ensemble should be kept with the group of others who are also suffering with their group of others who are also suffering with this problem.”

I urge students and others to support the re-opening of the Westcott Dove II Computer Center. The Center, located in the United Baptist Church, 716 Beech St. This center is sponsored by the Urban League, and is quite deceiving. The facility was opened to the public last year with free use of 15 computers, scanners and printers. Fees were made possible with funds from Yvonne Tasker-Rotherberg and the Community Service Account, which got $160,000 to pay for the cost of equipment.

Unfortunately for SU students and other residents, nos USDAAC grant was made to the Westcott Dove II Computer Center, located in the United Baptist Church, 716 Beech St. This center is sponsored by the Urban League.

The Westcott Dove Computer Center opened to the public last year with free use of 15 computers, scanners and printers. The center was made possible with funds from Yvonne Tasker-Rotherberg and the Community Service Account. The center was funded for 12 months and had to meet the guidelines in addressing the needs of the community.

The other groups received $78,000 in funds for concerts, dances, lectures at the Westcott Community Center, the City Teen Center, the St. Paul Street and the soccer and football programs. In addition, the police patrols for Eastwood and Westcott received $46,000.

I have petitioned the Common Council and Mayor Roy Bernardi to allocate $15,000 for staffing of Dove II by shifting funds from the University Neighborhood Preservation Association, which got $160,000 to pay for lawyers’ closing costs for homeowners.

I urge students and others to support the re-opening of the Westcott Dove II Computer Center. Please contact Mayor Bernardi and City Councilmember Gary Kirsch and Michael Atkins to show your support for Dove II.

“The Smell of the Kill” provides an off-beat take on marriage in the 1990s.

BY SAPNA KOLLAL
Asst. Lifestyle Editor

If your marriage was on the skids and your husband/ally accidentally locked himself in a meat freezer, would you rescue him? This seemingly mundane question is the central conflict in “The Smell of the Kill,” the first Syracuse Stage production of the new millennium.

“Kill,” a Michele Lowe production, opens in the kitchen, where three women discuss life and relationships over a few after-dinner drinks while their husbands — who never seem on stage — bond through stogie smoke in the living room. Eventually, the women admit to each other that their marriages are falling apart and they feel trapped. Meanwhile, the men accidentally become locked in a walk-in meat freezer. Once the women upstairs find out, they struggle to decide whether or not they should let their husbands out, or leave them inside the cooler on the deep freeze.

Robert Moss, artistic director of the Syracuse Stage, said the show’s appeal lies in the three women discovering who they are and making important decisions.

“It’s like ‘Thelma and Louise,’ but the women don’t have to die at the end,” he said. “These women don’t die at the end but they can’t do whatever they want, they have to make difficult choices.”

The show also reunites director Michael Donald Edwards and actress Suzanne Grodner, who worked together in “The Sisters Rosensweig” on the Syracuse Stage two seasons ago.

“We named the director about a year ago,” Moss said. “When we told him, he said ‘Suzanne has to be in it.’”

Grodner takes the stage along with Corrina May and Vicki Van Tassel as the passive Debra, playing strong-willed Nicky and flighty May, respectively. Jim True-Frost, Craig MacDonald and Gavin D. Dredit portray husbands Jay, Danny and Marty, the men’s presence is acknowledged only by their voices from off-stage throughout the show.

“It was very difficult to sit still in the wings,” said MacDonald, an SU drama professor, who plays Danny. “I was hungry to take part in the action.”

MacDonald said, however, that this is one of the strongest plays Syracuse Stage has put on in a few years. The consistently sold-out performances support this claim.

Tickets for “The Smell of the Kill” range from $15 to $38. The show runs at 8 p.m. Friday, 4 p.m. and 8:30 p.m. Saturday and 2 p.m. Sunday. Tickets for staged readings are $5, free for subscribers and six-pack buyers. Call the Syracuse Stage Box Office at 443-3275 for information and reservations.

“The Festival is round out by two one-act plays for high school students, held by the two professional playwrights during their visit to Syracuse. Twenty students, who are preparing pieces for the Syracuse Stage’s annual New Playwrights Contest, attended the last workshop, with Lowe; all are scheduled to return for Sunday’s program with Spence, who you need to make first-hand contact with professional playwrights.”

“They were all wide-eyed,” Moss said. “I was really something. They got to make first-hand contact with professional playwrights.”

The Festival also allows new and different ideas to take shape on the stage, MacDonald said.

“Someone’s got to do it,” MacDonald said. “We’ve got to keep bringing new things to the theater. Otherwise, we’ll be watching Neil Simon plays for the rest of our lives. I think it’s very brave of the stage to back a playwright (Lowe) with no established reputation, but it’s how you expand.”
After a long-awaited break, the Cinemajiiacs have returned, rested and better than ever. A lot of things have happened in the world of cinema since we last left you.

The award nominations are coming out of the wazoo. Tom Hanks took a long walk down "The Green Mile" and Jim Carrey made us believe that there is a "Man on the Moon.

Interestingly enough, Paul Thomas Anderson's "Magnolia" targets society's imperfections than ever. A nimilii takes the film that's taking on the film for its way of showing what are seen to be coincidences; it's not only an incredible story and fantasti¢ storytelling, but more than anything else, a mirror in the form of a mosaic-picture, showing society's morals and flaws impeccably.

It certainly doesn't do justice as words on paper.

Rasenfeld and Matt Bray, the Cinemajiiacs have of a group of individuals, and tackles an even more com-

Character color

After Anderson's almost-disclosure, we are introduced to a plethora of seemingly singular characters and life-changing situations. By seemingly singular, we mean not only are they distinct and colorful, but also seem not to have any relationship with each other.

There's Big Earl Partridge, an elderly, bed-ridden man awaiting his death due to cancer, who is not only dealing with his own character's phoniness, but also her difficult relationship with her father.

Frank T.J. Mackey takes elder stage next, on a television, as America's favorite "how-to-pick-up-girls guy.

Jim Kurring, a devout Christian, riddled with the waiting of salvation, whose loneliness and lack of confidence give him an almost child-like innocence, not uncommon of certain adults in this story.

Quizz Kid Donnie Smith, as he's forever unfairly known, 30 years after his initial fame on The Harvey Host, fights for not only his job, but his dignity and some source of compassion that he was robed of as a child.

Essentially experiencing Donnie's life as a rerun, Stanley Spencer, the '90s version of this financially troubled child, finds a way to use a hand-crank camera to turn his life around.

And finally, for characters at least, there's Claudia, the estranged and tormented daughter of Jimmy and Rose Gator, who is not only dealing with her cocaine addiction, but also her difficult relationship with her father.

Initially playing up his own character's phoniness, Cruise somehow finds something real to bring out as he is forced to deal with his own rejection of his identity. And he delivers a line that's more powerful, but not as G-rated as "Show me the money.

Not discounting their performances, but repeating their brilliant work in "Boogie Nights," although taking drastically different roles, are Philip Seymour Hoffman, Julianne Moore, William H. Macy, John C. Reilly, Philip Baker Hall, Melora Walters and Luis Guzman.

Tom Cruise, who plays Mackey, and was referred to by Anderson as a director's dream, shows such versatility and range of emotions never before seen, unless you count "Legend" but can come off as a put-down. Anderson, who not only directed, but also had full control from New Line Cinema over this project, wrote some of the most poetic pieces of dialogue ever heard, including an Aimee Mann song, which are affectionately copied.

February 2-4, February 6-8 and March 5-7.

The Syracuse women's team will ride a one-game winning streak into its next match up on Tuesday at 7 p.m. in the Carrier Dome.

Both teams enter the game ranked in the Top 10, with Syracuse at No. 6 and UConn at No. 8. Syracuse remains the only undefeated team in Division I at 15-0.

The extra break gives the SU men more time to prepare for their showdown with Connecticut on Monday at 7 p.m. in the Carrier Dome.

Both teams enter the game ranked in the Top 10, with Syracuse at No. 6 and UConn at No. 8. Syracuse remains the only undefeated team in Division I at 15-0.

The extra break gives the Orange women a chance to heal their wounds, which include a foot tendon injury to starting center Leigh Aziz. The junior center averages 10.4 points and 8.1 rebounds per game.

Aziz watched from the sidelines during SU's 66-62 win over Villanova on Wednesday.

Women's head coach Marianna Freeman said that Aziz is out indefinitely.

"We know for sure that the two tendons over the top of her toes are kind of sprained," Freeman said. "The doctor's not really sure if it may be a little hairline fracture in there. So we're going to keep her off it for a couple of days just to see if she can go on it. Right now, she's out for the time being."

Both teams do not relish the extra time off, however, as the tragedy at Seton Hall looms in players' and coaches' minds.

"We feel for them," Freeman said after the Villanova victory as Orange women Lorna McPhee and Shannon Perry nodded in agreement. "That's a big tragedy. Our hearts go out to them."

"We feel for them," Freeman said after the Villanova victory as Orange women Lorna McPhee and Shannon Perry nodded in agreement. "That's a big tragedy. Our hearts go out to them."

The extra break gives the SU men more time to prepare for their showdown with Connecticut on Monday at 7 p.m. in the Carrier Dome.

Both teams enter the game ranked in the Top 10, with Syracuse at No. 6 and UConn at No. 8. Syracuse remains the only undefeated team in Division I at 15-0.

On the day of the New Hampshire primary the group hopes to hold an event to show support for Bradley and watch the primary’s televised results, Schiferle said. This event also serves as an opportunity to promote the group and Bill Bradley, said Lipson, a junior political science and public policy major. “The more exposure we can get the better,” he said.

The group is looking to hold the event at an off-campus bar or other social facility, instead of on-campus, in an effort to save money and make it a more friendly environment. “It’s a little more recreational, a little more attractive to people,” Lipson said.

Members of the group agree to start networking among their friends and contacting other campus groups.

The group hopes to work with campus groups Pride University Area and the Student African-American Society. They also hope to make presentations to political science, women’s studies and public affairs classes regarding Bradley and their group.

They have already contacted Syracuse University Men’s Basketball Coach Jim Boeheim about the possibility of having a basketball-themed event on campus in support of Bradley, group member Kevin Selhi said.

Boeheim, a member of Bradley’s Central New York campaign committee, is eager to support his friend Bradley, Selhi said.

Since the group is not recognized on campus, the College Democrats are sponsoring a table for the Bradley group so they can distribute literature, attract students to the Bradley group and get and for the trip to New Hampshire, register voters and be an informational source about Bradley, Selhi said.

The group hopes to have the table in the Schine Student Center next Monday through Wednesday.

Although the College Democrats are sponsoring the table, they have not endorsed Bradley, said Chrisy Hinshel, president of the College Democrats. Since the group is split between supporting Bradley or Democratic opponent Vice President Al Gore, they are for both.

“It’s one of the many ways for students to get involved in civic and political life. In an ideal world, you’d have students organized to support all of the candidates,”

political science department chairperson using their effect on supporting First Lady Hillary Clinton’s New York senatorial campaign and will later support the Democratic presidential nomination. “I think it’s great,” Hinshel said of the Bradley campaign.

“I think it’s the type of political involvement that this apathetic campus needs.”

The Central New York Committee to Elect Bill Bradley President is equally as enthusiastic, said James Snyder, the group’s spokesperson.

“They’re extremely an excellent group,” he said. “We support them in every way.”

Both the CNY and the SU Bradley groups would like to bring him back to the Syracuse area. When Bradley visited a Syracuse Boys and Girls Club in October he said there was a chance he would return. The CNY group is hopeful that they can host a large-scale Bradley event.

“There’s a good chance there is going to be a return trip to Syracuse before the New York primary,” Snyder said.

Krissi Anderson, political science department chairperson, also believes the fact the group exists is positive.

“The beauty of one of the many ways for students to get involved in civic and political life,” she said.

In an ideal world, you’d have students organized to support all of the candidates.”

Besides Bradley, Republican candidate Steve Forbes is the only other presidential contender with a campus group, the Syracuse University Campaign of Young for Forbes.

Much like the Bradley group, the Forbes group is voting to solicit votes for Forbes and holding an off-campus gathering in support of Forbes on the night of the New Hampshire primary, said Chris Ryan, the coordinator of the group.

The fact there are only two groups is surprising, said Chris Fento, chairperson of the College Republicans.

“I have a feeling that there are the only two campaigns that are reaching out to young people,” he said.

For his part, political science and history major

Fire postpones games

BY GREG BISHOP
Staff Writer

College athletics are a big business. Budgets help create classrooms and athletes are placed on a pedestal as people's hopes and dreams rise and fall with each win and loss. It can be hard to understand the tragedy to help put big-time college athletics in perspective.

One such tragedy occurred when a fire broke out at 4:30 a.m. Wednesday in a dormitory at Seton Hall University in South Orange, N.J., killing three and injuring 62. On Thursday, five of whom remained in critical condition.

Members of Seton Hall's senior administration cited the tragedy when they canceled athletics for the weekend, including men's and women's basketball games against Syracuse scheduled for Saturday.

"In light of the tragedy on campus and the potential psychological impact it has had on everyone in the Seton Hall community, we have determined that our athletic teams will not compete on the weekend," said Jeff Fogelson, director of athletics. "We appreciate the understanding and support of our Big East conference partners as we have removed the disruptions to their campuses."

The Syracuse men's game was scheduled for Saturday at 12 p.m. in the Carrier Dome, while the women's game was scheduled for Saturday at 2 p.m. at the women's gym within the Carrier Dome.

After the fire, there was a possibility that the Seton Hall women would travel to take on the Orangewomen in Manley Field House on Saturday at 7 p.m. Both, however, have been postponed indefinitely and rescheduled later this season. Fans who had tickets for the men's game will be permitted to use those tickets when the new game date is set.

Syracuse head coach Jim Boeheim expressed concern for the Seton Hall program and promised Syracuse would do everything in its power to cooperate. The tragedy was simply more important than the Orange's 15-game winning streak, he said.

"It goes beyond that," Boeheim said. "It's a tragic situation down there. We're going to do whatever Seton Hall wants to do, and down the line, we'll reschedule the game."

Marie Wozniak, sports information director for Seton Hall, said she believes no athletes were injured in the fire, though she could not comment, however, as to whether any athletes reside in the hotels.

SU's administration also supports Seton Hall's decision to postpone this weekend's games.

The thoughts of the Syracuse University community are with those in the Seton Hall community affected by this unfortunate incident," Syracuse Director of Athletics Jake Crouthamel said. "We will do whatever is necessary to support the healing process."

Both the Syracuse men's and women's basketball teams have three three-day breaks remaining in the month-long winter break.

Back from Florida, SU hosts Mountaineers

BY JASON REMILLAR
Staff Writer

As members of the Syracuse swim teams look back at their Florida vacation and see snow blanketing the landscape, they probably wish they were still in Florida, where they trained over winter break.

The Orange, however, must put the memory of their 10-plus days of sun, sand and hard work behind them as they host West Virginia at Webster Pool on Saturday. The Orangemen, who were 11-6 overall last season, continued to rack up their points in the longer distances.

"This is the time of year to get excited," Walker said. "Your training yardage begins to come down. This is a fun and interesting time of the year as you move from the heavy training to championship preparation."

The Mountaineers will provide a decent conference test for the Orangemen, especially on the women's side, Walker said. First-year head coach Eric MeHoan covers the team that excels in the freestyle events and butterfly events, whereas the Orangewomen boast a wealth of individual talent.

"The women are in an even-up situation," Walker said. "If each team wins its share, then it all comes down to who wins the relay." Walker said the SU men have a decided advantage over the Mountaineers. Four Orangemen — sophomore Dajhe Filipe, senior Brett Bergeimann and juniors Johnk Yu and Haa Mahkab — have posted times in the Top 25 nationally this season.

"It is the team's depth Walker cites as the factor that should lead the Orangemen to victory. "We've got a lot of veterans," Walker said. "They know the ropes and go forth. Frankly, for the men's meet, I would rate us as the favorites." SU has competed successfully this season, finishing second at the ACC Championships in Binghamton. "If we just have to go out there and race," Walker said. "It's a competition we have to win. People compete with each other in practice, so we try to use that as competition." The Orangemen are in fine shape. For most Northern college swim teams, not just Syracuse. That includes the Mountaineers. Walker said.

Because of the coaching change in Morgantown, Walker said it will be hard to judge just where WVU is at this time. This uncertainty might help create an exciting meet, which could draw a larger crowd now that the SU/Seton Hall men's basketball clash scheduled for that same time at the Carrier Dome has been postponed.

"West Virginia has definitely been getting better over the years," senior Eric Lihb said. "I think it should be a close meet."

As the Syracuse wrestling team prepares to grapple with its second-half schedule, it must first have a roll call to see who is available.

Sophomore C.J. MacNaught is out for the season with a second hernia surgery is enforced during the week. He will be ready to wrestle following next month's football championship.

Heavyweight Graham Manley, the SU football team's third-string tight end, never saw the wrestling mat after injuring his knee during the NCAA bowl game.

He failed to make the trip up to Nashville, Tenn., for the Music City Bowl victory. He, too, should be ready to wrestle following next month's football championship.

Miller confirmed.

Because of family circumstances, sophomore Cesar Escober did not return from San Francisco along with the month-long winter break. His return remains uncertain, Miller said.

The Orange men continue to fight the injury bug, as junior Ike Wannheim went down with a tweaked knee during Wednesday's practice. He is out for this weekend's New York State prep school Championships in Binghamton.

Because of the NCAA's scheduled Senate, SU lost its lone mid-year break dual meet at Bucknell by a score of 35-9. In two team tournaments the Orangemen struggled, as they lost points because of injury-induced forfeits.

"We're just in a situation that when you give up points, you're tough to come back," Miller said. "When you have to perfect to not be easy in these tournaments."

Inserted into the depleted lineup is a host of green freshmen and sophomores. Replacing Wannheim at 185 pounds is sophomore John Soden. He finished 1999 with a 4-7 record.

Joining Soden in the starting lineup is classmate Mike Noonan and a host of frosh-freshman newcomers.

Law professor addresses race, affirmative action

BY EMILY KULKUS
Staff Writer

Amid hundreds of candlelit tables Sunday night in a dimmed Carrier Dome, Lani Guinier urged members of the Syracuse University community to heed the lesson of the canary when following the words of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

As the keynote speaker for SU’s Martin Luther King Celebration Dinner, the Harvard University law professor spoke to a sold-out crowd of more than 2,300 people. She addressed affirmative action and the use of standardized testing in higher education as examples of inequality in the United States.

Guinier explained how schools would use canaries because of their weak respiratory systems to test for toxic fumes in caves — in the same way blacks have been symbolically treated in society, she said.

“We, in this country, have tried to outfit the canary,” she said. “Rather than fixing the need to fix the atmosphere.”

Inequalities in higher education, similar to the civil rights inequalities King fought to abolish, will not change if colleges and universities continue to use standardized tests.

Students discuss nomination

BY SAPNA KOLLALI
Staff Writer

Lani Guinier dismissed her 1993 nomination for the U.S. Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights Sunday as being her worst experience.

Instead, her worst experience came when she published a study about gender discrimination at the University of Pennsylvania Law School, which “soiled the nest” and inadvertently created tension among her fellow professors, she said to about 75 Syracuse University students in Maxwell Auditorium.

“When it came out, it was worse than in 1993,” Guinier said. “My colleagues felt that I had betrayed them. But I have no regrets about doing the study. Women in law school still tell me they are grateful for the study.”

President Bill Clinton, a Yale Law School classmate of Guinier, withdrew Guinier’s nomination in 1993 for the civil rights position because of growing opposition from conservatives who perceived some of her views as radical.

Guinier spoke during a question and answer seminar that would prelude her keynote address at the 10th annual Martin Luther King Jr. Celebration Dinner Sunday.

Man destroys coffee shop door

BY DAVE CURTIS

Two Syracuse men were arrested early Saturday morning for criminal mischief after refusing to leave No Borders No Barriers, 171 Marshall St., after closing hours, according to a police report.

Kendale Wilson, 23, threw a glass bottle and a light bulb at the coffee shop’s street-level entrance, the report said. The objects shattered the glass door, said Joseph Driscoll, a shop employee. Wilson was accompanied by Jason Hassett, 22, added the report.

Driscol said that two men came into the shop during a band performance. The two men asked to play the band’s instruments, he added.

“They thought they were drunk, so we closed the band,” said the report.

Thirty minutes later, Driscoll politely asked the two men to leave, the report said. Driscoll said he struggled to push the men out the front door.

Driscol called the police after Wilson took a beer bottle and Common Council to consider Mayor Bernardi’s adult-zone proposal

BY MAGGIE MCKENNA
Staff Writer

The Syracuse Planning Commission recommended Friday that the Common Council vote against Syracuse Mayor Roy A. Bernardi’s proposal to relocate local strip clubs, adult video stores and other sex-related businesses. The recommendation follows Tuesday’s rejection of the plan by the commission.

The proposal, which was submitted to the commission in late November by The Office of the Mayor, gave local adult entertainment businesses one year to relocate into a district near East Erie Boulevard and the Chittenango Lake Shore near Geddes. Local artists and for-profit art organizations protested the proposal in fear that the proposal would include in its definition of a sex-related business.

The commission rejected the legislation because it would lead to an adverse concentration of the businesses in one area, said Chuck Ladd, a zoning administrator for the city of Syracuse.

“Whatever you get from the elimination of the businesses from one place to another, you just transfer the problem someplace else,” Ladd said. ‘It doesn’t solve anything.’

The Council meets tonight but will not vote on the proposal because it was not submitted in time for the Jan. 14 agenda deadline. But it may be voted on at the Council’s Feb. 7 meeting, City Clerk John Copanas said.

The proposal would serve as an amendment to the 1966 law which stated that sexually-related businesses must be at least 1,000 feet from a residence, school, park or place of religious worship. But the Weizman refuses leave

JERUSALEM — Defying much of Israel's political elite and ignoring all the mainstream media, President Ezer Weizman Sunday refused to resign or take a leave of absence as a crisis over his relationship with a French textile tycoon who reportedly gave him hundreds of thousands of dollars starting in the late 1980s.

Weizman read his statement at his official residence here. No journalists were present, but the camera cut away to a continuing statement and to失利 negative commentary directed at him from across the political spectrum.

Virtually every newspaper in the country has called for Weizman to resign or take a leave of absence for the dime job in response, the president apparently decided to appeal directly to the public, with whom his cronyish persona and record as a selfaken坏了 always have struck a sympathetic chord.

Looking drawn but determined, Weizman said he would not take a leave of absence, as Justice Minister Yossi Beilin urged him to do last week. He said he is ready to submit to a criminal investigation and then challenge any finding. He also indicated that he may run in the 2001 elections and consider a future term in the Knesset, Israel's parliament.

Weizman's standing among Israel’s political elite and the mainstream media, who have shed light on the affair since it broke open last week, has been severely damaged. "I am the leader of a free democracy," Weizman told his staff. "I have the right to defend my name and my reputation in court."

Weizman said his refusal to resign or take a leave of absence "is not a sign of cowardice, but a sign of determination and persistence in the fight for truth and justice." He said he would continue to work for the country "as long as I can.""
University advertises new minority scholarship

BY KARIN PATTENGILL
Contributing Writer

The Gates Millennium Scholars, a program funded this year by a grant of one billion dollars from the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, will provide scholarships for minority students nationwide over the next twenty years.

The program was established by Microsoft chairman Bill Gates and his wife to provide financial aid to minority students wishing to pursue a higher education. "America must continue to address the challenge of making college education possible for deserving minority students," according to the application. "With high school completion rates steadily rising, our nation must promote and improve access to higher education for these students."

An applicant must be of black, American Indian/Alaskan Native, Asian Pacific American or Hispanic descent, said Anne Hamill, the associate director of scholarship programs for Syracuse University. An applicant must also be a permanent resident of the United States, she added. Hamill said she will be available to assist students with their applications.

In addition, the applicant must have a cumulative grade point average of 3.3 on a 4.0 scale and be currently enrolled full-time in an accredited college or university for the academic year of 2000-2001, Hamill said. "Producing outstanding graduates will help sustain and advance our nation as a global, competitive democracy in the new millennium," the application said.

High school seniors who have applied or have been accepted at an accredited college or university can still apply, Hamill said. Students enrolled in a graduate program whose mathematics, science, engineering, education or library science are also applicable, she added.

The applicant must have significant financial need and demonstrate leadership ability in the community or in other extracurricular activities, she added. "There is no minimum or maximum amount of money given to students will be based on their financial situation, and will be designed to meet their needs."

Applicants must submit a nomination from a dean or professor, a personal recommendation and a personal statement to the Scholarship Programs Office in Lyman Hall by March 3. The program, in its inaugural year, is still operating on a "pilot basis," Hamill said. After the end of its first year, the program will be subject to changes following a thorough review, she added.

The scholarship is a great opportunity for any eligible student who wishes to apply and can play an important role in the success of a student, Hamill said. "It is a unique, one-time opportunity for students enrolled at SU," Hamill said. "There is a potential to fund a student's entire higher education career."

day night in the Carrier Dome.

"I liked how it was a conversation because it really gave the students a chance to ask her questions and really understand her," said Tamara Kramer, a one-year Hillel fellow. "She clar-ified a lot of issues I thought of when reading her book. It was inspiring."

Many attendees read
Guinier's book "Lift Every Voice: Turning a Civil Rights Setback into a New Vision of Social Justice," a re-telling of her 33-day nomination for the U.S. Justice Department.

"She was very good, very informative," said Nicole Young, a graduate public administration student. "She addressed a lot of racial concerns and other issues for law students."

But Guinier, the first tenured female professor at Harvard Law School, faced tough questions about her nomination and her political views.

She told a story about the time she spent in Phillips County, a highly segregated area of Arkansas where no black individual has ever held a seat in local government, although blacks comprise 43 percent of the population.

"It was a textbook perfect case — they violated the Voting Rights Act, the minority was locked out," Guinier said. "But we lost. The judge said I was challenging democracy. The next thing he knew, I would be challenging the need for elections."

Guinier said she simply wanted to make elections fairer for minorities, regardless of race, religion or creed.

Former U.S. Sen. Alan Simpson (R-Wyoming) once asked Guinier what would happen if the white minority in South Africa read her ideas of proportional representation.
Guinier was shocked, she said.

"It's not about shutting anyone out," she said. "He thought I would go out to get revenge and to put one race into power. It's about including the minorities in the decision-making process to legitimize the majority's power."

Guinier said being called anti-democratic was very painful and upsetting, but she has moved beyond that phase of her life, as her book title suggests. •

"I don't think a lot about that experience anymore," she said. "For 33 days, I agonized even if I had gotten the nomination. I would have still been ready committed to what Lani Guinier spoke about, be even more committed."

While many attendees agreed that Guinier is a wonderful speaker, there was some dissent as to how well the seminar was received by the SU community.

"I think it's an embaracement that only a fraction of the Maxwell School was here," said
Elliot Ratzman, a graduate religion and politics student at Princeton University. "If Lani Guinier was speaking at Prince-town, our entire public administration school would be there, squeezing in the doors. She is a

The tests are intended to assess the projected success of the student, but instead do the opposite by judging what the student has already learned, which is often based on economic factors, she said.

"I am talking about the kind of test you give in kindergarten that tracks some kids to college and other kids to prison," Guinier said. "These tests judge what your parents had to give you, not what you have to give them. The tests judge what the student has already learned, which is often based on economic factors, not what the student is capable of learning in college.

"The purpose of higher education should be to select aid the students with the best potential to succeed. In a society where there are not enough opportunities for people to learn, "the problem is when the student has already learned what the student is capable of learning in college," Guinier said.

Guinier spoke of a successful policy signed into law by Texas Gov. Bill Clinton. The policy made it illegal for employers to require a college degree for a job that does not require one. "The problem is when the student has already learned what the student is capable of learning in college," Guinier said.

As an example of students succeeding against the odds, Guinier noted that the recently appointed black director of pediatrie neurosurgery at John Hopkins University in Baltimore, Dr. Benjamin Carson, was told by his college advisor he was not likely to make it into medical school. He is the exception, Guinier said, noting that there is one black man in a California state university for every five men in a prison in the state.

"We are willing to tolerate a society where there are not enough opportunities for people to learn," Guinier said. "There are too many opportunities to go to prison. We can not reverse a society where half is in prison and the other half is supporting those in prison.

"We can not waste so many lives," Guinier said.

"The problem is when the student has already learned what the student is capable of learning in college," Guinier said.

A 1974 graduate of Yale Law School and classmate of President Bill Clinton, Guinier was active with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People before going on to teach at the University of Pennsylvania Law School and then at Harvard.

Prior to her speech, Guinier led an open discussion with SU students about her most recent book, "Lift Every Voice: Turning a Civil Rights Seabed Into a New Vision of Social Justice," which addresses the withdrawal of her 1993 nomination that has yet to be followed by a confirmation hearing.

The committee's selection of Guinier was successful because she was able to voice her opinions on several issues pertinent to university life, co-committee chairperson Sylvia Martinez-Dalbosa said.

"It creates a needed dialogue on issues of race and ethnicity," Shaw said.

Her concern, however, about standardized tests do not directly relate to the SU admissions process, he said. Schools like Harvard and Stanford University, that only base their admission on the tests, are what she is concerned about.

"The good thing about her nomination process is that it has given her a process to talk about some important issues," said Martinez-Dalbosa, SU's director of community relations.

"She addressed issues about the majority and the minority — not just racial issues — but about those who hold power and those who don't," Guinier said.

"Rather than dominate the decision making," Guinier said.

SU: seize the day, the census way

Syracuse University students, listen up—this won’t be your chance for another 10 years.

The city of Syracuse’s Bureau of the U.S. Census opened Jan. 21, in preparation for the survey’s arrival in mailboxes in late March.

Census 2000 results will help determine everything including educational and other federal funding. But no matter how hard Census workers work to ensure accuracy, results are still skewed. Some critics say that in Census 1990, New York state’s population was underestimated, which cost the state federal funds and representation in the House of Representatives.

This does not bode well for college students. With skewed results, politicians will have the ammunition to cut the programs that we care about.

The 1990s were not the 1960s. College apathy is at an all-time high and the future seems dim, but there is a simple solution to our plight. Take a few minutes to fill out the form yourself. Don’t depend on your parents to fill out their forms, because their answers won’t take your thoughts into account. Census takers will be stationed at residence halls, and off-campus students will receive the survey in their mailboxes. SU is even sponsoring several activities to encourage students to participate.

The form is also completely confidential, leaving no reason for students to fear this opportunity.

Politicians ignore college kids. The national media laughs at us, saying we’re lazy and self-absorbed. Census 2000 affords us the opportunity to be heard. We won’t see the results immediately, but after 10 years, we will see how accurate our Census was.
We’re a textbook example of why the Internet is so handy.

We realize we don’t have to waste your time explaining the virtues of the Internet. Let’s just say that at VarsityBooks.com we’ve made the most of it. Not only can you save up to 40% on textbooks, but you’ll also receive them in just one to three business days. All on a Web site that’s completely reliable and secure. What more do you need to know?

definition of what constitutes a sexually-related business was not included in the planning commission. Ladd said.

The proposal includes all for-profit organizations that use models who expose their breasts, genitals, buttocks or anus.

"In the 1980s when the city adopted regulations and it did it outside of the zoning ordinance in the alternative that if you didn’t like the 1,000-foot law, there could be fixed boundaries," he said.

Under the mayor’s proposal, Barnes and Noble Bookstores and other mainstream businesses could be penalized for selling material within the scope of the new rule, he said.

"If you’re going to retain that clause with bookstores and video stores," Ladd said, "you should make it clear what you will need to be affected.

The city may be able to keep the wording, however, if it can make a distinction between adult entertainment businesses and mainstream businesses that sell adult materials, Ladd said.

In Friday’s recommendation, the commission also unanimously rejected provisions in the proposal that restricted an artist’s right to sketch nude models, largely in response to a Nov. 29 community meeting inside City Hall that attracted more than 300 residents, he said.

During the meeting, Syracuse resident stripes tape across their chests to warn local artists of the wording in the proposal that could restrict the right to sketch nude models. Rick Guy, corporate counsel for the mayor, authored the proposal and called the commission’s rejection a “disappointment” and added that he does not expec it to pass through the Council.

"If there was that much furor over the drawings, we weren’t going to be high enough to include them," Ladd said. "It just complicates matters. The protest brought the arguments to light. It wasn’t a political thing."

The commission also eliminated a clause in the proposal that categorized violations as either Class A misdemeanors, Ladd said. Violations of zoning laws, however, are not criminal offenses, he explained.

"That was just a technical mistake," Ladd said.

If the Council does end under intense pressure to address the proposal, Ladd said the issue could be decided as late as October.

“They haven’t had a chance to really discuss what they’re going to do,” he said. “The Council may have to have a few meetings to deliberate.”

Diane Darwish, a Syracuse University second-year law student, had $50 stolen Friday night while playing pool at Planet 505, 505 Westcott St., according to a police report.

Darwish said she placed her date planner containing credit cards and identification and $50, on a bench with her coat next to the pool table.

She said she remembers watching her belongings while playing against a man, who she did not know. A second man was watching the game, she added.

Darwish also told detectives that when she noticed her planner missing, Darwish asked Abate to check her the missing planner.

Darwish, 25, pushed the woman from a car early Saturday morning from their house on the 500 block of Walnut Avenue, according to a police report.

The sisters declined to comment on the incident.

Syracuse resident Phillip Abate, 25, pushed the woman from a 1999 Chevrolet Blazer, said the report. Police later stopped Abate on Euclid Avenue after being spotted near Waverly Avenue, the report said.

Abate appeared intoxicated and admitted he had been drinking, the report said. After field sobriety tests, police arrested Abate for driving while intoxicated, reckless endangerment and harassment, the report added.

Police interviewed the victim at Crouse Hospital, 735 Irving Ave., before she was taken to a hospital for a laceration to her lip, the report said.

The victim admitted that she had also been drinking prior to the incident, the report said.

The case was closed with Abate’s arrest.

Hot to trot
The February magazines seem to be generating an awful lot of heat. With less than a month until Valentine's Day, Movieline, Essence and Esquire, among others, are taking big-time notice of the holiday with themes of love, desire, and in the case of Movieline's annual "More Sex Than Usual" issue, raw lust. But Essence magazine details the opposite of sex with a story on a woman who has forsaken bedroom activities since March 8, 1996. Most people, the magazine says, are holding out for sex "within an intimate, loving and compatible relationship. In other words, good sex."

Book bust
John Grisham is back on the shelves, this time with his eleventh legal thriller, "The Brethren." A first printing of the Doubleday book yielded 2.8 million copies.

This time, though, Grisham's latest hardcover will share attention with another new work—"A Painted House," a semiautobiographical story about a boy growing up in Arkansas, which he is writing as a serial novel for the Oxford American, a southern literary magazine based in Oxford, Miss. The first of six installments appears in the January/February issue of the bimonthly.

Syracuse gears up for Census 2000.

BY HOLLY AUER
Lifestyle Editor

In an age of high-speed Internet connections and cable modems, perhaps the most important communications tool that will affect the United States for the next ten years is an old-fashioned No. 2 pencil.

When Census 2000 forms hit mailboxes nationwide in late March, a series of handwritten checkmarks and fill-in responses bubbles will produce the statistical information used to determine everything from congressional allotments to highway funding.

"This is very much what we call a 'stubby pencil exercise,'" said Clark Billings, manager of the Bureau of the U.S. Census in Syracuse. "It's a practical thing—this is how America knows what America needs."

Like the estimated 275 million people nationwide, all Syracuse University students will be asked to complete the census form on April 1, 2000. Forms will be distributed in residence halls and to off-campus residents throughout the last week in March, and a drop-off location will be located in each dorm for the completed forms.

Even students who are still financially dependent on their parents must fill out census forms, since they are considered Syracuse residents and census rules mandate that people must be counted where they live. College students are not included on their parents forms at home, no matter where they reside. For those students who live on campus, census takers will be sent to residence halls after April 1, to round up the stray forms.

"As a citizen, filling out the census is a civic responsibility," said Sylvia Martinez-DeLisa, SU's director of community relations and liaison between the university and the Syracuse census office. "I hope students will take that to heart."

While SU students may not see any direct benefits of census results in the immediate future, Billings said the information gathered from the university and surrounding areas will be helpful in adding funds to the city coffers and determining what kinds of new businesses the Central New York region needs.

Census 2000 is especially important for New Yorkers, said Kristi Andersen, chairperson of SU's political science department. During the 1990 count, she said, New York state received $1.7 billion in federal funding on the strength of the state's population. For the 2000 census, she's predicting a 21 percent increase in the state's population, which means a $3.5 billion increase in federal funds.

"And it's a patriotic thing—this is what America knows what America needs," said Billings.

"Magnolia" Music From the Motion Picture

In "Magnolia," Paul Thomas Anderson's brilliant epic of human despair and loneliness, music plays an instrumental role in the overall flow of the film. The music is so essential to the experience of the movie that some have described it as a cinematic opera. Needless to say, "Magnolia" doesn't work without an outstanding soundtrack to accompany it.

And, for the most part, the musical counterpart of the film works quite well. It does so mostly on the strength of Aimee Mann's nine original compositions. Former member of the group Til Tuesday and struggling solo artist ever since, Mann got the break of a lifetime—having Paul Thomas Anderson as one of her few fans.

Anderson reportedly wrote "Magnolia" as a showcase for Mann's music, or at least drew a great deal of inspiration from it. The overall tone of the film and Mann's music is strikingly similar—sombre, lonely, yet also filled with ironic beauty. Mann herself could be a character in the film, her bruised, wispv voice echoing many of the characters' doubts and desires.

The album begins with Mann's excellent cover of the Three Dog Night classic, "One." The song, as the film's music so often does, class us in to the characters' inner pathes without the assistance of dialogue. Reflecting the song's "One is the Loneliest Number" etc., the characters that Anderson has created are all achingly lonely but have love to give.

The next song, "Momentum," explains how all the characters in the film have, up to this point, wasted their lives and their love by

JONATHAN CHAYAT MEMORIAL AWARD

Jonathan Chayat graduated cum laude from Syracuse University in 1976. He was killed in a bicycle accident that July, just before he was to begin graduate studies in English at SU. His parents established an award to be given to the junior or senior SU student most closely embodying the intellectual and moral qualities of Jonathan Chayat.

In addition to his academic prowess, Chayat was active in the peer advising and fresman orientation programs, played saxophone in area jazz groups, sculpted in metal, and worked as a photographer and carpenter.

He was concerned about the ethical and aesthetic dimensions of life, and lived with integrity and self-knowledge. He was unswerving in his contributions to the SU community.

Students may be nominated for the Jonathan Chayat Memorial Award, which will be $500 this year, by other students, by faculty or staff members, or they may apply themselves. A letter describing the student’s character, ideals, achievements and contributions accompanied by the candidates resume should be sent to the Jonathan Chayat Memorial Selection Committee, 329 Hall of Languages, by Friday 4, 2000.

Calhoun said. “Living in Connecticut, I didn’t realize that. We were 12-3 going into Georgetown, and I thought we were 3-12 because all I kept reading was ‘What’s wrong with the Huskies?’

The three losses suffered this season already surpass the Huskies’ total of two from last season. One of those was a 59-42 loss to Syracuse at the Hartford Civic Center on Feb. 1. UConn played that game without star forward Richard Hamilton and center Jake Voskuhl. Hamilton is now collecting paychecks in the NBA, but Voskuhl will match up with SU big man Etan Thomas for control of the paint.

A look at the numbers says that Thomas should win the inside battle, as he averages 14.2 points and 8.5 rebounds to Voskuhl’s 8.6 and 6.3.

SU’s shot blocker extraordinary has struggled in recent games, however, mostly because of foul trouble, while Voskuhl has been impressive as of late, including a 15-point performance in Saturday’s 92-71 win over Georgetown.

The most intriguing matchup of the game comes on the perimeter. SU point guard JamaalTart and UConn’s Khalid El-Amin rank as arguably the Big East’s two best point guards and the emotional leaders of their respective teams.

The two players lead physically as well. Hart averages 11.0 points and 7.1 assists a game, and the Huskies’ poorly point guard pours in 18.6 and dunks out 4.6.

Calhoun said El-Amin has become even more valuable to UConn this season after the departure of Hamilton and the graduation of Ricky Moore.

“This is his best season in three,” the 13th-year UConn head coach said. “Other people we have had have allowed him to be more expressive. This season he’s taken the burden of responsibility.

“I first noticed it in the Duke game against Jason Williams. Khalid locked him up. Jason Gardner of Arizona went 2-for-10 against him. He’s put a lot more emphasis on his game. We have some weaknesses, but we also have strengths and he highlights them, making sure the big guys get touches, getting the ball to shooters.

“After (Cincinnati’s) Kenyon Martin, I don’t know if there’s another player doing as much for his team right now.”

While El-Amin is certainly valuable, UConn is no one-man band.

Alburt Mourning hits 49 percent of his shots from behind the 3-point arc on the way to averaging 13.4 points. Kevin Freeman is also in double figures for the Huskies with 11.5.

Thomas leads the SU team in scoring, but in the squad’s last few games the perimeter game has been the key.

The Orangemen nailed 14 treys against Notre Dame and 11 against Pitt and were led by different players in each contest.

Sophomore sharpshooter Preston Shumpert led the Orangemen against Fordham and freshman DeShaun Williams nalled five against the Panthers.

One of the more telling signs of the importance of tonight’s game is the presence of Dick Vitale — one of college basketball’s most recognizable personalities who will color commentate for ESPN.

The balled-domed broadcast is a lot more than a fun thing to do at this point.

You’ve got the three well-seasoned seniors, a small forward in Damone Brown who looks as though he’s going to hit his peak on the Carrier Dome roof every time he skies for a dunk, and three shooters — Preston Shumpert, Tony Bland and DeShaun Williams — who are as accurate as the laser sight on James Bond’s Beretta.

Standing in the way now is UConn, last year’s national champion.

The Huskies graduated All-American Dick Hamilton and Ricky Moore and still are trying to find that niche.

“I still think they’re the best team in the conference,” Boeheim said. “They’re just trying to find out how to replace the guy they lost. Once they do that, they’ll be very good.”

UConn certainly can beat the Orangemen. It was no surprise if the Huskies do. Point guard Khalid El-Amin is a very pick and the supporting class complements him well.

The Orangemen ruined the Huskies’ perfect season last year, and not if the Orange win the Big East — which entered the game 19-4. If the Orange are in the Big East, played without Hamilton and Voskuhl — 59-42.

ington, D.C., and I read that we have won 47 of our last 52 games,” UConn head coach Jim Calhoun said. “Living in Connecticut, I didn’t realize that. We were 12-3 going into Georgetown, and I thought we were 3-12 because all I kept reading was ‘What’s wrong with the Huskies?’

The three losses suffered this season already surpass the Huskies’ total of two from last season. One of those was a 59-42 loss to Syracuse at the Hartford Civic Center on Feb. 1. UConn played that game without star forward Richard Hamilton and center Jake Voskuhl. Hamilton is now collecting paychecks in the NBA, but Voskuhl will match up with SU big man Etan Thomas for control of the paint.

A look at the numbers says that Thomas should win the inside battle, as he averages 14.2 points and 8.5 rebounds to Voskuhl’s 8.6 and 6.3.

SU’s shot blocker extraordinary has struggled in recent games, however, mostly because of foul trouble, while Voskuhl has been impressive as of late, including a 15-point performance in Saturday’s 92-71 win over Georgetown.

The most intriguing matchup of the game comes on the perimeter. SU point guard Jamaal Hart and UConn’s Khalid El-Amin rank as arguably the Big East’s two best point guards and the emotional leaders of their respective teams.

The two players lead physically as well. Hart averages 11.0 points and 7.1 assists a game, and the Huskies’ poorly point guard pours in 18.6 and dunks out 4.6.

Calhoun said El-Amin has become even more valuable to UConn this season after the departure of Hamilton and the graduation of Ricky Moore.

“This is his best season in three,” the 13th-year UConn head coach said. “Other people we have had have allowed him to be more expressive. This season he’s taken the burden of responsibility.

“I first noticed it in the Duke game against Jason Williams. Khalid locked him up. Jason Gardner of Arizona went 2-for-10 against him. He’s put a lot more emphasis on his game. We have some weaknesses, but we also have strengths and he highlights them, making sure the big guys get touches, getting the ball to shooters.

“After (Cincinnati’s) Kenyon Martin, I don’t know if there’s another player doing as much for his team right now.”

While El-Amin is certainly valuable, UConn is no one-man band.

Alburt Mourning hits 49 percent of his shots from behind the 3-point arc on the way to averaging 13.4 points. Kevin Freeman is also in double figures for the Huskies with 11.5.

Thomas leads the SU team in scoring, but in the squad’s last few games the perimeter game has been the key.

The Orangemen nailed 14 treys against Notre Dame and 11 against Pitt and were led by different players in each contest.

Sophomore sharpshooter Preston Shumpert led the Orangemen against Fordham and freshman DeShaun Williams nalled five against the Panthers.

One of the more telling signs of the importance of tonight’s game is the presence of Dick Vitale — one of college basketball’s most recognizable personalities who will color commentate for ESPN.

The balled-domed broadcast is a lot more than a fun thing to do at this point.

With college football signing day rapidly approaching, Syracuse University officially secured a commitment from a running back who leaves defenders reeling.

Walter Reyes, a 5-foot-11, 205-pound back from Youngstown-Struthers (Ohio) High School, ran a 4.38-second 40-yard dash and posted 1,102 yards rushing in the 40-yard dash, plans to sign with SU on Feb. 2, national signing day.

And although he missed three games this season with a hyperextended left knee, Reyes still posted 1,127 yards rushing and 13 touchdowns. He’s been continuously ranked in most top 20 teams.

Struthers head coach Gary Zetski deems Reyes the best back out of the Youngstown area ever.

“He is extremely fast and his strength is unbelievable,” Zetski said of Reyes, who bench-pressed nearly 450 pounds and leg presses over 1,000. “Around here, we’ve never seen anyone with his power and speed, and he has a nice, lean body so when he’s running, he’s always driving himself forward.”

Shaking their heads and checking their stopwatchs, the coaches told Reyes to line up again. He proceeded to run another 4.2 flat.

Prep Star Magazine’s Rick Kimbrel likes Reyes’ explosive ability. “He is a guy who hits the hole and runs through it, then gets by tacklers quick, and can outrun you,” he said. “He is an [Oakland Raider] Napoleon Rice type.”

These outstanding times come on his 1,102-yard season, but number draws national attention entering this past season, at which time Prep Star ranked him as the No. 2 running back in the Midwest.

After the mid-season injury setback, his stock dropped. But Kimbrel believes Reyes’ 1100-plus yards in seven games comes with his career. So he became even more determined, and set short- and long-term goals. And those long-term goals are all tied to his success at Syracuse.

While Reyes appears to have all the moves on the field, it will take a strong spring finish in the classroom and one physical science course over the summer to maintain his eligibility. Both Zetta and Reyes said he should have no problem meeting those requirements.

Members of the SU coaching staff cannot comment on Reyes since NCAA regulations prevent them from recruiting before signing day.

Reyes said he hopes to transfer into the SI Newhouse School of Public Communications after a year at Syracuse, eyeing broadcast journalism as a possible major.

His decision to attend Syracuse to study the school’s broadcast program, and patience coupled with his athletic ability, will supply Reyes with the mind-set to succeed at the collegiate level.

Noticing his undeniable speed, with one back move and strong field vision, High School head coach Dan Beem said he’ll need to adjust his view of Reyes’ parents believed he had the speed, but not the strength. Moreover, they knew he had the talent.

“His great running and determined person,” Tinsley said. “He is a speed demon, and you can’t cite about him because he is a tremendous person.”

Testament to his abilities came in a 20-carry, 250-yard explosion in his team’s first-round playoff win three years after he returned to the lineup.

“He was injured and before that he was one of the most explosive and sought-after backs in the nation,” Beem said. “A lot of people fell off him after that. Walter’s a good, hard-nosed ball carrier, and if he gets past the second man, when he reaches Orange fans everywhere should be excited about his desire of being a speed demon, and you can’t deny that speed.”

As a star recruit and young man, Reyes and Marylou Reyes-Tinsley and Walter Reyes’ mother believe his outgoing and assertive personality coupled with his athleticism, will supply Reyes with the mind-set to succeed at the collegiate level.

Today's date has been circled on the calendars of Syracuse basketball fans everywhere since the announcement of this season's schedule.
It is the night when the unbeaten and sixth-ranked Orangemen (15-0, 5-0 Big East) can prove that, just because some of their wins came against pastries such as Albany, Hartford, Florida Atlantic and Colgate doesn't mean SU doesn't deserve national recognition.
And there is no better way to earn it than by defeating defending national champion Connecticut (13-3, 2-2).
Syracuse takes on the eighth-ranked Huskies tonight at 7 p.m. at the Carrier Dome.
The game will be nationally televised on ESPN's Big Monday.

"Everybody knows this will be our toughest game of the season," said head coach Jim Boeheim.
Our kids usually look forward to a challenge like this, and hopefully they'll respond on the court.

The Orangemen remain the only team in Division I with an unblemished record.
Yet many college basketball coaches would say that team.

In the battle for wrestling supremacy in the state, only a pair of Orange- men reached the second day of the New York State Colle- giate Wrestling Champi- onships in Binghamton.
After finishing the ini- tial day of competition tied for 13th out of 24 teams, Syracuse moved up slightly to finish tied with Oswego State for 12th place.
The finish fell just short of head coach Scott Miller's goal of "prove that we're one of the Top 10 programs in the East." While Miller only found six healthy bodies to travel down Interstate-81 for the two-day tournament, a third of these wrestlers — Shawn Thomas and Brett Cowen — went back for the placement competition Saturday.

Thomas, the team's lone captain and senior, took third place in the 174-pound division by defeating No. 3 seed Ryan Foster of Columbia.

Thomas, the No. 4 seed, pinned his Ivy league opponent in under half a minute. He fell in again, this time taking a tough 7-2 decision against No. 1 seed and eventual champion Maurice Worth of Army.

Syracuse defeated good teams from Notre Dame, Rutgers, St. Joseph's and Wisconsin by at least 19 points.

JA, Urtz report violation decrease

BY ERICKA JONES

Syracuse University officials reported Friday a decline in judicial cases during the 1999 Fall Semester.

During the first quarter of the 1999-2000 academic year, Aug. 25 to Oct. 15, the University Judicial System received 841 disciplinary referrals of students alleged to have violated the SU Student Code of Conduct, said Anastasia Urtz, Office of Judicial Affairs director and associate dean of student relations.

"Public Safety appears to be patrolling a lot more lately. They seem much more aware of what's going on around campus," said GEOFFREY RISPOLI, freshman in The College of Arts and Sciences.

The second quarter, Oct. 16 to Dec. 27, brought 273 disciplinary referrals, a 49.5 percent decline, Urtz said. "We were really excited," Urtz said. This is the first time that a decline in judicial cases has been reported during her six-year tenure at SU, she said.

The judicial system began several new programs in an attempt to decrease the number of violations, Urtz said. Prior to this academic year, Judicial Affairs distributed information detailing the code of conduct for both parents and students to encourage learning and understanding SU's expectations, Urtz said. Explaining the judicial process and familiarizing students with university policies contributed information detailing the code of conduct for both parents and students to encourage learning and understanding SU's expectations, Urtz said.

"Students seem more aware of the response, where as in the past they did not know," Urtz said. The University Judicial System also reported a decrease in cases within specific offices.

Assembly elects representatives, awaits Cabinet’s VP decision

The Student Government Association elected candidates during Monday's meeting to fill remaining positions in the Cabinet, Administrative Operations Committee and the Assembly.

The Assembly elected juniors Dwight Williams and Joe Burns, a political science and history major, to serve as members of the ten-person Cabinet.

"Hopefully I will become the liaison in administration operations," said Williams, a School of Management student. "There I can work on bridging the gap between the administration and the Assembly."

The four elected representatives, Williams, junior Larry Provost, sophomore David Gaxilin and freshman Ken Gallardo, all ran unopposed.

"I would really like to make a difference around here," said Provost, student in The College of Arts and Sciences. "The responsibilities do not astound me."

Junior Melissa Huber and fifth-year architecture student Jonathan M. Taylor also ran unopposed for the positions of recorder and parliamentarian, respectively. This will be Taylor's sixth session with the SGA.

"I see great potential for the session," Taylor said. "I can say that it's more promising than last year's Assembly."

Gore, Bush win in Iowa

The Associated Press

DES MOINES, IOWA — Vice President Gore won an overwhelming victory in Iowa’s Democratic caucuses in Iowa Monday, while Republican presidential candidate Bush managed to score a clear but narrow victory over his five Republican challengers.

Gore, who is also a candidate for the presidential nomination, scored by a margin that approached 2:1, a convincing showing that left Bradley on the defensive and scrambling to avoid a potentially debilitating loss in New Hampshire on Feb. 9.

Bush managed to cement his status as the national front-runner in the Republican field with a double-digit victory, winning about 41 percent of the vote.

Heartburn drug linked to deaths

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The popular prescription nighttime heartburn drug Zantac has been linked to deaths and more than 270 significant negative reactions since the FDA began monitoring the drug in September, 1995.

The FDA管局 announced at a news conference that it had received reports of 270 adverse reactions, including 9 deaths, linked to the drug. The FDA also said it was working with other agencies to ensure that the drug is safe and effective.

The FDA has been monitoring the drug since 1995, and has taken steps to warn consumers about the potential risks of using the drug.

Congress argues Cuban boy’s fate

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The case of Elian Gonzalez, a 6-year-old Cuban boy, has been a source of tension between the United States and the Cuban government, as some members of Congress sought to upend an immigration ruling that would send him back to Cuba by legislating the 6-year-old into a U.S. citizen or permanent resident.

On the first day back for Congress, lawmakers introduced two companion bills that would bar federal immigration officials from making further involvement in the case, reeling ro a custody case in a Florida state court.

The bills were introduced in the House and Senate on Monday by several Democrats who have been trying to find a solution that would allow the boy to stay in the United States.

The legislative maneuvers raise questions about the power of procedure and law, congressional staffers and legal experts say, including one that puts the political will of the anti-Castro community at risk in an era of persistent efforts to control the court's decisions.

But according to the FDA, 85 percent of the 270 adverse reactions involved patients with risk factors already outlined on Propulsid's label, people who were in clear danger of an adverse reaction.

Supreme Court upholds limits

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A divided Supreme Court on Monday upheld federal campaign limits, rejecting the arguments that the limits are unconstitutional and that they violate the First Amendment's guarantees of free speech and the right to associate.

The court ruled that the limits, which are set at $1,075, are a sensible way to limit campaign costs and that the limits are constitutional.

The decision is a victory for the Federal Election Commission, which has been trying to enforce the limits since they were enacted in 1990.

The court's ruling is a blow to advocates seeking to expand campaign finance rules and who have been pushing for a constitutional amendment to strike down the limits.

Thai commandos end takeover

BANGKOK, Thailand — Thai commandos Tuesday launched a predawn raid against a sprawling provincial hospital west of Bangkok and retook it from members of a Burmese rebel group — whose leaders are presumed to have fled from the facility along with its patients and staff of 200.

Large explosions could be heard as Thai soldiers moved inside the hospital, which had been held hostage by a rebel band since last August.

The authorities announced that nine rebels had been killed and several Thai soldiers and police officers had been injured, while one of the Burmese rebels escaped and was being pursued.

None of the hundreds of terrified patients, hospital staff and volunteers who had been held hostage was injured, officials said.

The assault came as a surprise to the rebels, who had been preparing to leave the hospital and had not expected a military attack.

Audit finds illicit Kohl party funds

BERLIN — Germany's Christian Democrats said Monday that an independent audit found $6 million in illegal party donations that sources could not trace, raising the possibility that secret funds managed by former chancellor Helmut Kohl could have been much larger than he has acknowledged.

Party Chairman Wolfgang Schuble said the audit, which was conducted by a law firm, found that the Kohl party had violated election laws by using "undeclared" contributions.

African Student Union President Ebrima Krubally described problems Monday plaguing African nations and detailed steps Syracuse University students can take to solve them.

Civil wars, extreme poverty and various epidemics ravaged the continent during the 20th Century, said Krubally in the Hall of Languages during the first ASU meeting of the semester. Western nations have either remained indifferent to Africa's problems or encouraged them, he said.

"Africa isn't tied into the world economic system, so turmoil in Africa will not affect the prices on the New York Stock Exchange," said Krubally, a junior engineering student and native of Gambia.

He noted that Western arms merchants have fueled Africa's civil wars and Western democracies supported corrupt dictators that stole billions of dollars from their countries. Meanwhile, international lending bodies such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund have encouraged policies that helped produce an economic dead end, Krubally said.

"The West has pursued a strategy of giving with one hand and taking back with another," he said.

Instead of exploring free trade with Africa, Western nations put up tariff barriers, Krubally said. The heavy burden of IMF debt discouraged investment in Africa — resulting in corruption, political instability and capital flight, he said.

Krubally called upon African SU students to join forces against the stigma.

"We want Africa to become prosperous, exploit its tremendous economic potential and get to the forefront of development," he said.

Campus activism
SU alumnus Joseph Bagacwe, who attended Monday's meeting, said ASU could increase its visibility on campus by inviting speakers to address students. He said that speakers would help increase ASU membership and work with other student organizations.

"There is great hope in increasing the awareness of Africa's problems on this campus," Bagacwe said.

He said ASU would be spreading its message among the students, the future leaders of the United States, who will someday walk through the corridors of power and shape the policies affecting Africa.

"I think maybe these crucial decisions will reflect greater compassion and understanding," he said.

Ultimately, however, the ASU members said they believe that only Africans are able to solve the continent's problems.

Most members plan to return to Africa after graduation, said Nchimunya Magande, a junior international relations major.

"We love Syracuse and consider it our second home," Magande said. "We've come here to get a quality education and go back and help."

While helping improve the situation will not be easy, it can be done, Krubally said.

"I am very optimistic about Africa," he said. "I'll overcome its hard times."

ter, a 45.8 percent decline. The Office of Student Mature Life reviewed the cases during the second quarter, down from 229 cases in the first quarter, a 54 percent decline. The Office of Student Programs had no cases during the second quarter and only one case during the first quarter.

The State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry saw 50 percent fewer cases in the second quarter than in the first, Urtz said.

"I have seen a lot of enforcement and more student involvement in the fraternity house," said Carlos Rodriguez, a senior information studies major and Alpha Chi Rho brother.

Parents are notified of any serious offenses their child may have incurred, Urtz said, adding that her ultimate goal is to reduce repeat offenses and address the cause of the problem, typically alcohol related.

She noted, however, that alcohol-related violations dropped 87.6 percent from first to second quarter.

"Public Safety appears to be patrolling a lot more lately," said Tiffany Rossini, a freshman in The College of Arts and Sciences. "They seem much more aware of what's going on around campus."

The Options Program is another choice for students who violate the code of conduct, Urtz said. The program begins with an evaluation of students to determine whether they need therapeutic or educational counseling because of a substance abuse problem.

A new computer program used in the Options Program, Alcohol One On One, simulates choices made by a party-goer, said, and tells "what happens if you take the next drink."

Judicial Affairs also offers an anger management program, she said. One such program, Project Care, allows students to interact with the local residents as a form of community service.

"We are trying to get people who may have done bad things involved in good things," Urtz said. Judicial affairs does not want a policy violation to take on the "snowball effect" — a student who could have been helped but instead continues down the same negative path, she said.

"We are trying to isolate the different causes and problems," Urtz said.

requests to attend two to four meetings a day and adding an assistant will make us more effective."

The Assembly passed the bill unanimously and sophomore Nicholas Maccarone was elected to the position.

James said that Maccarone's qualifications and energy will do great things for the organization.

"I was very persistent in tracking Jamal down. I had lots of ideas in the back of my mind that I wanted him to hear," Maccarone says.

James announced his decision to nominate Arish Gajjar as vice president and Edwin Esco-bar as public relations director, once he consults with the Cabinet this week.

"They were chosen based on their willingness to seek me out," James said. "And our ability to work well together will complement the session well."

Covered by Taylor, to create an assistant parliamentarian position. Taylor said that he needed to train a representative to assume the parliamentarian position when his term ends. He appointed junior Faith Tartaglia, former recorder of the 43rd Assembly.

"I want to see an SGA that grows and better serves the students," Taylor said. "Faith has a breadth of knowledge surely contained by no one else and her voting experience will prove vital as she steps into the Cabinet position immediately following my departure."

SGA President Jamal James proposed that an executive assistant position also be created to assist him with his duties.

"This officer will be a driving force in all aspects of campus life," James said. "I get requests to attend two to four meetings a day and adding an assistant will make us more effective."

Political Communication in the U.K. and U.S.

Study in London, England

This six-week program explores the merging worlds of consumer, political, and election campaign communications in the U.K. and the U.S. and will study the strategies and communication techniques essential to winning elections and influencing public opinion.

Burger King attack fails at ‘progress’

Coming to Syracuse University we’re all exposed to different people, thinking viewpoints and lifestyles.

Just walk into a SU dining hall. Take a look at the line. There’s Halal entrees for Muslims, Kosher selections for Jews and then there’s soy milk and falafel for vegans.

If you’re not familiar with vegans, here’s a heads up. They’re different from “normal” vegetarians because they don’t eat any animal byproducts — not just meat. Their meal plan excludes dairy products as well.

Some vegans keep their diet because of political and ethical reasons. “Meat is murder,” is a popular chant among these groups. Others stay away from the meats and cheeses because they feel better. Whatever the reasoning, vegans are entitled to eat whatever they want to.

But within this group, there are a few whose views are a bit more militant. These individuals seek the consumption of meat and will not hesitate to tell a carnivore to put their burger down and pick up a Gardenburger.

A group of such individuals are in all likelihood responsible for the vandalizing of King’s Kith in Oneida on Sunday night. The restaurant, along Route 5, was covered with graffiti including the aforementioned “Meat is Murder” and “ALF” stand for “Animal Liberation Front.” A nationwide underground organization that encourages its members to end cruelty to animals, from fur coats to the consumption of beef, by all means necessary — including violence.

It’s outright ridiculous for vegans to target a Burger King. The restaurant’s employees are only trying to earn an honest buck. Destroying their place of business accomplishes little for the cause, especially when there are thousands of franchises all over the world. The violence only harms innocent bystanders.

Just look at the two dreamers of racial equality — Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Malcolm X. Dr. King’s passive resistance transformed the United States, while Malcolm XTs assassination left a dream ixnfulfilled.

Coming to Syracuse University we’re all entitled to eat whatever we want to. With the road to paradise, the basic rundown. Their meal plan is entitled to eat whatever they want to.

Millennium this, millennium that. All-time these, all-time these.

From Major League Baseball’s All-Century Team to ESPN SportsCentury’s 50 Greatest Athletes to Syracuse’s All-Century football team, the past year has seen our brains with ‘best-of’ lists and countdowns from the previous hundred years.

And just because we’re 25 days into the next century, don’t think columnist it’s too late to capitalize on this phenomenon. As such, here are five days of pure-premium Orange in women’s athletics from Fall 1999.

Sept. 11 — Chelsey Inman called the sign and Tara DiMaggio nodded in agreement. Eight seconds and one strike later, the Syracuse University’s softball team’s inaugural season began. It marked the first time in 27 years that varsity athletes donned the orange on the field of dreams. Baseball was eliminated as a varsity-level program in 1972, the same year Title IX was enacted, giving these softball players an equal right to hook slide into second base and stop blazing ground balls at third.

Syracuse beat Binghamton 2-0. DiMaggio notched the complete-game victory as she went seven innings and scattered four hits, while walking three and fanning nine. Binghamton’s Melia Larvin had the dubious distinction of being the first and final out of the game.

Syracuse beat Providence 3-1. DiMaggio fanned 10 Freehold’s first batter and then out of the next four. Providence, 0-2 on the year, was nursing a one-run lead when DiMaggio stepped up to the plate with one out in the top of the fifth. She hit a three-run home run for SU.

Oct. 11 — Women’s soccer head coach April Kell was concerned about her latest foe to march across her desk. Kater, the only coach the program has known, learned that her team had just earned the No. 23 spot in the NSCAA/Adidas National Rankings. Though different from NCAA rankings, it was the first national ranking of any kind for the four-year program.

The ranking came during a four-game winning streak, capped by the 0-0 drubbing of Providence a day earlier. The Orangewomen netted four goals in the first 20 minutes of that game, while ousting the Friars 18-2 over a 30-minute period. The Friars earlier in the season. After dropping the first two games of the series, Friars powered back to split games two and three.

Her second career “tripie-double” came one week after she dominated Villanova with a previous season-high 20 rebounds. She also chipped in 20 points as the Orangewomen downed Concladia Riga 92-78 in an exhibition game at Manley Field House.

Playing all 40 minutes, Aziz routinely hit jumpers and free throws to keep the Latvians at bay. Aziz went 7-for-11 from the field and 6-for-10 from the free-throw line. She also grabbed four boards in the last three minutes to secure the victory. And for good measure, Aziz even blocked a shot.

Nov. 22 — In a military battle, 30 kills usually earns the soldier a medal or two. In the war that is Eastern Conference volleyball, only 10 kills from a single player results in a tournament, it puts Dana Fiume in a prestigious circle. More like a triangle considering she is one of only three Division I players this season to reach the 30-kill plateau while recording a triple-double in the same game. Where she succeeded, 108 others failed.

The junior right-side hitter added 18 digs and 10 blocks as the sixth-seeded Orange edged No. 3 Providence 3-2, in the quarterfinal round, avenging a 3-2 defeat at the hands of the Friars earlier in the season. After dropping the first two games of the series, Friars powered back to split games two and three.

Her second career “tripie-double” came one week after she dominated Villanova with a previous season-high 26 kills.

Those were some memories from last fall. Let’s do this. This semester can live up to these expectations.

Mark La Monica is a first-year graduate student in public communications.

A century of wonder.

On Wednesday Jan. 26, grab a Daily Orange and share in a century of Syracuse memories as we unveil our special section: “Higher Ground — A Century of Syracuse University.” You won’t want to miss out on this special keepsake edition.

Local high schools have recently turned to voluntary drug testing programs to encourage students to remain substance free.

The Be Free Be Proud program in place at Cicero-North Syracuse High School, Rte. 31, Cicero, began last month and offers year-round testing to its varsity and junior varsity athletes and youth court members. Those who want to participate at Cicero-North Syracuse High School, with parental consent, can fill out an application allowing them to be randomly tested throughout the school year. Principal Stewart Amell said the event testing program is available.

Syracuse University athletes are required to submit to random urinary drug testing, but no voluntary testing program is available through SU.

I think a lot of schools are looking at drug testing," said Amell. "It’s a positive way to approach abuse on any campus."

Drug testing of SU athletes is implemented because of tainted steroids and other performance enhancing substances used by many athletes, said Debra Bergen-Cico, director of substance abuse prevention and health services. The tests are used as a way of leveling the playing field.

"The policy in the athletic department of SU is that everyone is to sign a consent form to be tested randomly," said Bergen-Cico.

However, testing for the entire student population is not available, a doctor's note is required, Bergen-Cico said.

But Creathak said that if SU were to offer voluntary drug testing to the entire student population it might tarnish a student's reputation.

"We switched the policy from urinary testing to hair strand testing," Chow said. "Then they started selecting students randomly, using their ID number."

"Students at SU will not be as willing to submit to similar drug tests, they are urinalysis," she added.

Others students said they felt that a voluntary drug testing policy at SU would not help reduce the number of students who abuse drugs on campus.

"It would be a nice thought," said Rich A. Berardi, a former Syracuse University basketball player and SU fan. "But it doesn't work. They don't want to just tell them they do drugs."

Drug usage is hard to detect because it is quiet and self-inflicted and not likely to cause disruption, said Anastasia Urta, director for the Office of Judicial Affairs and associate dean of student relations.

"I think the drug culture is one we don't fully understand," Urta said. "Individuals need to be motivated."
Greek community readies for Spring Rush 2000

BY SHELBY HEALY
Staff Writer

The Syracuse University Office of Greek Life kicked off its biggest event of the year Monday with Spring Rush 2000, a two-week-long event expected to attract more than 400 men and 600 women — a substantial increase from last year’s numbers, said Lisa Walsh, OGL graduate assistant.

After one day of recruiting, the numbers were impressive when compared to last year’s totals of about 500 women and 300 men, Walsh said. "We had an incredible turnout," Panhellenic Association President Sarah Korf said. "I think the rushes are as exciting as we are. Greeks have been on this campus for 125 years, and that is something to celebrate about."

This year’s rush theme emphasizes unity and tradition, she added. "So far, we’ve got a third of the people we had last year in the first day," said SId Wolf, Interfraternity Council rush co-chairperson. "The rushes have been primarily freshmen."

Rushes, regardless of year, are required to have a 2.3 grade point average and must have completed 12 academic credits while enrolled at SU or the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry.

"We’re going to all the freshmen dorms as well as South Campus and will have a question and answer time," said Wolf, a sophomore. "This is the biggest one."

There are three rounds of sorority rush, the first of which begins Feb. 4 when rushes visit each house, Kappa Kappa Gamma President Missy Deacon said. During the second round, rushes select six or seven houses to re-visit before narrowing their choices to three sororities, Deacon said.

"The women then submit their final house selection before Bid Day," she added. Sigma Nu President Ryan Archer said his house will be seeing more people involved in the rush process than last year. "We’re hoping to get more people," he added, "the senior chemical engineering and chemistry major said. "We’re really excited about it."

Mixed feelings
Several rushes shared the same enthusiasm when questioned about their greek plans, citing the opportunity to meet new people.

"They do a lot of good things," said Jenna Fortmann, an undecided freshman in The College of Arts and Sciences. "It’s not about buying friends. It’s just about being close to people you have a common interest with." Meghan Meehan, a freshman child family studies major, said she will be participating in Rush to learn about the greek system.

"I think it is a good experience," Meehan said. "I want to meet people — I just want to know what it is all about."

Other freshmen said they have decided not to rush and are satisfied with life outside of the greek system. "I don’t want to be tied down to one group," said Allison Bellina, a freshman public relations major. "It’s such a time commitment and I don’t want to be labeled like that.

Korf said she believes people just do not know what greeks do and do not give the rushing process a fair chance. "The greek system provides the opportunity to become involved in what you may be missing from high school," she said. "It gives you everything — academic support, community service, leadership and friendship."

"The greek system puts it all at your fingertips."

tory major, accepted an at-large Cabinet seat. Burns, College Republicans chairperson, said he wants to "increase communication between SGA and the Syracuse community — specifically with city, county and state government officials."

Burns added that he would like to see SGA develop better relationships with student groups. "There doesn’t seem to be cooperation between SGA and students," Burns said. "I’d like to see that change."

Edwin Escobar, nominated for director of public relations, said he also hopes to improve SGA relations with the student body. "I want to help refine SGA’s image," said Escobar, a freshman newspaper major. "It has been traditionally bureaucratic and ineffective, and I want to change it to make it more accessible and productive.

Escobar, a contributing writer for The Daily Orange, also said he wants SGA to invite controversial speakers to campus.

James Skinner, a senior political science major, and Joni Weber, a freshman speech communications major, are two of the new members in the Administrative Operations Committee, which reviews legislation for legality.

Weber said she will push for more classes available each semester and plans to talk to professors and the registrar’s office and seek students’ opinions. "I’m very thrilled by the fact that we were able to fill up all the positions," said James, a senior English major. "I think people are thrilled about it too. I think I did a decent job."

James’ recommendations for vice president and director of public relations will go before the Cabinet this week. If the Cabinet approves the nominations, a two-thirds majority vote by the Assembly will confirm the appointments.

"I always want to be optimistic," said Dwight Williams, who won seats on the Assembly, the Cabinet and the AdOp Committee. "We were efficient last semester, but I always want to strive for perfection. That’s the key to it all."

"I’m comfortable with Jamal’s choices," added Williams, a junior finance major. "They have a certain enthusiasm about them."

SU proves its cynics wrong with a dominant 88-74 victory against Connecticut.

BY BART CURTIS
Sports Editor

SU came in as tremendous underdogs. A Big Monday basketball battle between a Big East powerhouse and a Big East also-ran. Amidst the clamor of the Carrier Dome, the Orangemen were facing the Huskies, the defending national champions. The pressure was on.

But SU's defense stifled UConn, allowing only 74 points. The Orangemen dominated the game, taking control from the start and never looking back. The 88-74 win was SU's second double-digit victory in as many games.

SU's defense was the key to the victory. They held UConn to just 74 points, their lowest output of the season. SU's defense forced 16 turnovers, including five steals by Damone Broussard. The Ordangemen's defense was unrelenting, causing a thunderous noise that drowned the defending national champions.

Syracuse's offense was also on fire, scoring 88 points. The Orangemen's fast break was shut down by SU's defense, which forced UConn to shoot from long range. The Orangemen's 3-pointers were off-target, while SU's were on-point. The Orangemen's defense was a sight to behold.

"SU stifled UConn like no other team this year," said SU head coach Jim Boeheim. "We were ready for this game and we showed it on the court."

off 35 before halftime to take complete control of the game. Syracuse got its defense and locked him up pretty good," UConn coach Jim Calhoun said of his point guard's performance. "They cut the head off of the dragon. I thought they did it with 14 points. We never really scored after the first eight minutes," Calhoun added.

The Huskies' defensive shutdown of El-Amin — and his five steals — certainly came as no surprise to those who have followed his career. The senior guard already holds the school's career steals record and grabbed 23 in the 15 games previous to Monday. Hart also acts as the spearhead for a defense that combined for 148 steals coming into the UConn game.

"I think Jason's the best defensive guard in the country," Calhoun said. "I've seen him a lot of times. I don't think he's had as much credit because we do play a lot of zone, but even in our zone, we're a good defensive team."

-containing El-Amin was a key to the game coming in, Hart said. "He's a very quick, very quick player, and I think I'm the best defensive player. I wanted him to come right at me, just make it hard for him, and I did," Hart said. "I went right after him with my defense, like the best defensive player, and I think I'm the best defensive player."

-the rendering of El-Amin into an ineffective onlooker proved to be just one of the highlights for the Orangewomen defense.

-Thomas continued his shoeblocking ways with four and also contained the Huskies' other leading scorer, UTCenter Etan Thomas finished with 19 points, but 13 of those came in the game's last eight minutes.

-The Huskies only put three players in double figures, and not one scored more than 10 points, all four of which came in the second half. Edwards and Saunders knocked double digits with 10.

-Conn's top two scorers this season, El-Amin and Albert Mourning, combined for 16 points, half of their combined average.

-We weren't able to get to the spots to get good shots off," El-Amin said. "They played great team defense. We just weren't the Connecticut team we have been. We played more one-on-one than five-on-five."

-The Huskies' shooting statistics showed the lack of team shooting, as 11 of their 12 shots off El-Amin. "They had a good team defense. We just weren't the Connecticut team we have been. We played more one-on-one than five-on-five."

-In the first half, Syracuse has taken comeback shooting an abysmal 35 percent from the field, allowing the Orangewomen to put up a 48 percent effort. "Our man-to-man defense was a play to the one that I've played here," Hart said. "We limited everything they like to do. We knew Khalid wanted to come off the pick-and-rolls, and we just didn't give him a chance to get going.

Orangewomen look for two straight wins

BY GREG BISHOP Staff Writer

The Orangewomen's basketball team gained a short winter respite when its game against Seton Hall, scheduled for last Saturday, was postponed due to an SHU residence hall fire.

It allowed the Orangewomen to prepare for their midseason matchup tonight at the Fitzgerald Field House in Pittsburgh at 7 p.m.

Last season, the Lady Panthers finished 12th in the Big East, ranking up a 3-17 conference record. In addition, Pittsburgh lost three starters and seven players overall to graduation, leaving an even bleaker future.

As the season's midway point passes, though, the Pitt game holds a different story for the Orangewomen. Pitt second-year head coach Traci Waines has guided the program through a 180-degree turnaround.

The Lady Panthers (13-6, 2-4) bolstered their roster with four freshman standouts that have made large contributions en route to Pitt's quick rise.

They've played some tough teams," Pitt head coach Marianna Moore said. "They're much improved. They have four freshman that do a lot of good things for them, and so we've got our hands full.

"It's always been a tight ballgame and I figure it will be another tight ballgame down here,"

Williams is a pure athlete who can get a shot from anywhere. She's got the ability to control the tempo. The Orangewomen possess a squad with many second- and third-year players who need to control the ball and against a green Pittsburg team.

"That's important," Freeman said. "With Pitt, we want to be medium speed. We definitely think that athlete-to-athlete we match up well, and we want to continue to change our offenses and our defenses a little like we did against Notre Dame and try to keep them off-guard."

The extra break may have been just what the Orangewomen needed. Syracuse already plays with a thin squad already, so the loss of Moore for the season with a torn knee ligament.

Without Moore and center Erin Pratt, who didn't dress against the Lady Wildcats, Syracuse must use coaches to run full squad drills in practice.

"Sometimes it's better to just continue to play," Freeman said. "But I think that we could appreciate the rest. It gave me an opportunity to practice them on Saturday and allow us to go home and rest and rest all day Sunday. I think it will do us some good."

January 25, 2000 The Daily Orange Evening.

Thomas and Damone Brown canned just five more field goals in the opening stanza, giving the Huskies 35-12, including the free throws.

“Thought the difference was our defense early,” SU head coach Jim Boeheim said. “It was a total team effort from everyone on defense and rebounding.”

With the score knotted at 18, DeShaun Williams stole a Jake Voskuhl outlet and drove for a uncontested layup. The Huskies would never sniff the lead again, spending the rest of the night inflating Orange exhaust. SU then ran off 10 consecutive points, with the 26,474 in attendance raising its volume with each bucket.

The fiery fans reached a crescendo when Williams drilled back-to-back triples, pumping up, and they were there tonight,” center Etan Thomas said. “It was a lot of fun out there tonight,” center Etan Thomas said. “We were all pumped up, and they were behind us on every play, every basket, every blocked shot. The crowd was great, and ball pressureed us.”

Switching defenses and owning a 47-31 edge on the perimeter threat Albert Mouring taking just one shot from deep. The Huskies received zero first-half points from their shooting guard position, with Mouring and freshman Tony Robertson hitting on all three of his tries.

“What was disappointing was the way they came out and ball pressureed us,” UConn head coach Jim Calhoun said. “We missed a couple easy layups and easy plays. Then we stopped playing defense.”

The highest-profile guard entering Monday night’s tussle, UConn junior Khalid El-Amin, found himself suffocated by SU’s man-to-man and patented 2-3 zone defenses. The Huskies limited El-Amin to three points on an Etan Thomas fast-break dunk with 11:15 left.

The Huskies shot 57 percent from the floor in the second half and whittled SU’s lead as wide as 26 points on an Elan Thomas back-to-back triples, putting SU ahead 40-20 with 14:25 remaining. But the Orange exhaust fanned its flames in transition and one against the zone. Besides that, it was all Jason.

Although both teams shot more than 40 percent for the game, they struggled to get production from behind the arc. The Orangemen made just five attempts from 3-point land, and their most prolific marksman, sophomore Preston Shumpert, hit iron on all three of his tries.

UConn shot just 4-for-11 from downtown, with leading perimeter threat Albert Mouring taking just one shot from deep. The Huskies received zero first-half points from their shooting guard position, with Mouring and freshman Tony Robertson hitting on all three of his tries.

“Syracuse is a tremendous basketball team. They handled us for that 10-minute stretch in the first half. We had the opportunity to play Duke, Arizona and Texas, and Syracuse can play with any of those teams.”

SU proves itself among elite with win

A few minutes after 9 p.m. on a frigid Syracuse Monday, the perfect college basketball scene unfolded inside the Carrier Dome. An army of orange-clad students descended from the bleachers, stomping on press tables before storming the hardwood. The hometown team dominated an opponent and were hoping to hop in the rankings.

Richard Vitale, the Mad Hatter of college hoops, even lent his familiar bellowing routine to the carnival atmosphere. Images such as those usually appear in images via satellite on Central New York television screens, carrying return addresses such as Durham, N.C., and Lawrence, Kan.

Yet for one night, as Vitale ingrained in the minds of millions of viewers, "The basketball capital of America is Syracuse." This season's crop of Orangemen past St. John's in its triumphs. UConn's full arsenal spanked the Orange, 88-74 before UConn starters Richard Hamilton and Jake Voskuhl spent the game on the bench in street clothes, watching their squad's 19-game winning streak stand.

SU's trials far outweighed its triumphs. UConn's full arsenal spanked the Orange twice, once in the Big East Tournament finals. Miami and St. John's, both NCAA Tournament teams, took wins out of the Dome as well. This season's crop of Orangemen played exorcist against the Huskies, shedding any remaining flaws at Critical. This night, no one could accuse them of playing a juvenile schedule, dotted with Albany and Florida Atlantic.

This night, the Huskies sent their full squad to battle and it came up short. This night, Syracuse shut down the Huskies and shut up the critics.

The merger of AOL and Time Warner is a topic of concern for many in the communications industry. As Elin, a technology expert, stated, "Unless action is taken to ensure journalistic independence, we face a dangerous threat to media diversity.

Elin believes that the deal, which combines two of the largest media companies, poses potential conflicts of interest. AOL and Time Warner have significant interests in maximizing profit at the expense of journalistic integrity and diversity.

The merger, Elin argues, will lead to monopolistic control of content, reducing competition and potentially stifling innovative ideas. "When a company is buying another company, it will most likely be due to investors, not government action," Elin said.

Elin notes that the combination of AOL and Time Warner could lead to a loss of diversity in the media landscape. "There is a potential for infringing on free speech," he said.

The potential threat to media diversity is not the only concern. Media analysts anticipate that the stockholders of Time Warner will now own AOL, and that this could lead to a loss of editorial independence. "When a company is buying another company, it will most likely be due to investors, not government action," Elin said.

Elin is worried about the potential for monopolistic control in the communications industry. "There is a potential for infringing on free speech," he said.

For First Amendment crusaders, the merger raises serious concerns. "There is a potential for monopolistic control of content, and the possibility of infringements on free speech," Elin concluded.

Elin stresses the importance of maintaining journalistic independence to ensure a diverse and free media landscape. "Unless action is taken to ensure journalistic independence, we face a dangerous threat to media diversity," he said.

Skimpy wear

Dresses for the Big Day have not only gotten simpler over the last few seasons, but they’ve gotten skimpier up top as well. Who is the actress with the best description of the look for today’s wedding dress? It’s Jennifer Aniston, with her bare and sophisticated look. First there were classic sheaths, then spaghetti straps a top tulle bal- lechina skirts. Now gowns are going strapless. Other hot items for those planning to take the plunge include sunset colored roses bound with yellow and golden ribbons and bridal hair in a flurry of jeweled or pearl-scatter- ed pins instead of a veil.

Ad backlash

Benetton’s advertising alliance with Talk magazine has had its intended effect: As Benetton’s anti-death penalty ads is going on over the airwaves, in print and in internet chat-rooms. But it has also prompted a debate Benetton didn’t expect Thursday — negotiations over the ad cam- paign with a major retailer, Sears, Roebuck and Co. Calls from angry customers, including relatives of murder victims, prompted Sears to begin dis- cussions with Benetton.

Big beauty

Mr. Bijan and a fat lady are the talk of the town in New York magazine circles. The hugely success- ful Beverly Hills clothes designer and his runway model named Bella were first rejected and then embraced by some of the toniest Manhattan-based magazines. The controversial advertise- ments, meant as an homage to painters Peter Paul Rubens, Fernando Botero, feature a high-heeled, nude Bella and a fully clothed Mr. Bijan. A quote of the day:

Just as the sun rose on the new millennium, America Online and Time Warner shook hands and made a deal to alter the face of modern-day communications.

Although the impact of the $162 billion deal could be felt worldwide, the implications of the merger also struck home for the world of media professionals. The holographic deal continues the growing trend toward an international media market controlled by just a handful of companies. If other media moguls follow suit, the number of companies searching for new talent will continue to be whittled down, leaving job seekers with less options for employment.

“This kind of convergence has the ability to raise barriers for entry into the field,” said Larry Elin, an assistant professor in the television, radio and film de- partment.

But some students disagree. Since the blockbuster merger under the high-speed Internet prowess with conventional newspaper, magazine and television media, brand-new opportunities in the job force may appear as the cutting-edge technology takes over.

“This will probably open up jobs for people in new media, because film is just beginning to converge with the Web and (industry professionals) are beginning to see the power it can have,” said Seth Robbins, a freshman in major.

“Films are beginning to be shown on the Web. As soon as the Internet gets a little bit faster, you could be watching all your movies on the web,” he added.

Ryan Fisher, a junior broad- cast journalism and political science major, is confident that the joint-effort will benefit employees throughout the industry.

“If someone’s hired into one of these huge companies, there should definitely be more opportunity for advancement,” he said, “I just see profits for companies like AOL getting bigger and bigger because of these merg- ers.”

Groups debate caucus

BY EMILY KULKUS
Asst. News Editor

With the Iowa Caucus ballots counted and the New Hampshire Primary just days away, the 2000 presidential race is far from over — in fact, it has only just begun. Several candidates, including incumbent Vice President Al Gore, are seeking the nomination during Monday’s caucus, magazines publisher Steve Forbes trailed frontrunner Texas Gov. George W. Bush with 30 percent of the vote. Bush garnered 41 percent of the votes, with Gary Bauer at 9 percent and Arizona Sen. John McCain with only 5 percent of the Iowa votes.

Debates in the New Hampshire Primary begin Thursday night in Manchester, N.H., with the elections following on Tuesday.

Forbes’s second place finish in Iowa is a surprise to College Republican Chairperson and Forbes supporter Joe Burns, a junior political science major. “I was thrilled but I still remained hopeful to see Bush win,” Burns said.

Speculation surrounds Utah Sen. Orrin Hatch, who garnered only 4 percent of votes in Iowa, that he will announce his withdrawal from the race today.

Reports of break-ins continue near campus

Staff Reports

An unidentified person broke into a Syracuse University student’s vehicle Jan. 13 and stole materials valued about $210, according to a police report.

The theft, occurring on the 1200 block of Madison Street, marks the tenth car break-in since Sept. 16 in the university area. Six break-ins occurred during the week of Dec. 4.

In one such incident, an unidentified person smeared a substance — believed to be acid — on the passenger side of a Syracuse man’s car on Dec. 2, according to a police report.

Other burglary-related damages included smashed windows and slashed tires, reports said.

Items most commonly stolen included credit cards, money and stereo equipment.

The most recent car, a 1985 white Volkswagen Jetta, belongs to SU graduate student Stephen T. Buckman, the report said.

The thief smashed the rear passenger side window and stole an Old Navy down jacket, a pool cue in a black case and eight compact discs in a black case, according to a police report.

The cost to replace the broken window was estimated at about $110, the report said.

“I was in the process of moving to Comstock,” Buckman said. “This now makes me hesitate.”

Civil rights forum calls for student activism

“The Civil Rights Movement has not ended,” panelists reminded about 30 people Tuesday night during a forum in the Flint Hall Study Lounge.

“What have we done?” asked panelist Robert T. Robinson, Syracuse University Public Safety director. “We’re sleeping through another revolution. It’s time to wake up.”

Robinson once marched for equality in Alabama alongside Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. He said the sense of urgency is gone in today’s generation partly because young people do not know of a cause for which to fight.

“We have forgotten from whence we came,” Robinson said. “We forgot to teach our kids. We are the people that were supposed to teach you.”

“But that doesn’t give you the right to be ignorant,” he said. “We got here on the backs of others and we shall not forget that.”

“We are the generation we are doomed to fail.”

A six-month investigation into domestic violence rumors involving Syracuse Mayor Roy A. Bernardi ended Friday, Onondaga County District Attorney William J. Fitzpatrick said. Fitzpatrick, a longtime friend of Bernardi, concluded all allegations were unfounded.

“T here is no evidence of any visits to domestic violence shelters, police reports or emergency rooms,” Fitzpatrick said. He added that the investigation probed the admissions records of all New York state hospitals, with Alice Bernardi’s permission.

Because many of the rumors placed Bernardi and his wife in domestic altercations during specific times, the District Attorney’s Office checked out a variety of leads during the investigation. Fitzpatrick said those leads, “just didn’t pan out.”

LOS ANGELES — The Army and NASA are expected to announce Wednesday that they will work together to develop systems that can be used to deploy weapons systems to train soldiers and marines and to design space probes.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration partnership extends an Army program to build partnerships with universities and the private sector to develop technologies such as virtual reality, artificial intelligence and high-capacity computer networks. Last year, the Army established the $45 million Institute for Collaborative Technologies at the University of Southern California to study the entertainment industry's expansion of computer models and simulations.

Study encourages controlled rest

Don't call it a nap. It's called a microsleep and you can get pretty tired," said Capt. William Degraffenreidt, chief engineer for human resources at the Army's Natick Soldier Research, Development and Engineering Center.

Whatever you call it, experts have found that soldiers who take microsleeps during the course portion of a flight, when there is little to no motion, can perform better and appear to recover faster the next day, when they've got to be on top of things.

Schwarzenegger splits with restaurant

Schwarzenegger and his wife, Maria Shriver, split Tuesday that they are ending their formal association with Hollywood, nearly nine years ago, just as the restaurant chain is emerging from bankruptcy reorganization.

Schwarzenegger in 1993 joined fellow actor Arnold Schwarzenegger and Sylvester Stallone in lending their names and money to the chain, in exchange for stock. Planet Hollywood said it retains the rights to use Schwarzenegger's name and likeness in its dozens of restaurants but that the actor had sold his ownership interest.

As part of its recently completed Chapter 11 reorganization, Planet Hollywood closed nine properties, including the restaurant at Universal CityWalk and said it will soon unveil new performers to its "existing superstars."

U.N. seeks head for Iraq probe

UNITED NATIONS — Eliza Blaylock Moretti, deputy director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said she will run an international team to head a new U.N. weapons inspection agency for Iraq, diplomats said Tuesday.

Blix, a 71-year-old Swede, ended his 24-month mission without finding any proof of weapons of mass destruction or evidence he could point to in a report to the United Nations, Monday.

According to diplomats, France, which first proposed the creation of the new team, and the United States, which back the idea, and Russia agreed to support him as a consensus candidate. China has yet to respond but is not expected to stand against him.

Belgium argues Pinchet release

LONDON — Six human rights organizations have written to the government of Belgium to go to court here Wednesday in a bid to prevent the expected release of former Chilean President Augusto Pinchet. The groups decided to bring a legal action now because they feared they would not be able to reach a judge fast enough to stop Pinchet from returning to Chile once an order to free him is issued.

Home Secretary Jack Straw said two weeks ago that he is "very willing" to let Pinchet return home to Chile without facing a trial on charges of torture and conspiracy brought by a magistrate in Spain. Acting on reports from a medical examination in Paris, the judge also said the 84-year-old former general was too sick to stand trial.

The human rights groups have challenged that conclusion and demanded a hearing into Pinchet's mental and physical condition. A hearing was scheduled for Wednesday morning.
Syracuse establishes safety programs

BY CAROLINE CHEN

Syracuse law enforcement is heeding the advice of New York State Gov. George E. Pataki and creating programs to better relate to and involve the community, Syracuse Police Department Chief Joe Cecile said. On Dec. 15, Pataki called for more interaction between local law enforcers and the public.

"We go to neighborhood watch meetings constantly," said Joe Cecile, a sergeant of the SPD's South Team Oriented Policing. "Triad works to build a trusting relationship between senior citizens and law enforcement by holding community meetings every two months."

SPD will host presentations at McKinley-Brighton Elementary School, 141 W. Newell St., beginning Feb. 9, explaining crime scene investigations, criminal law and hiring and training practices, Hierholzer said. Other events will include speakers, such as judges, he added.

In response to Pataki's announcement, Syracuse officials created the Triad program to reduce the number of crimes against the elderly.

"Triad started as a joint venture between the police, sheriffs and seniors to educate seniors on safety issues," said Arlene Bolton, vice chairperson of the Onondaga Triad and district coordinator of the American Association of Retired Persons Administration.

Forty-six states have established Triad branches, with New York being the 34th state to have a formal statewide agreement, said Cecile. SPD officer of community relations.

Several police departments take turns giving tips on WFLR-AM radio on ways seniors can protect themselves from crime, Pinksky said. The tips, which change every week, are broadcast twice a day, Bolton said.

Campus initiative

SPD and Syracuse University Public Safety are working together on the Neighborhood Patrol Initiative, which started at the beginning of the 1998 Fall Semester.

The initiative, which was arranged through a Westcott business development group, was the result of complaints from residents and homeowners in the Westcott area, Cecile said.

Complaints from the neighborhood have gone down dramatically as a result of the initiative, Cecile said.

During a three-month period in 1998, there were 52 phone calls from residents to the police. Cecile said. However, during that same time period in 1999, there were only 36 calls from residents, he said.

"It has definitely resulted in more communication between police and students," he said. "We try to educate students that the homeowner next door doesn't appreciate a party at 3 a.m."

Senior forehead major Kimberly Miller said she supports the neighborhood patrols.

"It's a privilege to live off campus," Miller said. "In a dorm room there were rules about noise. The same should apply to off campus."

Fifth-year architecture student Thor Nelson said he questions the values and ethics involved with the neighborhood patrols.

"I find it a problem when the university and the institution that claims to support the health and well-being of students pays police to find students guilty of crimes," Nelson said. "I think that the university should look to other ways rather than just make them fearful of the law."

IOWA

nounced his endorsement of Forbes, but his ideas do not necessarily reflect those of the College Republicans.

Taking 56.186 votes at Monday's caucus, Forbes is running the more organized and popular campaign, Burns said. McCain's lack of campaigning in Iowa helped the other candidates, he said.

"I really didn't think we would get much over 25 percent, but his campaign in Iowa was much better than McCain's," he said. "I think we surprised a ton of people." Burns added.

"Really just a couple days ago, he was looking at the same way Alan Keyes and Orrin Hatch were looked at — now he's a frontrunner."

SU's Youth for Forbes coordinator Chris Ryan said although Forbes did much better than what polls are indicating, he wasn't in his votes.

"It's a surprise, but it's not that much of a stretch because he put in a lot of work and money in the state," said Ryan, a sophomore political science major and broadcast journalism major.

Undecided Republican voters in New Hampshire will throw their support behind Forbes because of his strong Iowa showing, Ryan said.

"A third actively campaigning candidate would have divided the vote," he said, "but it gave Forbes a window to pick up steam going into New Hampshire."

The early Iowa and New Hampshire votes are not indicators of party nominations or elections, argued Christina Hinchee, president of the SU College Democrats.

Burns said he disagreed, noting that the Iowa Caucus and the New Hampshire primaries can be indicators of GOP outcomes.

Forbes' showing in Monday's vote is not an accurate telling of the Republican nominations because McCain did not make an active effort in the state, she said.

"I would be shocked if Steve Forbes gives George Bush that much of a run for his money," added Hinchee, a senior public relations and political science major.

"Bush has the party machine behind him. They say party politics is dead, but George Bush has the Republican Party machine behind him."

McCain's centrist views and Bush's reluctance to command a strong stance on abortion is attracting voters, Hinchee said.

"Americans lean toward centrist views," she said. "Basical- ly, that's how you win. That's how Clinton did it."

With the New York state primary more than one month away, no one can speculate any outcomes, Burns said.

"The media has been getting it wrong," she said. "It is only a two candidate Republican race with Bush and McCain," he said.

"Forbes is a real candidate."

EPA helps city schools to study Lake Onondaga

BY KEVIN TANIPONE
Staff Writer

Wastewater from surrounding communities and industrial has flowed into Onondaga Lake for more than 100 years. And the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and other community groups in the lake include lead, pesticides and mercury and lists the lake as one of the most polluted in the United States.

But the Syracuse City School District applied for a $300,000 EPA grant last April to study the lake and just weeks ago the city received it.

The pollution is intolerable and the Syracuse community must correct it through careful study and cleaning of the lake, said Steven Effler, a faculty member at the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry.

"This is certainly an area that needs accurate environmental information," Effler said. "It's an urban area that needs monitoring." To help realize this goal, the city school district plans to use their share of $3.4 million in EPA funding — distributed to 86 urban areas across the nation — to provide for floating instruments capable of measuring various factors indicating the general health of the water quality in Onondaga Lake, Effler said.

Researchers, students and others involved in the program will access the instruments from land-based computers and control where and when tests are conducted. The instruments will be placed in the lake and what aspects of the water the devices examine, he added.

"We see it as a combined research, management and education program," said Effler, who helped the city apply for the grant. "It's going to meet a variety of needs. It's a way for increasing components of the community to get involved in what's going on up here.

The school district began implementing the program this week, said Anthony Meggesto, assistant superintendent of city schools.

"There's a number of schools that have already expressed interest," Meggesto said. "It's something we're very excited about. We're developing curriculum so the students would be able to access science.

The program will involve students in grades kindergarten through 12 in several schools throughout Syracuse, Meggesto said. A committee began meeting this week to determine which school will house the program's computers and Meggesto said that he expects an announcement on participants later this spring.

The school district plans to develop study sites around the lake for all the schools in Syracuse involving the information available from the new technology, Meggesto said. The units will probably be located in schools and will focus on Onondaga Lake's condition and impact on the community, he said.

"It becomes relevant to our young people in the community we've been wanting to do for a lot of years," Meggesto said, "want to use the lake as kind of a science lab for students.

Although the money from the grant only provides funds for two years, it could continue indefinitely, Meggesto said.

"We'll already have the computers in place," he said. "I don't see any reason why we wouldn't continue if it's successful.

The Upstate Freshwater Institute, which is a non-profit research organization that monitors water quality throughout New York state, Syracuse University and the institute will help the school district in the technical aspects of the application process.

Those institutions will continue to help the school district in scientific areas of the program, said Effler, Upstate Freshwater Institute research director.

The important feature of the EPA's Environmental Monitoring for Public Access and Community Tracking Program, the project began in 1998 and each year provides millions of dollars for programs to improve the quality of our country's water.

Its goals include educating the general public and students about the environmental health of their area by providing data on a Web site centered at the institute and individual projects, according to EMPACT grant application guidelines.

"It's a competitive grant that was professionally advertised," Effler explained. "It focuses around innovative research and technology implementation.

In addition to providing the methods to collect scientific data, the project focuses on translating complex information into commonly used language for community members interested in studying the impact and improving environmental quality, according to application guidelines.

The money flowing out streams of thousands of numbers is of limited interest. One of the major challenges is communicating this information to the general public and the students," Effler said. "It's the old challenge of how to make it understandable and useful.

The information that the EPA's Website is for the entire community's use. Continuing to produce and distribute the Site for other purposes is either an EMPACT program, Effler said. Growing community activism about the lake is to its essential, he added.

"When the grant ends, we're not just going to roll it all up and stick it in the garage," Effler said. "We're going to find ways to keep it going and hopefully we'll eventually rely on components of the community to continue the program.

Onondaga Lake is potentially one of the area's most important assets and caring for it is in the community's responsibility, said Andrew Saunders, professor and research associate in environmental and forest biology at ESF. He think the community is concerned about the quality of the lake and we have a lot of money in it," Saunders said. "The school district and the mayor's office need to work together on this issue. The mayor's been in office a long time and they need to improve the quality of our lake.

"There's a whole panel of comments involved," Meggesto said. "It's mostly stupid, but I don't need to feel you're on the inequity that the gossip makes a person feel better. I can't prosecute people individually.

Mrs. Bernardi denied the allegations from the outset, but her attorney, Andrew Saunders, said she had an established job to do and I did it.

"I found the accusations to be true," he said. "I don't know where this came from. We've been prosecuted vigorously.

Fitzpatrick began the investigation independently after he received a phone call from a source who wanted to be assured that the mayor had a violent altercation with his wife, he said.

"I was interested in finding out if it was an organized effort of spreading gossip about public officials," he said. "If so, these individuals could be charged with criminal conduct.

Fitzpatrick would not speculate on who was behind the rumors, but said he has "confidences" that they are involved in spreading the rumors will most likely not be brought up on charges. The charges are likely to be related to the mayor's public statement about the rumor.

"There's a whole panel of comments involved," Fitzpatrick said. "It's mostly stupid, but I don't need to feel you're on the inequity that the gossip makes a person feel better. I can't prosecute people individually.

"I got a letter a couple of weeks ago from somebody who is absolutely convinced that I am covering up for the Mayor. But I had an established job to do and I did it.

WILLIAM J. FITZPATRICK
Onondaga County District Attorney and friend of Syracuse Mayor Day, Bernardi

For a three-year period, the Office of the Mayor has been inundated with phone calls from local journalists who have been contacted by anonymous sources detailing allegations of abuse, Parenti said. Unfortunately so much of our society is driven by gossip and there are people out there who have ulterior motives, the mayor said. "It's quite another to call the media day after day. I received a call after not much from such things as the major quit his job and is taking a position with Pataski, to allegations that he had abused his wife.

Parenti said he thinks the rumors could have been started by Bernardi's political enemies who seek to "tarnish the Mayor's polished image as a successful politician."

Since the investigation began in August, 2000, Fitzpatrick had said phone calls regarding the matter have stopped.

"The mayor's happy it's completed. We knew these rumors were false and malicious and would be found untrue," Parenti said. "We have involved learned something and realized that rumors and gossip is this nation's daily diet and do not belong in politics."
Senators dishevel college betting ban

When March Madness sweeps the campus this spring faster than a gust of wind, cross-town rivalries will pop up throughout dorm floors and offices. In the pages of this issue of The Daily Orange, the Battle for the Bottles and point spreads for major college basketball games.

These traditions may go the way of the underhand free-throw and thigh-hugging shorts if two U.S. Senators have their way. The High School and College Gambling Prohibition Act sponsored by Sens. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., and Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., seeks to eradicate any form of betting on amateur sports. It would also prohibit listing of point spreads in newspapers.

Wiping the amateur sports slate clean of all traces of gambling is a noble yet unrealistic goal. The NCAA has harshly punished the schools and their athletes. Careers have been ruined, schools' reputations have been damaged, and the future of college sports is in jeopardy.

Thoroughly against creating new laws, the government should look for ways to enforce the ones already on the books. When fixing or shaving occurs, such as at Northwestern University, Arizona State University and Boston College in recent years, the NCAA has harshly punished the schools and their athletes. Careers have never, in their long history, been so damaged, so tarnished, so torn apart.

The NCAA has proven that when teams and players violate the law, they will not be dealt with lightly, lending evidence that criminal investigations.

The federal government should take its ball and go play somewhere else.

Vegan activist dispels editorial 'misreadings'

As a committed vegan and longtime animal rights advocate, I feel compelled to respond to some of the misconceptions and misreadings that mark The Daily Orange's editorial in The Daily Orange on Jan. 28 on vegan activism. "Burger King attack fails at progress." First and foremost, activlists in the Animal Liberation Front have never, in their long history, committed acts of "violence" against living beings. Such acts are diametrically opposed to the ALF's fundamental conviction: violence should not be committed against animal products, the wearing of skin, or the practice of vivisection. ALF does, however, commit acts of illegal animal rescue and more to your point, property damage. I propose that the term goes beyond both self-defense and protection of innocent animals. There is, however, a difference between property damage and violence: if the result of a lab or the facing of a Murder King further the cause of animal liberation and prevents the further perpetration of violence, one can hardly call the ALFs tactics "violent." One ought to save that designation for the supposed "victims" of property damage.

I am equally concerned by your misreading of the legacy of Dr. Martin Luther King, who advocated public defiance of unjust laws; the ALF steps in to liberate the animals whose exploitation is protected by laws that must be kept research labs funded and public reservoirs at a minimum. Like King, the ALF is defending the natural rights of an unconfined unconscious just laws for just social ethics. I share your concern that such ethics are not lost on journalists like The D.O.'s, nor its readers.

Hands off the animals.

Grant funds audio player, enhances history archive

BY EVANS BOSTON  Contributing Writer

Students can soon close their textbooks and listen firsthand to famous speeches by 19th century celebrities and politicians. The Institute for Museum and Library Services in Washington, D.C. allocated a $158,976 grant last month to Syracuse University's Bird Library for the construction of an audio player with the ability to play extremely delicate audio cylinders from more than 100 years old.

The institute nicknamed the Radius Project, is expected to be completed in December, said Susan Stinson, Bird's Belfer Audio Laboratory and Archive curator.

Belfer was the first building in the United States designed for the preservation of sound recordings. Famous recordings from late 18th and early 19th century celebrities and U.S. presidents have been collected in the archive. Some fragile recordings on wax cylinders are extremely rare and valuable.

"I think it will be a little bit different. Instead of reading in books or listening to teachers' lectures, it's more interactive," said Jerome Viens, an undeclared sophomore who intends to major in history. "It's a different way of learning — from a firsthand source."

Some recordings include political speeches by 1925 Stoop's Monkey Trial attorney William Jennings Bryan and former U.S. presidents William Howard Taft and Theodore Roosevelt.

Bill Murphy, a U.S. history graduate student, teaches History 102. The class focuses on U.S. history since 1865.

"The recordings are very useful for teaching purposes," Murphy said. "If you have a recording of one of Bryan's or Roosevelt's speeches and you're telling students about it, it's great to be able to have them actually listen to it."

"It's a great way of bringing things home to students a little more."

Murphy said his area of expertise rarely gets that opportunity.

"People dealing with 20th century history have a lot of material — JFK's speeches, FDR's fireside chats, the kind of things you can't really do with late 19th century and early 20th century stuff," he said.

A U.S. history graduate student Jim Eichsteadt added that the Radius Project will attract more visiting professors and scholars to the campus, as well as being useful to SU students.

"It's great for more than just history students," he said. "It's great for the whole university to be able to use historical recordings like that."

"There won't be a line of students outside (Belfer) tomorrow, but it's certainly a good investment," Eichsteadt added. "For any field, more is better when it comes to having access to material."

The century-old audio cylinders are rarely ever played due to the high risk of permanently damaging the recordings. With the help of the grant, the archive will be able to play and remaster SU's collection, the second largest audio archive in the nation — succeeded only by the U.S. Library of Congress, the SU Office of National Media Relations said.

"The machine will use weak laser beams to restore "fractured" playback of the recordings, creating no marks and leaving the brittle wax cylinders untouched," Stinson said. Once completed, the Radius Project will begin the process of copying the recordings to analog tape and then to digital quality for distribution.

Belfer holds more than 22,000 cylinders, and more than 300,000 individual sound recordings. The archive began its collection in the 1980s and early 1990s, with the majority of the cylinders donated to Bird in 1993.

Martha Hanson, SU library preservation administrator and Belfer director, helped found the Radius Project in 1996. The project begins with Stinson, three SU professors of electrical and computer engineering — Burt Harold, William Penn and Frederick Phelps — and engineering students. Hanson then continued to pursue the grant to help with the costs, Media Relations said.

The Institute for Museum and Library Services is an independent federal agency that aids educational benefits in museums and libraries across the country. SU was one of 50 recipients nationwide to receive a grant from the institute this year.

"This is a very expensive, yet very unique effort," Stinson said. "We have so many recordings here, it is almost impossible to find a way to put our archive to use."

Some of Belfer's rarest recordings include early 20th century actor D'Wolfgang Hopper, perhaps best known for the first public recitation of the poem "Casey at the Bat." The collection also contains a cylinder, circa 1905, of internationally-known opera singer Adelina Patti. Popular jazz and folk music are also included in the archive, as well as recordings of foreign language dialects that were originally used during the country's mass immigration from Europe during the late 19th century.

"These cylinders represent the first documentation and dissemination of the sounds of a bygone era," Stinson said.

"I think that this is a historical artifacts collection," Stinson said. "It is a very important window to an important time in America. It should be very interesting and exciting."

Experience a little uncommon courtesy. A lot has been said about how enjoyable it is to buy a new Saturn. Well, just to let you know, things don’t change after you become an owner. We still go out of our way to make you happy. Sometimes that means returning your car clean after an oil change. Sometimes it means lending you a hand if you lock yourself out of your car. (Oh, admit it, you’ve done it before.) But mostly it’s just about common courtesy. And when you think about it, that kind of courtesy is far too uncommon.

Syracuse University College of Law will mark National Minority Law Student Recruitment Month with a Visitor Program open to undergraduate minority students who wish to learn more about law school.

National Minority Law Recruitment Month at Syracuse University College of Law is funded by the Law School Admission Council (LSAC) to raise awareness of minority recruiting issues facing law schools.

What: Visitor Program for Undergraduate Students of Color

When: Friday, February 11, 2000, 9:00 a.m. - 1:00 p.m.

Where: Syracuse University College of Law

The Program will include:
- Reception with Dean Daan Braveman
- Attendance in a first year law class
- Presentation by current law school students on preparing for law school
- Presentation by an alumna who will share her personal experiences of law school and the legal profession
- Presentation by Gina Boll, Director of Financial Aid, on financial preparation for law school
- Lunch with current law students

College grads head back to the classroom with Teach for America.

BY ANTHONY SOLAZZO
Contributing Writer

Last September, 1,400 recent college graduates hit the books — again.

Armed with undergraduate degrees ranging from English to engineering, these graduates joined the ranks of the Teach for America program. Jumping into teaching positions in the often understaffed classrooms of urban and rural schools across America, they will spend the next two years helping in teaching the educational experience of children nationwide.

Teach For America presents an unusual opportunity for students interested in exploring careers in public service and education, but who aren't pursuing degrees in education. Students accepted into the program are selected after some training, to one of 13 regions in the United States, from the inner cities of New York and Los Angeles to the rural flatlands of the Mississippi Delta. Sprinkled in classrooms across the nation, the corps members work with students in both elementary and secondary schools.

While some newly-liberated students opt to take jobs in a field specific to their major, others prefer to take some time to explore different careers and seek out new opportunities. By the way, the most fit 400-pound, 19-year-old he has ever seen, so heed my advice.

A final suggestion for beating those back-to-college sicknesses is to exercise. I thought for a healthy diet is Easy Cheese on anything. The way, my doctor says I am the most fit 400-pound, 19-year-old he has ever seen, so heed my advice.

Generic American offers handy health tips

Well, we are at the beginning of a new semester here at SU, or Snow Unlimited, for those of you new to upstate New York. And at the beginning of every semester, we come back with full wallets and bellies thanks to Mommy and Daddy. But we bring other things back to school with us, and I am not talking about the new Mandy Moore/Britney Spears/Christina Aguilera compilation CD. I am talking about sickness.

In case you haven't noticed, college dorms especially — is a haven for bacteria. Bugs are all over the place, and by bugs I don't mean the three-foot proving mantis you have living under your bed, feeding on Domino's crust and spilled Amaretto. Yours truly has a nagging cold that just won't go away. I think I picked it up during that game of ultimate-drunk-take-drunk frisbee Saturday night on the Quad, but who knows. Anyway, I think I have a few crisp ideas to keep your thoughts off of your ailments.

Something that always works for me when I get a little under the weather is to drink plenty of liquids. But, last year I made a mistake and figured that pounding gallon after gallon of Gatorade would make me strong enough to run thousands of yards and slay my ex-wife's throat. Alas, my C in Nutrition shows how much I know about the subject. So, if you want to forget about your cold and be spending all day in the john, go right ahead.

They also say that a good night's rest can do wonders for the sick. If you're really want to utilize this strategy, say you have mono. I know you won't get much sleep from your girlfriend, but sleeping 19 hours a day does sound pretty tempting. The only thing I haven't figured out is how to fake a blood test, but don't worry gang. I'm working on it.

I heard the other day that there is some kind of spiral meningitis going around. I don't know what the deal is with this one, but if it gets me out of my intro to Romanticism course, hey, I'm up for it.

I guess doctors also recommend that you eat healthy when you're under the weather. Well, I guess doctors haven't ever seen our dining halls. I know that penicillin is good for you when you are ill, but I don't like ingesting it when it's growing on my meatloaf. My suggestion for a healthy diet is Easy Cheese on anything. The way, my doctor says I am the most fit 400-pound, 19-year-old he has ever seen, so heed my advice.

As for myself, I am going to fix myself the old fashioned way — by tripping on my usual dose of Nyquil and passing out on the floor.

be in a completely different city or state with lots of people to support you," said Aisha Carter, a Trinity University graduate now stationed in a Houston Teach for America program.

Since the program doesn't require participants to have a teaching certificate, Teach for America appeals to students of all academic disciplines. Instead, college graduates of all educational backgrounds can donate their time and expertise to educating the nation's youth.

What the corps members lack in practical teaching experience, however, they offer in dedication and community spirit. The majority of the corps members are placed in schools with other members, so they can collaborate when necessary.

The members are profoundly affected by their classrooms' experience and are serious about making a difference, said Yael Aufgang, a University of Pennsylvania graduate and current program member in the South Bronx.

Aufgang said the experience has exposed him to a different side of life. "I didn't have much hands-on work with people in poor neighborhoods before the program," he said. "But I'm learning a lot as I go along."

Broading horizons

The Teach for America program counts alumni from nearly every college in the nation, from Stanford University to the University of Chicago to Syracuse University. To be considered for acceptance, the applicant must have a Bachelor's Degree and a minimum cumulative GPA of 2.5. Because Teach For America is affiliated with the national service program AmeriCorps, applicants must also be a U.S. citizen. While this restriction is limiting, the program's coordinators aim to build a diverse corps ethnically, racially and culturally.

Upon acceptance to the program, corps members are sent to Houston for a five week crash course in education. During this rigorous training period, the participants really have to take advantage of their time and learn, Aufgang said.

While many of the areas participating in the Teach For America program are remote, corps members are not randomly assigned. The participants are asked for their teaching location preferences, but they are also encouraged to be flexible when making their choices. Applicants are asked to consider new areas of the country to live in, and salary is based upon this decision. Corps members earn a regular, full-time teacher's salary and benefits paid by their respective school districts.

Annual pay ranges anywhere from $20,000 to $34,500. After taxes, rent, transportation and utilities are deducted from these salaries, the net pay for a year falls between $11,500 and $7,100.

Most students interested in the program, however, are not concerned with the financial aspects of it. If participants selected jobs within their chosen field of study, most would be making more than a starting teacher's salary. Teach For America President Wendy Kopp attributes the overwhelming interest in the program to the growing desire of students to make a difference fresh out of college.

"I thought that I could make a more significant impact on people by working directly behind them, rather than sitting behind a desk or a computer for ten hours a day," said Aufgang, who studied sociology during his years at UPenn.

Long lessons

Although most of the corps members do not enter the program with education backgrounds, many remain in the field in one way or another after their two-year tenure. Mark Levin-Suarez, a New York City corps member from 1991 to 1993, started a credit union in the community he worked in to address unfair economic conditions. And Martin Winchester, another corps alumnus, recently received a $1 million grant to begin a charter school in the Rio Grande Valley, where he completed his initial teaching experience.

"Teach For America can cultivate a generation of citizens that not only longs to redress the inequities in America, but one that has educated itself in how exactly to do so," said Michael Johnston, a New Orleans program alumnus.

This group was formed in 1989 as the brainchild of then-Princeton University senior, Wendy Kopp. As her senior thesis, Kopp proposed that a national corps of teachers, from different academic fields, be created to dedicate two years to teaching in the country's most under-privileged schools. Working with a grant, Kopp was able to kickstart her operation shortly after graduation.

In its first year, 1,500 people applied for 500 positions. School districts in six different areas hired the corps members as beginning teachers, while $2.5 million was given by foundations and corporations to cover the program's expenses.

During its ten years of existence, Wendy Kopp has retained the helm of the Teach For America program, and has overseen 6,000 teachers lead classes in schools across the United States. The program has been kept afloat by almost $600 million in grants from foundations, individuals and the federal government. In addition, the program hopes to expand its service into five new regions within the next two years, Johnston said.

"If Teach For America succeeds in its mission, we will go on to lead a generation that is characterized by service, not as a hobby or recreation, but as a lifestyle."

A quartet of the Panthers players scored in double digits. Entering the game, only freshman Amanda Wittenmeyer (15 points) was averaging more than 10 per contest. But guards Gina Montesano and Monique Toney combined for 31 points, including 4-for-4 on 3-pointers.

In the face of Pitt’s solid play, Perry bailed out an Orange women team that struggled in its offensive sets throughout the first half.

Pittsburgh matched the 5-foot-5 Toney against Perry and SU’s gritty guard used her size advantage on the interior. They had Toney on me, and she just posted up a couple of times,” Perry said. “They weren’t watching the back side, and I just snuck in off the pick.”

Perry continued her strong showing in the final 20 minutes with a quick layup. But on SU’s next possession she bailed herself as she reached for the basketball on a Jasmine Wright (14 points) miss.

Perry, also battling tendinitis in her knees, re-entered the game with a little more than 12 minutes remaining.

The wounded Aziz saw some action as well, playing just two minutes. But neither averages 100 percent. The Panthers had already regained the moment in the quick-eight-point burst.

After the game, Perry said the Syracuse trainer could not diagnose whether or not she sustained a concussion.

Beth Record, who leads SU and the Big East in scoring, tried to rally her mates by registering a double-double with a career-high 40 minutes in rebounding in 37 minutes. Jamie Donaghy scored 25 points and 40 minutes and dropped in 10 points for Syracuse.

In the game’s final minutes, however, fatigue hindered the Orange women, and they wilted to the Pittsburgh onslaught.

“I think we tried to rush a lot of stuff,” Perry said. “Pitt played a lot of players. They are a very good team.”

he led both SU and the SkyChiefs in 1988 and joined PBS as a sideline reporter during the 1991 NCAA Tournament.

From there, the Massachusetts native got through stints with the New England Sport Network, ESPN, Fox in Boston and ESPN. He reached his goal of being a network sportscaster, landing with CBS in 1990.

People associated McDonough’s voice with everything from college athletics to the major league baseball.

But despite all the experience, he said some of his favorite games come from World Series games. McDonough called both the 1993 World Series when Joe Carter beat Philadelphia with a home run and the 1990 Series in 1993 when LSU won four straight.

Between the two world series, he said, only three times in the total combined history, it ever happened in the same year. He said McDonough, who called Monday night’s SU-Conn game as a guest broadcast in 1993, was living in Minnesota at the time. “I had a chance to do two out of three, so that was kind of an experience.”

But McDonough won’t be on CBS during the contract expired at the end of last year and was not renewed.

The reason, he said, was the hiring of Dick Enberg at NBC, Enberg’s arrival was ironic, as McDonough admired Enberg’s and Mike Francesa’s style of broadcasting.

“I thought they were great storytellers, and I think that’s what really supposed to do,” McDonough said. “We’re supposed to educate our viewers about who are out there on the field.”

“What their backgrounds were. What’s going on in their team. That’s what those guys do, and that’s what I try to do.”

In addition to his work at CBS, McDonough also gained recognition as the play-by-play announcer for the Red Sox on the NESN television network the last 17 years.

Being from Massachusetts, McDonough grew up around the Red Sox. His father, Will, was a player for the Boston Globe, and often took him to spring training and left him with the team’s radio booth while he wrote his stories.

McDonough’s wish came true, as his picture now hangs with those of Bob Costas, Dick Stockton and Mike Tirico on the shrine of alum.

“When I came here, that was sort of the dream, that someday when they listed off the names of the famous sportscasters, they said here, that they would throw my name into the list,” he said. “It seemed like a validation that I had done something worthwhile in my professional life, and I really, many renowned people of broadcasting, he said, would know him.

PITTSBURGH — With 17:46 left to play in Syracuse's battle with Pitt on Tuesday night, a loud thud echoed through a quiet Fitzgerald Field House.

Orangewomen freshman Shannon Persinger said to the ground after she skied to grab a rebound, unable to help hold back the Panthers.

Shannon was phenomenal tonight, and when she came out of the game, we fell apart. And we shouldn't have," Syracuse coach Marianna Freeman said.

"We are a much better team than that. It was a lack of effort, and we gave up.

When Perry left the game, SU owned a 44-36 lead thanks to a 7-0 run to start the second half. But the Orangewomen appeared to run out of gas down the stretch.

Syracuse center Leigh Aziz played sparingly with a sore left foot. With the reigning Big East Rookie of the Week joining her on the pine, SU (8-9, 1-4 Big East) had just seven players at full strength.

Pittsburgh (12-6, 3-4), on the other hand, shuffled 11 different players in and out of the tussle, with 10 of them scoring as they wore down the Orangewomen.

"We just kept trying to rotate people around to find what worked," Pitt head coach Traci Waites said. "When we did, we just kept going and never looked back. But I think at the end we wanted it more and played a more..."

When, in 1906, builders laid the last bricks of the innovative John D. Archbold Stadium in place, they also laid the groundwork for years to come of the role of women at Syracuse University.

Although SU was the first college in New York state to be coeducational since its founding in 1870, women have and continue to struggle for their place on the Hill.

With a 10 p.m. curfew and explicit instructions in the 1903-04 student handbook, the women of SU from 1900 to 1910 learned to follow the rules. "Never let a door close in the faces of women or of the faculty," the handbook reads. "Never smoke on the campus, in the athletic field or when in the presence of women."

Today, men and women live together in residence halls throughout campus, attend classes together and cheer on the Orangemen in the Carrier Dome together side by side.

In 1901, the Orangemen were extended to include women with the first mention of women's basketball in the student handbook. However, according to records compiled by the SU department of women's studies, the women's team disappeared from subsequent handbooks until later that decade.

But the women of SU from 1900 to 1910 developed and created social and educational organizations for women on campus, several of which were the first of their kind at U.S. colleges.

From 1906 to 1909, women and men formed the Women's League, a group later known as the Women's Student Governing Association. The group was responsible for legislation, administration, student conduct, rules and disciplinary action among women at SU.

To further in every way the spirit of unity of the women of the University, to increase their sense...

In 1919, the United States was recovering from the losses it sustained during World War I. The nation readied to replace President Woodrow Wilson. Citizens unknowingly entered a decade of unprecedented economic prosperity and social change — the Roaring Twenties. And Americans prepared to drink their last legal drops of alcohol.

The House of Representatives and the Senate passed the 18th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution that year, and the states ultimately ratified the ruling as well. According to the mandates of that amendment, "the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors ... is hereby prohibited."

On Jan. 16, 1920, the cause that generations of Americans had fought for — a ban on alcohol — became a reality. Ultimately, 13 states had fought for — a ban prohibited.

But the effort to ban alcohol — or the temperance movement — didn't gain attention at the national level until after the Civil War, said Elisabeth Lasch-Quinn, an SU history professor.

By the end of the Civil War, drinking laws were strictly criticized by the public. Most of the state bans on alcohol sales were modified, repealed or ignored, Clark said.

For many years, alcohol consumption experienced few restraints.

"Soon there were more than 100,000 saloons in the country, or about one for every 400 people," Clark said. "They became increasingly competitive for the drinkers' wages. Many of them permitted gambling, prostitution, sales to minors, public drunkenness and violence."

The effects of the unrestricted bar-rooms, like loss of earnings due to gambling, became a focal point for the people who began to fight against alcohol — especially women.

Frances Willard, a 19th Century feminist and a leader of the temperance movement, played one of the most crucial roles in transforming the alcohol issue from one that was dealt with in private homes to a national — to an international movement.

In 1879, Willard became president of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. During her time there, she helped convert the temperance movement from a national to an international move-ment. In 1862, she helped establish the Pro-temperance movement.

Hendricks Chapel, which builders completed in 1930, serves as a central place of worship for students of all faiths.

Built high above a thriving industrial city in 1873, Syracuse University was dubbed “The Chapel on the Hill.” Erected by the Methodist church, the college was intended to serve as a shining beacon to those searching for educational and spiritual enlightenment in the Methodist tradition. Today, however, an SU education comes hand-in-hand with the opportunity to worship in a wide variety of religious faiths.

Chancellor James R. Day, a Methodist minister who served SU from 1894 to 1922, came to Piety Hill with a mission. Addressing university trustees early in his tenure, he explained his intentions to mesh religious observance with the educational process. The two, he believed, were intrinsically linked and equally necessary to a successful college career.

“We exact nothing but sound morals and good work ... without gallinness, learning will fail,” he said.

Chancellor Day, Hendricks Chapel Dean Thomas Wolf said, was a revolutionary thinker for the era. While he advocated the continued celebration of Methodist tradition within the university, he preached the importance of inclusiveness as a basic church tenant. Since Christianity embodies a general spirit of hospitality, Day said, all people should be welcome at SU.

During Day’s inaugural address in 1894, he emphasized that although SU was born of the Methodist faith, he hoped it to be holistically Christian rather than denominational.

“It will be a university Christian enough to make a Hebrew as much at home as a Christian, to afford equal facility to Catholic and Protestant,” Day said.

“There is no creed in mathematics or in natural science. Syracuse University will be a brain manufacturer, taking its material from all sources of usable brains.

“It will be Christian not by exclusion, but by indu-

The Roaring '20s quieted and the Great Depression arrived. A new era tightened its grip on the United States and those who were previously content found themselves unemployed.

But President Franklin D. Roosevelt began to wield his New Deal policies to restore confidence in a jobless country. The Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs moved into a building of its own to discuss those policies and students at Syracuse University began to question an astringent unspoken policy — women's inequality with men.

Students at SU were Roosevelt-supporting New Dealers, said Chester Hansen, Sr., who enrolled in Maxwell in 1936. They had confidence in the government and believed strongly in the president's pledge to pull the country from economic despair, he said.

"It was a time of belief," said Hansen, who would later hire the first woman editor in chief for The Daily Orange. "Whatever we believed in, we believed it strongly. We took great pleasure out of that."

Hansen transferred to SU as a sophomore after a year of taking night classes at New York University and a job working at a city bank. The political science major accepted a scholarship working as a delivery man, delivering copies of the D.O. to academic halls and residences each morning.

"I had a $50 a month job, so I got in my $75 automobile and drove up," he said.

Hansen spent the next three years studying political science in Maxwell, an institution he said fostered the national and international awareness of the 1930s.

"Maxwell helped us find out what was going on in the world," he said. "We were all involved in politics unlike most of the kids right now. The school helped us sustain those interests."

GIs FLOCK BY THE THOUSANDS TO THE SALT CITY SEEKING EDUCATION. ALMOST OVERNIGHT, SU SCRAMBLES TO ACCOMMODATE THEM. BY DANIELLE KOST STAFF WRITER

Much sat still on the front line — scared, dirty and tired. Bomb shells flew overhead, men fell dead around him, reminding him that he was human. • For Col. Lewington Ponder, this was his first five minutes of combat in World War II. • "I think most of us were naive,"

Ponder said of his fellow soldiers. "We knew people were going to get killed and wounded but none of us thought it would be one of us."

Ponder, 76, joined the war effort immediately after graduating from Syracuse University in 1943. He fought through Europe in the infantry, meeting Russian soldiers in Austria on May 5, 1945 — the war's end.

Just a year earlier, President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed the Servicemen’s Readjustment Act of 1944, guaranteeing GI s one free year of college or vocational training for each 90 days of service and one additional month of paid education for each month of service up to 48 months. The bill was meant to help returning soldiers ease into civilian life. Millions of veterans would take the opportunity, altering higher education in the process, especially at SU.

When the war ended, New York state Governor Thomas E. Dewey asked New York state schools to welcome back returning GIs. Many university officials scoffed, but Chancellor William Price Tolley vowed to make SU, a small $200-a-semester college with 6,000 students, a haven for returning GI s. He even loosened entrance standards to allow high school dropouts to catch up.

"It was a relatively sleepy, little place — it transformed the ambience of the university. SU became a major player," said Ron Cavanagh, current vice-president of undergraduate studies.

Enrollment boomed the following year. More than 7,000 veterans attended SU in 1946 with almost 10,000 attending in 1947, according to SU records. Total enrollment peaked in 1948 at 19,698 before leveling — nearly six times the enrollment in 1943. About 80 percent of the players on the 1947 football team were GI veterans. Veterans made up half of the student body in 1946.

"This is higher education's most crucial period," Tolley said in 1946. "It has a responsibility to American youth which it must meet. Regardless of the risks involved, we at Syracuse will do all in our power to educate the veteran and non-veteran. We don't know how we're going to do it, but we'll do it."

Between 1945 and 1950, the GI Bill sent about 2.2 million veterans to college. SU had the highest GI enrollment in New York state.

"For them, it was the excitement of having made it through World War II and to have this kind of opportunity in a society that felt no limits," Cavanagh said.

After serving as an army nurse during the war, Barbara Novotny Barnett, 76, used the GI Bill as a chance to study education and public health. School was a welcomed change from the 12-hour days she spent nursing wounded soldiers in an August, Ga., orthopedic unit.

War left them wiser, older and more mature. Like Barnett, many lived apart from the rest of the student body on campus and were not held to restrictions such as curfew.

If they created the coaching mastermind on the first day and made the golden quarterback on the second, they surely molded the perfect tailback on the third.

The gridiron gods conjured up a fierce warrior — redwood thighs, hands the size of hubcaps and a chunk of Soldier Field sod glued to his face mask.

They blessed him with Peyton's durability, Sanders' jives and jives, Campbell's speed, Sayers' toughness and Simpson's nose for the end zone.

They would also give him bulky shoulder pads, tight-fitting metal cleats and, to cover the battle gear, a flimsy nylon jersey.

With a No. 44 on the back.

In the 1950s, with Syracuse's suburbs filling up with football-craving GIs, No. 44 took SU football from gory to glory. It brought three Lambert Trophies, seven All-Americans and, the decade's crowning jewel, a 1959 national championship. It made a new coach's radical I-formation and offensive attitude work in the face of harsh criticism.

But most of all, it dragged an unwilling campus and a burgeoning community on a fun-filled, life-changing 100-yard drive to national fame. The city changed the campus phone extensions and the postal codes to reflect the number. A sports bar also sprung from the figure, two digits soon to be meaningful to more than just orange pom-pom wavers on Piety Hill.

It started a legend, the legend of No. 44.

And No. 44 began with two men.

Daily Orange Editor Elizabeth Donnelly gains widespread attention as the nation's first female editor of a major college newspaper, the D.O.

BY RYAN DONOHUE STAFF WRITER

In 1965, a handmade banner saying simply "God is dead" hung from the roof of Huntington Beard Crouse, flapping against the side of the building in the wind.

Conditions at Syracuse University were ripe for the daily's burial. With anti-Vietnam War sentiment rising, it became harder to side with any kind of establishment. People more than 30 years old were not to be trusted, and Christ was nearly 2000. The message was the ultimate sign of the times for a generation of students who had largely, sometimes violently, rejected the culture of their parents.

It signified the mid-point in a decade of change. SU, like many other colleges in the United States, was experiencing a rising tide of student awareness that something was wrong with the way the world worked. That span of 10 years left a legacy of mistrust of authority, political awareness and maybe most importantly for future students — the idea that the university was not in complete control.

Witness another banner that hung from the Hall of Languages in 1959, with an equally pithy message: "Fuck NATO."

Beyond disco and the hordes of polyester clothing of the 1970s, a new way of thinking emerged that would change the landscape of how technology and information were perceived.

In 1974, Syracuse University's School of Library Science changed its name to the School of Information Studies and Technology under the leadership of then-Dean Robert S. Taylor. However, the name change needed faculty, administrative and alumni approval first. Taylor was ultimately placed in charge of the committee, and is credited with facilitating the new name.

But more important than a name change was the technological direction in which the school, and SU, was going. IST would ultimately become one of the first institutions nationally to break away from the world of library science into the world of information technology—and computers.

"SU was the leader," said Marta Davis, who received her master's in library science in 1973. Davis became an information broker. She would advertise her skills on the radio, in print and by word-of-mouth. She was one of the nation's first in her field, getting hired to track down figures and quotes—whatever a client's heart desired.

Davis played her role of data mercenary for a year and a half until she switched careers to work in film production.

"I had no intention of being a librarian," Davis said. "I couldn't even stand to read a library catalog".

The curriculum changed drastically, said Susan Markowitz, who received her master's degree from SU in 1978 and is now a library director at Cornell University. "I was in the very first database class."

Computers are now the norm for students, but back in the '70s, they were only reserved for computer science majors and those interested in the technical aspects of the machines.

Prior to 1974, the School of Library Science offered only one type of degree—a master's in library science. Now, IST offers three degrees: information resources management, telecommunication management and networking.

The addition of the new majors drew the interest of students who weren't necessarily interested in being librarians.

SPORTS HAVE ALWAYS BEEN DEEPLY INGRAINED IN THE FABRIC OF SU CULTURE. BUT IN 1987, SPORTS BECAME THE CULTURE.

Markus Paul stood in the Syracuse locker room, exhausted and jubilant. It was Oct. 17, 1987. The free safety and the rest of his Syracuse mates just finished blasting eastern rival Penn State 48-21, creating pandemonium in the Carrier Dome and throughout the SU campus.

Across the sea of celebratory bodies, Paul saw his defensive backfield mate, strong safety Jeff Mangram. The two made their way through the locker room frenzy and gave each other the requisite congratulatory embrace.

Then Paul noticed something strange — they were both totally naked.

"I was like, 'Wait a minute now. What's going on here?'" Paul said with a laugh.

What was going on was the best 13 months in the history of Syracuse University athletics, and Paul and Mangram weren't the only ones to get caught up in the moment that they sometimes forgot — or didn't realize — just what they were doing.

It would have been impossible for anyone to know they were entering the pinnacle of SU sports history when the 1986-87 basketball season tipped off on Nov. 29, 1986, with a game against Loyola of Chicago. However, between that day and Jan. 1, 1988 — when the Orangemen football team took on Auburn in the Sugar Bowl — Syracuse found itself with a basketball team in the NCAA national championship game, an undefeated football team in a New Year's Day bowl game, a Heisman Trophy runner-up, a new legion of fans and a prominent national identity.

"It was the most exciting time in Syracuse sports in recent memory," ESPN and ABC broadcaster and SU graduate Mike Tirico said. "It's hard to find a year to rival that one from an athletic standpoint at Syracuse."

CHANCELLOR KENNETH A. SHAW ENVISIONS SU AS THE NATION'S LEADING STUDENT-CENTERED RESEARCH UNIVERSITY.

By Aileen E. Gallagher Staff Writer

Kenneth A. Shaw wasn't looking for Syracuse University. SU came looking for him.

It was 1990 and Shaw was president of the University of Wisconsin, responsible for all the schools in the large state system. "They contact you and you do a little dance. I wasn't very interested," Shaw said of SU's offer.

He was a world away from a mid-sized private university in Central New York. But the relationship that began with "a little dance," would grow until Shaw was the chancellor of SU, charged with leading the school through a period of significant change.

Shaw came to SU at a precarious time in the school's history. Retiring Chancellor Melvin Eggers had carried SU through a period of wide-scale growth. The construction of the Carrier Dome, the Schine Student Center and the Sci-Tech building changed the face of the campus, and in all, 19 structures were erected by SU between 1970 and 1989.

The economic boom of the mid-1980s also caused SU's student population to increase, and the amount of faculty and staff on campus increased with it. SU grew until the end of the decade, when a recession caused enrollment to level off.

"We had an '80s bubble and then a contraction," said Robert Van Gulick, a philosophy professor who served on the University Senate for several years. "When that deflated, we were left with the fact that we had 20 percent less students and 20 percent less tuition.

SU gleans about two-thirds of its revenue from undergraduate tuition.

In the summer of 1991, shortly before Shaw's arrival on campus, Eggers formed a committee to examine the university's financial issues. The news was not good.

"It was apparent that we faced a large deficit if nothing changed, projected at between $30 to $40 million," Shaw said. "But the committee also had some optimism.

Women during the early part of the 20th century participated in Elaborate May Day events such as this.

Karen DeCrow, a Jamesville resident and former 1972 SU Student of the Year graduate, said that students today do not have the issues to fight for, but would present with diverse issues like students from her and Murphy's generation.

DeCrow has long been a public advocate for women's rights. Serving as the president of the National Organization for Women from 1974 to 1977, she brought women's rights issues to the attention of people in this area simply by being a Central New York native, she said.

"It was a time of progressive change, this area has always been surrounded and supported by the state's women's rights groups," she said.

An independent lawyer specializing in employment law, gender, and age discrimination and civil liberties DeCrow was the only woman in her class of more than 200 women for three years as a law student.

"I was moved to action by the issues of my day, but I think we surprised was there but they accepted me," she said.

Regardless, my face is easy to spot on the law school composite," DeCrow said with a laugh.

At the time, DeCrow was aware of her unique position as the only woman among hundreds of men, but it was years later when she became a public figure.

In 1960, DeCrow ran for the position of Syracuse mayor, while still enrolled in law school. She was the first woman in New York state to run for a mayor's office.

"I was not the first and I am not the last woman to take strides among them," she said, noting that female professors were employed at SU as early as 1917.

Since her time at SU, the female faculty at the university has nearly doubled, but DeCrow agreed with Murphy that SU still has a lack of women in its administration.

Serving as the university Senate committee on women's concerns, Murphy and the committee urged Chancellor Shaw two years ago to search for a woman to fill the position of vice chancellor and provost to replace Carolyn Viso. Shaw responded this summer by hiring Deborah Freund, former vice chancellor of academic affairs and dean of the faculties at Indiana University at Bloomington.

"Syracuse University was doing what was going on all over the country, they were slowly changing their ways, but it would take time and it has," she said.

"I have changes in views about women's issues have drastically evolved in the last century, culminating in family and student success," like Murphy and DeCrow, but graduates like Ruth Colter from the SU class of 1913, still remember when times were different.

Colter, who was born in 1923 and attended SU from 1909 to 1913 attended private school before her time in Central New York.

"My private school was very big on what today would be called an education," she said Colter, who now lives in Vermont.

Like Murphy and DeCrow, Colter reiterated that SU was ahead of its time for its views on women's issues.

"In fact, it was very good when it came to women for that time," she said. "Obviously, we are better off now."

Many of the nation's 200 Catholic colleges struggle to determine whether to remain tied to the institutions forever, Wolfe said. As colleges built monetary endowments and attended more students, they became capable of standing on their own, without fiscal support from the church.

“Is like birth — the church gave birth to these colleges, and eventually, growth,” he said. “The institutions gain enough momentum to shed their umbilical cord, they go out of their own sense of spirituality, embrace other religions.”

Coincidentally, Wolf noted, the last several Hendricks Chapel deans have been United Methodists. In addition, four current members of the SU Board of Trustees are Methodists, including Hsung-Kim, the Central New York United Methodist leader.

Prior to Day’s installation, university administration discussed the possibility of allowing Hendricks Chapel to be Methodist. Now, chapel deans can be ordained in any religion as long as they maintain their association with the church, they put a school.”

Wolfe said, Methodist Colleges struggled to decide whether to remain church-sponsored or establish independent units. “We have a value system of needing to learn, asking questions about one’s faith. We want students to feel comfortable here,” he said.

Each campus religious group maintains a fellowship within the community, Lang said. Not surprisingly, the challenge of catering to a large number of religious and spiritual traditions has forced Hendricks Chapel to establish its own identity and design programming to suit its unique needs.

“Hendricks Chapel is a place of reconciliation,” Lang said. “It’s essentially large for a private, secular university, said Brian Kaminsky, Hillel director. But Jews have an interfaith student community, he said, noting that while other universities placed quotes the home front, a second world war loomed on the horizon. Maxwell, founded in 1924, found enrollment increasing as its reputation began to spread around campus that a new building may soon be needed.

A possible creation of Maxwell Hall became publicly known in 1932 when Chancellor Charles Wesley Flint spoke of the death of alumnus George H. Maxwell and the allocution of his fortune.

On Sept. 27, the D.O. published a statement by a student confirming the availability of funds to erect the building in the name of its benefactor.

"A ample provision has been made to meet all their commitments to the School of Citizenship and Public Affairs in the matter of the endowment and building, the final conclusion awaited only more favorable general financial conditions," Flint said.

Construed using the $500,000 endowment, the largest ever received by the university at the time, Maxwell Hall opened in October 1937 and was dedicated a month later by President Herbert Hoover.

The building was built in the colonial style, with the most impressive part of the building being the lobby off the main entrance. Boasted an alumni newsletter commemorating the 75th anniversary of the hall.

It is a wonder that construction ever began, a result of the unwavering commitment by Mrs. Maxwell to celebrate her husband's faith in the nedelin 1903. Maxwell Senior Associate Dean Robert Cluro said.

It was there that Donnelly met a budding young editor named Chester Hansen. The two became good friends. A year later, Hansen became editor of The Orange in who would become the editor in chief since 1903. Donnelly began to write for the paper.

She debated public policy at Maxwell, Donnelly began at the D.O. to challenge the unwritten policy, at SU and beyond, of restricting women's rights.

The university ultimately had discretion to become the editor in chief since the D.O. did not become independent until 1971. But Hansen said he pulled for Donnelly, knowing that if she were hired, a new policy regarding gender would be made.

"I used to joke with Betty and tell her that the biggest mistake God ever made was to take the rib out of Adam and begin the female gender," Hansen said. "Women knew their place at the time, but Betty came along and inundated the feminist movement by 40 or 50 years."

On April 29, 1939, the D.O. proclaimed in its masthead that "Elizabeth Donnelly Named D.O. Editor."

"For the first time in the history of the paper, a woman would lead the editorial staff. It was a proud moment. We were all so excited. The University of New Haven even went over to the University of New Haven to meet with our students and every newspaper in the United States ever had the head of a major college newspaper," Elizabeth C. Donnelly, 35 years of university tradition when she was elected editor of The D.Orange, Hansen wrote in an article on the issue's front page. "It was the first time since The Daily Orange was incorporated in 1803 that a woman was chosen to head the staff."

The campus received the news well, said both Hansen and Donnelly. Students especially the women, welcomed her with open arms. Marguerite Fisher was subsequently hired as the first black woman faculty member at Maxwell.

"The women were glad, and I don't remember hearing any nasty comments from the men," Donnelly said. "Women were accepted much more on campus at this time. I cared a lot about it and I was up for the challenge."

The greatest challenge would come next semester for Donnelly. A war began overseas and men enrolling at SU didn't expect to graduate, let alone enlist, in the services.

Hansen graduated and within a year, he enlisted in the U.S. Army and began serving time in North Africa, Normandy and Sicily.

"You were sort of prepared for it," Donnelly said. "We knew our classmates were going to war and that we would lose some."

"When the students came back to the campus that fall, there was not much time to think of women editors. Just hard work and deadlines," she wrote in a reflection on that period. "We were the first women to head the staff of a major university newspaper, and all of us entered the group and had to adapt to being a major paper.

Within the group, we made mistakes. We made mistakes every time since then. We would have to be more flexible, a fact that generations have continued to prove.

We were not ready to be part of that world," Donnelly said. "We never took for granted the wonderful women we had in the United States."

The GI Bill still exists in the form of the Montgomery GI Bill, a $10,000 tuition grant that servemen may use within 10 years of finishing their duty. Along with other bonuses, the Montgomery GI Bill often paid for tuition and allowed young men to go to school for the first time in their lives, "They were four wonderful years for me, a woman reporter covering the stories of World War II," Mettler said. "I got chocked up talking about this."

The GI Bill had a remarkable civic generation, these people participated tremendously in '40s public life," said Carver. "I've been in the SU community for 60 years. I've met Mettler, who noted the increase of veterans who left to fulfill a sense of duty. "I will never forget the moment I learned that I had been selected as the first female editorial writer in the Orange newspaper at Syracuse University, and I was a student at the University School of Journalism and worked on The Daily Orange from my dorm room," Mettler said. "That was the time, Ponder remembers soldiers who were as young as 18, "We'll never talk about it much other than to veterans," he said. "There's a person who has seen the worst of it who never had a big feel for campus."

Elizabeth Angelino '40 was reported by the D.B. to be the first women in the nation to serve as editor in chief of a major college newspaper. She now resides in Oneida.

Ponds, who came to SU in 1949, said there was a movement in the university to hinder the growth of campus computer technology. Not only was the cost of computers an issue, but administrative members questioned the computer's merit in the classroom.

In fact Chancellor William P. Tolley, who served at SU from 1942 to 1969, said that computing was "a tail on a dog." It was turned off for the last time without a phone line.

There was also the fear that these younger, more technologically savvy students would use their computers at a price and break into student record and change grades.

"That's why to this day the administrative system is separate from the students," Ponds said. "But the computers have come anyway."

SU initiated a $700,000 project to install specially configured computer terminals in the administrative computing system with the rest of the campus. Wiping out the technology was a step for the students, Foster said.

ROBERT PHILLIPS

My first glimpse of this big campus, crawling with Goon Squadders and students dressed in casual clothes, was from the late Donald A. Dike. I set between classmates Joyce Carol Oates and Justin M. Dominique. I believe he was the prototype of the former and eventually married the latter. Donald was the captain of the Cotton Bowl team in the mid-60s, and he was a senior at SU.

But perhaps the most vivid impression was made by Delmarce Schwartz, who was a professor of English in the 60s. He was a distinguished and enthusiastic teacher, and his students formed an integral part of his classroom.

With our, I loved the broadcast courses that I took. But what was so valuable was being able to work with the Daily Orange and have the opportunity to work with a large number of students and to have the opportunity to work with a large number of students and to have the opportunity to work with a large number of students and to have the opportunity to work with a large number of students.

The Daily Orange became fully independent from SU by the end of the academic year, ultimately losing 12-67 to the Kentucky Wildcats, coached by former SU assistant Rick Pitino.

The last cut of the season, the Orange seniors played their last game against the West Virginia Mountaineers.

> "Two things made Syracuse a prominent college basketball program that year," said Coach Boeheim. "One was the leading scorer from the season before — and perhaps the most talented player in Syracuse history — Dwayne 'Pearl' Washington. The other was the incoming freshman, Derrick Coleman and Wendell Alexis.

> "Two seniors were really the catalysts of the team," Boeheim said. "They were always there, always by my side."

Then the declaration of PSU followed, and SU was thrust into the national spotlight.

"When we blew out Penn State at home, that's when we started getting national recognition," said Paul. "We beat them 48-21, and it could've been worse than that.

The community embraced and got behind us. They encouraged and supported us. I can remember people being excited to go to games and being stopped by students saying 'Good luck,' and I couldn't remember that happening more than once or twice.

Many point to that sixth-game win over the Lions as the turning point in the season. However, SU quarterback and 1997 Heisman-winner Don McPherson said the difference for him was in the season's fourth game against Virginia Tech.

The Hokies led the Orange 21-0 at the half when Syracuse offensive coordinator George DeLeone gave what McPherson called "one of the best speeches I've ever heard."

DeLeone called the Orangemen out and told them, in no uncertain terms, that they possessed the talent to go undefeated, and they were letting it slip away.

"It was intense and we were all thinking 'He's right,'" McPherson said. "Most times coaches yell and you're just like 'Yeah, yeah' but this time we were like 'He's right.' That moment we realized we had the ability and the coaching to turn it around."

Syracuse outscored the Hokies in the second half and left Blacksburg 28-21 victors. From there, it was on to victories over Missouri, Penn State and the rest of its independence schedule, including the regular season finale against West Virginia.

With the knowledge that they had already been guaranteed a spot in the Sugar Bowl, the Orangemen downed the Mountaineers 35-21 in the final seconds with a touchdown pass from McPherson to running back Michael Owens.

With the victory, and the perfect regular season, the 1997 team cemented its place in SU lore.

"It used to be basketball winning every year and we would be drooling watching football," Paul said. "That football team started something. Now Syracuse has something to look forward to in football season and something to be proud of."

After the win over WVU it was on to New Orleans for a New Year's Day date with sixth-ranked Auburn. But first it was time for the Orangemen to soak up some national attention.

McPherson had national coach of the year awards to collect, and McPherson traveled around the county, doing everything from conducting a second-place finish to Notre Dame's Tim Brown in the Heisman race. In fact, the quarter-back estimated he practiced only two or three times with the team before the bowl game. Then SU flew to the site of the basketball team's heartbreakling just over 10 months before.

"The New Orleans people were happy to have Syracuse back," McPherson said. "Their saying was 'They wear orange, but they sleep green.'"

After whooping it up on Bourbon Street, the Syracuse faithful marched into the Louisiana Superdome to watch their team defeat the seventh-ranked Auburn.

The Orangemen fell behind early, but battled back, and after a Tim Vesling field goal held a 13-lead over the Tigers with 2:04 left to play. The famed Orange 10-yard line was broken down, but left on the clock, Tiger kidder Win Lyle hit a 30-yard field goal with 12-seconds left to end the storybook season, and the history of the Sugar Bowl. It was also the only black mark on Syracuse's 11-0-1 record.

"The Syracuse community responded to Auburn coach Pat Dye's perceived cowardice by sending the Tiger head man thousands of orange dreadlocks."

"They milked it all winter," McPherson said of the fan's response. "We ended up getting more out of that game than if we had won the thing."

As it was, SU finished fourth in the polls behind Miami (Fla.), Florida State and Oklahoma and No. 1 on the list of many top recruits in the nation. The Orangemen's wide-open offense, combined with the enthusiasm of MacPherson and the community and the attraction of the Dome, had many prep standouts to one of the sports capitals of the nation.

Syracuse was also helped by the fact that the media attention surrounding collegiate sports had begun to intensify. ESPN was becoming the world's leader for sports information, and the media attention surrounding collegiate sports had begun to intensify.

"My biggest thing and maybe our worst enemy."

We hit the jackpot certainly," Crouthamel said of the year. "The shock event was the biggest thing and maybe our worst enemy.

courageous news. At the time, SU had very little financial muscle and little deferred maintenance.

So I decided to work to right the situation from his first day on the job. The actions the university took were sweeping — capping enrollment at 10,500 undergraduates; cutting the budgets of some schools while increasing those of others; and offering an early retirement program to about 150 professors.

Ironically, the administration cut costs by putting students on student enrollment. Increasing enrollment would have improved SU's financial situation, Shaw admitted, but it also would have decreased its academichuman reputation.

Graduating from the School of Speech and Dramatic Arts with an E.F. degree, I was named to the All-American basketball team, a special one in that I was named to the final of the trials. I was not selected for the team. However, to have had this opportunity was truly a rewarding experience.

Eventually, he went on to Wyoming and the University of Michigan before returning to SU to teach in the geography department. Later, as a dean, Eric Faigle understood the true measure of a student and what was the most important thing. If you needed a push to reach your potential, he was always there to help you strive. Long before the popular TV show came along, many SU graduates knew that thanks to Dean Faigle, they'd been touched by an angel.

Brendon Dabkowski, Lene Dahl, Ron Fooks and Laura Prabucki — a couple of lofty goals and the dedication to mold the pieces together to pilot a schoolteacher. She retired and lives in Wyoming, with the young women of Kappa Alpha Theta, also at SU, and the wide range of professional challenges that followed. Professors like Mike Somich had infused us with her love of Shakespeare, and A.E. Johnson, the poet, was initially just a favorite of mine. How did they do that day after day, year after year? The stories about rich and stimulating friendships, some of them lifelong, with the young women of Kappa Alpha Theta, had provided a stable core during my college years.

As the first member of the Nelson family to go on to higher education, September 1949 was the beginning of a wonderful and rewarding experience. As I prepared to take the next step in my education, I had many questions. Most notably, could I succeed academically? Secondly, did I have the athletic ability to compete on the intercollegiate level?

As long as the sun still rises above the massive Green Mountains that encircle her valley dwelling, Colter said she will remain loyal to SU. She will take great pride in being the oldest alumna from SU, a place that was instrumenal in shaping those ideals.

"I never dreamed of being the oldest," she said. "Now, I just want to be the best I can."

After months of planning and hundreds of hours of research and interviews, Higher Ground is ready to stand in testimony to SU's remarkable history. Each story was conceived, written, and edited by a distinguished and staff of Daily Orange editors on the basis of its topic's profound affect on the university — both in the time in which the story occurred and years afterward. They reflect the best and worst of SU. Institutionally, her greatest challenges, darkest days and most glorious triumphs. It also aims to tell the tale of some of the university's notable personalities to have passed through the Quad, studied in the Hall of Languages, shared a beer on M-Street and left the university with an orange and blue streak through their souls.

A debt of gratitude is due to all the writers who contributed their articles from what initially were scattered ideas, a couple of lofty goals and the dedication to mold the pieces together. Special thanks to SU's Archivemen and University Relations for their kindness, time and help; also, all of the alumni whose participation made Higher Ground come alive. To the Daily Orange editing staff, present and former, the deepest of thanks: Brian Angell, Annemieke Bello, Bill Nelson Leading the marching band when we went to the 1953 Orange Bowl was a highlight for me, although Alabama crushed us.

There were so many highlights: Leading the marching band when we went to the 1953 Orange Bowl was a highlight for me, although Alabama crushed us. I've rooted against them ever since. My roommates at Sigma Chi nominated me for International Sweetheart of Sigma Chi, then pitched in to help make it happen. We had a marvelous time doing that. Being on the cover of Look magazine, traveling worldwide as halftime entertainment with the Harlem Globetrotters, being named Miss Drum Major of America, were all opportunities that came to me because of SU. If you think it sounds like fun, trust me, it was!

I received a priceless education at SU and had an extraordinary time in the process. My liberal arts experience prepared me for International Business School, also at SU, and the wide range of professional challenges that followed. For the 1950s, I was a very good soccer player for an American. I was born and raised in Britain and had played varsity soccer for two years. But after my sophomore year, I quit the team to become program director of WASH. Corny Schwartzwalder was the head coach of the football team then, and after he led the team to the No. 1 ranking, he was asked to kick for the team and went to be Ben.

As I could kick the extra points, not knowing that there were no such things as extra point kickers, having never played football before. So here I was, a 135-pound soaking wet British kid offering myself to the coach of the best football team in the country. And he turned me down.

Who knows where my football career would have taken me? I could have gone somewhere, I could have become somebody, in which case Corny Schwartzwalder is right now, but I know he has made a terrible mistake.

Olympus. This never occurred. However, in 1991, a move was or dered to make room for Eggers Hall. The $900,000 movement of the building was unsafe, with broken and oiled steps. A headline ran that year in The Daily Orange stating that the lives of the 1,500 students may be in danger if the report was true.

One of Syracuse's most impressive buildings for 100 years, and one that SU owned until the 1980s, was Con nul Longstreet, who made its fortune manufacturing civil war uniforms. Architect James Renwick in charge of the construction of a 24-room replica of a Norman castle. At the time, Renwick was in Syracuse building the First Pres byterian Church on East Fayette Street. Renwick's most famous works are St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York City and the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C.

The castle, constructed in Tudor Gothic style, sat at the foot of the hill above Crouse College. It was constructed out of brick but sanded over to look like gray stone. The entrance was a massive carved oak door. Later in 1908, a concrete bridge, which spanned a ravine, was added.

But Longstreet was not completely happy with his castle. By 1865, he had spent more than $200,000 on it and it was not completely finished or furnished. At the time, the castle's population numbered only 22,000 citizens. The Longstreet home sat for three years, the city's center. The lack of streetlights and muddy roads marked the university landscape at the turn of the 19th century, students ambled from building to building in bulky costumes even during summer months, and what few autumns existed on campus were marked on lawns.

The most exciting game of my basketball career happened during my senior year at SU. We played Villanova for the championship of the Big East Tournament in the Carrier Dome. It was the first year in the new building and we were having an average season. The game drew a “small” crowd of around 18,000, but the energy was high and the game was televised locally. Both teams played a great game and it remained close throughout. Regulation time ended with the teams tied, and we went to overtime.

By now, the tension level had been raised. We were playing not only for league bragging rights but also a berth in the NCAA Tournament. This win would go a long way toward salvaging a disappointing season for us all. One overtime became two and then, incredibly, three. Finally, after a Leo Rautins tip-in, the final seconds ticked away and the Dome erupted in celebration of an exhausting triple-overtime victory.

However, the most intriguing part of the win was yet to come. After the game, my family and I went to the Scotch and Sirloin restaurant in DeWitt to celebrate the big win. By then it was pretty late, but for some reason the restaurant lobby was still packed with people trying to get a table. As I walked in, I was greeted with a huge ovation. We didn’t have a reservation because we came right over from the Parish — have had longer seasons. Moses — Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, other players in league history — have had longer careers.

And that’s why it’s the most exciting game I’ve ever played in.

WITH the grit and concentration of the Varsity football team, the freshmen strategize at the bottom of the hill that Crouse College looms atop. They strategize, shout words of encouragement to each other, and remind themselves of all the taunting they have endured from their bitter rivals, the sophomores.

Men led a very different collegial existence than the women did. There were far more men, who worked toward degrees so they could win bread after graduation. Few women worked then, so the female students took courses that interested them and did not trifle over a degree, unless they planned on teaching.

Women came to get degrees to teach, and went to the Teachers College or the College of Fine Arts," said Mary O'Brien, assistant director of archives for SU. "They even didn't have to be enrolled to attend fine arts. They could take lessons and classes if they were going to be a painter."

The College of Liberal Arts dominated the university's physical and academic landscape then, and gave rise to the Lyman C. Smith School of Applied Sciences (Engineering) in 1902 and the Teachers College in 1906. And while men and women led distinctly different lives of scholarship, school spirit narrowed the rift.

Amid criticism that women dampened school spirit, the University Herald came to their defense with an editorial in November of 1900 that read, "Instead of being a hindrance to the development of the Female College, the Women Students have proven themselves to be a strong and creditable element in the University family." It was a custom that could grow only a a at a small, tightly-knit school in an era when school spirit ran thick through a college student's blood. The concept for each other shown during the rush subsided afterwards when the two classes of males would gather at the local YMCA. Most of the boys that rushed the hill were the same - white, Protestant, greek and affluent enough to attend school before financial aid existed.

The Syracuse University of 1900 bore little resemblance to the SU of 2000 — a large, secular, corporate school with a sizeable endowment. The university 100 years ago, with only 1,467 students, was a collegial, Methodist institution that had to borrow from its endowment to pay the bills and build to keep with its growing student body. Enrollment jumped 24 percent in 1900 alone, leading Chancellor James Roscoe Day to begin planning the great expansion that culminated in the building of Archbold Stadium and six other buildings in 1907.

Prior to the early '2000s, Syracuse University was a desolate hilltop, with less than half a dozen buildings. But a construction project by Chancellor James Roscoe Day changed this. Courtesy of SU Archives

ALUMNI

Ted Gregory '87

What stands out is the Nebraska win in '84, because during the late '70s and early '80s we weren't experiencing much success. Nebraska was a milestone for us as far as Syracuse University football climbing the plateau it had once been atop.

The following year, making it to the Cherry Bowl was a nice progression to bring Syracuse University football back to national prominence. In '86, I missed the whole year, and we remained status quo. It was Donnie Mac's (Don McPherson) first year as a full-time starter, so they actually won five of their last six. But there were injuries and I missed the whole season.

In '87, I have to say that we finally got to the top, we reaped the summit, and thanks to the university itself for dedicating itself to having a top football program. We were able to get to the top and have been dedicated from that point on. It was the culmination of four to five years of hard work from the top down, from the head coach to players to trainers. It was a team effort. We all found our way and realized what it took to be a top program. It took great pride in being one of the players who helped bring Syracuse University football back to prominence, and I thank the university and players for maintaining the tradition we helped bring back.

All the principles that we learned and applied to become a winning program are the same values that help you live a successful life. You learn about life through your relationships with family, friends, your parents, and coaches.

People don't understand it, they draw too much of a line between the field and the classroom and personal lives. I don't see the line. It's a complete circle and one spills into the other, and through the personal relationships that I made at Syracuse University, I got to meet some real quality individuals and I maintain relationships with many of them to this day.

SU gave me the opportunity to meet these people by offering me a scholarship. A lot of people think it's the bottom line — making revenue through TV and the ticket gate — but we also play to win. Syracuse wins by getting these funds, players win by getting the opportunity to play against other quality football programs, expanding our horizons. At SU, you experience the full gamut, especially on a team, you meet people from different economic, religious and geographical backgrounds that come together and work towards one common goal.

Ted Gregory '87 was drafted by the Denver Broncos in the first round of the 1988 NFL draft. He was a consensus pick for the 1987 AllAmerican Team as a nose guard. He now works in construction in East Idaho.
The friends you make, are the thing that stands out most, of all things I miss. I miss hanging out with friends. We keep in touch but it's not the same over e-mail. It's different than when you were around them all the time. I miss the camaraderie... My closest friends were my teammates. With the amount of time you spend in practices and traveling with them, they become a family.

Raquel Nurse '98 is the SU women's basketball team's all-time assists leader with 530 for 4.9 per game. She works in Big East headquarters in Providence, R.I.

Scoreboards are meaningful, but off-field involvement with all the wonderful student-athletes has a more meaningful memory for me.

Roy Simmons Jr.

Roy Simmons Jr. '59
My most memorable moment was the chance to take the 1990 and the 1995 national championship teams to Lockerbie, Scotland to help mend the sorrow caused by Pan Am Flight 103. Scoreboards are meaningful, but off-field involvement with all the wonderful student-athletes has a more meaningful memory for me.

I will now dedicate my time as a member of the Syracuse University Library Association and a member of the Board of Trustees of the Everson Museum while continuing to work in my private studio as a visual artist.

Years ago, when asked what my goals were, I said I wanted to be a national champion and be seen in the Museum of Modern Art. I'm now working on the second half of my goal. Roy Simmons Jr. '59 retired in 1998 as head coach of the Syracuse University men's lacrosse team. He is the only collegiate-level coach to win six national championships.

Ruth Colter, pictured here in 1997 at her 84th college class reunion, says that learning is a life-long endeavor, even when one is a centurian.

BY DAVE LEVINTHAL MANAGING EDITOR

MANCHESTER, Vt. — Thirty-eight years to the day before the Empire State Building opened its doors for the first time, a newborn child across the New York Harbor first opened wide her eyes.

Despite being born into an affluent Staten Island family, little Ruth Morrison's home lacked a computer, a television, a phone — electricity. It was May 1, 1893.

Thirty-eight minutes after 3 p.m. on a crisp October afternoon, an old, old lady across a lifetime peered curiously through clouded yet vibrant ice-blue eyes.

Despite spending her final days at a residence home in Manchester, Vt., Ruth Colter's home was filled with smiling photographs, a tape player, bright decorations — unique electricity. It was Oct. 22, 1999.

"If I make it, and I hope that I do, I'll have lived in three centuries," Colter said, gently leaning forward in her chair. "I want to do it. It will be fun to do it. And I am going to do it."

She did. And at 106 years old, Syracuse University's oldest living alumnus, a graduate of the Class of 1913, lives every day with a singular aim — to live well. It would be foolish to stop learning, stop enjoying the world now, she says, citing her daily "readings" of audio books, the topics of which range from Homer's Iliad to essays on modern Chinese government policy. Eighty-seven years after receiving her degree in history, Colter is still bent on proving she deserves it.

"I'm now trying to learn the 41 presidents in sequence before the year is over," she said, noting that 13th President Millard Fillmore is giving her difficulty. "I just can't get it yet, but I'm trying. I have to keep my mind going, and I've just always been learning. Why stop now?"

A noble goal for a woman who has seen 30 of them come and go. Noble like any opportunity to enrich one's life with learning and love, Colter explained.

The core of this attitude was born during her four years on the Hill. Although admittedly not a "diligent" student who failed a couple of classes, Colter took great interest in history and classics. She became a sprinter for the women's athletic club. She also sat in the front row in all her classes, afraid that if she didn't, she'd fall asleep.

Her freshman year, Colter joined Kappa Alpha Theta, describing the decision to do so as one of the best she has ever

Students advocate political support

BY JASON VOLACK
Staff Writer
The Syracuse University College Republicans planned a political brigade Wednesday night that is expected to attack voter apathy both on and off the campus.

About five members of the group met in Schine Student Center to address Central New York GOP support.

"Our current answer is to reach out to the community in hopes of getting a broader support in the Syracuse area," said Chris Ryan, a sophomore political science and broadcast journalism major.

"To actually have students walk around campus making themselves available to students."

Involving younger people is a problem facing the Republican Party, said Joe Burns, College Republicans chairperson.

"I'm trying to get feedback from students about this issue in hopes that the party can use the information to get more people active and vote Republican," said Burns, a junior history and political science major.

Ryan, a supporter of candidate
Steve Forbes and coordinator of SU's Youth for Forbes, is using his group to relinquish GOP frontrunner and Texas
Gov. George W. Bush of Central New York support, he said.

"We have some very good delegates in the area so we feel our chances are very good," Ryan said. "As we look now, it's a Bush versus Forbes race."

Though Arizona Sen. John McCain has proven strong in New York state polls, his eligibility to appear on some district primary ballots is yet to be determined, Ryan said.

McCain filed an appeal Jan. 14

pepsico beverages in SU's dining halls and allows for only a small percentage of shelf space for other companies' drinks, such as juices and teas, said Lou Marcoccia, SU vice president of business and finance.

Marcoccia said SU based its decision to switch from a previous contract with Coca-Cola to Pepsico because of financial benefits and upgraded vending machines.

"We went out and thoroughly evaluated all the factors involved," Marcoccia said. "In the end, Pepsico Corporation proved more beneficial to the institution on all fronts.

"We are always looking out for the interest of the students and in this case, Pepsico provided the institution with an overall better package, allowing us to focus the dollars we saved, elsewhere."

The controversy with beverage preference is a major topic at SU, said Danielle Scheafer, a freshman in The College of Arts and Sciences.

One student, Janet Morrison, said she strongly opposes the current contract with Pepsico.

"I hate Pepsico," said Morrison, a freshman television, radio and film major. "Personally, I dislike the fact that it monopolizes the campus. If Pepsico is going to capitalize the dining halls, at least allow Coke products to be sold at Schine."

Leslie Cee, a freshman marketing and retail major, said students should not take the decision seriously.

"Some people like Coke. Some people like Pepsico," Cee said. "That's what it all boils down to, and it is just a drink."

One woman fell off a chair while in the crowd but refused to be treated by medical staff. No other injuries were reported, Campbell said.

Fans dangerously attempted to pull down one of the basket-ball hoop stands, SU Spokesperson Kevin Morrow said. The stands weigh about 2,500 pounds and can be extremely dangerous if moved in a large crowd, Campbell said.

People ran out of things to celebrate, so they started doing stupid things,” Campbell said of the fans who remained on the hardwood for about 30 minutes. “It’s a part of history, not necessarily from that game, but it’s a nice souvenir thing,” said the fan, who wished not to be identified. “It was kind of a joke. I thought we would get 10 feet and someone would say something, but they didn’t.”

An SU student who rushed the court and took one of the team bench chairs on Monday, said the thefts and damages involved in the celebration are “not a big deal.”

“It’s a part of history, not necessarily from that game, but it’s a nice souvenir thing,” said the fan, who wished not to be identified. “It was kind of a joke. I thought we would get 10 feet and someone would say something, but they didn’t.”

SU fans are neither encouraged nor forbidden from rushing the court after a basketball game, Campbell said. However, the university is looking into enhanced safety procedures to prevent further problems, he said.

“There will be some noticeable changes,” Campbell said. At Duke University, Durham, N.C., students historically rush the court following high profile games during a season, but typically there are no injuries or damages, said Neal Morgan, sports editor of The Chronicle newspaper at Duke.

“There are no rules against rushing the court,” Morgan said. “But the press row knows enough to get out of the way.”

GOP rules prevent fair state primary

Sen. John McCain said New York Republican voters have less choice than the Russians.

That may not be much of an exaggeration. Only two candidates — party favorite Texas Gov. George W. Bush and evangelical Steve Forbes — will be on every ballot in the New York state GOP presidential primary. In at least three of the state’s voting districts, Sen. McCain has been kicked off the ballot for failing to meet the party’s standards.

With the money and muscle of the New York state GOP behind him, front-runner Bush ensured he would be on every ballot. Steve Forbes spent $750,000 on lawyers and signature-getters.

But Sen. McCain, who ranks No. 2 in most national GOP polls, has been challenged by state party bosses who want him off the state’s ballots. Those same party heads who want to push their strongest candidate into the White House are trying to make it as easy as possible for Bush by blocking McCain.

In the New York GOP primary, candidates must get on the ballot of all 51 congressional districts by gathering thousands of signatures in each one. The archaic system is known as one of the country’s most complicated and one that goes against the democratic principles Americans value.

The Arizona senator made it farther than other GOP hopefuls — Alan Keyes and Gary Bauer will slip the primary altogether.

While New York’s system has some merit — it forces candidates to campaign across the entire state — its restrictions and rigors favor the rich and make victory nearly impossible for candidates who are less wealthy but viable nonetheless. The primary’s rules were created in the 1850s for the Students For the Right to Sleep candidate from appearing on the ballot, not credible politicians like McCain. More important candidates in general were created to take power out of the hands of political bosses and give it to state citizens.

In a political landscape that is being dominated more and more by big spenders, the New York state GOP should follow the lead of its Democratic state counterparts and loosen its rules so more serious candidates have a fighting chance.

Otherwise, the Empire State might as well nominate an emperor.
Nanocomposites are plastics filled with micro-sized materials to bolster strength. The school expects to garner $10 million in funding from the National Science Foundation to complete the project. RPI is also planning on spending $1.5 million of its own money and may receive an additional $2.5 million in corporate donations, Adams said.

The center will make flame-retardant plastics for automobiles, trucks and airplanes; decrease the size of telecommunications systems and create microsystems that could be entered into the human body to produce insulin, Adams said.

"You can create materials that have never been created before," he said. "This is the point of the center."

With help from the grant, major breakthroughs in flame-resistant plastics and telecommunications technology could occur soon, Adams said. Other developments could take as long as 10 years, he added.

Cornell will found the Technological Enhancement and Access Laboratory, said Carl Batt, co-director of the center and a food science professor.

"We want to build a structure that will tie nanocomposite research to the private sector," Batt said.

The plan includes a $10 million Biotechnology Industry Growth Fund which will encourage investment in the industry, said Charles Diester, a Pataki spokesperson. The program provides start-up money for companies trying to sell their new lab innovations.

The Empire State Technology Employment Program will also begin, allowing high-tech companies in New York state to give $3,400 a year to prospective employees who are studying engineering, computer science and other science-based programs. The program aims to encourage more graduates to pursue high-tech careers in the state.

"For the state to grow and prosper, you need your best, brightest and talented to stay here," Diester said. "Things are only going to get better, but it's important that we keep science-related professionals in New York."

In the 1980s and early 1990s, many students from New York state would leave after graduation to pursue high-tech jobs in California's Silicon Valley, he said.

"People would get a great education in New York and then take a look around them and decide that their future was not in New York," Diester said. "We're reversing that."

The issue of political apathy among youth affects the Democratic Party as well as the GOP, said Christina Hinchey, SU College Democrats chairperson and senior public relations and public policy major. She noted that the large amount of campus interest groups create a competitive environment for student organizations.

“We have always attracted very liberal, opinionated students, but other groups are vying for these people’s attention,” Hinchey said. “It actually continues to be our biggest problem.”

Hinchey said that the College Democrats have not faced any serious problems recruiting minorities, however, because of the historically liberal policies of the party.

Some of the ideas that have been proposed by the College Democrats to remedy the problem include establishing political information stands and beginning a listserv that is available to all Democratic party members. Hinchey said. The College Democrats hosted a table Monday and Tuesday in the Schines Student Center advocating the campaign of Democratic candidate and former New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley, she added.

“It’s absolutely important that Syracuse students who wish to vote in the New York primary register to vote now,” Burns said, of the March 7 New York state primary election.

Burns said he will be serving as a delegate on behalf of the Youth for Forbes campaign. The College Republicans, however, do not officially support a candidate, he added.

“Although Forbes doesn’t look phenomenal to voters now, he will in March for the New York primary,” he said.

Shyness leads to social peril, loneliness

It is the ghost on one's shoulder, constantly shrouding the individual in self-doubt and unnecessary worries. Most everyone has experienced shyness. In a recent poll conducted by U.S. News and World Report, nearly one-half of the respondents claimed it happens on a regular basis. For some, shyness can even be an endearing trait — it shies away from society and lead to a host of destructive behaviors ranging from low self-esteem to chronic drug use to suicide, in the most extreme cases.

Shyness has been a part of recorded history since the days of Hippocrates, though it wasn't until 1980 it was named as such. Shyness is a form of social anxiety that may range from feelings of mild stress in the presence of others to absolute fear. One of the saddest aspects of this disorder is that the patient is never satisfied with their social situation and they feel anxiety when around others. Eventually, this combination leads to the loneliness of only a few relationships.

Since the problem of shyness plagues 44 million Americans in some form, researchers have been making strides to clarify the nature of the disorder and determine whether it may be inherited. According to a new study at the University of Oregon, shyness appears to have a genetic component, and there may also be evidence of a physiological mechanism fueling the phobia. Furthermore, the study indicates that shyness is probably influenced more by heredity than by any other personality trait.

People who experience this social phobia during adulthood, but were previously outgoing, were usually more influenced by social and environmental factors. This portion of the shy population has risen from 40 to 50 percent over the last decade alone. Research blames technology for this trend.

Acoustic rockers Guster promise fun-filled show

BY LORI BISTIS
Contributing Writer

Syracuse University students are invited to face up to their dancing shoes and hop onto the dance floor as Guster, an acoustic rock band from Boston, takes the stage at St. Lawrence's Rhythm Palace, 314 S. Franklin St., tonight.

The band plans to give Syracuse a performance equal to the caliber of a much larger venue, as they will be warming up for their Friday show in Worcester, Mass. where they expect a crowd of more than 3,000 people.

"We'll be trying out some things in Syracuse that we want to put into the Worcester show," said Guster frontman Ryan Miller. Crooner Miller is joined by Adam Gardner, another guitarist and singer, and Brian O'Connell, who plays the bongos. The trio met during their freshman orientation at Tufts University and formed a band called "Gus."

"We came out for "Gus," there were already too many bands with that name. But a band called "Gus" was started, "Parachute," debuted in April 1994 said. "Someone just sort of was born."

Guster's first two albums, "Parachute" and "Coldplay," sold 65,000 copies, mainly through word of mouth. The band established a "Guster Boy" program where fans sold CDs for the band in exchange for a special spot on a guest list. Todd Gallagher, a senior advertising major from Westfield, Mass., has been a Guster Boy for four years.

"I basically got into it so I could help get Guster's name out there," Gallagher said.

Growing up

Gallagher and other long-time Guster fans have witnessed on enormous growth in the fan base over the last three years. And with the release of the band's latest album, "Lost and Gone Forever," a performance at Woodstock '92 and increased radio play, the band is excited to be gaining ground in the music industry.

"We always play in New York City after Thanksgiving. The size of that show has gone from 1,200 to 2,000 to 3,700 just over the last three years," Miller said. "Our fans are great."

But what is it about Guster that draws in the fans the way times bands like Limp Bizkit, Red Hot Chili Peppers and Korn are dominating the scene? "They're just what they call them up there on stage," said Kari Arnold, a senior political science major. "There is definitely a uniqueness about them."

The on-stage presence of Guster brings fans back to their shows again and again. Not only is the group fully energized and clearly loving what they do, but they seek out audience participation and perform impromptu cover versions of songs.

"Their performances are never dull," said Kendall Podgurski, a senior speech pathology major from Cumberland, R.I., who has seen five Guster shows. The stools the band sits during a show range from playing in a space suit to bringing a stuffed animal known as the "Friend" onstage, to crowd surfing in the audience while singing a rendition of "American Pie." The band encouraged fans to meet with fans and signs autographs following their shows.

Despite recent success and plans to make a video for their new release "Fa-Fa," the band hopes to maintain their image as a fun, energetic and down-to-earth rock group.

"It's difficult sometimes for a band to try to establish a certain image and then have some director that they don't really know. You're basically relying on him to make a decision on how people will perceive you. I think we've got a good director for the video though," Miller said.

"Fa-Fa," released as a radio single in late March. The current single, "Barrel of a Gun," has received ample airplay time on alternative radio. But the band is planning to campaign "Fa-Fa" to mostly pop music radio stations. In light of the recent transformation of alternative music to predominately hardcore rap, Miller is cautiously optimistic with the switch to pop.

"We're still the same band. It all goes back to what do we want to be as a band," he said.

bone is broken down. In the three-month bone-remodeling process, bone cells called osteoclasts break down the old bone, leaving tiny cavities. Osteoclasts, another type of bone cell, then line the bone with protein fibers. These fibers are then hardened by mineral deposits, namely calcium and phosphorus.

Children grow rapidly because their bodies produce new bone faster than old bone is removed. This allows bone mass to increase. By the time a woman is in her mid-twenties, she has 98 percent of her skeletal mass. After reaching peak bone mass in her mid-thirties, new bones continue to be made. However, bone mass starts to decrease as old bone is broken down faster than new bone is made, which happens as women inch toward menopause, generally in their late forties or early fifties.

This is when fractures can occur.

As more and more bone breaks down, it becomes difficult to do simple tasks for fear of a fracture. Stepping on a curb is enough to fracture a bone. Even coughing can do damage.

"It can really hurt the quality of life for many people," said the spokesperson for the NOP.

Kathy Van Vechten, director of nursing at Syracuse University Health Services, also emphasized the severity of the disease.

"Someone without osteoporosis would be bruised, whereas someone with osteoporosis would break a hip," she said.

Got milk?

Bones are often referred to as an account. The more calcium one puts into it now, the better off their retirement plan will be.

The NOP recommends that adults get 1,000 mg of calcium a day, equivalent to about three cups of milk. Other dairy products that can help prevent the disease include yogurt, cheese and ice cream. Some helpful vegetables include broccoli, soy beans and collard greens. It's never too early to start planning for the future.

"Bones are still building," said the spokesperson for the NOP. "You are still laying down bones for your skeleton."

College students on the run from one class to the next often don't have time to stop for meals, let alone worry about getting the right amount of calcium. This is where dairy products such as Caltrate, Os-Cal and Tums offer one alternative to getting calcium the traditional way.

Kendra Pierre-Louis, a sophomore at Cornell University, has operated Calitate with Vitamin D since October 1999. Watching her great grandmother cope with osteoporosis has a strong impact on her, she said. Today, she is more mindful of her calcium intake.

"I saw my grandma and she, like, shrunk," Pierre-Louis said. "I don't want to be a bent-over old lady when I'm 50."

Pierre-Louis advises college students against using calcium supplements as their only source of calcium.

"The way we eat, you'd have to buy out the drugstore to supplement enough," she said.

While some choose to take calcium supplements, Van Vechten said she recommends that college students pop a daily multivitamin to kick the right dose of all vitamins and minerals into their systems.

Plan ahead

Often thought to be an inevitable product of aging, osteoporosis is actually a product of poor planning on a young person's part. But new technology is helping to wage war on what was once considered inevitable.

The LUNAR Corporation, based in Madison, Wis., was established in 1980. The company works to develop bone densitometers, which detect osteoporosis in its earliest stages.

Osteoporosis is visible on X-ray film, but only once 40 percent of the bone mass is lost," said Brad Herrington, director of marketing at LUNAR Corporation. "There was no effective way to tell before bone densitometers."

The LUNAR Corporation developed the most widely used bone densitometer, the dual-energy X-ray absorptiometry (DEXA), in 1988. Though DEXA scanners are used mainly in major academic centers, the LUNAR Corporation put together a Bone Matters Tour in 1997. The program features a touring van, which travels from city to city with a DEXA scanner, offering free bone scans to people. A bone scan typically costs $40.

Eighteen million people currently have low bone mass, which puts them at risk for osteoporosis. One in two women and one in eight men over age 50 will experience a fracture due to osteoporosis sometime in their life, according to the NOP.

"It's a disease whose results you don't see until you are older," the spokesperson said. "If you're not following bone-healthy behaviors from the time you are young, then you are at risk. Be conscious of this disease at any age."

OSTEOPOROSIS risk factors:
- Being female
- Old age
- Family history
- Small build
- Physical inactivity
- Low bone mass
- Taking corticosteroids, thyroid medications, anticoagulants or anticonvulsants
- Smoking
- Excessive alcohol consumption
- Excessive caffeine consumption
- Prior fractures

Prevention:
- Increase dietary calcium; additional calcium if needed
- Avoid excessive alcohol, caffeine
- Do not smoke
- Regular weight-bearing exercise such as walking, tennis, etc.
- Some exposure to sunlight for vitamin D or vitamin D supplement (to absorb calcium)
- Hormone replacement for women as recommended by their physician
- Make sure your living environment is safe, i.e. rugs

38-31 victory over Super Bowl-bound St. Louis.

Working with a struggling offensive line, McNabb spent most of his season eluding oncoming rushers. After the Rams win, McNabb joked, saying even though he wore a knee brace, he still darted away from defenders wanting to pound him into the turf.

“I don’t fear anyone,” McNabb said. “There are big guys that are out there, but I always look at it as they can’t catch what they can’t see. Any time you are out of their vision, then they can’t get you.”

McNabb struggled early in the season for the Eagles. In three appearances in relief of beleaguered starter Doug Pederson, McNabb completed just 13 of 29 passes.

Pederson lost his job after leading Philly to a 2-7 start. Making his first NFL start against Washington, McNabb led the Eagles to a 35-28 win, which was the victory of the season. He connected on eight passes for 60 yards and scrambled for another 49 yards.

Until then, a Philadelphia rookie QB had not won his first start since Mike Boryla in 1974.

“Any time you throw three touchdown passes, it’s something you could build on,” Eagles head coach Andy Reid said. “It was productive for him. He made strides forward, and he’s done a nice job.”

Although McNabb is experiencing success in the NFL, he hasn’t forgotten his boys from Syracuse. He keeps in touch with several of his former teammates who remain on the Hill, often asking about a particular game the Orangemen just played.

McNabb also tries to speak with other Syracuse grads in the NFL, particularly Cleveland wide receiver Kevin Johnson and Miami running back Travis Kauffman.

“To see those guys are doing well, that they’re successful in football and successful in life,” McNabb said, “you definitely know that you have great friends that you can fall back on in any situation. You know that they’ll be there.”

Already preparing for his second season, McNabb said he knows his play must rise with the increasing expectations on him. McNabb hasn’t decided where he will spend most of the off-season, but said he will be in Philadelphia often to watch films and work out.

The SU grad hopes to better his rookie-season stats, especially the quarterback rating of 60.1. The higher-tier NFL quarterbacks own ratings of 60 or higher. As a young quarterback and a team leader, McNabb makes no secret about what he wants to guide the Eagles toward — a post-season berth.

“I would love to play in the playoffs,” McNabb said. “We all have a positive attitude about going out and just trying to change this thing around.”

Rising storm
Miami's 63-48 victory over Notre Dame helped put a little distance between itself and the next tier of teams in the conference. The Hurricanes are now 4-2 in the Big East, 11-7 overall.
UM wins games this season with its defense. Against the Irish, the Canes held Troy Murphy to just 14 points on 4-for-13 shooting.
Miami guard Johnny Hosley led all scorers with 18 points. The early success for Miami has been surprising, as many expected the Canes to tumble after the graduation of Tim James. But bully forward
Mario Bland boosted the inside game, racking up the 1,000-point plateau for his career against Boston College last weekend.
Close calls
The last two conference losses for Rutgers have come by total of six points.
That's how close the Scarlet Knights are to being 5-1 and in total control of second place. Instead, they are 3-3 and mired in the middle of the pack.
Against St. John's, Danhayne Jones posted a double-double with 18 points and 10 rebounds. Freshman Telfi Billet was held to five points, his most anemic output of late.
Last week, Billet dropped 31 points on Notre Dame and shared conference rookie of the week honors with SU's DeShaun Williams.
Inconsistent Irish
After suffering back to back double-digit losses, Notre Dame came back with a 15-point victory over Pittsburgh.
In that game, the Irish connected on a school record 14 threes and shot 60 percent from the field for the fifth time this season. They followed that stellar performance with the ugly 14-point loss to Miami.
And just a week after Miami's loss, Troy Murphy likely will reach 1,000 points for his career. He needs just four points this Saturday again St. John's. If he does it, he will have achieved it in just 48 games, the fifth fastest in ND history.
UCan't
After a horrendous first half against Syracuse, the Connecticut Huskies battled back to make this final score respectable. The fact remains that they didn't look too good, and their chances of repeating as national champs are in serious jeopardy.
The loss marked their third conference setback this season. They only had two of last year.
Against SU, Huskies center Jake Voskuhl registered a career-high 19 points. He still has never scored 20 points in a game at any level of play, and although he is a solid rebounder and defender, scoring continues to be the major question mark for the big man from Texas.
Voskuhl will get another shot tonight against Providence. UConn shouldn't have a problem with the Pinecones' team that lost at home to Central Connecticut State.
Sister Act
Although Villanova hasn't exactly been having a season to remember, point guard Nykesha Sales is making a name for herself. And that's not easy to do in his family.
In a recent loss to Rutgers, Brooks Sales posted his second consecutive double-double, with 10 points and 11 rebounds.

Syracuse separates itself from Big East foes

Just a week ago, many doubted which team really was tops in the Big East. After all, Syracuse hadn’t played any ranked teams, defending champion Connecticut was struggling, and even St. John’s had lost a few games.

But everything changed Monday.

When Syracuse handed UConn a solid thumping in the Dome, the Orangemen made their claim as the top team in the conference and possibly the nation. If they can do the same thing Monday against St. John’s, there will be no doubt in anyone’s mind who the beasts of the East are.

Avoiding the heat

Due to the residence hall fire at Seton Hall, the Pirates hadn’t played a game in over a week before Wednesday’s nine-point triumph over Boston College. And thanks to St. John’s loss to Ohio State, they now have sole possession of second place in the Big East.

The 15-3 start is the best for Syracuse since 1997, the Orangemen finished with a nine-point victory over Boston College.

Syracuse has always been a team of destiny, and this season has been no exception.

The Orangemen finished with a nine-point victory over Boston College. And thanks to St. John’s loss to Ohio State, they now have sole possession of second place in the Big East.

The 15-3 start is the best for Syracuse since 1997, the Orangemen finished with a nine-point victory over Boston College.

In its rebound game from that loss, SJU struggled before beating Rutgers on Tuesday 61-57. It was the Johnnies’ sixth consecutive win against the Scarlet Knights.
McCain fights for state ballot

The New York state Republican Party is in shambles, State Democratic Party spokesperson Peter Kaufman said Thursday.

Kaufman’s opinion refers to the current debate regarding Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain’s status on the primary ballot.

Two years ago, we went through the first round, but we didn’t land a chair,” said Stewart Thau, interim chairperson for the department and associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

The college invited Charron to campus because of his work to broaden the company’s consumer appeal, said Karen Bakke, retailing department chairperson.

“We need to give the reality of consumer business to our students,” she said. “That’s where they’ll most likely be spending the next 40 years of their careers.”

More women and minorities are slowly joining the faculty and staff of Syracuse University, according to a report released early this month by the SU Office of Budget and Planning.

The office reported that women represent 31.3 percent of the faculty this year. The number is an increase of almost 6 percent since the 1994-1995 school year, when women represented 25.6 percent of the faculty.

Minority faculty members account for 19 percent of the full-time instructional staff this year, according to the report. The number of minorities from 1995-1996 was not available.

“We have tried very hard to be sensitive to needs in the recruiting process,” said Deborah Freund, SU’s vice chancellor.

“A wide range of programs is under way in the sciences and I believe we can attribute our success to the leadership of the women in science and engineering programs.”

In 1999 when then-Vice Chancellor Gordon Vincow announced that the college would create a new position to help increase the number of female faculty members, the college invited Charron to campus because of his work to broaden the company’s consumer appeal, said Karen Bakke, retailing department chairperson.

The Syracuse University African-American Studies department this week reviewed two candidates for a chairperson position. The review comes after a two-year nationwide search for a permanent replacement.

As a part of his review, candidate and professor Jacob Olupona gave a lecture on black and African religious experiences in the United States Thursday night at Bird Library. About 30 people attended the lecture.

Dorothy Drinkard-Hawshawe, the second chairperson candidate, lectured Tuesday.

Thau said the department tries to minimize the effects of the absence of the position has on students.

A search committee composed mainly of faculty members, department heads, and other members in the College of Arts and Sciences conducted the review.

It does not take a rocket scientist to save a failing business, said Liz Claiborne CEO Paul Charron Thursday.

Graduate Student Affairs

The Graduate Student Organization decided Thursday night to spend $10,000 to bring Green Party 2000 presidential candidate Ralph Nader to Syracuse University in April.

The Committee For Hosting Ralph Nader, a subcommittee of the GSO Finance Committee, originally proposed allocating money from the GSO budget to help cover Nader’s fee of about $15,000. But after rejecting the proposal, the finance committee sent it to the Senate, which passed it Thursday, 13-6 with 6 abstentions.

The Nadar committee has already raised $2,500 from organizations outside GSO, meaning it will need to collect another $7,500 by the end of the month to bring Nader to SU, said Kayla

Jones calls for school improvements

BY EVANS BOSTON
Contributing Writer

The Syracuse City School District needs to improve the academic level of students in mathematics and language arts, said Superintendent Dr. Stephen C. Jones Thursday morning at the Drumlins Country Club.

City schools have made improvement in those areas its first priority, Jones said to an audience of about 30 community members.

“My goal is to make sure everyone is moving in the same direction,” he said. “I don’t believe in throw-away kids or throw-away adults.”

Jones, a graduate of Morgan State University in Baltimore, was a social studies teacher and area supervisor in Baltimore and Washington, D.C. before becoming superintendent in Syracuse last year.

It is critical that the school district works hard to help its students, Jones said, noting his reliance on standardized tests. He proposed developing a system that would assess students’ progress and provide feedback to teachers and administrators.

The New York state Republican Party is in shambles, State Democratic Party spokesperson Peter Kaufman said Thursday.

Kaufman’s opinion refers to the current debate regarding Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain’s status on the primary ballot.

Two years ago, we went through the first round, but we didn’t land a chair,” said Stewart Thau, interim chairperson for the department and associate dean of The College of Arts and Sciences.

The college invited Charron to campus because of his work to broaden the company’s consumer appeal, said Karen Bakke, retailing department chairperson.

“We need to give the reality of consumer business to our students,” she said. “That’s where they’ll most likely be spending the next 40 years of their careers.”

Clinton gives last address

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bill Clinton, in the final State of the Union address of his roller-coaster presidency, outlined a far-reaching agenda Thursday aimed at fulfilling his commitment to the quest for political advantage in this year's elections.

Clinton said that today's overawing as easy as to whip out the national debt in just 13 years — with enough left over to extend the life of Social Security and Medicare and allow modest tax cuts.

Detailing an ambitious list of proposals more typical of a first-year president than a lame duck, Clinton challenged Republicans to abandon their commitment to balanced budgets for political advantage in this year's elections.

Clinton pitched a flurry of edifying tidbits that cover students from pre-school to graduate school.

The initiatives include a $1 billion increase in the Head Start programs for disadvantaged preschoolers, more than $500 million to expand after-school programs, another $1 billion in grants to help states and cities care more tenderly and a $30-billion package of tax breaks for college education.

Bill will require debt warnings

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a victory of consumer groups over financial services, Congress today upheld a 1995 law that requires banks to alert consumers when paying just the minimum amount due will add significantly to their interest costs.

The industry-backed bill, which the Senate will vote on next week, would make it harder for consumers to escape being swamped by debts ratcheting up through bankruptcy. It is similar to legislation passed last year by the House.

But in last-minute maneuvering, Sen. Paul Sarbanes, D-Md., succeeded in pushing through an amendment opposed by the industry. It would require credit-card billing statements to warn consumers about interest costs and provide toll-free phone numbers where they can learn how long it would take to eliminate a balance when paying just the minimum amount required each month.

Democratic and Republican leaders expect the bill to pass by a wide margin as early as today.

It is unclear whether the consumer-disclosure requirements will make it through the maze of reconciling the Senate and House versions of the bill, consumer groups say.

China cracks down on Internet

BEIJING — With its latest series of rules regulating Internet use, the Beijing government has sent another strong signal of its desire to control the burgeoning world of cyber-space — and its relative inability to do so.

Since Internet access began to grow here, the Beijing government has shown itself to be deeply ambivalent about the medium, acknowledging both its economic importance and its potential for undermining Communist Party supremacy with the unfettered flow of information.

MOSCOW — Raising questions about the Kremlin's justification for the war in Chechnya, former Prime Minister Serjii V. Stepashin said Thursday that Russia planned its invasion of the separatist republic in March — months before a Chechen attack in southern Russia that the government cited in sending in troops.

After an August attack by Chechen rebels on Dagestan and a series of apartment bombings in Moscow and southern Russia in August and September, anti-Chechen sentiment was high. But Russian leaders, launched an offensive in the southern republic after.

But concrete evidence that Chechen rebels behind the apartment bombings has never emerged.

Vladimir Putin's comments, which Russian authorities have never acknowledged, are key for the conspiracy theories.

Drogosz, a committee member.

"It's not yet guaranteed that he's coming," said Drogosz, a graduate student in public administration. "But we wanted to bring in someone who is a paradigm of getting an alternative public voice out. He's created public interest activism as we know it today."

Drogosz justified spending the $10,000 of GSO funds by noting the $100,000 available in the organization's budget, Drogosz said.

A number of GSO senators questioned the proposal, however, because paying Nader to speak might make it appear as though GSO was endorsing his presidential candidacy. Sen. Darryl Smith proposed an amendment to the initiative stating that GSO was in no way supporting Nader's run for president.

The expenditure is too expensive for just one speaker, said Smith, a physics graduate student. "I was against it for the amount of money they had allocated for it," he said. "I feel it will inherently take away from the potential for inviting other candidates to speak."

Fund debate ends

After months of debate about this issue, the Senate voted, 20-3, to spend $6,000 on a graduate student travel fund. The fund, proposed by the finance committee, will allow graduate students to apply for travel funds for conferences and research in their areas of study. GSO will set aside $1,200 each month for the next fiscal year for the expenses.

Although the travel fund issues came up in the organization for a few months, GSO President Eric Hunn said he was not surprised about the Senate's vote because they had come close to a decision before the end of the Fall 1999 Semester.

"At the last meeting, it appeared as though there was almost unanimous support for it," said Hunn, a law and graduate student in public administration.

"I know once somebody actually called the question that there would be enough support."

But Dan Neal, one of three senators who voted against the travel fund, said he did not think the Senate would pass the expenditure.

"I'm somewhat surprised because last time it seemed people were arguing about 50-50," said Neal, a graduate student in psychology. "And I didn't see that many changes made since last time."

The fund also should have been voted down because it would be impossible for the finance committee to objectively decide who should receive funding for travel and who should not, Neal said.

Despite debating intensely about the travel fund, the Senate took only five minutes to pass about 800 changes to the GSO Constitution.

All of the changes were spelling and grammar errors that the special initiatives committee had corrected, Hunn said. GSO needed to fix the mistakes quickly so the constitution would look more professional, something it probably could not have done in the past, he said.

"I was happy that the senators decided they could trust the good judgment of the (special initiatives) committee," Hunn said.

"In years past, a different GSO would have taken issue because it didn't trust the leadership."

The expenditure is too expensive for just one speaker, said Smith, a physics graduate student. "I was against it for the amount of money they had allocated for it," he said. "I feel it will inherently take away from the potential for inviting other candidates to speak."

"We deliver traditional academic services, but also reach out to the community," Thau said.

"The African-American Studies Department has 10 full-time professor positions, he said.

"It's one of the smaller departments in Arts and Sciences, but it's one of the larger departments in the country," he added.

About 20 to 40 students major and 30 students minor in African-American studies each year, Thau said. The department also serves many students who take African-American studies classes to add depth to their education, Thau added.

Originally from Nigeria, Olupuna is currently a professor of religion history, African and African-American Studies and director of religious studies at the University of California at Davis. If hired, Olupuna said he would move to Syracuse.

"Religions of our people of African descent are not only understudied, but they are under-theorized," he said.

Should SU create more themed housing floors?

I'm in favor of it. Freshman year, I choose Flint and Day and I ended up getting Brewer/Baldwin because my financial aid got in late. The students, no matter what, will find their own group. That's the way it is.

Let's get together

With the housing reservation process beginning in February, students need to have the necessary information to make informed decisions for their future.

Eric
Tartaglia

As the issue of themed housing at Syracuse University has been a topic of discussion in recent editorials, it is important that students are aware of the possible benefits of living in a themed community. There are numerous benefits for students living in themed communities. Living on a floor focused on a particular issue, major or lifestyle, fosters a smaller, stronger community for the students. SU is a large university. Themed communities can help it seem smaller and more intimate.

Secondly, themed housing increases faculty, staff and student interaction. This increased interaction helps connect the academic and co-curricular experiences for students. When a seamless learning environment such as this is created, research has shown that students become more actively involved in their learning and their community. Not only do students enjoy spending time with their friends, they also enjoy time spent together on the floor in both academic and non-academic pursuits.

Finally, for students who apply to live in themed housing, there is an opportunity to live with whom they share a floor and common living space. With a more narrow variety of students, the opportunity to branch out and develop relationships with different types of people will be lessened. While the formation of cliques among members of the Syracuse University community should be inhibited, grouping people together based on a specific interest or idea will only foster that kind of limited community. bordered by a more narrow variety of students. Themed housing is not required to create a sense of community or a more positive environment. Instead, floors dedicated exclusively to one area will be more likely to damage the overall range of a student's friendships and relationships with others. For most students during their first year, their closest friends are often the ones with whom they share a floor and common living space. With a more narrow variety of students, the opportunity to branch out and develop relationships with different types of people will be lessened. While the formation of cliques among members of the Syracuse University community should be inhibited, grouping people together based on a specific interest or idea will only foster that kind of limited community bordered by a more narrow variety of students.
Clinton needs better education proposal

In his final State of the Union address Thursday, President Bill Clinton proposed an ambitious, bipartisan financial plan to put more U.S. youth through college.

The proposal calls for a $30 billion higher education opportunity tax cut. If approved, middle-class families would be eligible for an annual tax deduction for up to $10,000 in college tuition costs.

In the Republican-controlled Congress, the cut stands a fair shot at approval. But it is unfortunate that educational funds must be pared out through a middle man — parents — when college students are on the cusp of learning to manage their own finances.

Instead of doling out money through a complicated bureaucracy, as the tax credit system would, students would benefit by funneling more funds toward existing loan programs and federally-funded grants.

Grants and low-interest loan programs have proven the test of time as a means to put college diplomas in the hands of the nation's youth.

Providing government-subsidized loans to students is a win-win situation for the United States: The nation gains a pack of educated citizens and earns its money back over time. Reluctance to underwrite educational improvements may get lost in the shuffle of other pending legislation.

The nation faces challenges across the board as it moves into the 21st century — from health care to Social Security reform. But to adequately plan for the future, the U.S. government must make significant investments in its most precious asset — the minds of its young.

Students must be conscious of safety when attending Orangemen games

The UConn/Syracuse game last Monday was toss-hardly exciting. I am proud of our team, as I know you are. But the scene turned frightening as the game ended, when hundreds of jubilant fans, many of immediately disregarded their own and others' safety as they erupted onto the court.

We were very fortunate that there were no serious injuries. Some fans know that fans were just caught up in the moment — it was a very exciting moment indeed — but there is a very great potential for disaster in such displays and we must avoid them in the future.

Join me in cheering the Orange until our threats are baseless. Let's not risk our safety or the safety of others by storming the court. Don't risk your safety, or the safety of other Dome patrons, sports commentators and our student athletes.

Robert T. Robinson
Director of Public Safety
To the Students of Syracuse University:

Last semester, Syracuse University, the City of Syracuse and the University neighborhood associations formed a new partnership to benefit students and residents living in the neighborhood east of campus. The goal of the University-Community Partnership is simply to enhance overall safety and improve the quality of life for everyone who lives in the neighborhood.

This year, a major focus for the partnership is the Neighborhood Patrol Initiative (NPI). It features special Syracuse Police Department patrols in the University area to deter crime, provide rapid response to any criminal incidents that do occur, and address other safety and quality-of-life issues, such as excessive noise, illegal parking and other city ordinance violations. City Police officers call our Public Safety officers to assist with specific incidents that involve Syracuse University students. Consequences do often result for those who violate the law or show disregard for the rights of others.

The neighborhood patrol concept was developed in January 1999—five months prior to the Livingston Avenue incident—by community residents, the Police Department’s Community Policing Office and the University in response to increasing crime in the neighborhood and increasingly disruptive behavior by a relatively small number of students living in off-campus apartments. At that time, the Westcott Community Development Corporation recommended a small grant to pilot the NPI for fall 1999. The Office of Judicial Affairs was not involved in the formation or implementation of this program; Judicial Affairs becomes involved only after alleged violations of the Code of Student Conduct are documented by Public Safety.

I want to emphasize that the NPI is not an attempt by the City or the University to single out students, or to punish students for the Livingston Avenue incident. The NPI is one part of a much larger effort begun several years ago to improve overall living conditions in the University’s east neighborhood for both students and permanent residents. And, these efforts are working—crime statistics recently released by the Syracuse Police Department show a significant reduction in the number of calls to the area, confirming that the special patrol is deterring crime. Moreover, the number of students documented for misconduct as a result of the NPI is very small—on average, less than five students per weekend of operation. We expect to continue this program, which all members of the partnership agree has had a beneficial effect on the neighborhood.

In addition to the NPI, the partnership has two other areas of focus. One is enforcement of underage drinking laws. The University continues to address the very real issue of binge drinking among students and will support efforts to enforce underage drinking laws, both on and off campus.

The other area of focus is enforcement of fire and safety codes in off-campus apartments. Syracuse University is engaged in dialogs with landlords and the City to address safety and other issues to halt deterioration of rental properties, and we are working to develop model leases that students can use to protect themselves. Students can help maintain and improve the quality of off-campus housing by calling the University’s Office of Community Relations (443-3919), or the City Code Enforcement Office (448-8695) directly, to report apartment safety concerns. The Office of Community Relations also is a good resource for general information about off-campus life.

In addition to lessons learned in the classroom, Syracuse University remains focused on helping all members of our community become responsible citizens. Off-campus living, while providing a measure of independence from the University, also results in increased responsibility for students as adult citizens and members of a larger community. Student residents have an important role to play in positively affecting the east neighborhood environment.

I invite all members of the University community to discuss these issues further. On Tuesday, February 8, at 7 p.m. in Hendricks Chapel, Dean Thomas V. Wolfe will moderate a campus meeting on issues related to the University-Community Partnership and student safety. I hope you will attend.

Sincerely,

announced his retirement, the University Senate Committee on Women's Concerns urged the Senate and Chancellor Kenneth A. G. to actively recruit and hire a woman to succeed Vinocow. A selection committee responded this past summer by choosing Freund as SU's first woman vice chancellor.

Alejandro Garcia, a professor in the School of Social Work, said the university changed for the better.

"I think that the university realized the need for a more multi-racial faculty because that is the way the real world is," Garcia said.

When he first started teaching at SU 23 years ago, Garcia said the university faculty was dominated by men. But now, in part to an expansion in the women's studies program, the numbers are beginning to change, he added.

The university must continue the trend of hiring more women and minorities to provide students with contacts from various backgrounds, Freund said.

"Having a more diverse faculty will make the university a more real and welcoming place, more diverse, she added.

SU established the Women in Sciences and Engineering program in 1996 to identify and recruit talented female candidates for jobs positions.

Shiu-Kai Chin, a professor of electrical and computer engineering, noted the success of WISE. The program influenced the hiring of three women this year in the engineering department, he added.

Having a diverse faculty that students can identify with is extremely important in encouraging participation from various ethnic groups, Chin said. Since there are a variety of projects to build and design, students encounter different kinds of problems and may need the assistance of faculty members from a wide range of backgrounds, he added.

"The United States is changing demographically and we must reflect that diversity," Chin said.

A diverse faculty provides students with different views on situations, said Ysanne Harper, a sophomore advertising major.

"It is nice to see more diversity among the faculty because it gives you a different perspective on the world," Harper said.

Tejani Mendiz, a freshman biology major, said she has not noticed a change yet, but it is comforting to know the university is becoming a bit more diverse. Sometimes minority students feel singled out when dealing with all-white professors, said Mendiz, who is black.

"It is a step in the right direction," Mendiz said. "And it makes me feel like the struggle to prove ourselves is paying off."

Students ready to support Bradley in N.H.

BY NICHOLAS STEFFENS
Staff Writer

More than 25 Syracuse University students will join hundreds of college students this weekend in New Hampshire to campaign for presidential candidate and former New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley.

The students are part of SU for Bill Bradley, a 90-member group which began last week with only 10 people who attended their first meeting, said Brooke Schiferle, the group’s coordinator.

“It’s ecstatic,” said Scott Lipton, a group member. “It shows the exact opposite of what everyone, including myself, thought about this campus six months ago.”

The group will advertise Bradley’s platforms by going door-to-door in New Hampshire neighborhoods, calling residents and distributing literature, said Schiferle, a senior political science major. They will also attend a get-out-the-vote pep rally, she said.

The students will be traveling into “politics at ground zero,” said Stephanie Miner, a Bradley supporter and a senior political science major. “It shows the exact opposite of what everyone, including myself, thought about this campus six months ago.”

The Bradley supporters will experience a “once in a lifetime” New Hampshire primary because the Republican and Democratic contests are competitive, Miner said.

The SU students, who will be accompanied by four St. Lawrence University students, will leave Syracuse at 8 a.m. Saturday and return late Sunday night, Schiferle said.

The students are part of SU for Bill Bradley and a local Boys and Girls Club. Several Central New York Bradley supporters are renting cars for the trip.

“I think it’s going to be an experience we will soon not forget,” Schiferle said.

In addition to supporters from SU and St. Lawrence, students from more than 100 universities across the country will work in New Hampshire for Bradley, said Steve Wachtel, the Bradley campaign’s New Hampshire internship coordinator.

“One thing we’ve known all along is that we have a lot more support on college campuses than the vice president,” he said of Democratic opponent Vice President Al Gore.

Heavy collegiate support will be coming from the Washington, D.C. area. More than 60 George Washington University students will work on the campaign, he said.

“You can see in his eyes how enthused he is,” said Wachtel of Bradley and his youth supporters. “I think it energizes him a lot as well as the rest of the staff.”

Despite Bradley’s loss in Monday’s Iowa Caucus, SU Bradley supporters expect him to win in New Hampshire. Bradley only garnered 35 percent of the caucus votes, compared to Gore’s 63 percent.

“I’m expecting Bradley to win,” said Upton, a junior political science and policy studies major. “Iowa is not an indicator of New Hampshire or the rest of the country.”

The caucus process, which involves public voting, is biased toward established party candidates, Upton said. People will often vote to appease a party leader, instead of voting for who they want to see, she said.

Bradley’s anti-establishment message will resonate much better in New Hampshire, a state that usually supports upset candidates, she said.

Recent polls from the Quinnipiac College Polling Institute show a close Democratic race in the New Hampshire primary.

The Jan. 25 Quinnipiac poll shows a tie in the primary, with Gore and Bradley each receiving 46 percent. In a poll taken Jan. 13, Bradley had a 10-point lead.

and Gamble and VP Corp. He was hired by Liz Claiborne in 1994 as a consultant. He said the company underwent a financial and leadership crisis in the 1980s, he said.

After six months, Charron was promoted to CEO to transform the 23-year-old company's crummy image into a business that would appeal to women and men of all ages and backgrounds, he said.

The company became the last fashion, accessories and apparel company in the United States and is now worth $32.6 billion, he said.

"I'm not going to tell you that I walked in and things were swinging from the trees," Charron said. "I was confident, but I did not know how screwed up the company was."

In his time at the company, he replaced Liz Claiborne designers using magic markers and paste-up techniques to craft designs. It was then that he realized the company employed more people than it could afford, he said.

Re subtype proved to be off 25 percent of his workforce and replaced the workforce's 1 million in computer technology.

"We had so much success in the early 1980s that we got smug and arrogant," Charron said. "I needed to develop a vision and mission."

Charron blamed the company's unstable leadership and the lack of a clear strategy, like Ralph Lauren and Tommy Hilfiger, for the company's loss of appeal in the early 1990s.

"We were doing stupid things," he said. "The world had dramatically changed since 1976 and we were boring."

Charron transplanted 80 employees from the company's headquarters in Manhattan to a warehouse in a small town in New Hampshire and said the task of bringing Liz Claiborne into the next century.

He also interviewed as many people in the industry as he could find and took voluminous notes of his observations, he said.

After running up a $25 million dollar debt, Charron determined seven principles of business that would lead the company into the future.

"Product is the most important principle," he said. "If we screw up product right and screw up everything else, we'll be OK. If we screw up product, we have nothing."

Charron then fixed the task of building a consumer base that reached beyond middle-aged career women.

The company spent about $400 million conducting consumer research — the first of its kind in Liz Claiborne history — to discover the kinds of products its multi-faceted consumers would want in the coming years.

By 1999, Liz Claiborne, which is the only Fortune 500 company to have four women on its board of directors, expanded to men's clothing lines and began selling less expensive labels to stores like Wal-Mart, J.C. Penny and Sears, Charron said.

It also acquired women and men's fashion lines from DKNY and Kenneth Cole, he added.

"We're definitely looking for more businesses to buy," he said. "I am in the midst of a major buying acquisition. But if I said the name here, my lawyers wouldn't be very happy." said Charron.

In recent years, however, Charron recognized that Liz Claiborne has received criticism for not hiring an equitable number of minority employees, especially blacks. He said that the company could improve its minority hiring practices, but that it hires based on talent and not race.

"We're working diligently with predominantly black schools to get more people into the company," he said. "But we don't go out looking for people."

Joanne Cary, a junior retailing major, attended the lecture and said Charron was a more dynamic speaker than past lecturers.

"It was interesting," she said, "especially because women are in charge of fashion lines for men."
said. "It's sad to see what they've been reduced to.

The New York State Board of Elections in Albany overturned the challenges Wednesday in eight upstate congressional districts. The state board hears challenges for districts that overlap county borders. County election boards vote on challenges for districts contained within counties.

The State Republican Party immediately appealed the Albany decision to the State Supreme Court and a judge overturned the board's vote Thursday afternoon, removing McCain from the ballot in all eight districts.

"You can't let it upset you, but it's very disturbing that such a thing would still happen in the freest nation in the world," McCain said at a town hall meeting Thursday at Nashua High School in Nashua, N.H. "It's just really very, very unprofessional.

Bush must meet the Republican Party in restoring true democratic ideals to the primary process, he added, asking for Bush and New York state Gov. George E. Pataki to help remedy his situation.

"I wish that Gov. Bush would pick up the phone and call Gov. Pataki and say, "Let John McCain on the ballot,"" McCain said. "We all know that I'm a qualified candidate. They continue to exercise this kind of Communist behavior by keeping a qualified candidate off the ballot.

The challenges originally failed at the state board in Albany because of actions by the two Democratic members of the board. The board has four members, two Democrat and two Republicans. For a challenge to succeed, it must receive the support of three of the four board members.

While both Republican members voted to remove McCain from the ballot in the eight disputed districts, the two Democrats abstained from voting. The abstentions made it impossible for the board to reach the three-vote total required for removal.

The actions of the board members, however, were independent of the state party and Democratic leaders did not organize the abstentions, Kauffman said.

"The state party had nothing to do with that," he said. "The State Republican Party can self-destruct by itself, it doesn't need our help.

Earlier this week, the New York State Board of Elections removed McCain from the ballot in two districts. Three other challenges are still pending.

Two county election boards on Long Island also removed McCain from the ballot, while the Monroe County board voted to allow McCain to remain on their ballot.

The petition challenges are a direct attempt to keep McCain off the New York state ballot, Kauffman said. Republican supporters, including Pataki and State Republican Party Chairman, still will tell their voters to sign in the upcoming challenges to create an easy win for Bush, their favored candidate, he added.

McCain and his supporters said they praised the positive ruling by the state board, but are disappointed in the judge's decision and New York state laws that continue to hamper legitimate regulation.

"We're pleased that the state board would make the right decision," said Howard Opinsky, a McCain campaign spokesperson. "But it's unfortunate that New York maintains elections laws that are so byzantine and restrict voter's choices so much.

"The fairness and constitutionality of the state laws will take center stage in a lawsuit McCain filed with a federal court to secure his appearance on the ballot in all of the state's 31 districts. In a lawsuit filed in December and hearings are set to begin in January, McCain is challenging the ballot.

"The law deprives New York voters of a choice," said Daniel Allen, state Republican Party spokesperson. "It's ironic that voters in Moscow will have a choice in their upcoming election than voters in New York."

Republicans refute

New York state Republican Party denies any intentional attempt to keep McCain off the ballot and is simply trying to verify his petitions' legitimacy, said Daniel Allen, state Republican Party spokesperson.

"It's the position of the party that we have to get each candidate to verify their validity," he said. "It's our responsibility to check out all the signatures. Every signer's name has to be verified."

The state party filed no challenges against Bush's petitions, however, because they believe no reason to suspect his petitions' legitimacy, Allen said. In the 16 districts where the state Republicans filed challenges, there was always evidence that McCain did not have the required number of signatures, he added.

The state laws exist for legitimate reasons and it is the state party's duty to ensure that all candidates realize the reasons for the laws and follow them, Allen said. "Our rules are set up because our process is as diverse as the concerns of families in Buffalo are not the same as in families on Long Island," he said. "We have to make sure all those concerns are taken into account.

Despite the rulings by various election boards, McCain may still be on the ballot in New York state's districts because of his victory, said Lee Daghlian, New York State Board of Elections spokesperson.

"I don't see the unconstitutionality of it," he said. "It's always been up to the states to prepare rules and regulate how candidates get on the ballot, but the judge may change everything."

McCain's New York state difficulties began in December when his state campaign group collected nearly 30,000 statewide voter signatures on petitions supporting his place on the March 7 primary election ballot. New York state election law requires candidates for the primary elections to collect signatures from registered Republicans in each district where they wish to appear on the ballot.

Candidates are required to collect 3,000 signatures or 5 percent of the signatures of the total number of registered Republicans in the district, whichever is less. Because candidates are required to collect petitions in all districts, a candidate may appear on the ballot in some districts but not others.

McCain's organization managed to file enough signatures to place him on the ballot in 25 of 31 congressional districts.

Students defend McCain

Both Republican and Democratic students at Syracuse University endorsed McCain's cause for voter choice.

The state's current election laws allow the parties to keep their candidates on the ballot even if there are legitimate choices in the primary, Burns said. A Burns chairperson of SU's College Republicans.

Burns recently endorsed Steve Forbes and was working for the Forbes campaign on the Internet. Some people have told me it would be better for Steve Forbes if McCain was not on the ballot," he said. "Regardless of that, it's not fair and he should be on the ballot.

Even more disturbing than the state laws, however, is the attempt by Bush's supporters to keep McCain off the ballot, Burns said.

"Simply because he's a candidate, he should be on the ballot," he said. "Gov. Bush should order his supporters to stop harassing McCain on this.""

Tonight, the Wu-Tang Killah Bee known as Method Man, will be flashing a gold-plated smile and his gravely Wu-Tang style in a sold-out concert at Goldstein Auditorium. Expect pyro, hydro and an unmatched flow of hard beats and rhymes.

Mr. Meth's current small-venue tour comes after an eventful year which first saw him coupleing with Redman as the tag-team opening act for the record-breaking, $18 million-grossing Hard-Knock Life Tour headlined by Jay-Z and DMX. The two New York natives from the Bricks and Shaolin first collaborated on the cut "How High" in 1995.

They clicked so well together on the tour that they also released an album titled "Blackout" last fall. The pair's machine gun rap energy is rare today and comparable to that of legendary old school duos like Eric B. and Rakim.

Along with finding a partner in rhyme in '99, Method Man also earned some street credit in the burgeoning "rap-metal" scene beginning with Gangstar's DJ Premier-produced track "N 2 Gether Now" on Limp Bizkit's "Significant Other." Band leader Fred Durst was so impressed with the seasoned rapper during recording sessions that he invited him and Redman to tour with him on the annual "Family Values" outing late in 1999.

Students with a wide variety of musical tastes will flock to see Method Man tonight. Chris Preczewski, a freshman architecture major, said the performer has a broad crossover appeal for all types of audiences.

"Meth can be as appealing to someone from New Hampshire as someone from the streets of New York," he said.

And the streets of New York are exactly where Method Man, born Clifford Smith, began his path to hip-hop stardom. While living with his mother and two sisters in the Park Hill projects of Staten Island, Smith freestyled and forged friendships with Robert Diggs (RZA), Gary Grice (GZA, who made a stop at the Schine Underground last semester)

No kid gloves for Washington, ‘Hurricane’

Here comes the story of ‘The Hurricane.’

Sorry, we had to write it.

Anyway, we were referring to the movie, not to the man, although the story of the man is depicted in the movie.

But we could also have referred to the Bob Dylan song, which is played throughout the film. Finally — a Dylan song which has been reinterpreted and not be mistaken for a Gun 'n Roses or Jimi Hendrix tune. The song itself tells the basic plot of the movie and traces the path of Rubin Carter. Carter's life is not, though, the only film to do this — see ‘Man on the Moon’ in recent cinematic history.

Denzel Washington plays Rubin "Hurricane" Carter, the former championship boxer and notorious victim of a racist conspiracy leading to unjust prison imprisonment. He is the center of this story — a most ordinary person with the most extraordinary heartfelt intentions.

A true story, the film follows Carter's life of hardships through a number of prison stints from a juvenile to adult, by way of his autobiography. In reading his story, an inner-city youth, Lesra (Vincent Reon Shannon) finds the opportunity to change his life through his own education.

This youth's illiteracy is obliterated early in the film and leads him to the discovery of his first book, "The Sixteenth Round," by a then-unknown inmate, Carter.

Lesra is enamored not only by Carter's story, but also with his own life brought to the book as he reads it. Taking the advice of his young Canadian mentors, Lesra decides to contact Carter and profess his thanks for this spiritual connection between them.

Lettera becomes visits and strangers become family, as both Lesra and Carter maintain the quest to free an innocent man and their search for truth.

The case itself is shown on screen a number of times. The proof lies in the works of Richard Wright, and Lesra's influence catalyzes a number of inter-relationships that ultimately contribute to Carter's freedom.

Throughout the film, the strength of the protagonists' inter-relationships lies in their ability to educate themselves.

Carter, influenced by the Harlem Renaissance, specifically the works of Richard Wright, and Lesra's influence — Carter himself — allow him to share this idea of self-betterment. Rubin Carter's self-determination, both in the ring and in the cell, is something to be admired.

Although not the first time seen in a boxing film, it's effectively portrayed in a style reminiscent of "Rocky" and "Raging Bull," the latter of which also shares a visual style in the ring with "The Hurricane." Carter to justice.

was almost non-existent.
"We had a talk with her, and we told her we needed her to step up. She's not a freshman anymore in our minds. She's a player."

Bento said Perry's potential is so large that she will be a vital cog in SU's run toward the Big East tournament in March.

Perry said her love for rebounding stems from chasing after the ball and battling against different types of opponents.

"I like to jump," Perry said. "So wherever the ball goes, I'll step up at the botttom and try to get the rebound. I just like rebounding."

For her efforts, Perry was named the Big East rookie of the week on Monday. She was co-rookie of the week the week of Nov. 29 with Villanova's Tr-ish Juhline, but this is her first solo act.

Perry took home the conference's top honors for a newcomer by aiding the Orgowomen with a double-double of 15 points and 15 rebounds against the Wildcats last Wednesday night. In the win, Perry shot 4-for-6 from the field and 7-for-10 from the charity stripe.

Perry joins teammate Beth Record in a Syracuse sweep of conference honors.

Perry scored Villanova's career-high of 28 points in last week's win.

She leads the team and the league in scoring with 18.6 points per game. She followed her Villanova performance with a double-double of 19 points and 11 rebounds on Tuesday night's 80-66 loss to Pittsburgh.

After dismantling the Wildcats 66-42 last Wednesday at Manley Field House, the Orangewomen looked to regain the stroke which enabled them to start the season
4-0.

But Syracuse had a week-long layoff due to the postponement of Saturday's game at Seton Hall, and failed to regain that Villanova touch.

The Orangewomen had a two-point lead at halftime but saw Pittsburgh go on a 27-9 second-half run on route to a 80-66 victory over SU in the Steel City on Tuesday night.

"In crunch time, the last six or seven minutes of the ball game, we really didn't put the effort out," Bento said. "Pittsburgh just straight outplayed us. It wasn't anything in particular that we did as far as execution goes.
We just didn't have the effort and intensity that we needed."

As Syracuse strives to regain the form it held against Villanova, West Virginia is just trying to regain some dig-ity. The Mountaineers have looked more lost than a five-year-old separated from his parents at a shopping mall.

West Virginia has dropped eight straight games and is winless in six conference matchups.

The Mountaineers rank near the bottom in most offensive category. They do not own a single player in the top five of any Big East offensive category.

The Mountaineers enter the Salt City on the heels of a 61-45 loss to Georgetown on Wednesday.

Senior guard Mandy Ronny faces the Mountaineer offense with 10.9 points and 4.8 assists per game. Syracuse and West Virginia split last year's season series, with each team winning on its own court.

West Virginia does not exactly have a true home court to call its own this season.

Due to an asbestos problem, the Mountaineers have been forced to play their home games at three different sites, including nearby Morgantown High School.

The Orangewomen follow the Mountaineer game with a road trip to southeastern Pennsylvania to face Villanova.

With the Pittsburgh loss behind them, a conference win over a hapless West Virginia squad this weekend would prove beneficial in SU's efforts to move up in the Big East standings.

"I think these next couple days of practice, we'll be concentrating on ourselves and getting back to where we need to be," Bento said. "Geting into West Virginia, it's going to be a good opportuniity for us, we feel, to redeem ourselves and get back on track."

The Syracuse men's and women's swimming teams head to Connecticut on Saturday to take on the Huskies after having battled a team that resembled them in many ways only seven days before.

SU head coach Lou Walker said that he hopes to use last week's meet against West Virginia as a model for their performances against UConn. Last Saturday, the SU men dominated the Mountaineers, while the Orange women needed to come from behind to win.

"Honestly, it's very much the same thing as West Virginia," Walker said. "Our guys are clearly the stronger team. The women's meet again this weekend will be close."

Last season, the Orange men finished third at the Big East Championships, four places ahead of the Huskies and three ahead of West Virginia. On the women's side, SU, WVU and UConn finished fifth, sixth and seventh, respectively.

Syracuse should enter the meet as the favorite, and it did against West Virginia, as Walker is beginning to lighten his team's pressures for the conference championships.

"A lot of people are still tired," junior Dustin Riley said. "But we should do pretty well."

Last Saturday, the Orange men spanked the Mountaineers 142-93 to push their dual meet record to 4-1. The women, however, had more of a challenge, as they came back from a three-point deficit heading into the last two events to take a 128-113 victory.

"We had a lot of people racing tough in there and getting the points we needed," Walker said. "The women continued to show their depth and with the seniors winning events, led by two swimmers from freshman Julianna Day and sophomore Djordje Filipovic.

Loveless recorded the longer distance leg, winning the 1,000 yard freestyle in a season-best time of 10:23.90. She then came back after a two-event break to win an executive events, the 200 individual medley and 200 butterfly (1:58.13).

"We really just dominated the meet from start to finish," Walker said. "It was really a total team effort."

The Bryan sisters, Melanie and Kelly, held their own in capturing Orange's outside barrage.

"They're really athletic. They have a lot of talent and they can step it up and put pressure on you," said Walker. "But we should do pretty well.

In the past, SU's outside barrage has been the key to victory.

The fourth-ranked Orangemen, led by point guard Jason Hart, who's averaging more than seven assists and who can shoot the ball really well, is going to be tough.

"We still have six players averaging between nine and 10 points per game, led by Thomas' 14-4.

Those six players don't include freshmen forwards Derrick Coleman and Williams who scored in double digits.

Williams blew up for 23 against Pittsburgh and hit two key 3-pointers on his way to nine points.

The Orange head to Storrs this weekend as the Huskies seem to have a mission.

With SU seemingly on a mission and Boston College in the middle of an only losing streak, Saturday's outcome would be preordained. Bell, however, is one person not counting out his team's chances."

"If my team is still playing, there's no telling what could happen," Bell said. "We just want to have the opportunity to have to go right. If we play the best we can, we can beat anyone. We have shooters.

We have the people."

SU faces Beantown showdown

BY CONNOR ENNIS
Asst. Sports Editor

There will be no ESPN cameras, no loud, bald-headed announcers and no nationally ranked opponent.

The only similarity between Syracuse's victory over Connecticut on Monday and the Orangemen's upcoming battle against Boston College is that SU's unbeaten record will once again be on the line.

Syracuse (16-0, 6-0 Big East) looks to keep its record without blemish when it faces the Eagles (9-9, 1-5) at noon Saturday at Conte Forum.

A win would also put this SU team into the record books with the best start in school history. Right now, this version of the Orangemen is tied with the 1917-18 squad.

The BC game might seem a prime opportunity for the Orangemen to let down. They come off an impressive 88-74 nationally televised win over No. 6 UConn.

On the other end of the spectrum, Boston College limps into Saturday's contest on a five-game losing skid.

SU's players say, however, that the win over the Huskies and their status as Division I's only undefeated team has in no way made them complacent.

"It's a great accomplishment," sophomore Preston Shumpert said. "We feel that we're a great team, but we've got more to accomplish. I think we're not satisfied."

Boston College's record would look much more impressive had it not taken a nose dive once conference play began.

Before the conference falter, however, BC spanked both the Eagles and their status as Division I's only undefeated team has in no way made them complacent.

Boston College's record would look much more impressive had it not taken a nose dive once conference play began.

Leading the Eagles is freshman guard Troy Bell, who has appeared in all 18 of BC's contests. The rookie ranks first on the team in scoring, with 18.8 points per game, and assists, with 2.1. He also has 26 steals, good for second on the squad.

Bell's backcourt mate, junior Xavier Singletary, is the only other Eagle with a double figure scoring average. Singletary, a transfer from Howard University, pours in 15.4 points a game and leads the team with 34 steals.

Bell and Singletary also lead the Eagles 3-point shooting, hitting 37 and 33 shots, respectively, from behind the arc. While this will be Bell's inaugural game against SU, the freshman sensation knows he and the rest of the Eagles have more to accomplish. I think we're not satisfied."

Bel leads Eagles

Asst. Sports Editor

Troy Bell fondly remembers the glory days of his youth.

He played the part of the little guy who slippin' between the two oafs in a game of backyard football, the pint-sized peon who outsmarted everyone by two steps.

And Bell had lofty aspirations for his gridiron career at the Academy of Holy Angels in Richfield, Minn.

"I went out for the football team, and I was just to play, Bell said. "But I was only 5-foot-6, 125 pounds. I wasn't going to be starting quarterback, so that wasn't going to work out. I just said forget it."

Good thing. With that decision, Bell decided to focus his efforts on basketball.

Seven inches, 50 pounds and 2,491 Holy Angels points later, Bell finds himself wearing Boston College's crimson and gold.

Someone should tell Shannon Perry point guards don't usually rebound well.

Most players under 6-feet tall in women's college basketball are known more for scoring and distributing.

But the 5-foot-8 Perry has introduced her knack for rebounding to the Manley Field House crowds.

Behind her 7.1 rebounds per game, Perry leads Syracuse (8-8, 1-4 Big East) into a game against West Virginia at 2 p.m. Saturday afternoon at Manley Field House.

As the lone freshman on the team, Perry has exceeded the expectations placed on her by the Syracuse coaching staff.

"She started off the season on a great note," SU assistant coach Michelle Bento said. "She had about four ballgames there where we felt she"

Take note of these little-known illnesses before heading off on vacation ventures:

Know Your ABCs
Travelers to developing countries where sanitation habits are poor are at risk of contracting Hepatitis A. Most episodes of infection are spread by infected food handlers that may not have any signs of illness. By failing to wash his hands adequately after a bowel movement, such disease carriers can spread the virus to food in the preparation and serving process. Transmission can also occur by drinking sewage-contaminated water or by eating contaminated raw shellfish.

For protection, travelers may receive one of the two Hepatitis A vaccines (administered as a single dose at least two weeks prior to departure, followed by a booster dose in six to 12 months) or an injection of immune globulin.

The facts
Lyme disease is the most common disease spread by insects in the United States, with more than 50 cases occurring in the northeast and north central states. While the disease spread by lyme disease was approved by the FDA in 1998; more than 1,600 cases are reported each year. The disease is transmitted only through bites of infected ticks and can be prevented by avoiding areas with brush and small wild animals. Lyme disease can be avoided by taking triple drug doses of doxycycline and one-half of visitors to the tropics will encounter when trying to enjoy their vacation ventures. But many hidden dangers. Dr. Mary Nettlemann of the University of Iowa College of Medicine said that up to one-half of visitors to the tropics will spend a large part of their journey jumping from toilet to toilet. And others can incur diseases that although rare, could potentially be deadly. The most common disease found south of the border is traveler's diarrhea.

This ailment, though not extremely dangerous, poses much more of a hassle than any traveler would like to encounter when trying to enjoy their fun in the sun. According to the Centers for Disease Control, traveler's diarrhea can be caused by a plethora of things, which is why the problem is so prevalent among tourists. Although viruses, bacteria, parasites or insects may cause it, it is usually caught through a boat such as contaminated water or mishandled food. This is why there is such insistence on drinking bottled or boiled water. But when neither option is available, there are still ways to avoid trouble.

Filtering water through an "Absolute 1-micron filter" and dissolving iodine tablets in the water effectively removes 99.9 percent of contaminate.

Nettlemann said that after the water should be as clean or cleaner than any tap water you'd find at home.

Diarrhea can most definitely put a cramp in vacation plans but it's one of the mildest things in the harmful bag of traveler's illnesses.

Biting back
Malaria is classified as one of the most infectious diseases worldwide and infection among exposed travelers is growing at an alarming rate, according to the World Health Organization. It is transmitted by female mosquitoes, and even if briefly exposed — just one night in a malarious area — protective measures are imperative. It's possible to contract malaria during brief stopovers at airports in malarious zones if officials have not taken proper measures to rid the area of mosquitoes. But this matter can be cleared up by taking the problem into your own hands before it even becomes an issue. Chloroquine is the most common drug taken for malaria prevention, but it only serves to limit the extent of infection and suppresses the symptoms. The infection itself is characterized by flu-like symptoms, including fever, body aches and diarrhea, though it can have much more dangerous consequences if left untreated.

If these symptoms aren't recognized or go untreated for weeks or months, complications can lead to shock, liver and kidney failure, coma and even death. The most practical way to avoid the disease all together is to stay away from infected areas, but when that's not possible, always wear shoes instead of sandals, use unscented soaps and deodorant, which can lure bugs, and always use an effective insect repellent with a high DEET concentration.

CDC recommends various immuni- zations travelers should have before leaving the country. Cholera, Hepatitis A, Typhoid, Tetanus and Influenza top their list of the most important.

While infectious diseases certainly pose a valid threat to travelers, more accidents kill many more people than all other diseases combined, according to WHO resources. The endless boardwalks of clubs, bars and shops can lead to slightly irresponsible behavior during the vacation ventures, but common sense should always prevail.

The road trip — a classic component of the American Dream. From settlers crossing the continent to fulfill their belief in manifest destiny to modern-day works like Jack Kerouac’s beatnik classic “On the Road” or the film “Easy Rider,” the open road has always called to the American spirit.

Many college students take advantage of spring break to grab a map and tap into this spirit, and the highways of our nation fill with migrating students. This part of the American Dream, however, can become a nightmare when automobile troubles crop up. And for those mechanically-challenged college students who have never known a world without full-service gas stations, even the most minor car troubles can send them into panic at a moment’s notice.

If drivers aren’t careful and conscientious, even small car problems can quickly become large car problems, said Hilary Harned, manager of Sears Auto Center, 3649 Erie Blvd. The only way to deal with car trouble, he said, is knowledge of the car and preparation for trouble.

Knowledge of how to turn the key in the ignition may not always be enough to get drivers from Point A to Point B. For example, Harned said, someone attempting to jump-start a car incorrectly could cause the battery to blow up like a grenade in their face. Lack of preparation will also cause problems, he added, since students familiar with changing a tire might be surprised to find their spare tire deflated and is unsuitable for use. The best policy anyone can follow on a road trip, Harned said, is use common sense.

Spending a little time and effort checking the car before leaving the driveway can save a lot of hassle later on. Harned recommends having a professional inspect any car before it is taken for an extended trip. Many auto shops, he said, will give quick, yet thorough inspections for no charge. Some items that should be on the mechanic’s checklist include the inflation levels for all the car’s tires (including the spare), engine belt wear and fluid levels. Even cursory checks of these items can identify and prevent potential problems.

Kit and kaboodle
Harned also advocates the use of a car safety kit, which includes common tools to use in the unfortunate event of a breakdown. These safety kits generally include flashlights, reflectors, tire irons, help signs and jumper cables. Such kits are available at most auto and many general stores. Prices range from $20 to $50.

“It’ll come in handy, whether on a long road trip or a short trip to the grocery store,” Harned said. “Even if you never use the kit, it’s worth the price for peace of mind.”

Car problems tend to come at the worst time, Harned joked — at night, in the cold, alone. But he

CHANGING A TIRE
1. Make sure that your vehicle will not move or roll. If you have a manual transmission, put the gearshift in 1 (First). Set the parking brake and place a block under the tire that you are changing.
2. Get the spare tire and jack, if you have not already done so.
3. Remove the wheel covers to expose the bolts on the tire.
4. Loosen the wheel lug nuts by turning the handle of the wrench one-half turn counterclockwise. Do not remove the wheel lug nuts until you raise the wheel completely off the ground.
5. Fit the jack under a solid part of the car, Use the jack to raise the wheel completely off the ground.
6. Remove the lug nuts by using the lug wrench assembly.
7. Replace the flat tire with the spare tire.
8. Replace the lug nuts. Do not fully tighten the lug nuts until after you lower the vehicle. If you do, you could force the vehicle off the jack.
9. Lower the vehicle, using the jack.
10. Remove the jack and fully tighten the lug nuts, alternating tightening the nuts across from each other.
11. Put the tire, jack, wrench and any other items away in the trunk.
12. Unblock the wheels.

JUMP STARTING A CAR
1. Put the second vehicle close to the hood of the stalled vehicle, but make sure the vehicles do not touch.
2. Set the parking brake on both vehicles, and clear the engine cooling fins. Make sure the battery cables are off both vehicles. This helps protect the electrical system from possible damage.
3. Connect one end of the first jumper cable to the positive (+) terminal of the dead battery. Most jumper cables have a red cable and a black cable. The red cable is generally used for the positive terminal and the black for the negative one.
4. Connect the other end of the cable to the positive (+) terminal of the booster battery.
5. Connect one end of the second cable to the negative (-) terminal of the Booster battery, not the dead battery.
6. Connect the other end of the cable to a good metallic surface on the engine or frame of the vehicle that you want to jump-start, making sure it is clear of any rotating engine components.
7. Start the stallied car.
Top 10 Tips for Travelers
1. Make sure you have a signed, valid passport (and visas, if required). Also, before you go, fill in the emergency information page of your passport.

2. Read the Consular Information Sheets (and Public Announcements or Travel Warnings, if applicable) for the countries you plan to visit.

3. Familiarize yourself with local laws and customs of the countries to which you are traveling. Remember, the U.S. Constitution does not follow you. While in a foreign country, you are subject to its laws.

4. Make two copies of your passport identification page. This will facilitate replacement if your passport is lost or stolen. Leave one copy at home with friends or relatives. Carry the other with you in a separate place from your passport.

5. Leave a copy of your itinerary with family or friends at home so that you can be contacted in case of an emergency.

6. Do not leave your luggage unattended in public areas. Do not accept packages from strangers.

7. If you plan to stay abroad for more than two weeks, upon arrival, you should notify by phone or register in person with the U.S. embassy in the country you are visiting. This will facilitate communication in case someone contacts and accuses looking for you. It is also a good practice to keep your passport in a safe place other than your luggage.

8. When sightseeing, there are also ways to cut down on the prices of attractions, such as museums. Many European countries offer student ID cards that give discounts on flights, museums and other tourist attractions. Paris offers a special museum card with discounted admission to museums, including the Louvre.

9. While special tours and trips are often very expensive, Coen added that it is important to splurge in some areas. "If it is a beautiful day, take that one special chair ride up in the Alps," she said. "It is so worthwhile. A scenic trip can be one of a kind, despite the cost."

10. Certain countries also have a higher price tag than others do. Right now, Coen said visits to London, Paris and Venice pull hardest on the purse strings, while Portugal, Greece and Turkey are relatively inexpensive.

Cheap Trek

Design an exciting European vacation—without breaking the bank.

With a reputation for exquisite restaurants and expensive attractions, Europe is not often a hot spot for penny-pinching students. But there are many ways to cut costs abroad that make traveling through Europe on a shoe-string budget a great option for younger travelers.

Rick Steves' Europe Through the Back Door is a travel company that has been helping people with tips and short cuts for budget travel for nearly 20 years. Julie Coen, travel manager for the company, said the key to making a visit to Europe affordable is researching and exploring ways to get around high price tags before the trip even begins.

Coen said the price can be cut down in a variety of areas. She said that one of the main ways to bring down costs is to cut back on money spent on food. She suggested finding university cafeterias or all-you-can-eat buffets for cheaper dining options. When shopping, Coen said to bargain and buy directly from locals.

"You have to be creative," Coen said. "If you are traveling with a big group, go to the grocery and have your own picnic. Not only is it less expensive than eating in a restaurant, but it is also a great way to experience the culture."

Get Carded

Stash this plastic in your wallet for vacation steals and deals.

For those with a walletful of maxed-out plastic, dousing out the cash for a spring break trip overseas seems a bit foreboding. Jetting off to foreign lands leads to cumbersome airfare expenses and other draining necessities such as food and lodging. The new world traveler also has to struggle with fluctuating exchange rates, which don't always favor the American dollar.

But for the student, there is one savior — the International Student Identity Card Association — that attempts to ease the burden international travel can have on the wallet. The International Student Identity Card, or ISIC, provides full-time students between 12 and 36 years old with discounts and services in more than 90 countries, including the United States. Cards cost $20, and discounts of up to 50 percent apply to airfare, hotels, restaurants and attractions such as museums and clubs.

Discounts vary among cities and countries, said Lisa Carter, marketing and discount development manager for ISIC. Depending on students' specific interests, some may use the card more frequently than others, making the card a better investment.

Students receive a handbook that details the discounts available when they purchase the card. Discounts can also be researched on the ISIC website, www.isic.com. The site can be searched by city and country for savings specific to those areas.

The ISIC is a good investment even if students use it only for their airfare, Carter said. Council Travel, which works with travel agencies worldwide, offers substantial discounts on plane tickets to ISIC cardholders. Students recoup their $20 on the airfare alone, she added.

The ISIC can make traveling easier as well as cheaper. Through a program called ISICConnect, students can use the card as a pre-paid phone card. The phone card service is activated when students prepay $20, and additional funds can be added with a credit card, Carter said. ISIC adds an additional $5 free for activating the card.

In addition, the ISIC can be used to access web-based email, to receive voice mail and to fax copies of personal documents such as passports and birth certificates.

Plastic persuasion

As a student at Syracuse University's London Centre during the fall semester, Erin Corcoran didn't use her ISIC card as frequently as she anticipated, she said. Corcoran, a junior English and textual studies and psychology major, used the card for discounts on airfare, several clubs and tourist attractions.

"It saved me a few pounds here and there," she said. For example, full admission to Edinburgh Castle in Scotland is six pounds, but Corcoran paid just three with her ISIC.

Corcoran primarily used her ISIC while traveling, especially during her 10-day trip to Italy. She recommends that students traveling abroad purchase the ISIC, but said discounts can be hit-or-miss. Some places don't care that you're a student, she said.

Rowdy MTV Spring Break participants live it up under the sun during the 1999 festivities.

MTV Spring Break showcases boobs, brawn and beer.

For those of us lacking the funds to travel to an exotic locale for our spring break vacations, there is MTV's Spring Break programming to save the day and at least allow us to look at a beach. It's the cheap way to visit the tropics without leaving the comfort of your own living room — bonus points if you sit under a sun lamp on the couch.

But just like most of what's on TV, MTV's Spring Break is pure fantasy packaged and sold to its bored — and ultimately horny — television audience. Large jugs and wash board abs — huge numbers of viewers — solid advertising for the network.

Whipped-cream bathing suit contests and guys and gals switching their clothes in the back seats of cars — MTV is selling sex and we gladly lick it up each and every year as quickly as we would like to lick some of that whipped cream. Yummy! For the last 15 years, we have been welcomed as voyeurs into the drunken world of the coolest and best-looking people who would not give a typical person a second look.

With only beach cateys and big-breasted gals swimming in drunken exessen, we, the viewers, waste away the dull hours of break at home feeling sort of let down. At no other time of the year do kids feel so insecure of who they are or what their bodies look like. It hurts to be missing out on all the fun while we sit in front of the boob tube vegging out — something most of the waifish girls shown during Spring Break only dream about in their sleep.

Have you ever noticed that only genetically mutant, wanna-be Abercrombie models are allowed to participate in the programming during the week of taping? Yo, MTV — what about the fat kids? Ain't they allowed to get in on all the fun or should they just go hide away somewhere. Seriously, even the audience is jacked beyond belief, which gets me thinking — is Spring Break really like this?

Could MTV be targeting our lustful hearts and eyes, populating our screens with only the best-looking people for a reason?

West, San Padre Island and Palm Springs have been past shooting sights for the network, and this year's spot is bound to be just like the others — beautiful and sandy with lots of jacked-up guys and hour glass-figured chicks.

Even a few lucky Syracuse University students got in on the orgy taping last week. MTV followed three SU frat boys as they wandered around aimlessly with a handful of MTV's cash trying to show us how to have a good time. Camera crews observed them around as they drank, hooked-up with strange females, drank some more, participated in wet t-shirt contests and then, ultimately, drank even more. I was damn proud to be an Orangeman that week, let me tell ya.

Sometimes if you're lucky (and this is a big if), a musical act or two will pop up during one of the pointless shows like Beauty and the Beach or Springer Break to perform a new song. Usually, the acts are new and trying to get some airtime, so it's nice to see them perform in front of a live audience.

Fashion Forecast

Though brisk winter winds and snows are common in Syracuse, fashion capitals nationwide have been warming up to new clothing lines for the spring season.

At a time when puffy coats and boots are standard essentials, it’s hard to look ahead to sundresses and bathing suits. But if you’re planning a trip for spring break, you might want to start stocking up. And remember this season, the warmer the better.

A lot of the major designers on the West Coast seem to think color is going to be hot,” said Syracuse University fashion professor Jan Wright. “But the East Coast is always going to stay a little on the black side, even in the spring.”

Bold shades of orange, blue and yellow will be seen in lines by major designers this spring, said Todd Conover, a fashion professor. Patterns may have notes of colorbands in the sixties and seventies, he added.

Other styles, including very fitted and contoured skirts, will be reminiscent of the twenties.

“Fashion is a comforting thing that people look back to,” Conover said. “I think we’ll see a little of everything that’s really been something. Anything goes.”

Century style

And with the millennium fire dying out, designers are squeezing in last season for reflective pads and mirrors on clothing. Though bold will be big this season, there’s no need to stash the traditional floral skirt in the back of your wardrobe. Conover said that floral skirts and sundresses will be back this year in all lengths.

“Things will still be very sweet, very feminine,” Wright agreed.

Basse said that A-line plaid skirts will be coming back, for those with a taste for darker shades.

Hang on to last year’s capri pants as well, said Wright, because they will also return to the spring scene, this year fitting with a flare around the calf.

Along with flowers, stripes and other exotic patterns will hit the fabric this season.

“A lot of trends that I’m seeing now are covered in dots,” Wright said.

For those heading out to the beach over break, check the stores for a return of crocheted bathing suits, Basse said. Also, the tankini will return for another successful trip down the runway, she added.

“Many women love that look on them,” Basse said. “Bathing suits really don’t move as quickly as other clothing does. They’re also recreating the seventies look with some fuchsia and orange.”

In the accessory department, keep your eyes open for more beaded handbags, this year with added trim and fringes, Basse said.

Also, expect to see bigger, fashion accessories to go with any outfit, Conover said.

“We’re heading to an era of opulent wear,” Conover said. “What we design today may be dead tomorrow. It’s very important that the fashion industry keeps changing to stay alive.”

And if you’re planning on spending endless hours by the sea this spring break, fashion forecasts indicate that you may be bringing along a few ocean-native pads in your suitcase. A splish of last year’s popular butterfly jewelry, Wright said designers plan to introduce a new kind of insect to the accessory scene this spring — the crustacean.

“A lot of lobsters and crabs and such are coming up on accessories all over,” Wright said. “I think we can expect to see a few whimsical, fun little things, accessories-wise.”

If you’re looking for these new styles from major brands including Hilfiger, Polo and Calvin Klein in Syracuse, check stores at the Carousel Center, including Lord and Taylor or Kaufman’s. Also, try shopping online from other industry leaders including, Macy’s and Bloomingdale’s, Basse said.

So while winter may be tugging things white outside, add a little color to your life and start stocking up for spring break.

All times and never travel in a new place alone. In Mexico, taxi cabs target lonesome tourists. Catching a ride with a cabby off the street can leave a single tourist open to robbery or assault. One should also be wary of clubs — being in crowds situations increases the chances of trampling, especially under the influence of alcohol — so sip alcohol and stay on the floor with a foot in your face.

If you're forced to seek medical attention while away, you don't have to worry if you're in a relatively populated area. According to the CDC, Mexico and most of the Caribbean have adequate treatment facilities. The key is that most hospitals expect cash payment before they treat you. Medical insurance is not always valid outside the United States, so it's important to check with your insurance provider before you travel. In cases where medical insurance does not cover the treatment, the traveler's insurance provided by either the travel agency or another company can supplement most needs, from psychosomatic help to suturing removal. Almost everyone complains about the financial costs of travel, and the thought of an empty wallet or a butched credit rating keeps many people home. But almost no one considers the potential cost to their belongings that can incur. Spring break tales should be about hot nights on the town and sunny days on the beach, not accidents with the toilet and life-threatening illnesses.

Travel Safety 101
All travelers should take the following precautions, no matter where they're headed:

- Wash hands often with soap and water.
- Never use latex condoms to reduce the risk of HIV and other sexually transmitted diseases.
- Don't eat or drink dairy products unless you know they have been pasteurized.
- Don't share needles with anyone.
- Sit only thoroughly cooked food or fruits and vegetables you have peeled yourself. Remember: boil it, cook it, peel it or forget it.

Car tool kits come in handy, whether on a long road trip or a short trip to the grocery store. Even if you never use the kit, it's worth the price for peace of mind.

Health Services can give in some areas. But the dispatcher assures the police are an excellent resource for help, either from the police department directly or through a referral to find additional help.

If you are stranded and automobile repairs are necessary, a few simple checks can help you get the best deal. Certifications, such as seals for Automotive Service Excellence or from the Better Business Bureau, will help ensure you get a good price, according to Federal Trade Commission consumer pamphlets.

Making sure the owner's manual is in the car before the trip begins is also a good idea. Owner's manuals generally have guides and tips for the care and maintenance of the car. If you are uncertain about something, check in the owner's manual.

The excitement of a road trip may prevent one from taking all the proper precautions. But the extra effort and the few extra items could prevent a small problem from becoming a big one.

through Europe. It's just seemed more like home, she said.

The ISIC can provide discounts at home — whether home is in London or here in the United States. Although more discounts exist in Western Europe than in the United States, Carter said, students traveling here can save money in about 20 cities, including New York, Miami and Los Angeles.

Corcoran, like all participants in the SU semester abroad programs, received her ISIC from the Division of International Programs. Outside the DIPA programs, students out of the DIPA programs can also obtain a card through that office.

To apply for the card, students should bring a 1-inch by 1-inch photograph of themselves and proof of their full-time status from the registrar's office to the DIPA offices, said Lucerno Van Kesteren, who processes the cards for the office. Most cards are ready within two to five days, but that time can be extended to two weeks near the end of the semester. Van Kesteren said.

Students who need an ISIC in less time can obtain one at Advantage Travel in Keene where you can sometimes get the card the same day. You can also obtain a card through the Hostelling International Federation or through Advantage Travel.

But we all know that's secondary to the real reason we watch — to see the drunken escapades of a bunch of kids who have one motive for an entire week to get laid — as early and often as possible with as many partners as possible. It's kids having fun the old-fashioned way, like they did way before there was MTV. Not that I'm patronizing all that we saw in that sexual, but if it's going to happen, I'd rather see it in my rooms for repeated viewing, right?

Sure, MTV Spring Break reinforces our expectations of beauty, fun and ultimately, what a typical spring break should consist of — but you'll never hear anyone call it Mount Vernon. The World Traveler, too.

People 26 or younger who are currently not enrolled in college or are enrolled as part-time students can obtain the International Youth Travel Card (ITTC). The ITTC offers many of the same benefits and services as the ISIC. Advantage Travel issues the ITTC, while the DIPA office issues only the ISIC.

Hostels 101
Hostels, or dormitory-style housing, cater to budget travelers, especially students, worldwide. Over 5,000 associated hostels all over the world belong to a parent organization called Hostelling International (HI). Many have restrictions such as lockouts during the day and early curfews, so you generally must be an HI member to stay, although some let you in if you pay a surcharge.

You can obtain an HI membership at your local Council Travel office. Independent hostels are also run in almost every popular destination — these hostels tend to have better room options and fewer or no restrictions, and prices are generally the same as HI hostels.

Pros
Cheap accommodations
Facilities such as kitchens, cafes, bike-rentals and facilities for travelers with special needs.
Opportunities to socialize

Cons
Don't expect fancy decor, room service or a TV in your room.
Most hostels are barracks-like facilities with rows of bunk beds.
The special restrictions and curfews can be limiting.

Lake Placid has long been thought of as a winter sports paradise. Situated in the Adirondacks and having hosted both the 1932 and 1980 Winter Olympic Games, skiers and snowboarders regularly flock to some of the tallest mountains on the East Coast.

There are more than 65 trails available to skiers and snowboarders on Whiteface Mountain and other nearby slopes. The more adventurous can try the highest vertical drop on the East Coast. New this year is the fastest gondola in North America. Skiers and snowboarders can also check out the powder on close-by Mt. Van Hoevenberg or test their skills on the MacKenzie-Intervale Ski Jump Complex.

Not just the downhill thrill
Lake Placid has excellent cross-country skiing through the 41 million acres of the Adirondack Park. There are 35 trails and a 44-mile cross-country ski track. The Lake Placid Olympic Complex offers 15 trails, a 14-mile course, and the Lake Placid Cross Country Skiing Association.

For those who don't ski or snowboard, or for a break from a few hours, people can tour the Lake Placid Olympic Complex.

Clinton pushes gun safety

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bill Clinton will propose sweeping new gun safety measures as part of his initial budget proposal for the new federal fiscal year. The administration has recently backed a number of programs targeted at reducing gun deaths, which number about 30,000 a year nationwide. The administration has used these tools to reduce gun violence in many parts of the nation. HUD estimates 10,000 gun crimes are committed every year in the urban areas managed by the 100 largest public housing agencies.

San Diego unveils hate crime plan

SANDiego — With the city witnessing a major increase in reported hate crimes, the city's Police President Al Gore acknowledged Saturday that he has changed his views on the polarizing subject since the 1980s, when he described abortion as "arguably the taking of a human life" and favored limits on federal payments to cover abortions for poor women.

The admission came as Democratic candidate Bill Bradley, who placed fifth in the New Hampshire primary, declared that he had used the word "arguably." Instead, he now believes that abortion is a moral issue.

Asked whether or not he continued to believe that abortion amounted to the taking of a human life, the vice president emphasized that he had used the word "arguably." Instead, he now believes that abortion is a moral issue.

Barak seeks to repair credibility

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak struggled Sunday to stand by the policies his government has pursued during his year in power, which ran aground as he attempted to negotiate peace with the Palestinians. Barak, who is due to meet with Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad today, said he would continue to pursue the peace process.

Environmentalists remain skeptical about whether developing countries will make their share of the necessary reductions. According to a report released by the World Resources Institute and the United Nations Environment Programme, the developing world accounts for about 50% of global emissions. While the developed world has cut emissions by about 20% since 1990, developing countries have increased their emissions by about 70%.

Syracuse University's Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse is creating a new Web site to give students a look into federal government. The Web site, dubbed FEDPROBE, is expected to be operational in February.

The site is designed to give the U.S. public a window into the federal government, allowing access to information that was previously not available before its creation, said David Burnham, clearinghouse co-director and a member of the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications research faculty.

FEDPROBE is derived from TRACFED, a Web site created by the clearinghouse and designed for the distribution of federal enforcement data to the news media.

"I know a lot of people, other than people in the news media, who are interested in the information posted on TRACFED," said Steven Franish, a junior psychology major who works for the clearinghouse. "I think FEDPROBE is going to be very popular."

The clearinghouse is a nationally renowned organization started at SU and known for its pursuit to release federal enforcement data. "No other public or private agency or institution provides this type of service," said Susan Long, an SU statistician and professor in the School of Management. "Clearly, federal information is of interest to all kinds of people in all sorts of areas. It is important for people to find out what is going on inside our government."

The clearinghouse provides the public with information about federal enforcement in order to determine if the government is spending our money wisely, Burnham said.

"We have a couple of indications that this can be a very powerful tool," Burnham said. He said among those indications is the fact that more than 200 news organizations already subscribe to TRACFED.

Students studying public policy in the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs commonly research the work of the government, said Andrew Schwab, a freshman who will declare a public policy major by the semester's end. He said the Web site would be very helpful to do research for his classes.

"The work gets tedious," he said. "The Internet becomes your best friend."

Schwab also emphasized the importance of federal record disclosure, he said.

"You've got to see how the government spends the tax money," Schwab said. "The government should discuss what's going on because we elect them to be there."

The new Web site will make TRACFED and certain federal government information available to any person willing to pay a subscription fee, Long said, but the fee associated with the site might rightfully deter researchers, she added.

The fee has yet to be determined, Long said.

"The interworkings of our government should be available with out any cost," she said.

Long said the site was created with help from a grant given to the clearinghouse from the Rockefeller Family Foundation.

"FEDPROBE will be different from TRACFED. You get an account, and you will be able to do much, much more," Long said.

The site is being tested before the site is open to the public. Burnham said he hopes to get test reports back soon.

The clearinghouse has a number of similar public Web sites, he added. They give information on agencies such as the IRS to the U.S. Customs Bureau.

"We get more than three million hits a year," Burnham said, "and the information we distribute has generated hundreds and hundreds of news articles."

Burnham said that FEDPROBE will attract more users and visitors to the clearinghouse Web sites.

"We believe in good data," Burnham said. "I think we're beginning to gain some traction."

night by Syracuse Police, according to a police report.

S.A.E. risk management chairman Brian Carter was cited for serving alcohol at a party with more than 100 people, the report said.

Carter was unable to be reached for comment.

Syracuse resident Erik Dunn, 20, was arrested Saturday night for criminal possession of marijuana during an Alcoholic Beverage Control check at Planet 505, 505 Westcott St., according to a police report.

Police entered the age 18 and over dance club to perform random ID checks, the report said. An officer noticed a young man, later identified as Dunn, put his drink down and walk away from the police quickly, the report said.

The officer followed Dunn and approached him asking for ID, the report said. Dunn told the officer he did not have any and began to walk away. The officer then escorted him outside the club, the report said.

Dunn appeared uncomfortable while being interrogated by police, the report said. After repeatedly sticking his hands in his pockets and removing them, Dunn showed a fake ID, which he used to enter the bar, the report said.

After searching Dunn, police discovered a small packet of marijuana, the report said.

The case was closed with Dunn's arrest. Last week an SU law student had $30 stolen from her date planner at Planet 505. She had been approached by two men when her money was stolen, a report said.

Students organize campus, city blanket drive

BY STEFANIE KRATTER
Contributing Writer

The fourth annual Share the Warmth Blanket Drive begins Tuesday. The Students Offering Service in Syracuse University's Hendricks Chapel and the Church World Service groups are sponsoring the drive which ends Feb. 20.

The groups will collect blankets and monetary contributions in an effort to ensure a warm night's sleep to citizens of Syracuse and needy families worldwide. The service will work with student groups from Le Moyne College and Onondaga Community College.

Colleen Locke, a junior broadcast journalism major and a co-chairwoman of the event, said she expects this year’s drive to be better than previous years. Last year the drive raised $500 and gathered 212 blankets, including 50 from the SU Food and Housing Zone.

"It is very nice to see students and faculty, as well as people from the community, united together toward one common goal, which is to give the poor people a chance to be warm," Locke said.

Although she said she is "thrilled" with last year's result, senior environmental design major Emily Borland noted that the increasing support of the surrounding community is encouraging. Borland is hopeful that this year will surpass last year's numbers, she added.

"Donating blankets may seem like a trivial concept, but you are really sharing love with people at the same time," said Borland, a co-chairwoman of the service.

This year's drive will be the first to have receptacle sites off the SU campus with a drop-off site added at Kahunaville, a tropical-themed restaurant in the Carousel Center.

Locke said. In past years, local receptacles were only in the Hendricks Chapel dean's office and in Schine Student Center, she added.

Each week in February, blanket donors will be entered into a drawing for a $50 Kahunaville gift certificate. Also during the month, all donations made to Turtle Pond, a wishing fountain at Kahunaville, will benefit the drive.

Kahunaville also is offering a limited number of free appetizers and dessert coupons to students who make donations to tables set up in Schine. Tables will be set up between 11 a.m. and 2 p.m. Feb. 8-10 and Feb. 15-17.

Local hotels and motels are also being very supportive, Locke said. This is the first year that area hotels were asked to donate extra blankets.

"Every little bit makes an impact," Locke said. "It really doesn't matter how much a person contributes because the bottom line is people are still being helped."

This year, the idea to have a blanket drive was initiated by SU alumnus Kim Wilcox. It began as just a simple gesture to help the needy, especially during the freezing Syracuse winters, Borland said. Each year response to the drive increased because of the Church World Service's assistance and other community service agencies in the Syracuse area, she said.

This year the blankets will be distributed to Central New York community service agencies including Unity Kitchen, the Migrant Farmworkers Advocacy Group and the Dorothy Day House, among others.

All the monetary contributions will be forwarded to the Church World Service, which will then be sent to assist people in places such as Mexico, East Timor and Turkey.

"I plan to help SGA stand out

Despite a late BC charge, SU runs and guns down the Eagles 73-55.

By Jeff Passan

This century's version of the unheralded and underdog BC Eagles met the No. 4 SU Orangemen Saturday afternoon at Conte Forum.

SU (17-0, 7-0 Big East) stunned BC (9-10, 1-6) then went on an 11-1 run, capped by a Kenny Walls (offense) and shooting. But whenever BC (9-10, 1-6) had the ball, it was on the run.

SU JUMPS ONE SPOT

SU remained in the Top 10 at #5 in the Associated Press poll this week, even after losing its final game to Penn. 1917-18 team, which began 16-0 but lost its final game to the Eagles.

Thomas
Red Storm pose newest obstacle for Syracuse

BY GREG BISHOP
Staff Writer

Last year, when Syracuse prepared to host St. John's in the Carrier Dome, the then-No. 16 Orangemen were not on top of the Red Storm's agenda.

With the Syracuse game sandwiched between a SU overtime loss to perennial powerhouse Duke and a looming showdown with eventual national champion Connecticut, St. John's simply had bigger fish to fry. St. John's eventually rallied behind 21 points from shooting guard Boeheim Thornton to snag a 75-70 victory under the bubble.

The loss was frustrating to a Syracuse team that dabbled on the fringe between solid and mediocre basketball throughout a 21-12 season.

"It shouldn't have come down to the last few minutes," Hart said after the game. "We didn't do the things we needed to do down the stretch. We played well enough to win, but they did what they had to at the end."

This year, when the No. 25 Red Storm (13-5, 5-2 Big East) roll into town for SU's second consecutive Big Monday showdown on ESPN, the Orangemen will be in a different position from last season, with a large bulls-eye planted squarely on their chests.

After all, the No. 4 Orangemen (17-6, 7-0) come off an 88-74 throttling of UConn and a 73-68 victory over BC on Saturday.

The win over BC set the Orangemen up for a showdown on Tuesday night against the Red Storm, which would be their first road test since falling to the Eagles, 73-60, last month.

"You have to take them serious," said head coach Jim Boeheim. "They are a team that is capable of making a run to the Final Four. This wouldn't be a bad game for us to have a tough test before a tournament."

The loss to BC was a wake-up call for the Orangemen.

They had taken UConn for granted, Boeheim said. "Now we are getting ready for the Red Storm."

The two teams meet on Tuesday night in the Carrier Dome. The Orangemen are seeking closure on the 73-60 spanking at the hands of a Notre Dame team Syracuse beat 69-65 in South Bend.

Un fortunately, for Syracuse, the game could not be without a little drama. The two teams have a history, with Boeheim's squad losing to St. John's last season, 82-57 earlier in the season.

"They had a historical win over us last year," head coach Mike Jarvis said. "They are a tough team that plays well at home."

St. John's is not a team to be taken lightly.

The Red Storm are led by one of the nation's top backcourts, with Thornton and point guard Erick Barkley.

"They can do a lot of things," said defensive guard Patrick Ewing Jr. "They are a team that is capable of making a run to the Final Four. This wouldn't be a bad game for us to have a tough test before a tournament."

The Orangemen are not looking past any team.

But the 6-foot-8 rookie from the Bronx picked up his third foul just 91 seconds into the second half, giving BC the opportunity to run its offense without Thomas.

"Anybody coming in there has to be able to challenge him, he's going to be close to the rim," Boeheim said. "He's a very good player, he can play at the 4, 5 or 3."

Syracuse head coach Marianne Freeman had her reasons. Griffin added his defensive effort and, quite frankly, she wasn’t giving us that," Freeman said. "We needed more defensive pressure, and she just wasn’t there defensively for us, so I had to think about who was going to help us on the defensive end."

"When you’re undefeated, you never know what you can get."

While her teammates fought their way back into the game against West Virginia on Saturday afternoon, Syracuse forward Beth Boeheim on the sidelines and watched.

The Big East’s leading scorer took a seat between Lora McNiece and Tara Trammell on the bench, where Orangewomen bench for three of the contest’s last four minutes.

Record re-entered for the final 25.1 seconds, but her presence made little difference, as West Virginia hung on for a 65-63 victory over the Orangewomen.

"We had the advantage that we get up faster than they going down, but," Griffin said. "Coach was like, ‘We’ll never give you the ball again — you have to step up’."

category tend to be more invigorating and energetic. After two instrumental tracks, the performance crescendos into "Master of Puppets," a Metallica classic blown up into nine-and-one-half minutes of head-banging delight. Also impressive is the new version of "Fuel," which is a great improvement over the original song.

However, tunes from the second category, the ones more dominated by the symphony, help "Metallica S&M" transcend mere novelty. The orchestra, conducted by Michael Kamen, adds rich layers to Metallica's already stirring "Nothing Else Matters" and "Bleeding Me." "Metallica S&M" reaches its high point in the album's most somberly-paced song, "Here of the Day," off the band's "Load" album, works brilliantly with the new arrangement, the dramatic sweep of the original enhanced by Kamen's orchestra.

The disc also offers two brand-new tracks. "Minus Human," off the second half of the album, was directly written with the orchestra in mind, and although it overwhelms the band at points in this song, the melody is so expertly arranged that one can hardly complain.

More successful is "No Leaf Clover," a better blend of the Metallica and symphonic sounds. The hook is addictive, perfectly mixing electric guitars, heavy drums, and orchestral sweeps. Lead vocalist James Hetfield alternates full-voiced singing with more intimate whispers as the background orchestral grows and shrinks in volume and tempo.

The only drawback to "Metallica S&M" is its length. The first album, although it has its share of terrific songs, sometimes suffers from too-lengthy instrumental solos that sound too similar to be distinguishable. Several songs carry over the eight-minute mark, and even though they are expertly arranged and performed, they can feel like a burden.

Because it is more streamlined, the second disc outdoes the first in almost every way. The arrangements are leaner and more focused. The balance between old and new songs is much more consistent. Plus, it features two of the collection's best tracks — "Wherever I May Roam" and "For Whom the Bell Tolls." For a live album, the performances are all unexpectedly disciplined. Hetfield keeps his voice in check, keeping in balance with the new orchestral arrangements. Lars Ulrich on drums shows great skill and control throughout, especially on "One," where his relentless drum roll helps propel the song into a blistering, furious climax.

In fact, the discipline displayed on "Metallica S&M" is even more apparent when the band lets loose during their encore performance at the end of the second disc — "Battery." The band and orchestra let it all hang out, leading to an energetic but unfocused tune.

But, despite this and other occasional flaws, "Metallica S&M" works seamlessly. Although the double-album probably will not appeal to Metallica enthusiasts — obscure tunes and old favorites collected all in one place — this album has merit for anyone looking for a wholly original rock experience.

Like The Verve's "Bitterest Symphony," only extended to epic length, "Metallica S&M" combines two elements that don't seem like they would work together, and somehow they become more than the sum of their already accomplishments. My Grade: A-

The Daily Orange minds to people right away. Surprisingly, they did not perform "High," their first single together. The last time we played it, the song got lost," Method Man said in a pre-show interview. For a hip-hop show, Mr. Meth and Funk-Doc were extra- ordinary. They introduced the talk show with their content with just standing on stage and giving exact renditions of their studio work, the two were decidedly unpredictable. They leaped into the crowd repeatedly during the night, climbed along railings and were fondled and robbed of their possessions by hungry women fans. Putting their all into the performance paid off, and some students said Meth's show was the best concert they'd ever been to. The duo just has that rare chemistry. According to Method Man, the two are a perfect match.

One of their performances is a man who can't shit a b.b. out of his ass," he said. That is pretty damn tight, and it's surely the reason why Method Man and Redman are two of hip-hop's most promising acts of the new century.

Worlds Apart

BY JOY DAVIA

Last month, you were living life as a bonafide Londoner, munching on fish and chips, drinking pints of Guinness with friends at a neighborhood pub and riding on red double-decker buses. Now you're back at Syracuse University, trampling through a foot of snow to enjoy some fine Kimmel cuisine.

Whether you spent the last four months studying business and fashion design in Hong Kong, watching bullfights in Madrid or pursuing adventures in Harare, Zimbabwe, relocating to the United States can spur symptoms of reverse culture shock.

Reverse culture shock can be worse than the initial shock shock when first setting foot on foreign land because the latter is more expected, said Jon Booth, deputy director of SU's Division of International Programs Abroad. "You may take on some elements of the host culture," Booth said. "Some things that didn't bother you before you may find irresistible when you return."

Whether you crave the wines that complemented every meal in Florence or Madrid's slower lifestyle, adjusting is not without obstacles, Booth said.

For Noah Paul, a junior Spanish and marketing major who spent last semester in Madrid, readjusting to life as a college student at SU has been a challenge. "Life back here is tough to deal with, very depressing and much more difficult," Paul said.

SU's binge-drinking atmosphere has been tough to reacclimate to, especially since Paul has spent the last four months consuming alcohol in a more relaxed drinking climate.

Returning to SU after studying abroad is like going from one extreme to another, he added. Madrid's nightlife and "very sunny and cheery" demeanor contrast Syracuse's dreary weather and limited social scene.

Cindy Tsai, a junior marketing and advertising major who spent last semester in London, agreed. "Before, I thought this campus was kind of boring," Tsai said. "But after London, there really isn't anything to do here."

But after spending three semesters in London, fifth-year senior Wesley Law said readjusting to life in the United States has been a challenge. "Life back here is tough to deal with, very depressing and much more difficult," Paul said.

Maxwell grades city governments

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

The Government Performance Project released its report Monday detailing the quality of management within the 35 U.S. cities with the largest annual revenues.

The project, directed by the Alan K. Campbell Public Affairs Institute in the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, aims to improve city management nationwide, said Anthony Stacey, project director.

The report awarded an A to only Phoenix, New York City and Buffalo, the only cities in New York State to be included in the report, received a B and a C, respectively.

"We're obviously not too thrilled," said Peter Cutler, director of communications at Buffalo Mayor Anthony M. Masiello's office. "No one likes getting a C on anything."

Cutler said city officials are looking at Buffalo's grade personally, however, because the report doesn't bode well for the city.

"That's not to say that the report isn't bona fide," he said. "It's not to say that the report isn't accurate."

"But the comptroller will be watching them very carefully for a while," Cutler said. "If you don't get the finance rules, you don't get the finance code and do not understand the finance code and do not seek explanation."

Greiner said he is creating a liaison program between SGA and student organizations to aid in following the finance code.

Student organizations should make an effort to comprehend student government policies, James said.

"If you don't understand something in a textbook, you ask the teacher," he said. "If you don't get the finance rules, you ask us.

SGA resinds A.S.I.A. funds

The Student Government Association reallocated funds Monday night from Asian Students in America, reprimanding the group for misusing allocated funds.

"This does not mean the organization will not receive funding," James said. "But the comptroller will be watching them very carefully for a while."

"If you don't understand something in a textbook, you ask the teacher," he said. "If you don't understand the finance rules, you ask us."

"If you don't understand something in a textbook, you ask the teacher," he said. "If you don't get the finance rules, you ask us."

Christine Ho clearly understood what she was doing when she signed the Student Organization Expenditure Request, James said.

The expenditure request that Ho signed states that the money borrowed for social expenses would be paid back from ticket sales for the Autumn Bazaar.

The bazaar is an annual event funded by A.S.I.A. that usually attracts 200 to 300 people, said Paul D'Amato, A.S.I.A. public relations manager. Only 100 people attended this year. As a result, the ticket sales did not cover the social expenses incurred by the group and resulted in the violation.

In addition to repaying SGA, the group must now be placed on funding probation for six months.

First Lady to speak, campaign on campus

BY SHELBY HEALY
Staff Writer

First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton will follow up last summer's listening tour with a campaign tour that will bring the New York state senatorial candidate to the Syracuse University campus next week.

Clinton will speak at noon on Feb. 9 in SU's Goldstein Auditorium regarding improvements to New York state public education. Her visit is sponsored by the College Democrats.

"We have been working with the campaign all year and they knew it was our desire to have her come to campus," College Democrats President Christina Hinchey said. "It was just a matter of finding the right time."

FDA approves drug to be human tested

The Food and Drug Administration gave EntreMed Inc. the green light Monday to begin human studies of Angiostatin, a recently tested experimental anti-tumor drug.

Angiostatin is the second experimental tumor-killing drug that researchers hope losing EntreMed has received FDA clearance to test on humans. The other drug, Endostatin, is under evaluation at six safety tests at three medical sites in the United States.

Both proteins were discovered in the mid-1990s by Dr. M. Judah Fruton, director of the University Medical School and Children’s Hospital in Boston.

Researchers find new anti-viral drug

SAN FRANCISCO — A new drug reported preliminary success against HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, in a study published Thursday.

Researchers said the experimental drug, known as A22, may help cure HIV in people with AIDS as they age.

The researchers said the drug is crucial to future therapy because, even if current treatments cure HIV-infected patients, the virus can now be present in patients' bodies, making the drug critical.

Seelig suspends Rocker until May 1

The Atlanta Braves’ closer was suspended with pay — may 1 — following a report that he was participating in activities that would make him unavailable for the opening day.

Justice looked at the experience of dozens of people with HIV in South Africa, and found that many cases of the disease were related to fatalities.

Scientists disclose AIDS information

SAN FRANCISCO — A low concentration of the AIDS virus in the bloodstream greatly increases the chance that an infected man or woman will transmit the disease to a heterosexual partner, according to two studies from Africa presented at a scientific meeting here.

The observation raises the possibility that an imperfect AIDS vaccine may yet be useful, particularly in regions where 70 percent of the world’s cases of AIDS are transmitted through heterosexual sex.

The virus (HIV) infection occurs. This suggests that a vaccine that fails to block initial infection — but does manage to lower a person’s “viral load” — may reduce that person’s ability to pass the virus on to someone else.

Nearly 70 percent of the 34 million people with HIV live in sub-Saharan Africa, where the virus is most prevalent.

Doctor kills women patients

LONDON — A respected 54-year-old family doctor with a grey beard, twinkling eyes and seemingly soothing manner was given 15 life sentences Monday for the murder of seven British women by a jury that ended six days of deliberation and returned its verdict at Preston Crown Court.

Police are investigating at least 20 more cases involving a doctor, who ran a popular solo practice in the area of the United States.

Between March 1993 and June 1998, Shipman used lethal injections of diazepam, an anesthetic, and morphine, a painkiller, to kill 15 women who ranged in age from 49 to 81.

Shipman also received a four-year sentence for forging the will of his last victim, an action that led to the discovery of his deadly trail.

Shipman was guilty of "wicked, wicked crimes," Justice Thomas Judd said. He added that Shipman had pleaded innocent to the charges and expressed remorse or provided a motive for the killings.

MOSCOW — Russia and the United States pledged Monday to work constructively on an anti-ballistic missile defense, an erosion of mutual trust and a stabilizer trim problem.

Campaign reveals expenses

WASHINGTON, D.C. — From $64,000 for FedEx packages to $5.2 million on media, Texas Gov. George W. Bush revealed how his campaign has spent more money in a shorter time than any presidential candidate ever has in the thick of a primary battle.

New reports filed Monday offered thousands of pages of insight into how this year's presidential campaigns are spending at a much more rapid clip than the fourth quarter, the new reports show.

responsibility for them, Pennisi Jr. said.

"He wasn't ashamed of anything," Pennisi Jr. said. "It was out of being a true Syracuse fan."

Campbell did not know the specifics of the safety changes, he said.

Pennisi Jr. said fans did not rush the court following Monday's game when SU beat St. John's University 63 to 57. Pennisi Jr., a speech communications major who attended Monday's game, said he saw an increase in the number of security guards in and around the court.

In a letter to the editor that appeared in the Jan. 28 issue of The Daily Orange, Director of Public Safety Robert T. Robinson urged students to "refrain from storming the court," after such an event. Robinson could not be reached for further comment.

Campbell said Robinson's letter was appropriate and necessary, but students should be able to rush the court when an important event like the UConn game occurs, he said.

"From the moment we opened up the doors everyone was a sky high," Campbell said of the UConn game. "When the stars line up and it happens, it's a good way to get all of the emotion out. I just hope it isn't a trend.

"They're a good team, they're going to win a lot of games — court rushing is for special games."

Ithaca College sophomore John Sigmund, who boosted Pennisi Jr. to the rim, also appears in the photograph.

"I remember seeing all the people with laptops trying to close them up and get out," said Sigmund, a photography major. "It was a little terrifying because there were people all around me and I couldn't breathe."

At about center court Sigmund fell to the floor and was trampled but later pulled up by another student, he said.

"I would do it again," Sigmund said. "You just have to be careful."

In a letter to the editor published in the Jan. 28 issue, community darkrooms are highlighted with their great features.
Daily Orange hires new management

BY MAGGIE MCFADDEN Contributing Writer

The Daily Orange Corp. hired a new management staff this week as part of the newspaper’s annual transition process.

A selection committee, comprised of six graduating staff members, selected Dave Levinthal, a junior newspaper and political philosophy major, to assume the editor in chief position. Levinthal then hired Emily Kulkus, a sophomore newspaper major, Monday as managing editor.

As editor in chief, Levinthal will be responsible for making sure all aspects of The D.O. function properly, Levinthal said.

"Basically it is my responsibility to, metaphorically, be conductor of an orchestra," Levinthal said.

Kulkus worked as an assistant staff writer in August 1997 and began an assistant news editor position by that December. In February 1999, Levinthal began working as the publication’s special projects editor. After four hours of interviews early last week, Levinthal was named the new editor in chief. He will replace current Editor in Chief Ron DePasquale, a senior newspaper and English and text studies major.

"I love newspapering," Levinthal said. "It is the type of business in which you can come to work every day with a whole new set of challenges, and I could not be more enthusiastic.

"We want to make The D.O. more accessible to everyone," Kulkus said. "It needs to be an inviting place for people to come work for us as well as to come find us.

Magin McKenna, a freshman staff writer, said she welcomes the change.

"I am looking forward to working with Dave and Emily," said McKenna, a newspaper major. "They both have a lot of talent to share."
Politics fun? Bet your ballot on it

Joe Burns and Christina Hinchev are hardly the student-striking, tear-gas dodging, anti-government rebels of the 1960s. Chancellor Shaw, do not fear: The Tolley Administration Building is safe from their wrath.

But what Burns, chairman of the College Republicans, and Hinchev, president of the College Democrats, have shown is that the rhetoric we inject some desperately needed political serum into an otherwise anemic SU campus.

The likes of Pat Buchanan, William F. Buckley, Ralph Reed and Oliver North have swayed our conservative diatribes here in the same way that 1960s rebels have swayed our student-striking, tear-gas dodging, anti-government rebels of the 1960s.

Politics are suddenly fun in Syracuse. Maybe it's the natural result of a popular culture that spawned television shows like "Miami Vice" and "Vanderbilt" that causes sweat to bead in the least aerobic of situations. Her appearance at the latest Annette Benning hairstyle made her face appear all the more puffy and roely unattractive. Her pink Reeboks and oversized white Vasser sweatshirt were as ugly a combination as the pants were a almost as ugly a combination in a Miami Vice-era sea. The pants were almost as ugly as the tapestry sewed into meat sleeves, the pant legs were useless pants worn by the couple in front of me, Mr. and Mrs. Fishpants. They were talking long and they were talking loud. They were talking about real estate and they were talking to me.

And now, passengers of all makes, models and destinations from that and the previous day's flights stood grumpily and waiting in a check-in queue stretching two terminals at the Baltimore airport. But they made it worse. They turned two hours of waiting into an afternoon of headaches.

The husband was large in stature and manner. Somehow he had combined a Texas guuff with a Connecticut education. He was obvious. His mate was worse.

The wife was the kind of sloppy-Rosanne-fast that causes sweat to bead in the least aerobic of situations. Her attempt at the latest Annette Benning hairstyle made her face appear all the more puffy and roely unattractive. Her pink Reeboks and oversized white Vasser sweatshirt were as ugly a contrast as her delicate, gold rings and sausage-size fingers.

It apparently, however, they believed their looks were in jeopardy, so they slipped into some fish-pants. Puffing out like MC Hammers troopers in a brand new pair of pants, they could hide the elephant pants within. Like a popular tapestry sewed into meat sleeves, the pants were useless. And although it is primarily the rich who have received an R rating. If that means taking out a few sex scenes, or a few gratuitous sex scenes.

But the head-stalking wonder of their personal style and character_cache of Mr. and Mrs. Fishpants. They were newly rich too. The jewel-laden bangles Mrs. F wore were the first sign.

Horrible. Her husband's expensive Italian loafers were the second. And after they opened their mouths, I needed no further warning that they spoke with their feet and welded their financial success without a hint of bashfulness. Their every action described them as wealthy and tasteless. As they bowed to me about their new condos in Ft. Lauderdale, I flipped through the hundred dollar bills in a bland wallet that the Fishpants' conversation was frequently interrupted with Starbucks snack breaks and the subsequent slohery.

Mr. F spoke about his technology consulting business. The firm, which he owns and runs, met recent success after securing several large accounts. These deals turned the couple into millionaires. And now, middle-aged and loaded, they were met with a common problem of the inexperienced rich: cash without class.

The Fishpants are willing carriers of an exclusively American disease. And it is spreading. Today marks the 107th week of economic expansion in the United States — a new record. There is no doubt that America, the wealthiest nation in the world, is getting wealthier. And although it is primarily the rich getting richer, many Americans are breaking the bonds of middle-classmum to achieve elite status. Unfortunately, the Fishpants and their kind are mis-handling their windfalls.

Much like the junk bond dealers of the 1980s, the greatest carriers of the 1990s owe much of their worth to their stock portfolios. In other words, the new generation of rich are only as well off as the market. A major correction could leave the Fishpants pawning their designer luggage. Like a carousel out of control, everything faster it goes, the further you're thrown when it stops.

The Fishpants aren't thinking about any of that. When we finally parted, they seemed as unfazed by the Dow Industrials worst January in a decade as they were the stone cromes on their leather jackets. With as much sincerity as they approached our superficial discussion, they waved good-bye from the ticket counter, while Mr. F shouted, "Hope you don't crash." And that was my thought exactly.

Clinton is a strong opponent of school vouchers, which help public school students to attend private schools, and she advocates higher standards for public school students and employees. Clinton also calls for nationwide support of education funding to allow schools to form student programs and scholarships.

"It should be good to get some exposure for her campaign," said Stephanie Sprague, a sophomore political science major. Although she is not well-informed of the Clinton campaign, Sprague said she thinks it will be beneficial for students to attend Clinton's speech.

College Democrats will advertise extensively for the free event, Hinchey said. "We are thrilled to bring such a prominent political figure to campus," College Democrats Vice President Anthony Quinn said. "We see this as an excellent opportunity for both S.U. students and the Central New York community."

But not all S.U. students have the same enthusiasm for Clinton's visit.

"You have to be wary of her," said Andrew Schwab, a freshman policy studies major. "You don't know if she is for New York or if she is just saying things. The only way to see if she really is good is if we put her in office."

Schwab added that the speech will be an opportunity for the community to consider Clinton's public education policies.

"Depending on when it is, I'll probably go," said Michael Cohen, a junior television, radio and film major. "I don't buy into much of her stuff."

Clinton is expected to begin the campaign tour on Feb. 6 when she will visit State University of New York's College at Purchase.

This will be the second stop on Clinton's statewide "announcement tour," Hinchey said.

"We enthusiastically support Clinton's Senate campaign," she said. "We think she is an extraordinary candidate."

A.S.I.A. board members are cooperating with SGA and are working to make amends, said Feng Yen Lan, treasurer of the group.

"It's totally OK," Yen Lan said. "I understand. We violated the rules."

Aaron Eng, A.S.I.A. vice president, said the group will attempt to pay off the debt by cutting funding for a Lunar New Year event in March.

"It was our mistake and we deserve to be punished," Eng said.

In other SGA news:

James presented Arish Gajjar to the Assembly Monday as vice president of the SGA.

Gajjar, a sophomore economics major, said his main goals for his term include establishing a 24-hour student study area and working with the city government to remedy problems caused by the East Adams Street stoplight.

The stoplight has been scene to several car accidents in recent years.

"I also feel it is important to improve contact between SU and the Syracuse community," Gajjar said.

Freshman Edwin Escobar also greeted the Assembly as the new SGA public relations director.

"I expect to improve SGA relations with the public at large as well as the various student organizations," Escobar said. "I want the public to know what the SGA is up to."

Escobar said that in the past, SGA has been accused of being too bureaucratic.

"For an organization to thrive, it needs to establish a rapport with the public," Escobar said. "That's how it will be successful."

Freshman biology major Joe Sauer joined the Assembly as a representative for The College of Arts and Sciences.

Sauer said he wants to see SGA's role expand.

"I want to see people going to the SGA for more than problems," Sauer said. "If they have problems with security, learning or teachers, they should come to SGA for help."

Sauer is trying to get the Resident Hall Association to work with SGA this semester to solve campus-wide problems.

"I don't totally know the limitations of my position," Sauer said. "But I will do as much as I can."
Financial management includes how each city allocated its budget and whether the money went to fulfillment of intended need. The financial facet of the report also examined debt management and internal control, according to the report.

Human resources management includes workforce planning, hiring practices, employee reward and reprimand, employee turnover and training practices, the report said.

Leslie Carsman, a student in the masters of public administration program, worked on the project. She said the staff also looked for correspondence between the subjective surveys and actual documentation the city provided to the institute.

"We look at a budget report, for instance, and if the city didn't say the city did all these things with human resources and the budget didn't show it, something was wrong," Carsman said.

Carmen is from Los Angeles. She received a C in the report. She said she worked for the city government, and though she did not work in any departments the report focused on, she felt the grade was a fair assessment of conditions in her home town.

"There were a lot of things wrong," she said. "I couldn't really argue with the grade. There's definitely a problem with potholes, taking care of buildings, streets. There's a lot to improve on."

The institute surveyed city officials about the quality of capital and financial management. It also looked at the programs integrated with other networks, as well as the training and cost of these systems, the report said.

The institute also looked at capital management within the cities, which deals with long-term financial planning, initial construction or purchasing justification, capital and operating budget interaction and maintenance, the report said.

Finally, the institute examined the quality of the city's strategic planning, performance measurement and information, the report said.

Stacey Cutter said he handled many of Monday's phone calls to the Buffalo mayor's office from media asking for the city's reaction to the low grade.

"They don't pay me enough for days like today," he said.

When looking at the report from one perspective, Cutter said, it shows that there is a serious problem with management in the city. But he added that it also shows room for improvement within the city's government.

"The state of New York governmentally plays a big role in the city of Buffalo's ability to manage itself effectively and responsibly," Cutler said. "It's its intent is to identify areas of weakness within the city."

Scott Phelps, press secretary to Philadelphia Mayor Ed Rendell, cited the bipartisan structure of the city's government as the reason for being the top-ranked city.

"Phoenix is just a very professionally run city," Phelps said. "There's not a democratic or republican way to fix a pothole."

In 1993, Phoenix was named Best Run City in the World by Germany's Bertelsmann Foundation, an honor that came with a $100,000 grant, Phelps said.

"We're kind of used to being recognized."

Last year's project focused not on cities, but on state governments. Alabama received the lowest grade in the state government analysis, Stacey said. Phelps said the project prompted the need to make constitutional changes in an effort to improve their status, he said.

"Cases like this are exciting to hear," he said. "They show that states are not taking the information and putting it aside, but looking at it objectively to see the areas they can really improve on."

"The report is not a finger-pointing exercise," Stacey added. "Its intent is to identify areas of weakness in the government and improve them."
Health 2000
The federal government last week set the first national health goals for the new century, targeting a list of persistent health problems, including obesity, inactivity, tobacco use, substance abuse and asthma. Since 1979, the government has set similar goals for each decade. Successful efforts in past decades have reduced teen pregnancy, homicides, cancer mortality, motor vehicle deaths and deaths from heart disease. However, only 60 percent of the government’s set goals have been reached, and there have been troubling increases in asthma, physical inactivity, obesity and diabetes.

Food outrage
There has been a dramatic escalation in the grocery industry’s demands for slotting, or fees that food companies pay in exchange for supermarket shelf space. Manufacturers shell out $9 billion a year in slotting fees, representing more than half of the supermarket industry’s total profits, analysts estimate. This has concerned regulators because small suppliers say they cannot compete and pay such high prices. Critics are also wary that shoppers are getting gouged heavily, since slotting fees are built into prices.

Oldie but goodie
The Material Girl ... driving a Chevy to the shops? And hanging out with good old boys drinking whiskey and trying to compose music like an icon? Madonna’s latest career surprise will arrive Wednesday, when radio stations across the country begin playing her new song: a reworking of “American Pie,” Don McLean’s 1971 epic of lost innocence and rock ’n’ roll history. Though there are skeptics, many industry insiders predict the new Madonna will be a hit.

Students campaign for N.H. primary

MANCHESTER, N.H. — The 1996 presidential election turnout for voters aged 18 to 24 sank to an all-time low, but this week in New Hampshire, a few dedicated students are trying to solve this problem.

The bustling atmosphere of the days prior to the Feb. 1 New Hampshire presidential primary draws both college and high school students to the campaign trail. From protesters armed with provocative signs to peaceful, bow-tied high school Republicans, students are out and about this week.

The red, white and blue jackets of the nationwide Citizens for a Sound Economy appears at town meetings and debates, shadowing all seven presidential candidates. Although CSE does not endorse a single candidate, it believes Americans can better make a choice through their efforts.

The group’s goal is to encourage a free-market economy and promote political awareness. The group targets teenagers, saying they are the country’s most precious resource. Bombarding candidates with economic-based questions will ensure American citizens a president who will live up to their trust, according to campaign literature.

CSE conducts business quietly. They show up in packs, all outfitted with their aforementioned jackets. They silently blend into the rest of the crowd and when they are finished with their speech, one or two members may ask a question.

Citizens for a Sound Economy and the Campus Green Team do business in a slightly different manner.

Both groups came armed with loud battle cries, signs and costumes for presidential candidate Sen. John McCain’s arrival at the Wyndham Town Hall in Wyndham, N.H. on Saturday.

Members of the Ozone Action wore pink spandex pants with purple underpants. Some even wore purple masks over their eyes and brown capes, which they said represented an environmental super-hero.

Global Warming is the burning issue for these two groups. Livingston, 24, was outfitted with a two-foot-tall cylinder.

Contestants and viewers alike win big with prime-time game shows.
BY MELISSA MORGAN
Staff Writer

What is the latest trend to hit the prime-time television airwaves? Television game shows, and they have taken over in a big way.

Is that your final answer? Yes, Regis, it is. Since its premiere on Aug. 16, the ABC game show “Who Wants to Be a Millionaire” has soared in popularity. According to the Nielsen ratings for the week of Jan. 17 to 23, the popular quiz show ranked number one, two and three in the ratings charts. The Jan. 12 airing brought the highest ratings ever for the series and the highest for any show during the whole 1999-2000 season.

With the dominance of “… Millionaire,” other major networks have spawned their own versions of prime-time game shows — “Greed” on Fox, “Winning Lines” on CBS and “Twenty One” on NBC — and sitcoms have been pushed aside to make room for sculptured hosts and screaming contestants.

Though game shows in prime-time may be new for Generation X, said Robert Thompson, a television, radio and film professor and the head of Syracuse University’s Center for the Study of Popular Television, but they are not a new trend in prime-time television.

“The miracle isn’t that they are so popular,” he said. “The miracle is how long they took to come back.”

Game shows peaked in the 1950s, with 22 shows in the 1956-57 season, according to Thompson.

Super Bowl highlighted by clever ads, cold pizza

By the time our $15.95 Cosmos cheese pizza and Buffalo wing special arrived at our little Super Bowl get-together — two hours late and in a cold and mangled state — we began to wander, and the excitement of the biggest sporting event in the new millennium, thus far, had already settled down.

Pete Beisser, media freak

By the time our $15.95 pizza came, our little Super Bowl get-together had already settled down.

8:30 a.m. Monday class. Crucial for some as the home teams prepared for the game. For others, it was simply another day.

For those of you who feel asleep listening to the factory smokestack, the spotlights were on the biggest Cinderella stories in NFL history. The NFL has replaced organized religion as the reason why most Americans believe in God. The reason why most Americans believe in God rested on that seventh day. If you don't believe me, go ask one of those cheese heads in Green Bay, Lambeau Field is their church.

Although it never fails that every TV program is geared to the NFL history. The biggest and most holy event in America — has become just as monotonous as standing through a crowded Sunday mass.

For those of you who get excited by the sick, the sneeze peek of the box office, it's the game that matters... the over-blowing halftime show that you don't even watch. There really is too much junk sprinkled in to cover the quality of two great teams playing a game in which one will walk away the absolute victor while the other suffers utter defeat. Heats break at the end of the game — Steve McNight's being helped up off the turf by coach Jeff Fischer wasn't scripted, that was life.

In the end, the Super Bowl is a nice excuse to get friends together, talk about old sports memories and to eat large amounts of unhealthy food — even if it does arrive by the time you're ready for bed.

We're the words "Global Warming, Inc." wearing a cardboard sign reading "Meet Ernestine Bradley." This morning, she made an appearance outside of one of McCain's town hall meetings. She came armed with a large, white cardboard sign reading "Meet Ernestine Bradley."

The Green Team paid a visit to Gary Bauer's camp prior to McCain's speech and was en route to Gov. George W. Bush's appearance alongside country singer Travis Tritt.

Volunteers are often the backbone of political campaigns, and offer students prime opportunities for activism.

Eighteen-year-old Ruth McDonald, volunteer for Democratic candidate Bill Bradley's campaign, Saturday afternoon she made an appearance outside of one of McCain's town hall meetings, equipped with a large, white cardboard sign reading "Meet Ernestine Bradley."

McDonald graduated from high school in Washington, D.C. last May and is currently taking a year off. She's been on Bradley's campaign for two weeks and plans to enroll in college this fall. She gets to Bradley's home base reliability from 7 to 9 a.m., which is only a 10-minute drive on the road and getting cars to honk their horns," McDonald said.

She credits her family and living in Washington's wild political climate for cultivating her political interests. Even high schoolers are in on the action.

At McCain's Friday town meeting, high school senior Cliff Olsen offered his kind words to McCain.

"You've definitely motivated me," said Olsen. Olsen attends Exeter High School in Exeter, N.H. He said that before McCain visited he hadn't yet made up his mind about which candidate to support.

"Our school tries to keep us informed," he said. "We even discussed the candidates for a whole math class, and the teacher didn't even take part in it."

At the town meeting a Republican recruiter approached Olsen. Olsen said the walking with signs on the road and getting cars to honk their horns, McDonald said.

scandal prompted congres-end to its run. According to a Web site modeled after the PBS program, "American Ex-Scandal," the culmination of the controversy involved the original version of the show, "Twenty One." Producers of the show hired contestant Herb Stempel to attract viewers by giving him the answers. Later, he was exposed and the show was brought down.

Thompson said the popular "The Price Is Right" game show was brought back in 1999 when America fell in love with "...Millionaire."

"It's a goofy game show, but it is also a masterpiece," Thompson said.

Thompson added that the three elements that make the show a stroke of genius are a fast-paced format, consistcut airing, and a host that audiences love, Regis Philbin.
All these things are a great recipe for a simple show that pulls in the audience, he said.

"The show is hard to quit watching," Thompson said.
"Once you start it, it begs you to see the rest. It's completely mindless, and that's what viewers really want."

Making his way through the slash and snow on the Syracuse University campus, Mary Albert vividly recalled his memorable foul with combusted by a Damascus Brown something happen. In the second days at Syracuse. Albert addressed more than 100 students at the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications on Monday.

"Just being back here brings so many memories — starting with the weather," Albert said. He reflected on his involvement in the sportscasting scene covering the Syracuse SkyChiefs and the variety of on-air experiences at the local radio stations.

The freshman's steal and drive by him and didn't let him rallies from a 35-3 deficit to upend his current position at the MSG networks still shared some of his experiences. Albert's famous "Yes — and..." catchphrase stemmed from his being a court press at a layup for the Johnnies' final goal — and how he got it. Anchored in the middle by Etan Thomas' six rejections and 11 blocks and the second stanza — SU limited St. John's to a few good looks in the game's waning moments.

"They came in (the lane) a lot, and the way Howard said. "I listened to and admired (like) Marty Glickman," Albert added. "Even at home I would drive my parents crazy because I phone sounding like Marty and doing things. But eventually you learn the game." Albert's famous "Yes — and it counts" and his role as an announcer from childhood basketball games with his friends. He recalled hearing his friend the echo call after each game, and later incorporated it into his play-by-play.

Zone stifles
Red Storm

Opposing coaches fear the trademark Syracuse 2-3 zone like a young reporter fears a Bobby Knight press conference.

If not for the hot hand of Kentucky's Jeff Shepherd, the 2-3 would have had Jim Boeheim's 1995-96 squad cutting down the nets concluding March Madness.

Like No. 44 or heckling Jake Voskuhl, the SU tradition of the 2-3 was out in full force when St. John's stymied the Carrier Dome on Monday. The 22,632 onlookers watched the zone limit St. John's to just six points in the final six minutes of SU's 63-57 victory.

"We teach great fundamentals of the zone defense," SU guard Tony Bland said. "We had guys out there playing active, and we made some great deflections and good plays."

St. John's found the backdoor open in the first shot of a thee-point lead, but St. John's coach Mike Jarvis said, "Unfortunately, one wasn't. Hart made a great pass. I don't know how he saw (Brown), but he did."

Campus assaults increase

R.A.P.E. Center cites rise in rape cases

BY SARAH OVASKA
Staff Writer

The number of sexual assaults reported by Syracuse University students is rising, according to the SU R.A.P.E. Center.

Students reported 74 cases of assault last year, according to the center. The number increased from 67 in 1998, 58 in 1997 and 30 in 1996, the report said.

The 1999 report includes incidents involving students last year, plus counseling for assaults in previous years. The cases consist of incidents involving rape, attempted rape, incest, stalking and relationship abuse.

Ninety percent of the students who sought help last year, however, continued attending therapy at the center after their initial contact with counselors, the report said.

"The numbers go up, but its hard to know if it reflects an increase in violence or reporting of incidents," said Anastasia Urtz, associate dean of student relations and director of the SU Office of Judicial Affairs.

Forty-two students sought help at the center for sexual assaults that occurred within the campus community in 1999, according to the report.

Of the assaults that occurred last year 20 were on campus, usually in the residence hall rooms of victims or the assaulted attacker, and 52 occurred at off-campus locations, usually in apartments.

Alcohol and drugs

In 91 percent of the attacks, one or both parties involved were under the influence of alcohol, the report added.

Urtz said because many sexual assaults occur under the influence of alcohol and without witnesses present, Judicial Affairs hearings are often cases of hearsay.

"It may be hard for a board to understand and pinpoint which behaviors were consented to and which were not," she said.

Date-rape drugs such as Rohypnol, GHB and Xanax were involved in 14 incidents. See RAPE page 10.

Fiscal report reveals growth in SU earnings

BY MAGIN MCKENNA
Staff Writer

Syracuse University’s earnings grew during the last fiscal year by more than $49 million, a sum spurred by a greater collection of student tuition and fees, according to Internal Revenue Service documents.

The figure includes all income generated from university-owned buildings, equipment and other SU business and property investments, said Lou Marcoccia, senior vice president for business, finance and administrative services.

The 1998 fiscal year report includes all money accumulated between July 1, 1998 and June 30, 1999. By the end of the 1998 fiscal year, SU assets totaled $1,405,026,272 compared to just more than $1.3 billion at the end of the same period a year before.

Income collected from tuition and fees in 1998 mainly contributed to the growth in revenue, Marcoccia said. The university gained about $15 million from the tuition and fees, compared to the 1997 fiscal year, according to the report. See BUDGET page 9.

The War of Race Haunts the Conscious of American People - All of Us Are Related

The war of race haunts the conscious of American people, panelists said Tuesday in the Schine Student Center.

Syracuse University faculty panelists emotionally debated an exhibit displayed in Schine entitled, "All of Us Are Related. Each of Us Is Unique."

The exhibit stresses that race is only an "illusion" and biologically does not exist. Many of the panelists, however, agreed that this "illusion" built the foundation of race relations in the United States.

"I am a firm believer that something called 'race' exists and that something called 'race' affected a large part of my life," said panelist William Pollard, dean of the School of Social Work.

Pollard asked, "Why now am I suddenly being told that I am no different from the white guy next door?"

Thruway Authority raises tolls, prepares for construction

BY MAGIN MCKENNA

The New York State Thruway Authority is asking drivers to pay more in tolls this February. 2000.

The Thruway Authority will make about $42 million in improvements to the I-481 interchange and the Western New York area. Improvements will also be made to the Syracuse Inner Harbor, she added.

The improvement project includes widening traffic lanes, restoration of pavement and safety improvements to thoroughfares across central and upstate New York, Frost said.

"There has been a huge increase in traffic in the state," she said. "The Thruway has been identified as a high priority for improvements and it would be impossible to get these badly needed projects underway without an increase in tolls."

Tolls that are documented through ticketing systems will be rounded to the next nickel for the next three years, Frost said. At bridges and barriers stations, where tolls are collected in increments of 25 cents, the increase will not take effect until the collection requires an additional quarter, Frost said.

RICHMOND, Va. — A measure requiring public schools to observe a minute of silence for meditation, prayer or reflection at the beginning of every school day was overwhelmingly approved by Virginia's Senate today, and even opponents expect it to become law.

In a 28 to 11 vote, senators agreed to legislation hailed by many religious groups as a way to instill values in young people and reduce vio- lence in schools. Many civil lib- erties arguments that it crosses the line between church and state.

Gov. James S. Gilmore III (R) said in an interview that the measure would not infringe on religious freedom and that it was a good way to help "instill character in the lives of young people."

Since the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1962 that organized school prayer is unconsti- tutional, the courts have been divided on the issue of religious prayer and school-sponsored activities in public schools. In the 1962 ruling, the high court held that voluntary prayer in public schools violated the establishment clause of the First Amendment.

This year, Republicans control the Virginia General Assem- bly for the first time, creating a favorable environment for legis- lation sought by conservatives.

Primary heads surprises

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Vice President Al Gore, the Democratic Sen. John McCain scored key victories Tuesday in the nation’s first presidential primary.

McCain surpassed the greatest of expectations by trouncing Republican front-runner Texas Gov. George W. Bush, 49 to 30 percent, according to CNN.

McCain’s strategy of ignoring the Jan. 24 Iowa caucus and concentrating on the New Hampshire Primary made his victory in the Granite State the biggest win ever by a non-incumbent in New Hampshire.

McCain’s success in gaining independent voters, Gore’s narrow victory may be attributed to the New Hampshire’s complex primary system.

Republican National Committee member Mike Helon of Tucson, Ariz., said the victory in New Hampshire should prove to voters in McCain’s home state that he could win the presidency. He praised the senator for his “dynamic, energetic” appeal.

Gore’s narrow victory may be attributed to Republican primary victor Arizona Sen. John McCain’s success in gaining independent voters, who can vote in either the Democratic or Republican primary, Snyder said. McCain beat his Republican opponents.

NASHUA, N.H. — Arizona Sen. John McCain won’t be able to take the stage for a victory speech in New Hampshire tonight after his narrow defeat to Texas Gov. George W. Bush, 49 to 30 percent, according to CNN.

McCain plowed through the crowd of supporters at the Nashua Crowne Plaza ballroom to reach the stage. The swing band missed its cue to launch into “Anchors Away,” but the crowd improvised on its own with chants of “Go, John, Go.”

The challenge for the McCain campaign now is to try and Bush's organization and funding outweighed McCain so much that putting Bush over was the best objective, said DeRios.

McCain could not afford to run a national effort like his rival, so he had to use a massive campaign in one place, he said. McCain's campaign needs to continue primary victories and winning ballot access in New York state, DeRios added.

tor, disagreed.

"If Bush had won in New Hampshire, I wouldn't have as much acceptance as I do now," Ryan said. "There's a lot of primaries coming up and so far, there's been none for the other Republican candidates who have less name recognition.

The upcoming primary in South Carolina and Delaware will further cement the candidates, early success, said Dan Derossi, SU's College Republicans president.

"I definitely don't think this is a one time shot," said Derossi, a senior political science major.

Derossi favors McCain out of disagreement with the other candidates who "don't seem to have the best chance," he said.

The two Democratic leaders in the general election, Derossi explained. The McCain pick has the potential not only to unite the Republican party, but also to draw in key independent and moderate voters, he added.

The only way for him to realize that potential and win his fight for statewide ballot access is by continuing the pace of his New Hampshire campaign, Derossi said.

Palin, who received 14 percent of the New Hampshire vote, must now focus his efforts on adding a truly convinced electorate to the primaries, said Jim DiBlassi, Oneida County legislator.

"He's a long shot. I wonder if he's running just to get his ideas into the Republican party," DiBlassi said.

DiBlassi is running as a Republican delegate to the Republican Na-\ntional Convention to counter the defeat in New Hampshire of the seared Forbes fare. The defeat is because of Forbes' inability to gain momentum on issues, but because of voter concern over the candidates' images, he added.

that are important are health care, education, social security, taxes and the economy.

Gamble pays off for McCain in N.H.

Throughout Sen. John McCain's storied life, courage has been a common theme. He had his fighter jet shot down twice over Vietnam and spent five years in a Viet Cong prison. He consistently waged ideological battles with establishment-minded politicians on the floor of the U.S. Senate.

When the odds are against McCain, he is usually at his best.

His 2000 presidential campaign is no different, as proven Tuesday by his crushing of Texas Gov. George W. Bush in the Republican's New Hampshire state primary. Clearly outmatched by Bush in national publicity and money, the U.S. senator from Arizona skipped last week's Iowa caucus to campaign with incredible fervor in the tiny New England state. McCain conducted town meetings even when only 40 people showed up, traveled from sleepy town to sleepy town, and delivered speeches and showed the homey New Hampshire citizenry that he was worthy of their vote.

It was a brilliant, albeit risky strategy. If Bush would have beaten McCain in New Hampshire, McCain's Republican presidential nomination hopes would be dashed. Instead, McCain's victory-or-bust gamble in New Hampshire worked, elevating him from distant second to legitimate contender status in the Republican primary race. And he did it intimately.

Primary contests this month in Delaware, South Carolina and Michigan will determine whether Republican voters are singing behind McCain or view his New Hampshire victory as a threat to the GOP establishment and its chosen son, Bush.

Regardless of what one thinks of McCain's views, a politically healthy McCain will make the Republican presidential primary a real contest, especially when New Year's turn comes March 7.

Giant corporate merger should be prevented

Remember how you read George Orwell's 1984 and thought, "Gee, I'm glad that one all-powerful force doesn't control almost everything." Unfortunately, sentiment became a little less reassuring on January 10, when America Online announced its intention to purchase media giant Time Warner. I can't help but ask, is anyone paying attention?

The week of the announcement was superfluous media attention to the merger, yet most of it was of no substance at all. Even the New York Times seemed to have a hard time thinking about what the deal meant in terms of the real important questions. Frankly, I really don't like the idea of the CEO of anything dressing casually. It will only make it more difficult to decide where to shout when the revolution comes.

Regardless, attire is not the most important issue at hand.

This deal is being called the largest business merger in economic history. I don't think "large" is even a sufficient word. The AOL/Time Warner merger makes Ma Bell look like a school girl. Time Warner is the most powerful media conglomerate in the world. They own cable systems, television networks, newspapers, magazines, record companies, publishing houses, film studios and movie theaters in almost every country worldwide. AOL's grip over America's Internet transactions is all too familiar in business and popular culture. "You've Got Mail" is not only hallmark of AOL's Internet mail service, it is a metaphor to the fact that it seems like America can't get enough of the Internet or Tom Hanks.

One of the strangest things about the merger is who is purchasing whom. Time Warner’s cable system now was worth $28 billion, dwarfing AOL's $5.2 billion. However, AOL's buying power in the merger is based on its stock value, which, like other Internet stocks, is highly speculative. It is worth a lot more money than it actually makes. So much more, in fact, that they are able to buy the company that owns and distributes more of the history of the world. If this doesn't sound like Big Brother, I don't know what does.

One hot button issue of the merger has been the topic of open access to broadband cable lines. AOL fought to ensure that Time Warner's cable lines would be available to other Internet service providers the same way those lines are open to competing long distance companies. Now that AOL will own Time Warner's cable lines, that commitment to open access has been called into question.

Nightline, Time Warner CEO Gerald Levin said, "We're going to take the open access turbines of Washington, and out of city hall, and put into the marketplace. We're in the business of making over the obscene amounts of money he could make selling access to the cable lines, not about any sort of fairly regulated infrastructure. This isn't so much "open" access as it is "selling" access. You'll think a high level CEO would know the difference. As usual, with corporate America it's not about being fair, it's about making money.

Levin went on CNN several days before the merger announcement and prophesied the new age of global media. "It will be and is becoming the predominant business of the 21st century. In his view it is "more important than government. It's more important than educational institutions and non-profits. We're going to need to have these corporations redefined as instruments of public service, and that may be a more efficient way to deal with society's problems than bureaucratic governments."

I don't know if big business should be lecturing the government on the merits of bureaucracy. Second only to government is Big Business of the 21st century. In his view it is the dominant business of the 21st century. His column appears in The New York Times seemed to give more of no substance at all. Even the New York Times seemed to have a hard time thinking about what the deal meant in terms of public safety. This isn't so much "open" access as it is "selling" access. You'll think a high level CEO would know the difference. As usual, with corporate America it's not about being fair, it's about making money.

This merger should not be allowed. The AOL/Time Warner deal warrants immediate antitrust investigations from the Justice Department and the FCC. Until that happens my only advice is: be afraid.

SU alcohol policy hurts innocent students

To The Editor:

In the beginning of last semester, my roommate and I had a few people in our room late on a Saturday night and nobody was drunk, there were no alcoholic beverages around when my roommate and I went to the bar and ordered a lot of beer out all over the place. The next day, this event is that one of the guys who lives in the suite we don't have anything to drink that night. He now has to face alcohol charges that now have most likely ruined his chances of saving his parents $9,000 a year in room and board because he had applied for an RA position for next year.

The question I ask is: How can public safety or RA's accuse students of being intoxicated without breathalyzers or any type of "walking the line" test? The fact of the matter is that drunk, Campus police Shaw listen loud and clear: you will never ever get students at any college in America to stop drinking no matter how many ads you run, spread the word or how hard people get hurt! Take our parents' money and spend it somewhere else!

Students await $1.5 million Web site deal

BY SHELBY HEALY
Staff Writer

Virtualintern.com, a new Web site created and operated by four Syracuse University students, will this week close a $1.5 million deal with start-up firm Venture Capital, site creator Nathan Kuder announced Tuesday.

The site, launched last week, allows students, businesses and career counselors to search for internship positions filed by companies. Businesses registered with Virtualintern can also look for specialized applicants by grade point average, university, major, skills, location and availability.

"We were interning for my older brother's e-commerce company," said Kuder, a sophomore political philosophy and economics major.

Nathan and his brother Jason began planning for the project in August, Kuder said.

"We had to find replacements for ourselves and thought about how much easier it would be if we could do this all online," Kuder said.

Each of the site's creators had their own problems finding internships, said Brian Cohen, a senior advertising major.

"We bounced the idea off of a few people and they really liked it," he said.

Venture Capital, a company that financially assists new businesses, will invest in the company, Cohen said.

Virtualintern includes Cornerstone Partners, an executive placement firm based in Columbus, OH, and Netvendor, an internet commerce company.

Ryan Spratt, another partner in the venture, said he hopes to see companies such as DreamWorks, Disney, MTV and Nickelodeon on the site as it becomes more advertised.

"We are aiming to be the premiere internship site," Kuder said. "We want people to think of us as the internship site."

Kuder added that E*Trade, an online stock brokerage, registered for the site and will be added to the database soon.

"This site will be a great help for internship hunters as well as business and non-profit organizations," Kuder said.

Previous sites have excluded organizations in charging to be added to their databases, he added.

Some SU students are eager to use the new site once it begins to expand, said Mary Robinson, a freshman psychology major.

"A Web site like that would be very helpful to undergraduates, especially those who are clueless in the process of finding an internship," Robinson said. "It cuts down the work and eradicates the fear of having to go ask someone for an internship."

"It's like a job, you know they want you, and that makes it a lot easier."

Students ready for One World Celebration

BY CAROLINE CHEN
Staff Writer

The School of Management is bringing a world of culture to the Syracuse University campus today as part of its One World Celebration.

The celebration. which continues until Feb. 12, preludes in planning the event are also practicing different marketing strategies, said Wen-Cheng Chen, a junior entrepreneurship major.

The primary reason for having International Day is because we want people from different countries to appreciate what other countries have to offer," said Peter Koveos, School of Management associate dean.

"It's an opportunity for international students to display what makes their culture unique," McKewon said.

Business students involved in planning the event are also practicing different marketing strategies, said Wen-Cheng Chen, a junior entrepreneurship major.

"We want people from different countries to appreciate what other countries have to offer," said Peter Koveos, School of Management associate dean.

There will be 20 to 25 booths set up by students representing their native countries, which include India, Brazil, Thailand, Turkey and Malaysia, Koveos said.

"It's an opportunity for international students to display what makes their culture unique," McKewon said.

Business students involved in planning the event are also practicing different marketing strategies, said Wen-Cheng Chen, a junior entrepreneurship major.

"You have to try to make people interested in your country and culture," Chen said.

Taiwan native Lino Li, a first-year business administration graduate student, said he will give SU students a presentation regarding the importance of computers and technology to Taiwan.

"The more people to visit our booth, the more people to introduce Taiwan to," Li said.

He added that it is especially important for business students to experience other cultures because they will work on a global scale.

"You will need to go abroad for your business, so you will need to understand other cultures," Li said.

"I think from the comments we've heard from students, they had a great time last year," Koveos said. "It's been growing every year.

"Now it has become a tradition. We wouldn't think of having a year without International Day."
He added that blacks have always known that race is only a social construct. But race has continued to exist because "people are programmed to think about themselves and others" in a certain way.

Bruce Hare, a professor of African-American studies, said this programming comes to life through people like Ku Klux Klansman David Duke and baseball player John Rocker, who has recently been criticized for comments he made regarding ethnicity.

"I don't think we should go to the extreme of saying there would be also be ignored. "I don't think we should go to the extreme of saying there are no racial categories," Masur said.

"People say you can ignore race," Pessin said. "However, our society is based on that. You can't ignore it because it does exist. People are treated differently. Race is something that's attributed to you whether you acknowledge it or not."

He cautioned the audience that the category of race may be replicated with non-pleasing words such as sub-species, breeds, and a variety of stocks or strains to describe a type of human being.

Political science professor Daniel Holliman stated the hypocrisy in erasing a socio-historical problem of racism because now science "has suddenly gotten a clue that there is no such thing as race."

"Science got us into this problem," Holliman said after quoting noted scholars from the 17th Century Age of Enlightenment, such as Thomas Jefferson, Emmanuel Kant, John Locke, and David Hume that created the notion that "blacks" and "whites" were born with biological differences that pre-determined their natural capabilities and intelligence.

"If you want to know where the idea of race comes from," Holliman said, "it comes from our intellectual giants."

Scientific theory was used as a justification for oppressing the "inferior race" and now it is supposed to be eradicated because science says they made a mistake, he said.

"We inherited a legacy of intellectual discourse that gives us nothing but racism," he said.

Cathryn Newton, earth sciences department chairwoman, urged gatherers to celebrate racial diversity rather than focus on the cultural and societal evils that have been associated with them.

Dean of Hendricks Chapel Thomas Wolfe said there was no easy solution, even though the exhibit tries to capture it.

"There is a temptation in the simplicity to ignore the complexity of this idea we call race," Wolfe said.

Yolanda Arrington, a senior broadcast journalism major, said the categories of race and racism will continue to flourish because of this complexity.

"I don't think there is a clear-cut resolution for racism," she said. "We're too far into it to put an end to it."

Sophomore Sandi Pessin said that although race is not a biological reality, it still has a great effect on society.

Financial aid granted to students from the university, however, increased by about $30 million, the report said.

But SU Student Government Association President James James called the numbers disproportional. The disparity in funding between tuition and financial aid is an issue of engaging dispute for SGA and the SU student body, said James, a junior musical theater major.

"I believe financial aid should go up," James said.

A concern for SGA is that university tuition rises without comparable financial aid increases, he said.

"The university is a business before it is an institution of learning," James said. "It has to make money. I think it's a shame.

Marcoccia, however, said the tuition and financial aid numbers are proportional because they both increased by 5 percent from the 1997 fiscal year.

"The largest revenue source for the university is tuition and fees," Marcoccia said. "If all the tuition and fees were put in financial aid there would be no money for instruction.

"I would suggest that students inform local legislators and university officials of their financial concerns.

"Ask yourself how many classes you have that are taught by teaching assistants," he said. "Where's the big distinguished faculty?"

Residence Hall and Food Services

The report cited dining services and residence halls at the top of the university's income producing activities.

During the 1998 fiscal year, SU garnered more than $30 million in total revenue from residence halls, about an $870,000 increase from last year. Income from dining services is about $20 million in revenue both years, the report said.

Although the numbers are labeled as income producing activities in the report, they do not represent profits for the university, Marcoccia said. He added that the majority of the money earned goes to covering university expenses.

Marcoccia declined to disclose the net amounts, citing university confidentiality policies.

"The university does not make money off of residence halls or dining services," Marcoccia said. "Any amount in residence halls or dining services that is not used to pay for salaries or other expenses gets returned to the university's budget.

"We could lower the prices on residence halls and increase tuition," he added. "We still need to come up with an 'X' amount of money.

Several SU students are critical of the amounts of money generated by residence halls and dining services because they say the services are over-priced.

"I can't speak on behalf of my organization, but personally I think the quality of our food services is not worth that much money," Residence Hall Association President Jonathan Eisenmann said.

"I think the food services could improve," he added. "They are not very responsive to students. They either need to improve the quality or lower the price.

SU residence halls, however, are of comparable quality to other universities, said Eisenmann, a political science, economics and policy studies major.

One reason for SU's ability to generate a great deal of income from food services is a policy that mandates freshmen living on campus purchase a minimum of 11 meals per week, Eisenmann said.

Parking revenue

The university collected about $4 million in total revenue from parking services during the 1997 and 1998 fiscal years.

"It doesn't surprise me that they made that much money," said Stefanie Pollock, an undecided freshman in the College of Arts and Sciences. "They charge so much to do it."

Pollock, who pays about $330 a year to park in the underground Brewer/Boland garage, said her parking spot is not guaranteed by the university.

"When I tried to park in the B/B garage I found out the university had rented it out for the basketball game," Pollock said. "It's kind of frustrating when I'm paying that much to park and I can't even find a spot."

Another frustration is a fear that her vehicle will not be safely guarded in the area that surrounds the B/B Complex, Pollock said.

"Anybody could have entered the garage because the doors were wide open," Pollock said.

James recognized that parking concerns are often brought to SGA by students. But there is no simple solution to the problem, he said.

"Our school is in the city," James said. "When students complain to me, I say 'What do you want me to do, knock down Newhouse and build a student parking lot?'"

Incidents last year, according to the report, "The date-rape drugs are more accessible now than ever before," said Dolores Card, the center’s director.

Card added that the drugs’ tendencies to exit a victim’s bloodstream quickly is combined with the anonymity the drugs give the attacker. This gives that attacker a false sense of security and makes that person think they will not be caught, she said. The use of the date-rape drugs first began to appear at SU three years ago, Card said. Since then evidence of the drug’s usage has been prevalent, she said. To avoid date-rape drugs, students should watch drinks being poured — whether they contain alcohol or not — and avoid drinking from open containers like pitchers of beer or punch. Card said. It only takes a second for a rapist to drop a pill in a drink, she added.

"One of my close friends had something put in her drink," said Amanda Cohen, a freshman international relations major. "We were just really glad we were there to bring her home." Card advised that students who think they are suffering the effects of date-rape drugs to call the center immediately. The number of the center is posted in both men and women bathrooms on campus and counselors are available at the center during all hours.

Medical evidence needs to be gathered within 72 hours of a rape in order to be used in a criminal prosecution, because of the crime’s 30 day statute of limitation, Card said.

Punishment
Victims, after contacting the center, are given the option of whether or not to seek punishment for the accused rapist, Card said.

Punishment can either come through criminal prosecution or disciplinary action through Judicial Affairs. Only a fraction of the people utilizing the center choose to prosecute their attackers, Card said.

Judicial Affairs gives sexual assault victims and accused attackers the choice of having a student or faculty board hear the case.

In Urtz’s experience, all cases of sexual assault brought to Judicial Affairs are heard by a faculty board, she said. Disciplinary action ranges from separation of the two involved students to the attacker’s dismissal from the university, Urtz said.

Ruling can be difficult in sexual assault cases because of the emotions involved and the influences of alcohol, Urtz said. But cases occurring both on and off campus are treated equally, she added.

"Students think Judicial Affairs only applies to (SU) real estate," she said. "The Code of Student Conduct applies to students no matter where they are, even if they’re studying abroad."

Despite the difficulty of determining consent, punishment would more likely be given by Judicial Affairs than a criminal investigation by the city police, Urtz said. A criminal rape trial requires that guilt is proven without any doubt. Judicial Affairs operates by standard of proof, as in a civil trial, where an event needs to be proven it most likely happened, she said.

Sexual assault is the most rapidly growing violent crime in the United States, according to the American Medical Association. The association added that fewer than half of all rapes are reported.

Card said even fewer rapes are reported on college campuses — about 4 percent. She said the rape statistics at SU are consistent with other colleges, but she stressed their seriousness.

"Rape is a lifelong concern," she said. "Anywhere you live, be aware and learn to trust your instincts."

"This is just the beginning of the proposal," Frost said, adding that the Thruway Authority will host four public meetings in Syracuse, Buffalo, Albany and the Hudson River Valley region before beginning the project.

"This process requires public input," she said. "We will take all public comments under advisement."

Increased tolls, however, will eventually add another expense to college students’ small budgets, said Lauren Williamson, a Long Island resident. "You wonder why they’re so much higher in New York."

But despite the inconvenience of increased tolls, Williamson said road improvements are especially important in a state that is subject to weathering by heavy snow.

Increasing tolls is the best method to raise revenue for those road repairs, said Renee Hanhart, a senior marketing and economics major.

"The way the economic system is set up, the tolls are the only way to go," Hanhart said.

Many students will not be affected by the increased tolls, however, because of infrequent trips home, she said.

"It only affects me twice a year really," said Hanhart, a Chicago resident. "It’s not something I would notice until I went home."

The federal government provides free tests for low-income women with no health insurance to help determine whether they might have breast or cervical cancer. But if the tests determine that you do have such a cancer, you'll be left pretty much on your own. Although the disease is often fatal, women who get the free tests often can't afford such treatment without help. Abundant research has shown that low-income, uninsured, black and Hispanic women, while less likely than the general population to get breast and cervical cancer, are much more likely to die of these cancers once they contract them.

Tug of war

No one can say for sure how the ongoing custody dispute between Ellen's Cuban father and his U.S. relatives will ultimately affect him. But Dan Reidenberg, 33, one of the first children in the United States to be given to a father in a custody dispute, affirms the researchers who say the long-term fallout of such battles can be devastating for children.

Cold snap

Snow requires folks to rethink their wardrobe. It also shows fashion to the back of the closet in favor of comfort, practicality and endurance. When you're layering, the lower layers should be hidden by the top layer. If you're going to wear warm, fuzzy boots for your commute, take shoes to change into at your office or school. The fashion industry manufactures all sorts of items designed for bad weather. But often these items are so expensive that one hesitates not only to buy them but also to trapeze through muck in them.

Coplin touts good deeds

BY SAPNA KOLLALI
Asst. Lifestyle Editor

A little teasing doesn’t really bother Bill Coplin. The director of Syracuse University's Public Affairs Program and a policy studies professor in the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Coplin is well aware of the stigma surrounding his self-proclaimed "do-gooder" status, and he welcomes the joking among his friends and colleagues.

"When they make fun of me, a lot of times it's because they're afraid of becoming a 'do-gooder,'" Coplin said. "And boy, if that's the case, then go right ahead."

"The term has such a negative connotation, and I really wanted to change that because I think it's important to give part of yourself back to the community," Coplin said. "It's just not a positive term in our society."

"How You Can Help" details simple good deeds readers can incorporate into their everyday lives. The book also lists more than 70 charities and organizations with which readers can become involved.

Coplin, a long-life volunteer and author of 14 previous public policy books, wrote his first trade book as a resource for people looking for ways to become involved in their community. He added in profiles of people - from Ralph Nader and Nelson Mandela in South Africa to Wendy Kopp, a Teach for America worker, and Susan Anderson, a member of the Literacy Volunteers of America in Wisconsin - who are good citizens and have made contributions to their community.

Readjustment proves difficult

I was in London last semester. It seemed like a one-month-high school experience. It was hard to believe that I still attended Syracuse University while studying in a mansion in the center of Notting Hill. It was hard to believe that life goes on without you for family and close friends. The normal, everyday life you are accustomed to has ceased, and you are thrown into a new, exciting city life. You are expected to find a flat, flatmates, part-time work and search for a group of people who could maybe substitute for those you left behind at campus - all in one day.

It didn't really work; it's impossible to do everything.

Pollack advocates allowing kosher students to be exempt from mealtimes, so they can spend their own time and money on their own kosher food and cook it themselves rather than worrying about the dining halls' kosher practices.

“There has to be exceptions,” he said. “SU is a human organization, and there’s no reason for technicalities to get in the way of surviving physically and financially.”

“It says all over the handbooks and applications here that SU is a student-centered university,” he said. “But it doesn’t feel that way when I come across the kosher problem.”

Ariel Wolinsky, a sophomore undeclared major in the College of Arts and Sciences, said he became frustrated with Shaw's rules for obtaining kosher meals. In order to get a kosher breakfast, lunch or dinner, students must call several hours in advance. Her busy class schedule, however, prevented her from planning in advance, and she generally stuck to eating vegetarian selections and pasta, both of which also meet kosher standards, in the dining hall.

After a year of struggling through the sameness of pasta dining hall dinners, Wolinsky obtained a waiver to move off-campus, where she can maintain her own kosher kitchen. But while that solution caters to her dietary needs, it locks her out of the social camaraderie that usually accompanies college mealtimes.

“I end up cooking alone every night,” she said. “After a while, that’s not so fun.”

But Kaminsky said he hopes that the small number of student complaints doesn’t set the tone for the entire kosher dining program, which he said is flexible enough to cater to most people’s definitions of kosher eating.

“There will always be two or three unsatisfied customers, everywhere — from the kosher kitchen at SU to Amazon.com,” he said.

Branching out
Students at other universities also struggle to meet kosher dietary needs.

Only a few predominantly Jewish universities in the nation boast extensive kosher dining plans. While schools such as Yeshiva University and Brandeis University have large Jewish populations, most U.S. universities have only a small pocket of Jewish students, which generally makes the establishment of kosher kitchens cost-prohibitive.

Some schools, however, find ways to provide for all students without breaking the bank. The University of Pennsylvania, for instance, strives to provide inclusive dining options for all its students. Penn offers comprehensive kosher meal plans and snack bar offerings, served in the campus Hillel, for about the same amount of SU’s semesterly meal plan rates.

After being unimpressed with her school’s kosher offerings, Maryanna Silverman, a senior economics major at American University in Washington, D.C. resorted to a steady diet of vending-machine potato chips and candy bars, which are generally kosher. AU, she said, shied away from the expenses incurred by a kosher kitchen.

Kaminsky, too, believes universities fear the monetary loss that kosher kitchen establishments usually lead to — wasted dollars from leftover food and salaries for kosher cooks and supervisors. But he said schools should treat the process as a service to students with special needs — not like a business.

“Kosher kitchens are certainly a black hole for money, but it’s a losing prospect if universities are counting the dollar as their bottom line,” he said.

Instead of bearing the burden of purchasing kosher food for preparation and providing proper supervision for cooking, Silverman recommends that schools examine the possibilities of bringing in private restaurants or snack bars, like Pizza Cave, a national kosher pizza chain.

But it’s a cyclical problem, she said. Since most colleges don’t offer kosher meal plans, they don’t attract a large Jewish population, and then the few Jews who do attend aren’t given the proper options.

“With this kind of problem, you really don’t know what came first — the chicken or the egg,” she said.

The slide continued for the Syracuse women's basketball team Tuesday night as it dropped a 57-44 decision at Villanova.

The loss was the Orangewomen's third in a row and dropped their record to 8-10 (1-6 in the Big East).

The Orangewomen's last victory came on Jan. 19 to the same Wildcat team that beat them by 13 at The Pavilion. In the previous match, Syracuse downed Villanova 66-42 at Manley Fieldhouse.

SU started quickly against the Wildcats on Tuesday, scoring the game's first seven points. However, VU battled back and with 17:19 left in the first half, sophomore forward Stephanie Baker hit a layup to give the Wildcats an 18-17 advantage.

The Orangewomen would never see the lead again.

The Wildcats led 23-21 at halftime, mainly because of the Orangewomen's continued shooting woes.

SU, which suffered through a horrid shooting afternoon Saturday in a 65-63 home loss to West Virginia, shot just 33 percent from the field in the first half against Villanova.

The Orangewomen's 12-0 run early in the second half to pull away from SU. VU senior guard Jeneri Skeeters keyed the burst with seven points.

After the early run, the Wildcats led ballooned to as much as 20 before the eventual 13-point final margin.

Freshman guard Trisha Juhline led the way for Nova with 14 points, while Skeeters chipped in 14.

Junior forward Beth Record led the way for the Orangewomen with 13 points.

The team-high performance comes on the heels of Record's worst outing of the season when she scored just six points in the loss to WVU.

Shannon Perry, who had a double-double with 18 points and 13 rebounds against West Virginia, gave another sterling outing as she scored 10 points and pulled down seven boards.

Sophomore guard Jaime James, the poster girl for SU's poor shooting against West Virginia as she hit just 1 of 16 shots, finished with just eight points against the Wildcats.

Entering the game, James was hitting just 29.2 percent of her shots, including 27.9 percent from outside the 3-point arc.

Overall, the Orangewomen continued to shoot poorly, hitting just 37.5 percent of their shots from the field.

SU will try to regain its shooting — and winning — touch when it travels to Rutgers for another conference battle Sunday at 2 p.m.

The closest Syracuse came to gaining a victory was in senior Shawn Thomas' 7-3 loss to John Williams. Freshman Kaleen Pascual — just adjusting to Division I competition — lost a 17-2 decision.

The seven SU competitors lost to the Bears by an aggregate 75-16, and seven of those points were courtesy of Mike Noonan.

Another grappler trying to find his niche is sophomore John Soden. He suffered SU's lone pin — in 42 seconds.

"Anytime you're shut out, it's just unacceptable," Miller said. "Brown just beat us up, one pin after another.

"It was a good experience for me, (The first time). I wrestled out of position, not offensive and weak on defense. This time, I wanted to keep him off balance.

"Also continuing with a great individual season is junior captain Shawn Cowen, CU's captain faced a rematch with BC's Dan Degan. Unlike Cohen, however, Thomas scored a pin in their first showdown, dropping Degan in 1:31 at the Millersville Belles Wrestling Tournament. This time, Thomas put Degan on his back in 2:08.

"Shawn pinned Degan — a wrestler BC coaches think highly of — for the second time in a month," Miller said. "Shawn proved it was no fluke."

With seven dual matches remaining, the Eagles' Evan Williams 16-12. Williams previously decided Cohen 7-4 in the Wilkes Open in early January.

Kent State's 13-point final margin.

Overall, the Eagles continued to shoot poorly, hitting just 27.5 percent of their shots from the field.

SU will try to regain its shooting — and winning — touch when it travels to Rutgers for another conference battle Sunday at 2 p.m.

While Boeheim definitely does not need to tamper with his 18-0 record-setting club, his veteran guard remains in limbo.

However, Griffin prepares for every game as if he might have to play more than 30 minutes. But the reality is that the minutes column by his name in the box score likely will not hit double digits.

"He's frustrated," Larry Brown said. "Allen has been the fourth guy. (Saturday) he stepped up big time. He made a lot of good plays. It's tough to get ready, it's tough to do that, but really good teams have a guy like that.

Griffin keeps his head up and made the best of a less-than-ideal situation, and the SU coaches agree he works hard in practice and helps the young guys mature. He has been supportive of players and has helped Blind and Williams, assistant coach Mike Hopkins said.

Griffin can always look forward to the future. The future of a deep March Madness run. Or the possibility of assuming the point guard slot in the 2000-01 edition of Syracuse basketball.

"Coach said I am the No. 1 guy going into next year," Griffin said. "The only reason I won't be is if I come back to basketball camp out of shape or not prepared. There will be a lot of responsibility on my part.

Griffin battles for time

BY ERIC NATHAN

He's a year older. Stronger. Quicker. More experienced. So what happened to Allen Griffin?

Last year, Griffin played in all 33 games and each time was on the floor when the ball went in the air. In 1998-99, he posted a solid season as a sophomore with 7.9 points per game and 16 assists versus just 71 turnovers. While his shooting was still 39 percent from the field, including 35 percent from behind the 3-point arc, he still played better than 27 minutes a game — 30 in the East competition.

Griffin had only one 20-plus minute game this season — against lowly Richmond — before he logged 28 against Boston College on Saturday. He filled in for Jason Hart, who played 33 foul-plagued and flu-ridden minutes, with a solid seven point, four-assist effort in leading SU to its 73-65 victory.

"It's no surprise he can come in and run the team," Hart said. "He's played point guard last year. A lot of people don't realize that. He played the two-guard a majority of the time. He started all the games. There is no mistake why he can handle the pressure."

This year, head coach Jim Boeheim has replaced Griffin's minutes with more than half. While the Brooklyn native continues to play the point guard slot, he has been relegated to the pine because Hart slid over to his natural position.

Griffin's minutes have not been appointed this year. While Hart has an impressive 24-0-1 assist-to-turnover ratio, Griffin has nearly 4 to 1 ratio. The junior guard has also snatched 10 steals, three of which came in the BC game. But whose minutes should suffer to give Griffin a spot on the hardwood?

Tony Bland is playing the best basketball of his career, and DeShaun Williams is draining threes from all over the court. Hart is easily having the best year of his celebrated career. So what happened to Allen Griffin?

Wrestlers lose pair of duals

BY ERIC NATHAN

With neither Syracuse nor Brown fielding a wrestler in the 197 and 285-pound divisions last Friday, the score sheet read "no match."

That phrase could have described the whole meet for SU, as it lost shut out the Orangemen in the remaining eight matches on its way to a 36-0 victory.

The Orangemen (4-5, 0-3 EIWA) spent the previous day an hour north on Interstate-95, losing a meet to Boston College 35-16.

As has been the trend in SU wrestling, the Orangemen forfeited 16 points between the two dual meets. Brown thoroughly dismantled SU, winning the 125-pound match by forfeit and the remaining seven on the mat — six by decision.

"Brown's just that much better than us," SU head coach Scott Miller said. "They are in the top four or five in the EIWA. We're in no shape to be a top EIWA team."
Moore begins protest

Former GSO president alleges class plagiarism

BY NICK SERRANO
Staff Writer

A graduate student began fasting Tuesday to protest what he said is plagiarism of his work, and unfair grading by a professor.

Former Graduate Student Organization President Zac Moore, an interning relations and social science student, is also organizing a sit-in at the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs Dean’s Office as part of his protest.

Moore held vigil from 12 to 5 p.m. Tuesday and Wednesday at Maxwell. He plans to continue the protest during the weeks to come.

He is asking for a low grade to be removed from his transcript, his money refunded, and his name dropped from class listings and social science student. He is also asking to police reports.

In the 1988 Spring Semester, Moore enrolled in GSO 815 with professor John Renzulli. One day that April, Moore called Short to say he would be late to a class because he had to go to work, he said. But Short would not let him to police reports.

Short responded by telling Moore he had to go to school. Moore called for 18 cars to be towed this week from the University and a taxi company. Nine cars were parked on University Place, according to the reports.

Police targeted areas including Clarendon, Ackerman and Livingston avenues, the reports said. Nine cars were parked on University Place, according to the reports.

"Towing is an established ordinance in the city of Syracuse," said Tim Smith, a driver for the American Automobile Association. "Illegally parked cars make it hard for fire trucks, police cars and anyone else to get down the street."

During the winter months, parking violations increase due to driver apathy toward restrictions, said Marty Rooker, owner of Marty’s Centro buses to travel between North and South campus.

The Central New York Regional Transportation Authority is operating at a sub-par standard, said Syracuse Representative Michael Bragman in a Jan. 26 letter to the authority.

Bragman, the New York State Assembly majority leader, addressed the letter to the authority Board of Directors Chairman Vincent A. Cook.

The authority is a publicly funded corporation which operates more than 200 buses in Onondaga, Cayuga and Oswego counties. It serves more than 41,000 customers daily, including Syracuse University students who use Centro buses to travel between North and South campus.

Nielson seeks ESF presidency

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

Professor Larry Nielson spoke to State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry faculty members Wednesday, imploring them to support his pursuit to become the school president.

The position opened in November when current President Boas Whaley announced he would resign to establish a charter school in the city of Syracuse. SUNY's Board of Trustees granted Whaley permission last week to open the school which will focus on math and science.

Nielson, a natural resources professor from Pennsylvania State University, outlined his plans for ESF, as well as personal characteristics which he said would compliment the job.

"I could say I was bringing a $10 million deal into the university, or I have this, or I have that," said Nielson to about 200 faculty members. "But I couldn't do that. What I do have to offer is 22 years working with a wide variety of people and organizations where a lot of students are, a lot of opportunity, a lot of representation for underrepresented groups."

The common university strategy of "marketing" -- trying to talk students into taking interest in a university -- does not work, Nielson said. Instead, he proposed a method of "sales" when searching out minority recruits.

Student discovers silver coins missing

Staff Reports

Syracuse University graduate student Michael Larcono noticed that a vodka bottle filled with about $250 in silver coins was missing Monday from the dresser in his room, according to a police report.

Larcono said he returned to his home on the 700 block of Clarendon Street Sunday afternoon. He was away for the weekend and noticed the large bottle missing. He called the police the following morning, he said.

Police questioned his roommates. Larcono said his roommates could not be reached for comment.

The result has been widespread dissatisfaction, with workers often liking the old ways. In the case of transit workers, for instance, the new agreement allows for shifts as long as 14 hours.

Navy retrieves recorder

FORT HUENEME, Calif. — An underwater Navy robot, operated remotely, has located a 700-foot-long undersea recorder late Wednesday that should contain clues to the crash of an Alaska Airlines jet off the coast of Ventura County.

The voice recorder, one of two so-called black boxes aboard the plane, was found by the submersible Scorpio, deployed by the San Diego-based Navy vessel Koolie Chooate. Search teams still have not found the flight data recorder, which will be crucial to the investigation.

In Phoenix, an American Airline Flight made an emergency landing Wednesday morning after reporting a “stabilizer trim” malfunction. The pilot on the doomed Alaska Airlines flight reported a few minutes before they crashed. The American crew was using an electronically made single plane model, a twin-engine MD-83, that was being used on the Alaska Airlines flight.

The proposal to increase restrictions comes as part of a push nationally to address the strong statistical evidence that shows teenagers are more easily distracted and engaged in drinking and driving. It’s not clear the peers, making a fatal accident more likely.

Clinton requests benefit increase

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton’s budget would give federal employees a 1.3 percent pay raise for the first time, would allow government workers to use pretax dollars to buy health insurance premiums, officials said Wednesday.

The fiscal 2001 budget, scheduled for release Monday, also would roll back a 1997 deficit-reduction measure that required federal employees to contribute more toward their retirement.

The proposals amount to one of the most generous compensation packages ever in a presidential budget request. The raise and improved benefits would put an estimated $1.9 billion in the pockets of the average federal employee, the Office of Personnel Management said.

The proposals may prove difficult to resist in an election year, especially during a time when Congress projects an overall budget surplus.

Students organize leadership summit

BY SHELBY HEALY
Staff Writer

The Schine Student Center Underground is hosting an all-day summit Saturday to teach Syracuse University students the leadership abilities and time-management skills needed both during college years and after graduation.

The Leadership Education Summit, sponsored by Leadership Experience, Achievement and Development and the SU Student Activities Office, will take place from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m.

"This conference-style event will provide students with a diversified toolbox of leadership skills and abilities," Assistant Director of Student Activities Chris Johnson said. "It aims to help them effectively and efficiently manage their day-to-day lives as college students and equip them to be successful life-long learners."

The day will be divided into four sessions, each of which will last one hour and incorporate three different workshops. The workshops will focus on many facets of leadership, such as communication, motivation and time management, L.E.A.D. member Emily Ching said.

Breakfast and lunch will be provided during the workshop. Paul Buckley, associate director of the SU Center for Academic Achievement, will deliver the keynote address during lunch.

"This is open to all students on campus interested in leadership possibilities," said Ching, a senior sociology and public relations major. "It's free to all students — all you have to do is register."

Students are not required to attend the entire day of scheduled workshops, Ching said.

She said the coordinators of the summit aim to provide all SU undergraduates, graduates and faculty members with one condensed day of workshops. This is in contrast to having the meetings stretched out in weekly sessions, as they were last semester during the first summit, Ching added.

"Leadership is important in the sense of taking the initiative and being able to organize," Ching said. "I think it brings on a lot of issues of responsibility and accomplishment."

Ching said that even if students are not in leadership positions, the skills taught at the summit, such as planning, ethics and team building, are useful in the real world.

"That's where I really screwed up," said Courtney Young, an undeclared sophomore in The College of Arts and Sciences. "I think it could be beneficial for freshmen."

Some students, however, said the summit is trying to teach skills one can only be born with.

"I could use help with time management," said Jonathan Hoster, a sophomore broadcast journalism major. "But I don't think that is something that can be taught — it's something you have to learn for yourself."

Starving student will open SU eyes

Zac Moore’s blitzkrieg fast that started last Monday ends tonight at midnight, but it’s yet to be seen if it has benefited the Syracuse University graduate student.

In the summer of 1999, Moore accused geography Professor John Renie Short of plagiarism. Moore contends that a paragraph in Short’s book, published in 1999, was directly stolen from Moore’s own work, in the form of a paper submitted to Short for Geography 815 in the spring of 1998.

This was just the latest chapter in the conflict between Moore and Short. In the very same spring, Moore says that Short threw him out of class without proper cause. Moore received a “D” in the class.

Claiming wrongdoing, Moore says he has taken his case up with the university. He wants his grade transcript changed and for Short to be reprimanded for stealing a portion of his work. The university has yet to respond.

Expressing his displeasure with the lack of administrative action, Moore is more than willing to grab headlines, student support and pressure the administration with his stunt. Already groups like the Student Environmental Action Coalition are distributing flyers and petitions to garner support for Moore.

However, this spectacle has yet to facilitate direct action from the university. Conventional knowledge says once students hear about Moore’s crusade, the school will respond quickly to protect both its image and Short’s.

But the school’s silence lends suspicion. Four deans at the Maxwell School of Citizenship, home of SU’s graduate geography program, are mum on the case. If the school has investigated Moore’s accusations, they have not shared their findings with students. Their reluctance to communicate does not help the school’s reputation or Professor Short’s.

If Moore has gone through the proper channels, only to be ignored, the university has failed its students. It is unfortunate that the university needs a gun held against its head to perpetuate change.

Campus snow removal receives icy reception

To the Editor:

Once again, I am completely disgusted with the care (or lack thereof) that Syracuse University shows for its students. For a school that costs students money, they can’t clear off the sidewalks and stairs that we need to use to get to class. Here is a news flash for SU: it is against the law for sidewalks and stairs not to be cleared off in a timely fashion.

Of course, something like this does not seem to be a big deal, until you actually have to deal with it. I am disgusted to learn how a school that worries so much about paying off campus debt does not seem to care that its students are going to kill themselves waiting for snow that they have failed to remove.

It’s dangerous for us to have to walk down cement stairs that haven’t been shoveled, or down a sidewalk that hasn’t been cleared. I have seen people fall and almost fallen myself on the way to class.

This is a lawsuit waiting to happen. I know that if I were to fall and seriously hurt myself, I would have no problem slamming the university with a lawsuit to cover my expenses for the next couple of years. Something needs to be done about this before someone gets hurt.

Changing education

Nielsen said universities generally hold fast to tradition and are slow to change — a quality that can be both beneficial and detrimental to its community.

"Traditional disciplines and professions are essential, but they're not sufficient," he said. "We need to build on our strengths and core disciplines, and to support them with other interdisciplinary programs — for tomorrow's programs, not yesterday's."

He added that public education, namely in the United States, is a major step in improving society by providing everyone education. Once students enter ESF, Nielsen called for more more hands-on and fieldwork oriented classwork to not only form a more well-rounded curriculum, but also to break the monotony of packed lecture halls.

The use of visuals in a classroom, even if only videos, will spark students' interests, he noted. "We stand up and lecture in the classroom, even if only videos, will spark students' interests, even in packed lecture halls."

When asked his reason for leaving Penn State to pursue the position, Nielsen said he wished to further achieve his career goals in the field of education — to be part of a leadership position, something he said ESF could give to him.

"My wife and I are very careful at looking at opportunities based on quality programs, quality of life," he said. "ESF fits those needs."

He said the presidential seat he hopes to gain at ESF is "a great job, an absolutely fabulous position."

"Why would anyone not want it, I think is a better question," he said.

Tom Schuster, an ESF employee who graduated from the school in December, said he agreed with many of Nielsen's ideas. He noted Nielsen's priority of catering to students' needs, instead of the "skewed" methods currently in place at ESF. "I was impressed with the way he talked about the urban aspect, about the attraction of minority students instead of telling them 'Yes, you do want to come here.'

Around midnight, police returned to the house after receiving complaints of loud noises coming from inside and outside the residence, the report said.

The students could not be reached for comment.

Sophomore Gerald Brow covered to the house after receiving reports said.

Brow said he went to work and classes throughout the day and came back to his apartment while another has been too ill to regularly attend board meetings, he added.

These factors undermine the board’s oversight of various projects and cause mismanagement of the CENTRO bus company, Bragman added.

"I question whether those in charge are complacent or even complicit in perpetuating this situation,” he said. “Absent compelling information to the contrary, I can only assume that the board has been serving its own interest rather than its leadership and the Central New York community.”

CENTRO did not receive needed equipment because of the incompetence of the directors, Bragman said. Some of the buses ordered by the authority experienced mechanical trouble and could not be used.
The board, however, did not touch the manufacturer, he added.

Authority spokesman David Ristau denied Bragman’s accusations and maintained that the authority provides effective service for its customers.
The CENTRO buses arrive promptly 97 percent of the time, Ristau said. The buses experience an average of only one accident per 100,000 miles, he added.

Bragman requested that the authority submit its financial records for review.

Dan Weiler, a public relations advisor for Bragman, said the request could commence an investigation into the board’s operations.

Campus busing
Many SU students are also affected of the bus service.

"Sometimes the buses are so jammed with people the bus driver will just drive you right by,” said Stacy Rich, a sophomore speech communications major.

While bus service is generally reliable during midday, it is rarely dependable during the morning, the evening and weekends, students said.

“I waited half an hour for the bus one morning,” said Suzanne Ronnholm, a sophomore international relations major. "The bus just wouldn’t come.”

Especially during the winter, CENTRO users grow impatient with the sometimes lagging service, students said.

"I’ve seen some people seem to think we have all the time in the world,” said Jaime James, a sophomore pre-medicine major.

"In this weather, the bus often comes late. Then you are late to class. You get marked absent.
You get in trouble.”

TOWING

"People have a tendency to more or less park closer to where they're going because it's so cold out," Roskoff said. "Parking is also more difficult in the winter because of the snow."

He said drivers do not always abide by parking restrictions so they may park closer to their destination.

"It's a problem when people don't park where they're supposed to," Roskoff said. "People get lazy at times. It causes hazards and people then get in accidents."

Violations, however, are not always the fault of the drivers, he added. Syracuse city streets, particularly in neighborhoods around SU, are narrow, said Kevin Garrett, a junior information studies and technology major.

"Some of the street parking is just annoying," Garrett said.
"There's snow on the road that's sometimes hard to get around."

Though parking may be difficult, it is usually not impossible, Garrett said. The city does a sufficient job marking restricted parking areas, he added.

Snowplows also have a tendency to push snow into areas where students generally park, said Jason Sherman, a sophomore advertising and marketing major.

"Compared to last winter, this winter is far worse," Sherman said. "The plows do a good job plowing and stuff but what they do is push it on the curb where people park."

Sherman said he does not often use his car this semester, knowing that parking will be a problem at most places around the university.

"A lot of people get frustrated with the weather and having to find spots," Sherman said. "I'm just avoiding the problem."

Diversifying millionaires

Frustrated by its inability to put more minorities and women on the show, "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?" delivered an on-air plea Tuesday for more non-whites and women to try qualifying. Executive Producer Michael Davies said he may change the contestant selection method to increase diversity, altering the blind phone-in process that has been employed since the program premiered in August.

Safe sex?

At least eight percent of all cases of HIV infection result from oral sex, according to researchers from the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. The finding is disturbing because many gay men have switched from anal to oral sex due to their perception that it is a safe practice. The study said that eight of the 100 men sampled practiced only oral sex without protection. If any other risk behaviors were identified by the subject, oral sex was ruled out as the route of infection. But because some of the excluded cases could have been caused by oral sex, the actual percentage may be higher.

Westernizing Japan

Japan has always been embraced English, teaching it to students. But it still fails at communicating in English. After many years of muting over this condition, Japan is suddenly being swept by a sense of crisis, almost panic, over the nation's lack of facility with English in the Internet age.

Some critics have labeled Japan as a failed state for its low English proficiency, saying it will fall further behind in all areas unless more Japanese learn to speak it. Prime Minister Keizo Obuchi recently said one of Japan's goals for the 21st century is to make English the country's official second language.

For more than 15.7 million people nationwide, a late-night sweet tooth could be deadly. A Hershey Bar, a handful of Oreos or a glass of Coke could land them in a hospital bed.

Diabetes, a serious and chronic disease, affects 2.9 percent of the U.S. population, according to the American Diabetes Association. Unfortunately, of those 15.7 million people, 9.4 million do not know they have the disease. But, they should. With its complications, diabetes is the seventh leading cause of death in the United States.

Diabetes occurs when a person's pancreas produces insufficient amounts of insulin. Insulin is the hormone that allows the body's cells to convert sugar into energy. Diabetes strikes in two forms — Type 1 and Type 2.

Type 1 is considered more severe of the two types of diabetes. It generally manifests itself before the age of 30. The causes of Type 1 are unknown, but genetics are believed to play a role. A family history of diabetes increases the risk of diabetes.

Type 2 diabetes is more common among minority ethnicities — African Americans, Native Americans, and Latinos — which supports the theory of a genetic cause.

"It's not unusual for a college-aged person to be diagnosed with Type 1," said Christina Biajelo, RN and certified diabetic educator at Creuse Hospital. In Type 1 diabetes, the pancreas stops producing insulin completely. The onset of Type 1 is sudden, almost like shutting off a light switch, Biajelo said.

When this happens, the symptoms hit fast and furious, she said. Symptoms include extreme thirst, frequent urination, weight loss and fatigue. Some of these symptoms may sound familiar to college students, but their extremity is such that the student would be forced to seek medical attention.

People with Type 1 diabetes must receive daily injections of insulin to keep the patient's blood sugar under control. The first method of insulin delivery was by syringe, but now insulin pens and pumps can be used as well. Insulin pens look like ordinary pens, but have needles to inject the insulin.

Pumps are bigger-sized devices cathetered into a person's abdomen, so injections are unnecessary. The pumps contain a reservoir of insulin, and the amount of insulin it delivers can be adjusted. Pumps often offer greater flexibility in diabetes management, but require more responsibility.

Type 2 diabetes generally affects people over the age of 45. In these cases, the pancreas still produces insulin, but not in normal levels. Its symptoms are similar to those of Type 1, only less sudden and less severe.

Risk factors for developing Type 2 diabetes include having a family history of diabetes, being overweight, obesity and poor general health. Because these are contributing factors, Type 2 diabetes can often be managed through a combination of nutrition, exercise and medication.

Diabetes treatment focuses on keeping the patient's blood sugar levels within normal ranges by prop.
SLEUTH

beforehand. My thirst and hunger were out of whack, too."

His scenario is typical in many aspects. Often when first coming down with the disease, people find themselves up and down the munchies at odd times doing constant runs to the bathroom. While these tell-tale symptoms of being overly tired and having the munchies are out of whack, too. "But eating sweets and treats in moderation and restraint is essential to managing the disease. "I love cheesecake, but I know now that I can only have it once in a great while," Moore said.

The challenge of eating on the run has been a constant challenge, he added. He now must cope with budgeting his time around when he must eat, not when his next class is.

That's why it's wise to eat a healthy diet even when you're not exhibiting signs of the disease. In an environment full of junk food temptations, OE sometimes sticks to a strict diet, but it's an important precaution to take for many diabetes-related ailments.

Thirst quencher

All of these symptoms can be the trickiest balancing act for diabetic college students. Alcohol and diabetes don't mix very well. Prolonged alcohol consumption can lead diabetics to feel numbing in extremities and visual problems like cataracts. Again, moderation is key. The American Diabetes Association recommends that patients consume no more than 11 drinks a week. Moore said he has almost entirely eliminated drinking from his lifestyle. "One drink is my limit, with an occasional splurge of two or three," he said. "I used to do it now, it's even kept me more focused on my academics." Though most diabetics have a good understanding of their limitations in these situations, those who don't face an even greater challenge.

Binge drinking is a common college phenomenon. For party-goers who can handle the perils of a drunken stupor, including the treacherous hangovers that follow. But if diabetics drink massive quantities, their blood sugar level can dip dangerously low, resulting in hypoglycemia. Hypoglycemia exhibits signs similar to drunkenness such as slurred speech and impaired walking. So a rule of thumb, eating a meal rich in carbohydrates, such as pasta, can help keep sugar levels up before a night on the town.

Diabetes is a disabling disease; it can cause students to put their lives on hold for a time, in order to reevaluate their lifestyles, as they can avoid problems in the future. At Syracuse University, VanVechten is considered a disability because of its impact on the individual, said Susan Cullen, director of the University's Office of Disability Services.

Since the disease has a stigma, it often affects students who are diagnosed with the condition. "It's important to be open about it. Eating and drinking is something that affects all students, not only those who are diagnosed with diabetes," she said.

There is no cure for the disease and it continues to kill 100,000 Americans each year. Education may be the best weapon to combat its deadly toll.
BAKER

"I feel good about the period I've had to sit out. It's been a big test, but it's made me realize what I've got to do, which is work hard and focus."

The coaching staff keeps him informed of key happenings, he said, which helps him focus.

Finding the willpower to succeed on the field is never an easy task. Baker currently studies with the team and uses the football wing's weight room, but he is unable to involve himself further until next season.

"My problem according to Baker's father, Baker uses the memory of two late grandparents and an aunt — all of whom passed away four years ago — as motivation. "He is a very quiet kid," said Barry Baker Sr. "He's been through trial and tribulation, and that motivates him to stay focused and not keep his head down because things happen for a reason."

"He's set goals, and he is focused on showing what he accomplished in high school was not a fluke."

Baker can't wait for that opportunity.

"Right now, I'm thirsty," Baker said, "and when I get out on the field, all of the energy will come out."

ARE YOU PLANNING TO GRADUATE THIS YEAR?

Qualifications to participate in Commencement on May 14, 2000:

- Bachelor's and master's degree candidates who will complete coursework by August 2000.
- Doctoral degree candidates MUST be certified by May 14, 2000, to participate.

To receive Commencement information:

- Fill out a DIPLOMA REQUEST CARD NOW.
- Questions, call your college recorder, the Registrar's Office — 443-2422 (undergraduates), or the Graduate School — 443-3425 (graduate students).
Great expectations

Of Paul Pasqualoni’s 10 recruiting classes as head coach at Syracuse, this year’s could rank as one of the best heading into the season. The Orange are set to return to past classes that won Big East Championships and major bowl games.

Tough competition

The pressure to win for picking which teams bounce off the bubble and make the NCAA tournament always includes Syracuse. For big wins, the Irish knocked off SU, UConn and Ohio State. That marks the first time the Irish have beaten three top-20 teams in a season since 1991-92.

For their success is sophomore Troy Murphy. He sparked a 17-2 run in N.J.'s 70-63 victory against Johnnie Morris and put the Irish on the NCAA radar. He scored 20 and grabbed a career-high 18 boards for the Irish, helping them come from behind against Villanova for an ESPNU game. A couple of big wins can put some thoughts in the minds of the selection committee.

Climbing up

The Mountaineers of West Virginia are living up to their name and scaling the Big East standings.

They recently won five games in a row, including an overtime thriller over Providence. Leading the way in that game was Marcus Goree. He hit up for 19 points, 12 rebounds, six blocks and four steals.

Gore joined Etan Thomas at the Big East co-player of the week. He also joined Team USA's roster over the weekend Wednesday.

Now it looks like the Hoyas may finally have an heir to the throne. Though G-Town has been led by guards Kevin Serren and Anthony Perry for most of the season, their team is finally taking over.

Either way, the incident is a direct result of the Golden State's collapse. That marks the fourth straight loss for the Golden State, which has at least two conference losses and finally a trip to the swamps of New England.

The battle in the pivot, however, might be even direr. Orangemen center Jereme Frazier, will go head-to-head with the Big East's best ball handler.

SU lands blue-chip class

BY GREG BISHOP

After ascending to the Bowl Championship Series in 1998, the graduation of several key starters left Syracuse with plenty of shoes to fill.

Future NFL players Rob Konrad and Kevin Johnson finished their respective careers, and Donovan McNabb took his legendary Central New York status and moved on to the Philadelphia Eagles.

In spite of the new openings, several of Syracuse's recruits failed to provide instant impact, with just two true freshmen playing in 1999.

This year, things appear to have changed. Syracuse has completed its 2000 recruiting class with a group that may make immediate contributions, especially at the skill positions.

Barry Boswell, one of the top running backs and all-around athletes to ever come out of Long Island, currently attends Syracuse University.

Problem is, he's not playing football.

A standout tailback and strong safety in high school, Boswell put up monster offensive and defensive numbers while winning three Long Island championships.

But the North Babylon High star's academic struggles prevented him from accepting an athletic scholarship from the Orangemen.

Indigible this year, Baker is attending SU under the Higher Education Opportunity Program (HEOP) grant for financially struggling families. He took a full schedule of classes this academic year while he waited to start playing again in August.

Fundraising effort provides $300M for select initiatives

BY KARIN PATTENGILL

Syracuse University’s Commitment to Learning Campaign may have surpassed its $300 million goal, but not all programs in need will be fully funded, according to Division of University Relations officials.

The shortage is due in part to benefactors’ requests for specific funding allocations, said Lansing Baker, senior vice president for university relations. Some pledges have not even been collected, he added.

There are many more priorities than there is funding and in six years priorities change in importance,” Baker said. “We will continue to raise money for the academic priorities that the donors have established.”

Baker declined to comment on the SU programs that will not receive funding from the campaign.

The university targeted four areas for funding: meeting student needs, upgrading educational technologies, providing a competitive environment and preparing for future needs, Baker said.

Funds from the campaign will go toward the establishment of programs, said Lansing Baker, senior vice president for university relations.

The survey is a collaboration between the SU Division of Academic Affairs and the Division of Student Affairs.

Students to grade SU campus in nationwide survey

The Pew Charitable Trusts foundation encourages students this semester to speak their minds and grade the Syracuse University campus.

The foundation’s National Survey of Student Engagement will give 700 members of the freshman and senior class the opportunity to voice their concerns about life at SU. The foundation this week released a report of the 25 largest revenue-producing U.S. cities, through the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs’ Government Performance Project.

“It will give a student perspective on what really happens at SU,” said Bill Notte, a senior culinary arts major, of the student survey. “If it’s answered truthfully, it should be a good thing for SU students and prospective students as well.”

SU is one of 250 universities invited to take part in the survey’s College Student Report. Several universities comparable to SU in size and academics, including Boston College and Villanova, are also participating in the survey.

The survey will accomplish two goals, said Mike Scalon, a graduate student in the Office of Student Affairs. The survey will both accommodate students in and out of the classroom and establish an educational standard for U.S. universities, he said.

“If we can learn superior methods from other colleges or if Syracuse can introduce effective policies to others, it would benefit everyone,” he said.

The survey is a collaboration between the SU Division of Academic Affairs and the Division of Student Affairs. Both Ronald Cavanagh, vice president of undergraduate studies, and Barry L. Wells, vice president of student affairs and dean of student relations, are leading the project on campus. The SU IQ Measurement and Benchmarking subcommittee will also coordinate the survey.

The survey will allow SU to compare itself against other universities of comparable size, an opportunity never before presented, according to SU officials.

Westcott forum to discuss educational equity

BY MAGIN MCKENNA
Staff Writer

Local Socialist Party members hope to use a forum Sunday afternoon to encourage community dialogue about educational equity.

The forum begins at 3 p.m. at the Westcott Community Center, 426 Euclid Ave. It will feature a panel discussion on the topics of economic and racial inequality in New York and state public schools, said Dave Edelstein, an event organizer.

“There are portions of the state that have disproportionate amounts of funding in suburban areas compared to urban ones,” said Edelstein, a former Syracuse University professor of sociology.

There are schools in New York City and the city of Syracuse that do not receive as much funding as their suburban counterparts, he said.

SU economics professor Dale Tussing will speak at the forum about his research on educational equity.

Tussing studied school financing in both the United States and Ireland for more than a decade, he said.

Public funding too often benefits the education of the economically and socially privileged, while virtually ignoring those who are less fortunate, Tussing said.

“If I could put it in a nutshell, there are some functions that primarily benefit the individual learner who will, through higher learning, achieve a higher income,” he said.

But some aspects of education serve to benefit all of society, such as literacy, quantitative skills and moral values, Edelstein said. These are not given enough emphasis in public schools, he added.

“The younger the child is, the more important it is,” he said.

Cancer to pass heart in top killer
PARIS — Cancer is expected to surpass heart disease in the coming decade as the leading cause of death in the United States, making it one of the world’s leading causes of illnesses that will strike most Americans in the 21st century, cancer specialists said Thursday.

The changing state of this global cancer burden, projected to reach 20 million worldwide by 2020, could have a great impact on financial, social and medical resources around the world.

Doctors, patients, scientists and advocacy groups gathered here Thursday to pledge their support for patients and to help them recover their power from the laboratory bench to their arms. The unprecedented meeting, called the World Summit Against Cancer, comes as the United States, marking a milestone, launched the February sweeps after the March of the Million.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — It was the first time right-hander Jay Leno wasn’t going to run some lines at the audience during Valentine’s Day.

Leno, who exited the comedy circuit in 1995 to pursue a career in Hollywood, made references to his CBS late-night talk show and Valentine’s Day. It was the first time that he didn’t perform a joke during the show.

For the audience, the joke was a surprise, and there was a moment of silence before the audience began to laugh. Leno then went on to perform some of his most famous jokes.

According to one of the audience members, the experience was a fun change from the usual routine.

Fats under scrutiny, guidelines proposed
WASHINGTON, D.C. — New federal dietary guidelines proposed Thursday would for the first time make a clear distinction between fats Americans should eat and those they should avoid.

The guidelines recommend that Americans reduce their intake of saturated fats and trans fats, which are found in many processed foods.

According to one of the audience members, the experience was a fun change from the usual routine.

Maxwell professors begin health care endeavor

BY EVANS BOSTON
Staff Writer

A New Jersey-based foundation is seeking Syracuse University faculty members to help write health care studies.

The Scholars in Health Policy Research Program, created by the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, accepts only 12 former graduate students nationwide per year. Two SU faculty members are currently working in the program, and two others already completed their two-year sessions.

"It's a great organization from top to bottom. They do everything well and really go out of their way to be helpful to people in the program," said John Moran, assistant professor of economics and former participant in the program. "Most importantly, their support provides a boost to young scholars who are just beginning to get their research programs off the ground."

The program calls for its participants to spend two years engaged in the study of health care. The participants are expected to contribute to a number of publications by the program's end.

The program does not require a background in health care policy, only an interest in the subject, said Grant Reeher, a political science associate professor and a former program participant.

Moran said he had little exposure to health policy prior to taking part in the program. But he did write a dissertation during graduate school regarding a related subject, he said.

"I saw the ad for the program, and the position was very attractive," Moran said. "I felt that it would be a great opportunity to supplement the more theoretical training I had in graduate school."

The program funds the members for a leave of two years from their current positions.

"It gives these young people a great opportunity to learn more about the policy, and the program also gives you full support of your full-time research," Reeher said.

Some participants start working for the program immediately after graduate school, Moran said.

"I started in the program in the summer of 1997," Moran said. "It was my first real job after graduate school."

"What I got out of the program was a much better understanding of how things in health care work, and how the institutions operate," he said.

The participants are split into three sub-groups and sent to the University of Michigan, the University of California at Berkeley, or Yale University. Moran and Reeher both worked at the University of Michigan, they said.

The program does not require a background in health care work, and how the institutions operate. He also interviewed Vermont legislators about many health care concerns.

His work with the program led to his book "Narratives of Justice: Beliefs About Distributive Fairness."

The program also led to other projects, including a study involving health care policy and aging. He is currently working with SU Vice Chancellor Deborah Freund on a project regarding pharmaceuticals and the elderly.

"Now I try to integrate health care policies into my teaching," Reeher added.

John Palmer, dean of the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, was also chosen to lead a 12-month evaluation of the actual program, with help from adjunct professor of sociology Elaine Wolf.

The foundation asked for outside help in the evaluation to make sure things will operate within the program, Reeher said.

"I was asked to undertake the task because I have already bridged the kinds of experience the Robert Wood Foundation was trying to integrate," Palmer said. He said that his evaluation of the project has been fully funded by the foundation.

Palmer said he is excited about the project and what it means for SU.

"This will bring some resources here that are very beneficial," Palmer said.

"It's one of the largest national foundations dealing with the biggest schools," he added.

"I think that it's great that SU has had a number of people involved."
Is rushing the court a proper way to celebrate?

Students respond to fan jubilation following the Jan. 24 UConn game.

Fans should observe common sense

Syracuse University students have the right to be royally pumped when their basketball team is undefeated. The Orangemen are off to the best start in school history and are looking stronger and stronger with each game. However, there is such a thing as showing too much spirit.

For example, take a look at the wake of SU's top-sided victory over UConn on Jan. 24, where ecstatic fans rushed the basketball court. Some overeager fans even hung like monkeys from the basketball rims. It is refreshing to see such a demonstration of SU spirit, but was this appropriate? Tall tales were passed around the day after SU's victory about students who thought they were going to be victims of "death by trampling." What would have happened if a student were severely injured as mobs of people pushed him or her down, or if he or she grew entangled in a folding chair? What if one of the basketball players got injured from this rush of people? Or an injury to an elderly SU alum? It seems that the only time we stop to face issues, such as student safety, is when an incident occurs or a situation gets out of hand.

It's time that we start to act responsibly, even in times of high emotion. Of course, there are historical moments in basketball history when fans have stormed the court to celebrate a win, but we have never heard about the people who could not breathe or felt threatened by the pushing of his or her body from all directions. I am not trying to be a stickler who says students are not allowed to have fun, or students are not allowed to celebrate and demonstrate their SU spirit. I am simply requesting that students think before they act, so that Syracuse University is not renamed Su-chaos University.

Andrea Hurwitz is a sophomore public relations & sociology major.

'Rodynamonium' reigns supreme in the Dome

The tradition of storming the court after a big win by a college basketball team dates back many years. One reason for the continuation of this form of celebration is that it allows for fun, mainly the students, to feel like they are a part of the victory. And, students, as members of the university, are part of the team.

A huge advantage in any sport should be homefield advantage. The main advantage comes from fan participation and involvement. While I truly appreciate the effort that our basketball players give every second that they're on the floor, I also feel the need to give it my all.

After such an entertaining game as the one between SU and UConn in which all of the Orangemen and their fans gave it their all, storming the court was only appropriate. The win was so emotional that the greatest celebration imaginable seemed necessary. It was a way for the fans to thank the team for their greatness, as well as a way for the players to thank the fans for their involvement.

The SU victory over the Huskies means so much more than just a win; it means respect. After 16 straight wins, we finally received our much-deserved respect. Rushing the court was our way of celebrating a great win, a great team and the national attention that any undefeated team should have.

I have only one complaint about the incident. The safety of the players, students, SU employees and the media was compromised. If done properly, storming the court can be magical.

However, the near-breaking of the backboard was ludicrous, as well as the stealing of anything that is SU's. So, let's work together the next time we rush onto the court. As much as I hate Duke, let's learn from their Cameron Crazies. Celebrate, enjoy, be safe and smart!

Christian college draws Bush, GOP

Texas Gov. George W. Bush began picking up the pieces after his stunning defeat in the New Hampshire Republican primaries Wednesday by visiting Bob Jones University in Greenville, S.C. BJU isn't a normal college. Mostly white, conservative Christians compose the student body of 5,000. The college began admitting blacks in the 1970s. The government revoked the school's tax-exempt status over this controversy. Currently, the college employs a ban on interracial dating and marriage. So much for forward thinking in the new millennium.

Democrat presidential hopeful Bill Bradley lambasted Bush on Thursday, insinuating that by appearing at BJU, Bush and his conservative brethren support the school's archaic policies. Republican candidates Steve Forbes and Alan Keyes have already scheduled appearances in Greenville. Alabama Sen. John McCain's camp is negotiating a stop.

For the GOP, stopping at schools like BJU distances the party from the "liberal" Clinton administration and tells ultra-conservative groups that they should continue to place their faith in the Republican party. The Republican candidates' moves make perfect sense and even benefit Bush's campings.

On the other hand, criticizing Bush for ditching his "compassionate conservative" platform is a brilliant move for Bradley, who lost a hotly-contested race to Vice President Al Gore in New Hampshire. Bradley has made race relations an issue in the nation.

Republican candidates Steve Forbes and Alan Keyes support the school's archaic policies. By appearing at BJU, Bush and his conservative administration and tells ultra-conservative groups that they should continue to place their faith in the Republican party. The Republican candidates' moves make perfect sense and even benefit Bush. But just because the Republicans are stopping at BJU doesn't mean they endorse the ban. Republican campaign strategists need to care for the United States special.

I saw that damn girl yesterday. I was walking along in the Building library minding nothing but my own business when she came into sight. I jolted to the closest door and hastily jiggled the handle. Her footsteps got louder and that flapping ponytail came into view. The door didn't seem to open. I cursed the school for using the locks. There was no haven from her happiness. I told my friend who saw this magnificent girl to call her mad. She said, "This isn't going to mean what you've never truly talked to before in my life but for some reason we always enter into that customary discussion."

what happens? How are you doing?"

And we went through the motions making sure we knew exactly how we were doing, how classes were going and where exactly we're living this year. I immediately forgot everything the moment we finished in order to make room for more useful information.

If there's one thing I've picked up in my two years at this school, it's that the people in power, whoever they might be, use all methods possible to keep people like me in their place. Everything we do, say, or are exposed to is probably a plot to keep us from taking away from people the power they hold over us...over...whomever they might be. So it's my conclusion that the conclusions of this conspiracy.

From our youth, the people in power train us to use small talk. We were all critics of this unnatural idea when we were young. Do you remember the last time you came home from school and your parents asked you how school was? I always responded with a shrug of the shoulders accompanied by an "I don't know." We were battling for our rights as youngsters, but slowly we gave up and now we small talk just like our parents.

The main practical reason for small talking to people every time we see them especially if we don't really care. Let's break down a customary greeting for a second — "What's up?" Now there's truly only a few ways you can respond to this question. You can say "nothing" or "not much." The most illegal but most common response is "jokingly repeating 'What's up?' Why don't I do this? It's absolutely ludicrous. We have gained no insight in to what is actually up. The question has never been answered and we just wasted a good four seconds of our life.

For seconds don't seem much like by itself but when this happens numerous times every day, we lose significant portions of our life. In a very scientific calculation, I estimated my total loss of life to small talk to be around one full year. Small talk is an unnecessary annoyance that we waste our lives and never truly know how oppressed we are. There is no small talk in the Pentagon. If you go there, you will merely see a bunch of guys standing out there tongues at each other when somebody is apparently they don't sleep either, but that's an entirely different conspiracy.

What I propose is an elimination of small talk. I suppose the word "hi" can remain, seeing as it's hard to get somebody's attention when you just start talking. But "hi" is enough — one syllable and only a split second wasted. Then get down to business. Tell the person why you have approached them in the first place. If you need to borrow toenail clippers, simply say, "Hi. I need your clippers." That's all you need to do.

This isn't meant as an attack on people who say phony things. I am just as guilty of phoniness as anybody else and I don't have the guts to stop. I am not trying to wage an attack on acknowledging unfaithful people. Without this, it would be hard to make friends. I just don't think it's necessary to waste my time with people in use to me. This should be viewed more as a calling to somebody brave enough to change the way things are. I would love to have somebody come up to me and simply stick out their tongue. In return, I would gladly extend my own tongue in greeting.

I will dive further into conspiracies next week with an article titled "Sleep — Necessity or Government Conspiracy?"

Inane chatter transforms America into puppets

I agree enthusiastically. His job, along with every other faculty member at SUNY, is to do the best they can to transpire the information to the student in their classes. And I am sure we all know that most of the professors don't do the work or even show up at all. Dr. Short told Zac Moore that he had not done the work and gave him the relevant information that was needed in order for that to make an informed decision on what he should do about the situation he was in. And I know that Dr. Short would have not just let this happen.

Therefore, the situation that Mr. Moore put himself in was of his own doing.

letters

I do agree with Mr. Moore when concerning the protection of students' rights against plagiarism, but I knew first hand, because I have made copies of a number of Dr. Short's works, that he always gives proper recognition for thoughts that aren't his own. The "original" thought that Mr. Moore himself said was taken "verbatim" more than likely not an original thought of his own, and once he realizes the foundation of writing is one that he put in a situation originally thought to produce your own, he would begin to question his own ideas before "throwing stones."

Many donations during the last several years contributed to the success of the campaign, Baker said. There have been more than 61 gifts of at least $1 million, he said. Four of these donations were of $4 million or more, Baker added.

As of Dec. 31, individuals and corporations contributed a combined $302.3 million. Individuals contributed $192 million while corporations and foundations donated $110.3 million, according to a campaign report. Ruth Freeman Meyer, a 1950 SU graduate, donated $14 million, the largest individual sum. The majority of this contribution went toward scholarships, said William Preston, an SU manager of public relations.

SU Vice Chancellor Deborah Freund said she is pleased with the success of the campaign. "Wonderful things helped take us where we needed to go," she said.

Survey topics range from students' scholarly activities to social life. Some students, however, argue the validity of the survey.

"This is a great opportunity for the students at Syracuse to give their input about the institution and about the university system in general and hopefully change it for the better," said Allison Scuderi, an undeclared freshman in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Joe Ingram, a senior marketing and finance major, said he is skeptical of how much change will result from the survey.

"The survey in question probably won't do any good," Ingram said. "I'm not sure that anything will be done in response to negative survey answers."

society benefits," Tussing said. "Why do we put money into financing medical school or legal education or business school for people who are going to make more money?"

"There's a lot of evidence that the way we pay for education helps the wealthy stay wealthy," he added.

The socialist group decided to organize the forum for various reasons, including an October proposal by the Urban League of Onondaga County and Edison Schools, Inc. to establish a charter school in Syracuse next fall, Edelstein said.

"One of the factors that interested us was the push for charter schools," he said. "As a socialist, I am opposed to a central bureaucracy limiting the flexibility of what parents and faculty can do in running a school."

In order to promote equity, public schools should be democratized at the district level, with more administrative power placed in the hands of teachers, he said.

The movement of political parties that differ from the mainstream, like the Green Party and Socialist Party could improve public education because of their organizational structure, Edelstein said.

"Some things could improve if teachers had the power to make more decisions," he said. "There should be considerable autonomy."
Your weekend guide to events on and around campus

BY HOLLY AUER lifestyle editor

The Syracuse University Hill is rockin', thanks to a new, university-run dance club in the Schine Underground.

At 10 p.m. Thursday, organizers put the finishing touches on the opening-night festivities at Club Abyss. Fluorescent swirls of light crisscrossed the dance floor, mingling with puffs of fog from a dry-ice machine. Tunes from DJ Double-A spun the night away, and frozen drinks chilled in a cooler.

After a series of surveys conducted last year by the Student Government Association and the Student Activities Program, John Tyler, a facilities coordinator of the Schine, said it became apparent that SU students wanted a dance club located on the SU campus. After rejecting a plan from an outside company to form a dance club in the Schine Underground, Tyler wrote a proposal for an SU-run, alcohol-free club in the Schine Underground.

"We've been running dances for fraternal and sorority groups in the Underground for a long time," said Tyler. "But they only catered to specific groups of people. We knew we wanted to change that.

So, armed with some creative ideas, Tyler and Hill's worked in collaboration with the Office of Student Programming, the Office of Greek Life, and the Student Activities Office. Following the success of student group-sponsored dance events in the past, they molded a new entertainment creation for students on the Hill.

We all had the same goal—to provide a safe, social environment for SU students, right on campus," he said. "We want students to form the club as being fun, exciting and popular.

The Student Affairs budget provided the funds to form the club, while the Schine Underground provided the space and the student groups provided the entertainment.

"It's ridiculous how little character development there is, not to mention that it's missing a "Mass of people" all at once.

It's certainly one memorable or worthwhile film at all. Even those who were drawn to the movie for the voyeuristic value, so to speak, can't get too much out of it: one minute of topless Joanna and 108 minutes of utter boredom and confusion — like why McGregor's character, leaves his job working with a technically advanced spy unit of Washington, D.C.'s British consulate office to chase lustfully after a

It's a lot of critical acclaim for this performance, but she did not perform tactically in the movie. Maybe it was the poor script, but other lines had very little impact. Beyond that, her role in the movie was to walk around with a scowl on her face and a new wig on her head every five minutes.

One interesting casting choice was Jason Priestley as a villainous druggie, which was definitely a change for 90210's Brad-o, but very good and unfortunately too short.

Simply said this film was an "Eye" sore and not worth the money or time.

And in this corner, in the Dickie workwear trunks, Matt "Private Eyes" Bray:

"OR, I'll admit it — this isn't the strongest of titles. Really, it sounds as if it could have been a Meat Loaf song.

Although, "Eye of the Beholder" sounds like it would be on a one-way track to eliched land, it has some redeeming qualities.

First of all, because it is a film about surveillance and infat-uation with a subject of surveilance, it runs the risk of being a gadget film. And you all know what I am talking about.

However, this is not all you got for your eight bucks. Although technology infects the movie as it does almost all contemporary cinema, the focus is placed mostly on the relationship of the two main characters and their psychological profiles.

Ewan McGregor and Ashley Judd (obviously cast for their ability to put butts in seats) create performances that enthral the viewer to feel not only shock, but also odd compassion reinistent of other dark romances, such as "Leaving Las Vegas," not to mention the framework for this type of story developed by "The Hard.

Judd shows an array of emotions as she goes on as the observed. Because she is in control, she must also actively deal with the situations at hand rather than just observe them from outside.

McGregor's character, never dressed by name, gives him an anonymity only tapped by technological means. He is a surveillance expert for the British Embassy, and on an assignment runs into a brutal and psychopathic murderer associated with a case.

Eye is also struggling with his rocky past, which involves the kidnapping of his own daughter by because his demanding job was affecting her mar-rriage. She is afraid to talk in his mind when he is working.
His encounter with Judd helps him focus on his duty by observing her psychological troubles.

He gradually finds out that Joanna was abandoned in the streets when she was a young girl. McGregor's character has been looking for and serves as a mother figure to a young woman, and he experiences a mu-ture until he finally confronts her and must reveal his plight.

The psychological voyeuristic romance addresses differences in human sexuality that are usually ignored.

Virginia Tech forces Big East hoops shuffle

Staff Reports

Significant change officially hit the conference on Thursday, much to the dismay of several league coaches.

Mike Tranghese announced Thursday morning a new press conference format for men's basketball and a 12-team conference tournament for women's basketball.

The changes will take effect next season when Virginia Tech enters the league as its 14th basketball member.

Virginia Tech will join Georgetown, Notre Dame, Pittsburgh, Rutgers, Seton Hall and West Virginia as one-of-a-kind conference.

The announcement was made after the Big East Council, consisting of the league's 11 presidents and athletic directors, met at the league offices in New York.

"It's a recruiting tool to tell a kid he can play in a big game, and that's what's happening for us. We've really built our way up from the bottom of the conference," said Jim Boeheim, assistant coach at Virginia Tech.

League coaches voiced concern about the revisions on Thursday's Big East Conference logo.

SU head Jim Boeheim said such an arrangement is a consequence of the Big East's success.

"Georgetown has always been our biggest rival, but that's changed in the last few years," he said. "Connecticut has one and that's a big game for us. In time, you develop some new rivalries."

In addition, the league will operate in two separate conferences each regular season.

"The Syracuse winter track teams host their lone home meet of the season this weekend and they come into it soaring. SU hosts the Syracuse Invitational on Saturday at Manley Field House.

In its last competition, the track and field team says it serves the Orange in field events.

The fourth annual Owls Invitational is Saturday at Delaware.

Junior Alex Brown took first place in the pole vault at the East Championships in two weeks. Meanwhile, the meet will feature schools from all over the Northeast.

The Owls are SU's final dual meet opponents of the season. Syracuse hopes to write a suitable last chapter for its eight seniors, who will be honored in the meet. It also gives them a last crack at reaching Pooler Wall Point.

"It's time for them to be recognized by their friends and family in the last meet of the season. It's the time to take a deep breath, look around and enjoy the moment," assistant coach Steve Bedard said. Florida Atlantic poses an adequate challenge for its squads final competitive test before the Big East Championships in two weeks, SU then the previous two meetings with the Owls, the last match came in 1990-96.

"Coach (Steve) Bechamp does a great job and also that program," Walker said. You have to respect that. I think we also have a lot of great races to test yourself a few weeks before the big meets ahead."
Freeman opposes mentor at Rutgers

SU coach assisted Stringer at Iowa

BY ALISON HISCHAK

Staff Writer

An empty chair in front of the television and videotapes on her desk — sure signs that Syracuse head coach Marianna Freeman is logging extra hours preparing for the Orangewomen's basketball game at Rutgers on Sunday. Freeman can't help it. She's a workaholic.

The Orangewomen head coach learned her work ethic by watching her grandmother. Freeman describes her as a handicapped, single parent on a fixed income, who successfully raised five children, including Freeman, her twin sister and her brother.

"She had that drive, that will," Freeman said. "It was unmistakable. That's what made her special. She always told my twin and I that being African-American, we always had to be better, which meant you had to work harder."

Freeman carried her grandmother's ideology with her to the basketball court. When Freeman arrived at Cheyney State, she played a tentative style of basketball, not knowing set plays existed.

But then-head coach Vivian Stringer, who now coaches Rutgers, introduced her to the theories and ideas behind the sport. One memory that remains vivid 20 years later is the first time Stringer taught the team a jump-ball play.

"If you could have seen the look on my face, I was like, 'Oh wow! You mean you can make this happen the way you want it to," Freeman said. "I just usually got in the circle and tapped the ball. She taught me the methods to the game. She actually taught me the game."

Once Freeman learned the finer points of the game, she climbed the ranks to stardom. The young center developed into Stringer's first All-American player, and earned the College President's Award of Excellence her senior season. Freeman was inducted into Cheyney State's Hall of Fame in 1993.

Stringer watched Freeman's progression in awe, realizing she had something special.

"She is very giving of herself," Stringer said. "She is one of the most unselfish players I know. She had a very mature approach to things and she was extremely bright. By her sophomore year, I knew she would make a great coach."

Stringer got a chance to experience Freeman's coaching ability first-hand at the University of Iowa. When Stringer was hired as the head coach in 1983, Freeman topped the list of people she wanted...

GSO president questions Moore's claims, protest

A former Syracuse University doctoral student denied accusations Friday that she and an SU professor plagiarized the work of graduate student Zac Moore, calling Moore's claims "ridiculous" and "based on nothing." Yeong-Hyun Kim, an assistant professor of geography at Ohio University since last summer, said the accusations of plagiarism in her book, "Globalization and The City," are completely false. Kim wrote the book with geography professor John Rennie Short when she was a doctoral student at SU last year.

"What he has argued is not true," Kim said. "The book is based on my work and John Short's work, and our knowledge and our reading and our research. No one can argue for plagiarism there.

"It's a very cheap shot, it doesn't make sense." Moore, a former Graduate Student Organization president, recently accused Short and Kim of plagiarizing work he turned in for a GEO 815 class he took during the 1998 Spring Semester.

During the following summer, Moore also said he denied Short permission to publish a paper Moore wrote with two other graduate students and Kim. Short submitted the paper to the "Professional Geographer" journal, despite Moore's objections, listing Moore and the classmates, plus himself as its authors, Short said.

Moore said he contacted the editor of the "Professional Geographer" in November 1998 to See MOORE page 8

Trash fire scares B/B

Residents of the Syracuse University Brewster/Boland Complex evacuated early Saturday morning when a bathroom fire activated alarms.

The small fire started around midnight in the fifth-floor bathroom of Boland hall, said Kevin Morrow, an SU spokesman.

A resident was alone in the bathroom on the management-themed floor and noticed smoke coming out of a bathroom trash can, Morrow said.

Fifth-floor resident Michael Iosanelli, who said he first witnessed the fire, ran out of the bathroom and noticed smoke coming out of a bathroom trash can, Morrow said.

The resident then extinguished the fire with the assistance of another resident, Morrow added.

Fifth-floor resident Matthew Lencskay, a freshman management major, I was like 'Oh, shit.'" Iosanelli noticed paper towels in the trash can were on fire, Iosanelli said. He and Lencskay

The Student Government Association Finance Board unanimously voted Sunday to deny the Syracuse University College Democrat's request for money to host First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton. Clinton, a U.S. Senate candidate, is scheduled to speak at noon Wednesday in Goldstein Auditorium.

The College Democrats requested $1,000 after the university refused to cover rental costs of Goldstein Auditorium, said Christina Hinchey, president of the College Democrats. Clinton's events staff contacted the Chancellor's Office Jan. 28 to schedule a visit, Hinchey said. The Chancellor's Office, not able to support a partisan candidate, passed the offer to Director of Student Programs Michael Elmore, who suggested the College Democrats sponsor the event.

Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw, however, requested that the College Democrats contribute $1,000 for the rental of Goldstein, said Hinckey, a senior political science and public relations major.

But Hinchey said the university initially agreed to pay for the entire cost. She noted a university policy that promises funding for all first-time visits by candidates. "We were under the impression that the university would pay for everything," she said.

The SGA Finance Code, however, states that no funding will be given to non-campus political organizations or candidates. "There are rules and there are interpretations of those rules," Hinchey said. "The request money was for the production cost of an educational event and will be paid to Goldstein, not Hillary Clinton." SGA Comptroller Chris Greiner recommended denying the College Democrats funding because of its political ties with Clinton.

"We have never funded campaigning candidates for political office in our recorded history," Greiner said. "I cannot in good conscience recommend funding a campaign tour of any kind with Student Activity Fee monies." Clinton is expected to speak on public education in New York state, Greiner said. The topic, which is a part of Clinton's campaign platform, does not need funding from student fees, he added.

Greiner said he was also skeptical of the amount requested by the College Democrats for the event. "Financial contribution is not at all required to sponsor an event," Greiner said. "And I've seen what it costs groups to use Goldstein." College Democrats plans to raise the $1,000 privately by appealing to other academic programs, Hinchey said.

Scott Lipton, a College Democrat, said campuses need to be understanding in their overzealousness to remain non-partisan. "We will not allocate funds from the student fee if the activity does not encompass the entirety of the student body."

While the denial of the request was not a surprise, it was a disappointment, Hinckey said.

Elmore said the decision was short-sighted and stretching for rational. "The real question isn't who's coming, it's what is the benefit for the campus," Elmore said. "I think the board misunderstandingly in their overzealousness to remain non-partisan made a mistake."
Accused Pan Am terrorists plead not guilty

BY SHELBY HEATY

Two Libyan defendants charged with the 1988 bombing of Pan Am Flight 103 pleaded not guilty Wednesday in Scottish High Court at a pretrial hearing in Edinburgh, Scotland.

Abdel Basset Ali al-Megrahi and Lamen Khalifa Fhimah are held on charges of murder, conspiracy to commit murder and breaching the 1982 Aviation Security Act for the alleged terrorist attack. The bombing killed 270 passengers — including 35 Syracuse University students.

Defense attorneys Bill Taylor and Richard Keen relayed not-guilty pleas to Scottish High Court Judge Lord Ronald Sutherland. Al-Megrahi and Fhimah chose not to attend the hearing.

"I'm not surprised they pleaded not guilty," said Helen Englehardt, wife of one of the bombing victims. "They've been stalling since 1991 — why should they change their story now?"

Some victims' relatives, however, said they are surprised the defendants pleaded not guilty so early in the proceedings. Generally, pleas are entered several days before trial, not several months, said Judy Dios, a sister of one of the bombing victims.

"It has to do with sentencing," said Englehardt, editor of TruthQuest, a newsletter regarding the trial proceedings. "It's meaningless. I was worried that they would plead not guilty and all the evidence would not come out to the public."

Dios said she expected the Libyans' not guilty plea.

"With the evidence we've heard, I think the charges will be appropriate," she said. "I hope the world will find out the truth."

The May 3 trial, initially scheduled for Feb. 2, will take place at Camp Ziest, a former U.S. military base in Holland. The trial's move to the Netherlands began through an agreement between Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi and the U.S. and British governments.

"It's pretty frustrating that it's taken so long," said Lesley Gouger, an SU Remembrance Scholar and senior English and philosophy major. "I don't think they will get off completely."

If found guilty, al-Megrahi and Fhimah could face up to a life sentence in a Scottish prison for the bombing.

Although the trial is in Holland, it will be conducted under Scottish law and will be presented before a panel of four judges instead of a jury. They will reach one of three verdicts — guilty, not guilty or not proven. Scottish law also does not enforce the death penalty.

"I'm not for the death sentence," Gouger added. "But I do think their punishment will be justified."
SU must target DWI at source

A drunken joy ride has always been a recipe for hefty fines and a criminal record. And if a new University Senate rule, well, it could also put a kink in plans to get a Syracuse University diploma.

Director of the Office of Judicial Affairs Anand A. Urtz and Dean of Student Affairs Barry Wells submitted a proposal outlining changes to the Student Code of Conduct — including one that would make students charged with driving while intoxicated face a suspension at least one year of suspension from the university.

The university has the right to be concerned. Drivers under the age of 21 account for 6.7 percent of the driving population, but they constitute 13 percent of the drivers that cause fatal alcohol-related crashes. Despite stringent, zero-tolerance laws for young drivers in the New York state, alcohol-related traffic fatalities continue to rise.

But the university's efforts to thwart drunk driving are mislaid. Exposure to a panel of people who have lost loved ones to drunk driving are misplaced. E^qjosure to a panel of students often opt to hop in their own cars rather than wait for a bus or a taxi. Students might not be so quick to grab their own keys if late-night escort and shuttle services were available to loop frequently between the M-Street watering holes, South Campus and off-campus neighborhoods.

SU's alternative weekend activity offerings like Late Night at the Gym and Fire Station at the University at large identify 170 “primary drivers” of alcohol-related incidents, 14 percent of whom under the age of 21. While SU students are expected to positively represent their school both on and off campus, university punishment for off-campus behavior is a slippery slope. This is especially true when state and local court procedures already exist.

SU's double jeopardy justice system is not the solution. Squashing mistakes before they are made is a more viable course of action.

Digital chats breed innocent 'fibs, fantasies

For those who are unfamiliar with ICQ, it is an instant messaging computer device that enables computer users to chat with World Wide Web friends from all over the world. This convenient device immediately connects the diverse among humans and unites strangers together more comfortably. But the very nature of ICQ's closeness has given rise to many so-called "heinous conduct" such as cybersex and untruthful behavior, like lying about one's age and physical appearance.

There's a line about cybersex in the movie 'You've Got Mail' which I found particularly humorous — an old lady says to Meg Ryan's character, "I tried having cybersex once but all I got was a busy signal."

While I am no expert on ICQ, I want to share some of my thoughts about the untruthful behavior aspect. According to a recent poll, 65% or more of ICQ users tell lies when they chat with strangers on the web. They lie about their age, gender, height, weight, hair color — they give endless false information about their identities.

Many recent psychology reports written by respectable authorities identified that the "lying on ICQ syndrome" will likely turn people into compulsive liars in the future. However, there is no basis for such publications to make these groundless and frightening statements.

Of course, I am not condoning lying on a hourly basis. But the university can do a much better job of allowing people from loneliness, than lying is not a malicious thing, per se.

There are two main reasons why people lie on ICQ. First, they disclose false identities to protect themselves from potential attackers. Last year in New York City, there was a bevy of cases where innocent teenage girls were or almost became victims of horrendous sex crimes. While I am no expert at cybersex, I want to share some of my thoughts about the untruthful behavior aspect.

Student reports missing car, police make arrests

A Syracuse University junior's vehicle was stolen last week, according to a police report. Police later recovered the 1994 Chevrolet after spotting it being driven on Midland Avenue, the report said.

The student returned from class to find his car missing, the report said.

Staff Reports

The vehicle was locked.

The vehicle was left unattended in a parking lot on the avenue, the report said.

The three suspects exited the car and ran from the police through the park, the report said. Police eventually apprehended and arrested the suspects, the report added.

No property was stolen from the vehicle, the report said.

A Dorian's Gourmet Pizza and Deli employee found the passenger window to his car smashed Wednesday after returning to the shop to pick up more deliveries, according to a police report.

The car smashed Wednesday after returning to the shop to pick up more deliveries, according to a police report.

The vehicle was left unattended in a parking lot on the south side of the store at 504 Westcott St., the report said.

There was no one around. It was late and it was snowing, and there were very few customers, said Kostas Petkopoulos, the store's owner. "One of the other drivers pulled up, and pointed out that the car's window was missing."

The victim reported the incident after replacing the damaged window, the report said.

There were no witnesses, the report said.

The victim was unable to be reached for comment.

Petkopoulos said incidents like this happen several times a year.

"I'm not sure 100 percent," Petkopoulos said, "but it is possible that it was one of the customers who did it."

The Syracuse City Police Department towed three cars parked near the SU campus Thursday, according to police reports. More than 20 cars have been towed from near-campus locations since Jan. 30, the reports said.

The cars were parked illegally and obstructing the roadway, the reports said.

McCain wins entire New York state ballot

BY KEVIN TAMPONE

The decision in Arizona Sen. John McCain's lawsuit for ballot access in New York state will place all Republican candidates on the March 7 primary election ballot.

McCain, who has struggled since state's laws were unfair in 1996 in his campaign against Bush, said he was delighted with the decision. "The judge ruled in McCain's favor, the party would not continue to block McCain's attempts to gain ballot access. The state party's promise not to appeal the decision in the lawsuit and the judge's subsequent decision in favor of McCain guarantee him a place on the March 7 primary ballot.

"Rejoice citizens of New York, your chains have been removed," McCain said. "He's absolutely delighted, but he's disappointed that it didn't happen earlier," she said. "A simple well-placed phone call could have ended it all.

McCain will not change his campaign platform or strategy at all before the New York state primary, she said. He added that Governor Bush and McCain have the error of their ways have ended all this.

"It's very important to Sen. McCain to have one-on-one contact with voters," she said. "It's a winning strategy and eventually it will win him the nomination."

The Bush campaign did not order the State Republican Party's decision to stop the challenges and appeals to McCain's ballot spot. Bush applauded it as the fairest outcome, said Scott McClelland, a Bush campaign spokesman.

"It's always been totally up to the New York Republican Party," he said. "Gov. Bush has said he believes this is the right decision and he welcomes the competition. We're confident that Gov. Bush will win there."

The most recent poll from the Quinnipiac College Polling Institute released on Jan. 19 shows Bush leading McCain in New York state 47 percent to 28 percent.

A CNN/Time poll released Saturday, however, shows that McCain opened a small lead over Bush in South Carolina, the state of the next major Republican primary on Feb. 19. The poll shows McCa

The fire department spent about 10 minutes inside the building.

"It was our job to get here, and we did," Scott said.

Public Safety declined to comment on the investigation and would not say if the fire was connected to three other fires, believed to be arson, in Brewer hall last fall.

In late October and early November, three stairwell fires evacuated the Brewer/Boland Complex. The fires were started in the stairwells between the ninth and twelfth floors of Brewer hall.

"Public Safety is continuing its rounds once an hour of Brewer/Boland as we have been since last semester," Public Safety Sergeant Drew Buske said.

Public Safety arrived on the scene of the fire after the Syracuse firefighters exited the building. Public Safety officers spent about 15 minutes inside the bathroom with the doors closed, as they questioned floor resident Chad Prior and floor management major Philip A. Robinson, a floor resident who carried the fire extinguisher into the bathroom.

"Technically you're not supposed to put a fire extinguisher in the bathroom, but there was an act of arson," Prior said.

"It seems that this may have been accidental. Public safety is not considering this as an act of arson. It seems that someone was extremely careless." - Kevin Morrow

An SU spokesman

Kevin Morrow

Boland residents had difficulties evacuating because snow on the walkways outside the fire exits made it slower.

"I think our university is taking some positive steps in fire safety," Isacson said. "We are taking a proactive approach as far as addressing concerns.

"We have student rights and we have intellectual property rights. You can't take away both rights."

The "Professional Geographer" editor eventually gave him two weeks to respond or his name would be removed from the article, he said, but Moore never responded.

"He was given an opportunity to appeal," Kim said. "And it was turned down at that time he didn't. After a year, can he be here?"

Current GSO president Eric Hunn said that Moore neglected to seek the proper outlets for his charges.

"He has failed to exhaust the administrative remedies and last decided to take it into a court of public opinion," Hunn said.

"He hasn't taken advantage of the appeals processes and there are a number of them."

Moore was an international relations and social science graduate student who had planned a three-day hunger strike Tuesday and organized a sit-in at the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs' Dean's Office.

He demanded the poor grades he received in the course to be removed from his transcript, his money be refunded for the course and his right to a hearing regarding plagiarism be reviewed.

Kim said she could not comment on Moore's grade or his performance in the class, as those issues are between Moore and Short.

Moore said he was not surprised by Kim's denial of his plagiarism claim and that he did put full effort into the class.

A Jan. 19 fire in Seton Hall University's Boland residents hall killed three students and injured 52. I'm just scared and worried that it could have ended up in my building," said Johnson, a second-year marketing major. "We don't need another Boland hall to be burned.

SU Boland hall Resident Director Mary Triano spoke with the fire department after a fire in Seton Hall on Feb. 2. More than 60 residents of the hall's fifth floor Sunday night. During the meeting, Triano and the students discussed fire safety and smoking privileges.

"I don't want anyone thinking they're responsible for putting out a fire," Triano said.

She added that residents would not have the right to smoke anywhere on the floor, except in their rooms.

SU residence halls will undergo major renovations this summer to prepare for potential fires, Triano said. Contractors will install fire sprinkler systems in B/B rooms, she added.

"This is carelessness," she said. "I'm just scared and worried. Next year, there will be no smoking in residence halls."

South Asia lecture series discusses singer’s legacy

BY CAROLINE CHEN
Staff Writer

The human voice is the best indicator of feminine identity in modern India, said Indian native and lecturer Dr. Sanjay Srivastava Friday.

As part of a six-part lecture series regarding South Asia, Srivastava spoke to 24 people who attended his discussion in the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs. He reflected upon Lata Mangeshkar, a prominent Indian singer and topic of his most-recent dissertation.

Early in Mangeshkar’s career, filmmakers dubbed her singing voice into Indian films for its huskiness. It was a time during the 20th century when public singing by women was considered unacceptable and not domesticated, said Srivastava, a senior lecturer at the School of Literary and Communication Studies at Deakin University in Melbourne, Australia.

“Lata sings in public, but in a respectable manner,” he said. “When she performs, Lata stands rigidly on the stage, her nose buried in her notebook.”

She presents a respectable housewife persona and couples the Indian images of entertainer and mother, Srivastava said.

In Indian society, most people look to the woman to be caring, nurturing — basically someone you can turn to for emotional help and support,” said Andrea Abba, a psychology major and cultural director of the Syracuse Indian Association.

Orangemen struggle to secure 19th win

BY MIKE CURTIS

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — When the season fell to one-up and the team down, Syracuse's 3-4 win over St. John's, 76-64, was not without its struggles.

Joe McGinniss, who came off the bench in the first half, drained a 3-pointer to give the Orange a 37-32 lead. But the Red Storm, led by a career-high 19 points from Dwayne Jarrett, came back to tie the game at 58-58 in the first half.

Syracuse's 74-58 win over Providence at the Carrier Dome was marred by a foul-heavy, high-speed, foul-fraught affair that saw the two squadrs combine for 50 personal fouls.

There are the blowouts and the nailbiters. This was a blowout. It was a nailbiter. It was a blowout in which the Orangemen (19-0, 9-0 Big East) and the Friars (36-38, 74) combined for 50 personal fouls.

The two squads combined for 50 personal fouls, including a school-record 51 fouls against Providence. The Orangemen, led by 19 points and grabbing 21 rebounds, helped Syracuse move to 9-0 in the Big East.

The No. 4 Orangemen (19-0, 9-0 Big East) and the Friars (29-29, 58) combined for 50 personal fouls, including a school-record 51 fouls against Providence.

not painful, pace. Both teams rushed offensive sets, crashed into each other on defense, and missed dozens of easy shots.

The night's struggles showed in the first minutes.
After a Damone Brown jump shot opened the scoring, PC's Romuald Augustin hit the bottom of the backboard with a 3-point try.

After Jason Hart mistimed an alley-oop with Brown, Augustin airballed a triple from the left wing. SU (19-0, 9-0 Big East) recovered, but Bland lost his dribble to Errons Vann, who dribbled the lane, and got to the foul line.

Providence (9-14, 1-8) failed to seize the rim with a field goal attempt until Augustin tipped in an Abdul Mills miss with 17:14 left.

"We were playing messy," said
SU forward Preston Shumpert.
"It was a really hard game to get into. They felt the exchange was great with a high-speed game and their trapping.
But we got it under control."
As the first half dragged on,
Syracuse tore off a 30-12 run to take a 24-point advantage.
Hart and Shumpert each tailed at least five points in the spurt.

But Providence's full-court pressure flipped the game into a helter-skelter affair, as the Friars answered with a nine-zip outburst.

Augustin drilled a turnaround on the left side of the lane to start the rally. Hart turned the ball over on a painting violation, and Mills made two foul shots to cut the lead to 10.

The Orangemen inbounds in to Thomas, but the Friars bumped the All-American candidate, and he flipped a lazy shovel pass wide of Hart and out of bounds.

Mills scored on the ensuing possessions, and the Friars' Mark Jarrell-Wright added a steal and a two freebie slice to the lead to 34-28 with 54 seconds left.

"It was a scrappy game," said Williams. "It was all over the place. There were lots of turnovers. We were playing the way they wanted to play."

Hart tried to outrun the Friars' press, but he completed his dash upcourt with an out-of control, 22-foot heave that crashed against the backboard.
Providence rebounded, and Llewellyn Cole broke open, getting to the lane and cutting the deficit to five.

SU led 36-29 at the half, and PC shaved the lead to four less than two minutes into the second stanza. The Orangemen scored the first three points from the line, but PC caught them in a 7-0 run that gave the lead back to the Friars.

"In that kind of game, with the pushing and grabbing and people coming at you, we did what we had to do to win," SU coach Jim Boeheim said. "You just have to find a way to win in this sort of thing. And we did."

While struggling from the field, Syracuse clung to the lead at the charity strip. Shumpert scored two of PC's first 11 points.
Hart scored 14 of its first 31 points from the foul line.
In the first 16:45 of the second half, SU made 20 of 30 shots from the charity stripe, hit just five field goals and used its advantage from four to 18 points.

"Fifty-one free throws (at-temped) is because they're an aggressive team," PC coach Tim Walsh said. "They took the ball to the basket, and they're great passers. They create good angles and good opportunities for one another."

ugly continued from page 11 and tied the 1978-79 team for the longest one-season winning streak in school history.

The frantic, foul-plagued matchup came about because of the Friars' Big East inexperience and the need for PC to force turnovers in order to score. SU head coach Jim Boeheim said, "They have to play that way," he said. "That's the way they're going to play, and I think that's the only way they can play at this stage. They don't shoot the ball well, and they've got to come at you and do it.

Early on, the attacking, gamboling style of play seemed to fluster the Orangemen. Just 2:49 into the contest, SU center Etan Thomas had already committed his second foul, and the normally composed Boeheim was whistled for a technical after arguing a foul call on center Bill Celuck.

Syracuse, however, settled down and went on a 19-6 run that gave the Orangemen a lead they would never relinquish. Aware of the Friars' anemic shooting, Boeheim switched SU's defense from man-to-man to the 2-3 zone.

The result was obvious, as PC finished the game hitting just 25 percent of its shots.

Even with the horrendous shooting, the Friars were buoyed by Syracuse's own struggles and stayed within 13 points until the last few minutes.

"You know, we gave some effort and we hung around for a while," Providence head coach Tim Welsh said, "but you've got to make some shots. And we just couldn't make any shots against the zone."

The lack of outside shooting for PC was accentuated by SU's defense, which held PC's 7-foot-2 center Shabazz ineffective. The junior finished with eight points on 3-for-11 shooting.

On Syracuse's offensive end, Thomas returned from his early foul trouble to dominate. The senior finished with 19 points and grabbed 14 rebounds.

Thomas said Shabazz's height posed a different challenge from many he's faced this season.

"It was a good, hard battle," Thomas said. "He's a tall guy. I had to really be aware of him all the time." He finished with 18 points, but couldn't go in the hole.

"You can't shoot wonderfully all the time. You're going to have games like that," Thomas said. "You can't shoot wonderfully all the time. You're going to have games when the ball doesn't go in the hole."

Forward Erron Maxey was PC's lone offensive bright spot. He finished with 18 points, but like three of his Friar mates, he struggled foul trouble throughout the game.

Both Maxey and Murray picked up three fouls in the first half, enabling SU to go on its decisive run.

While the Friars remained within striking distance in the second half, they never truly threatened the Orangemen.

Both teams seemed to struggle to find continuity, as almost-constant whistles routinely stopped the action.

In keeping with the game's overall ugliness, Boeheim felt that it was his team's worst shooting performance of the season. The previous season-low shooting had been 40 percent against St. John's on Jan. 31.

However, the 24th-year head man said that not all wins are picture-perfect.

"You just have to find a way to win these games and we did," Boeheim said. "We'll get on the plane and go home and get ready for Seton Hall."

SU senior swimmers beat FAU in final home meet

After honoring its graduating seniors at its last home meet, the underclassmen won three events apiece as the team will be in capable hands next season.

Four Syracuse underclassmen won three events apiece as both Orange squads defeated Florida Atlantic on Saturday at Webster Pool.

The men and women switched roles from what SU had done the past few weeks, when the men's team had set the tone. This time, the Orange women were the ones dominating the meet, winning 179-119, while the men pulled out an 11-point victory, 149-138.

"I think it shows that we're on the way to the Big East meet, and we'll do well," said junior tri-captain Dustin Riley, who was one of the four SU swimmers who pulled off trifectas. "It was good to go out positively like that." Riley's showing in the 100-yard breaststroke (1:06.77) and 200 breaststrokes (2:05.59) and 400 individual medley (4:35.15).

On the men's side, Riley and classmate Josko Vucetic set pool records for Syracuse (5-1). Riley's showing in the 100-yard breaststroke (58.30 sec) shaved more than a second off the previous mark set last season by junior Ilin Mikhailov (59.42). Riley also won the 200 breaststroke (2:06.30) and 400 individual medley (4:03.70). He was part of a winning effort in the 200 medley relay (1:35.01) as well.

"I felt real good in the water," Riley said. "Hopefully, I can keep it up a week and a half from now (at the Big East meet) and swim well for us." Vucetic set his record in the 100 breaststroke, touching the wall in 59.61. The Croatian also won the 200 breaststroke (1:50.45).

"I think they took a look at (the pool records) and where they are and took a shot at it," head coach Lou Walker said of Riley and Vucetic. "Building on that confidence is a positive thing."

Sophomore Djordje Filipovic won three events for the Orangemen, the 200 freestyle (1:41.66) and 100 butterfly (50.54), as well as joining Riley and Vucetic on the victorious 200 medley relay team.

Upstart Pirates invade Carrier Dome

"We've been dealing with a lot of issues on campus," he said. "Any time we can get back to basketball and have the kids play at a high level, we're happy."

The game between the Orangemen and Pirates, originally scheduled for Jan. 22, was postponed until tonight.

And as the teams face off, Amaker hopes his squad's mind will concentrate solely on basketball.

SHU (15-4, 7-2 Big East). Syracuse also would eclipse Connecticut's conference-record 19-0 mark in conference play.

The Pirates, who share a first-place tie in the Big East regular-season standings, have yet to find an offensive rhythm.

He averages 5.2 points per game, shooting a robust 63 percent from the field. Thomas, conversely, hits for 14.8 points and shoots a robust 63 percent.

Had anyone doubted 19-0, this is the Orangemen's victory over the Pirates, who share a first-place tie in the Big East regular-season standings.

Holloway's role this year, though, has changed. He need not take the scoring load upon himself, as sophomore guard Darius Lane leads the team with 15.1 points per game.

Concentrating on his overall performance, Holloway is racking up solid numbers — 12.1 points, 6.1 assists and five rebounds per game.

"He's been a leader first of all to any success we've had," SHU coach Tommy Amaker said. "He's invested more and our players feed off him. We'll go as far as Shaheen takes us."

"He's demanding more of himself and his teammates," senior guard Amaker said. "Shaheen, in his third season with the Pirates. He's been our most consistent player, and I think he's proven to be one of the best point guards in the conference this year."

While Holloway roams the wings, Dalembert creeps around in the paint, intimidating opponents with his 6-foot-11 size and downright scaring opponents with his 6-foot-11 wingspan.

The closest Beck gets to self-importance is "Beautiful Way," about an ex-girlfriend who is lost and alone. While hardly serious in tone, the album repeats the refrain "Oh, such a beautiful way to break my heart." But, on the whole, anyone looking for deep meaning in "Midnite Vultures" is going to be sorely disappointed. However, despite its whimsical tone, the album actually features impressive instrumental arrangements. Beck mixes everything from electric guitar to harmonica with synths and random sound effects that manage to blend seamlessly. Although his voice doesn't have much range, Beck keeps it in perfect harmony with the heavy instrumental proceedings around it.

Whether his voice is distorted or not, it always seems to fit the tone of the song perfectly. Even his ridiculous falsetto on "Debra" fits in with the rest of the package. "Midnite Vultures" calls to mind the sexual freedom of the pre-AIDS, pre-Reagan 1970s with vivid conviction. This sexual freedom is hilariously expressed in "Peaches & Cream" with lyrics such as "Give those pious soldiers/another lollipop/because we're on the go!"

And the album's final song, "I Call 478-6504," is a Prince style funk-pop song that centers on a foray between Beck and two sisters. Beck has taken his post-modernist act to its peak with this album, an audacious romp through a half dozen music genres. Although he is not exactly the most vocally talented or deep musician, Beck is still probably one of the most creative artists working in the music business. He is completely uninhibited in his art — and his lack of trepidation is our musical gain.

goal that is keeping the group together — getting a Democrat elected to the presidency.

Christina Hinchee, group chairwoman and Gore supporter, said each Democratic candidate embraces issues vital to the College Democrats, including pro-choice and pro-women's stances.

Hinchee said she enjoyed conversing with supporters for Bill Bradley group about their experiences at the New Hampshire primary, despite her support for Gore, Sunday's gathering in the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs. The College Democrats have offered to let their members use the school's facilities for free.

"I love the Bradley group," she said.
"They are involved, they write letters, and they even went to New Hampshire. We just worked together." To help the Democratic plight, the group pledged support behind each camp after Bums, including sponsoring a table in the Schine Student Center for the Bradley group.

"There are certain things we cannot do because we are not a recognized student organization," Hinchee said. "We are a group that supports the State University of New Hampshire political climate that has plagued universities nationwide."

One method of resurrecting political activism among students, Hinchee said, is to attract high profile speakers to campus to create a bigger forum for political opinions. Although she cannot accept credits for Hillary Clinton's visit to SU — the First Lady contacted the university and asked to come — the group is trying to bring back Hillary Clinton.

The Student Government Association has already approved the funding for this event, although the Democratic candidates have not been assured of Jackson's presence.

While the Gore campaign

Hinchee said she has avoided attendance at Democratic candidates' campaign events, including those for Gina De Rossi, a young Chris contender for Bill Bradley's seat.

"I don't know what it was, said
Burns, a junior political science student at the university. "I've always been drawn to politics."

Burns, the man responsible for making the College Republicans a very prominent and active campus group, started with the group two years ago. She is a 15-year-old, stuffing envelopes

Aliza Einhorn, former College Republican chairwoman, is a former Republican Lieutenant Governor candidate. She drew on and off-campus such issues as gun control and pro-choice abortion policies.

Specifically, the group has fought state and national attempts to decrease abortion rights and financially support higher-level education, as well as efforts to decrease educational Tuition Assistance Program monies. The College Democrats have also dumped the College
Republicans ability to promote their students and to speak to political organizations.

And in the years since, Burns, a Syracuse graduate, has not left the political world. In 1995, he worked on campaigns for Onondaga County Executive Nicholas Pirro
As well as a volunteer campaigner for the College Democrats.

Students, however, did not have a harmful effect on the group. Instead, Burns said the behavior actually helped strengthen it, he said. Burns said he met Ryan, a future member, at the speech.
Furthermore, Burns said that Ryan was his first College Republicans event, much like Bums, Ryan immersed himself in this political organization in the shadow of his academic years.

Whether he was working on local campaigns trying to pass Republican ideas during Model Congress competitions or using his position as chair-or of his school paper, he got his conservative message out to anyone willing to listen.

"I didn't know that there was an avenue to influence others," Burns said.
"I think it's had a great impact."

Branching out

Much like Burns, Ryan quickly rose through the ranks of the College Republicans, climbing from the group's first day at the university to the position of second vice chairman during his freshman year.

Ryan recently left the position to head the Syracuse University Yacht
For by for the College Republicans.

Ryan was heavily involved in the Forbes campaign after meeting a Forbes official at a College Republicans event in 1998. He found the experience with the Forbes campaign and the College Republicans has taught him that "the window of opportunity for change, being a staunch conservative would not help him in New York State," Burns said.

"I have a more savvy, political mind now," said Ryan. "It has made me a lot more political.

Both Ryan and Burns are very pleased with the growth of the College Republicans has given them.

"He's got the edge under his wing," Ryan said. "He's helped us gain in a professional light.

De Rossi said that the speakers for the group have brought to campus.

"I've been the one speaking part for me, getting to meet the people," she said. "Joe is an excellent leader.

Although both leaders of the College Republicans are quick to put Burns and De Rossi on the spot,

"I don't know if I'm a natural leader," he said. "I'll leave that to other dehos..."

AIDS breakthrough
A handful of male patients were on the minds of AIDS researchers last week, because they have found a way to keep sufferers off expensive and burdensome AIDS drugs for long periods. The men are walking advertisements for a new approach to HIV infections called structured treatment interruption (STI), a controversial technique that at least some clinicians think can induce the immune system to combat the deadly virus. STIs involve intermittently taking patients off their drug regimens in the hope that repeated exposure to the virus during such periods will stimulate the immune system and thereby aid in control of the infection.

Political rivalry
A new television commercial from George W. Bush's campaign drew an angry response from Sen. John McCain's campaign this weekend, in a sign of the escalating warfare between the two rivals for the Republican presidential nomination. The ad, which began airing in South Carolina on Friday night, says McCain knowingly distort Bush's tax plan by claiming that it does not set aside money from the projected budget surplus to save Social Security.

Hepatitis progress
Researchers are reporting major progress in combating Hepatitis B and C, which threaten to overtake AIDS as a national health crisis. Studies reported in recent months at medical conferences suggest doctors might soon be able to eradicate the viruses or send them into sustained remission in a majority of infected people. The studies are the culmination of years of work in developing medicines against Hepatitis B and Hepatitis C. About 20 percent of Americans carry one or both viruses.

College Democrats Split ticket
Campus political activism groups make their mark

As presidential hopefuls Bill Bradley and Al Gore ran neck-and-neck in the race to capture the Democratic presidential nomination, Syracuse University's College Democrats find themselves equally divided and unable to throw their support behind one candidate.

But instead of allowing this division to tear the group apart, members have embraced these differences and rallied behind the one they think is best.

College Republicans

Although liberal politics may be the rage on college campuses across the nation, the Syracuse University College Republicans believe a conservative ideology makes more sense.

While members' backgrounds and reasons for joining the Republican party are different, they tend to hold similar beliefs — less government is better, taxes should be lower, and an unborn child is a life worth preserving. Many of them,

Three unidentified men robbed a Syracuse University senior at gunpoint Sunday night in Thornton Park, according to a police report.

The senior was walking home from class at 10:30 p.m. when he passed a small blue car near the football field in the park on Ostrom Avenue, the report said. The car is thought to be a Nissan, the report added.

While passing the car, the victim heard a man threatening him from behind, the report said. He turned and saw a man pointing at him with what appeared to be a silver-colored, semi-automatic handgun. There was another man near the car and a third in the driver's seat, the report said.

The victim then got on the ground and handed the gunman his wallet containing $25 and his driver's license, the report said.

The second man then approached the victim and took his black nylon shoulder bag that contained a textbook and a Panasonic personal stereo, the report said.

Before driving away toward South Beech Street, the men told the senior to climb over a wooden rail and walk through the snow to the corner of the football field, the report said.

The victim described his attackers as black, about 6 feet tall, with tight winds and an edge that it's not safe but it's kind of scary.

Assembly calls for RHA alliance

The Student Government Association discussed Monday night the advantages of strengthening ties with the Residence Hall Association.

Dwight Williams, an Assembly representative from the School of Management, said a stronger relationship with RHA would break down barriers between Syracuse University students and SGA.

"Virtually every undergraduate has contact with the dorms and this is a good way to hear what the students want," said Williams, a junior finance major.

RHA President Jonathan Eisenmann said communication with SGA during his tenure was never strong. He tried to work with SGA last semester in hosting the Campus Safety Forum but response from SGA was disappointing, he said.

"No one showed up. But I have high hopes for this semester because an SGA officer approached me at the end of the Campus Talent Show and we should have met with me," Eisenmann said of Joe Sauer, a freshman Assembly representative from the College of Arts and Sciences.

The Assembly plans to run Spring Campaign 2000 with the guidance of Escobar, Williams and Sauer.

The Office of Multicultural Affairs recently awarded $5,000 to strengthen ethnic and racial harmony on the Syracuse University campus.

SU began awarding Feinestone grants to students, faculty and staff in 1996. Those interested in a grant submitted a formal proposal to the Multicultural Initiatives Committee in December.

An endowment by SU alumnus Sol Feinestone made the grants possible. Shantay Cherry, a senior television, radio and film major, acted as student chairwoman for the review committee. She said the committee wanted applicant proposals to include ideas that would move race relations beyond the level of toleration and would realize the advantages of a diverse community.

"Our forum looked for proposals with actual skill-building components and achievable goals to break racial barriers and prejudices," Cherry said.

The review committee heard 14 proposals and awarded the grants to seven applicants.

Helicopter crash kills 30

LUANDA, Angola — An overloaded military helicopter crashed and burst into flames shortly after taking off from southern Angola over the weekend, killing 30 people, officials said Monday.

Hospital sources in Lubango said the bodies were among the fatalities. Two dozen others are feared dead in the crash, including the aircraft's crew and a 3-year-old child.

The M/8 transport helicopter took off Saturday from an air base at Lubango on route to the Angolan capital of Luanda, 630 miles to the north, officials said.

Airport officials in Lubango said the pilot contacted the control tower minutes after takeoff and said he was returning because of technical problems. The pilot also reportedly asked for the firefighting team to be placed on standby.

A dozen of the helicopter crashed at the Lubango base. The survivors managed to step out of the flaming helicopter after it slammed into the air. The nationalities of the victims were not immediately available.

The identities were not released, and no passenger list was drawn up before the flight.

Monrday it had opened an inquiry into the crash. The helicopter apparently was overloaded: It had a capacity for 35 people and was carrying 42.

Poor aircraft maintenance during two decades of fighting between the government and UNITA rebels has led to dozens of plane and helicopter crashes in Angola. The overall death toll is not known.

Attorneys seek death penalty

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Federal prosecutors announced this morning that they will seek the death penalty against Carl Cooper, the man suspected of killing two people at a Starbucks coffee shop in Inglewood.

Cooper, 30, showed no reaction as U.S. Attorney Kenneth L. Wainstein revealed the government’s intentions at a hearing this morning in U.S. District Court. The hearing was scheduled to stand trial May 2 on murder, racketeering and other charges in a swarming 48-count indictment. He has pleaded not guilty.

The case against Cooper would be the first death penalty matter brought to trial in the District in nearly 30 years. The last execution in the District was in 1957.

The Starbucks killings took place July 6, 1997, in the 1800 block of Wisconsin Avenue NW, when a man went into a Starbucks coffee shop. Prosecutors allege that Cooper, also known as C-19, the leader of a management Mary Castron, and employees Emory Allen, Evans, 18, and 48

If Cooper is convicted of a capital offense, the jury then begins a separate proceeding to consider punishment.

Vandals attack Yahoo Web site

MOUNTAIN VIEW, Calif. — Computer vandals yesterday attacked Yahoo, the world’s largest popular Web site, bringing it down for about three hours, company officials said, in one of the most serious known acts of sabotage on the Internet.

At 10:20 a.m. Pacific Standard Time, the servers at the company’s Mountain View, Calif., data centers were bombarded with mock requests for information from the search, directory and portal site. The demands apparently came from “multiple” computer users around the world, the company said, jammed the system so that it was nearly impossible for estimates to get through.

Yahoo Inc. President Jeffery/Mallett said the attack did not include any penetration of data stored in Yahoo’s computers. The attackers did not leave a message of punishment.

Hijackers free eight hostages

LONDON — Britain’s hijacker negotiators last night said they could be days of talks with the armed group still holding 157 passengers and crew on the British airliner that was diverted to London’s Stansted Airport after a journey across Asia on Sunday.

The hostages on the plane were said to be uncomfortable but safe as they headed into their third day of captivity. Earlier today, eight passengers were freed by the hijackers, who had been treated decently.

The British assured the hijackers by keeping the plane on the ground, according to government sources.

The hijackers gave the orders to keep the plane on the ground, according to the British government.

two to three weeks at all of the dorms," said Escobar, a freshman newspaper major.

SGA will sit down with students and talk to them about what should be accomplished on campus, he said.

James, a sophomore musical theater major, said the tour is akin to his campaign for president. He expects this campaign to be as successful as his own because the tour will also attempt to capture students at dining halls, where he says they are most "attentive."

The campaign also requests that an SGA representative be present at RHA meetings and vice-versa.

"We have similar goals. We just haven't gotten together because our meetings were always at the same time on Mondays," said Eisenmann, a senior political science, economic and policy studies major. SGA meets at 7:30 p.m. every Monday in Maxwell Auditorium.

The prospective public relations board is expected to change the appearance of SGA by conducting various meetings in residence hall lounges. Escobar said. He added that by bringing the meetings there, students will be more expressive because the Assembly representatives appear more as peers than officials.

In other SGA news:

Comptroller Chris Greiner motioned to discuss the appointment of a new advisor after reading comments said by current SGA adviser Michael Eisenmann about the finance board in the Monday edition of The D.O.

Elmore, dean of student programs, commented on SGA's decision not to aid the College Democrats in funding U.S. senatorial candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton's visit to SU Wednesday. Elmore called the decision "shortsighted and stretching for rational."

"We need someone who is behind us wholeheartedly and not so driven by personal agendas," Greiner said.

The Assembly approved funding for the publication of "Comix Plus." The magazine is printed by students to showcase comics that do not appear in The Daily Orange, Greiner said.

"It's going to cost $938 and I think it is a good investment because there is a good group of guys in leadership that will do a good job," he said.

The Syracuse University community is invited to attend a campus meeting on issues related to the University-Community Partnership, the Neighborhood Patrol Initiative and student safety. The meeting gathers our community for the purpose of sharing concerns and information in order to clarify these matters, which affect our campus life together.

Phi Kappa Theta establishes university charter

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

As established Greek houses recruit pledges this week for Spring 2000 Rush, a new fraternity is just emerging on the Syracuse University campus.

Greek Expansion Board members — officials from the Office of Greek Life and representatives from the Panhellenic Council and the Intrafraternity Council — approved Phi Kappa Theta’s recognition request on Feb. 1 after the chapter made a presentation to the board on Jan. 26.

Junior political science major Sal Piscopo said the response to the request was “kind of quick.”

“I think they were impressed with us,” he added.

Piscopo said he came up with the idea to start a new fraternity at SU during Fall 1998 Rush. Piscopo brought up the idea of starting their own fraternity one night as he and his friends discussed events that went on during Rush, he said.

“We didn’t want to conform to any present ideals,” he said. “We wanted to set our own standards.”

Piscopo researched during winter break that year what he and his friends would need to do to begin their venture, he said.

“I did the research and brought the information back to the guys and they were all gung-ho about it,” Piscopo said. “So we took it from there.”

Piscopo approached the national headquarters of PKT after the break and inquired about starting an SU chapter, he said. Representatives from the national headquarters came to SU and interviewed students who expressed interest in joining the fraternity, he said.

Sophomore environmental engineering major Justin Joslin was among the would-be brothers that accompanied many Greeks, one he wishes to shed with PKT.

“I see a close-knit group of guys who trust each other and help each other through college,” Joslin said of his ideal fraternity. “It’s basically about meeting new people.”

The national PKT headquarters contacted SU to finalize the plan after interviewing students and deciding the proposal was serious, Piscopo said.

Although the SU granted recognition for the chapter, it is still a “provisional group,” meaning that they have not fully chartered and are not yet required to pay membership fees, Piscopo said.

Piscopo said, however, that the fraternity will be ready to participate in Fall 2000 Rush. The group currently includes the 15 to 16 students that worked to establish the chapter, he said.

The executive board includes Piscopo as president, Joslin as vice president of membership, WJPZ-FM 89.1 personality Mike McPherson as vice president of programming and Matt McDonough as vice president of communications, in addition to a variety of chairmen, Piscopo said.

Grade school tests fail to gauge truth

Elementary school isn’t just about hopscotch and dodgeball anymore. For some New York state fourth graders, one bad day could shape their visions of strolling through junior high halls.

Fourth graders statewide took a new standardized language arts test last week that requires literary and grammatical analysis. This is a departure from traditional multiple choice-based aptitude questions.

In the New York City area, 67 percent of students failed the test last year. New York state school officials plan to use this year’s results to help determine if students will be promoted to fifth grade.

Reports of fourth graders fearing a marred “permanent record” or a botched shot at Ivy League entrance exams circulated through third-grade classrooms. Parents served up power breakfasts and packed their kids off to school with crossed fingers.

Most of these elementary schoolers have never been exposed to standardized tests. The sight of endless rows of answer bubbles and a thick, sealed test booklet is surely enough to shake the confidence of even the brightest student.

The New York City Board of Education and the State Education Commissioner, Richard F. Mills, tried to put dollars on the docket for remedial education programs and establishing a standardized curriculum.

Increased testing without the appropriate training won’t paint the state’s youth as intellectual superpowers. Repeated failures will only continue to draw lines between children of various backgrounds and perpetuate low morale for underachievers.

If students are held back, teachers will be forced to water down curricula to prepare for the test. Learning in an overcrowded environment will shortchange kids the benefit of educational enrichment.

Only a combination of parental input, teacher feedback and realistic performance indicators can truly determine students’ educational fate.

Testing scare tactics won’t add interest to the nation’s brain trust — but a vested interest in a quality learning process will.

D.O. editor in chief recalls inspiring comrades

As I end my tenure as editor in chief of The Daily Orange at the end of this week, it seems like whining away the last two years at this paper was somehow part of predestined fate.

I can’t imagine not watching some of these wonderful writers transform into dedicated editors who spent night after night on the microphones. But at one time, I was the contributing writer, and the D.O. was just a place to come write about the cross-country team.

If not for some sports editors who’ve since moved on to less gray pastures, those who know I would have ever wanted to become a part of the organized chaos that is the D.O.? And but for the encouragement, who knows if I would have had the confidence I needed to apply for editor in chief?

I left for summer break at the end of my freshman year with my D.O. future in limbo. I hadn’t written much that spring, but the sports editors, Pete Thamel, Kirk Woudny and Jason Notte, gave me a good best anyway, the Big East notebook.

I came back that fall determined to prove myself to them, to ameliorate a way they吃惊ly and personally — how they were like brothers. They argued like brothers, they stood by each other like brothers. They bitched about each other behind their backs, and then fought over who would stay the latest, who would get the name stories, who could help the freshmen.

They were all so intrinsically small. It’s no small feat that they blended so well together.

Pete was the confident leader, the wunderkind who took over the dormant section. He was knowledgeable of SU sports that was downright scary.

Kirk was the consummate editor, who had the stories and the fragile freshman ego with care, who knew how to switch among just enough words to make a sentence sound perfect.

And Notte was the gentle giant, the incredibly talented writer who could make the Winthrop backcourt offense sound like the most exciting thing ever to hit campus. I couldn’t help but look up to, study how they

Greek advertisement perpetuates stereotypes

To the Editor:

I am writing to publicly call attention to the hypersexual and nauseating advertisement for Beta Theta Pi written up, apparently by each and every man in the fraternity. The advertisement, which ran in the Monday, Feb. 7 issue of The Daily Orange, is written in the manner of the magazine "FLUSH BETTA CHICKS DIG US" appears. This sexist phrase completely undermines the content of the well-meaning ad and simultaneously destroyed any remaining shred of respect that I had for the brothers of Beta Theta Pi and their place in the greek system in general.

The greek system at Syracuse University not only perpetuates rape and jock culture, expressions that exist as a result of the heightened emphasis on masculinity and devotionalism of women by members of social fraternities and the women themselves, but it also fosters a sense of academic mediocrity that has no place at an institute of higher learning that is trying to raise its academic standards.

In the words of the Beta Theta Pi Rush Chairman themselves, the greek system is in trouble. Students who allow these sexist and classist organizations will not tolerate the brainwashing of otherwise intelligent, talented men and women for much longer. In my opinion, I doubt the university would either if it did not depend so heavily on alumni donations from the IAC.

As rush approaches, the usual, redundant criticism of the greek system and deceptive rebuttals will appear in campus publications and in dialogues among interested parties. I believe to be the one to start this tired conversation, but I simply cannot allow this regressive ad for fraternity whose motto is, “so greek it hurts” to pass through the clutter unnoticed.

ASU discusses low attendance, spring events

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Staff Writer

Low attendance plagued Syracuse University’s African Student Union meeting Monday night as the group discussed plans for the Spring 2000 semester.

"Last week we had almost 20 people in here," said Ebriha Krubally, a junior engineering major and ASU president. "This place was packed. There were people all over the place..."

The low attendance at the meeting resulted from factors out of ASU’s control, he added, citing Monday night’s SU men’s basketball game against Seton Hall University and the poor weather as main deterrents.

Despite the attendance, the four members present made final preparations for an upcoming lecture by Nigerian literature professor Leo Obumulu entitled "Africa: beyond the Dancing and Killing Field."

ASU must try to engage as many student organizations as possible for the event to increase its viability on campus and unify black student organizations, Adesopo said.

"It can’t be something too religious. Just a friendship festival, I think, is something that could work," she said. "We’ve got to invite other groups. We’ve got to be a little more integrated so we can attract more active members to the organization.

The members agreed to organize a formal dinner with entertainment that coincides with an African spring harvest festival.

Council approves annual parental involvement day

Staff Reports

The Syracuse Common Council is asking black parents to support their children’s education through a city-wide parental involvement day to be observed Feb. 16.

During its 20-minute Monday meeting, the Council approved a resolution for the observance, Councilor-at-large Kate O’Connell said. The city of Syracuse began observing the day two years ago, she said. “It’s a day set aside to encourage African-American families to support their children’s education,” O’Connell said. “The council feels it’s extremely important to be respectful of the diversity in the district and to support any effort in regard to education.”

The day will culminate at 5:30 p.m. at the Oncenter Complex, 800 S. State St. of common City residents are invited to show their support for the observance through a community gathering, O’Connell said.

Syracuse University African Student Union President Ebrima Krubally said he hopes the day will promote equity in education throughout the city.

“If parents are taking part in their children’s education,” Krubally said, “the university will benefit as well.”

Historically, blacks have not been given the same opportunities in public education as other races and in turn have suffered high illiteracy and crime rates, Krubally added.

“If you look at both sides, you know there has been a disadvantaged group,” he said. “That group happens to be African-Americans.”

In other Council news:

• The Council did not vote on Syracuse Mayor Roy A. Bernardi’s proposal to redistrict adult entertainment businesses into an area east of Erie Boulevard and the Onondaga Lake Shore. O’Connell said.

• Members of the city’s zoning commission rejected Bernardi’s proposal last month because they feared it would adversely concentrate adult entertainment businesses in select areas of the city.

Board members also wanted the proposal would restrict the rights of artists to sketch nude models.

The Council did not vote on the issue because the proposal has not been forwarded to councilors by Rich Guy, corporate counsel to The Office of the Mayor, O’Connell said.

foot 11 inches tall, medium build and between the ages of 16 and 21, the report said.

One man was a dark hooded sweatshirt that covered his face and another wore a gray hooded sweatshirt. The third man remained in the car during the incident and the victim could not provide a detailed description, the report said.

The senior then walked to the SU Public Safety office and notified the Syracuse Police Department, the report said.

The Police Department’s Criminal Investigation Department is investigating the case. There are no suspects or witnesses, the report said.

Sergeant Joseph Sweeney, of the investigation department, said the incident was most likely an isolated one.

This was purely a case of being in the wrong place at the wrong time,” Sweeney said. “Thorndon Park is actually a very safe place to be.”

About 90 percent of crimes involving students both on and off campus occur randomly, Sweeney said.

Other gun-related incidents this year include an assault in Shaw Residence Hall and a break-in on South Campus.

An armed man entered Shaw Hall unuestioned Nov. 9 and broke into the room of his ex-wife. When the woman returned home and asked him to leave, he struck her head with the handle of a small handgun.

Three men entered the apartment of three SU students Nov. 17 and tied the women with clothing and Christmas lights and locked them in the bathroom of their home. The women were able to free themselves and contact the police, but only after the men left with a laptop computer, cash, ATM and credit cards.

It is not likely that someone targeting university students in a particular area, Sweeney said.

Students living in both Booth and Dehlin halls, however, have heard numerous rumors about dangers in the park, said Megan Kelly, a sophomore in the School of Management. “I live right across the street and wouldn’t go there by myself,” Kelly said. “They can try to make it sound scary, but it’s kind of scary.”

Sophomore film major Scott Adams said he leaves his car in the park during the day. “I personally didn’t feel safe leaving my car there at night,” Adams said. “I enjoy the park, but have told myself not to go there.”

Many students visit Thorn- don Park, especially to go sledding during the winter, without being aware of its potential dangers, said David Polazzi, a sophomore political science major.

Me and my friends have been going sledding and we haven’t had any problems,” Polazzi said. “We should probably be more careful.”

SU Public Safety should inform the student body when such incidents occur, Adams said.

“I think it’s important that the university make known that this did happen,” he said. Kelly said she is alarmed that the university has not informed students of the robbery.

Any incident like that should be alerted to the students,” Kelly said. “I don’t now why they didn’t tell us.”

Public Safety declined to comment on the case but did release a report Monday of the robbery to select faculty and publications.

The incident should remind students to look after their personal safety, especially in areas that present a potential danger, Sweeney said.

Everyone should be diligent when walking through a dark area,” he said. “If something doesn’t feel right, trust your feelings.”

If students see someone or something that appears suspicious, they should report to Public Safety immediately, Sweeney said.

Students must also be careful to secure their property, he said.

“You can’t leave things out in the open,” Sweeney said. “You can’t leave yourself to be the victim.”

Honeybees have a keen ability to navigate over very long distances and lead companions to sources of food. Two new studies have produced new insights into how the insects do this. Australian professors and researchers sent honeybees on a search for food inside a narrow tunnel decorated with different black-and-white patterns, then analyzed the dances and waggle they performed to communicate the location of the food to other bees. The bees danced differently depending on the pattern in the tube, indicating they judged distance with visual cues.

Like cocaine? A decade after then-President George Bush's request for science to devise a vaccine to render addictive drugs harmless, Donald W. Landry may have come up with the solution for cocaine. Using methods seldom applied in drug abuse research, he built a "catalytic antibody" that eats cocaine in a lab rat's bloodstream, and biotech companies may further develop the antibody to treat human cocaine abuse. The President's Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP) estimates that there are 5.2 million users of some form of cocaine in the United States, and 3.3 million addicts.

Seeing the light "Neardeath experiences" may be caused by a normal psychological response to the intensely stressful experience of almost dying, according to new research. In a study from the University of Virginia Health System in Charlottesville which was published in the Feb. 5 issue of the medical journal Lancet, almost 72 percent of people surveyed reported having many more symptoms than normal that fit the signs of "disassociation" — the separation of thoughts and feelings from the normal stream of consciousness.

But thanks to the good folks who play professional basketball, we'll settle for the 49th annual NBA All-Star Game and get out of bed.

There should be lots of fun this year, with Eastern Conference starters Vince Carter, Allen Iverson, Grant Hill, Eddie Jones and the Mourning going against the Western lineup of Shaq, Kevin Garnett, Tim Duncan, Jason Kidd and Kobe Bryant. Plus, this year, the slam-dunk contest is back to delight us fans. Sweet!

"Blue Streak" — available on tape Tuesday

All "Blue Streak" consists of is comedian Martin Lawrence trying to do the whole "Beverly Hills Cop" buddy cop thing. Is it going to be nominated for any awards? I don't think so, but it's worth renting for the multiple laughs it'll pull out of you. Despite the idiotic premise that Lawrence is a burglar pretending to be a cop in order to get back a diamond that he lost thanks to a new police station, "Blue Streak" ain't half bad. If anything, it will make you remember why you miss "Martin," Lawrence's popular Fox comedy show, so much.

Bubble Wrap and Bell Labs Text to Speech

The Bubble Wrap is a virtual version of that timeless amusing bubble popping that you do when you buy something fragile and get your hands on the wrap. Just move your mouse over the bubbles and they will pop, making that wonderful noise that we crave. What constructive end will this meet for you? To tell you the truth, it won't do anything for you, but it's amusing. Bell Labs has one of the most interesting web gadgets, too. Whatever you type into the text box is converted to sound in eight different voices, including Child, Coffee Drinker and Big Man. Amuse yourself, your friends or people you don't even know on the phone with these ridiculous computer voices.

The college crowd wasn't always central to A&F, Jeffries said. Though A&F has been around for more than 100 years, it targeted an older, up- market class.

When Jeffries joined A&F as president in 1992, the company was floundering. It needed a new head to revitalize sales at the American college student. With focused advertising strategies directed at 18 to 25-year-olds, A&F secured more than $800,000,000 in sales during 1996. Last year, it was named as a Top 100 company in Advertising Age magazine.

Following the trends are about 10 percent college graduates who work at the company's headquarters, Abercrombie and Fitch specifically recruits fresh minds to stay in tune with youth culture.

"We gave birth to this brand," Jeffries said. But it was a delivery wrought with complications.

Legal wrangles

Last fall, A&F allegedly withheld financial information from investors for five days, cost a class action lawsuit and a doubletake from the Securities and Exchange Commission.

But A&F is best known for its magazine/catalog, A&F Quarterly. The publication has had glowing reviews in semi-nude models and printing alcoholic drink recipes. It also flaunts a circulation of more than 200,000. Though shrink-wrapped and designed for an R-rated audience, the magazine made clothes aren't enough to say "makes a statement," he said.

"I've seen the catalog," she said. "I don't know what a nude woman sitting on a horse bareback has to do with selling T-shirts." Jeffries' focus comes perhaps from a lifestyle in retail. Though A&F takes pride in its narrow age range, Calderone praises chains that can appeal to a broader audience, like The Gap.

"I love the product," Capone said. "I wear it all the time."

Though Capone conceded that the price was a little high, he felt that it is worth it, since it "makes a statement," he said.

Quality fabrics and well-made clothes aren't enough to warrant the price tag, said current fashion design major Gina Calderone.

"A $50 shirt is not worth $40 because it says "Abercrombie and Fitch," she said.

A&F's prominent logo takes pride in its narrow age range, Calderone praises chains that can appeal to a broader audience, like The Gap.

"I love what he's targeting, I guess it's working."

Shareen Lai, to injury does not bother her either.

And Neveklovska certainly does not chalk her nails over the pressure of playing in two championship matches.

The pressure never faced Neveklovska in Ithaca last week, as the Syracuse junior led the Orange women to three titles at the Cornell University Winter Indoor Classic on Jan. 30.

Neveklovska won the Flight B singles and doubles titles at the weekend event.

"I had a good tournament," Neveklovska said. "It was an improvement from the first week. I was making my shots and moving my feet. After the second set, I picked myself up again and managed to pull it off."

Neveklovska needed three sets to beat Rebecca Ho of Penn State.

She defeated Ho 6-2 in the first set. While trying to put Ho away, Neveklovska let down and dropped the second set 6-2. She came back to beat top-ranked Ho in the third set with 6-1 win.

"Michelle cleaned up," SU head coach Mac Gifford said. "In the championship, she played well in the first set. She had to come on and take charge in the third set. That is her trademark."

Gifford said playing a higher seed did not take Neveklovska out of her rhythm.

Like Neveklovska who hails from Vancouver, Ho is a Canadian, which proved to be a motivating factor.

"Michelle has this way about Canadians," Gifford said. "She beats them all. She has this attitude. She's not even worried."

Neveklovska and Ho faced each other four years ago while in high school. The SU junior defeated Ho then, too, triumphing in a three-set match.

"You get to know the player while growing up," Neveklovska said. "It's easier in a match knowing your opponent."

Neveklovska earned a second title for the Orange women over the weekend as she combined with freshman Masha Kabanova to win the Flight B Doubles.

Neveklovska and Kabanova pasted Columbia University's Tina Romic and Shelly Mital 8-4 in the championship, a round after upsetting Cornell's Jodie Harburg and Daniela DelFrato 9-7.

The Orangewomen received their third title of the weekend from freshman Shervin Saedinia, who won the Flight C singles. Saedinia dropped Dana Rovinsky of Penn State 6-1, 6-2.

Gifford said Saedinia is playing her best tennis of the season and is making a run at the higher-seeded players on the SU squad.

"She's more confident and is starting to show the rest of her game," Gifford said. "I'm going to be looking for it."

Others on the team are not looking forward to playing her. They feel she might replace them in the seeds.

Syracuse's No. 1 singles player for the weekend, Anna Khudolina, lost to Penn State's Pilnar Montgomery 1-6, 6-4, 6-3 in the finals of the Flight A singles bracket.

Gifford still deemed the tournament a success, even without the services of Lai.

The senior co-captain pulled out of the tournament with a sore shoulder, Gifford said.

A week of rest should be enough for Lai, as the Orangewomen host Cornell in a dual match Wednesday at the SUABR0AD@SUMMON3.SYR.EDU

The Orangewomen should face many of the same players they did last weekend.

Cornell's recent success against Syracuse has been minimal. The Orangewomen downed the Big Red 6-3 last season in Ithaca.

"They could be charged up," Gifford said. "They don't like us. We beat them badly last year."

Cornell will be the next test in a tough winter schedule. The Orangewomen have three consecutive home matches with Cornell, St. Bonaventure and Rutgers before facing a tough Rice University squad at Ithaca on Feb. 19.

"We have confi! I know this team can be very good," Gifford said. And a lot of tricks: individually, they've upset a lot of people.

"Now, we have to do it as a team."
BUS continued from page 16 selves.

Syracuse and Columbia traveled back to SU for a night date after both lost in Ithaca.

At Manley Field House, the Orangemen's struggles continued, as they managed to tally just a single win on the day. SU captain Shawn Thomas pinned Columbia's Jeff Anderson at 4:10.

The Lions defeated Syracuse 43-6 in front of 54 patrons, most of whom cheered for Baldwinsville native Mark Prince, who pinned SU's Kalen Pascal in 2:35.

The battered Wennihan, meanwhile, lost a physical 5-3 match to Columbia's Pat Kuznia, which featured multiple stoppages to clean up both wrestlers' blood. Wennihan had cuts on his back, while his opponent had frequent nosebleeds.

"I would have liked to have that one back," a visibly dejected Wennihan said. "I wanted to win coming back (from the injured knee). My shape was better than I expected, but it doesn't matter if I don't win."

Wennihan held a 2-0 lead over Kuznia, when he made a fatal error. Shortly after Kuznia cut his deficit in half, Wennihan lost his cool and gave Kuznia an extra shove after the whistle blew. The extra point gave Kuznia the momentum he needed to win the match.

With Wennihan in a one-point hole and 15 seconds left on the clock, Kuznia made an escape for a 5-3 lead. He wrestled defensively for the last 15 seconds to secure the victory.

"I thought that (Wennihan) did a very nice job on top," Miller said. "He has to be a little more controlled. Take a look at that match — he loses by a point, and that's a penalty point. You can't give away points or it'll come back to haunt you."

Miller said he felt uncomfortable letting Wennihan compete in two matches, so the junior only wrestled in SU's home meet. He should be ready to wrestle in all three dual meets next weekend, Miller said.

Thomas continues to be the nightlight in SU's nightmare season. After dropping a 6-2 decision at Cornell, he pinned Anderson for his 20th pin of the year in 22 wins.

"As usual, I'm disappointed with the team," Thomas said, "but it's almost as if I'm getting used to it and expect it. It's not fair to expect too much more from these guys and what they're able to give. I say that's the struggle for me, so I have to find my own focus to continue."

Along with lopsided scores, SU wrestling has also become all too familiar with forfeits. The Orangemen gave up three forfeits in each match, putting them in an 18-0 hole before the first competition.

Syracuse's Manley appearance marked its second home meet of the season and first since a November 23 loss to Binghamton. The Orangemen head back to the road this weekend, facing Rutgers, Franklin & Marshall and Coppin State in dual meets at RU.

"We just have to take the steps necessary to where we are scoring points," Miller said. "That's our biggest problem. We just can't score..."

“We talked about not giving them an offensive rebound. At that point, you have to have the will to live and die with the foul calls and the officials’ decisions.”

The Pirates derived a great deal of confidence from the play of senior point guard Shaheen Holloway. The 6-foot-10 freshman averaged 13 points a game as a grade school kid. His adaptability helped Syracuse’s defense work the zone and St. John’s to the stretch.

“In the time out, we wanted to try to give our guys a lot of confidence,” Pirates coach Tommy Amaker said.

The Orangemen hung close, too, with a 25-22 lead at the first 25 minutes, but the Hall answered every SU attack with a 31-28 advantage. The Orangemen finally bust the seal with 12:08 left, as a Shumpert layup put them up 44-43.

On Monday, Blackwell mustered two late-game free throws — which gave SU a 67-66 lead — as his only points.

After SU’s Darius Lane bombarded him by scoring 26 points, Blackwell’s drive and bank fell short.

Boeheim attributes Blackwell’s lack of success to the after-effects of a flu bug suffered 10 days back. “He’s an end-of-season player,” Boeheim said. “He’s got to have his legs, and he hasn’t been as active as he was earlier in the year.”

The lanky Duany played 20 minutes and spelled Blackwell for a majority of the game, and finished with just two points.

Starters slowed in loss

BY JEFF PASSAN

As the clock hit triple-zero and the Seton Hall Pirates whooped it up in the epicenter of the Carrier Dome, a dejected Ryan Blackwell walked off the court.

Less than 10 seconds earlier, with SHU leading 69-67, an open lane on the right wing greeted Syracuse's senior forward.

Blackwell, 0-for-6 at that point, filled that lane with two strong dribbles and lifted up an off-balance bank shot.

A rim rattle later, his line read 0-for-7, and SU's season line read 19-1.

Syracuse wrestlers drop lopsided decisions to Cornell, Columbia and the bus.

Continuing its fall into the abyss, the SU wrestlers dropped lopsided decisions to Cornell and Columbia.

But the misery continued off the mat as well. On the way to Cornell, SU's bus driver accidentally opened the cargo hold door into Ike Wynnham's forehead.

Wynnham still wrestled, returning for his first match following a knee injury, despite needing three stitches above his left eyebrow to mend the bleeding. He has been out since the Penn State Open two months ago.

After Wynnhan's latest injury, the Orange suffered their second consecutive shutout, 43-0 to Cornell.

The Big Red dismantled SU (0-7, 0-9 EIWA) and crushed Columbia 30-6 in Ithaca.

"Cornell is one of the top teams in the country, and our talent is nowhere near their talent level," head coach Scott Miller said. "We did some things better, like better movement. But the final scores speak for them."

Senior reports

lew behavior

A Syracuse University senior filed a harassment complaint Tuesday with the Syracuse Police Department against former history professor Jay Flemma for repeated lewdness in unwanted e-mails and phone calls, according to a police report.

Flemma was removed from his position Jan. 13 due to related complaints from at least five unidentified SU students, the report said.

The senior, a student in the College of Visual and Performing Arts, said Flemma repeatedly harassed her since early October, the report said. She notified the university of the situation and requested that they investigate the case against Flemma, the report said.

In response to the complaints, SU officials advised Flemma to stay away from the senior, the report said.

"We interviewed individuals from the class and others who attested to Flemma's area of expertise," said Donald Lany, VPA dean. "We came to a decision that was very well informed."

According to SU's policy on sexual harassment, Flemma and that his complaints against faculty, administrators and staff for lewdness or sexual misconduct will be referred to the chairperson of a University Senate committee. The committee will then appoint a two-person investigative team from a pool of faculty and administrators trained for that purpose.

GSO president criticizes Moore

BY NICK SERRANO
Staff Writer

Former Graduate Student Organization President Zac Moore's protest and accusations of plagiarism against a Syracuse University geography professor reflect the "radical" manner in which Moore handled his own presidency, said Eric Hunn, current president of the organization.

"We have chosen to fight this battle by these tactics that are very radical and not becoming of the serious nature of graduate students on campus," Hunn said. "His protest is not the way the GSO was similar to the way he's dealing with this in that he was very public, very radical and very aggressive."

Moore said he attempted to post a description of his case last week on the "gradlist" listserv that reaches up to 1,000 graduate students, but GSO Vice President Joe Roser refused to post it.

Community examines safety issues

Syracuse University is evaluating and improving campus safety for everyone, said Eleanor Ware, vice president of Human Services, during an open forum Tuesday night in Hendricks Chapel.

Ware informed about 25 students and local residents about the state of public safety on campus, just two days after a robbery at gunpoint was reported in Thornden Park.

SU Public Safety Director Robert T. Robinson said safety precautions in that area are the responsibility of city police.

"We are taking all necessary precautions to prevent this from happening again," Robinson said. "We have sent out a campus alert e-mail, warning all students of the situation."

The forum, mediated by Hendricks Dean Thomas Wolfe, included several SU department directors who attended to answer questions.

LOS ANGELES — Radar data shows a piece of Alaska Airline Flight 286 may have fallen off seconds before the plane plunged into the Pacific, investigators said today.

Analysis of radar and the flight data recorded by the plane indicates it was oscillating, or pitching, during its descent. About 1,700 feet above the ocean, the plane then regained some semblance of control for about nine minutes. Then it pitched nose-down, rolled upside down and plunged 17,000 feet into the ocean. Just over a minute later, the plane hit the water.

National Transportation Safety Board Chairman James Hall's detailed description didn't offer a cause for the Jan. 31 crash. He is having trouble with his feet, which are numb, and blood clots were found in his blood.

The accident occurred in the late afternoon, and the plane was carrying passengers and crew members. Hall said the plane was about 30 miles off the coast of Alaska when it went down.

Hall said the plane was a Boeing 747, and the passengers included crew members and a photographer. He said the plane was flown by an experienced pilot who had been flying for four years. The pilot was a two-time Olympic gold medalist in skiing and had been involved in a number of plane crashes.

Bradley supporters discuss debate, activism

Syracuse University is attempting to schedule a campus debate between Vice President Al Gore and former New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley before the March 7 New York state presidential primary, said the Bradley campaign.

Nationwide debate plans for the two Democratic presidential hopefuls are stalled because the two candidates cannot agree on the logistics of the debates, said James Snyder, a spokesman for the Central New York Committee to Elect Bill Bradley President.

Many areas across the state, however, are also competing to host a debate, Snyder said.

"There's tough competition around the state," he said. "But we're trying." The university would be a good choice for an upstate location because it is a large media market, he said. But there is a strong possibility that the only state debate will be in New York City and will focus on racial issues, Snyder added.

Bradley will make campaign stops in Buffalo and Rochester before the New York primary, said Steve Washoe, Bradley's Onondaga County campaign organizer.

When Bradley visited Syracuse last November, he said he would likely visit the SU campus. Since there is nothing currently planned, a prominent Bradley supporter - such as Nebraska Sen. Bob Kerrey or Minnesota Sen. Paul Wellstone - may come to campus on Bradley's behalf, Washoe said.

"We'll get someone up here to speak," he added.

Campus connections

SU for Bill Bradley met Tuesday night to plan a voter registration drive and prepare for the New York state primary.

The voter registration drive is planned to begin today and continue through Thursday, said Brooke Schiferle, the group's coordinator.

Group members will work with residence hall directors to set tables by campus dining halls.

Both Democrats and Republicans can register at the tables, Schiferle said.

The majority of the meeting, however, was spent discussing with Washoe programming ideas to realize after the voting drive.

Washoe said he will also work with Cornell University, Ithaca College and Elmira College in campaigning. The Syracuse area will take up the majority of his time, he added.

The group plans to contact all the new Democrats they register, in addition to those who have already registered, he said.

"There will be an especially big focus on the people we register," he said.

The CNY effort will not be supplemented by advertising, signs and literature, Washoe said.

"We get nicked and dinged a lot of things and it's a pain in the ass," he said. "Until we get commercials, we have to do everything we can."

SU for Bill Bradley, with Washoe's assistance, is trying to get the candidate's name into the community by writing letters to the editor of local newspapers and holding up signs or media events, such as SU men's basketball games.

"If Gore rears his ugly head in this part of the state, we should have someone with a sign there," Washoe said.

The efforts of college students are important for the campaign, said Rob Walther, the New York state campus coordinator for the Bradley campaign.

In New York state, there are 28 college Bradley groups with 10 or more active members, he said.

The group plans to contact all the new Democrats they register, in addition to those who have already registered, he said.

"There will be an especially big focus on the people we register," he said.

The campaign hopes to have 22 additional campus groups established soon, Walther added.

"We have the machine in place," he said. "Now they have to move from member recruitment to voter solicitation."

The campaign is seeking campus groups to inform students of the education-related aspects of Bradley's platform.

"College students are more important to our campaign than any other," Walther said. "Students have an energy that a political machine can't mimic."

SU for Bill Bradley is especially important because there are several thousand potential voters on campus, Washoe said. Winning the New York state primary is crucial to the future of the campaign, he said.

"If we don't win New York, we're in deep shit," he said. "But I think we have a good chance here."

Flemma would most likely not have returned to teach during the Spring 2000 semester despite the allegations against him, Lantzy said.

If he decides to re-apply for the Fall 2000 Semester, his placement would be put under careful consideration, Lantzy added.

Despite the VPA administration's warnings, Flemma continued to harass the student both at home and at work, the report said.

Flemma was a "weird" and had no allegiance to the office, the report said.

The student will not seek legal remedies, Wachtel added.

Professor strives to uphold SU's academic honesty policies, takes interest in students

To the Editor:

I am currently a work study student in the geography office here at the university, a position I have held for almost two years. My work has allowed me to develop a multitude of relationships with the professors in this prestigious department. So when I read the attack on Dr. John Rennie Short, I was appalled to hear such accusations. Dr. Short is one of the most intelligent, hard-working, motivated, and friendly individuals that I have ever been in contact with and I know the majority of the people who have been in contact with him will agree enthusiastically.

His job, along with every other faculty member at Syracuse, is to do the best they can to convey information to the student in their class. And I am sure we all know that most of the professors don't care whether you do the work or show up at all. Dr. Short told Mr. Moore that he had not done the work and gave him all the relevant information that was needed in order for the student to make an informed decision on what he should do about the situation he was in. And I know that Dr. Short would not have let this go unnoticed. Therefore, the situation that Mr. Moore put himself in was of his own doing.

I do agree with Mr. Moore when concerning the protection of students rights against plagiarism, but I know first-hand, because I have made copies of a number of Dr. Short's works that he always gives proper recognition for thoughts that aren't his own. So before Mr. Moore makes such outrageous attacks on a person's integrity as an author, take a couple of English and textual studies courses where the question of "genius" or "originality" or "intertextuality" would shine a light on the thoughts that the vast majority pawn off as their own.

The "original" thought that Mr. Moore himself said was taken "verbatim" more likely than not an original thought of his own. The foundation of writing is based on a combination of original thoughts which help to produce your own new thoughts. Only once he Mr. Moore understands that he begins throwing stones.

Student lights up Short fuse

Moore's statements hold empty hyperbole, unfairly attack professor

To the Editor:

After reading Feb. 3's issue of The Daily Orange and the story about Zac Moore's protest, I am very disappointed The D.O. neglected to contact the other students involved in that situation to get their take on Mr. Moore's outlandish claims. In no way does Mr. Moore speak for me when he states, "He's (Professor Short) using three students and raping their ideas." I would like to take this moment to shed some light on his allegations.

Mr. Moore alleges that Professor Short dismissed him from the GEO 815 seminar after only one truancy. The fact is that in the first few weeks of the seminar, Mr. Moore often failed to complete the required readings and assignments. This sank Mr. Moore was followed in later weeks by several late arrivals to class and a string of constant absences. In a graduate-level seminar based primarily on student discussion and participation, Mr. Moore's failure to complete the required work and attend class was unfair to the rest of the students. Professor Short, with the students' best interest in mind, asked Mr. Moore to drop the class.

Through his statements, Mr. Moore makes it appear as if he were the principal author of the published paper in question. This is ironic, considering that the paper contained not one iota of Mr. Moore's work. The paper was the outcome of a collaborative effort between Professor Short, the other two students and myself. Mr. Moore did not contribute one paragraph nor did he assist in the data collection. Once written, the other two students and myself, not Professor Short, chose to include Mr. Moore's name as a sign of graduate student collegiality. In light of his recent actions, I greatly regret our gesture.

Finally Mr. Moore alleges that Professor Short and Yeong Hyun Kim plagiarized work he contributed during GEO 815. Although I have yet to read "Globalization and The City," I know both authors on a professional level and have no reason to question their academic integrity. I and the other students involved would concur that Professor Short did not "rap our ideas." In fact, Professor Short guided a collaborative effort that allowed our ideas to be shared with the entire geography academic community.

Mr. Moore has made a number of irresponsible allegations during the last week that only stand to damage the reputation of a great academic department. Professor Short, as well as unnecessarily drag his fellow graduate students into an ugly personal grudge. Keep in mind that this incident took place during the spring of 1998 but it is only now, two years later, that Mr. Moore is voicing his concerns. It appears to me that Mr. Moore is reviving until the all the witnesses have left Syracuse before engaging in his smear campaign.

SEAC's support of Moore's charges undermine credibility of professor

To the Editor:

Zac Moore's attack on the academic credibility of Professor John Rennie Short is disturbing. I have been a student of his for the past year and have been fortunate to have him as an advisor for my senior thesis. His forthright style and honest character are evident in all he does. With all of this now suspect, Professor Short is forced to defend himself against Moore's baseless argument that has since gained the support of the Student Environmental Action Committee (SEAC), a group whose "blind activism without a cause" credo cleaves itself within the noble aims of liberalism. Moore's claims and SEAC's cluelessness speak for themselves. Their attack on Short should be thoroughly dismissed.

Genetics measure proves premature

While searching for employment, people take pains to leave past criminal deeds off their applications. The 21st century may force them to tuck away evidence of their genetic composition, too.

President Bill Clinton announced a decision Tuesday prohibiting federal agencies from using genetic test results to make employment decisions.

The order, which covers nearly two million civilian federal employees, ensures that the U.S. government can’t strike workers out on the basis of genetic testing of their workers is still a long way off.

While sickly people won’t be denied coverage outright, insurance companies may instead opt to boost their rates to unaffordable levels to absorb the rising costs of treatment. And since dollars remain the bottom line for many struggling HMOs, price hikes may be their last resort.

With healthcare and welfare reform already at the top of Congress’ "to-do" list, this trendy, futuristic piece of legislation seems a bit premature. Certainly, policies must be implemented to safeguard the sensitive information gleaned from scientific progress, but they shouldn’t bump more pressing issues off the Senate floor.

It is wise to keep a close eye on the ethical dilemmas that may arise as science climbs into the new millennium.

But protecting the nation’s present-day reality — not its science-fiction future — should still be first on the government’s agenda.

Race dialogue ignores class, economic struggles

February is Black History Month and there is a race-relations problem in the United States of America.

America has supposedly reached a point where the law requires equal treatment regardless of race. This is the objective legal truth. But it seems that the people enforcing the laws are in charge of the businesses and the people on every street corner still hold some conceptions of race that don’t match this ideal.

A big part of America’s race problem is directly linked to our lack of class-consciousness. With all of the social-Darwinist/Heritario Alger-nonsense that plagued the early part of American history, Americans have had a distorted idea of what economic power is, how it is achieved, and what it means to large sects of the population. Generally, Americans have a poor understanding of the way economic problems affect other areas of society.

The struggles of class and race in America are inextricably tied. In Strivings of the Negro People, W.E.B. DuBois said: "To be a poor man is hard, but to be a poor race in a land of dollars is the very bottom of hardships." That was in 1897 and it could have been said yesterday. Since Reconstruction, coming out of slavery, discrimination, segregation and oppression, blacks in America never had a fair shot to catch up with whites economically. Now that all Americans are equal in the eyes of the law, the legacies of those hardships remain. According to scholars, the economic and educational opportunities of blacks, adjusted for cultural differences, is forty years behind the white standard.

But this is not news. It is common knowledge that blacks are disproportionately poor to whites. This is stock footage of Watts and the ruins of the civil war. The rest are white people who only take notice of Dr. King’s birthday so they can close their eyes to inequalities that they know still exist.

We cannot continue to ignore the realities of the situation. We must recognize that race and the problems associated with it. Two facts tell us that this is not news. One is the absolute number of those who can’t talk about race. The second is that there are real inequalities that exist on a number of social and economic levels.

Fraternity refutes claims of poor taste, misconduct

To the Editor:

Speaking on the behalf of the brothers of Beta Theta Pi, I would like to briefly respond to some of the erroneous comments made in her letter, which ran in The Daily Orange on Tuesday.

The members of Beta Theta Pi would like to point out a few facts regarding the incident in question. This incident is not out of character for the Beta Theta Pi fraternity. In fact, it is one of the many events that demonstrates the respect and regard that the fraternity members have for one another.

The incident described in the letter is not an accurate representation of the fraternity. The fraternity members are committed to maintaining a positive and respectful environment, and they work hard to ensure that all members live up to the high standards set by the fraternity.

The fraternity is committed to providing its members with a safe and supportive environment. Beta Theta Pi members are encouraged to discuss any concerns or issues they may have with the fraternity leadership, and the fraternity is committed to addressing these concerns in a timely and effective manner.

"The goal of this meeting is to clarify assumptions or questions, and to create a sense of community," Wolfe said.

Three speakers — Barry Wells, vice president and dean of Student Services; Ware and Louis Marcoccia, senior vice president of business, finance and administrative services — addressed various aspects of campus security during the forum.

"Crime on campus not only hurts the victims," Wells said, "but it also threatens every student. It hurts the victims," Wells said, "but it also threatens every student."

State and city involvement

In August 1996, the city of Syracuse passed an ordinance addressing various aspects of campus security during the forum. Public Safety is running," Wells said.

Neighborhood initiatives

Marcoccia addressed the safety of campus dormitories, including fire alarms, traffic lights and street lighting at night.

"All of the residence halls have fire sprinklers in stairways and storage closets," Marcoccia said. "New additions also have sprinklers in the rooms. All the residence halls will be fully furnished with sprinklers in every room by the 2004 Fall Semester, including all the dining halls and parking garages, Marcoccia added.

"High-rise dorms are first priority," Wells said. "New sprinkler systems will be added first to all rooms in Brewster, Beland and Day halls, starting this summer."

The speakers allowed the audience to state questions or concerns before concluding the event.

The predominant topic was the safety of off-campus neighborhoods where SU students reside. Public Safety is currently involved with the Syracuse Police Department in the surveillance of these off-campus areas.

"The problem with Public Safety getting involved is that the victims get in trouble twice," said Dwight Williams, a junior finance major and a member of the Student Government Association. "Once by Syracuse police, and those calls will be handled by the university, too."

"The audience asked various questions about fire safety and fire prevention, the bus services and the effect of the Blue Light emergency call system."

"The Blue Lights do not deter crime," Robinson said. "They are aides in case you need assistance of any kind."

As for bus services, SGA Vice President Arish Gajjar discussed the potential benefits of establishing a 24-hour bus service, as well as a 24-hour study building.

Gajjar has a valid point, Williams said, and added that improvements can be made.

Residence halls

Students also expressed concerns regarding resident advisers' responsibility for student safety.

Director of Residence Life Tom Ellett said he is not impressed with the current system. More should be expected out of the advisers, he added.

"Essentially what neighborhood Public Safety does is help avoid students from getting in trouble in the first place," Utz said. "Calls of disturbance will go to the Syracuse police, and those calls will be handled by the university."

"The audience asked various questions about fire safety and fire prevention, the bus services and the effect of the Blue Light emergency call system."

"I just think the policy is old, and needs to be reviewed," he added. "We need significant advancement in the quality of RAs. We are behind in having student peers that help critically in the dormitories."

Students said the forum was a success for those attending.

"I thought the discussion was very good," Gajjar said. "A lot of issues were covered, and there was a decent turnout. The right people were here to answer questions."

Williams agreed.

"Hopefully, people within the community will be more informed about what is going on and we can get some of these ideas up and running," Williams said.
Alpha Phi Alpha to show race-related film

BY EMILY KULKUS
Assistant News Editor

Filmmaker Marlon Riggs produced and directed a film in 1987 meant to open people’s eyes to black presence in media. The Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity of Syracuse University will use Riggs’ work tonight in hopes of doing the same.

The fraternity is hosting a 7 p.m. screening and discussion of “Ethnic Notions,” a documentary film exploring the depiction of blacks and institutionalized with racial stereotypical references dating back to 1820. The film examines how racial stereotypes have been ingrained and institutionalized in this country, Idani said.

The 58-minute, Emmy-winning documentary explores depictions of race in media and artistic outlets varying from caricatures, novels, vaudeville entertainment and films. Riggs’ graphic examples take both Idani and fellow fraternity brother Jared Green by surprise, they said.

“It was very disturbing the things that it looks at,” said Green, a junior civil engineering major. “The same things are going on now, it’s just done in so many subtle ways.”

Green, president of SU’s National Society of Black Engineers and secretary and public relations chairman of the six-member fraternity, said several of Riggs’ stereotypical pop culture examples were things he had never before realized.

“A lot of the stereotypes and the clichés — it tries to show some history behind them,” Idani said. “Simple things like Jim Crow. It’s a name we’ve all heard of but this video explains all that information.”

The showing will be preceded and followed by a discussion, Idani said. The discussion before the film will allow the audience to share what they already know about depictions of blacks in pop culture in order to illustrate what the film teaches its audience.

“We want to see how their views change before and after the showing,” Idani said. “There’s no way you can walk away from this and not learn something.”

Both Idani and Green worked to publicize the showing among both students, faculty and administration, they said. A large turnout is expected, they added. The fraternity will also promote the event at a table today in the Schine Student Center to attract those visitors on campus for First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton’s speech at noon today.

Following Riggs’ AIDS-related death in 1994 at the age of 37, the Sundance Film Festival awarded his final and most well-known work, “Black Is... Black Ain’t,” the 1995 Filmmaker’s Trophy.

Link Hall lab renovations near completion

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Contributing Writer

Syracuse University is putting the finishing touches on a $4.5 million endeavor to transform Link Hall’s fourth floor into a laboratory center.

The construction of new lab facilities for the P.C. Smith College of Engineering and Computer Science shows the university’s recognition of the department’s importance, said Patricia Switzer, the project’s financial advisor and design consultant.

“This was a very large project. I couldn’t tell you how many miles of duct work and piping there are up there,” Switzer said.

The top floor of Link was completely gutted and reconstructed, clearing 20,000 square feet of environmental laboratory space. The renovated space includes a large teaching lab, several wet labs and a computer cluster. The interior corridor, which used to lead to a hall of offices and large classrooms, will now be walled with glass, said Put Watson, director of development for the college.

This should give the new labs the benefit of natural light, as well as a great view of the campus, she added.

The construction, which has taken nearly a year to complete, did not go unnoticed.

“The noise made by the construction really disrupted class discussions,” said Michael Bosco, a sophomore advertising major who has a history class in Link Hall this semester. “I hope the investment was worthwhile.”

While the initial construction is complete, the labs still need work, Switzer said. When completed, the labs will be maintained at a certifiable level of cleanliness, in order to give experiments a high level of purity, she added.

The chemical engineering department will share the added space with the department of civil and environmental engineering, said Shehba Bhatia, environmental engineering department chairwoman.

The project, funded entirely by the university, will attract more engineering students, Watson said.

There are plans for using the advanced facilities to help clean up Onondaga Lake, with the help of Honeywell Allied, a high-tech engineering company based in New Jersey, Watson said.

SU will look to alumni and other sources for campaign funds to help cover the cost of construction and future lab projects, she said.

POLICE REPORTS

Dome vendors accept counterfeit money

Staff Reports

An unidentified man used $140 in counterfeit money to purchase goods during Monday evening’s basketball game against Seton Hall University at the Carrier Dome, according to a police report.

The suspect used a counterfeit $50 bill at the ticket booth at about 7:30 p.m., the report said. Carrier Dome employee Rachael Cleave, who accepted the bill, refused to comment on the situation.

Later that evening, the man used another $20 bill and a $100 bill at two separate beer stands, the report said.

Alan Weinberger, manager of Carrier Dome ticketing services, told police that Syracuse University had experienced several other forgery incidents in the past, but had not reported any incidents to the police department.

Police recovered the bills, which were confirmed counterfeit because of their abnormal look and feel, the report said.

Weinberger refused to comment on the situation.

MOORE

“Eric had taken the time to read that briefing or ask about the basic details of the case I don’t think he would have made these comments,” Moore said. “I clearly have filed formal grievances and appeals. It would be clear to anyone that the process of administrative remedies has broken down completely in the face of an abuse of power.”

Roser refused to post Moore’s message because the gradlist is not for those kinds of messages, said Roser, a graduate student in physics.

“Gradlist was not set up to allow one member of the graduate student community to semaphore information to an subscribers in a one-sided way,” Roser said. “He would have told his story with his allegations to be presented to the students he could have talked to the GSO. Gradlist was not the appropriate forum for that message.”

Moore, an international relations and social science graduate student, refused to eat and organized a two-day sit-in at the office of Student Government Association and Public Affairs dean’s office on Feb. 1. Moore began the protest after accusing geography professor John Rennie Short of exploiting his work for a book. In his book, “Globalization and The City,” Moore wrote the book last winter with Yeon-Hyun Kim, a doctoral student in geography at the time.

Both Short and Kim denied Moore’s allegations.

Moore is demanding that the university upgrade his transcript, refund his money for the class and receive his rights in regard to plagiarism. Moore said he is considering beginning another hunger strike and vigil next week depending on how much formal correspondence he receives from the dean’s office.

Moore will meet with Diane Murphy, chairwoman of the University Senate committee on academic freedom, tenure and professional ethics, Wednesday morning to find out how he can file a complaint through USen. Moore is meeting with Murphy because the dean’s office has no policy on plagiarism, he said.

Roser said he does not know how soon he can file his complaint, but that he does not want to “out itself if case does not progress through USen.”

Moore said his worst nightmare and probably the worst nightmare of his university, he said, “I think a lot of people, especially students, are going to wonder why they’re going here, wonder why the university would trample on their rights and steal their labor.”

Moore said he is optimistic about USen because it should provide a more level playing field than the other channels he has tried.

Hunn, a law and public administration graduate student, noted a connection between the way Moore conducted his protest and the way he conducted his GSO presidency.

“He came into office and basically used it as a platform to get his political agenda across,” Hunn said. “When he has a problem, he can go do a thing, he doesn’t say one thing, just give me the keys and that’s it.”

Hunn said Moore’s administration helped build trust within GSO by not fighting like the previous administration. Roser added.

“Mistakes were made at that time in terms of things that were done that perhaps shouldn’t have been done,” he said. “When the president and vice president had served, mistakes were the fault of GSO senators and members of the body. I don’t think Zac can be held liable for the mistakes his predecessors might have made.”

To earn a million dollar bill such as this one working at the Syracuse University Literacy Corp.’s $8/Hour Pay Rate you would only have to work 125,000 hours. That is pretty good compared to the 190,476 hours you would have to work at the average work study job. Besides, working for the Syracuse University Literacy Corp. allows you to do something good for yourself and the community. The position involves helping children learn to read and being a part of an exciting new literacy initiative in Onondaga County. In addition to being serious about literacy and having experience working with children, you must also have the following availability to apply:

Lipton said the group’s protest plans did not bother him.

Insurance incentives
The Department of Health and Human Services has proposed a $421.2 billion budget to help extend medical coverage for 44 million people who are uninsured. It would increase efforts to sign up children who are eligible for Medicaid and, for the first time, offer states incentives to insure those children's parents. The administration also wants to devote an additional $2 billion to help low-income parents afford childcare.

Enviro-dollars
The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) is seeking its largest funds increase since President Clinton took office. It would include an 11 percent spending hike to improve air and water quality, mitigate global warming, produce healthy foods and enhance public access to environmental data. Also included is a new $50 million program to improve the waters of the Great Lakes and a $46 million increase in efforts to help states clean up other waterways.

MTV wants SU students for ‘Break’

They’re back!

MTV, which I’ve come to love almost every other week, returns Thursday in the form of their annual spring break special. It’s a chance for students to have some fun and enjoy the sun after weeks of studying and work.

MTV typically showcases the rowdy side of college life on spring break in some beautiful southern beach resort. It’s a week of wet and wild adventures, soaked with alcohol and sprinkled with sex.

Between 1 and 4 p.m. Thursday in the lobby of Goldstein Auditorium at Schine Student Center and 11 p.m. and 1 a.m. at Harry’s Bar, 700 S. Crouse Ave., willing contestants will be able to register for their shots at being the subject of this year’s “Spring Break.”

Anyone willing to have his or her lives taped and act like a fool for the cameras during the Spring Break ’98 festivities. “MTV has a good relationship with SU,” said C.J. Strock, University Union Concert Board director.

Strock has worked closely with MTV in the past, helping to bring the Campus Invasion Tours to SU. He jumped at the chance to have them return again.

“They’re real cool with us, and they’re nice that they’re coming back to involve us in their programming,” he said.

Day trippers

So who’s down with having MTV spend each waking moment of break with a camera up their ass? There seems to be a number of varying opinions of the idea.

Joe Schildhorn, a sophomore communications design major, still has no plans for Spring Break, but he said he would surely not miss an opportunity like this.

“I’d go down and just check out the people that are going to show up. You know they’re going to be real whacked out people,” he said.

Then you’ve got others, like Brooke Gambi, who isn’t going anywhere near the auditions.

“Not me,” said the sophomore political science major who is headed to Cancun in March. “I’d be too intimidated to have them follow me around. Plus, they probably have his or her lives taped with MTV you’re only going to get the best of everything — and hey, it’s a shot at being a celebrity.”

But some students, like junior photography major Nick Putignano, are going to sit back and enjoy watching the process.

“I’d go down and just check out the people that are going to show up. You know they’re going to be real whacked out people,” he said.

If you’re up for the challenge, you’d better get prepared between now and Thursday afternoon. Come up with a routine that’ll make you a definite pick. Do something different — wear a bathing suit in the freezing temperature.

“If it’s the same this year as it always is, why not?” said Sarasota, Fla.-bound Lauren Musso, a freshman political science major.

“Usually it’s just a bunch of people taking off their clothes the whole time. So, yeah, I may go down.”

Pete Beisser is a sophomore magazine and political science major. E-mail him at pbeisser@syr.edu.

Are you a top caliber student, who is interested in pursuing a career where you will manage a business, lead others and have tremendous opportunity for future growth? Have you considered a career as a Retail Executive with one of the nation’s premier retailers?

were not properly trained for life abroad and had to "umble" their way through the initial adjustment stages.

Culture saturation

The qualities that initially characterized the program 40 years ago continue to separate it from other study abroad programs. "Its size has grown but the motivating principles remain the same," said Gary Radke, a fine arts professor who attended the Florence center in the early 1970s.

Radke returned to the Florence center to teach art history in the mid-1980s. Adams encouraged the Florence program to offer undergraduates with little or no foreign language experience a chance to study in a foreign country. To better acquaint the students with the Italian language outside of their American-run center, each student stayed with two different host families per semester, to custom the student to different Italian lifestyles.

"The students had the best of both worlds," he said.

Radke said when he arrived in Florence, he had only one semester of Italian under his belt. But, the outgoing nature of Italians — whether it was the natives trying to strike up conversations with him on the train, hotel maids initiating small talk or his host family talking to him constantly — forced him to learn the language.

"I had no idea what they were saying," he said. But by mid-semester, he was finally beginning to grasp the language.

Having students live with host families instead of every student living together in a dormitory setting is unique, he added. Abroad programs like Georgetown, and Stanford universities, for example, house their students together in villas.

"But that is not the way to experience a foreign country," he said.

Katey Hansen, a junior international relations major, said she took a few Italian classes at SU and initially struggled to hold a conversation with native Florence. And although she is not fluent in the language, after the first few weeks, she picked up enough to hold her own in restaurants. She stays with her host family, where only the 30-year-old daughter spoke English, helped her become immersed in Italian culture.

By attending an American university in Florence, Hansen was also able to meet a diverse group of people because many of the students were from other American universities besides SU. Most of her classes were taught by local professors who spoke and taught English, except for her Italian class where English was not spoken.

But when Radke returned to teaching, students were staying with only one host family per semester. Although he said staying with the same host family gives the student a sense of stability in a foreign country, they should not be exposed to only one way of living.

"Smaller universities, he added, are also more likely to send their professors abroad to teach instead of hiring Florentine professors. Professors from the American host college are sometimes barely aware of what is going on in Italy. At the SU Florence program, local professors mingle with SU professors who have an in-depth knowledge of Italy.

But many students don't really have the chance to learn about Italian culture in depth. A recent trend among students in Florence, and other overseas programs, over the last few decades is exploring Europe instead of spending the majority of the semester in Florence, he added.

"When I went, I was not allowed to leave Italy," he said. "I had a friend that skied over the Alps to France. I thought, 'Oh my god, he went over to the other side.'"

He said he discourages students from traveling too much outside of Italy on the weekends and instead should wait for a long break or extended period to truly experience another country. By not spending enough time in Florence, students are not truly becoming immersed in its culture.

"People lose something by gaining something else," he said.

Contrasting programs

The Florence program may have been the first American abroad program with a campus in a foreign country, but it was not Syracuse University's first shot at sending students abroad to study. Efforts to send graduate students to China in 1922 and 1947 were thwarted by World War II and the turn of the country to communism. Other short-lived programs in Asia and Mexico placed students as volunteers in foreign national organizations.

Graduate summer programs were also run from 1962 to the 1980s in Paris, Japan and Sweden. As the Florence program muddled its way through its first years and expanded, other abroad programs were modeled on the SU program. SU's London Center opened in 1973. Harvard, University of California Berkeley and Stanford opened in 1990 and Hong Kong in 1996. DIPA also offers an array of summer programs and direct placement programs in Europe and Asia.

After spending time at SU's Florence program as a graduate student in the late 1960s, Fred Frohock, an SU political science professor, helped get the ball rolling for a SU center in Madrid.

Two years later, in 1974, SU opened a center for French, business and government in Strasbourg, France.

With the various programs available to students, Shank urges students to take advantage of SU's abroad opportunities.

"Nobody should graduate without seeing another culture and experiencing it first hand."

Syracuse tracksters win 11 events at Manley

BY JOSH LUKIN
Staff writer

The SU track teams made use of their home field house advantage this past weekend as the squads claimed 11 first place finishes at the Syracuse Invitational.

Ten different Orangemen and women took home titles from the competition held inside Manley Field House last Saturday.

The victories encompassed all facets of track and field, with success in sprints, distance, throwing and jumping events.

In the men's competitions, freshman phenom Joel Carusone took home the pole vault title, catapulting an experienced group of vaulters who forced the first-year star into a lengthy competition.

The pole vault became a showcase as the day wore on, with the final rounds taking place as the day wore on, with the final rounds taking place.

Following Dyer in the 55m hurdles was Barfield, who placed third and fifth respectively.

In addition to the strenuous of Manley, Syracuse's athletes claimed victory in several jumping competitions. The Orange teetered to victory in the men's and women's long jump and in the men's high jump, as junior Mark Gannon garnered his first win on the year.

Senior standout Veronica Dyer failed to disappoint as she entered the day favored to score big for SU. In addition to the long jump crown, Dyer claimed victory for the ECAC tournament in both events.

Following Dyer in the 55m hurdles was Barfield, who placed third and fifth respectively.

Inside the confines of Manley, SU runners dominated the short races as well. Junior Opal Jones won the 50-meter hurdles with a time of 8.19, low enough to qualify her for the ECAC championships. Senior Michelle LaPointe rounded out the women's winning performance with a 15.49-meter run. LaPointe will be running that race once again this weekend, as she will take the trip to Nebraska to compete for the Orange.

In the men's events, graduate student Ace Brown put up an overall strong performance, as he qualified for the ECAC championships in the 200-meter and 55-meter dash.

His 21.70 time in the 200-meter was his fastest of the season and was also good enough to take first place.

Along with Dyer, Woodley was competing in the 60-meter hurdles this weekend in Lincoln. His time was regarded as one of the top in the nation and is No. 1 on the Big East list, according to the SU Track and Field news.

"This definitely is an excellent opportunity for him to earn a spot at the National meet and prepare for the [Olympic] trials coming in the spring and summer," coach Teressa DiPema said.

The Orangemen received strong performances in yet another event at the meet as they swept the top two spots in the shot put.

Dyer will be one of five Syracuse seniors competing in the shot put.

"I love to compete," Dyer said. "I don't like the feel of losing or the walk off the track. It hurts mentally and physically. That's why we train so hard," Dyer said.

"I've got to get that confidence back, we're really struggling," James said. We've got to get that confidence back, we're really struggling," James said. "We've got nine players that can hurt us both mentally and physically. We've got to get that confidence back and lose again. But we should be all right if we play well.

James epitomizes the Orange women, who have struggled this season, but turned in a 15-point performance against Rutgers this past Saturday. She must work on relaxing and contributing to the game in other ways, Freeman said.

An Orangewomen who has been in and out of confidence recently is Ervin, who broke the conference plate in the 110-meter hurdles. She must work on relaxing and contributing to the game in other ways, Freeman said.

"I would love to see us turn around and have a couple of wins of the rest of the games," Ervin said. "If we play hard, maybe we can say we lost. But a lot of games we lost, and I don't feel like we played our best. We give it all we have, that's a great accomplishment."

AOU goes out like a lamb with a first-round loss, a la last season, the underdogging label will be slapped on quicker than you can say Danny Ferry.
Like the misnomer of the Orangemen comes to the forefront and SU goes deep into the insanity that is March Madness, Monday’s loss will be — not totally forgotten — seen as a mere pebble on the road to greatness.
Every national champ for the past 25 seasons saw its record tarnished with at least one defeat. All the first-place finishers since the 1975-76 Indiana Hoosiers have felt the disappointment of losing a game or being upset by a team that doesn’t necessarily belong in the same court.

College basketball seasons are long affairs. They stretch from early February until — for the lucky few — early April. The opening round is an equivalent of beating your head against a wall to hope that your favorite team will grace through its schedule with many a scratch. But the team that today that includes the point arc and the player of talent, the old adage of “on any given night any team can beat you” is more truthful than ever. Syracuse’s given night came Monday.

The slogging that had been white hot cooled to icy. The win at West Virginia solid through the first 19 games, followed by the biggest win in almost a decade. But the Orangemen comes to the forefront and SU goes deep into the insanity that is March Madness, Monday’s loss will be — not totally forgotten — seen as a mere pebble on the road to greatness.

Loss brings reality to SU

Stop crying in your beers, Syracuse basketball fans, and wake up to reality.

The Seton Hall loss was about as destructive to the Orangemen's season as a cool spring breeze is to a brick wall. Sure, new SU can't brag about its elite status as the proud owner of the sole unblemished record in Division I. And visions of a place among the undefeated giants of NCAA history no longer beckon.

What Syracuse still maintains is its very real status as one of the six or seven teams with an extremely legitimate shot at a trip to the Final Four and a spot in the national championship game.

And let's be honest — people remember the games that happen before March like they remember their Science for the 21st Century notes the day after the final.

The 1999 Orangemen could have set all the regular-season records they wanted and drawn comparisons to the 1986-87 national runner-up team until their cows came home. But this team's legacy will come from its performance in the third month of the new season.

Point guard was the featured position during the 1998-1999 college basketball season. Floor generals such as Scoinnie Penn, Mateen Cleaves and Khalid El-Amin put up big numbers and led their teams to successful seasons.

This year, though, it's the big men who are grabbing the attention. It seems like the blocked shot is a bigger factor than it has been for several seasons.

Here's a look at some of the centers who are making a big impact:

Loren Woods (Arizona) — Woods tied the NCAA record for blocked shots in a game when he swatted away 14 Oregon shots Feb. 3. He's the Wildcats' leading scorer at 16.2 points a game.

Ken Johnson (Ohio State) — Despite not playing organized basketball until high school, Johnson has developed into a starting Big Ten center — and a good one. Johnson leads the nation in blocked shots (5.4 bpg) but lacks diversity in his offensive game.

Kenyon Martin (Cincinnati) — Martin has...
Professor contests accusations

Former music law TAs question harassment charges against Flemma

BY TIFFANY LANKES
Asst. News Editor

Former music industry professor Jay Flemma appealed his case to Syracuse University at the close of the 1999 Fall Semester in response to harassment complaints filed against him with the Office of Judicial Affairs and the Syracuse Police Department.

An SU senior had been receiving unwanted e-mails and phone calls from Flemma since October, according to a police report. A complaint concerning the incidents was reported to Judicial Affairs at the end of the fall semester, Flemma said.

"I have been informed that Judicial Affairs removed Flemma, who is a lawyer for music companies, from his position Jan. 13 after several students from his class filed complaints of sexual harassment. They notified him of his dismissal in a one paragraph letter, Flemma said.

His appeal to Judicial Affairs asks them to reconsider his position, he said.

"I have been informed that they have accepted my appeal and it is valid and running," Flemma said. "They left the hammer in the window of the jeep."

The senior filed a harassment complaint Tuesday with the Police Department because Flemma repeatedly stopped by her place of employment looking for her. Flemma formerly was an adjunct professor that instructed a weekly music law class of about 60 students during fall semester.

Flemma said that he had not been aware that the senior was filing a report against him with the Police Department.

He went to the senior's place of employment because he was looking for the building's resources for his appeal, she added.

"I was there on legitimate business," he said. "Also to bring the lady up on charges for filing a false complaint."

Flemma appealed to Judicial Affairs in an effort to clear his credibility as a professor and what he said are false accusations against him, he said.

"I've been at the university too long to let anything go by without fair process," he said. "I love Syracuse and I love teaching. My appeal is in and I want this to be done fairly and by the rules."

In the senior's 14-page complaint to Judicial Affairs, she listed one of Flemma's former teaching assistants'

Many misconceptions of African culture exist outside the continent, one of them being the perceived frivolity of African myths, said Nigerian newspaper director Ben Obumselu Wednesday night.

Obumselu, the director of the Post-Express Newspapers in Lagos, Nigeria, described a superstition in his village that provides an amethist stone for snakebite. The story was part of a lecture hosted by the African Student Union in Bird Library.

The snakebite cure is based on the belief that the stone follows the victim home after it bites. When the snake arrives at the home of its victim, it hides under the rock.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Steve Forbes abruptly quit the presidential race Wednesday after supporters questioned his capability to build a winning ticket, according to a new report. Forbes, a billionaire and former governor of New York, is the third candidate to announce his withdrawal from the race.

Los Angeles, May 16 (AP) — Forbes, an independent candidate running as a libertarian, said he was withdrawing from the race because he believes he cannot win the nomination. Forbes was one of the last candidates remaining in the race, along with John McCain and Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

The decision was announced following a meeting with Republican Party leaders in Washington, D.C. Forbes said he decided to withdraw after receiving assurances that he would not be a viable candidate in November.

The move comes as the party is trying to narrow its field of candidates, with Mitt Romney and Newt Gingrich leading the race.

The withdrawal of Forbes leaves McCain and Gingrich as the top candidates for the nomination. The two are expected to face off in the Republican primary in the coming weeks.

Forbes, who is running as a libertarian, has been critical of the Republican Party's approach to the economy and has called for a balanced budget and lower taxes.

In making the decision, Forbes said he had been advised by his campaign advisors that he could not win the nomination without the support of the party establishment.

The move is likely to add pressure on the other candidates to secure the nomination, as they face increasing scrutiny from the media and the public.

Forbes has been a leading critic of the Republican Party's economic policies, and has called for a balanced budget and lower taxes. He has also advocated for term limits for members of Congress.

Clinton addresses education

BY MAGIN MCKENNA
Staff Writer

First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton called politics the art of making difficult choices. Wednesday seemed impossible to her as she visited Syracuse University.

Before Clinton spoke in Goldstein Auditorium, Bragman, a 1963 Syracuse University graduate, addressed the issue of political correctness in public careers. He said he chose to run for the Senate seat because he is from the Syracuse area and has been successful with the state Democratic party.

The College Democrats, the SU Office of Student Affairs, Public Safety and other departments, worked together to organize Clinton's visit. While the exact cost of the event has yet to be determined, it is about $10,000, Morrow said. SU absorbed all of the event's costs, with the exception of a $1,000 fee for the rental of Goldstein Auditorium.

The College Democrats paid the fee with private funds, Hinchey said.

Everything went according to plan, Hinchey said. "We have more to do for your life and my daughter's life to set the tone for what we do as a nation."

Audiences also viewed the speech via-satellite in the Schine Underground and Hendricks Chapel. Clinton made brief visits to both the Underground and Hendricks to speak with audience members following the speech.

"I very much echo the importance of youth involvement in politics," Clinton said. "It is the price we pay for progress in a democratic nation."

Bragman reaped the rewards of his endorsement by Clinton. "It's certainly an historical event whenever a First Lady comes to the university," he said. "Especially when she is a winner this November," Bragman said. "There is no better place for her to be.

Bragman, a 1963 Syracuse University graduate, addressed his political expertise and drive for success. "Hillary Clinton has the experience, vision and drive to be a winner this November," Bragman said. "There is no better place for her to be."

Bragman was an obvious choice to present Clinton to the SU community because he is from the Syracuse area and has been successful with the state Democratic party, said SU College Democrats President Christina Hendricks.

"The Bragmans are close friends of ours," Tytler said. "They worked closely together to coordinate the event.

Bragman's office organized the dinner event to endorse Clinton as New York state's Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate seat.

"The Bragmans are close friends of ours," Tytler said. "They cannot attack her ideas and abilities. She knows more about Upstate than her opponent. She's not been living in a vacuum for the past eight years."

Clinton will continue her campaign in Albany today, Hinchey said.

Bragman endorses Clinton, aids in campaign

New York state Assembly Majority Leader Michael Bragman delivered a speech Wednesday advocating his support for first Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton's senatorial campaign.

Bragman is an obvious choice to present Clinton to the SU community because he is from the Syracuse area and has been successful with the state Democratic party, said SU College Democrats President Christina Hendricks, a senior political science and policy studies major.

"I think you could describe Rep. Bragman as Clinton's most important supporter in this area," Weiller said. "Throughout all this time, he has been in regular contact with her, regarding the campaign. He was a natural at introducing her."

The SU Office of Government and Community Relations selected Bragman to give the introduction because of his close political and personal ties with Clinton, said Kevin Morrow, an SU spokesman.

"The office maintains a regular dialogue with Rep. Bragman," Morrow said. "They worked closely together to coordinate the event."

First Lady dismisses anti-religion allegations

BY KEVIN TAMPONE

U.S. Senate candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton accused New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani of false personal attacks Wednesday afternoon during her speech in Syracuse University's Goldstein Auditorium.

"I want to talk about the issues New Yorkers want to talk about," Clinton said in an audience of about 1,500. "I want to run a campaign based on issues." Hamburg, a Democrat, officially announced her candidacy Sunday at State University of New York at Purchase for New York state's U.S. Senate seat in the November 2000 elections. Clinton's likely Republican rival, has not officially announced her candidacy.

Clinton's accusations of personal attacks are a response to a fundraising letter Giuliani sent to potential conservative donors in October. The letter accuses Clinton of having anti-religious views.

"There's no place in a campaign for statements like that," Clinton said. "I ask all New Yorkers to take a stand against that."

The letter described Clinton's criticism of Giuliani's withdrawal of subsidies for the Brooklyn Museum of Art because of an exhibit he found unacceptable. The letter contained a painting that depicted the death of Jesus.

Fraternity discusses race, shows documentary

BY JOY DAVIA

An Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity film presentation and discussion Wednesday night explored how society's stereotypes portrayals of blacks are embedded in images of their past.

From the image of the Sambo, to the plantation, to that of the brute, preying on innocent virgins, such portrayals still exist in subtle forms, according to the film.

"No matter how far I climb up the corporate ladder, I'll always be a Sambo or a coon," said Michael Julius Idani, the fraternity's philanthropy chairman and former president of the Student Government Association.

About 30 students and faculty members in the Hall of Languages discussed how images of the past continue to exist. They then watched Marlon Riggs' documentary describing the country's deep-rooted stereotypes, "Ethnic Entities."

Beginning in the late 1820s, the jovial Sambo image emerged to dispel the notion that slaves were unhappy in their oppressive state.

Other images also emerged to support this theory, including that of "Mammie," the protector of the plantation who would do anything for her masters.

Void of any sexual allure, Mammie also served as the controlling force in her own family. This portrayal of a black woman as domineering and ugly contrasted that of the dependent and sexual white woman.

Minstrel shows emerged in the early 1840s, with Thomas Dartmouth Rice's exaggerated imitation of a crippled black man. Wilcoxon, later called "Jim Crow.

White men with black corked faces, enlarging their lips and wearing white gloves. Although one of the most famous black minstrels, Bert Williams, earned a lot of money, he still could not walk into the local pub and order a drink without facing harassment.

"It's not a disgrace being a black man, but its terribly inconvenient," said an actor in the documentary imitating Williams.

When the civil rights movement and affirmative action years later, these images began to change. It became advantageous for the white dominated society to portray blacks negatively because whites could not support their own freedom.

Blacks were portrayed, especially in movies, as a menace because they were no longer under the control of their masters.

One image that emerged from blacks challenging the white labor force was the gambling black or "coon." Blacks were also portrayed as "pickaninnys" — animal-like, unkempt creatures. These images were predominant in cartoons and children's books.

These images still exist, but in an altered form, the film expressed. Current versions of the images include the black cop, who is more likely to engage in violence than their white partner and Aunt Jemima, a character spin-off of the "Mammy" image.

Moving forward

In a discussion that followed the film, graduate student Alberto Dominguez said most television shows do not feature many black characters.

Those that do are usually featured in comedies — reinforcing the Sambo image that blacks are characters to laugh at, students said.

Idani said he remembered watching Amos 'N Andy as a youth and laughing at the characters on the show. Only when the show attempted a return to the television screen in the 1980s did an older Idani realize it was racist.

"I was laughing with the characters, but (whites) were laughing at them," he said. "Even in movies like Soul Food and Love Jones that presented blacks in a positive manner were released, other movies come along to tear apart that persona, like the newly released movie Next Friday," Idani said.

One show that did portray blacks in a serious and dramatic role was the "Cosby Show." But it is argued that the Cosby show did not portray the typical black family, with the father as a doctor, the mother as a lawyer and children who avoided troubles. With these attitudes, Idani argued that negative and positive portrayals of blacks on television and in movies do not accurately represent them.

"We are sensitive to racism," she said. "We live it everyday." Idani then encouraged blacks to be proactive, rectifying unfavorable images when expressed by peers.

Others in the audience said they felt obligated to present themselves in a way that will enhance blacks' images of blacks. Often they said they find themselves as the token black student employee.

Although some group members said they were discouraged by the film, the film's deep-rooted stereotypes, "Ethnic Entities."

"It was a step forward," he said. "It's up to you to make the next step forward."
Clinton makes up for previous snubs

Hillary Rodham Clinton finally took a trip to the Hill — the Syracuse University Hill. It's about time.

After two snubs on last summer's listening tour, the newly-announced U.S. Senatorial candidate addressed the university community Wednesday in SU's Goldstein Auditorium.

SU boasts Central New York's eighteenth-largest labor force. Combine that with the hefty core of young voters from throughout the state, and a stop on the Hill should be a no-brainer for any political candidate.

Clinton, of course, now, she's cashing in on the strength of SU's voting population, which could surely help stuff the ballot boxes in her favor this November.

Calculated campaign move or not, Clinton's choice to hit SU during her preliminary upstate sweep was a natural, and smart, choice.

Critics slapped Clinton with the nasty moniker of "carpetbagger". Indeed, she has traveled a long way from the affluent Chicago suburbs of her youth to economically lagging upstate New York.

But along the way, the first lady made pit stops at the Watergate prosecution counsel table, on the boards of countless public service-minded organizations and in the halls of the lady pulpit on the Senate floor, where she pushed hard for health care and educational reforms.

Her experience alone makes her a viable choice for New Yorkers in the voting booth, regardless of where she called home before Chappaqua. However, she has only nine more months to make her mark in the Empire State.

Her slick campaign tour thus far, traversing the state to listen to and about its residents, is a well-oiled plan. It sets her a few steps ahead of her Big Apple competitor, New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani.

Clinton's quest for a slot on Capitol Hill won't be a smooth ride. But she's getting used to the state to listen to and learn about its stump.

Critics may say that her choice to hit SU during her preliminary tour, the newly-announced U.S. Senatorial campaign, which could surely help stuff the ballot box.

With the advent of radio and television, black men were depicted as buffoons and criminals. Today, few images are presented showing what black men are really like.

Unfortunately, it is easier for most people who are not black to build their assumptions from media depictions rather than go out and meet the actual people.

These images have influenced the most violent treatment that this country has ever seen. Over the course of the twentieth century, thousands of black men were lynched for false rape allegations by white women.

In the 1960s south, for instance, 14-year-old Emmett Till was murdered for making an innocent comment to white woman. Black men have been repeatedly denied access to opportunities for education and employment. And to this day, black men remain perceived as a "threat" and are the target of sometimes fatal attacks.

Is it a coincidence that African-American men are imitations of white counterparts? I think not.

Black men are not the only victims of harmful stereotypes. Black women are perceived as stereotypical strength. This is a fact that a number of black women are uncomfortable by the popular eurocentric beauty standard.

Throughout history black women have been presented as animalistic, violent and savages. Often, they were shown as subhuman beings praying for the fragile white woman. With the advent of radio and television, black women were depicted as buffoons and criminals.

Today, few images are presented showing what black women are really like.

Unfortunately, it is easier for most people who are not black to build their assumptions from media depictions rather than go out and meet the actual people.

These images of black women has led mainstream society to ignore the concerns of black women. Perhaps, they tend to be depicted as superhuman creatures. Black women have used this portrayal to withstand any personal tragedy and emerge totally prepared to face the demands of life. Medical research on diseases such as heart disease, that kill more black women than any other group are now addressing that black women should play a more integral role in this research.

The role of black women as emotional towers of strength has made black women shy away from the needed counseling and psychiatric help they desperately need. While young girls of all ethnicities doubt their normal young black girls deal with these worries even more frequently. Despite statistics showing that young black girls feel the most comfortable with themselves and their bodies in comparison to other racial groups, they are often taught that to show weakness makes them a target. I doubt these surveys look that far into consideration.

The hurtful aspect of these distinctions is that they are accepted as fact across the board. There is no room for individuality. I have seen that there is an issue with these perceptions here at Syracuse University. People assume that certain groups dress and act in similar ways. Some whites have given "ghetto" parties where they have all dressed in clothes commonly worn by those who are into hip-hop music. The party attendees adopt a way of speech and attitudes commonly heard in black circles but not characteristic of all black people.

Give me one chance to see the truth behind these stereotypes. If you really want to know about African Americans, the education that personal interaction and books provide a much more valuable insight than the media's misrepresentations.

Don't believe the hype.

Media perpetuates black stereotypes, violence

Many of us received messages about African-Americans. In fact, many people have told me about African-Americans beyond the information we see in the media. This not only limits a person's abilities, but it also is often dangerous. The media has no incentive to present information that's less positive — images of African-Americans. This is nothing new, but the inaccuracies are having a greater impact on the lives of black people.

State teachers who are not qualified to maintain a classroom should be removed from the school system, Clinton said. Teachers must be tested for qualification skills and evaluated by their peers, she added.

"We need to remove from the classroom anyone who is not making the grade and not turn to gimmicky-like school vouchers," Clinton said. "We have tried vouchers and seen when we expect less of them than they do in front of the chalkboard, Clinton said. She proposed sending these students to alternative schools where they can get the help they need without disrupting their classmates' studies.

Clinton is a proponent of charter schools, however, and recognized their potential to better public education. "If they're properly done, then run with them," Clinton said. "I'm for choice in public schools."

Charter schools, legalized in the state last year, are privately-funded institutions that receive public funding. They often offer a specialized educational focus not taught in public schools.

Recruiting teachers Clinton proposed a program to provide annual scholarships to 50,000 college students if they commit to teaching. "There is a serious problem of teachers who are teaching in small towns," she said. "And you have a lot of students who are going to college."

People with interests in becoming educators are often not aware of available job opportunities in the field, she said.

A more serious threat to public education is the loss of qualified teachers to retirement or higher paying jobs, Clinton said. New York City alone could lose 70 percent of its teachers to retirement next year, she added.

"I've met a lot of teachers who say they don't get enough respect to stay in a classroom," Clinton said. "No teacher should be afraid of their students."

More often than not, public educators spend more time disciplining insubordinate children than they do in front of the chalkboard, Clinton said. She proposed sending these students to alternative schools where they can get the help they need without disrupting their classmates' studies.

"It was very strong against false accusations. I had never seen such an intense example of a lie." It's bullshit," said Thomas Kelleher, a former co-counsel of Flemming. A former co-counsel of Flemming's said that the case was based more on pressure from the family of the victim than on fact, he added.

"They didn't know what to do, so they released him," Rocklin said. "The victim's complaint contained many fabricated incidents, Rocklin said. "There's a lot of ulterior motives behind what she did," Rocklin said. "She didn't have to take the final. She didn't have to do the final exam. She saw a way to get around him. Flemming's relaxed teaching style with friends and family showed that even more students may have discouraged the sexual abuse by trusting his teaching abilities, he added.

Students were frequently invited to local restaurants to cover material that had not been discussed in class, Rocklin said. "I've been in schools where the curriculum was literally faked out," Rocklin said. "I've never had a professor talk to me like he could before. He's been my teacher and my mentor."

Flemming's dismissal by Judicial Affairs was not attributed to the sexual harassment charges, but to various other complaints brought against him, Rocklin said. The decision to release him was based more on pressure from the family of the victim than on fact, he added.

"They didn't know what to do, so they released him," Rocklin said. "The victim's complaint contained many fabricated incidents. -"He's really hurt he got pushed out."

John Vacanti, a junior television and film major, also worked as a TA for Flemming's class. While he had heard rumors of Flemming's alleged encounters with female students, Vacanti said he had never been implicated. "I never saw anything that led me to believe female students would be uncomfortable around him," Vacanti said. "No one really knew something was going down."

Clinton shared an experience with the audience about her visit to Buffalo earlier this week. Clinton met a young girl who had once lashed into Clinton's education and future, she said.

"She told me how her life was turned around by an after school program," Clinton said. "It just clicked for her. There was a woman who believed in this girl and it made a big difference.

But the first foundation for strengthening a child's education begins in his or her home, Clinton added. She said that even if her programs were put in place, they would only work if children come to school ready to learn.

Clinton recalled the beginning of her career as an attorney when she worked for the Children's Defense Fund. In the early 1970s, Clinton participated in a study that evaluated enrollment in public schools and investigated why students were not attending class.

"I met children who weren't in school because they were taking on out at the age of ten to help their family make a living," Clinton said. "I met children who were kept out of school because they were disabled. I met children who were so poor that their families could not afford them.

Clinton urged constituents to demand more federal money to be spent on restoring dilapidated schools. Clinton said. "I think it's important that we have more representatives to meet in the United States."

"She didn't touch too strongly on why she decided to make her political leap in New York," Wolkoff said. "She could have explained why she believes that this is the right place for her to start, especially in regards to the "carpetbagger" accusations."

GIULIANI views, said Kim Serafin, a Giuliani spokeswoman.

"The mayor is opposed to using hard-earned tax payer dollars for the desecration of religion," she said.

Serafin said Clinton is now using the letter to unfairly criticize the mayor's fund-raising technique and run a negative campaign. Clinton has no business accusing Giuliani of unethical fund raising, Serafin added.

"She's the one that brought it into politics, not him. He didn't go and put that letter on the front page of a newspaper," she said. "She also has a pretty checkered past as far as fund raising is concerned."

Clinton's fund raising techniques are questionable because she uses the same network as her husband, President Bill Clinton, Serafin said. The Clintons' network had several scandals during the president's 8-year term, including accusations of selling overnight stays in the Lincoln bedroom of the White House, she added.

Republican students at SU agree with Giuliani's views on religion and believe he is the stronger candidate.

Dean Schuler, a member of SU's College Republicans, disagreed with Clinton's candidacy so strongly, he protested her campaign during Clinton's speech at Goldstein.

"Yeah, I was out there with my 'Go away Hillary' sign," he said.

Clinton's entire campaign is only a patch she is using to eventually run for the presidency in 2004, he said.

"I feel that Hillary Clinton is a carpetbagger and she doesn't know what's good for New York state," Schuler said. "She hasn't lived in New York and she doesn't understand what New Yorkers need."

Clinton's home state does not benefit her potential image as a lawmaker, however, said Amy Ferraro, a Democrat and public administration graduate student.

"She's the one that brought them, and she's more than qualified," Ferraro said. "She adequately put out why she's running. She's more than qualified."

While Clinton's approach to solving New York state's problems is not the best one, her campaign does have some value, said Bernard Schulz, a Republican and public administration graduate student.

"I think she brings some really important issues to the table that are really of importance to all New Yorkers, even though I don't personally agree with her stands on them," he said. "The two of them will have some very engag- ing debates."

The suspect smashed the driver's side window and police found the contents of the car, the report said. The dashboard was damaged and a Sony radio/compact disc player was stolen, the report said.

Police estimated the costs of the CD player and vehicle repairs at $1,150, the report said. An unidentified suspect also broke into a car on Livingston Avenue that night, according to a police report.

The car, a 1995 Jeep Cherokee, owned by a junior communications design and visual performing arts major, contained several personal items that were all reported missing, the report said.

"It was the first day I got back to school," the student said. "All of my stuff was still in my car."

The student said she woke up the next morning to find the car's rear driver's side window smashed.

A Sony Discman, a Nintendo GameBoy, a USB Zip drive and a North Face fleece jacket were missing, the report said. The total cost of all missing items is estimated at $1,495, the report said.

Police arrested two Syracuse residents Monday night for breaking a local city ordinance at the Pita Pit on the 100 block of Marshall Street, according to a police report.

Pita Pit workers observed the suspects entering the store with paint ball guns.

"A driver and I were working on Monday night making pizzas," said Chris Anagnostopoulos.

The student said she woke up the next morning to find the car's rear driver's side window smashed.

"We heard a thump. When we realized what it was, we called the police," said Anagnostopoulos.

Police found the suspects seated in a 1997 white Ford Mustang, the report said. In the car were two Vulcan paint ball guns and other paint ball paraphernalia, the report said.

Inspection of the car revealed that one of the guns was loaded with wet paint on the barrel, the report said.

The color of the paint on the gun matched the marks on the Pita Pit, the report said.

Police handcuffed and arrested the suspects. They received tickets for missile violations, the report said.

Anagnostopoulos said there is no permanent damage to the building.

"The two were just horsing around, and they knew it," he said.

The suspect's purse containing an ATM card and identification was stolen, the report said. The purse was recovered by police at an ATM at Sam Dell Dodge on West Genesee Street, the report said.

The suspect destroyed the dashboard and took her JVC tape player, which has not been found, the report said.

Police estimated the costs of car damages at about $200, the report said.

A 1999 Volkswagen Jetta was found broken into at about 5 p.m. Jan. 14 on the 700 block of Walnut Avenue, according to a police report.

A car was towed Saturday night from Thordren Park, according to a police report.

Police observed a black Jeep standing in a snow pile at about 8 p.m., the report said. The car was on snow-covered grass 25 feet off of the street, the report said.

The vehicle had no occupants. The doors were locked, and the car alarm was activated, the report said.

Police issued it a parking ticket and then towed the car, the report said.

the house's thatching, waiting for the family to fall asleep, Obumselu said.

At that moment, the snake pounces and removes a vital lock of hair from the head of the victim, thus breaking the thread of life, Obumselu said.

Because of this superstition, he said, when a snake bites a villager, he does not go directly home. He and his family and friends literally run away.

At a steady pace, the group runs nonstop for eight to nine hours, climbing walls and lumbering through sand to evade the pursuit of the snake. At the end of the trek, the man — half-dead from lack of sleep — finally returns home, Obumselu said.

"This is African superstition at its glorious best," he said. "Does it work? Yes. If you are bitten by a snake, you should try it."

After laugher from the audience, he went on to explain how this superstition is not totally imaginary.

The venom from some snakes near his village contains poisons that require victims to maintain a high level of activity for eight to nine hours to gradually work the poison out of the body.

"In a great many things, what we call myth is really a shadow of some sort of truth," Obumselu said.

Many of the 40 audience members were required to attend the lecture as part of an WRT 205 class requirement.

"The lecture was really interesting, except some parts I didn't really follow," said Becky Collins, a freshman speech communications major and WRT 205 student. "It was a little unstructured. He had a lot of good things to say, it just took a while to get going."

After the lecture, Obumselu invited audience members to ask questions and share their own experiences.

Jennifer Biribwamugumu, an area resident who hopes to study at Syracuse University, said a myth in her home village in Africa does not allow women to eat chicken or fish, for fear they will grow beards.

"I think it is so the men may eat all of the chicken or fish. It's smart," she said. "But I have eaten chicken and fish and I have not grown a beard."

She continued to tell of her first experience with the U.S. tradition of Groundhog Day.

"When I first came to this country, I thought they had no myths," Biribwamugumu said.

Then a few days ago, I hear of this hog that comes out of the ground and says we will have six more weeks of winter.

"It is like a nightmare for me," she added. "I look out the window and I see it is still snowing and the hog has said we still have six more weeks of winter."
oral sex presents HIV transmission risks

The shades are drawn, the candles are lit — the atmosphere is warm with desire and anticipation. He wants to go all the way and persist that he's perfectly clean, claiming there isn't a notch on his bodysuit denoting a promiscuous past. She abstains for a moment, looking sternly through her boyish charm, and replies with a no.

But she's not entirely prudish. She has experience down-under and her skills are unmatched. He concedes and she proceeds. Though it may seem like a safe alternative to pregnancy and sexually-transmitted disease worries that accompany sexual intercourse, oral sex is not entirely safe. In fact, a report by the Centers for Disease Control claims that the fastest growing segment of the HIV population has contracted it through oral sex.

Although the study was composed of gay males, the results can be applied to heterosexuals as well, said Dr. Frederick Hecht of the University of San Francisco.

"The main message is that while oral sex is safer than anal or vaginal sex without a condom, it is not risk-free," he said.

Depriving oneself of sleep has many detrimental effects including irritability, memory loss, depression, a weakened immune system, loss of libido, and becoming hyper-emotional, Maurer said.

When sleeping, the body performs essential maintenance. It rejuvenates organs, replaces cells and organizes thoughts. Good sleep should be a part of a healthy lifestyle, as a good diet and exercise are, according to the Better Sleep Council.

"With eight hours of sleep, people function much better," Maurer said.

SU students struggle with the perils of sleep deprivation

Drinking dizziness

Even social drinking can sometimes cause healthy people to faint not due to drunkenness, but due to the way alcohol impairs the body's ability to tighten blood vessels. Standing briefly cuts blood flow to the brain, which can be why some people feel dizzy or lightheaded if they stand too quickly. Normally, blood vessels adjust by narrowing or constricting to keep blood pressure steady and prevent fainting. But alcohol relaxes blood vessel walls, diminishing the ability of drinkers to adjust easily to the blood-pressure effects of standing after being seated. This change occurs even at mild intoxication levels.

Dr. Fredrick Hecht of the University of San Francisco said that sometimes affects her mood.

"I get a little cranky," McGivney said.

Sleep Foundation indicated that 40 percent of adults report that daytime sleepiness affects their daily routine.

"I'm always tired," said Erin McGivney, a senior advertising major. She admitted getting to bed at 2 a.m. during the week and much later on the weekends. This lack of sleep sometimes affects her mood.

"I get a little cranky," McGivney said.

A student sits in his 2:30 p.m. lecture. The professor's monotonous voice is like a lullaby guiding him to slumber. His head drops slightly and the sandman pulls his eyelids down like window shades.

This scene shows an overworked, exhausted student — a familiar sight on any college campus. With early classes, loads of homework and active social lives, college students are prime candidates for sleep deprivation.

"College students like to burn the candle at both ends," said Tom Maurer, supervisor of the Sleep Services Department at Crouse Hospital. "They stay up late at night and they have class in the morning. College students are definitely sleep deprived."

A 1999 study conducted by the National Sleep Foundation indicated that 40 percent of adults report that daytime sleepiness affects their daily routine.

"I'm always tired," said Erin McGivney, a senior advertising major. She admitted getting to bed at 2 a.m. during the week and much later on the weekends. This lack of sleep sometimes affects her mood.

"I get a little cranky," McGivney said.
Experience a little uncommon courtesy. A lot has been said about how enjoyable it is to buy a new Saturn. Well, just to let you know, things don't change after you become an owner. We still go out of our way to make you happy. Sometimes that means returning your car clean after an oil change. Sometimes it means lending you a hand if you lock yourself out of your car. (Oh, admit it, you've done it before.) But mostly it's just about common courtesy. And when you think about it, that kind of courtesy is far too uncommon.
SLEEP
Most experts recommend between eight and 10 hours of sleep per night. The quality of time allows your body to become reenergized because it goes through a whole sleep cycle. There is even evidence that sleep helps students perform better on tests.

McIntyre recalled an experiment in which 50 students were allowed to sleep seven hours and the other 50 were allowed to sleep as long as they could. The average sleep time for them was nine and a half hours. The students that were allowed to sleep scored six points higher than the group that slept seven hours.

Dangerous dozing
There is a safety hazard that causes many people to deprive themselves of sleep. Sleepy drivers cause thousands of accidents each year, according to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. It’s also harmful to be sleepy on the job. Most industries can’t afford to lose productivity when employees fall asleep at work. Sleepy drivers can be a dangerous weapon.

The Exxon-Valdez spill was believed to have been caused, in part, by reduced consumption of alcohol. But many students don’t realize they’re more tired than they realize and more susceptible to a demanding schedule.

When I’m running on something and I’m extremely busy, there have been times I’ve been edgy and not thinking clearly," said Matt Silke, a senior psychology major. But teas and turn-off nights don’t have to be too norm — insomniacs can easily find relief.

Dozing is a sleep you shouldn’t do. It’s just lie awake. You should get up and do something boring to you," Maurer said.

Corporate neptune
In an increasingly hectic world, more and more people are napping during breaks in the work day, and the workplace is becoming more accommodating to that trend. Aarde Metals, a company in Connecticut, has gone so far as to build a nap room in the corporate headquarters.

“Napping is very good, you can take a nap and feel refreshed," Maurer said. He recommends napping from 70 to 90 minutes at a time, allowing a person to go through an entire sleep cycle and wake out of REM sleep. Experiencing a sleep inhibitor if it is within hours of bedtime. Maurer recommends napping less than two hours before going to sleep.

Coffee also prevents sleep for some. Maurer suggests not falling asleep with coffee after 2 p.m. If one is highly affected by caffeine, then he suggests they don’t consume any, including coffee, tea and soda.

Warning: Awakenings from delta sleep, similar to REM sleep, will cause "sleep drunkenness," Maurer said. A person feels groggy tends to take more time to bounce back to consciousness. Weekends are an especially trying time to get enough sleep. Students often stay up very late and sleep in the following morning.

“If you create a sleep debt at any point you’re going to have to pay that debt back," Maurer said.

Many students choose to sleep in on Saturday and Sunday mornings, but that could be harmful later on when they might suffer from what Maurer calls ‘Blue Monday,’ the term for the sleep deficit catching up. If someone goes to bed late on Saturday night and gets up late on Sunday, he or she will not be rested until late Sunday night — or possibly early Monday morning — which means the person will only get a few hours of sleep the night before and be sleep deprived Monday morning.

The best way to combat sleep deprivation Maurer said, is to have good sleep hygiene. "You should do the same thing every night, go to bed at the same time and use the bedroom only for sleep."

When it comes to sex, they don’t think twice about using something for a blow job," she said.

The tendency to take oral sex lightly in comparison to other sex acts is not uncommon. According to the Journal of College Health, many young people don’t want to interrupt the sexual pleasure of their partner by asking them to use protection during oral sex.

It's almost as explicit as saying ‘I don’t want you to use protection during oral sex lightly in comparison to other sex acts. The odds are not in their favor though, and the risk factors are numerous.

Risky business
According to Columbia University’s Health Education Program, if an HIV-positive man abstains from ejaculating in his partner’s mouth, the risk of transmission is lowered considerably, but bumps, slippery decay fluid may still carry the virus, even in small but deadly amounts.

In one case documented by the American Journal of Public Health, the infected woman had toyed with deep kissing and oral sex without having to a gay partner’s love potion. Later, she found out that he had been infected with HIV and contended that she had taken every precaution that she could think of. Though her instructions were not as protective, the bottom line is that education about the subject in the key factor to combat it.

Although the increase in transmission of HIV through oral sex has been decreasing in recent years, there are a number of precautions and things to keep in mind to make things more enjoyable and relaxing between partners. In fact, one of our considered defenses is an invaluable weapon.

Saliiva plays a key role in blocking HIV. It has a unique property of degrading the virus, and it’s also an outer layer of the virus. The enzymes in saliva that start to digest your food actually start digesting parts of the virus before it has a chance to do harm. When an individual has canker sores or other abscesses, the virus can move into the bloodstream.

Prevention pointers
To fully combat any type of transmission, conventional practice is the best way to go. Condoms can be also used to provide oral sex on a woman. Although they’re not ideal, they are commonly in use and it is easy to cut one in half and use it as a pseudo-barrier.

But Hackel claims that using such methods aren’t on her mind and are not what she’d do. "Using a condom definitely inhibits the sexual part of it. I’d never ask a guy to put one on," she said.

"This feeling of awkwardness usually occurs when someone is talking in a monogamous relationship. These individuals believe they’re supposedly having relations with them exclusively."

"It’s not the case all the time. Research conducted by the Journal of College Health focused on two different college men, in order to obtain sex data on their partners about their sexual history. So, obviously,short-term, serial monogamy is not effective in preventing HIV infection, especially in light of these findings."

HIV will likely continue to threaten through society, shocking the lives of many individuals for years to come. For the most part, efforts to prevent its transmission have helped halt the deadly spread.

But it helps our guard down — like during war, what unfortunate events occur.

Syracuse faces Cardinals

No team enjoys a loss.
Syracuse's men's basketball squad may have gained a case, however, when saying its loss Monday night to Seton Hall felt no more disappointing than usual.

It marked the first defeat in this campaign for the Orangemen (19-1, 9-1 Big East) and snapped the 19-game winning streak that had the team tied for first in the Big East. SU's loss means there are no more undefeated teams in Division I.

"One loss doesn't hurt us," SU sophomore guard Tony Bland said. "Last year Connecticut was 19-0. They played us and we beat them, and they ended up winning the national championship. One loss doesn't make the season."

"We'll just have to play better tomorrow," SU coach Jim Boeheim said.

The Orangemen will try to take Bland's attitude and not feel sorry for themselves as they travel to take on Louisville at 9 p.m. tonight in the less-than-inviting setting of Freedom Hall.

The Cardinals (12-9, 4-5 Conference USA) have dropped their last two games at home — to North Carolina-Charlotte and No. 1 Cincinnati — but were a perfect 9-0 before that.

"Coming into the season, Louisville had won 83 percent of its games at Freedom Hall," Boeheim said. "It's definitely an advantage to play at home." Louisville senior forward Tony Williams said, "Our fans get there about an hour before the game and use to get their Budweisers in them. They'll do anything to make sure their team gets their edge and led to an 84-77 victory.

SU's only blowout loss came on the road at the hands of Kentucky, 76-46.

"I think that playing that kind of schedule is beneficial," Louisville head coach Denny Crum said. "You hope that the more good teams you play, the better you'll be at year's end."

Crum said the fact that the Cardinals dropped four straight games before Saturday's victory over Memphis is deceiving.

"Louisville played well but inconsistently in the losses, according to Crum. The Cardinals — who shoot 70 percent from the foul line overall — were SU tops SJU in overtime

All it needed was a spark.
The Syracuse women's basketball team just required a boost to help break a four-game losing streak.
Syracuse guard Jaime James' 3-pointer with 2:27 remaining in overtime broke open a two-point SU edge and led to an 84-77 victory on Wednesday night at Manley Field House.

"I thought my team played with a lot of heart and a lot of moxie," SU head coach Marianna Mottonen said. "I thought it was tremendous team effort. We played both halves and then some. It was great to see us get back into that groove again."

The total team effort was the difference in a game which saw four ties and five lead changes in the second half alone.

With just over a minute left in regulation, the momentum shifted toward the Orangewomen (9-11, 2-7 Big East). With SU trailing by two, Syracuse guard Jakia Ervin drove towards the opposite basket, but the ball rattled off the rim and into Aziz's hands.

The SU forward grabbed the rebound and kicked the ball out to Beth Record. With three seconds

Garage burglaries continue
BY SARAH OVASKA
Staff Writer

Five cars parked in the Booth parking garage have reportedly been broken into since the beginning of the spring semester, said Robert T. Robinson, director of Syracuse University's Department of Public Safety.

Junior Chris Pappas walked to his car parked in the Booth Garage the afternoon of Jan. 22 and found the passenger side vent window of his 1987 Volkswagen Jetta broken and his stereo missing, Pappas said. There are no suspects in the case.

Pappas, a neurology and psychology major, said he felt angry and upset at the burglary and damage to his car, which could have been prevented by simple security checks.

The amount of snow has made security an issue in the garages because the door tends to stay open when the snow catches it, said Jay Oda, director of SU Parking Services.

Pappas said he has seen Public Safety officers pass by the open door without closing it.

"Someone opened the door to the garage and the snow caught it and left it open, right next to where Public Safety drives by," Pappas said. "Not only of the Public Safety officers decided to close the door." Robinson said he has not seen such a high number of car break-ins at any time during his six-year tenure.

The burglaries can be attributed to a number of reasons including the garage doors being open and the tendency of students to leave compact discs and the faces of stereo in cars, Robinson said.

Oda said the robberies may stem from student laziness in leaving the pedestrian door open to avoid entering pin codes and in students sharing pin codes.

"The parking lots at Booth and Lawrinson are considered secure lots, Oda said. "The lots have doors that are only accessible by entering such a high number of car break-ins at any time during his six-year tenure. The burglaries can be attributed to a number of reasons including the garage doors being open and the tendency of students to leave compact discs in cars."

Colleges vie for funding

Colleges within Syracuse University are seeking to increase funding for existing programs by using more than $300 million raised during the last five years by the Commitment to Learning Campaign.

Directing a portion of the fund toward merit scholarships for students in a common priority among several schools.

"Our highest priority is scholarship so we can attract the best students," said Donald Lantzy, dean of the College of Visual and Performing Arts.

School of Education Dean Steven Bossert agreed, adding that he hoped the school would be able to garner $1 million for the Burton Blatt Scholarship Fund. There is currently about $700,000 in the fund.

"We have had high expectations and we have made considerable progress," Bossert said.

Eileen Jeng, a sophomore advertising and fine arts major, said she is the recipient of a $6,000 Chancellor's Scholarship.

"I think giving out scholarships should be a primary goal," Jeng said. "It demonstrates our school's dedication to SU."

In addition to increasing scholarships, the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs seeks funding for research programs and faculty chairperson positions in the Campbell Public Affairs Institute and the Global Affairs Institute, said Robert McClure, senior associate dean in Maxwell.

VPA hopes to host more visiting artists and to create production funds for the school's cars, according to Robert Jensen, the College of Arts and Sciences dean.

Jensen said his school is seeking more funding for the center for undergraduate research, the career services program and for a professorship in the writing program.

Greek houses are attracting more students this Spring Rush than last year, the Syracuse University Office of Greek Life said.

Fraternity Rush concluded Thursday and sororities will conclude the Greek Life said.

There is 60 more than last year, added, noting that only 20 students have dropped out of the process this spring.

More than 3000 men visited the houses, at least 30 more than last year, Walsh said.

"For many of the rushers, the two-week event is an opportunity to meet people and get a first-hand experience of Greek life," said Katie Getz, a sophomore magazine major. "My friends told me that it was a great thing to do, even if I didn't pledge."

Feds on alert for hackers

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The computer vandals who blacked out two high-profile Internet sites this week took a breather Thursday, as the Pentagon, government agencies and universities scrambled to find out how they had not become unwitting accomplices to hackers.

Justice Department officials said Thursday they were continuing their hunt for the culprits but had identified no suspects. Several computer security experts warned that the data trail was probably already cold.

“It’s going to be very hard to track this down by technical mechanisms,” said researcher Steve Bellon of AT&T Labs. Authorities believe the attacks that shut down sites including Yahoo, Amazon and CNN were a veritable, coordinated denial of service. In such hits, hackers drop malicious software into unsuspecting computer systems — often those with weaker security — and then activate the software remotely to bombarded the target sites with overwhelming streams of data.

A spokesman for the Defense Department said while there is no evidence that Pen- tagon computers were used as intermediaries, officials would check the hard drives of the more than 1 million computers in the intra-net.

The FBI is “following all leads, conducting interviews and gathering information from other victim companies,” spokesman Debbie Weiser said.

Court urged to condone schools

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Raising the stakes on a Mont- gomery County, Md., school case now being reviewed by the Supreme Court, a group of educational organizations has urged the justices to allow students across the nation to be assigned to schools based on their race as a way to promote cultural diversity.

“This case," the groups argued, "presents a critical legal issue with a basic premise of the school board take intentional steps to create a diverse learning environment.”

The friend-of-the-court brief, by the National School Boards As- sociation and 16 other groups, at- tempts to convince the court that much more is at stake than a race-based transfer policy in Mont- gomery County.

The brief seeks to persuade the court the bear the case and move beyond the era when race was routinely forbidden as a basis for school assignment because the aim was to maintain segregation. Puerto Rican island becomes election issue

The U.S. Navy calls Vieques, just off the southeast coast of Puerto Rico, its best and biggest training ground for bombing runs and land attacks.

Clinton, courting the nearly 2 million New York state residents who identify themselves as Puerto Rican, announced the Navy's use of the island during negotiations with the Puerto Rican government. The settlement, however, is not favored by all Puerto Ricans.

The issue is one that has frustrated Puerto Ricans because there has been little opportunity to voice their concerns, said Omar Rodriguez, a senior civil engineering major. Puerto Ricans, though they receive aid from the U.S. government, cannot vote in elections.

The Navy has seen the island as crucial to national defense because of its training facilities. Navy officials oppose giving up the island because its beaches are the last stop for Marines on their way to the Middle East or Europe.

Islanders see the situation differently. Their fishing industry has been disrupted and tourism has decreased because of the island's role as a practice bombing range, they said.

"Nature is so present there," she said. "It's 80 green."

"If something that you knew was so beautiful and so precious, you would want to protect it," she said.

"That's why Clinton is paying attention to the issue," Diaz said. She said she has heard nothing from Giuliani on the agreement over Vieques.

With eligibility from her New York residency, Micheli plans to vote in the upcoming U.S. Senate race in New York. Finding the most Vieques-friendly candidate will be one of her top priorities, she said.

But she doubts that either one will follow up on their commitment to hasten the Navy's departure from Vieques.

"So many things have been said and not done," she said. "I think the United States is going to do whatever they want to do."

The issue is one that has frustrated Puerto Ricans because there has been little opportunity to voice their concerns, said Omar Rodriguez, a senior civil engineering major. Puerto Ricans, though they receive aid from the U.S. government, cannot vote in elections.

Though Rodriguez said he will base his vote on more than just Vieques, he has been following Clinton and Giuliani's statements regarding the island.

"When you live on the island, you can not make that pressure," he said.

The Navy maintains an eight to 10 mile buffer zone between its bombing ranges and the island's inhabitants. It claims there are no adverse health or environmental effects from its training there.

Islanders see the situation differently. Their fishing industry has been disrupted and tourism has decreased because of the island's role as a practice bombing range, they said.

The Navy once accidentally fired 273 rounds of depleted uranium shells onto Vieques. This kind of ammunition gives off low-output radiation. And in April, a U.S. bomber plane pilot mistook the watchtower where civilian guard David Sames worked as a target. It dropped two 500-pound bombs, killing Sames and injuring four others.

"There should be an immediate and permanent end to the bombing," Clinton said in October. At the time, she was in defiance of her husband's five-year plan to phase out military actions in Vieques.

Around the same time, New York City Mayor Giuliani also said a five-year plan was too long.

After nine months of civilian protests on the Vieques beaches, the Navy and the Puerto Rican government signed a deal allowing two years before Vieques is demilitarized. The Navy will continue using live ammunition, but for only half of its usual bombing schedule. A referendum vote in one or two years would give Vieques residents the opportunity to vote the Navy off of the island.

The settlement, however, is not favored by all Puerto Ricans.

During negotiations, widespread anti-Navy sentiment temporarily unified Puerto Rican political opponents such as pro-American Gov. Pedro Rossello and pro-independence leader Faraando Martinez. La Estrella, a Puerto Rican newspaper, said the negotiations with the Navy left the commonwealth with only one option — to let the bombing continue.

Both Senate candidates have not spoken about the deal.

Clinton, who was in Syracuse on Wednesday, has not said whether she opposes the newly struck deal. She and friend Ana Diaz, also an SU senior from San Juan, said the candidates are more interested in their votes than in their vacation spot.

"That's why Clinton is paying attention to the issue," Diaz said. She said she has heard nothing from Giuliani on the agreement over Vieques.

La Estrella, a Puerto Rican newspaper, said the negotiations with the Navy left the commonwealth with only one option — to let the bombing continue.

Both Senate candidates have not spoken about the deal.

Clinton, who was in Syracuse on Wednesday, has not said whether she opposes the newly struck deal. She and friend Ana Diaz, also an SU senior from San Juan, said the candidates are more interested in their votes than in their vacation spot.

"That's why Clinton is paying attention to the issue," Diaz said. She said she has heard nothing from Giuliani on the agreement over Vieques.

With eligibility from her New York residency, Micheli plans to vote in the upcoming U.S. Senate race in New York. Finding the most Vieques-friendly candidate will be one of her top priorities, she said.

But she doubts that either one will follow up on their commitment to hasten the Navy's departure from Vieques.

"So many things have been said and not done," she said. "I think the United States is going to do whatever they want to do."

The issue is one that has frustrated Puerto Ricans because there has been little opportunity to voice their concerns, said Omar Rodriguez, a senior civil engineering major. Puerto Ricans, though they receive aid from the U.S. government, cannot vote in elections.

Though Rodriguez said he will base his vote on more than just Vieques, he has been following Clinton and Giuliani's statements regarding the island.

"When you live on the island, you can not make that pressure," he said.

The Navy maintains an eight to 10 mile buffer zone between its bombing ranges and the island's inhabitants. It claims there are no adverse health or environmental effects from its training there.

The Navy has seen the island as crucial to national defense because of its training facilities. Navy officials opposed giving up the island because its beaches are the last stop for Marines on their way to the Middle East or Europe.

Islanders see the situation differently. Their fishing industry has been disrupted and tourism has decreased because of the island's role as a practice bombing range, they said.

The Navy once accidentally fired 273 rounds of depleted uranium shells onto Vieques. This kind of ammunition gives off low-output radiation. And in April, a U.S. bomber plane pilot mistook the watchtower where civilian guard David Sames worked as a target. It dropped two 500-pound bombs, killing Sames and injuring four others.

"There should be an immediate and permanent end to the bombing," Clinton said in October. At the time, she was in defiance of her husband's five-year plan to phase out military actions in Vieques.

Around the same time, New York City Mayor Giuliani also said a five-year plan was too long.

After nine months of civilian protests on the Vieques beaches, the Navy and the Puerto Rican government signed a deal allowing two years before Vieques is demilitarized. The Navy will continue using live ammunition, but for only half of its usual bombing schedule. A referendum vote in one or two years would give Vieques residents the opportunity to vote the Navy off of the island.

The settlement, however, is not favored by all Puerto Ricans.

During negotiations, widespread anti-Navy sentiment temporarily unified Puerto Rican political opponents such as pro-American Gov. Pedro Rossello and pro-independence leader Faraando Martinez. La Estrella, a Puerto Rican newspaper, said the negotiations with the Navy left the commonwealth with only one option — to let the bombing continue.

Both Senate candidates have not spoken about the deal.

Meyer said the differences between the years 1914 and 2000 is the existence of more diverse universities with more student ideas. Activist groups are also now funded by a student activity fee, he added.

As an upcoming decision from the U.S. Supreme Court may take away all the progress made by groups like NYPIRG, Meyer said.

The case claims that universities cannot use the student activity fee to fund activist groups that reflect a certain viewpoint, according to a court case fact sheet.

Scott Southworth, a University of Wisconsin student, filed the suit in Wisconsin courts and said he should not have to pay the mandatory fee required by the university. The fee infringed on his First Amendment rights, the sheet said.

The Wisconsin court decided in favor of Southworth. The decision, however, conflicted with a court decision in New York state involving NYPIRG in 1992.

The New York state case allowed universities to require such funding as long as the activities funded were " germane to the educational mission of the university system," the sheet said. Because of this conflict, the Supreme Court has taken the case and will announce a decision in November.

Meyer said the student activity fee is essential in maintaining activist groups like NYPIRG. These groups are vital to counteract activities funded that "do not serve the educational mission," he said.

"The educational mission includes a strong extracurricular base," Meyer said. "The idea of a university allows for a wide range of activities that not everyone is going to agree with. It has been this way for generations."

The research group is attempting to gather activist groups to lobby against a decision removing the fee. Tyler Sparks, a member of the group, said the organization has plans for a wide-ranging coalition of student groups.

"We want to inform groups about this and let them know," Sparks said.

This decision can have profound effects on all student organizations at Syracuse University and the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry, Sparks said.

"Every single student group in these universities and others across the country is potentially threatened because this bill can eliminate the student fee," he said.

Meyer agreed and said that the system works and it would be detrimental to change it.

"We are doing this to make sure that a system that isn't broke, isn't fixed," he said. Meyer began his talk by praising the SU and ESF chapter of the group.

"My grandparents went to Syracuse University," Meyer said. "I love this chapter because Syracuse University is influential and prestigious."

Meyer's broad plan for the future is to make NYPIRG an active voice on the Internet, he said. He is also interested in exploring current Web issues, including consumer issues and privacy laws, he added.

"I want NYPIRG to use the Internet to work for democracy," he said.

His biggest goals for the group include continuing to educate students about the importance of actively voicing their opinions, Meyer said.

"The first step in doing this is to vote for your leaders," he said.

Kevin Cooney, a senior television radio and film major and group member, said Meyer is a great leader.

"It is always good to hear him speak," Cooney said. "He captures the core of NYPIRG's mission and really portrays the heart of activism."
I'm hopeful," Jensen said. "There's a small chance that all our programs will be funded, and a good chance some will be funded."

The School of Education would also like to add money to a flexible fund giving students and faculty an opportunity to integrate teaching with research projects, Bossert said.

"I'm disappointed, but I think the overall help has been outstanding," Bossert said.

Both the School of Education and the L.C. Smith College of Engineering and Computer Science seek funding for technology improvements.

"Technology will be a major priority in the next campaign for the school," Bossert said.

Edward Boguez, the engineering and computer science college's dean, added that he would like to see new equipment in the labs and renovations in the remainder of Link Hall.

Contractors recently finished renovating the fourth floor of Link, adding more laboratory space for student research.

Briant Luong, a freshman computer engineering major, said he supports the prerogative to update equipment.

"It's an engineering building, and you can barely find an open computer because it's always busy," he said.

The college created a supplemental program geared in math, the program started four years ago with funds from the campaign, Boguez said.

Groups of six to eight students meet with a facilitator weekly in Academic Excellence Workshops to tackle problems that go beyond regular coursework, Boguez said.

About 100 freshmen and sophomores are involved with the program, Boguez said.

"It's like the best thing ever," Luong said. "It's easier to understand because you're learning from another person at the same level as you."

The School of Education dramatically increased its fundraising push in the past years. In 1991, there were fewer than 50 annual gifts to the school, while there were more than 800 last year, Bossert said.

"Ultimately, we want to make alumni and friends aware of the caliber of students who want to attend," Bossert said. "In the long run, this loyalty and commitment will pay off."

The campaign is the result of a collaboration between SU and individual schools, Bossert said.

"The idea is to make more money," Lantzy said. "It's a never-ending battle. We keep chugging away at it."

Does it bother you that the first lady isn't from NY?

Students respond to the first lady's senatorial campaign stop on the Hill.

First lady makes sense for the Empire State

For months, the idea of Hillary Rodham Clinton as a candidate for New York's open U.S. Senate seat was mere speculation. When she wasn't officially a candidate, it was easy to dismiss her as a potential senator. After all, she wasn't from New York. She was trying to ride her husband's coattails into office. She was not up to the task.

But now she is a candidate, and I find that it's not so easy to cast the idea of a Senator Clinton aside. After all, she's not the first person to use New York's lack of a residency requirement to run for the Senate. Bobby Kennedy did the same thing and, as far as I know, he served the state well.

Hillary Clinton, through her years in D.C., Arkansas and Illinois, has learned a lot about politics. Although the failed health care reform effort in 1992 left her a bit bruised, she has tackled other issues, including child welfare, and has found ways to make the "inside the Beltway" culture work for her. She has worked with powerful world and national leaders. Maybe we could use a little of that in our next senator.

As for Bill Clinton's coattails, are they really all that long? While his approval ratings may be strong, that's likely a reflection of a healthy economy — not an indication that any candidate can sail into office in his wake. Just ask Vice President Al Gore.

But mostly I am rethinking my ideas about her because I have started thinking about her strength of character. In her fishbowl life, she has maintained some measure of privacy for her daughter. And through some very difficult times over the past several years, she has shown a remarkable public grace.

So will I vote for Hillary Clinton to be New York's next senator? I honestly don't know. Besides, we've still got a secret ballot. But I do know that I'll listen to her ideas and that I'll give her serious consideration. I think she deserves that much from us.

New York will suffer with Clinton

Hillary Clinton came to town with some very kind words for our politically active campus. She praised us for being so involved in the democratic process. So how can she expect such an aware group of people to jump on her bandwagon just because she supports smaller class sizes and more qualified teachers.

Naturally, we would all like to see this happen, just as we want to see fewer crimes and less pollution. But her statements and questions are not bold or new. How could we improve education? Maybe we should teach children to use the World Wide Web. Computer literacy is important, and Mrs. Clinton did suggest that all children should be connected to the Internet.

Conveniently, there happens to be a controversy in the Liverpool school district over this very subject.

The superintendent proposed that all students be required to own laptops. Most parents were unimpressed — they felt the school's estimated cost was overly optimistic. Still, some felt the computers weren't necessary, no matter the cost. Books can be very informative, after all. So is Mrs. Clinton's blanket proposal to better equip schools the panacea she touts it to be?

The question on my mind when I left her speech Wednesday was: "Who will pay for all this?" That doesn't mean I'd rather save a few dollars at the expense of a good education. Education is a huge priority, and sacrifices should be made so that the next generations will be successful in the world they find themselves in.

But what should be sacrificed? Social Security, defense, or should we go back to deficit spending? Maybe the money will come from new taxes. But we can't be sure — Clinton hasn't told us about her tax policy yet. It could very well be the secret ingredient to flavor her agenda.

Another matter that is closely related is Clinton's failed attempt at universal health care. It may sound like a wonderful idea to some, but in practice, even the Democrats backed her plan with much enthusiasm.

What's different about education? Mrs. Clinton's your first experience with a public office should not be as a Senator or at the White House, but as someone from New York. It's obvious by the way you shammily sign your names to letters in the New York Post and the New York Times that you'd be just as likely to run for a Senate seat in any big state.

When we refer to the "Senator from New York," it should truly mean New York, not Illinois, Arkansas or the District of Columbia.

Thank you for your interest in the position, Mrs. Clinton. Well let you know in November.

Partial apolgy stratifies police

It took two months for Syracuse Police to apologize for the Dec. 2 beating of 12-year-old Danielle Currier.

Shamefully, the apolgy only represents part of the department.

On Wednesday night, the Central New York Association of Minority Police 415 decided to extend their condolences to Currier's family. This was the first official complaint by any other body in the department. Currier was allegedly struck several times with a nightstick on Dec 2 by Syracuse Police Officer John Mullen.

The apology comes after Mullen's Feb. 4, arraignment downtown Syracuse. More than 100 officers gathered in front of the Public Safety Building in support of Mullen. Not one of those officers was black.

Though Mullen has not been convicted, common sense says 12-year-olds can hardly pose a dangerous threat. Whoever was involved showed a tremendous lack of judgement in striking a such a young girl.

Even more tragic is that the Syracuse Police Department has yet to issue an apology. It is a disgrace to the Central New York Association of Minority Police 415 or any other group within the force's responsibility to apologize.

Syracuse police's lack of action places minority officers in a precarious position in their communities.

Minority communities need to know that the police force cares about them. The Central New York Association of Minority Police 415 had to reassure the communities they represent that they cared, even at the expense of further irritating the department.

Syracuse University students need only to remember the Sadie's Place stabbings and community reaction to understand how certain areas are hypedcast by both the community and police.

But buyer beware: Even though one apology has been issued, it accomplishes little. The percent of officer is no closer to justice and both Currier and her family receive little in return.

Concert-goers must respect music performers

On the way back to the States, I was greeted rudely by Canadian customs. Why do we do this to Canadians?

There was a turist with a coin drop that was way off the line. I could be jumped over by the most unathletic of people and there was absolutely nobody watching. I was so mad that I had to pay to get back into my own country. My friends all jumped over the turnstiles. It was so we could become Canadians and deport all Americans too cheap to pay fifty cents, so like an idiot, I placed my 50 cents in the turnstile and walked through. I prayed that everybody else would get arrested once we got to the U.S. customs just so I would feel my money was wisely spent. It didn't happen, though.

Sunday night came and it was time for Beck. The concert was a let down. First of all, the concert took place in a huge hockey stadium. My seat was on the opposite end of the arena. From my experience, people don't let their seats work against them. Americans get up and groove no matter where they are, but the Canadians need some lessons in concert-going. Everyone just sat there throughout the entire concert. The concert planners also undersold the general admission section — only about half the seats were actually being used. The other half was empty, creating a huge hole between the general admission people and the seated people.

Beck shouldn't be blamed for the lack of energy. He danced like a madman. So did the rest of his band. The music was excellent and Beck kept the crowd going. For all the goofy people catered to, there is one left behind. The concert planners should have had more than 100 officers gathered in front of the Public Safety Building in support of Mullen. Not one of those officers was black.

I was just skimming the experience. Suffice it to say, I had no clue that it doesn't matter if you overpay.

Unfortunately for me, I got the sudden urge to use the men's room after only several songs. I cursed my tendency to piss during the most inopportune moments, and then hurried off. A group of uninterested college students gathered around the urinals talking in incoherent fragments. When I approached, one student asked me for a pencil. I tried to ignore the individual and took a urinal next to another freaked out person. The pen finally fell and I picked it up, begging for his desired writing tool.

"Look, buddy, I don't have a frickin' pencil," I finally bellowed.

Sunday, we stopped at Niagara Falls. It seemed like the right thing for my tourist self to do. I had no clue that it doesn't matter if you overpay.

We parked on the American side and walked to the Canadian side. Along the way, I had to be like an idiot. I placed my 50 cents in the turnstile but I was sure it was some conspiracy to deport all Americans too cheap to pay fifty cents, so like an idiot, I placed my 50 cents in the turnstile and walked through. I prayed that everybody else would get arrested once we got to the U.S. customs just so I would feel my money was wisely spent. It didn't happen, though.

Comics perpetuate greek stereotypes

Letters

To the Editor:

Okay, I know that these letters to the editor defending greek life are becoming tiresome. I am the entire student population here at Syracuse University.

However, the cartoons that are continuously published, depicting us 'ignorant fools' who are part of the greek system are even more tiresome. The creator of 'Get 'Cuse to It.'

He obviously thought his cartoon, featured on Tuesday, Feb. 8, was witty and mocking. The majority of the readers, however, looked at it and laughed.

Not at the stupidity of the greek system, but at the creator of the cartoon and his lack of creativity. It was this lack of creative ability that loaded him to fall back on the commonly used stereotype of greeks. My main gripe is not about his headline and had to create a cartoon in about five minutes. I thought he was being amusing.

Either way, I am not going to defend greek life in this letter. Plenty of letters before mine have attempted to do that. I am not going to preach about all the philanthropic and community service events that both sororities and fraternities participate in. Those of you who have made fake stories about us will simply close your ears. But I am going to say one last thing... the joke is old but the Greek system is still here. So, say what you will but recognize it. Oh, and last one piece of advice for the creator of 'Get 'Cuse to It.' Maybe for your next cartoon you can mock the intellects of either sororities or fraternities, but if you don't, there is a lot of fresh material there.

Senior Mary Beth Burke, an English and textual studies major, said she had a similar experience.

"Going into the houses has really broken down stereotypes of specific houses," she said. "I went into the houses with these stereotypes in my head. After visiting, it gave me a better view of sororities in general."

Burke said the atmosphere during house visits is generally friendly and accommodating.

"It's not competitive at all. Everyone is looking for something totally different," she said.

Students planning to pledge were not necessarily interested in a house because it is a popular sorority or because all their friends are members, she added.

Burke said she was open-minded to the entire experience of Rush and did not pressure herself to make a commitment to pledge.

"I don't know if I am going to pledge," she said. "I'm not going in it saying I have to be in a house."

Yes, the Daily Orange actually has a Web site, and I suppose that I am the one that is responsible for it.

However, the truth is that I really don't know anything about computers, or HTML or anything else like that. I faked my way through it like my ex-girlfriend used to do in the sack. So it goes.

I am supposed to write a little thing about everyone that I worked with here, and now at gunpoint I will.

Management: The DO is like a tree of monkeys. You look down from the top and see smiling faces, the rest of us look up and see monkeys.

Rush: The jackass who hired me. Good luck. Godspeed, and don’t work too hard. I hope your ear will finally heal from all the wailing and screamers out there...

DC, Connor, Jiloty, Jeff: If you all didn’t shower together at the end of each night, I would say that you were the only sane people here. In fact, I will still say it.

Lifestyle: Danielle, Holly, Brad: See, I didn’t add the ‘s’ at the end this time. Frankly, I have had gs for class and he’s great. By far, you where nicest to me out of everyone.

PC: Remember that time we almost got killed?

Lifestyle: The DO is the white and red house four blocks down there. That’s all that needs to be said.

As the walls of anonymity crumble down around me I would like to say:

Dinomania is the newest addition to the Museum of Science and Technology, 500 S. Franklin St. The new exhibit will feature giant robotic dinosaurs and focuses on several dramatic vignettes that portray the life of dinosaurs in a variety of settings. The exhibit will also include a special "dig box" for budding paleontologists. It runs from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. Sundays to Thursdays and 9:30 a.m. to 6 p.m. Fridays and Saturdays. Admission is $4.75 for adults.

Americana revisited

Art spanning 200 years of American history is on display at the Everson Museum of Art, 401 Harrison St. The multifaceted exhibit will display portraits of prominent American icons, landscapes and the culture of industry and entertainment. The works of Beatrice Wose-Smith, a favorite local artist of the Depression era, will also be shown, featuring landscapes of the Central New York scenes and faces. It will be open noon to 5 p.m. Sunday through Friday and 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday. Admission is free, but donations are welcome.

Second coming

The last weekend to see "Jesus Christ Superstar" is approaching at cataclysmic rate. The musical production is celebrating its 23rd season at The Salt City Center for Performing Arts, 601 S. Crouse Avenue. Performances will be shown at 8:30 p.m. Sunday through Wednesday. Prices range from $12 for an orchestra seat to $18 for a view from the mezzanine.

Disco chicks

Disco returns to downtown Syracuse when the Electric Chick Magnets grace the stage Saturday at Styleen's Rhythm Palace, 314 S. Franklin St. Admission is $5, and the music starts at 10 p.m.

Getting fit

Richard Simmons will be the premiere guest in a conference at Turning Stone Casino. The event, spanning Saturday and Sunday, will include exercise demonstrations and the zany personality of the health guru. For tickets and information, call 361-SHOW.

Try tubing

Instead of using the slopes for skiing, the Four Seasons Golf and Ski Center, 8012 E. Genesee St. Fayetteville, will be featuring a night of tubing. A small hill located near the store will provide the slopes for the event on Saturday.

SU's Matrilineage Symposium showcases successful women in the arts.

BY HOLLY AUER
Lifestyle Editor

Carla Hall plans to be reborn on stage at Syracuse University. The Miami-based singer-songwriter, a participant in SU's ninth-annual Matrilineage Symposium, will give her first large performance in nearly a year on Feb. 19 at Perc Place in the Schine Student Center.

Hall, who mixes soul, jazz and folk to form her unique sound, dedicates her SU performance to the memory of her mother, who died last February. After a year of quiet reflection and small performances, Hall said she's excited to get back to business on the road. The show, she said, is the perfect way to break back onto the scene and honor her mother's memory.

"I give an honest performance, I think," she said. "A lot of times in the music industry, you see people who..."
The Matrilineage Symposium, an effort of the Committee on Women and Art, began in 1992 as a senior honors project in SU's art media studies program. The program, which brings female professional visual and performing artists to the university each year, is funded entirely by the Student Fee. This year's program is facilitated primarily by the Committee on Women and Art, with helping hands from the Student Government Association, the Graduate Student Organization, the women's studies department, and the Jewish Women's Collective and the studio arts department.

This year's program, which runs from Feb. 4 to Feb. 26, showcases a diverse palate of talents. Presenters range from graphic designer Paula Scher, whose prize-winning work has appeared in the halls of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, to Aviva Jane Carlin, who stars in the one-woman play "Jodie's Body," to a panel of artists discussing the relationship between art and feminism since the 1970s.

Organizers chose the words of American author Susan Sontag as their guiding light throughout the planning phases of the symposium. "I do this, I endure this, I want this... because I am woman. I do that, I want that... even though I am woman," Sontag wrote in Women magazine.

Real world
The Matrilineage Symposium aims to provide positive role models for SU women involved in the arts, said Andrea Marquis, who aided in the planning of the symposium. The speakers, exhibits and performers help expand traditional classroom learning by portraying the successes of women in the arts nationwide, she added.

"It's good to listen to the artists speak and see their work," said Marquis, a senior ceramics major. "Usually we have to learn from textbooks and other, more abstract things. This is much more direct."

And indeed, the performers and presenters carry a message for the symposium participants. Hall said she hopes to reach out to women who are unsure of their skills or goals, perhaps fearful of the fierce competition in the arts fields. It's important to feel comfortable performing and creating art for oneself, said Hall, not an audience. In the 14 years since Hall began her music career, she said she has become progressively more willing to experiment with her own artistic voice in spite of potential rejection.

"I feel I have something to say," she said. "I just realized that I have to say what I have to say, and if people don't like it, I don't care." Joy De dendler, a junior communications design major and a co-chairwoman of the event, said she's confident that the campus exposure of the accomplished female artists will help prove to women that they can make their mark in any field they choose. She cited Scher as a pioneer for women in the predominantly male field of graphic design.

"I know that seeing people like her will help women artists to see that these women exist successfully in traditional, academically male-dominated fields," she said. "If you want to do it, and you say you can do it, then you can do it."

Hall, too, encourages young women to run after their dreams, no matter how far-fetched they may seem.

"Don't second guess yourself," she said. ""If you feel that strongly about something, you have to go forward with it. Otherwise, you'll never be happy again, and you'll always regret it."

Hall moved from Miami to New York City four years ago to gain exposure at larger venues and escape the struggling club scene in Florida. Though she admitted the jump to the Big Apple was a risk, she's happy with the results of her nortbward trek. Mixing and matching with big-city names and musical acts has helped sharpen her skills as a performer, she said.

"When you feel confident, people really kick you in the ass," she said. "It totally makes you step up to the line of your game and ask yourself what you can do better."

‘Scream 3’ falls short of frightening viewers

Aaaaaaaaaaaaah! That was our response to “Scream 3.” As we sat down to watch the last installment of the Scream trilogy — hopefully — “Scream 3.”

Onslaught of previews geared to make us think this time we were presented with an amazing opportunity — no, wait, that's not how you say, “whoa!”. We were presented with an amazing opportunity to not be frightened, and yet still be entertained. This is exactly what the writers and producers of “Scream 3” were trying to do, but it's not working.

Scream 3” boasts a parade of stars so glutinous that they may have well been on floats, making their way down Hollywood Boulevard away from the masked killer. My God, they even dragged Princess Leia out of the woodwork.

“Stab 3,” the on-screen version of the trilogy, is in production on Sunrise Studios, where one by one, the stars are killed off in some attempt to reel the real Sidney out of seduction from the killer. Along the way, we run into, sadly, the ever-so-annoying, doofy cop, Dewey.

Wait, though, there’s a catch: he is now employed as a consultant to the thriller based on the story of the murderer of his own sister, but goes back into doofy cop mode to take out the killer.

Enter stage left, literally, Gale Harbarts (Courtney Cox-Arquette), now working as the movie’s equivalent to Entertainment Tonight anchor. She feels her expertise on the subject will come in handy as she goes into doofy reporter mode to seek out the killer.

Hollywood appeal

If you haven’t noticed already, Craven makes a number of very obvious cameos in this film, including a very Hollywood-esque cameo that Jay and Silent Bob of the Jay and Silent Bob Reboot fame make in this film. It’s kind of interesting, but that, in combination with the fact that the magical device in this film is the magical device in any horror film, is kind of interesting.

This film does not border on the abysmal in any way, shape, or form. It’s a perfect example of how horror films can survive in the world of cell phones. But the magical device in this film allows the killer, whoever that may be, to manipulate any voice he or she wishes.

The acting was that bad. Cox-Arquette was worse than she is on Friends. Patrick Dempsey plays the detective at hand who may very well be Sidney’s killer. And he may very well be playing Sidney to hang out with him; see “Can’t Buy Me Love.”

Jenny, we wish we got your number. You know McCarthy’s not all bad at acting. Her character was actually the most interesting and played with the most depth out of all the cast. But Neve Campbell plays the same, sadly depressed character she plays in every other film she does. Ask her. Can we say type-cast?

And finally, David Arquette. Boy oh boy. Those 1-800-CALL-ATT commercials aren’t getting any better, and neither is his film choices. You used to do good movies!

Melissa McAteer: I know you’re not here to read this, but I wanted to thank you from afar. You were my first friend at the DO, and from you I learned how to handle this place...you even introduced me to my favorite drink (raspberry iced tea). We laughed, we carved pumpkins, we drove Bill crazy... it was a great time. Thanks for everything.

Bill: When I had that legendary interview 2 years ago (where my first memory of Bill Hingler is eating a big slice of Sammy pizza, a trend that would continue...), I made a crucial claim (or mistake...) that I loved Franklin Gothic. I knew that we’d be in together as only geeky designers can. I gave you so much credit for making my DO experience what it’s been. I’ve learned so much from you. I’ll never forget the late nights, the many-a-missing ads, the SND convention, watching you and Melissa, hearing your mix of country and God music, scarfing down bag after bag of tortilla chips & salsa, sneaking hidden objects into the paper, and the many many uncounted lemon iced teas. Thanks for 2 great years. Take that great confidence and run with it.

Elaine: The only other non-Allentowner in design, and that I am grateful for. Thanks for being such a sweet girl.

Title: Our token freshman in design and fellow lover of Dave Matthews and the great raspberry iced tea. You’ll go far at this place with your talent, just don’t forget about the outside world.

Trent: One of my nemeses at this place... you’re a great guy to know, work with and let select the right music. Have fun in my old position, but don’t fret...you’re going to do a great job at this and whatever else you do.

Erie: What can I say? From child molester vans, Tigger ears, to trip to Weggeman’s and Donn’s Diner, thanks for helping me not take this place too seriously.

Ashok: I’ve watched you navigate from our last, great Night Editor to Editorial editor with great success. You’ve helped me survive the crazy long nights by always making me laugh with your sometimes offensive, but always hilarious, humor. You’re a great guy... good luck with everything.

Holy & Lifestyle departments, past & present: Thanks for giving me countless sections to design. Not to pick favorites — okay, I will — I loved to work with you guys and design your pages.

Dave & Emily: Sadly, I won’t have the pleasure of working under your leadership. But I know that the DO will continue to be great in your very capable hands. Good luck next year.

Faye: So much has happened between us from the time I was hired at this place, to now. You’ve heard me rant and rave about this place for 2 years and still stood by me. There is not enough space in this paper for me to tell you how I feel. But with my new found freedom, they’ll be plenty of time for me to tell you. We’ve had so many good times, and that will only increase. I love you.

Thanks to everyone, I’ll really miss this place.

Consecutive matches...

EBrahim Hopper followed Williams’ layup with a jumper and then fed Williams for another turnaround jumper. This capped an 8-2 Louisville run in which Syracuse appeared to have one more step behind its Cardinal counterparts.

They shot well, forward Preston Shumpert said. “You’ve got to credit them. We’ve got to shoot well, too.”

In the game’s early stages, Syracuse appeared energized. Tony Iliai had started a 1-2-2 1-2-2 in a layup, Preston Shumpert hit a three from the left side of the key and then found Thomas inside for a rim-dunk dunk.

After evening the game out at 7-7, Louisville took control. Spearheaded by Marquis Wright and his 16 points, along with Williams and Gaines in double figures, the Cardinals scored 16 points in the first half.

Syracuse also found trouble putting the ball into Williams, who finished with 12 points and 12 rebounds, losing 36-35 to a taller Louisville.

The Scarlet Knights feature strong-serving first singles star Donna Krouzmany. She and Lai played out an epic during last season, and their rematch, along with the rest of the matches, should be just as intense, Gifford said.

"That is always a closely-contested match,” Gifford said, especially because they are so well-coached.

While Gifford set his long-term focus on the Big East Tournament, he said the key right now is playing fundamentally sound in the must-win matches and remaining healthy. That begins with Lai, at number-one singles, and follows throughout the lineup.

BUILD

To battle the Hoyas, Syracuse (9-11, 2-7 Big East) needs repeat performances from its leading scorers. LeRoi Clark, Jerome Williams, and Steve Lavin have scored double figure games against the Red Storm on Wednesday night, leading SU to an 84-77 overtime win.

James poured in 21 points on 7-for-14 shooting against the Red Storm. The sophomores guard went 4-for-8 from behind the arc.

During Syracuse's recent four-game losing streak, James fell into a mild shooting funk. Prior to last Sunday's loss to Rutgers, James had failed to score in double digits in four of Syracuse's previous five games.

Her numbers dipped below the 12-point-per-game average she posted during SU's first seven games this season.

But 21 points on Wednesday and 16 points against Rutgers served to have brought him back from the slump.

Record also suffered some shooting woes during SU's recent four-game losing streak, averaging 13.2 points per game.

But Flippen came through by scoring in three of SU's four games, averaging 11.2 points per game, while Record has dropped to 17.0 per game.

For SU, Atlantic had another solid outing against the Red Storm on Wednesday night. The center posted 18 points and 15 rebounds, including 10 boards in the first half.

The Orangewomen will need all of relaxation. They've got to keep it close and execute down the stretch.

They beat us early down the court tonight," Bechtel said. "You have to give them a lot of credit. They came out, they played well for a while.

Syracuse played without forward Dan Majerle due to a back injury. Majerle missed the last two games against Seton Hall and at one of the starting forwards for the Hoyas.

Syracuse even implemented a modified press midway through the second half.

Each time, Louisville answered with its myriad of offensive skills.

The driving of guard Marques Martin, one of theSUleaders, and he kicked the ball outside for an open jumper. The Cards knocked down three of nine three-pointers and shot a blistering 46.2 percent from downtown.

When the Orangemen shifted to the man defense, Maybin found alley and glided to the rim for an eight-point career night, flushing home a breakaway layup.

Williams shot 9-for-13, posted 22 points and 8 assists.

The Orangewomen will need to get to keep it closer and execute down the stretch.

Pac-10 guard Earl Watson and super freshman Kapono - a heavy favorite for Pac-10 Rookie of the Year honors.
The highly recruited Kapono could have played for Syracuse - joining California products Tony Bland and Jason Hart.
Instead, he opted for the comfort zone of his own backyard at UCLA - just 30 miles from his home in Lakewood, Calif.
"I knew that the decision would be tough," Kapono said. "Coach Boeheim is a great coach, and they have a great staff out there and players like Bland and Hart. But basically, it came down to what I felt most comfortable with."
He fit right into the whole college experience at UCLA - from its basketball tradition, academics and social life, Kapono said. And no doubt he enjoys playing in front of the laid-back Paleney crowds.
So far, the freshman phenom has started every game this season and led the Bruins (13-8, 4-6 Pac-10) in scoring with an average of 15.4 points per game.
He's currently eighth in the conference in field goal percentage (53) and averaging 49 percent from 3-point land.
One glance at Kapono's honors and it's understandable why there was so much hoopla surrounding his arrival on the Westwood campus.
He earned 1999 first-team prep All-America honors from Parade Magaazine and received the prestigious John Wooden High School Player of the Year award.
In his senior season at Artesia High School - the same school attended by former Bruin Ed and Charles O'Bannon - Kapono guided the Pioneers to a school-record 22 wins against just two losses.
He finished his 1998-99 season averaging 23.5 points, 8.0 rebounds, 7.6 assists and shot a smooth 92.5 percent from the foul line. In his four-year career, Kapono broke six offensive records once held by the O'Bannnon brothers.
Kapono also got the chance to play for the West squad in McDonald's High School All-America game in 1999, alongside talents Jonathone Rondler and Jason Hart.
"Just to get chosen as one of the Top 25 players in the land," Kapono said. "It really meant a lot. Especially with so many great players who've played in the past - from Magic, Shaq, Kobe."
Just this past summer, Kapono participated in a summertime league with L.A. native Jason Hart.
"I remember Jason probably from high school my freshman year or something. We definitely know each other."
Kapono is not afraid to lose, nor does he dwell on past mistakes. In the Bruin conference home opener against now-No. 7 Arizona, Kapono finished the night with 10 points and committed 10 of his team's 26 turnovers.
But in the following game against Arizona State, Kapono responded by tailoring 24 points in a UCLA victory.
"I just knew that I couldn't break down," he said. "Even though it was a tough loss (to Arizona) I felt it kept us stronger and more mentally tough in the game."
Kapono's combination of sharp shooting and versatility has served him well, helping him supply a steady stream of heroism.
One particular highlight was Dec. 30 victory over Purdue, in which he delivered the game-winning basket with 1.1 seconds remaining.
"I love the way Jason keeps the element of fun and play in the game," fourth-year UCLA head coach Steve Lavin told the Daily Breeze. "The season is long and sometimes it's hard. You need to keep that spirit of fun."

Kapono also got the chance to play for the West squad at the McDonald's High School All-American game in 1999, alongside talents Jonathan Bender and Jason Gardner. He's still the only Bruin to ever be selected as one of the Top 20, a honor, Kapono said. "It really meant a lot. Louisville, Ky. — In an up-and-down season, the Syracuse basketball team has visited both ends of the college basketball spectrum.

On some nights, the squad played below its potential, losing to unknowns like Alabama-Birmingham and Saint Louis.

On other nights — especially against teams ranked in the Top 25 — the Orangemen have shown their talent and beaten then-No. 6 North Carolina, then-No. 18 Utah and then-No. 23 DePaul.

On Thursday night, Louisville proved giant-killer again, shooting an amazing 57 percent from the floor and handing a Damone Brown-less No. 4 Syracuse its second consecutive loss 82-69 at Freedom Hall.

"When you have good shooting, you can overcome a lot of weaknesses," Louisville head coach Denny Crum said. "Thought, we got the ball to the right man, and when you do that you get better shots. It's that simple."

With 5:09 left in the contest, Syracuse appeared to be threatening a comeback in a game Louisville controlled throughout. On the right wing, forward Kueh Dunny found an open Etan Thomas for a thunderous dunk that brought SU within four, the closest it had been in the half, at 54-60.

"Fearless against the Orangemen's vaunted 2-3 zone, Louisville continued to work the ball around on the other end of the court. hoe Gaines, who finished with 15 points on the night, shook loose on the right side, nailing an open 3-pointer and sending the 19,861 Cardinal faithful into a frenzy.

Guards three sparked a 15-9 Louisville run that included a stretch where SU had to foul four consecutive times just to put Louisville in the bonus.

"When a team shoots that well, you've got to give them some credit," Syracuse head coach Jim Boeheim said. "But defensively, you've got to take some responsibility for that."

Just like in Monday's 69-67 loss to Seton Hall, Syracuse fell susceptible to Louisville's quickness, as forward Tony Williams sparked a run by streaking down the left side for a layup to put the Cardinal up 55-46 with 1:59 remaining. Williams finished with 20 points on 9-of-15 shooting.

SU — with an exploited perimeter defense and an interior game as soft as a marshmallow — played with the braggadocio it possessed during its 2-3-0 conference start to begin the season and with the loud screams of 19,861 Freedom Hall fans ringing in their ears.

And no matter which defense they played with the energy I think we need to," Boeheim said after the Orange's 10th-straight loss, 10-2 and 9-1 Big East).

Former GSO president files grievance against Short

BY NICK SERRANO
Staff Writer

Former Graduate Student Organization President Zac Moore filed a formal grievance Friday to the University Senate committee on academic freedom, tenure and professional ethics.

Moore said he filed the grievance because of alleged mistreatment and plagiarism by his former geography professor.

A three-member subcommittee will now investigate the case, said committee chairman Diane Lydick Murphy, professor of social work and director of women's studies.

Moore is accusing geography professor John Rennie Short of expelling him from a GEO 815 class in the spring of 1998 and of plagiarizing his work from the class in the book, "Globalization and The City."

Short wrote the book last winter with Yeohn-Hyun Kim, who was a geography doctoral student at the time. Short and Kim denied Moore's accusation.

Sororities close Rush with bids

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

Campus sororities completed Spring Rush 2000 with Bid Day on Sunday in Goldstein Auditorium.

"It was a really fantastic Rush," said Sarah Korf, Rush chairwoman of the Panhellenic Council and junior policy studies and public relations major. "So many girls signed up this year than last year.

Women went to Goldstein to receive their bids, an envelope containing the name of the sorority that invited them to be a pledge, Korf said. After opening envelopes, pledges ran to representatives of their sorority in Goldstein, or to their sorority houses.

"It was fun," said Lisa Walsh, an office of Greek Life graduate assistant. "People were screaming and running. They were hugging and some were crying out of happiness. It was basically a lot of screaming.

"I guess, for me, it made the whole hectic week worth it." During the first round of Rush, women toured the 13 sorority houses and were notified afterward which houses were calling them back for a second round. From the list of call-backs, women had to pick their top seven choices, rushies said.

In the second round, the candidates followed the same procedure, but at the end women picked their top three.

Dorian's employee attacks customer

BY EVANS BOSTON
Staff Writer

An employee of Dorian's Gourmet Pizza and Deli, 534 Westcott St., assaulted a customer early Saturday morning, according to a police report.

"I walked into Dorian's to order food," said customer Matt Brosh, a 21-year-old Syracuse resident. "After 20 minutes, they hadn't even started my order.

Brosh asked the manager to refund his money for the order, he said.

"The boss was willing to give me my money back, but the cook got really mad," Brosh said. "He hit me so hard, blood started coming out of my nose immediately."

After being punched by Wilson, Brosh blacked out, the report said.

Brosh said he knew Wilson before the incident.

"He was a friend of a friend," Brosh said. "I had met him once before, and never really liked him."

In a previous encounter, Wilson got angry at Brosh at a party for accusing him of drinking his beer, Brosh said. Wilson kicked Brosh out of the apartment where the party was hosted, Brosh said.

"Nothing else really happened after that," he said.

Wilson could not be reached for comment.

Petkopoulos refused to comment on the incident at Dorian's.

"It was a fight, there is nothing else I can say," Petkopoulos said.

Brosh did not get his money back and is planning on pressing charges against Wilson, he said.

Trump nixes presidential run

WASHINGTON, D.C. — New York tycoon Donald Trump has held several strong-front running for president, ending a lengthy flirtation that could have turned his personal fortune to capture the White House as a third-party candidate. The Associated Press learned.

Trump met with New York's Independence Party movement, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Trump and associates believe he will announce Monday that he is not mounting a presidential bid. After months of speculation about a possible Reform Party campaign, Trump decided to announce that his party was formed to support a credible presidential candidate, the officials said. The Reform Party operates in New York under the Independent Party label.

Arsonist sets fire outside Ostrom apartment

An unidentified person set a small fire early Saturday morning on the front porch of a house on the 700 block of Ostrom Avenue, according to a police report. Residents of the house were unaware that there was a fire on the porch, the report said.

"We were inside our house playing ping-pong," said resident Michael Godlewski, a sophomore business major. "We looked outside and saw a blazing inferno on the front porch."

The suspect took trash from a garbage can by the road and set it on fire on the house's porch, the report said.

The fire investigator said the fire appeared to be intentional, the report said.

"They think that it was probably some drunk people coming back from the bars," Godlewski said. "The police tried to find them, but they had no luck. We have no idea who it was."

The porch suffered only minor damages, the report said. One resident burned his hand pouring water on the fire, Godlewski said. "We also left the sink on and flooded the kitchen on accident," he said.

In the fall, an unidentified person set three trash fires in the Brewster/Boland Complex. The first two fires were set in back stairwells of Brewster Hall. The third fire was set in the trash room on the twelfth floor of Brewster Hall.

The fires raised issues regarding residence hall safety and fire prevention. The cases are still under investigation by the Syracuse Police Department.

A car parked on the 1000 block of Harrison Street was broken into by an unidentified person the evening of Feb. 1, according to a police report.

The passenger side door window was shattered and personal items were taken from the vehicle, the report said. The thief stole a black gym bag and a wallet, the report said. The wallet contained a driver's license, Syracuse University identification card and other forms of identification, the report said.

Last week, there were five car break-ins around the SU campus, according to police reports. No suspects were found for any of the incidents.
Bernardi calls for government reorganization

BY NICHOLAS STEFFENS  Staff Writer

Syracuse University is needed to help officials reform an out-of-date charter preventing the city from being efficient, Syracuse University Mayor Ray A. Bernardi said during his State of the City address Wednesday.

Officials have not determined SU's role, but Chancellor Kenneth A.汪 and Bernardi discussed using members of the university staff to assist the City Charter Commission, said Jim Parenti, a Bernardi spokesman.

Being a city resident is a prerequisite for placement on the committee and many university employees live in the city's suburbs, he said. Currently, university employees may sit on the committee or just serve in an advisory role, he said.

One of the study's conclusions was that cities could benefit from a review of their charter or constitution, Parenti said.

The charter is also being reformed because it was passed more than 40 years ago, Parenti said.

"We are a vital part of the community and the welfare of the city is important to us," he said. "I can't think of a reason why we shouldn't be involved.

The city is looking specifically for professors and researchers from the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs to work with the commission, Parenti said.

The Alan K. Campbell Public Affairs Institute in Maxwell last month released "The Government Performance Project," which graded the government quality within the 35 U.S. cities with the largest annual revenues. Syracuse was not one of the cities studied, but researchers from the project could still help cement the commission's project, Parenti said.

"The city has the same issues we're dealing with here," he said.

Pledges must seek to re-invent image

Brothers and sisters, raise your drinking glasses. Bid Day is upon us once again.

A toast to SU’s 2000 greek pledge class: Strive to embody the original ideals of greek life — brotherhood and sisterhood and service to the university community. For a change, help greeks make headlines for positive involvement on and off campus, not for landing pledges in hospital beds with near-fatal blood alcohol levels.

When prospective students roll up the SU Hill, Walnut Park’s row of greek letter-embazoned houses is one of their first sights. The high-profile image that accompanies your letter sweater should not be taken lightly.

You are held to a higher standard than other members of the campus community. Ugly hazing incidents and alcohol violations have historically tarnished the pride college students once felt in being greek.

Public good for greeks is often only a phone call away. Alerting local media outlets about philanthropy events and community service activities is a simple step toward re-establishing a positive greek image.

Similarly, it would be smart for house presidents to show leadership when slip-ups occur and greek houses are thrust into the public spotlight for alcohol or hazing violations.

Repeated pleas of “No comment” won’t clean up a soiled image. You are held to a higher standard than other members of the community.

“Animal House” — reminiscent social enclaves have crumbled in the clutches of an increasingly lawsuit-happy society and stricter university administrations. If the greek system is to endure, you must take pride in your responsibility as student leaders.

Ace your first lesson in the greek ABCs. Use it to write the next chapter of SU’s greek history.

Love sickness perplexes the hopeless romantic

Valentine’s Day is here again. Some will be joyfully celebrating with flowers and kisses. Others will be quietly mourning with coffee and cigarettes. Most will probably be indifferent.

It would be possible to argue that Valentine’s Day is a sham built by consumerism to sell candy and greeting cards. Everyone knows that. It’s just like Christmas.

But it seems clear to me that Valentine’s Day at least purports to be about love. When Aristotle describes the beginning of the universe he said, “as the seasons rolled forth sprang Love, the longing-for, shining, with wings of gold.”

This is a lovely vision, but certainly a romantic one, the vision of poets and songwriters.

Science, however, has a slightly different approach. Cindy Hazan, a researcher at Cornell University, recently concluded an interesting scientific study of love. Her study found that ‘love’ constitutes the release of dopamine, phenylethylamine and oxytocin — a powerful chemical cocktail — in the brain. This creates an increased sensation of euphoria that lasts between 18 and 33 months, just long enough for a couple to meet, mate and conceive a child.

“Thanks to the intensity and tunnel vision of romantic infatuation, we enjoy the illusion that we choose our mate. The reality is known to zoologists — the most certain way to get members of any species to mate is to house them in the same cage,” Hazan adds.

At first this is a disturbing thought, but then I wonder whether or not we’re using the right word. Perhaps humans have a habit of confusing love with mere infatuation. If there is a distinction, it is often a difficult one to make, especially for the infatuated. A perfect example appears in the recent film “Magnolia,” when Donnie (William H. Macy) is confronted about confusing sickness and love.

“On every page of Shakespeare, I do confuse the two and I don’t care!”

So maybe people who are ‘in love’ are just sick. The poet Coleridge once wrote, “And to be wroth with one who love doth work like madness in the brain.” This might be closer to the scientific perspective.

A study conducted by researchers at the University of Pisa found that serotonin levels in the brains of lovelorn Italian students were similar to those of people clinically diagnosed with Obsessive-Compulsive Disorder. Like the Cornell research, the Italian study found that these levels returned to normal after about a year.

Regardless, be it love or infatuation, I must admit it’s pretty cool in a sadomasochistic sort of way. Other feelings may come close, but none quite the same. As the Magnetic Fields so eloquently put it, “love is like a bottle of gin, but a bottle of gin ain’t like love.”

Barring clichés about how the ups of love wouldn’t be worthwhile without the downs, the idea still appeals to me. The pure and nihilistic I become about the state of the world, the more I find my only solace lies in being a hopeless romantic. It’s fun in a way that denies the idea stiJi appeals to me. The idea stiJi appeals to me.

Pataki visits Syracuse, promotes Empire Games

BY CAROLINE CHEN
Staff Writer

The 25th annual Empire State Summer Games are returning to Syracuse, announced New York state Gov. George E. Pataki Friday to students and local residents in the Carrier Dome.

"We're going to have the best state games in America right here in Syracuse," Pataki said.

Syracuse has hosted the Games 11 times since their inception 22 years ago, said basketball star Jim Boeheim, commissioner of the New York State Office of Parks, Recreation and Historic Preservation.

The city hosted the games during its inaugural year and last hosted them in 1994.

"Syracuse was selected because it is the center of the state," said Chuck Halliag, sports director for the event.

LoMoay College and the State University of New York at Cortland will provide additional athletic facilities, Pataki said.

"Most importantly, it will be a time when 6,000 young people from around the state will get to make friends that will stay for a lifetime," he said.

By the end of 2002, more than 125,000 athletes will have participated in the Games since they began in 1978, Castro said.

Under the leadership of Gov. Hugh Carey, New York was the first state to begin hosting statewide athletic competitions. More than 40 other states have since followed.

"This is an auspicious occasion," Syracuse Mayor Roy A. Bernardi said. "These games will come home to where they started."

Jim Mills, a 1981 SU graduate, won gold medals for freestyle wrestling and Greco-Roman wrestling at the Games in 1978.

"It was a lot of fun," he said. "It was a nice little stepping stone to the Olympics."

Mills joined the Olympic team in 1980 and later spent 17 years as an SU wrestling coach. Mills never competed in the Olympics, however, because the United States boycotted that year in protest of the Soviet Union's Communist ideals.

Economy boost

Empire State Games, which were in Long Island last year, generated more than $20 million for the local economy, Pataki added.

"There was a line out the door," said Donnelly, an undeclared freshman in The College of Arts and Sciences.

"It was crazy."

The Games are run by the Office of Parks, Recreation and Historic Preservation and are funded largely by the New York State Lottery, Pataki said. Bernardi said the Olympic-sized pool at Nottingham High School and track at Hanniger High School, both in the Syracuse City School District, are examples of long-lasting benefits of hosting the Games in Syracuse.

Both were originally built to accommodate the Games, he said.

The Nottingham pool is one of the few eight lane pools in the area that is available for high school teams to use, said Michael Baylis, a freshman illustration major and a 1999 Nottingham graduate and varsity swim team captain.

The games, featuring amateur athletes, will feature 48 different venues, Halligian said.

Moore said he is more optimistic about USen than the other classes I have ever taken, and I believe that is because he never contacted me about the alleged violations.

"I have to consider a vigil and hunger strike as some of my choices if the dean's office petition for the case to Vice Chancellor Debra A. Freund. After Freund reviews the report, she will take control of the protest proceedings, Murphey said.

No time line is set up for the committee's actions on the case, but it works "as fast as possible," Murphy said.

Moore said he expects to hear back from the committee this week. But he said he did not rule out continuing protests to the Maxwell dean's office.

"I have to consider a vigil and hunger strike as some of my choices if the dean's office does not rule out continued protests to the Maxwell dean's office."

"I think I definitely have to consider it."

Moore is also upset that Short, Kim and the two other graduate students in the GEO 815 class submitted an article without the dean's consent, he said.

In November 1998, Moore contacted the "Professional Geographers," who published one of the articles, said Stuart Aitken, co-editor of the journal. Aitken wrote back to Moore Dec. 3 saying he would hold the article until Jan.10 so Moore could file a formal grievance to SU.

"SU's decision about the case would determine whether the article would be published, Aitken said.

Now that Moore has filed a formal grievance, Aitken said he plans to speak to the journal's lawyers and contact SU about the case. The article is scheduled for publication in the August 2000 issue, Aitken said.

"If the article goes on to be published and it's an article that I was at one time listed as a co-author on, that doesn't seem to be professional, ethical or legal," Moore said. "From their perspective, I think it would be a bad move. It would open them up to a great deal of risk legally."

Armando Boniche, one of the three graduate students in the GEO 815 class, said Moore contributed nothing to the article that was submitted.

"All the data collection, writing, research and literature review, that was our work," said Boniche, who was a graduate student in geography when the article was written.

Boniche said he was upset that Moore did not talk to him and the other students in the class before contacting Aitken directly.

"It was very disappointing because he never contacted us beforehand," said Boniche. "He circumvented all of us and went straight to the editor. He should have come to us first."

Moore waited too late to raise the issue again, Boniche said.

"That's really what irritates me," he said. "That two years later this comes to the table out of nowhere."
The Daily Orange hires new editorial staff

The red and white house at 744 Ostrom Ave. is home to The Daily Orange. Beginning today, its new staff.

While the new group is young, the staff expects one of the better years of coverage the campus has ever seen, said Dave Levinthal, editor in chief.

"I think they may be young but they have a lot of talent," Special Projects Editor Jay Davia said. "I don't think that it has to do with how old you are, it's about being dedicated.

Davia was among several veteran members of the D.O. who spent last semester abroad in London before returning to fill positions.

"I think it is going to be different," Photo Editor Adeet Deshmukh said. "A lot of new people with different perspectives. I think we're going to have the same D.O. this year, but a lot more dynamic."

The senior photojournalism major will bring his photography skills to enhance the paper's coverage of off-campus events and world issues, he said.

"College is this bubble people live in," Deshmukh said. "I want to bring in more things that have to do with the world."

The newly-hired staff expressed a general feeling of excitement and an optimistic outlook of the way the semester's paper will be run, Levinthal said.

"It's a good mix of people who haven't been here a lot," Sports Editor Dave Curtis said. "I think that will help the paper work well.

Although several of the major aspects of the D.O. will remain unchanged, there are minor things that will be adjusted to give the readers an even better college paper to read, Curtis said.

Many staffers felt the communication and integration between departments will create better coverage and more in-depth reporting. After experimenting with cross-coverage last semester, the sports staff has already found improvement, he said.

Transition is also a time when some staff members decided to change departments. Lifestyle Editor Sapani Kollali said.

"I wanted something different," Kollali said. "I have a young staff but they seem like they are good learners. I think it will be fine. There are so many veterans — we have a handle on what's going on."

Presentation Director Bill Ehninger said the design staff is trying new approaches in the way graphics will be handled.

"I'm very excited to work with this staff," Ehninger said. "They have a good background as well as experience with lots of energy."

The title's game, Jason Hart's first collegiate start, was a foreshadowing of the game to come. The senior forward scored a game-high 18 points, including a trio of 3-pointers, as the Orange defeated the West Virginia Mountaineers, 71-67.

Jason Hart, a 6-foot-10 L.A. native, was named the game's MVP after a dominant performance with the game-clinching steal as Syracuse slipped past the Mountaineers. Hart finished with 18 points, seven assists, and four rebounds.

BY JEFF PASSAN

The victory snapped a two-game losing streak for the No. 4 Orange (20-2, 9-1 Big East), who remain tied for game-high honors with 18 points against UCLA. But in Hart's mind, the giddy grin on his face was worth the effort.

SU overcomes tough defense

In the first half, the Orange struggled to contain the high-scoring UCLA Bruins (19-0), allowing them to take a 37-30 lead into the break. However, in the second half, SU's defense stepped up, holding the Bruins to just 30 points, as the Orange pulled away to win, 71-67.

The Orange's defense held the Bruins to just 30 points in the second half, shooting just 33% from the field and 1-10 from 3-point range. Meanwhile, the Orange shot 53% from the field and 4-10 from 3-point range, outscoring the Bruins 41-30 in the second half.

The game was a back-and-forth affair, with both teams trading leads and runs throughout the game. However, SU's defense held strong in the second half, allowing the Orange to pull away and secure the victory.

L.A. native Jason Hart was the game's MVP after scoring a game-high 18 points, including three 3-pointers, and leading the Orange to victory. Hart also added seven assists and four rebounds, providing a spark for the Orange's offense.

The win was a welcome sight for SU, who had lost two of their previous three games. The Orange now sit at 9-1 in the Big East, tied for first place with Seton Hall and Villanova.

SU overcomes tough defense
Syracuse, UCLA far from great pasts

Early Sunday morning, more than 40 hungover Syracuse University sports guys gathered in the Carrier Dome to battle for the cup — the shiny silver Media Cup.

The Daily Orange met WAER on the Carrier Dome sidelines to continue the tradition that dates back to the 1950s. Ailer University "sports guys" stumbled to its 62nd Media Cup, losing four of its last five contests.

When John Wooden and his cast of characters rolled into town, fans dropped everything and rushed to the arena. He carried a royal aura, a college hoops emperor flanked by young squires who transformed from awkward athletes to sound players and sound men.

He recruited a redheaded center who once took 22 shots in an NCAA Championship game and missed just one. Unfortunately, for Wooden’s opponents, he played second on the list of centers to play for Wooden, a short jumper behind New York City schoolboy legend Lew Alcindor.

The success stretched to the backcourt as well. Marques Johnson,2 Hangar 8, Sidney Wicks and Gail Goodrich all helped Wooden to basketball’s greatest teacher.

His squads’ dominance rivaled the Yankees’, Celtics’ and Canadiens’. Wooden led his teams to 10 national titles in a dozen campaigns and won 81 percent of his games over 27 seasons.

A quarter century ago, UCLA rolled into town, hitting two goals in its final win at the Dome: to box out on a free throw in the final seconds of a must-win, three-point game.

A tear forms in the old man’s eye.

Brow furrowed and arms akimbo, the aging man cringes in an empty Carrier Dome locker room. After 569 triumphs and two Final Fours, he continues to teach basketball. He sits as one of the best in his business, but as more vocal next to King John of Los Angeles.

But he watched his team squeak past Wooden’s old bunch, running its record to 20-2 in front of nearly 30,000 fans.

The scene looked of time gone by, a decade-and-a-half ago when even the nation’s premier schools dreaded a trip to the Carrier Dome.

With Cameron Indoor Stadium filled with a crowd of campus clones still infants, the Dome served as the Temple of Doom in the college basketball religion.

Few fans escaped its cavernous surroundings with a victory. Perry, passed, Lawrence scored, Derrick rebounded, Billy ran and slumbered.

From 1962 through 1996, the Orangemen won 200 games and dropped 25 under their Wooden watch. Not only did the teams possess a stable of hungry thoroughbreds, it was unique as a spectrum carried a lore of its own.

This Sunday afternoon of Syracuse basketball flowered in the shadow of the glory days. A crowd that once prided itself on boisterous behavior remained silent for eins as the Bruins and Orangemen battled.

The players drew energy from the crowd or each other, as UCLA, who lost to Pepperdine and California this season, shot 51 percent and outlashed Syracuse on the way to beating them on the backboards.

Huddled with Bernie Fine, his 34-year sidekick, Jim Boeheim shakes his head, searching for answers.

For fleeting moments Sunday, the Bruins and Orangemen grabbed their posts.

UCLA rebounded and pitched, running the court for transition layups and controlling the defensive glass. Syracuse counterpunched, jabbing with Jason Hart, another in a long line of great SU point guards. The senior co-captain showed promise in an entertaining first half.

But in the waning moments, reality slapped every observers square in the mouth.

Instead of a roster of unfeathered bodies, UCLA boasted a group of undisabled kids who lacked skills and court smarts.

The floor game mirrored a program in turmoil, a team that saw starting swingman Jaffen Rush suspended for 44 games for contact with a sports agent, an inexcusable NCAA violation. It was, meanwhile, demonstrated a lack of desire, tucking after mistakes and folding itself manhandled in the post for this first time this season.

Two teams, two legacies, one game. In a purer time, the final seconds of a four-point game between two titans contained drama Shakespeare never fathomed.

But SIU did little to win this one — the Bruins did a better job of giving it away.

And the thousands in attendance and the millions watching on TV knew that the great SU team had the ball in the waning moments to win the cup.

"Have you gone, King?" A Carrier Dome turns its lonely eyes to you.
UCLA's aggressive defense. Bruins head coach Steve Lavin employed a 3-2 matchup zone that held All-American candidate Etan Thomas to nine field goal attempts and nine points.

Save its defense on Hart and Shumpert, who together tallied more than half of SU's points, UCLA's effort impressed Lavin. Athletic UCLA (13-9) shot 51 percent from the field, outrebounded Syracuse by nine and limited the Orangemen to 14 trips to the foul line.

"As a coach, you're never too excited about moral victories," Lavin said. "But we met every one of our goals. But they still found a way to beat us, and that shows that they're a very good team.

The nip and tuck duel featured 11 ties and nine lead changes, and SU held the game's biggest cushion at 17-10 just eight minutes into action. After the first minute of the second half, SU's lead grew no larger than a nickel.

The Bruins stayed close courtesy of sloppy Syracuse transition defense. With Dan Gadzuric and Jerome Moise combining for 22 rebounds and guards Watson, Ryan Bailey and Young streaking down the sidelines, UCLA converted several Syracuse misses into quick scores of the fast break.

In the halfcourt, UCLA found its offense all afternoon. Working in the middle of the zone, Gadzuric shot 7-for-9 from the field for 18 points, while Jason Kapono chipped in 13 and Watson scored 11.

"I think we're hesitant on defense," Shumpert said. "We don't want to let in foul trouble. That's leading to no rebounds and no steals. If you keep doing that, you can't win games.

While the Bruins knocked down their shots around the basket, they struggled from downtown and at the foul line. UCLA made only two 3-pointers on the day and shot an anemic 9-for-21 from the stripe.

The Orangemen matched their visitors' brick for brick, SU attempted 24 triples but knocked down just seven. SU also slapped at the foul line, shooting 77 percent and regaining a combined 2-for-7 effort from Ryan Blackwell and Thomas.

But Hart's steady play—combined with Shumpert's touch from deep and held-hard Damone Brown's 10 points and nine rebounds in just 21 minutes—pushed Syracuse ahead to stay. Beyond the points, Hart committed just two turnovers.

SU posted eight giveaways for the game. The point man also led a harassing defense that forced 16 turnovers from the blue and boosted a weary Orangemen bench that played its fourth game in eight days.

"Energy is a weapon thing," Hart said. "You've got to block shots or hit a steal, and the energy is up. It's not something that comes from the coaches. It has to be from the players.

While they led just once in the second half, the Bruins rallied late, making SU fans squirm down the stretch. A Gadzuric dunk brought the Bruinins within 67-65 with 2:11 remaining, but Blackwell stuck back a Hart miss to restore the lead to four.

"We were very fortunate," Orangemen head coach Jim Boeheim said. "At the end we made a couple good plays. Ryan came up big on the drive with the offensive board.

A minute and a half later, with the margin back to two, Bailey fouled Blackwell. The second free throw gave UCLA its last lead. UCLA worked a 4-for-7 effort from the stripe but couldn't break through for the win.

The victory ended SU's non-conference slate, a schedule the Orangemen completed with 11 wins and a single loss. The Orangemen finish the season with six league tilts, starting Wednesday against Pittsburgh at the Dome.

"We didn't play that great, but we pined well enough to win," Hart said. "We got some chemistry back today, and hopefully we can feed off this game.

Hart also excelled in freeing himself on the baseline, pouring in 18 points on 8-for-12 shooting.

To break the Orangemen's last 10 points of the first half, SU's defense forces two 3-pointers. Hart made only two 3-pointers, giving the Orangemen a 44-43 deficit to start the second half.

He capped the run after taking askip pass from Jason Hayes up the left corner with 2:52 remaining. Hart tore an outlet pass from Ryan Blackwell. The second try.

"My movement without the ball was good, and it showed," Shumpert said. "I helped the team. I've been trying to work on it the last few weeks in practice."

February 14, 2000

Nidor canned the front end of a one-and-one but missed the second try.

Thomas, stifled all game by Gadzuric and Moise, snagged the offensive rebound, The SU center got slapped and made 1 of 2 foul shots to give SU a four-point lead at 6:1 seconds left.

Any whim of a miraculous Bruin rally evaporated when Hart tore an outlet pass from Watson's grasp and narrowly dribbled out the clock.

The victory ended SU's non-conference slate, a schedule the Orangemen completed with 11 wins and a single loss. The Orangemen finish the season with six league tilts, starting Wednesday against Pittsburgh at the Dome.

A recent victory over St. John's has SU start the climb back to the middle of the conference, and Saturday afternoon the Orangewomen gained further ground.

James and James led a spirited Syracuse to a 75-62 drubbing of Georgetown in front of a season-high crowd of 1,841 at Manley Field House.

SU players entered the scoring column, helping the team to its second consecutive victory. James and Record topped the list with 29 and 19 points, respectively.

Each Orangewoman provided a different spark, and Syracuse head coach Marianna Freeman said she was waiting to see how the team would play.

"We went through a period of time where our two primary scorers were struggling, and no one stepped up," Freeman said. "It's nice to see our primary people have returned, and in their return, they've brought a few other people along with them."

The idea of teamwork showed in the second half against Georgetown. Syracuse (10-11, 3-7 Big East) had squared up against the Hoyas for advantage with 1407 points.

Then came the rush.

Jazmine Wright scored on a layup, while James drilled a three from the right corner. Shannon Perry drove through traffic in the lane for another layup.

Wright added a rebound bucket, Leigh Aziz scored on a shot off the glass, and James made two free throws, as the Orangewomen opened up a 55-42 lead with 9:15 to play.

On the defensive end, Syracuse has returned to form.

"Some of these questions were so new to me that I don't think everyone had a chance to run with their thoughts, to really think about how they feel," he said. "You can't judge things completely when you know so little about them, and you're just experiencing them for the first time." Young Jews from the United States often struggle to define their religious and cultural connection to their Israeli counterparts. Kaminsky said he believes the trip provided them with a new perspective on their relationship with Israel. "It's bigger than just saying, 'Let's make peace,'" he said. "There's real people involved, and that's something that people sometimes forget about. Israeli Jews are out there manning the front lines so that we can live as Jews elsewhere." Adam Kaminsky noted several marked differences between Israeli Jewish youth and young Jews in the United States. Since the Israeli government mandates military service for men above the age of 18, he said, Israeli Jews are forced to grow up more quickly and adopt a unique sense of responsibility. U.S. Jewish youth, and often the nation as a whole, Adam Kaminsky said, lives under a blanket, while Israeli citizens constantly struggle with domestic security concerns and a shifting political dynamic. "We look at things very differently than people our age elsewhere," he said. "It's a coincidence of a similarity that we're all Jewish." On the road "For the first time," he said, "I saw everything in Israel there to see, but in the Reader's Digest version." he said. "Next time, I'll definitely take it slower, and see more things deeply."
In many ways, the 1980s could be called the era of disposable music. Whereas many groups from the sixties and seventies were quite popular, and still considered relevant by audiences and critics alike, artists and groups of the eighties virtually faded into obscurity. There are a few holdovers — Madonna, U2 and Phil Collins — that are still popular, but in general, the hairbands and bubble gum pop music of the eighties are considered an ironic novelty, at most.

The sad fact is that popular musical taste left most bands behind, and those who survive had to adapt to a new musical environment. Some groups from the eighties, however, have managed to maintain a cult following without modifying their sound. One such group is the Pet Shop Boys, whose latest album "Nightlife" is an amusing, if slightly derivative, throwback to the era of disposable music.

The Pet Shop Boys, made up of vocalist Neil Tennant and musician Chris Lowe, had a number one single in America in 1986 with "West End Girls" and several other radio hits in Europe near the end of the decade.

As the more serious nineties approached, however, the duo faded into relative obscurity. Despite this decline, the band has continued to pump out disco-ready albums for their loyal fan base.

The most interesting part of the band's new album is how melancholically it often sounds. "Happiness is an Option," which superficially sounds disturbingly like a Spice Girls song, actually has brooding and depressed lyrics. "We're born under a blue sky but die in a dark forest/It is not easy/happiness is an option," Tennant sings.

Much of the album is similar to the early work. The songs deal with the pain of losing one's true nature, specifically sexual orientation. "Boy Strangle" combines synthetic background music with acoustic guitars and lyrics such as "See Boy Strangle as an example of youth/so close to the truth/but still for afar." "In Denial," a duet with Kylie Minogue, is also a known for remaining "The Liberation" in 1998, addresses a father in denial of his homosexuality.

Assembly calls for extended Centro hours

BY JOE PIRANEO  Contributing Writer

Assembly members favor an increase of Centro bus service operations around the Syracuse University campus, said Student Government Association Vice President Arish Gajjar Monday night.

"Generally, we are trying to increase bus service and have the system extend later into the night," he said. "Right now, buses are running 40 minutes apart during prime time hours."

Gajjar said the Assembly is working to improve the timeliness of the present bus system.

"Students need to get to class on time and when the buses are late, students are late to class," Gajjar said.

The SGA is considering instituting a shuttle program that runs 24-hours each day in response to a recent Office of Judicial Affairs report that stated alcohol-related driving incidents involving university students are on the increase, said Gajjar.

However, SU officials are still in need of stronger evidence to start the new service.

Semmel details life as an artist, showcases work

Joan Semmel discussed her lifelong transitions as an artist and presented a slide show of her work Monday night in the Hall of Languages.

"Things you do now are important and change the way the next generation sees the world," said Semmel to an audience of 30 students.

She spoke as part of the 9th annual Materials Symposium: Women, Art and Change. The symposium features different women artists throughout the month.

Semmel, an artist and former art history professor at Rutgers University, began as an abstract expressionist in the 1960s. She painted in Spain during a period of religious and repressive culture before returning to the United States in 1970, she said.

It was at this time that Semmel said she realized a change in her work. She became involved in the struggle of women artists protesting the exclusion of women's work in galleries and museums.

 Hackers tap into SU

BY KATE STEVENSON  Asst. News Editor

Computer hackers are responsible for a crash in Syracuse University networks Sunday night and Monday morning, said Dave Butler, director of SU's Network and Systems Services Operations.

Butler said hackers attempted to hijack university networks and use them to transfer attacks to outside Web sites.

A report by the System Services staff at SU's Computing and Media Services, however, indicated that the system failure Monday was due to an Internet connection failure, not a hacking attempt.

Similar failures occurred Feb. 8, 9 and 14, the CMS report said.

SGA revisits student bail bond program

BY STEPHANIE SILVER  Staff Writer

The Student Government Association revived a bill Monday that allows the organization to post bail for students.

Parliamentarian Jonathan M. Taylor motioned to revise and update the Bail Bonds Program Procedure Bill that began posting undergraduate students in 1970. The update further clarifies SGA's responsibility in aiding students.

The bill is part of the SGA Operations Code and can be applied to cover any Student Activity Fee paying undergraduate student that is arrested within Onondaga County, said Butler, a fifth-year architecture student.

Police typically notify SU Public Safety when a student is detained, Taylor said. Public Safety then has to call an SGA representative who will then make the decision whether or not to post bail.

"One student was able to use the system immediately," Butler said. "The system crash was an attempt to a 'denial of service' attack. In a denial of service attack, hackers try to flood an Internet site with a large number of file requests, jamming the site so users cannot access its information, he said."

School resumes in Mexico City
MEXICO CITY — Like a city reawakening from a nine-month slumber, the University of Mexico in Latin America awoke to life on Monday as thousands of students returned classes one week after a police raid ended a bitter student strike.

But even as the vast majority of classes were resumed, some 29,000 students at the University of Mexico stayed home Monday as organizers took up heavy course loads to try to make up lost semester, several hundred protesters marched to the campus to demand the release of dozens of students.

Those lingering tensions underscore the challenges ahead for university staff and students, who are seeking to heal divisions left by a conflict that erupted in April over plans to raise fees from a few cents to $145 per term. The strike, which started with an armed police takeover on Feb. 6 after negotiations broke down and clashes erupted between rival student factions.

ESF awaits presidency announcement

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Staff Writer

The State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry will select a new president by the end of this month, said Jeri Lynn Smith, SUNY ESF director of news and publications.

A presidential search committee recommended four finalists Wednesday to the SUNY ESF Board of Trustees. The board met Friday to make a final recommendation to SUNY Chancellor Robert King and the SUNY board of trustees, Smith said.

Current SUNY ESF President Ross Whaley is stepping down from his position after serving 15 years in office. He is leaving to establish the Syracuse area's first charter school, but said he will stay in the SUNY system as a professor. "I want to teach," Whaley said. "I’m looking for something to do academically rather than administratively. I also think it’s time for the institution to handle the excitement and vitality that a new president will bring and for it to move forward."

Whaley said in the fall of 1998 that he planned to resign by July 1999, however, the committee did not find a replacement by that time. "Ross did a fine job as president," said Robert Frey, dean of instruction and graduate studies. "Ross was here for 15 years. The average life expectancy of a president is five years. I think that demonstrated his commitment and ability. He was very well-liked."

SUNY ESF is proceeding with the presidential search process as mandated by the SUNY Bar Association, an organization that creates selection policies, Smith said. Finalists were chosen from a group of about 40 applicants with the help of the Boston-based independent executive search firm Isaacson Miller.

The finalists recently spent two days on campus, meeting with SUNY ESF groups and faculty and giving formal presentations to the college, Smith said.

Nick Channing, an ESF junior landscape architecture major, said he hopes the new president will not disrupt the atmosphere of the school. "ESF is a real laid-back place and everyone is very supportive," Channing said. "Sometimes when a new president comes in they change everything. I hope any changes made are done calmly and gradually."

Frey said he hopes the new president will keep SUNY ESF "stable and very successful at what it does."
National Gay Lobby endorses Sen. McCain

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Asst. News Editor

Bush and McCain both represent a threat to gay and lesbian community might make during the next president's term, said Matthew Romanello, executive director of the Lobby. But it is Bush who represents the most serious threat, he said.

The Lobby decided Jan. 19 to endorse candidates for the Republican primary as well as the Democratic contest.

It endorsed McCain to draw votes away from the more conservative Bush, Romanello said. Lobby leaders asked registered Democrats to change their party registration just so they could vote in the Republican state primary to vote against Bush.

"John McCain getting elected, that's not a bad thing. But I'll take four John McCains before one George W. Bush," Romanello said. "You may not agree with it, but at least he stands for something.

McCain and Bush campaign officials could not be reached for comment.

Despite the public endorsement of a Republican candidate, members of the gay and lesbian community should not take the announcement to mean that the Lobby will support McCain during the general election, Romanello said.

Both Bush and McCain are clearly conservative and their views do not reflect the issues that are important to members of the gay and lesbian community, he added.

"The political reality at that point in time was that George Bush appeared to be an extremely strong presidential candidate and the anointed standard bearer of the Republican party," Romanello said. "Winning the election for us in this case means keeping George W. out of the White House."

Syracuse University student Eric Estes, co-president of Open Doors, the university's graduate student gay advocacy group, agreed but said that McCain's election might not be a total disaster for the gay and lesbian community.

"I don't think that McCain or Bush is any great friend of the gay community, but McCain has at least shown some willingness to listen to what more liberal members of the Republican party have to say," Estes said. "Bush has refused to ever meet with gay Republicans. Bush is completely the worst candidate."

Bush's views are too conservative for most Americans, not just the gay and lesbian community, he added.

"It's clearly the least open-minded," Estes said. "I think Bush has run to the right while McCain has run more to the center."

The Lobby's public endorsement of McCain may aid the momentum he gained after his crushing defeat of Bush in the New Hampshire primary and help him to win primaries in traditionally liberal states, Estes said.

The endorsement will probably not affect primary outcomes in conservative states such as South Carolina, but it could sway supporters toward McCain in more progressive states like California, he added.

The most recent New York state poll released Feb. 10 from the Quinnipiac College Polling Institute shows McCain trailing Bush 44 percent to 37 percent. The gap, however, closed from the 47 percent to 29 percent lead Bush held over McCain in a Jan. 19 poll.

The fact that the Lobby endorsed any candidate marks definite progress for the strength of the gay and lesbian community's voice since the last presidential election, Estes said.

"It's remarkable how much the two Democrats have courted the gay and lesbian community," he said. "Just looking back to '96 there was hardly any mention of the issue."

The Lobby endorsed former New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley on the Democratic side of the state primary contests, but Romanello admits the possibility of Bradley winning the nomination is slim at this point.

Lobby officials are hesitant, however, to guarantee their support to Bradley's opponent Vice President Al Gore in the general election because of his support of the "don't ask don't tell" policy, he said.

The policy, currently practiced by the U.S. military, allows gays to serve as long as they keep their sexual orientation to themselves.

"The only people ranting and raving and screaming and jumping off the walls about this are Gore supporters," Romanello said. "Why any gay person would vote for Al Gore is beyond me."
Cowardly hackers stir up trouble

A silent thief travels the dark back roads of the Information Superhighway.

He has a simple plan. He wants attention, and he wants to make a nuisance of himself.

Last week, users tried to log onto search engine yahoo.com, bookseller amazon.com and virtual product retailer ebay.com. Last week, they received only error messages. The meddling fingers of hackers overloaded Internet servers with piles of useless information, effectively locking bonafide customers out.

A Syracuse University official said Monday that the university's computers may have been illegally used to launch one of these attacks.

Hackers don't need a college transcript full of high-level computer programming to cripple Net-based companies for a day or two. But the ability to use modern technology is a privilege, not a right. And it's a right that must be taken seriously.

For would-be surfers, the recent rash of infiltrations may only have amounted to a minor inconvenience. But for companies hit by the hackers, millions of dollars in potential sales may have been squandered.

These low-level Internet prowlers are cackling in satisfaction while watching high-profile online enterprises scramble to pick up the pieces after the cash loss. Encouraged by their initial successes, they'll surely try to strike again.

To safeguard against future attacks, Internet companies should take a proactive role in securing their sites. Waiting for disaster to strike will cost not only revenue, but credibility as well.

SU must also establish better computer security measures to fight hackers. One computer junkie with a vendetta against SU could shut down campus Internet and e-mail access for hours.

Trumped-up security measures are no substitute for responsible, controlled usage of 21st century technology.

Harness the powers of the Internet to explore and learn about the world — not destroy the ties it has helped create.

HENRY Y. CHUNG

Syracuse University is an appallingly apathetic campus.

It's hard for outsiders to believe that our university is indeed the home of the prominent Maxwell School of Public Affairs. Case in point: Hillary Clinton's visit last Wednesday was perhaps the most meaningful campus event this year and an extraordinary experience of which Syracuse students should all be proud. How often do we get the First Lady of the United States to address our student population?

Surely, the egotistical Student Government Association unanimously rejected funding the event sponsored by the College Democrats, providing irrefutable evidence like, "the Dems failed to observe funding guidelines."

Moreover, the attendance at Clinton's speech was quite disappointing. There were a number of empty seats in the middle and on both aisles on the floor level of Goldstein Auditorium. The balcony was no means "jam-packed."

Even Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw failed to attend the event without letting the community know the reason for his absence. Clearly, it was not the most courteous way to welcome the first lady in Central New York.

Many undergraduate students use their energy in rushing, pledging and bargaining to obtain academic achievements, but few of these attend SGA meetings. There is a good reason for that. In addition to their generally uninspiring weekly meetings, SGA members have a fabulous track record of voting "unanimously" on almost all resolutions that are presented before them. For instance, they unanimously voted against the funding of Clinton's speech and for Students Opposing Urtz's Regime's proposed to remove Anastasia Urtz, Director of Judicial Affairs.

The excessive use of "voting by acclamation" only reveals that SGA's decision-making process is a far cry from independence. Precisely speaking, each SGA member casts his or her vote by following the mass only to avoid criticism by fellow members. That is the antithesis of a democratic government. We vote for our representatives because we want them to speak their minds and vote according to their conscience, rather than "playing it safe" and following the majority.

The same token applies to NYPIRG, a left-wing lobbying group that supposedly supports progressive policies. As a record, NYPIRG started to receive student funding last year after the SGA's "unanimous" verdict to grant its funding. How can a student government so casually channel students' money to a left-wing lobbying group without conducting a careful investigation?

And how many students know that they can demand their S6 refund by going to the NYPIRG chapter on campus? Besides occasionally sponsoring roundtable discussions and voter drives, how many times has NYPIRG taken a proactive stand on authentic political issues on campus? At best, NYPIRG's contribution to campus activism is minimal.

On a graduate level, the Law School Senate is perhaps the most superficial among all other student governing bodies. Aside from sponsoring sophomoric social activities such as "karaoke" contests and alcohol-induced "tur night," the most "political" issue the Senate has taken this year was petting to bring back our snack bar lady, who was transferred to a different dining hall. While I do not dispute the significant role of the snack bar lady, the Senate can and should get involved in more local and national issues, such as sponsoring debates on tort reform and inviting high-profile speakers like Alan Dershowitz to campus.

Nonetheless, I have discovered that one is not allowed to speak openly in a Senate meeting unless she has "made an appointment" with the Senate president in advance. That is not how a Senate should be run. The Law School Senate's effective way of stifling urgent matters must be discouraged. As a law student, I am ashamed to have this body represent my interests.

By far, and surprisingly, the sole group that has taken a proactive stand on campus affairs is the Asian Students in America. This ethnically-based group has launched a groundbreaking campaign to protest the deplorable 1998 Denny's incident. Last semester, ASIA organized a one-day lobbying crusade in Auburn to alert the media of the controversy. I applaud ASIA's diligent efforts to bring student activism to Syracuse's campus.

Other groups should look to ASIA for leadership and guidance.

Inequality exists every day on campus but we have largely neglected its presence. However, we witnessed the tragic stabbing of our football players last fall. We have also observed the usurpation of student rights like the Denny's incident and the well-received misconduct of Judicial Affairs.

It's time for student groups to unite together, take a proactive stand and combat injustice. Then and only then will Syracuse be a better place for all of us.

that students were responsible for the attack.

"There's no reason to suspect anyone inside the university," Butler said, "It certainly could be, but we don't know yet."

Because SU's system identified the information as an attack, the hacker program was kept from leaving university systems, he said. The failures Sunday and Monday were a result of the network's rejection of the attack, Butler added.

"In a strange way, it was a good thing," he said. "We don't think the attack got out of SU. We think our servers stopped it."

Butler said he did not suspect it's coming from.

"A sniffer is a device put on a network that tracks information going in and out," Butler said. "We look at the information and try to find out its destination and where it's coming from."

"A cracker is a type of person who breaks into a system, but what you do inside the system is the difference," Butler said this kind of cracking attack is not uncommon at SU. "I wouldn't say it happens all the time, though," he said. "But it happens to be that this time they happened to find a server connected to a faster part of the network. You normally wouldn't notice if someone was doing this."

The Internet connection that was down last week, cutting off Telnet service to at least 20 SU students, may be connected to this recent attack, he added. But it cannot yet be proven, Butler said.

"The FBI is involved in the investigation of similar attacks at the University of California in Los Angeles and Santa Barbara," Butler said. "The FBI is interested in an attack like this because it affects interstate commerce, and is particularly interested in attempts to make damage like this happen."

"From my perspective, I just think that the attempt of an attack like this is a serious thing," Butler said. "I hope the authorities find who's doing it and prosecute them."

"We want to go slow so as not to disrupt how students and faculty work," he said. "But we definitely want to be prepared because if attacks like these continue, it makes it hard to work."

The attacks on SU servers have not attracted the scrutiny of the FBI yet, Butler said. If SU officials discover information that may be useful to the investigation, they may contact the bureau, he said.

"True hackers don't respect these kinds of attacks because it's unsophisticated. It's kind of like throwing rocks at someone's window — it disrupts service but there's no skill involved."

DAVE BUTLER director of SU's network and systems services

"Computer enthusiast Tom Hume, a junior television, radio and film major, said there is a difference between a hacker and the type of person who made this attack."

"I guess you could call it a cracker," Hume said. "A cracker is one who breaks any security system and destroys and vandalizes not only the server and site, but collects confidential information. He's purely there for destroying and wrecking havoc."

A hacker, however, is a person who enjoys exploring the details of programming systems and how to stretch their capabilities, Hume said. "Hacking is almost like the challenge of trying to break into a system," he said. "Anyone can break into a system, but what you do inside the system is the difference."

Universities are traditionally a favorite target for hackers because of their relatively open environment and high access to the Internet, he added.

"It's really easy and you get a big bang for the buck," Butler said.

searchers have easy access to computers at schools and can readily swap information. About 60 computers at Stanford University's Monterey marine research center were used Jan. 8 to send commands to popular Web sites, preventing users from accessing sites including CNN.com and Amazon.com.

"It happened so quickly. No clues were left behind," Marisa Pavlik, student news editor at the Stanford Daily.

Campus computers at the University of California and Los Angeles were used in the transmission of the attack which made Amazon.com inaccessible for at least an hour. Don Page, a UCLA spokesman, said the source of the attacks is unknown.

While working in New York City at the time of the sexual revolution, Semmel said she began painting nude figures.
Her painting, "Green Field," shows a couple having sex in a sitting position. Only the woman's back with the man's legs wrapped around her waist are shown.

Semmel later moved from abstract painting to modeled forms of surrealist qualities.
She began painting from photographs of herself. Not one of the 30 nude self-paintings in-cuded the artist's face, but rather the image of a lying figure looking over herself.

"I wanted to emphasize the skin of the canvas, put the viewer inside. The viewer became the figure so that you were forced to experience it as I experienced it," Semmel said.

Semmel searched for more freedom in her work. She experimented with color copies, collage, landscapes, portraits and painting in public spaces, she said. At one time, Semmel focused her painting on gym locker rooms and put an emphasis on mirror images of nude women. She then moved onto overlays, similar to collages, and painting from man-nequins.

Semmel's presentation fused the two areas of art and the women's movement, said Lara Tobin, a senior art history and women studies major.

Lathe laughter. Look for David Letterman's return on Feb. 21, hosting three nights a week initially, with guest hosts to fill out the week. The zany leader of late night TV is still recovering from quintuple-bypass heart surgery performed Jan. 14 and is doing well, according to "Late Show" Producer Rob Burnett. His return comes at a crucial time during the February sweeps period — and producers are hoping he will give the "Late Show" a unique ratings push.

Play it again. Faster than a speeding Bullet, more powerful than the most innovative graphics engine, able to play DVD movies, able to download from the Internet, PlayStation 2 could become the all-purpose unit that will help render the PC obsolete. The new system will be priced around $300 and will be compatible with PlayStation 1 games, though it won't be available in the United States till this autumn. Currently, one in four homes nationwide has a PlayStation 1. Sony expects to ride this popularity straight to the top of the charts as it recommends reserving a unit before it makes its debut.

quote of the day: "Breath is the soul of wit." Shakespeare

Schultz puts 'Peanuts' ahead of time. They say humor that appeals to both adults and children at the same time is difficult to pull off successfully. To be funny without the fallbacks of profanity or sexual innuendo is not an easy task — trust me, each week I try my best in this column and I always seem to fail. But cartoonist Charles Schulz, the creator of "Peanuts," had no problems pulling it off over and over again on a regular basis.

Schultz passed away in his sleep as his final comic was hitting the printing presses Saturday night. His death, at the age of 77, leaves a void in every child at the tree, could never kick the football and was always upstaged by his dog. It was a reflection of how life really is; a lesson for every kid not to back down from the struggle.义

Slight apology. The University of Pennsylvania on Monday admitted some mistakes in a gene therapy experiment that killed a teenage volunteer in September. They have promised improvements but have denied liability for the death. In an unsigned response to the Food and Drug Administration, the university conceded certain reporting and record-keeping shortcomings in its research program — most notably the failure to notify the agency after volunteers suffered serious side effects from the treatment. The FIA is calling for a formal response before deciding on the fate of the program.

SUVs are the newest trend in driving but they have inherent, unknown dangers. By far the world's most-read comic, "Peanuts," is the safety record of SUVs has been spotty at best. SUVs have a higher center of gravity, making them less stable than an ordinary passenger car. Smaller SUVs, like the Chevrolet Tracker, are especially prone to rollovers because of their shorter wheelbase. The number of deaths per million registered drivers for the Sidekick was 279, compared with 161 for regular cars.

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration reported in 1997 that SUVs had the highest rollover involvement in fatal crashes — 36 percent — than any other type of vehicle, compared to 15 percent for regular cars. The NHTSA also reports that the ejection rate of passengers during fatal accidents for SUVs was twice that of regular cars.

Although the number of deaths and rollovers are high for smaller SUVs, the larger SUVs boast some of the lowest death rates of all vehicles. The largest SUV in 1997, the Chevrolet/GMC Suburban, had the lowest death rate, with only 75 deaths per million drivers, according to Consumer Reports. But this statistic, although seemingly endorse for the Suburban, concerns safety experts.

"The larger and heavier vehicle usually

The defense can't give up easy buckets. Their offensive teams continued from page 16 Saturday. The Hoyas duo cooled down Hoyas forwards toate our offense."

"We're hyping a little more pressure," Freeman said. "We can't give up easy buckets. We've got to let our defense dictate our offense." The SU junior handled one point and picked up a lone offensive board.

Record proved another factor in stopping the Georgetown forwards. The SU junior has tied toward loose ball after loose ball and registered a block and five steals. Record also grabbed six rebounds, including five off the defensive glass.

While sharpening her defensive skills in recent games, Record has regained her scoring touch. She led the Hoyas in scoring much of the season but fell into a slump during SU's recent four-game losing streak.

The junior forward scored 19 points against Georgetown on Saturday after hitting for 20 Wednesday night against the Johnnies... Record credits her recovery with an increased sense of patience.

"I've just got to keep shooting," Record said. "Eventually they're going to fall. The coaches have been telling me to try to feel the inside first. Then I can bring it outside."

Heading into Manley tonight, the Scarlet Knights should be fired up after falling to top-ranked UConn 49-45 at the Rutgers Athletic Center on Saturday. The loss snapped Rutgers' four-game winning streak.

The Scarlet Knights got on the board early against UConn, pulling away to a 11-point lead. But a stingy defense by the Huskies forced 20 RU turnovers and aided the victory. Rutgers struggled in the second half, scoring only 19 points on 6-for-24 shooting. Shawnetta Stewart paced RU with 13 points and five rebounds in the loss.

Stewart leads Rutgers in scoring this season with 15.1 points and 6.5 rebounds per game. She helped Rutgers knock off the Orange women 77-41 at the RAC on Feb 6.

The Scarlet Knights applied heavy pressure to Syracuse's offense in the last game. SU's 41-point tally is the lowest output by the Orangewomen this season, Syracuse was held to a 11-point lead.

Rutgers visits Syracuse

BY KEVIN LEITZELL
Staff Writer

Facing No. 10 Rutgers and No. 1 Connecticut in one week is no easy task.

But heading into the rough week riding a two-game winning streak makes things seem a little easier.

That's exactly the position the Syracuse women's basketball team finds itself in.

"With the way we've been playing, we can only get better," SU head coach Marianna Freeman said, "it's nice to get those wins when we've been down."

A 75-62 win over Georgetown on Saturday was SU's second consecutive, as the Orangewomen knocked off St. John's in overtime last Wednesday.

Syracuse looks to build on its winning streak tonight when it faces the Scarlet Knights at 7 p.m. at Manley Field House. The game will be the first test in a difficult week for the Orangewomen, who travel to Connecticut on Friday night.

The SU defense slowed down its opponents' attacks during the two-game upswing.

In the victories, the Orangewomen shut down their opponents' frontcourts. Freeman threw various zone and man-to-man coverages at the Red Storm and Hoyas forwards.

The majority of the scoring came from the perimeter, where the guards were forced to take shots rather than hand them off to inside players.

Syracuse forwards Leigh Aash and Beth Record clogged the passing lanes, warding off possible interior passes and

James breaking slump

On a snowy Monday morning, the Syracuse women's basketball team escapes the weather inside the friendly confines of Manley Field House and works on ball movement against a 3-2 zone.

Team sharpshooter Jaime James is taking particular interest in this drill, knowing that if this situation arises come game day, she will be called upon to knock down the open jumper.

SU's starting five continues to work the ball around, looking for the open player. Suddenly, James pops out on the left wing, where she receives a pass from Shannon Perry. James doesn't hesitate, drilling the triple without grasping the rim.

This scene is far far removed from earlier this season, when James was caught in an admitted "slide," capped by a 1-for-16 shooting performance against Big East basement-dweller West Virginia.

The sophomore guard's confidence has returned, along with her shot.

After the make, James trots back downcourt, exhibiting a Jason Hart-like swagger that has helped her pour like swagger that has helped her pour

SU recruit Davis likened to Thomas

BY ERIC NATHAN

Nine months before he places his Nikes on the Carrier Dome's hardwood, Greg Davis might never get a fair chance.

As talented as he is, the Syracuse basketball recruit will always live in the dark shadow cast by current SU star Etan Thomas.

The comparisons are easy and plentiful. Not only are both from Tulsa, Okla., but each graduated from Booker T. Washington High School — five years apart.

They are both 6-foot-9 with solid frames.

"Coppin State was a good match," head coach Scott Miller said. "The match was a lot closer than the score indicates because of our forfeits. Everyone wrestled a good match."

Continuing his brilliant season, Shawn Thomas beat all three of his opponents to raise his record to 1-0 in the EIWA.

The Orangemen defeated Coppin State 21-19 to earn their first victory in a non-conference match.

Shannon Perry, the lone freshman for SU this season, has been a pleasant surprise, scoring in double digits and grabbing more than seven rebounds per game.

James finds himself in an admitted "slide," but he has "hit the ground running." He is still the only Orange recruit to raise his record to a team-high 22. He is still the only Orange recruit to raise his record to a team-high 22.

SU calls for more security

Federal officials target computer hackers

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

A day after hackers broke into Syracuse University computer networks, campus officials lauded a federal decision Tuesday to give an additional $105 million to build national computer security.

SU's Network and System Services Operations reported Monday that hackers were responsible for a system crash that morning and Sunday night.

Systems Services Director Dave Butler said there was not enough evidence to report the incident to the FBI. But he said that SU is exploring methods to reduce the risk of future attacks.

More than 300 members of the Syracuse University community attended the risk management lecture in Goldstein Auditorium.

Crane used true stories to emphasize the dangers of security and the importance of drinking responsibly.

"In the movies, people get hosed," Crane said. "In real life, sometimes they die."

He recalled a story of Louisiana State University fraternity pledge Benjamin Wynne who was a victim of hazing by SAE in 1997. Wynne, who was the president of his high school's Students Against Drunk Driving chapter, never drank before he rushed SAE in college.

One night during pledge activities, the brothers at LSU pressured new recruits to chug an entire bottle of beer. After finishing the beer, the pledges were encouraged to take several shots of Jagermeister.

Once the event was over, the pledges were escorted back to the fraternity house and put to bed. In the morning three pledges, including Wynne, were found unconscious. He died a few days later with a blood alcohol level of .46, Crane said.

Crane said because of these incidents the Greek community are exploring methods to reduce the risk of future attacks.

"Every single reported hazing incident and date of a sequestrated rape in the Greek system has been alcohol-related," he said.

Crane discussed the ramifications of irresponsible drinking by new members, especially when coupled with hazing. They both result in the negative stereotypes associated with Greeks, he said.

"The Greeks aren't the problem, but they are the most visible," Crane said.

Dave Drobnis, a second-year architecture major and SAE brother, said non-Greeks regard the Greek system as a party system.

"People hear about these stereotypes," Drobnis said. "At SU, it's a very weak system. It really is focused on drinking, parties and bars."

Lisa Walsh, graduate assistant in the Office of Greek Life, said Greeks experience the same alcohol issues as the rest of the campus, but they are more noticeable.

"They have to realize they are a targeted group," Walsh said. "They have to be leaders. The word 'social' and 'party' should not mean alcohol."

The Panhellenic Council maintains a rule that during the six-week social pledge period, women are not allowed to drink, said Jocelyn Guschl, a junior.

Students discuss hazing

Police beating elicits student concern

The Feb. 4 arraignment of Syracuse Police Department Officer James Mullen on charges of third-degree assault should alert students to the prejudices existing in the law enforcement system, said Janal James, Student Government Association president.

Mullen, who pleaded guilty to the assault of a 12-year-old black girl, faces a four-month unpaid suspension from the police department and other minor punishments, Syracuse Police Sgt. Joseph Sweeney said.

"This is not nearly enough punishment," James said. "The department should consider having him permanently removed."

The situation will not help the public image of police, said Sandi Pessin, external chairwoman of Point Zero, a Syracuse University group that advocates racial sensitivity.

"Examples like this will be brought back into the light in the future," Pessin said.

More than 100 police officers rallied at the city of Syracuse Public Safety Building to support Mullen on the day of his arraignment.

A minority officers participated in the rally, which received criticism from public officials and religious groups alike.

The Syracuse Police Benevolence Association organized the rally.

Diallo case raises race issues

BY KEVIN TAMAPONE
Asst. News Editor

The alleged Feb. 4, 1999 murder of Amadou Diallo by four New York City police officers has members of the Syracuse University community searching for answers.

"If this was a white man, would he have ended up with 19 bullets in him? I believe the answer is no," said Lakeisha Alston, a student in the College of Law and member of the Black Law Student Association. "It's disgusting, that's what it is."

Diallo, who was black, was shot 19 times and died on the porch of his New York City apartment. The four white officers, Kenneth Bosh, Richard Murphy, Edward McLemore and Sean Carroll, are currently on trial in New York State Supreme Court in Albany and have been charged with second-degree murder. If convicted, they could face 25 years to life in prison.
COLUMBIA, S.C. — George W. Bush and John McCain swapped charges of negative campaigning as two sides of the same campaign coin at a close quarters debate before the South Carolina primary.

You should be ashamed," the Arizona senator lectured his rival, "Don't compare me to Bill Clinton." Bush snapped back.

McCain said he had ordered his staff days ago to stop running any negative ads. But Bush, seated scarcely three feet away, waved a printed flyer that he said attacked him harshly and had turned up on a car windshield earlier in the day.

"That is not by my campaign," McCain said, "I don't say paid for by McCain committee," was Bush's instant rejoinder.

The rapid back and forth between the two men left the third contender, Alan Keyes, to complain about the tone. "Is this the kind of pointlessly squabbling we really want to see?" he said of a television and watching CNN's broadcast. The studio audience applauded.

Climate officials back free trade

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Two anti-smoking television ads filmed in and around the Philip Morris national headquarters in New York have been widely shown in a group established to fight teenage smoking under the national tobacco settlement.

The decision to pull the two ads, just now being rolled out, was part of the American Legacy Foundation's first major advertising effort, which was made yesterday by the foundation's board, a spokesman said today.

The ads are part of an aggressive campaign to save a struggling company and sometimes generated campaign that began appearing early this month. One of the ads featured hundreds of body bags filled with tobacco, lying around the Philip Morris building, and another included footage of a young actress entering the Philip Morris offices carrying a box labeled "for detection," the spokesman said.

Soon after those two ads were available to screen, Philip Morris announced it was looking into possible legal action to keep them off the air.

IRA pulls out of peace talks

LONDON — The Irish Republican Army, battling to reassert its leverage in their Northern Ireland peace process, said today its decision to pull out of peace talks was not because of the continuing IRA disarmament in the embattled British province.

The IRA's political wing, Sinn Fein, issued a statement urging the IRA to keep them off the air.

Rivers poisoned in Hungary

IRAN, Aug. — An anonymous "toxic bullet" killed at least 10,000 fish in the Danube river in southern Hungary, leaving a trail of aquatic devastation that will require years to repair.

Environment officials said today that the Adriatic and Danube rivers in Yugoslavia, with another 400 miles to go before reaching the sea, are in danger of contamination for being wasteful and careless.

The Danube river, which is 2,870 miles long, flows through 11 countries and is one of Europe's most important waterways. But Hungarian officials say the spill as Europe's worst environmental catastrophe since the 1986 nuclear accident at Chernobyl.

The officers were patrolling Diallo’s Bronx neighborhood, searching the area for armed criminals when they saw Diallo crouching on his porch. The officers said that they approached him and identified themselves and then observed him reaching for what they believed was a gun. McMellon fell backward on Diallo’s porch as the officers were approaching him, turned out to be his wallet.

Diallo’s death is indicative of the continuing presence of racism in American society, Alston said. “A lot of people believe because it’s not the 1940s, fifties or sixties, that racism doesn’t exist anymore. Racism does exist, it’s just more sugar-coated,” she said. “We’ve got people walking around with a badge can make them racist, but people walking around with a badge can be racist too.”

Walking around with a badge can cause it’s not the 1940s, fifties or sixties, that racism doesn’t exist anymore. Racism does exist, it’s just more sugar-coated,” she said. “We’ve got people walking around with a badge can make them racist, but people walking around with a badge can be racist too.”

“Regardless of the cause of the problem, finding a solution that will prevent incidents like this from occurring in the future is critical,” Alston said.

Many police departments, including the city of Syracuse, have suggested programs to make officers’ sensitivity to racial issues a remedy for incidents like the Diallo case. The Syracuse Police Department recently grappled with such racial issues when a white officer struck a 12-year-old black girl with his nightstick while investigating a domestic dispute.

Sensitivity training programs will definitely have a positive effect on police departments that use them, but are really only the beginning to solving much larger problems that contribute to events such as these, Alston said.

The best thing police departments can do to prevent these tragedies is begin recruiting more women and minority officers, Alston said. Police officials cannot expect to go into neighborhoods that are mostly populated by minorities and effectively enforce the law with a police force fully composed of white officers, she said.

Irma Almirall-Padamsee, director of the SU Office of Multicultural Affairs, said efforts to combat racism must go beyond the police departments and include the rest of society as well. Incidents like the Diallo case can be prevented, even though the solutions may not be obvious or easy to find, she added.

“People can make generalizations about what they’re doing or how they’re acting based on what somebody looks like.”

Students deserve textbook choices

The printed word costs a pretty penny these days, especially on college campuses.

Students thought they had found a way to slash the rising cost of their textbooks by buying textbooks from Internet booksellers.

But the National Association of College Stores has other plans. The association filed a lawsuit against Varsitybooks.com in October, charging the Internet textbook vendor with false advertising. The site hawked textbooks, claiming discounts of “up to 40 percent off.” But the association’s study of 44 books available on the site found prices to be comparable — if not higher — than university booksellers.

Syracuse University, an association member, backs the suit. University bookstore personnel reported that the site has failed to be forthcoming in their advertising campaigns, promising deals they don’t deliver.

While the association’s claims may be valid, their study is hardly unbiased. Books sold off of Internet shelves have sent college bookstores running scared, and the lawsuit is likely an unwelcome jab at these new competitors.

Most university bookstores monopolize the textbook market on their respective campuses. The convenience to swipe a university bookstore for textbooks shouldn’t provide much competition. College students deserve more credit than the association gives them. Most students are seasoned penny-pinchers: Price-shopping between the Net and the university bookstore for textbooks shouldn’t provide much of a challenge to those hoping to save a few bucks.

Students have no choice when rising tuition costs force them to pour dollars into university coffers each year. But they certainly deserve to pick where to spend their hard-earned money when it’s time to hit the books.

Religious teachings differ in thought on God’s attire

It has become the opinion of American pop culture that it is a lot like us — only bigger. The God of television and film is often represented as a booming voice from above, the source of which is bearded, omnious, male and white.

He is Sante Garnett on steroids. God the actor is an Old Testament ruler. He is powerful bully of a deity and related to the God-as-giant portrayal of Mount Sinai. This idea is strange, because Americans are of mainly Protestant faiths and believe in a more indirect representation of God.

Kevin Smith’s recent flop, “Dogma,” gave us God-as-rock star image when he tried to convince us Adam’s Mariotte was anything but an atheist. The vegetation Debbie Gibson wanna-be, George Burns, a lord of comedy, took on the role of the simpering for the movie “God,” in which he played the least likely version of the Christian creator — a cigar-smoking, frail wire-crisp- er. If these deity representations are so absurd, then why are we to believe he is sitting on a huge cloud somewhere in a bright white robe? After all, man was created in God’s image, according to Genesis. And that should mean more is likely God is George Burns in a kooky clown suit.

As a Christian, I would think so. However, if that is true, fact raises all new questions about the master of the universe. I first question is a problem that has haunted the ages: Does God wear pants? I think there are two facts. First, I believe he wears wool pants. It makes perfect sense that the Christian God who lives above the clouds where it is very cold, ails up in the morning with some nice gabardine trousers. Doesn’t he have to keep calling him a shepherd? I mean, it’s set on the scene that you don’t have access to the raw materials.

The second question is obvious: boxers or briefs? OK, that may border on sacrilege. But it’s a question that I think needs to be asked. However, the answer here is much more elusive, and must be broken down by religion.

The following is an excerpt from my Christian logic.

The stories of Judaism and Christianity both begin with the first of the Five Books of Moses: Genesis. The religions share prophets and beliefs with some dramatic similarities but a crucial difference. All that matters, however, is a common belief that God, at the time of creation, looked like you and me. I declare victory here, but other battles are not so simple.

Islam offers a challenge. The concepts that God rests on the seventh day of creation or that God is incarnate in any human being are considered blasphemy by Moslems. In fact, according to the Koran, a personifying the One True God is the only sin Allah cannot forgive. In other words, I’m risking eternal suffering if I call God Smith. Any way you slice it, it’s a harder nut to crack.

Buddhism emphasizes experiencing the truth for oneself. The Buddha, known as the first of the Five Books of Moses: Genesis. The

Columnist fails to see student activism efforts

To the Editor:

In his opinion column in Monday’s Daily Orange, Henry Y. Chang talked about a lot of the State Public Interest Research Group’s strong support of campus activism. Public interest group does not merit the label of “left-wing” as progressive ideas are inherently non-partisan. Chang’s characterization is more accurately a recognition of the resistance of right-wing groups have shown in embracing progressive stances on issues.

NYPIRG has, in fact, received substantial funding from the State Public Interest Research Group’s strong support of campus activism. The group presented new students last semester and regularly buses students to the Capito steps in Albany to raise their voices against cuts in higher education funding and for environmental legislation regarding toxic waste and pesticides. The group presented new students last semester and regularly buses students to the Capitol steps in Albany to raise their voices against cuts in higher education funding and for environmental legislation regarding toxic waste and pesticides.

This is a great opportunity to see the impact of such an empowering campus force as minimal. Instead, it seems that some progressive activists have made a mistake by making such a great opportunity to make a difference.

Don’t delay, don’t mourn — organize.

Panhel is currently engaging in The College of Arts and Sciences. "I think people have a need to categorize people so they do it with the greeks," she said. "It's easier to do with the greeks."

Crane said the media reinforces these stereotypes by focusing on the negative aspects of greek life instead of their charity work.

SOME non-greeks, however, feel that the stereotypes are a fair portrayal.

"I think the greek system is based on partying and uses philanthropy to cover that up," said Allison Bellins, a freshman public relations major. "If you have to use beer to get people to join, that's ridiculous. That is one of the reasons I didn't rush."

rally in Mullen's defense, Sweeney said. Many people confused the association's actions with the feelings of the entire police department, he added.

"The Syracuse Police Department did not condone this protest," Sweeney said. "The perception that the department was involved in the protest came across to the public."

Syracuse minority police officers responded to the rally with a formal apology to the girl and her family.

Mullen also wrote a letter of apology to the girl. He was required to retrain at the police academy, participate in diversity training and complete an eight-month assignment that would keep him away from the public.

The situation began Dec. 2 when Syracuse Police were called to a domestic dispute on Glenwood Avenue. Upon police arrival, a resident retaliated against authority by choking and attacking the two officers.

Syracuse Police Chief John Fagle, unhappy with the arrest, dropped the charges against the girl hours later, and initiated an investigation against Mullen.

Some police officers accused Fagle of being unsupportive of the officers who were involved in the dispute.

"The department is not commenting on the situation, because as far as we're concerned the situation is legally over," Sweeney said.

But questions of racism still linger, Pessin said.

"If (Mullen) were to see an incident like this happening, he would arrest that person immediately," she said.

James cited the need for greater role models within police departments.

"Obviously a situation like this hurts the community as a whole," James said. "The police department needs to be proactive instead of reactive."

Oscar Picks

The Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences divided its Oscar nominations Tuesday between the old-school material it has always favored and the more cutting-edge efforts that once would have been unthinkable as contenders. The best picture list includes Frank Darabont's "The Green Mile" and Lasse Hallstrom's "The Cider House Rules." "Being John Malkovich" got a pair of acting nominations and Paul Anderson's "Magnolia" got three nods.

You Betcha

Race tracks across the country will accept future wagers on the Kentucky Derby in a format that lets bettors choose from 23 contenders or pick the "field," consisting of all of the other nominees to the race. Wagering opens at noon Thursday, though most bettors will want to observe the results of Saturday's Fountain of Youth Stakes at Gulfstream before making a choice. The pool closes at 4:30 p.m. Sunday, and at that time bettors lock in the odds on their selection.

False advertising claim hits bookseller

BY COREY HANN
Asst. Lifestyle Editor

Stumbling through the aisles searching for textbooks is becoming passe. Chic online retailers have made their way into the market, providing students with a viable alternative to traditional bookstores. But with the competition comes controversy.

VarsityBooks.com received some unwanted hits on their site recently. The National Association of College Stores is accusing the online mogul of false and misleading advertising regarding their claims of providing 40 percent discounts on textbooks and college supplies.

The association, which represents the Syracuse University Bookstore and more than 2,600 other college bookstores nationwide, is not seeking monetary compensation but instead has appealed for VarsityBooks.com to discontinue making their so-called claims, according to a press release from the NACS.

"We cannot stand idly by when huge sums of money are being spent on deceptive advertising and promotional campaigns aimed at students," said Laura Nakoneczny, representative of the NACS.

These accusations are the result of a study, conducted by the association, comparing the online retail prices of books from a variety of disciplines to the book prices in college bookstores. Of the 104 books, 89 of them were offered at the same or lower price by the college stores.

"Even with all the advertising and publicity recently about the online booksellers and the discounted prices and conveniences they offer, these findings show that, at least with textbooks, those claims may not always be accurate," said George Herbert, president of the NACS.

"With the success of Olympic sports like ice hockey and synchronized swimming, I think you'll continue to see schools adding new sports," she added.

Emerging NCAA sports such as ice hockey, synchronized swimming, water polo, archery, badminton, bowling and even squash are other sports gaining popularity among women.

At SU, women's sports are increasing in number as well, said Janet Kittell, associate athletic director.

"It's a reflection of what's happening on the national scene," she said.

Men's sports and women's sports are moving closer to becoming equal partners," she said. Kris Sanford, SU's women's crew head coach said she is pleased with the state of women's sports at SU and women's athletics has received adequate resources lately.

"Syracuse is doing a phenomenal job with Title IX," she said. "We don't want for anything.

Changing times

NCAA women's rowing has expanded over the past five years. In 1997, there were about 7,500 NCAA women's rowing teams. Today there are 126, with more schools jumping on the bandwagon.

"Rowing used to be totally an East Coast sport, and now there are programs starting up all over the place," said Lisa Long, associate athletic director and women's varsity coach at the University of Southern California, in a Los Angeles Times article.

Rowing is a sport that requires a large team, which in turn means it can command up to 20 athletic scholarships, the most the NCAA allows for any women's sport. Those 20 scholarships are going a long way to solve a big inequity: the apple amount of scholarships that go to football players.

"There is only the way to gain athletes fast," said U.S. Rowing's Sarah Taylor. According to women's athletics director Lisa Long, a sophisticated information systems major, walked on at Rowing. Like 75 percent of the women's competition in college, she has touched an oar before a friend dragged her to practice a year or two until she lived up to the expectations.

"I started because some friend did it, and I wanted to lose weight," Long said. "The sport just clicked with me."

Money matters

Syracuse still offers scholarships to coming athletes, both for the student athlete and the coaching staff.

"We'll be going up to 20 athletic scholarships this year," she said. "It's a reflection of what's going on."

"A full scholarship is a lot of pressure for an 18-year-old kid. There are expectations from parents in instillation as well. You have to win." Another leap forward in the realm of women's sports is broadcasting. SU women's basketball games are being broadcasted by WorldTeam in Syracuse, known as W-News, and Empire Sports, a cable network based in Buffalo. Women's National Basketball Team has over 20 televised games this season, and ESPN will air more NCAA Division I Women's Basketball Championship games than ever before, according to the Women's Sports Foundation. Olympic women's figure skating is second only to the Super Bowl in total viewing audience.

"We can now order books from our favorite Web site and have the privilege of charging it to their bookstore account. They are wise of where the deals are," said. In the article, "where is the fairness in telling me there is no room for them?"

Title IX will continue to produce women who will pursue sports and universities will continue recruiting female athletes. Nicole Garofalo, a freshman member of the women's crew team, rowed in high school before being recruited by SU last year.

"I rowed all four years of high school," she said, "and I still like it." Another common complaint is the safety of using credit cards to purchase books over the Internet. VarsityBooks.com boasts one of the highest encryption levels in electronic commerce, but the company does not easily sway skeptical students.

"I don't trust giving my (credit card) number online," said. "Net. After the slew of big online sites that got hacked last week and only proves more right," said junior biology major, Robert La Duke.

Mike McDonald, a junior broadcast journalism major, said he thought buying online was too risky a hassle.

"I would rather go to the bookstore and get them right away," he said. "I'm not risk getting the books 'til the week before,"

To improve their image, the company has enacted an aggressive marketing campaign to hire student employees to pass out flyers to students and hire students to pass out flyers to campus and local area stores. Large advertisements in college newspapers. Benefits from this and other efforts are expected to exceed $3 million and, in some cases, stock options and cash bonuses are offered to student employees.

"I think the deals are," said English. "I still like it."

Toyota now offers coffee and have the privilege of charging it to their bookstore account. They are wise of where the deals are."

This would be the last time Syracuse found the hoop, as the Rutgers press remained a thorn in SU’s side.

“We needed some points at the end,” Stewart said, “and we got into our press.” Said Stewart, the Scarlet Knights leading scorer and rebounder. “We just happened to get a couple steals and make some crucial baskets.”

Rutgers guard Tasha Pointer would start the deciding run with a coast-to-coast layup. The subsequent press forced a turnover and a free throw by Usha Gilmore and a jump shot by Linda Miles. Stewart then hit the first of two foul shots holding on to a six-point advantage at the half.

Gilmore followed with another steal, and Pointer found an opening at the other end for a layup on which Erin committed her fifth foul. SU was finally able to break the press after Pointers free throw, but remained unable to score.

After a Record miss, Gilmore nailed a crucial jumper to cut the Orange women’s lead to two, 51-49. Syracuse had trouble again breaking the press, but in the process Gilmore fouled SU forward Leigh Atz.

An ensuing argument broke out at the referee table as to whether Gilmore had five fouls or six, which had student band members chanting, “It’s a school night,” was enough to ice the forward, who missed the free throws.

Rutgers rushed forward in the last minute and 1.3 seconds left. Stewart drove the lane, creating a layup out of nowhere. Stewart converted the 3-point play, giving the Scarlet Knights a 55-51 advantage it would never relinquish.

Another Sutton-Brown turnaround jumper left the Orange women down 54-51 with 12 seconds to go.

Syracuse set up at half-court and Shannon Perry, who finished with seven points and six assists, found the hot-handed James in transition and it was an inconsequential attempt that fell short, as the refs whistled in another foul on Perry.

James finished with 20 points and six 3-pointers but missed the majority of the game and ended up 5-9 from beyond the arc.

“This one hurts,” James said. “When you give everything you’ve got, you put it on the line, and it comes down to one 3-pointer — and you just don’t hit it. It’s like you’d give all those three back just to hit that one.”

For the Orange women, knowing they outplayed the No. 8 team in the country for the majority of the game is encouraging, especially with a matchup against No. 1 UConn on Friday in Storrs.

“It is tough to just play real tough and to really want to win the games as much as we did,” Record said. “And then to come down to the end and lose it. I’m just real sure that once we do turn that corner and once we do win those games that we’re not winning now, we’re going to be great.

“Right then, people are going to start looking at us as the team to beat.”

Beset by the rash of wounds and expulsions, Pitt still managed to knock off Villanova and Notre Dame. In Wednesday’s 74-61 loss to the Orangemen on Jan. 19 at Fitzgerald Field House.

Forward Ricardo Greer posted a double-double with 18 points and 10 rebounds. The only Panther to start every game, Greer ranks fourth in the league in scoring at 17.7 points per contests and second in rebounding with 9.9 boards.

Center Chris Seabrooks chipped in 17 points on 7-for-9 shooting in the 10-point loss. The 6-foot-9 sophomore bullied past SU’s Etan Thomas and Ryan Blackwell, keeping the Panthers in the game.

Thomas’ defensive play kept the Orangemen out of the lane, hitting a layup as the Rutgers press converted the 3-pointer from forward Tanya Grady, who finished with seven assists.

“He is just not good enough for the court,” Boebhm said. “I was disappointed that two of his first three fouls were in rebounding. We were not doing some things mentally that we can do.”

Freshman gunner DeShawn Williams preserved SU’s unbeaten record four weeks ago in Pittsburgh with a dazzling 23-point performance. The Orangemen shooting guard canned 5-of-8 triples in just 24 minutes.

For the evening, Syracuse compiled a score in transition off the Aziz rebound and an impressive 11-for-23 from behind the arc. Turnovers, however, plagued SU over the last four or five games, especially at the defensive end.

“This would be the last time we’re going to be great. Now, we’re going to be really good,” Thomas said of working against a zone. “You can’t do what you’re capable of doing. If my teammates weren’t stepping up, nobody was making the plays. It would be a different story. If everybody’s punishing teams for (playing zone)."
SU falters late, loses to Rutgers

BY GREG BISHOP

For 36 minutes Tuesday night, the Syracuse women's basketball team played the part of Cinderella to perfection, amassing a 51-40 advantage against visiting No. 8 Rutgers.

However, when the clock struck 3:44 in the second stanza, the Rutgers press forced the slipper off and the carriage turned back into a pumpkin as the Scarlet Knights stormed on a 16-0 run to steal the victory in front of 667 Syracuse faithful at the Carrier Dome.

It marked the 31st time in 23 meetings that SU has gone down to Rutgers.

"I'm very proud of our basketball team," SU head coach Marianna Freeman said. "I thought that we executed our offense and we were patient."

"We caught Rutgers on their heels. The play, the desire of the team, I was very, very proud of it and I think that Rutgers feels that they got out of here very lucky."

Rutgers stormed back with a vengeance, pounding the ball inside to center Tammy Sutton-Brown for two quick baskets to draw within 10. The 6-foot-4 Brown — five inches taller than her defensive counterpart, Beth Record — finished with 22 points and five of 11 shooting.

Rutgers' 77-41 victory earned the Orangewomen their second two-game losing streak of the season — the top of the West.

The two teams, bookending the season, met for the second time in Salt Lake City. However, when the clock struck 3:44 in the second stanza, the Rutgers press forced the slipper off and the carriage turned back into a pumpkin as the Scarlet Knights stormed on a 16-0 run to steal the victory in front of 667 Syracuse faithful at the Carrier Dome.

It marked the 31st time in 23 meetings that SU has gone down to the Orangewomen.

"I'm very proud of our basketball team," SU head coach Marianna Freeman said. "I thought that we executed our offense and we were patient."

"We caught Rutgers on their heels. The play, the desire of the team, I was very, very proud of it and I think that Rutgers feels that they got out of here very lucky."

Rutgers stormed back with a vengeance, pounding the ball inside to center Tammy Sutton-Brown for two quick baskets to draw within 10. The 6-foot-4 Brown — five inches taller than her defensive counterpart, Beth Record — finished with 22 points and five of 11 shooting.

Rutgers' 77-41 victory earned the Orangewomen their second two-game losing streak of the season — the top of the West.

Giuliani visits Syracuse

By Joy Davia

New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani visited an Armory square Irish pub in Syracuse Wednesday night — a visit contrasting the Hollywood-style campaign of senatorial candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton, Giuliani said.

"I am here on a real issue, the heat oil crisis," he said. "This is what a senator does. It's not about Hollywood or scripted appearances."

Giuliani, who has not officially announced his candidacy for the US Senate, said he is pressing President Bill Clinton to address an issue affecting the entire state — the rising cost of heating oil for New York residents.

Returning from a visit to Flattburgh, Giuliani said he decided to stop at Kitty Hoyne's Pub, 301 W Fayette St., on the way back to New York City. He said he was not influenced by Clinton's stop last week at Syracuse University.

"If the issue had not come up, I would have come up a few weeks from now," he said.

New York state spent $14 million to $15 million last year to pay for oil heating. With prices soaring 100 percent to 250 percent last year and higher during the past three months, Giuliani said it was time to take a tough stance against the president and force him to have major oil-producing nations release strategic petroleum reserves.

President Clinton released $125 million in government aid Wednesday to help needy families pay the growing costs of home heating. Last week the governor and others made $130 million available in home-heating aid. About $34.3 million of that money went to New York state.

Giuliani said that was not enough.

"The president who claims to feel our pain isn't feeling the pain of New Yorkers," he said.

Only when oil-producing nations release their petroleum reserves will New York residents start to see a decline in their heating bills, Giuliani said. He added that the president does not want to force oil-producing nations to release the reserves because it is not in the best interest of the United States.

"Mr. President," Giuliani said, "we're part of the nation."

Flemma awaits decision

Tiffany Lankes

After the Jan. 13 removal of Jay Flemma from his position as an adjunct professor in the music law department, the university will reconsider his position this week by reviewing an appeal Flemma filed Feb. 9.

Flemma, who is a 1993 graduate of the Syracuse University College of Law and an associate lawyer with Smith, Sovik, Kendrick and Sugnet, P.C. in Syracuse, appealed last week to the Department of Human Resources in response to a harassment complaint that one of his former students, an SU seniors, filed with the Syracuse Police Department Feb. 8.

The senior had been receiving unwanted e-mails and phone calls from Flemma since October, according to the police report.

Moore speaks to Senate

By Nick Serrano

Former Graduate Student Organization President Joe Burns, 1999-2000, urges GSO to look into the academic appeals process available to Syracuse University students Wednesday night during a GSO Senate meeting.

Moore is waiting for a decision on his own appeal. As a former SU geography professor of plagiarizing his work and mismanaging a graduate class two years ago.

"I am asking you to demand that students be present in decisions that impact the student body," Moore said to about 20 GSO senators. "Now is the time to say we demand the rights, respect and recognition that we have earned as students of Syracuse University.

Council discusses plant, local sewage concerns

By Ryan Donohue

When it rains on the Syracuse University Hill, it stinks in the city, argued officials at a Syracuse Common Council meeting Wednesday.

When it rains, water and melted snow are diverted into the Onondaga Creek to help prevent the backs up, but only after mixing with the human excrement that also runs through the city's sewers. This happens between 50 and 60 times a year, they said.

"It stinks," said Minchin Lewis, the Syracuse city auditor.

Not only does the creek smell bad, but it flows into Onondaga Lake — already one of the country's most polluted bodies of water, he said.

Lewis supports a plan to build a treatment facility on Midland Avenue to store and clean polluted water on over.

University funds improve security

By Sarah Ovaska

Safety measures including additional exterior lighting and the installation of two blue lights on Syracuse University's South Campus are estimated to cost the university more than $50,000, said Mark Oczarski, an SU spokesman.

Funding for the installation of security devices came from a general university construction and maintenance fund, he added.

Plans to establish a Department of Public Safety on South Campus were spurred from recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Campus Security in 1998, Oczarski said. The committee is mandated by the state to serve as a forum for students and staff to express their safety needs and specifically to address sexual assaults, he said.

"The purpose of it is to have a greater presence of security on South Campus and make Public Safety closer and more available," Oczarski said.

Oczarski said that the Office of Design and Construction also installed exterior lighting in the back of 33 apartment buildings and put up three "Welcome to South Campus" signs at the entrances to the complex.

"The signs make it obvious it's..."
RUSSIA, NATO mend ties

MOSCOW — Russia agreed today to resume relations with NATO, easing tensions and fears of a new Cold War created 13 months ago when Moscow broke high-level ties with the Western alliance to protest its bombing of Yugoslavia.

In a surprise announcement Wednesday, President Vladimir Putin reached the surprise agreement with Secretary General George Robertson in a 45-minute Kremlin meeting. It was one of Putin's most significant foreign policy decisions since he assumed power seven weeks ago, and was greeted as a sign here that he wants to reach out to the West.

Russia's break with NATO in March over the conflict in Kosovo was a breakaway region in Yugoslavia, Russia's historical ally — bombed Moscow from the West. In welcoming Robertson to the Kremlin conference room, Putin said he was ready for closer relations with NATO even though last year's attacks still complicate the relationship.

Signs of a possible thaw were evident as early as July, when Russia sent its ambassador to Berlin to discuss the NATO-dealt peacekeeping operation in Kosovo. But the Russian government continued to boycott sessions of NATO's permanent joint council, a forum set up for an exchange of views and to discuss any issue that threatens peace.

While Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov did not say which specific talks prompted the change, he said they included discussions on how to handle the issues of Kosovo and other conflicts in the region.

U.N. official protests strikes

UNITED NATIONS — Hans von Sponeck, one of two senior U.N. officials who resigned this week to protest the impact of cutbacks on his agency, said Wednesday he will also present a farewell report on the developments in Iraq and Britain's air strikes on Iraqi territory.

The career U.N. official, from Austria, was quoted as saying the recent United Nations decision to send 1,600 troops to Iraq was made without a detailed examination of the implications of the operation.

The U.N. officials resigned Tuesday in a dispute over Iraq, saying they were not consulted about the mission.

Rau requests forgiveness

JERUSALEM — In an address significant for its language, President Johannes Rau on Wednesday asked Israel's parliament to forgive him for his removal of the Nazi concentration camps in his youth.

The German president, who was present for the assembly at the site of the former Nazi concentration camp at Dachau, said he was sorry for the crimes committed by the Nazis.

The meeting was the first time a German president had visited the site of the former Nazi concentration camp. The D.O. regrets the error.

Harding remembers King's legacy

BY EVANS BOSTON Staff Writer

One of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s biggest concerns was how to develop a better, safer country, said theology scholar Dr. Vincent Harding, a friend and follower of King.

Harding spoke to an audience of more than 125 students, faculty and area residents Wednesday night at Maxwell Auditorium for the 17th Annual Dr. Martin King, Jr. Memorial Public Affairs Lecture. It was presented by the African-American Studies department.

"This was the assassination of President Kennedy on television," Harding said of King. "He told his wife that this was a violent country, and that he probably would not live to see 40."

When King walked away from his famous march on Washington in 1963, he dealt with many sacrifices, Harding said. He watched many of his followers die, Harding added.

"But the man kept going, kept challenging, kept determining and challenging for our freedom, even though he knew the costs," he said.

King was awarded for his hard work and sacrifices in 1964, when he received the Nobel Peace Prize. Harding said the next year also brought a series of federal immigration acts which King considered a victory because it was a step in increasing the rights of minorities, he said.

"King knew his movement had opened up the door to a new America in 1965," Harding said. King then had to face his fears in order to move forward, he added.

"Perhaps King's greatest fear of all was the fear that nothing could be done to change the past," he said. "King always wanted to point out that his people had been oppressed for more than 300 years. From the days that slavery was fought, we knew that there was a better way."

King's final two years were dedicated to exploring a new United States, protesting the Vietnam War and confronting U.S. poverty, Harding said. Harding then concluded his speech by reflecting on King's last days.

"Of course we need to pay great attention to that great movement in 1963," Harding said. "But his final years of life are the most unfamiliar years yet they are in my mind relevant to the 21st century."

He said King told his followers during his last night alive that they had the opportunity to make the United States a better country.

"He said he knew his movement had brought a victory because it was a step in increasing the rights of minorities, and he was aware of this. I was glad Harding brought it up."

Audience members lauded the university's decision to bring Harding to campus.

"It was an honor to be in the audience," said Susan Ekimunds, an English professor. "I think that this is the best thing SU does all year."
Bird librarian questions air quality

Chairman David Bennett said library employees, especially women, have been filing complaints about the building's poor air ventilation system.

In response, he said, these complaints are under investigation.

"A number of these employees are highly sensitive," said Bennett, a history professor. When library representatives met with AdOp in November to discuss the air quality issue, Virginia Dentone, director of Design and Construction, said the air quality was adequate.

Denton referred to a 1995 report by SU and an independent firm that concluded that the building is above standards, she added.

"The building was designed a long time ago and the ventilation system wasn't updated to accommodate the renovations," she said. "It can be a sick building to work in. At times the air is stale and stagnant and I find myself tired by mid-day."

In response to these complaints, Dentone said Janitors were instructed to clean the library with water. But the employees still complained that they felt sick, she added.

The last test was conducted in the 1986 Fall Semester and confirmed the good air quality of the building.

"The ventilation seems to be good on days that they conduct those tests which is definitely odd," Atwater said. "But on other days, I've seen people get sick in a matter of minutes."

Eliza Spear, a sophomore computer graphics major and employee in the library's shelving department, said although she had not heard student complaints, the air in the library was "dry and dusty."

SU graduate representative Daryl Smith said although a small minority of employees complain about the air quality, the issue should not be minimized because it is a health and safety issue.

"It's been 16 years," he said. "How long is it going to take to do something?"

Cleiriello said students that fall asleep in the library suffer from a lack of fresh air, not exhaustion.

"Sometime a student is going to get hurt and the university won't be able to brush it under the table."

Giuliani slinks to Syracuse too late

Hillary Rodham Clinton and Rudy Giuliani are playing follow the leader.

And with Wednesday's quick stop in Armory Square, the New York City mayor proved that he's lagging a few steps behind the first lady.

Giuliani slipped into town on the heels of Clinton, who spoke last week on the Syracuse University Hill. The mayor blames his belated trip on his downstate obligations, which he claims are keeping him from an upstate campaign launch like Clinton's.

But it's far too soon in the New York State Senate race for Giuliani to be resting on his city laurels. He won or lost his Big Apple votes years ago. Campaigning downstate would be a waste of his time and a disservice to upstaters.

Lever-pullers in upstate voting booths are the ones Giuliani needs to target as the campaign looms.

While Clinton sips coffee with grandmothers and colors with kindergartners in the North Country, Giuliani's lax, city-based campaign loses steam at every juncture.

He has lashed out at Clinton for running a glamorized, "Hollywood" campaign. But Giuliani's too, sports a perpetually sun-kissed visage, basking constantly between late-night talk show appearances and other press-padded photo opportunities.

And 2nd District Congressman Rick Lazio may be creeping up behind Giuliani while he sits pretty on his big-city cushion. If Lazio talks about talk show appearances and other press-padded photo opportunities.

While Clinton's statewide campaign is strong and getting stronger, Giuliani will need to take more than a few token trips across the Triborough Bridge if he hopes to score a Senate seat. Press-conference style appearances at upstate watering holes like Armony's Kitty Hoiny's Irish Pub won't satisfy the requirements of his Upstate New York campaign.

As Giuliani wants to capture the heart of New York state, he'd better realize that it beats north of the Big Apple.

Valentine's Day reflection breeds ambivalence

I thought Sunday was Valentine's Day — and I spent the holiday differently than I had in years past. While I was in high school, there were the cute little mentions of the holiday. In junior high and elementary school it was a more of a classroom activity. In college, the day takes on a few different meanings. If you are in a relationship, it becomes a day to celebrate your romance. If you are not in a relationship, you either don't care about the day or you are saddened about the romantic affection you aren't getting from someone special.

With the belief that Sunday was Valentine's Day, I spent the day crying with pleasure. I spent Monday ambivalent about the holiday. In this same breath, I wished people a Happy Valentine's Day, told them how repulsed I was about the day and the impending night I spent Monday ambivalent about the holiday. In the same breath, I wished people a Happy Valentine's Day, told them how repulsed I was about the day and the impending night I would be forced to spend alone.

Non-greeks reap social perks of independence

To the editor:

This debate about the greek system going on for the last few weeks — and for the 8th time in my SU career — is completely wrapped up.

Rush is mostly about looks. That is the undeniable truth. Ninety percent of people in houses will tell you that; the other 10 percent are liars.

The point is, it doesn't matter. In this great country, private organizations can use whatever criteria they want to gain new members. I'm writing to let people, guys and girls, know that it's OK not to be in a house. I rushed twice — and didn't get any bids because I had the romantic allure. It's true, I'm ugly. Ask anyone who has seen me.

Anyway, I've managed to live a happy life without being in a fraternity. And surprise, I even have a girlfriend — a very lovely one. Bottom line: Fraternities and sororities pick new members partially based on looks so they can continue to be liked by members of the opposite sex, which isn't so bad. And us "goddamn independents" can manage to muddle through, have a good time and even get laid once in a while.
The University officials reported contradicting information, however, regarding the status of the review of Flemma’s appeal. While Vice Chancellor Deborah Freund said that the appeal was being reviewed by the Academic Faculty Tenure and Ethics committee of the University Senate, SU spokesman Kevin Morrow said that the appeal was currently being reviewed by the Chancellor’s Office.

The final decision on the appeal will be made by the Chancellor’s Office, Morrow said. Freund said she had yet to see the appeal.

"Flemma left me with some materials, but I cannot rule anything based on that," she said.

"What’s happening now is it’s going through the university system."

The SU faculty codes on sexual harassment state that complaints filed against faculty, administrators and staff with instructional responsibilities will be referred to the chairperson of the APTE committee. The chairperson will appoint a two-person investigative team from a pool of faculty and administrators trained for this duty, according to the code.

The investigative team will determine whether the evidence is sufficient to conduct a formal hearing, the code states. The hearing will be held before a five-member panel composed of faculty, staff, students and administrators trained to resolve such cases in accordance with the code. Sanctions of the hearing include suspension, transfer or dismissal of the accused.

Though some students opt to follow procedures while the appeal is under review, such as taking a leave of absence from the university, the senior who filed complaints against Flemma should have no reason to do so, Morrow said. There is no apparent threat to her safety, he said.

"The senior, however, is out of town and could not be reached for comment.

"It would strike me as unusual for the student to take a leave of absence after filing a complaint like this," Morrow said. "A leave of absence takes a long time. It would imply that she wasn’t planning to come back for awhile.

"The university does not encourage students to leave their studies in fear of their personal safety," Morrow said. There are other ways to seek protection, he added.

"It would be at our character for the university to do so,” Morrow said.

Flemma left town Wednesday and could not be reached for further comment.

The Syracuse student code has been under scrutiny recently with the cases of harassment against Flemma.

"The creek right now is an open sewer," Lewis said.

But others are fighting the treatment facility plan.

Resident Rich Puchalski has a neighborhood group opposed to the plan.

Onondaga County, which will build and operate the treatment plant, could build it elsewhere rather than in a residential neighborhood, as officials now plan, Puchalski said.

The county will construct the plant within an area bordered by Oxford Street, Blaine Street, Midland Avenue and Cortland Avenue.

The apartment building will be razed to make room for the plant.

The area could see some physical improvements along with the new treatment plant.

A mock-up of the facility shows freshly-planted trees lining the streets. The displaced residents will be moved into row homes, said Puchalski.

While the county’s seven-year timetable for finishing the plant is a good one, said Cunningham, director of the Lake Improvement Project Office.

Onondaga County, which must clean up the creek or face federal prosecution for some rapidly approaching deadlines for the project, must obtain the land for the plant by March 1 and begin construction by May 1.

The county will start to be fined as soon as the misses its deadline: $500 for the first 10 days, $1,500 for the next 20 days and $5,000 for each day after that.

Cunningham said he was told by the state to do everything in his power to make sure that the county can deliver the proceedings — including filing a lawsuit against Syracuse.

No solutions were reached Wednesday, but the Council expects to find out exactly which streets will be torn up at a meeting set for next week.

Activist condemns portrayal of women

BY BETH BRAVERMAN
Contributing Writer

Advertisements give women a negative impression of their bodies because they are shown perfectionistic images, said Kathy Bruin, founder and executive director of the Matrilineage Symposium and an activist for women. Bruin gave them her audience of about 40 students and faculty to realize that the media are powerful influences in shaping American culture, though often their power is ignored or dismissed.

The media often project negative images even though their goal is to make women feel individually and what they are doing. Bruin said. "The problem I have," she said, "is when the culture determines any idea that we all have to scramble to get into or determine that we are not good enough.

After the slide show, participants received postcards of popular advertisements and were instructed to do "anything you want with them." Bruin gave them colored paper, scissors, glue and glitter for the project. Audience members then mounted their finished products on a poster.

The concept behind defacing the postcards comes from the same idea that started Adfudge. Bruin said. She said she was bothered by the Calvin Klein Obsession ads for a thin, nude model, Kate Moss. She said that she found the ad degrading and felt compelled to do something about it. She developed a poster, using the photo of Moss, but replaced the ad's text with her own.

It's not a good move to write off portions of the state. It's critical to reach out to the entire state," Bruins said. Grant hastens Onondaga Lake clean-up

E. Pataki announced Thursday that Onondaga County will receive up to $20 million to use for an end to Moore's combined sewer overflow. The local sewer system is outdated, O'Connor said. "The problem is that sometimes during storms, the storm sewage mix goes into the lake,"

The combined overflow is one of the most serious problems for Onondaga Lake, he added. The campus will use the grant to fund an upgrade of the sewers and reduce the amount of contaminants that enter the lake, said Maria Welsh, a spokesperson for the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation.

Since the reign of the Mayas, chocolate — the so-called food of the gods — has exerted a bewitching, almost addicting pull on mortals. Needs improvement
Time is running out, Department of Education officials say, for states to turn around about 8,000 of the nation’s worst-performing schools in poverty-stricken neighborhoods. Federal reforms require that, during the 2000-2001 academic year, states must force drastic measures on schools that are chronically failing to teach low-income students — steps that could include firing all the administrators and staff or sending students to other public schools that are making better progress.

There is a growing consensus among HIV specialists that patients who are doing well on their drug treatment cocktails ought to deliberately stop taking the medicines for brief periods. It’s a concept that flies in the face of all previous advice regarding AIDS treatment and defies worries about promotion of drug-resistant viruses. Some members of the medical community say the cocktails are far from a proven or clearly safe option.

Abundance of Ritalin perpetuates its abuse

From cups of joe to lines of blow, abuse of stimulants among college students is nothing new. In this new era of intense competition among peers and ever-increasing workloads, students are now using uppers like Ritalin to get ahead.

Ralph McNair, a Syracuse University sophomore chemistry engineer major, uses the drug but contends that he has never abused it: "I used it in the fashion that the drug is prescribed for. I found that, although I am not diagnosed with attention deficit and hyperactivity disorder, I was able to concentrate for longer amounts of time and thus get more work done."

Ritalin is now prevalent on college campuses, but it was not an accessible drug in years past. Heavy abuse of this psychoactive drug began modestly enough in the prep schools of the northeast. Access was easy because so many students have Ritalin prescriptions — often not warranted by medical need, Dr. Eric Hellquist, head of psychiatry for the University of Wisconsin Health Services.

Dr.essa Bergin-Cico of the SU Health Services, who pointed out that up until three years ago, use of Ritalin was not well-documented at SU, but there has been a marked increase in usage in the last few years, she said. "I have had students who have used it," Bergin-Cico said. "There is definitely a growing trend of improperly using prescription drugs."

These trends started during the late eighties and became mainstream during the nineties, according to Christopher Tannant, a correspondent for the Milwaukee Journal-Herald. The media made Ritalin its "darling drug" in the early 1990s and proclaimed it as a wonder and cure for students with ADHD. Prescriptions skyrocketed during this time, and in 10 Americans between the ages of 5 and 19 years-old currently have a prescription for the drug, according to the Drug Enforcement Agency.

But these numbers do not account for the thousands of others who use it improperly. In fact, students most vulnerable to prescription drug abuse — students who are actually students who have ADHD, can have very different perceptions when ingested, snorted or injected by someone who has not been diagnosed. "This side-effect occurs when individuals who have been lab-tested for this problem, and then have had the drug prescribed, be able to 'bend' the tip of the iceberg," Theye said. "Some school districts have no policy on how long a child can have Ritalin in their pockets. So, if a child can't or won't take the drug, it is a medication in their pockets."

These are the students most vulnerable to the thousands of other students who have ADHD, and are promiscuously using the drug in school districts have no policies at all on how long a child can have Ritalin in their pockets. So, if a child can't or won't take the drug, it is a medication in their pockets. Right now, four houses down from Shaw Hall, Hope to see you there!"

The Orangemen, meanwhile, were outrebounded by the Pitt Panthers, 38-34, in a Pitt loss to SU. The Panthers hit just 38 percent from the floor, including 3-of-8 from the free-throw line.

As the competition ends, Thomas said he hopes his SU career can score important points again in their final Big East meet.

"I think you're looking at the defensive challenge for men and women," the 24th-year Head coach said, "that is far and away head and shoulders above everyone else, talent-wise and most particularly depth-wise." The Orangemen were still struggling in the end of SU.

Walker said he predicts the Orangemen to finish in the top three and the Orangewomen to place in the top six. "The NCAAs European trio hopes to retain their respective titles," he said. "But if they lose, the Orangemen won the 100-yard breaststroke, Filopovic took the 200-yard butterfly and Mikhailov won the 100 breaststroke. The Orangemen do not have any defending Champions, but they return several point-scorers from last season's fifth-place finish.

Boebendorf, Bryan and Branka Sulic all tallied points last year as juniors, and Walker said he hopes they can score important points again in their final Big East meet.

He said underclassmen Kelly Bryan and Eleanor Theod could put needed points on the board for SU.

"You don't think you're just going to be able to have a great run in the final," the five-time Big East Coach of the Year said. "You'll be fighting with the rest of the pool out of the running in the consolation finals because you thought you could skate a little bit in the morning session."

And above all, Walker said, it is important for every team member to swim his or her best, regardless of placing, in order to maintain a level of confidence for the entire team.

"If everybody's swimming well, even if you're not scoring points," he said, "there's enthusiasm here that the group can feed off."
Fellow senior Ryan Blackwell, coming off several subpar performances, delivered a solid outing with nine points and six rebounds. Blackwell also shut down Greer — who finished with 33 points — for a stretch during the second half when SU pulled away.

Junior forward Damone Brown — who missed the loss to Louisville with a quadriiceps contusion — scored 11 points, six of them on highlight-reel dunks, and grabbed nine rebounds. "We're trying to get back to what we were doing earlier in the year — even scoring and hitting the boards hard," Brown said. "I think we got away from that a little bit, and it cost us two games. I think we're getting back, and we're almost right back to where we were at.

Coming off the bench, sophomore Preston Shumpert was the team's second-leading scorer with 18.

Shumpert converted all four of his attempts beyond the 3-point arc, proving all four of his attempts from in-the-hole. The junior forward hit four 3-pointers to keep Pitt at bay. The Syracuse head coach wasn't as happy with the first-half defensive effort of his team.

"Defensively, we're just having some breakdowns," Boeheim said. "Really, two or three of our best offensive players are two or three of our worst defensive players. That's something that we're going to have to fight the rest of the year."

In the second half, SU tightened up its defense on Greer, who started hitting shots from behind the arc.

"In the second half, we wanted to pick up our offense just a little bit more," Brown said. "We were sluggish in the first half, not playing real crisp defense. When we came out in the second half, we wanted to play with more intensity."

While SU pulled out the victory, Wednesday's game marks the seventh outing in a row that has been somewhat of a struggle for the Orangemen.

With away games against St. John's, Notre Dame and Connecticut looming, several Orangemen said they need to start playing up to the potential they last showed in a decisive victory over UConn on Jan. 24.

"I think we've been playing this way for a long time, and with our talent and our depth we were able to squeak out some games," SU guard Tony Bland said. "We're not going to be able to play like this for the rest of the season."

The Mid-American Conference has a good chance to send at least two teams to the NCAA Tournament again this year. If it does, both teams would likely come from the MAC East, where Kent St., Akron and Bowling Green all have more than 10 league wins. The Flashes and the Zips are the front-runners for NCAA Tournament bids, and they meet this weekend in a huge MAC showdown.

Facing a team with only six scholarship players and an absent head coach seemed to indicate an easy victory for the SU men's basketball team Wednesday.

Some shaky defensive play by the Orangemen combined with a monster performance by Panther Ricky Greer made Syracuse sweat, however, before it pulled out a 83-62 win in front of 18,597 at the Carrier Dome. SU (21-2, 10-1 Big East) had seen since four-years later.

Between his shots and swats, Etan Thomas dominated.

Syracuse's senior center scored 21 points and tied a career-high with nine blocked shots in Wednesday night's 83-62 victory over Pittsburgh.

The 6-foot-9 center also grabbed 13 rebounds for the game — eight in the second half. The senior center dominated the paint, scoring 21 points and blocking nine shots.

Thomas's Pitt counterpart, Chris Seabrooks, scored seven points and had six rebounds before fouling out with 2:07 left.

The Syracuse men's and women's swimming teams have had this weekend circled on their calendars for months. All SU's preparation in dual meets and during its winter excursion to Florida has been done with a single goal in mind — to score points high at the Big East Championships.

The wait is over as the teams take to the water Thursday at the Goodwill Games Aquatics Center on Long Island. Both squads hope to prove their places among the conference elite.

"From the beginning of the year, we post things like what kind of times it took to score points last year," head coach Lou Walker said. "It's not something you can control while you're swimming, but you want to have the mind-set of What can we do to improve on last year."
University postpones Flemma decision

BY TIFFTKY LANKES

An appeal filed by former Syracuse University professor Jay Flemma that would no longer be considered this week because of lack of information in the appeal regarding his dismissal, SU spokesman Kevin Moran said.

Flemma is a 1993 graduate of the SU College of Law and is a senior associate with Smith, Vedik, Kendrick and Sunion P.C. in Syracuse. He filed the appeal Feb. 9 with the Department of Human Resources in response to a harassment complaint that led to his termination at the end of the 1999 Fall Semester.

The student is currently out of town and could not be reached for comment.

Robert Freeman, executive director of the New York State Committee on Open Government, spoke to a crowd of students Thursday night about legal issues regarding access to public information.

What we're trying to do is keep it contained, Freeman said. "This is what we have to do as faculty."

Flemmas's removal was not because of the sexual harassment allegations, but other issues brought to the university's attention, Morrow said.

It was determined that Mr. Flemma had not followed certain administrative procedures of the university," Morrow said.

The senior also reported a series of complaints against Flemma with the Department of Human Resources. The department responded with an investigation that resulted in Flemma's dismissal at the end of the 1999 Fall Semester.

Donald Lantzy, dean of the College of Visual and Performing Arts, said the administrators involved in reviewing the case are keeping it confidential.

"What we're trying to do is keep it contained," Lantzy said. "Understand, this is what we have to do as faculty."

Microsoft releases codes

LOS ANGELES — In an apparently off-the-cuff remark to a reporter, Microsoft Corp. Chairman Bill Gates said Thursday that the company might be willing to make the basic code of its Windows operating system public in order to settle the government's antitrust lawsuit.

Antitrust experts said such a move might form the basis of a negotiated end to the case, in which the federal government and 19 state attorneys general have accused the software giant of illegally stifling competition.

But they also expressed skepticism that Gates' remark accurately reflected the company's position.

Michael Scherer, immediate the company's antitrust vice president, immediately disputed the reporter's story on Bloomberg News Service.

The company said it made no comment on settlement terms during the encounter and added that it had demanded a correction.

"Bill Gates in no way commented on any settlement proposals or the mediation process in any way," said Jim Cullinan, a Microsoft spokesman. "The only thing he stated was that we would be doing our best to settle the case."

Bloomberg editors said they would correct the story and added they concede that Gates' remark was a "casual" one.

Gates said that the company's remark came after a television interview on CNBC where the Las Vegas-based network opened the source code to settle the lawsuit, Gates said simply, "Yes," according to Bloomberg.

But that contradicts Gates' own comments during the taped portion of the interview.

Hospital tests for contamination

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Batches of genetically engineered viruses that were injected into children as part of a gene therapy experiment in Tennessee have been linked with the AIDS or hepatitis viruses as initially feared, according to follow-up tests conducted by the Food and Drug Administration.

But the agency said Thursday it's still too early to determine all circumstances that led to the contamination scare, including apparent sadness in testing and potential deaths. Officials were notified "promptly" of the potential problem by regulations.

Worries grew when Bowman couldn't find documentation showing that appropriate safety testing had been done on the "master batches" of gene-altered viruses from which the patients' batches were derived. This month, she decided to test some of those batches for contamination.

Initial tests suggested the presence of HIV-1, the virus that causes AIDS, and HCV, which causes hepatitis C.

Japanese giant divides paths

TOKYO — The Japanese electronics company is cutting ties with its Western competitors in two distinct economies.

Romanian spill causes concern

BAIA MARE, Romania — Romania acknowledged for the first time today the magnitude of the oil spill caused by a cyanide mine that has devastated rivers and wildlife in Romania's eastern plains and in Hungary and Yugoslavia.

An employee of the Roman Catholic Tomescu said Romania regretted the unfortunate accident that killed tons of fish and contaminated numerous rivers, including the Danube, Europe's longest.

Romania did not want to have to play down the magnitude of the accident," said Tomescu in Sosnow, Poland. The police have been called to a containment dam at a gold mine near Baia Mare in northwest Romania on Jan. 30, flowing into Hungary and Yugoslavia on the Danube, Romania's longest river.

The Australian-owned Esmersalda Exploration Ltd., owner of the gold mine, has denied responsibility for the cyanide spill, and its chairman said today that there is conclusive proof that the company is to blame.
Area residents, officials debate toll increase

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Staff Writer

Some Syracuse residents voiced concern regarding a recent toll increase proposal Thursday during a hearing with the New York State Thruway Authority.

"They're getting more money to expand work, and expanding work to get more money," said Bill Bushnell of Syracuse, who attended the meeting. "It's just expanding the bureaucracy. If the voting public is asleep, they'll wake it up to them."

A New York State Assembly transportation committee scheduled the meeting in the Oncodaga County Convention Center.

The hearing allowed the Thruway Authority to explain the factors that affect decisions made on the Thruway, and to allow the public to comment on them, said David Gantt, chairman of the State Assembly Committee on Transportation.

Similar hearings recently occurred in Rochester and Albany.

Officials conducted the hearing despite an announcement by New York state Gov. George E. Pataki that the Thruway Authority will reconsider the increase.

The proposed toll increase is a part of the Capital Plan, an attempt to have tolls rise proportionally with construction costs. Tolls could not increase by more than 3 percent any given year, Gantt said.

In the event that the cost of construction should decrease, the toll would remain the same, he added.

The tolls would be used to support construction on the Thruway that could cost $1 billion. The construction would alleviate congestion along the freeway and canal, Gantt said.

A third lane in each direction of the Thruway would be added in Syracuse, between exit 34A and Interstate 41 and exit 37 and Interstate 690, Gantt said.

Thruway tolls have remained the same since 1988, but increased traffic warrants the new tolls, according to a report by the Thruway Authority. Passenger vehicle traffic has increased by 2.5 percent annually since 1994. Truck traffic has gone up 5.5 percent each year since 1994, according to the report.

Out of state drivers account for one third of the tolls collected by the Thruway, Gantt said. The raised tolls would ensure that they pay for maintenance of the roads as much as New York state tax payers, Gantt added.

For some of those drivers, the toll hike means a great burden on their wallets.

"I take the Thruway to get to Syracuse," said Brian Kelsey, a Syracuse University sophomore information studies major. "Higher tolls and high gas prices will really hurt me. I'm a college student. I need all the money I can get."

Even after the proposed toll increase, however, the Thruway would still be the lowest in cost per mile among toll roads in the United States, according to a Thruway Authority report.

"It's our Boston Tea Party," Bushnell said of his reason for attending the hearing. "There ought to be a big investigation of where this money is going."

"The law will usually give you the edge you need to ferret out the information," Freeman said. "Your remedy is your knowledge."

 Agencies do not release records that constitute an invasion of privacy, identification of a confidential source, government inter-office communications, impairment of collective bargaining or to journalists, he added.

"Embarrassment is not one of the grounds for denial."

Journalists can submit a written request for information, citing the Freedom of Information Law, which the government agency must respond to within five business days, Freeman said. The agency's response depends on the resources of its filing system, he said.

The request cannot be denied if the information is readily available on a database, Freeman said. The only charge for the service is 25 cents for each copy, he added.

Journalists can appeal the ruling if the request is not granted. But the agency can also request for more time to search for the requested materials.

Sometimes during an open meeting, boards ask for an "executive session" from which the press and public is barred.

The clerk should become familiar with the law before they go out and talk to disgruntled school boards and police, Freeman said.

"You have the capacity of the pen," Freeman said. "You have the capacity to embarrass."

Mason said she distributed copies of the law to the school board to make sure they understood it. But it was the public response that changed their minds.

Many community members attended the board meeting, wanting to know what the school board had to hide, Mason said. She said the board member who again denied her access without giving a valid reason.

Freeman suggested that journalists talk to disgruntled board members and attempt to develop a relationship of trust.

Journalists and the government feed off each other in a symbiotic relationship, Freeman said. The government uses journalists to get information out to the world and serve as crucial sources for journalists, he added.

"You have a special responsibility to acquire information so the public will know what the government is up to," Freeman said. "Find out what the government is up to."

Freeman said he also educates public officials about the law. He gave about 85 seminars regarding the subject last year, he said.

"I think it's real important that students learn about Freedom of Information," said Jessica Caufland, SPJ vice president and a former assistant editor at The Daily Orange.

Students should learn about the law before they go out and actually cover stories, said Caufland, a junior newspaper major.

Students discuss recent hacker hijackings of SU’s computer server

“Hacking” episode creates false impressions

To the Editor:
I was amazed to see that The Daily Orange based their Feb. 14 headline deficit attacks by “hackers” only on the word of Dave Butler.

Whether hackers are a dangerous threat to the university or not is something that should be examined. But cover up, exaggeration and even lying to the student body is no way to go about anything. There is no evidence of an April 14 denial-of-service attack on the Sunix server — in fact, there is plenty of evidence against one ever existing.

Media Services reported it as a network failure, just like the ones that happen routinely.

If the “hackers” were truly able to slow down the whole connection, the machines must have been flooded by the hacker’s outgoing signals to the Internet and their network was not sending any signals, like CMS said, because it was down, and DoS signals couldn’t be sent to any target. All “edu” sites (all universities) were working perfectly nationwide, and were doing it at fast speeds, showing that the campus network was not overwhelmed. It was simply SU’s Internet connection failing, as it has many times.

Butler’s words were full of connotations. He said that SU recognized signals as “hackers” and “trapped” the hacker’s program, so it was not able to send any signals. Then, I ask, why was the school not able to do so long? If in fact, they were successful in trapping SU and using it for a denial-of-service attack, whom was he and who was their target? It seems to be more than just a coincidence that in the same times the network has been down, this is the first claim to be caused by hackers, just when such news has been all over the media recently.

As pointed out by Butler, we seem to lose control of our computer systems. Anyone can call himself a hacker and just when such news has been all over the media recently. And as pointed out by Butler, we seem to lose control of our computer systems. Anyone can call himself a hacker and just when such news has been all over the media recently.

Hacks use talents to enhance technology

To the Editor:
Once again, the local newspapers and the country in general has neglected to view computer hacking as a serious, dangerous, and hateful tool. The recent stir of issues regarding “hackers” penetrating Syracuse University’s computer is one that seemingly fails to take a large amount of resentment by those concerned.

Although the problem that has occurred may, in fact, be due to one of these DoS (Denial of Service) attacks that hackers are capable of leading by hackers. Hackers are individuals who enjoy figuring out how things work and developing new ways to do things. We are the group that brought Linux, FreeBSD, and OpenBSD to the world in all their glory, as well as OpenOffice, which contributed to creating the OpenOffice.org that brought the Y2K problem to its knees, virtually eliminating the world’s worry with our know-how and for-man’s praise.

We are the ones who fight for better communication from large corporations, and better products for our money. We are the children who spend time breaking and photos copied by

Media overplays impact of Denial of Service attacks

To the Editor:
It is a shame that the supposed “educated” people that report on campus news was filled with the same entirely misleading practices as the rest of the media. Or is that what they teach in Newhouse? What occurred when the Internet was down last weekend was called a Denial of Service attack. It is known that it is an attempt to deny service. Hackers do not do this.

Would you call someone a hacker if they disconnected your phone? No. This person is a common vandal, but not a hacker. But somehow in the media’s infinite wisdom about computers, anything having to do with hacking trouble is either due to Microsoft or hackers. And as often as the first may be true, the second is not. A hacker uses sophisticated methods to break into the system and then is known, which is explained to the media or public, would make the 90 percent of the population that are complete idiots realize what they are.

Hackers are technically proficient and geeks in their own right, even if they know can be used to do damage. It is what they do with their knowledge that matters, however none of these “internet vandals” (i.e. not hackers) have any of this knowledge. It takes literally no skill to do what they did.

Are hackers a legitimate threat the SU computers? Students discuss recent hacker hijackings of SU’s computer server
SU ignores proper harassment policy

When a female student stepped forward charging music law adjunct-professor Jay Flemma with sexual harassment last semester, the university responded. They swiftly dismissed Flemma from his post with explanation, informing him he would not be welcomed back next year.

But a recent series of miscommunications and procedural missteps leaves serious doubts about the university's intention — or ability — to take action on the case.

Kevin Morrow, the official SU spokesman, made statements markedly different than those that came from Vice Chancellor Deborah Freund's office regarding the reasons for Flemma's dismissal. Meanwhile, College of Visual and Performing Arts Dean Donald Lantzy admitted that SU is hoping to keep the case out of the public eye.

While the press leads the charge in exposing much of the case's logistics, the Flemma case lingers in closed-door university committee discussions. SU's procedural ineptitude is sickening, and it sends a clear message that looking out for the community's safety falls low on the priority list.

SU already showed its cowardly face when slogging through the sexual harassment lawsuit against former women's tennis coach Jesse Dwire, which dragged on for three years before an out-of-court settlement was reached last year.

While it's still too early to determine the validity of these harassment claims, the university's failure to follow its written treatment policies casts a dark cloud over the campus. SU's actions make a mockery of the struggles faced by sexual harassment victims, failing to provide them with a functional comfort zone in which to prosecute their tormentors.

SU spent countless dollars in legal fees before firing Dwire.

People's safety is priceless. Act now — don't pay later.

Opinions

Parting thoughts make up for lack of opinions

With my term as a Daily Orange columnist nearing its end, I decided to flip through my past articles to reminisce. After I was done, I noticed a recurring theme in my opinions articles — they lack substance. Some hinted at opinions and some did have opinions but were swamped in a pool of confusing and misleading symbolism.

However, none came out and gave a straightforward opinion.

D.O. readers have been cheated and so for this article I decided to make up for all the last time I've taken away from these people. The following is a series of my opinions:

I hate people who stand in my way. You know who these people are. They're the ones who conglomerate right inside the doors of the Schine Student Center to discuss their lives. I have to navigate my way through these masses and then I'm usually met by more people gathering in very impractical places. All I ask is that these people go to more convenient places where they won't be in the way.

Speaking of Schine, there are a few other things I hate there. One is the layout of the dining halls. Sometimes I go there for lunch, take a seat in the far end and then get stuck. Some day I walk through Schine and realize she's about to make a big move. It's a good idea to cram tons of tables into Schine so that it would be impossible for those in the back to leave.

My final problem with Schine is the upstairs talking. The upstairs lounge has to be one of the noisiest places on campus. I can't concentrate and I don't think anyone can either. These people should be examined as species of extreme stupidity.

On another subject, I hate commercials at the movie theater. I don't go to the movies to see commercials. As for Coca-Cola, I paid six dollars for Best Picture when "Being John Malkovich" and "Magnolia" were released in the same year! It must be the same reason Phil Collins is allowed to show up at the Oscars.

And on the positive side, I like snowflakes. If it snows at all, I don't mind snow. But I do hate the way snowflakes are portrayed in movies these days. We all know they can't snow out the snowflakes. We may think it's weird, but anybody smart enough to wear one must be so comely inside that thing. Another thing I like is the Victoria's Secret catalog. This publication is a pleasure for women as well as men, especially when Lauticia Casta is involved.

I hope these opinions are a little consolation for all my unprintable articles. It may not make up for all the wasted space in the D.O. every week but maybe it will be enough for a little forgiveness.

Community fails to publicize Panther visit

To the editor:

This letter is in response to The Daily Orange's role in the suppression of the words of Elaine Brown, the former Black Panther president who spoke on campus Sunday. The Black Panther coverage silenced Brown's intriguing message. I guess the entire black community should thank The D.O. for at least including a front-page picture of Ms. Brown, accompanied by the heading "Panther Power." This is not, however, something to be thankful for. This act not only stripped Ms. Brown's message of its power but also served in the complete objectification of this black woman in the attempt to render her words useless and send the message to all readers that she "doesn't look sick but not actually listen to people." Ms. Brown began her speech by conceding to the fact that she was most likely at the university to take a token black spot for Black History Month. For some odd reason, I believed that The D.O. would expect a little more energy in covering this story, if for nothing else, than for Black History Month. Once again, it has been proven that the SU community (black, white, etc.) cannot trust the D.O., since the same ideologies are passed on from staff to another.

A more journalistically-inclined newspaper would have not only written an article about Brown's speech, but also questioned University officials about the decision to deny her a campus appearance. As a programmer, I have had experience with Events Production, but I am sure those involved did not have very much to do with the decision to hire a publicist. But Coca-Cola is good. I wish I had the choice of Arizona Jeans and Coca-Cola. I paid six dollars solely for the fact that I would not have to sit through commercials.

But Coca-Cola is good. I wish I had the choice of buying Coke on campus, not at Qdoba's Root Beer. Have you ever noticed that Qdoba's is sold with everything that's good like McDonald's and Burger King? Pepsi is sold with everything that's awful, like Taco Bell and Hollywood Video.

Faculty members receive Fulbright grants to research abroad

BY NICOLE ELLIOTT  Contributing Writer

Three Syracuse University faculty members will use the Fulbright Program to conduct research abroad on topics including screenwriting and language studies.

Melissa Pearl Friedling, Jakkin Komfilt, and Philip Peterson are among about 700 U.S. scholars and professionals who are sent to more than 100 countries each year, according to a program report.

"3,000 Fulbrighters" have participated in the program since its establishment by former Arkansas Sen. J. William Fulbright in 1946.

Sean Platek, a senior marketing and finance major, said he's excited to see Starbucks compete with local businesses.

"I think it's a great opportunity for students to see how small businesses will act on the move," he said.

Flemma defended himself in his appeal against the sexual harrassment accusations, but neglected to mention his alleged failure to obey those administrative procedures, Morrow said.

Flemma said he was unaware that his appeal was questionable.

"I am caught by surprise," Flemma said. "I have no idea what they're talking about."

Morrow said Vice Chancellor Deborah Freund sent Flemma a letter Thursday morning informing him of the situation.

Because of its lack of relevant information, the appeal will not be reviewed by the University Senate's Academic Faculty Tenure and Ethics committee until Flemma can provide the necessary statements, Morrow said.

"This is really a matter between the university and the individual," Morrow said. "He needs to provide additional information for the appeal to be considered. If enough information is provided by Mr. Flemma, the AFTE committee will consider it."

But Flemma said he was not aware that he had disobeyed any administrative procedures.

As an adjunct professor, Flemma only teaches his course during the fall semester. In past years, VPA has sent him a letter at the end of the semester inviting him to return the following year, he said.

This year, however, the college simply stated in a one-paragraph letter that Flemma was not invited to teach during the 2000 Fall Semester, Flemma said.

The university did not give any reasons for his dismissal, Flemma added.

"They never gave me any notice," he said. "This is all brand new."

Flemma said the miscommunication is upsetting, but not surprising given the university's apthetic nature toward his case thus far.

"It's been typical of the way the university has run this investigation since day one," Flemma said. "It's another excuse. That's all it is — another glib excuse."

More personal basis."

David Gaulin, a sophomore in The College of Arts and Sciences, said he wants to influence how the Student Activity Fee is allocated.

"I had a similar position in high school," Gaulin said. "I think the key is to be more open to student groups."

Gaulin plans to be proactive if he is chosen for the position. One of his major objectives is to improve the relationship between student organizations and the Finance Board through a new liaison program, he added.

"A lot of the problems that arise have to do with the misunderstanding of the Finance Code," Gaulin said. "I think the key is to be more open to student groups."

The liaison program will include meetings where the board members of student organizations and the Finance Board will meet to learn about the SGA Finance Code, Gaulin said.

"These workshop sessions will teach members how to use and understand the Finance Code," he said.

Gaulin said he hopes to open communication between SU and SGA by publishing a student budget report.

"SGA used to publish the student budget in a newsletter," Gaulin said. "They haven't done this since the 70s. It is important that students know who gets what funds."

The student budget report would be published online so students know where their student fee is going, he added.

Both candidates said they are excited about working with Greiner.

"I have gone over and thoroughly understand each part of the Finance Code and its history," Gaulin said. "I believe I will be able to get along not only with Chris, but with the Finance Board and all officers of SGA."

"Student are urged to attend. It is crucial to the function of the debate," Escobar said. "It tests candidates' abilities to handle budget issues that arise."

Stray plot crashes 'The Beach'

It's time to get sand in our toes and go slummin' in Fantasy Island that no one can get to. It was like "Fantasy Island," unfortunately without Tattoo.

We start off with the Kirk Cameron wannabe bouncing about in Thailand and complaining about being a typical tourist. Speaking of cliches, how about look amusing voices over that narrates a number of scenes? If this film were in Miro Szuchy's film history class, it would be reminiscent of a classic spectacle of the early cinema. Hey, we get a movie camera! Let's film the beautiful islands of the Southeast, intermixed with outrageous acts like drinking snakes' blood and fighting off sharks!

"Titanic's" Jack runs into a few interesting travelers in Bangkok, featuring a young, apparently rich French couple—Leo regretfully lets a couple of surfers in on the action, and a beat-up Robert Carlyle, who does show the "Monty" but does spill his guts, literally.

Carlyle, the British sensation, tells Dicaprio of a secluded spot where the beer flows like wine, the women instinctively fall for the solid of Monty. Capra is a beach, and the beach seems to solve all the problems of everyday life. His interest peaks, and he recruits his neighbors to come along for the adventure of their lives where they will find utopia.

What the young 'uns find on this mysterious island are a group of herb farmers toasting Smirnoff and monks who live in perfect harmony with the hippie white kids who created a colony based on the natural ideals of Bob Marley, weed and Nintendo GameBoys.

But without the guidance of Alan Thicke, the greatest television fibre composer of all time—what you talkin' bout, Alvin?—Leo desperately tries to draw a couple of surfers in on the action, and specifically the weed, down on the beach.

This all leads to the downfall of parenthood.

The surfers, not knowing how to keep their boards out of people's business, invade the island; shark bite, relationships crumble and the trimmed and some somewhat luminous Leo character line to someone. It was odd and uncalled for. There is no psychological motivation for this character's insanity in the film.

Apparently, they left out a key factor from the book. Besides changing his character from British to American, they made him much younger and neglected his war veteran status as well.

This little known factor would have allowed us to understand their imagery and psychological breakdown! But since they left it out, it made the themes even weaker.

Falling short

The theme of searching for a utopian society crumbles under the shadows of earlier island films, such as "Lord of the Flies" and "No Escape," both of which also, coincidentally, have war themes.

Director Danny Boyle gave us a gorgeous view of the location with great cinematography. But who couldn't shoot this beautiful island in fine form? Also the blatant, gruesome shots after one of the shark attacks leave nothing to the imagination.

The impact would have been much more powerful had they just showed the blood trail on the bleached white sand. But since they wanted to gross everyone out, they didn't consult the Cinematographers. Yet again, Drat.

In effect, this creates a film that is much darker than the audience, 14-year-old girls yet again, may not have been expecting. We weep for the future if people aren't going to listen to musicians play instruments anymore.

Staged up

Out of all the guys in the Bible, it isn't hard to tell that Joseph has the worst case of bad luck. The poor guy gets sold into slavery by his brothers just for having a couple of good dreams. Catch Joseph singing his sob story tonight when the Syracuse Civic Theater presents "Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat" at the Cuse Center tonight. Steve Andrew Lloyd Weber's version of the Bible story is joyful enough, even as the animals, wise men, one out, they didn't consult the Cinematographers. Yet again, Drat.

These days, he's been known to make appearances on Howard Stern's radio marathon. After Cooper's performance at 7 p.m. and 10 p.m., Turning Stone hosts "Sounds of Sinatra," a tribute to old Blue Eyes. Tickets are $20-$25. Call 877-833-SHOW.

"All the events are pretty well attended," Cooper said. "Especially on the Saturdays, everyone is out, it seems.

Despite sponsoring 36 events intended to attract 200,000 visitors, Syracuse Winterfest, Inc. will not net a profit from the event, Cooper said. The cost of organizing the festival to talks to about $30,000, she said. Festival sponsors pay the majority of Winterfest advertising costs.

Although Winterfest may never be a moneymaker, Romano said the event serves other purposes. "Winter gets monotonous," she said. "This is a really nice moment-breaker in the winter. People can hang out with good food, good people. It's something they look forward to every year."

right here with Kent and Central Michigan. We should beat Wagner. This might be the only team in the conference who can hurt us."

When captain Shawn Thomas takes the mat shortly after 4 p.m., SU wrestling's lone senior will grapple for the final time before progressing on to the EIWA Championships in the first weekend of March. The Tulsa, Okla., native is not getting too excited about the match, even though his father will attend the bout for only the second time in his college career.

"It's just another match for me," Thomas said. "I'd like to perform well, especially from the aspect that my father will be here, but I always want to do well."

Though he has faced Buffalo many times while at SU, Thomas has never opposed the wrestler who will stare him down in the middle of the circle Sunday. Most recently, he squared off against Buffalo's David Guarino at the New York State Intercolligate Wrestling Championship. While Buffalo finished second to Hofstra, Thomas pinned Guarino in 4:58 on his way to claiming third place.

On Sunday, he'll wrestle a different opponent in Gary Cooper. While Thomas and the SU coaching staff don't know much about Cooper—who has missed much of the season with nagging injuries—the Buffalo staff knows about Thomas. They know his abilities and will coach against his strengths, Thomas said.

Thomas brings a 28-9 record into the meet, with a remarkable 88 percent of his wins coming via pinfall. He has twice as many pins as the second-leading pinner in the conference.

"I've always done that, even in high school," the Berryhill High School alum said. "Senior year, I had 16, 18 pins. Last year, I had 11, and that's high considering how few matches I was in. Even if you're up 14 points or down 12, you can always get the win with a pin."

Joining Thomas in the lineup is the slumping Brett Cowen. The freshman hit his stride midway through the season but has struggled since. He came up empty in three chances last week at the Rutgers Duals and saw his record fall to 10-19.

Thomas and Cowen were both named All-State at the NYS Championship, with Thomas since using the honors as a springboard. Following a victory two week later at Boston College, Cowen has been held without a win.

"It's a big match for Brett," Miller said. "He's struggled recently. His biggest problem is his first period. He needs to wrestle the first like he wrestles the third."

While Thomas gets his shot wearing a blue and orange singlet, Jerry Pacillo gets his chance at revenge. Pacillo transferred from Buffalo when he decided that he would not get a fair shot at the 141-pound weight class.

At SU, Pacillo has turned a slow start into a productive season. He earned a place in the starting lineup in the last few weeks, and at Rutgers, Pacillo won two of three matches.

"I have seen great improvement," Thomas said of Pacillo. "Jerry has a lot of talent. When he decides to use it, he'll be very good. (Early in the season) he wrestled to stay close, but (recently) he has wrestled to win points."

The transition game is paced by Big East Player of the Year Svetlana Abrosimova. The St. Petersburg, Russia native leads the Huskies'in Storrs. SU head coach Tara sard the transition game, "It's a religion than a sport. More than 10,000 fans are expected to pack Gampei for tonight's game. The expected crowd will be the largest that Syracuse has played against so far," Freeman said. After its meeting with UConn, the Orangewomen head south to the Garden State to challenge Seton Hall. The Pirates are 2-10 in the Big East and 3-14 overall. Sunday's 2 p.m. showdown is a game that was originally to be played Jan. 22 but was rescheduled due to last month's dormitory fire on the Seton Hall campus.

But before the Orangewomen can worry about Seton Hall, Freeman said the team must take one game at a time and face Connecticut on Friday night. Freeman said the Orangewomen will need to play flawless basketball to overtake the Huskies. While it may seem like a reach, a win at Storrs is not entirely unimaginable. The Orangewomen knocked Storrs and the country on Jan. 2, 1996, when SU upset No. 2 Connecticut 62-56 at Gampei. The loss was one of only four setbacks for Connecticut during the 1995-96 season when it went 34-4 and reached the Final Four.

"A couple of years back, we played a near-perfect basketball game," Freeman said. "To go to UConn and win, you have to play perfect. You don't go to UConn thinking that you lost already. Because if you do, why not just call them up and give them a win."

SU takes on Red Storm

BY JEFF PASSAN
Asst. Sports Editor

When Jason Hart talks, people listen.
And at halftime of Syracuse's victory against Pittsburgh on Wednesday, the Orange were all ears.
Following a lackadaisical first half, the senior point Guard stood up in the locker room and told his teammates exactly what he thought of their effort.

"He was saying that we weren't playing well, and that was the bottom line," center Dan Thomas said.
"He does it in a very emotional way because that's the kind of a person he is. But that's the kind of leader he is — he gets everybody pumped and ready and tells it like it is. He doesn't sugarcoat anything."

Said Hart: "It was very intense in here in halftime. Nothing out of the ordinary. We spoke to each other about what we needed to do, and that was the end of it.

Guys get fired up at each other, and once I saw that, we were ready to go.

They did, to the tune of a 63-57 second-half spurt, the Orange's first dominant half of the season after a lackadaisical first half since their 88-74 pounding of Connecticut on Jan. 23.

A week after the UConn win, the Orange faced the short but stout and clearly strong St. John's Red Storm.
SU narrowly escaped the Carrier Dome with a 63-57 victory and intensified respect for the Johnnies.

The Big East powerhouse's clash against the Orange's first home game after the NCAA season is the annual game of equal importance to each team.

Syracuse (21-2, 10-1 Big East) owns a one-game lead over Seton Hall in conference standings. The teams are tied in the win column, but the Pirates have lost two more conference contests each team.

"Buffalo is a very good team," he said. "The Mid-American Conference is one of the top five conferences in the country. Buffalo is a very good team," he said. "The Mid-American Conference is one of the top five conferences in the country.

Syracuse's track and field princess returned to the weight circle last weekend and annihilated the competition at the Booster Invitational in Lincoln, Neb.

Senior Cheree Hicks outdistanced her closest competitor in the shot put by more than five feet, recording a national-best toss of 53' 11". The mark was the best of her career and also broke the school record in the event.

Hicks' performance qualified her for the NCAA Indoor Championships held in March in Indianapolis. In last year's championship, Hicks finished fourth in the shot put with a mark of 53' 10.50".

"I just try to win each meet and not try to concentrate on the competition," Hicks said. "All I want right now is to win the national championship. It is my last year, and I want to go all cut out."

Although she ranks No. 1 in the nation in shot put, Hicks contends her best event is the discuss, which she will try to prove against the best throwers in the world.

She sat out the first portion of the season, intent on peaking in July at the U.S. Olympic Tri-ales. Hicks hopes for a chance to participate in the 2000 Summer Games in Sydney, Australia.

On the men's side, graduate student Adrian Woodley took second in the 60-meter hurdles in Nebraska with a Big East-best score of 7.50 seconds.

Woodley, who hopes to run for his native Canada, fell in Sydney, solidified his spot as the No. 1 seed in the event at this weekend's Big East Championships at the Carrier Dome. Last February, he won the 60-meter hurdles in a Dome-record 7.61 seconds.

Fellow sprinter Veronica Dyer also recorded a conference best time in the 60-meter hur-

Current and former SU athletes move on to professional sports careers.

For most Syracuse University athletes, the glory ends in Onondaga County, the orange and blue jerseys serving as their last significant uniforms. However, some Orange sports stars prolong their careers at the professional level. Six former SU men's hoopsters play in the NBA this season, and 26 past SU football players maintained jobs in the National Football League in 1999.

Subtract those SU alumni drowning in dollars, however, and a cluster of former Orangemen remain, hoping to salvage their skills in some minor league.

Kevin Mason, a 1995 SU graduate who piloted the Syracuse gridiron offense in 1994, splits his year between the Buffalo Destroyers in the Arena Football League and the Edmonton Eskimos. The athletic quarterback harbors dreams of playing in the NFL someday, and his efforts last year earned him a possible invitation to the St. Louis Rams' minicamp this spring.

“At every level, I’ve played with guys who have gone to the NFL,” Mason said. “I played with a Pro Bowler in Buffalo. We run a very high-level offense here. I think it’s a matter of time and luck before I get a shot.”

Two Orange alumni join Mason playing north of the border, while six SU grads participate in the Arena league. The most famous of the bunch, quarterback Marwin Graves, was dealt from the Iowa Barnstormers to the expansion Detroit Fury in December.

Players in the Arena and Canadian leagues, which play second fiddle to the NFL in fan support and financial backing, frequently struggle to make ends meet. While some earn as much as $100,000 per season, Mason said he knows players who don uniform for as little as $600 per game, totaling only $8,400 for the 14-game season.

Football minor leaguers discovered a model this season in Rams quarterback Kurt Warner. Two seasons removed from the Arena League, Warner threw 41 regular-season touchdown passes...
Upcoming graduates face the arduous task of paying back student loans.

Kathleen Mullaney is grateful but stressed. Like the majority of Syracuse University students, Mullaney, a senior nursing major, has taken out loans to help pay for her tuition, and she is already wondering how she will repay them. "I know once I graduate, I’ll have all these loans to pay back," Mullaney said. "I feel pressured because I’ll have to pay them back real quick. But without these loans, I wouldn’t be able to go to school here."

Students typically borrow about $18,600 to cover four years of school, said Christopher Walsh, director of Financial Aid Services. Students have up to 10 years to pay them back, beginning after a six-month grace period following graduation. The average payment is about $200 a month, he said. Every student is responsible for paying back the original borrowed amount, the interest and loan fees.

"It’s always a tradeoff," Walsh said. "You hate to see people borrow, but it’s an investment. College graduates earn more and more money each year, and because of that, I think it’s an investment."

Walsh said there is a difference between viewing student loans as debt and as investments.

Financial frustrations
Tuition at SU is $19,360 per year. Though loans for freshmen begin at $3,000, it increases with every year a student attends college and by senior year, a student can receive a loan for up to $6,000 from a bank, he said. The office of financial aid certifies each student for eligibility, and the federal government guarantees the actual loan.

"We don’t determine how much money a student receives," Walsh said. "The amount is determined by the Department of Education."

See LOANS page 10

Here are some little known consequences for college graduates who default on their loans:

- Your loans may be turned over to a collection agency.
- You’ll be liable for the costs associated with collecting your loan, including court costs and attorney fees.
- You can be sued for the entire amount of your loan.
- Your wages may be garnished.
- Your federal and state income tax refunds may be withheld.
- Your defaulted loans will appear on your credit record, making it difficult for you to obtain an auto loan, mortgage or even credit cards. A bad credit record can also harm your ability to find a job.
- You won’t receive any more federal financial aid until you repay the loan in full or make arrangements to repay what you already owe and make at least six consecutive monthly payments on time. You will also be ineligible for assistance under most federal benefit programs.
- You’ll be ineligible for deferments.
- Federal interest benefits will be denied.
- You may not be able to renew a professional license you hold.

Avoid defaulting on a student loan with advice from the experts:

- Make sure you understand your options and responsibilities before taking out a loan.
- Make your payments on time.
- Notify your lender or servicer promptly of any changes that may affect the repayment of your loan.
- If you encounter financial difficulties, consider applying for a deferment or forbearance on your loans. It is better to defer your payments than to go into default.
- If you are having trouble making payments, your lender may be able to suggest alternate repayment options, such as graduated repayment, income sensitive repayment and income contingent repayment.
- Consider using a consolidation loan to combine all of your educational loans into one big loan.
- Keep careful records regarding your loan. Put copies of all your letters, canceled checks, promissory notes, notices of disbursement and other forms in a file folder.

For some Syracuse University graduates, the door opened when they walked through the doors of Syracuse University's Division of International Programs Abroad. For others, they found opportunities on their own. In whatever way they ended up in an overseas career, SU alumni have made the international business world their home,

John Buschman, associate director of DIPA, said finding and maintaining a permanent overseas job is not as easy as one might think. "American citizens do not automatically have a right to work in other countries," he said. "You can get a short-term work permit, but a career is a different story."

If a student finds an employer that is interested while interning overseas, the employer would have to apply to that country's Ministry of Foreign Affairs and get an application for a work visa, he added.

"Some students have done internships through DIPA and students have gotten jobs before," Buschman said. "But it's unusual."

Megat Ahmad Tawwul Megat Wah, president of the SU Alumni International Club in Malaysia, decided to return to his homeland after graduation from SU in 1980. Wah, considered a scholar to his Malay government, said it was his obligation to come back to his country and contribute to his nation.

"That time, our Malaysian economy was booming, jobs were in abundance," he said. "With MBA qualifications, jobs were looking for you and not otherwise. I even got interviewed in the U.S. and offered a job before I graduated, especially with U.S. graduates in high demand by our Malaysian government and companies."

Wah's story is unusual in the sense he was a citizen of Malaysia while enrolled at SU, making it easier for him to find a career.

"It's hard to get overseas jobs especially when countries like Spain have a 15 percent unemployment," Buschman said. "You shouldn't go into the internship thinking that you will be working overseas."

Students weigh the option of graduating early.

What would you do if you could save a year of homework? While the grand majority of college students opt to graduate in the customary four years that constitute higher learning, there are some who choose to hit the books hard and graduate early.

With careful planning, graduating ahead of schedule is not always beyond a student's reach. The college road less traveled may mean less elective choices and more intense work loads, but for some students, the additional effort is time well spent, they said.

"I have a few more rough semesters to look forward to in order to complete all my requirements, but in the end it will all be worth it," said Erin Perry, a finance major at Pennsylvania State University who plans on completing her degree in three years. "I have an opportunity to get my feet into the business world before the rest of my peers, not to mention the fact that I am saving my parents a lot of money."

Unlike Perry, there are some students who are not yet ready to meet the demands of the real world. SU freshman Stacey Moreau has earned sophomore standing, but said she has decided against an early graduation.

"I was thinking of maybe graduating early, but instead I have chosen to take on a more difficult course load and graduate as a dual in Newhouse and the School of Management," said Moreau. "I had Moreau tried to complete a dual degree in the S. I. Newhouse School of Public See EARLY page 10

Keys to Professional Success

1. Be on time or, better yet, be early. This goes for everyday and special events.
2. Look busy, even when you're not. Be constantly looking for things to do.
3. Seek out responsibility and take it. Those who have initiative usually get promoted.
4. Develop the ability to make decisions. Bosses will appreciate this quality.
5. Get clarification when needed. It's better to get the job done right than spend the time doing it wrong.
6. Do more than expected.
7. Manage your time well. Show that you do not need a babysitter.

SU alumni relay stories of their quests for jobs after graduation.

Joy Davia special projects editor

After graduating from Syracuse University in 1998, Chris Arnold did not jump immediately into the job market and instead took a year off working temporary jobs in Syracuse. Two years later, he is unemployed and living outside of Boston, trying to cover the gaping hole in his resume when applying for research positions in the city. "Most people see the year gap and think you can't do the job," said Arnold, who graduated with a degree in history and a minor in education.

Not pursuing a minor that would complement his major was Arnold's second mistake, he said. Students studying the more "trendy" majors in The College of Arts and Sciences, such as history and sociology, should have a minor to use as an alternative. If Arnold could do it all over again, he would have selected a minor in information studies.

"No matter how many skills you have, you should have something concrete on paper," he added.

To avoid suffering a similar fate, he said, advanced preparation is key. "Junior year is the time to start researching the skills needed to pursue career goals," he said. This includes searching Web sites for employment advertisements to see what is needed for certain occupations.

"If I saw what skills were needed, I would have gone out and got them," he said. "It would have made my life a whole lot easier."

Arnold said he sent resumes out to companies nationwide, thinking that employers would bite. He added that employers are more likely to hire potential employees who live in the job area, and so he moved to Boston.

If a research job is not found in the next five months, Arnold said he may take a job at a bank or go back to college.

Fellowships offer college graduates the chance to work in the political arena.

Uncle Sam wants you to work for him—or at least for his elected officials.

Thirteen states around the country are offering year-long fellowships to college graduates in various branches of government to learn about the legislative process.

Capital Fellows Program, run through the National Conference of State Legislatures, is one of the most prominent post-graduate government fellowship programs in the country. The program is run in conjunction with a state capital-area university from which students earn a fixed number of graduate credits.

California offers one of the larger programs in the country. The fellowships are conducted in conjunction with California State University at Sacramento, and participants can be placed in the state Senate, state Assembly, executive office or judicial branch.

Tina Gonzalez, outreach coordinator for the California Senate Fellows Program, said this is a very viable option to enter the political realm.

"It's a way to get in," she said. "There are three ways people get into the government: dumb luck, they know someone or they got a really good internship or fellowship. If they're interested in policy, this is a great way to get in."

Fellows perform all the duties that any other government staffer would, including counsel work, public speaking, researching bills and office work.

"Each placement is different so depending on where they are, who they're working for and what their background is, they will have different functions and responsibilities," said Dan Friedlander, the program director of Senate Fellows, which began in 1973.

During their 11-month term, Senate fellows receive 12 graduate credits from CSU-Sacramento for their work and are considered both students and employees of the university. Fellows also receive a monthly stipend of $1,982 as well as medical and dental benefits. They do not receive housing or transportation costs, but they are eligible to defer student loan payments during their fellowship.

Similar benefits and conditions apply to the other California programs — the Jesse M. Unruh Assembly Fellowship Program, begun in 1957, the Executive Fellowship Program, begun in 1967, and the Judicial Administration Fellowship Program, begun in 1977. All the Capital Fellows Programs hire 18 fellows each year, except the judicial program, which hires five.

"This program is very established and well-known," Friedlander said. "It's very competitive."

The same is true in the other 12 states sponsoring government fellowships: Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Kansas, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Missouri, Ohio, Utah, Virginia and Washington. The program in each state varies and the types of fellowships available depend upon which state elected officials ask for additional staffers.

"Programs like these are invaluable," said Kristi Anderson, chairwoman of the political science department. "Of course, what the students actually do depends on their placement, but something like this gets them right into the political and governmental process."

Capital fellowships are not limited to political science, government or public policy students, Friedlander said. He said when selecting a group of fellows each branch tends to select a diverse pool of students, including those with interests in public policy, business, law and social sciences.

Eligibility: interest, but no formal training, in government, politics or policy required. Participants should have good writing, communication and interpersonal skills, as well as involvement in their community and have enthusiasm for their work.

Benefits: a monthly stipend of $1,802, plus comprehensive medical, dental and vision benefits. Fellows are enrolled during their term at a capitol area university in their state for 12 graduate credits, and they have the option of deferring student loan payments until their term is over.

Although preparation is key in landing such high profile internships, students should also concentrate on ensuring their senior year and the following summer are spent well filled. As a student in the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications, students should take advantage of opportunities and try to find a job by the time they graduate. When I was 5, though, the question was, "What do you want to do when you grow up?" Now people ask, "What are you doing in May?" What am I supposed to do if I don't want to grow up?
This column is supposed to describe the horrors of the senior job search (information studies and management types can stop reading here, because you probably already have jobs). My job search has been so bad — closer to a comedy of errors than a horror show. Unfortunately, the most horrible part of my job search is the lack of effort I've put into it.

While my friends land lucrative jobs at Fortune 500 companies, I rationalize that the companies I want to work for haven't started hiring yet. Whenever I talk to a potential employer, one of the first things they want to know is, "When do you graduate?"
"Mid-May," I tell them.
"Call me late in April," they say. Or, if they're a Syracuse University alumni, they start asking about the basketball team.
I called a man I worked with three summers ago. I don't know him very well, but he's only a few years older than I am and he recently landed a great job at a new company. So I thought he'd be able to offer some job-hunting advice.
"Get in touch with everyone you've ever worked with," he told me.
Okay, I thought, get that covered, I'm on the right track.

ESF student dies after crash

BY SAPNA KOLLALI
Lifestyle Editor

A State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry student killed himself with a 12-gauge shotgun Friday afternoon after striking another car and injuring its occupants on Route 5 in Montezuma.

Curtis Gerbig, 22, was a fourth-year forest biology and resource management major at SUNY ESF. He was traveling home after his Friday lab class.

Gerbig was driving his Cherry pickup truck eastbound at 5:40 p.m. Friday on Route 5 and tried to turn left onto state Route 80 when he struck Harald A. Willett, driving westbound in a Dark Spirit.

Willett’s wife, Kolly, was also in the car. The couple, from Seneca Falls, suffered minor injuries and are now being treated at Auburn Memorial Hospital, according to a police report.

The car spun off the road and into a parking lot at the intersection of routes 5 and 80, where the Refuge Diner once stood. Gerbig drove a short distance northward on Route 90 before he pulled onto the shoulder of the road, according to the police report.

He then shot himself while still in the vehicle. He was pronounced dead on scene.

"The whole thing is really strange," said his brother, Chris Gerbig of Orlando, Fla.

Chris Gerbig said the suicide was a direct result of the accident. He said the couple was found unconscious at the scene.

"Curtis just assumed they were dead," he said. "That was a little more than he could handle. His heart just got the best of him, and he got real hollow."

National colleges plan SU rape center headquarters

BY SARAH OVASKA
Staff Writer

Syracuse University is working to become the national headquarters of an inter-collegiate rape prevention center, said Doreta Card, the director of SU Rape Advocacy, Prevention and Education Center.

Colleges across the country are working collaboratively to form a group affiliated with the already-established New York State Intercollegiate Coalition Against Sexual Assault, Card said.

The coalition was created with a grant given to the R.A.P.E. Center by the New York State Department of Health in November 1997 from provisions in the Federal Violence Against Women Act. The coalition has 150 different campuses in New York state interested in increasing the resources for rape or sexual assault victims as well as education on the issue, Card said.

SU is the only college in New York State that maintains a center focused on sexual assault issues.

While most campuses include services for victims in their health centers, they do not have separate rape counseling facilities, Card added.

The R.A.P.E. Center continued.

There needs to be more communication between the Student Government Association Finance Board and each student organization, debated both candidates for SGA assistant comptroller Sunday night.

"We need to have the finance board and the organizations work together," candidate David Gaulin said. "Instead of it being us and them, it can be we."

About 20 students attended the debate between Gaulin and Mary Vestina in the SGA office of the Schine Underground.

The candidates were given two minutes each to answer questions asked by current SGA Comptroller Chris Greiner.

The debate allowed the student body to be informed of each candidate's position and the duties they would entail, Greiner said.

"We are your allies, we are here for you, to work for SU students," said Vestina, an undeclared freshman in the College of Human Development.

Greiner asked questions about issues including the $70,000 annual allocation to Syracuse's New York Public Interest Research Group.

Students vote every four years to automatically allocate specific amounts of the Student Activity Fee to NYPIRG. The organization received $8 this year from each student's $114 student fee payment.

It needs to be looked into because the group does many things for the state, not specifically for SU students, Vestina said.

"I would have to investigate NYPIRG and see if $70,000 is necessary," Gaulin said. "I am for understanding and what it is doing for SU students," she said.

Gaulin, an undeclared sophomore in The College of Arts and Sciences, agreed.

SU alumnus killed after weekend car accident

BY EMILY KULKUS

A 26-year-old 1998 Syracuse University graduate was killed Saturday morning when the car he was driving slid off the road and struck a tree in New Jersey.

Accelerating at speeds of more than 85 mph on a 65-mph four-lane Route 322, Thulasi Ooruthiran, known as Thulasi, attempted to pass a pickup truck and lost control of his 2000 Ford Taurus, according to a Township of Hamilton Police Department report and SU spokesman Kevin Morris.

He was pronounced dead on arrival, the report said.

Ooruthiran was traveling alone from a friend's house to attend a photography class in Atlantic City when the crash occurred, according to the police report and Morris.

Ooruthiran graduated with a master's degree in computer engineering from SU in 1998. A citizen of Sri Lanka but a native of Nigeria, Ooruthiran received a bachelor's degree in 1995 from Obafemi Awolowo University, Ille-Ife, Osun State, in Nigeria.

Residing in Ocean City, N.J., Ooruthiran was employed by Prosoft in Atlantic City, N.J., a software company based in East Syracuse.

While at SU, Ooruthiran was active with the international student community, organizing field trips to Florida and to Niagara Falls. During those trips, he would often be the photographer, filming the group and their activities for a final documentary, said Alex Thevarajan, a School of Management professor and friend of the family.

"Thulasi is affectionately remembered for his extraordinary kindness," said Morris.

Bar raid delivers 12 subpoenas

One month after a deadly residence hall fire, police raided a South Orange, N.J., bar Friday night.

One of those arrested, a Seton Hall student, had recently admitted to police that he had "crushed the lounge at Seton Hall's Roland residence hall minutes before the Jan. 19 blaze, The Star-Ledger of Newark, N.J., reported Sunday.

The fire killed three students and injured 84. Four students remain in the hospital with burns.

Nearly a dozen others arrested in the sting were given subpoenas by police to testify Tuesday in front of a grand jury investigating the fire, The Star-Ledger reported.

Pinochet injures himself in fall

SANTIAGO, Chile — Former Aug. 20 arrest on a plane to Madrid, Pinochet's health has been a source of speculation.

The accident happened Friday, when the 84-year-old former Chilean dictator awoke from his daily nap, Monica Wehrhahn, speaking with the package, local Pinochet Foundation said.

"As he was getting up, he appeared dizzy and fell," she said. "He suffered some bruises on the right side of his face and his right hand, but definitely nothing serious."

ROSKOVSKA MITROVICA, Yugoslavia — Serbs in a southern Kosovo town have thrown rocks and bricks at dozens of U.S. soldiers, carrying out an immense NATO search for illicit weapons in the northern part of this divided Kosovo city Sunday, prompting a French general to order their retraction.

The U.S. soldiers were surrounded by the mob only a few hours after they deployed, blocking a group of at least five ethnic Albanians from entering the town.

No serious injuries were reported; one American suffered a broken nose and another had a tooth chipped by a rock.

Historians rank Lincoln as top U.S. President

Washington, D.C. — Historians have surveyed the leadership qualities of the 43 presidents of the United States and judged Abraham Lincoln to be "by far the greatest," followed by Franklin D. Roosevelt, George Washington and Theodore Roosevelt and Harry Truman.

The survey ranked the top five presidents served in the 20th century, as did five of the next six. Among the 24 presidents who served before 1900, only Lincoln, Washington and Jefferson were ranked in the top 10.

Student assaulted, pushed down stairs

Staff Reports

An unidentified man assaulted a Syracuse University student early Saturday morning on the 1000 block of Harrison Street, according to a police report.

The victim got into an argument with the man who punched him and then shoved him down a set of stairs, the report said.

"He hit me three times and then threw me down the stairs," the victim said.

"We had no clue that it was illegal to sled there," said McCauley, a junior television, radio and film major.

McCauley added that Norgaard, a sophomore in the L.C. Smith College of Engineering and Computer Sciences, broke her hip while sledding.

Norgaard could not be reached for comment.

They even took the stereo remote," Subocz said. "It was clear that they knew what they were looking for.

There have been six other car break-ins around the SU campus this semester, according to police reports. No suspects were found for any of the incidents.

Syracuse police cite Zeta Psi fraternity

BY NICOLE ELLIOTT
Contributing Writer

Syracuse Police broke up a party at about 2 a.m. Sunday at the Zeta Psi fraternity house, 727 Comstock Ave.

"It really didn't happen," Zeta Psi President Dave Lingren said.

Lingren said some close friends gathered Saturday night at Zeta Psi. Initially, it was a small gathering of about 20 to 25 people, but as the night went on, more people began to arrive.

"People started showing up out of nowhere," Lingren said. "Drones of human beings started coming in.

As more students entered Zeta Psi, the house became increasingly crowded and noisy, he added.

Police officers arrived, without receiving any prior calls, to break up the party that developed from what was meant to be just a small gathering of friends, Lingren said.

He said the event just went beyond the brothers' control.

"The police was actually a blessing in disguise," Lingren said. "We welcomed them in."

Officers issued a noise violation to Zeta Psi. Party-goers then began to leave, he said. Lingren said he was unaware of any serious damages or injuries, and added that the party had no connection to gang activity.

Zeta Psi, along with other Syracuse University fraternities, is currently going through a pledge period, when new members are initiated into the Greek community.

Lingren indicated that the event brought up concerns regarding future gatherings. He said the house will be more careful about who arrives at their parties and that brothers will monitor how many people attend.

The Interfraternity Council does not have any intention of taking action unless a police report is filed, IFC President Brad Young said.

David Goldstein, IFC vice president, will work with the Office of Greek Life to decide what actions should occur in the event a police report is filed, he added.

"Zeta Psi is a good chapter," Young said. "They're in good standing with IFC and the Office of Greek Life."

The Fraternity returned to SU this fall after losing its charter in 1994 because of disciplinary problems. After losing its charter, Zeta Psi remained inactive on campus for the next four years to ensure that the brothers involved with the problems had graduated, allowing the fraternity to return to campus with a charter and a clean record.

The Zeta Psi brothers moved into their present house on Comstock Avenue last August, after gaining university recognition in the spring of 1996.

A medication for post-exposure to HIV is usually given.

The rape kit can cost up to $2,000, Card said.

Although the rape kit is covered under most health insurance plans, students often opt not to have the insurance companies involved because it would be listed under their parents' insurance, Card said.

"They won't choose the kit because it will state that a sexual assault has happened," she said.

The R.A.P.E. Center plans on running a series of events for Relationship Violence Week in April, including having informational tables in the Schiss Student Center, showing a film on relationship violence, sponsoring speakers and hanging shirts from the Clothesline Project, Card said.

Police secrecy won’t deliver quick justice

When an arsonist’s work leaves three students dead, there’s no time to ask questions.

But only questions remain after an early-morning raid at a Seton Hall University bar Friday. Police arrested 37 students for underage drinking while handing 12 of them subpoenas for questioning in the deadly Jan. 19 blaze that killed two and injured five more.

The Essex County, N.J. prosecutor’s office refuses to release information about the connection between the illegal-drinking sweep and the fire, leaving suspicions that the raid may have been a setup to blemish the reputations of potential suspects. The amount of time that elapsed between when the subpoenas were signed and when they were served remains a mystery.

Students, parents and Seton Hall administrators deserve better than an under-handled police investigation after the fiery tragedy. Bringing the perpetrators to justice is of utmost concern to the grieving families, but dodging the public and the press underscores the investigation.

Police and prosecutors were given ample opportunity throughout the weekend to clarify their motives, but repeatedly ducked questions about the situation.

A tight-lipped prosecution won’t hasten the judicial process.

Time is precious as the ashes cool and the trial grows cold. Only the student population holds the missing pieces to the fire’s puzzle and secrecy and scare tactics aren’t the tools that should be used to unearth clues.

The testimony of students subpoenaed in the harassment raid may lead police to information and arrests, but police should have been forthright when slapping handcuffs to the wrists of the underage drinkers. Crafty police may have been warranted, but the results deserve a clear explanation.

Deceit is a two-way street — only once the police start talking will witnesses talk back.

American voting begins outside voting booth

The American media often makes a fuss about the low voter turnout in American elections. What doesn’t realize is that “non-voting” is a viable option and explains the low turnout in American elections. There is a simple answer: America is the most democratic nation in the world that also enjoys substantial political stability and freedom.

First, American history shows that elections have always been a part of political culture. Beginning with James Madison’s discussion of “factions” in the Federalist Papers, the long-standing two-party system has come to dominate American politics. Consequently, some people have come to realize the two-party status quo is only an excuse for politicians to launch attacks against each other in search of personal gains.

Therefore, the public understands voting because they believe their choices really make a difference. Also, there are many Americans who have moderate political views or are tired of the two-party system. But for some ideologically reason, third-party candidates are often regarded as “radicals” or “extremists” and rarely win elections. Therefore, these people choose non-voting to protest the unfortunate reality of American elections. There is a non-voting “vote in itself.

Inevitably, the notorious two-party system gives rise to negative campaigning — a traditional tactic that politicians employ to discredit any other national television, force their opponents to resign from office and in some cases, send their opponents to prison. Instead of working together to build bridges and improve the lives of those candidates engage in nasty debates aiming at one another’s personality or even past sexual encounters. Today political campaigns are destructive at best and candidates pay only “lip service” to the notion of fuller participation in American life.

Elections drive us away from politics. On a technical level, the American voter turnout is low because, unlike most European and Asian countries, Election Day is on a workday instead of Sunday. Although the “non-Sunday election syndrome” has not proven to make a critical difference, it certainly has implications for American politics. Based on the recent voter registration record, there are more registered Democrats than registered Republicans. Statistically speaking, Republican voters tend to be wealthier and better educated than the population as a whole, while Democrats are more likely to be less affluent, blue-collar workers. So presumably, if election day was on a Sunday, Democrats might be more apt to get out to vote, since they don’t work that day.

On an interesting note, in the 1990 German election, Chancellor Helmut Kohl encouraged voters to vote in exchange for a banana. Though this banana was seemingly issued for the election, it made voting a fun and positive process for German voters. In America, voters are also given the opportunity to cast their vote at polling places strategically placed in the pool for jury duty selection. But many Americans feel that jury duty is a burden rather than an honor. Perhaps that explains why Germany’s voter turnout is, on average, 30% higher than that of America.

Hence, non-voting is a viable option and explains the low voter turnout in American elections. It is a signal of democracy; it is instead a signal of a well-established democracy. The more frequent “non-voting” is practiced in a country, the more likely that country is experiencing a well-established democracy and that its citizens are living in political and economic stability.

Throughout the years, both the American government and political parties have attempted to find ways to increase the voter outcome. Such efforts are hopeless. No matter how candidates energize their base, create strong, local party organizations or start engaging in positive campaigning, the current election turnout will not substantially increase. It would take another Great Depression or Civil War to completely transform this existing trend.

Furthermore, election turnout is low in the US because voters no longer feel they are part of the electoral system. As social scientist Michael Moore explains, “Democrats and Republicans look exactly alike nowadays.” Neither political party has been successful in defeating the original purpose of elections as methods to institutionalize mass influence in politics, it does not mean voters have lost representation. Instead, they have merely switched their challeges of selection representation. Often, crucial policy choices are made outside the electoral realm. For example, concerned individuals form and join interest groups and associations to influence policy outcomes. In reality, interest groups have taken over party politics while democracy is still alive and well in America.

CMS official disputes claims of sensationalism

To the Editor:

I hope that by responding to Mr. Erik Zimmerman’s comments in Friday’s issue of The Daily Orange, I can forestall any potential loss of the students’ integrity in me or Computing and Media. Mr. Zimmerman is right, there is no evidence of a Denial of Service (DoS) attack on the Sunix servers. It was not the Sunix servers that were attacked. The servers that were affected were other Unix servers not related to CMS. The outage was first noted as an Internet router failure (“symptom”) because that was where the initial evidence pointed.

Contrary to Mr. Zimmerm’s assertions, during February 12th through 14th, our network was, in fact, sending a large amount of data to the Internet. Since almost all universities have their own Internet connection, course, other “edu” sites were not affected. The issue was more than an attack on Amazon.com affects BarnesandNoble. The “symptoms” referred to were relatively bream and random throughout the weekend. The apparent cause of the attack was an ISP in Finland. I admit, the motive of attacking through SHI is not clear.

I am certainly not motivated by a desire to get more money out of the SU for increased funding. In fact, I have stated that those attacks, if possibly criminal, do not justify any large-scale investments in “putting bars on the windows.” My interest is to maintain high availability of computing systems, while balancing the desire for an open, learning environment. Be assured we have been in touch with the proper authorities. I reported this incident to the FBI. I am not interested in anyone “jumping on the bandwagon.” My reason for writing this column is to make sure that the SU is informed that they might find interest. If that’s a “quest for sensationalism,” then so be it. Frankly, I would rather be charged with that than with being inaccessible.

Supporters argue reason for Bush triumph

BY KATE STEVENSON

Campaign staff members for Arizona Sen. John McCain hope to bring their candidate back into the winners' circle in the upcoming Michigan and New York state primaries, said Howard Opinsky, a McCain spokesman.

The absence of right-wing supporters in these states will help McCain achieve this goal, Opinsky said.

Texas Gov. George W. Bush beat McCain in the Feb. 19 South Carolina Republican primary, 53 percent to 42 percent.

Bush's victory came despite the fact that 21 polling precincts in South Carolina's Greenville County were closed for the primary. Voters, however, were able to cast their ballots in other precincts.

"We won every group in South Carolina except for the Christian Right because our message was distorted," Opinsky said.

He added that Bush's campaign focused on attacks toward McCain's religious life in an effort to alienate devout Christian constituents. The ad campaign inspired countless members of the religious right to make their way to the polls to vote against McCain, he said.

"McCain would have been able to win had it not been for the showing of that group," Opinsky said.

Texas Gov. George W. Bush beat McCain in the Feb. 19 South Carolina Republican primary, 53 percent to 42 percent.

Bush's victory came despite the fact that 21 polling precincts in South Carolina's Greenville County were closed for the primary. Voters, however, were able to cast their ballots in other precincts.

"We won every group in South Carolina except for the Christian Right because our message was distorted," Opinsky said.

He added that Bush's campaign focused on attacks toward McCain's religious life in an effort to alienate devout Christian constituents. The ad campaign inspired countless members of the religious right to make their way to the polls to vote against McCain, he said.

NYPIRG concludes voter registration drive

BY BETH BRAVERMAN

Syracuse’s New York Public Interest Research Group registered about 200 voters from the beginning of this semester to the Feb. 11 primary registration deadline, said Eric Wild, the group’s project coordinator.

Wild said he is satisfied with the number of registrations during the drive, given the short time available to recruit new voters.

Group members distributed more than 300 registration application forms to students waiting in line for tickets to First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton’s Feb. 9 speech in Goldstein Auditorium, Wild said.

The group hosted tables in the Schine Student Center and dining halls to register the students. NYPIRG representatives also spoke to classes, trying to encourage students to register for New York state’s March 7 presidential primary.

Registering student voters is important because it gives them a political voice, Wild said.

“Basically, it’s students who empower themselves politically, they cannot do that without voting,” Wild said.

Politicians will not work as hard for student-oriented issues, such as lowering tuition and students’ rights, if they do not see many registered students, he added.

Chris Durie, a freshman engineering major, said he has been a registered voter since November.

“I figured it was my responsibility to make sure someone doesn’t end up in office who is going to screw everything up,” Durie said.

NYPIRG is non-partisan and therefore can perform the drive with any political affiliated group, Wild said.

The College Democrats planned to run their own voter drive, but Clinton’s speech consumed most of their time before this year’s primary deadline, said Christina Hinchey, president of the College Democrats. She said, however, that NYPIRG was very thorough in their own project this semester.

“I think NYPIRG is a wonderful organization. They do a fantastic job on voter registration and a lot of issues,” she said.

Joe Burns, College Republican chairman, said although NYPIRG’s final registration numbers are impressive, he does not agree with what he feels is the group’s liberal orientation.

“I think NYPIRG is an extremely left-wing organization,” Burns said. “While registering voters is a good thing, we will not participate in activities run by such extreme organisations.”

NYPIRG is the largest student-directed advocacy organization in New York state, with 20 chapters on college campuses throughout the state, according to a NYPIRG report.

The group’s goal is to fight for issues important to students, as well as involve them politically. In addition, NYPIRG also fights for environmental protection, consumer protection, homeless and hunger prevention and an end to sweatshops, according to the report.

The group is currently working on a nonpartisan guide to help students become informed voters, Wild said.

“We are also trying to get many student organizations on campus signed on to Student Vote 2000,” he said.

This service will update the organizations about the election via e-mail. Groups interested in this service should contact NYPIRG, Wild said.

and compassion that he shared with anyone that he met,” Thevaranjan said.

Ooruthiran and his devout Hindu family arrived in Syracuse for some time last year, the professor said. Thevaranjan and his family will host a memorial gathering in honor of Ooruthiran on Saturday at Thevaranjan’s home in Syracuse, he said.

Thevaranjan encouraged all those wishing to attend to contact him in his SOM office, he said.

A photography enthusiast, Ooruthiran was a “good guy,” said several of his friends.

“Even though my brother was my roommate, I was always closer to Thulasî,” said Sutha Sivasubramaniam, Ooruthiran’s roommate for five years while studying in Nigeria. “He was just so nice. It seems that all the bad stuff happens to around nice guy. It seems that all the bad stuff happens to nice guys.”

Sutha recalled teasing Ooruthiran about his photographs asking him who was shaking the camera while admiring the black and white still life. As one of five boys, two of which live in Nigeria and the other two in Australia, Ooruthiran is always warm and reserved, said Sutha, who is currently working for the Oracle Corp., a software company in California. Sutha and his brother, Kiruba, were studying at the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy, said their common Sri Lankan heritage with Ooruthiran created a close relationship between the students.

“He was probably the best example of a nice guy,” Kiruba said. “He had no bad habits. The two brothers said they were attempting to contact the Nigerian Embassy to make arrangements for the body to be flown to be with family. Because it was the weekend and Monday is President’s Day, however, arrangements would not be finalized until Tuesday, Sutha said.

Upset by their friend’s death, the two brothers said they had spent the day contacting mutual college friends about the accident.

“In my religion, they say that only the nice guys die early so they can go be with God,” Sutha said. “I guess that’s what happened here.”

Artist’s work highlights non-traditional subjects

BY CAROLINE CHEN
Staff Writer

The image of a large nipple made of wood, wood putty and lacquer flashed onto a screen Friday night in the Hall of Languages.

This work, 13 inches in diameter and 14 inches tall, called “Nursing Missile,” was one of 14 slides Maria Elena Gonzalez, a Brooklyn-based sculptor, presented to an audience of about 50 students at part of the ninth annual Maritimine Symposium.

In the gallery where it was shown, “Nursing Missile” hung on the wall above the viewer eye-level, forcing them to tilt their heads up to see it, Gonzalez said. “For me, it was sort of like the relationship of nursing,” she added.

Young artists should not be concerned with conforming their works because the art world is constantly shifting, Gonzalez said. “Do what is important, not what will be the next flavor of the month,” she said.

Although she avoids labels, she said she is known as the “Ghetto Princess” because she frequently exhibits her work in alternative settings in Brooklyn and Bronx.

Gonzalez said she participated in Latino, women and gay shows in the beginning of her career just to be noticed. But she said she realized that she did not want her work identified only with shows focusing on specific types of artists.

“It was like dissecting myself into all these little boxes,” she said. “After a while, it became reductive instead of amplifying audiences.”

Gonzalez said she would not consider exhibiting her work in that type of show anymore. She turned down an opportunity to show her work in an exhibition of Hispanic artists sponsored by AT&T, she added. “You’re all Hernandez-Fernandez-Garcia-Rodriguez,” Gonzalez said. “It was an insulting.”

Gonzalez said her traditional training in art was helpful but hindered her freedom to explore non-traditional subject matter.

“The teachers I had were just very formally inclined,” she said. “When I brought in ideas and imagery into my work that had to do with specific issues, primarily the queer issue or women’s issues, it was dismissed as a subject matter not important enough to be explored in a show.”

Redefining normal

In a piece entitled “Seesaw,” Gonzalez incorporated two concepts with public hair from herself and her lover. She described the piece as “very playful,” but added that the work was taken down when children came into the museum to see the show.

Gonzalez said her work took on a serious note in “Persistence of Sorrow,” a work she dedicated to friends who died of AIDS. A wide band of black rubber stretched around the room with the names of deceased friends embossed on it in Braille and covered with Vaseline.

“Once you go up and read it, you have to speak through your hands that you walk away,” Gonzalez said. “I wanted the piece to speak through the bestes.”

Gonzalez said she also “pushes the envelope” through the way her works are displayed. She turned down an opportunity to exhibit a 20-by-12 foot sheet of rubber over the actual artwork.

“As people kept rubbing it and rubbing it, the outlines of artwork surfaced,” Gonzalez said.

The museum had put up a sign to let people know they could touch the art, she said. “Viewer participation is very important,” Gonzalez said.

Some of the installations are occasionally for people to touch and play with.

Gonzalez also addressed the role of funding in art, specifically regarding to a show featuring daring works by women artists. The 1994 show, called “Bad Girls,” took place at the New Museum of Contemporary Art in New York City.

Gonzalez said she proposed one of her own works, “Self-Serve,” for the show, but curators considered the work too extreme to include. “That has to do with being an institution that has to listen to a board that might be offended,” she said. “It undermines the function of a place as the New Museum.”

For “Self-Serve,” Gonzalez created a bathroom-like chamber on one side, two metal handle and a penis-shaped object protruded from the tiled wall. Small round mirrors were scattered on the walls of the room. The artist said the work was “uncomfortable” but “humorous.”

Artist Faith Wilding and Judith Barry were also scheduled to participate in the discussion with Gonzalez, Wilding and Barry, however, were unable to attend because of inclement weather.

“I felt really bad that the other two people weren’t there,” said Danielle Zeulinski, an undeclared freshman in the College of Visual and Performing Arts.

Zeulinski said she did not know a lot about feminist art and would have liked the opportunity to compare the artists.

The event was taped for the artists in absentia, who are scheduled to speak in March, said Cindy Moore, a graduate painting student and a member of the Committee on Women and Art, the group which sponsored the event.

After hearing Gonzalez speak, Zeulinski said she hired her for avoiding a label for herself as a woman, as a Latino or as a lesbian artist.

She has so much diversity within herself,” Zeulinski said. Gonzalez said she does not worry about how her work relates to other artists or social theories.

“When I’m working, I don’t really want to know what I’m doing,” she said. “Sometimes, good things are being lost in it and finding your way out of it.”
Jury suggests $37 million for Cayuga Nation

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Asst. News Editor

The Cayuga Indian Nation will receive $36.5 million as compensation in its 20-year-old land claim trial against New York state, a jury decided Thursday. The jury verdict is a far from over, said Daniel Braveman, dean of the Syracuse University College of Law. “There are still a number of issues the judge has to determine,” Braveman said. “Both sides could also appeal the decision because there have been rulings on both sides that could be disputed.”

The jury’s verdict is not a final number, because U.S. District Judge Neal McCurn still must decide several issues regarding compensation in the case, Braveman said. Some issues McCurn must examine could drastically increase the Cayugas’ final compensation, exceeding Thursday’s jury ruling, exceeding Thursday’s jury ruling, said Marc Violette, state attorney general’s office spokesman. “We’re working very diligently for what we believe to be the best interest of the people of the state of New York.”

Justice Department attorneys could not be reached for comment. During closing arguments Tuesday, the state’s lawyers focused on destroying the credibility of the Justice Department’s land appraiser, Arvel Hale. Hale estimated the land’s value at more than $350 million, while the state’s appraiser said the land was worth about $51 million, Violette said. Hale made critical errors in his calculations of the land’s value by overlooking and ignoring numbers that would have reduced his final estimate of the land’s value, Violette said.

The claim, originally filed in 1980, said the tribe has a valid claim to 64,000 acres of land in Cayuga and Seneca counties because the state obtained the two parcels without the consent of the U.S. government. In 1994, McCurn ruled that the nation’s claim was valid. His ruling led to a lengthy process of negotiations between the Cayugas that ended without a compromise. The stalemate in the years of negotiations led to the current trial, which is being heard in a Syracuse federal district court.

The verdict in the Cayugas case is the first of several similar land claim cases in the country to enter the damages phase and return a decision on compensation. “This will definitely have an impact with the negotiations in other cases,” Braveman said. “Because at least one jury has gone closer to the state’s appraisal, it could quite possibly influence future juries.”

Even though other land claim cases in New York state are rapidly approaching the trial phase, no one can predict the effect the Cayuga decision will have in those cases, Violette said. “It’s improper for us to speculate on other pending land claim cases,” he said. “It would just be inappropriate for our office to say that this will have a huge impact or no impact. We’ll just have to wait for that day to determine that.”

Violette added that an appeal is not out of the question, however, the stakes are still too high to discuss specifics. “We’re being pretty tight-lipped about the future of this case,” he said. “We might make the judge upset and that’s just not something we’re interested in doing right now.”

NEW YORK, CITY — Jason Hart and Etan Thomas were in the Nets’ organization, but lost their jobs as they left Madison Square Garden — a place legendary for its basketball and its Associated Press writers. The two former New York Kay-aks are now with the New York Knicks, and the Knicks are trying to make a name for themselves in the city.

They were on the floor as the Nets were beaten by the Knicks, 91-80, in the first half. Hart and Thomas are two of the few players who get much attention from the media.

The Nets had been holding their own against the Knicks, but they were never able to pull away. They led by 13 in the first half, but the Knicks came back to take the lead in the second half.

The Nets were trailing by two points with 10 seconds left in the game when Hart and Thomas came off the bench. They had both scored 10 points in the first half, but they missed their shots.

The Knicks had a 91-80 lead with 10 seconds left in the game, but the Nets had a chance to tie the game with a three-pointer. However, the Nets missed their shot and the Knicks won the game.

The Nets ended up with a record of 8-16 on the season. They are currently in last place in the Atlantic Division, and they have been struggling to keep up with the rest of the league.

Despite their struggles, the Nets have been trying to stay positive. "We’ve been working hard in practice, trying to get better," said Hart. "We’re just trying to keep it simple and play some good basketball."
ORANGEWOMEN DROP TWO OVER WEEKEND

BY CHRIS WOJCICKI

STORRS, Conn. — Beth Record couldn’t do it all by herself. Syracuse’s junior sharpshooter scored a career-high 35 points on Friday to try to lead her team to an unthinkable upset of No. 1 Connecticut.

Still, it wasn’t nearly enough, as the best team in the land put on a 41-31, 11-6 victory in a rematch at Gampel Pavilion, sprinting past the Orangewomen for a 107-76 victory.

"Midway through the first half, around the 12-minute mark, their press really started to have an effect on us," SU head coach Sue Chennoweth said. "We started to lose our composure just a little bit. UConn is an incredible team. In my opinion, they’re probably the best team ever assembled.

Despite snow and sleet making travel conditions treacherous, approximately 6,500 fans turned out for Friday’s game as the Huskies honored Stacy Hansmeyer and Paige Sauer on Senior Night.

For 10 minutes though, it appeared Record and SU might steal the spotlight.

The Orangewomen trailed just 20-16 early on and forced UConn into a slow-down game that seemed to make the Huskies uncomfortable.

But UConn (24-1, 13-0 Big East) got out in transition and scored SU. The ball almost touched the floor except when it went through the net on lay-ups, but Postell got a 19-1 2-point play to pull away.

"It looks like they shot a great percentage from the field, but really we’re taking three’s and they’re making lay-ups," Record said. "It’s disappointing and that’s something that we will work on.

We still have a young team, and we can carry this feeling right now and this experience over into next season.

While the Huskies shot 65 percent on the evening to remain undefeated in the Big East, Record responded with an impressive 11-for-24 shooting including four triples. He hit a game-high 22 points, including nine in the second half.

In fact, her output was the largest by an opposing player all season against once-beaten UConn.

Besides 12 points from Shannon Perry and four 3-pointers from Jaime James, Record didn’t have much help. The rest of the Orangewomen combined to make just four baskets and at times appeared to be in slow motion while UConn dominated.

Connecticut’s dynamic duo of Svetlana Abrosimova and Shea Ralph combined for 42 points, 17 assists and 15 rebounds.

Record said it’s the best 1-2 punch she’s witnessed since her tenure as an assistant at Iowa, when Laurie Aaron and Tia Jackson brought the Hawkeyes to the Final Four in 1993.

"We just have so much offense when the two of them are on the floor," Connecticut head coach Geno Auriemma said. "When they’re both playing the way they are, it’s so difficult to beat us.

Defensively we have to become more consistent and each game increase our level of play until I get that level."

Another loss

In another big upset, Record and the Orangewomen continued to struggle on the road. Syracuse fell to 0-6 in league play after losing to St. John’s 70-67 on Wednesday.

Record led SU (10-14, 3-10 Big East) in scoring with 10 points but was just 4-12 shooting. Shannon Perry posted a double-double with 14 points and 15 rebounds, while Levizia scored 10 and grabbed 10 boards.

South Orange, N.J., native Jasmine Wurl talled 10 points and had a game-high seven assists.

The Huskies next play on Saturday at 2 p.m. against SHU.

The Orangewomen continued to struggle, losing 79-73 to the Red Storm.

Barkeil missed the front end of a 1-and-1 the next time down and Shumpert drew a foul. He hit 1-of-2 from the line, setting up Jessie’s workmanlike board and hands, picking up his third foul.

We hit a couple big baskets, and we got back to tie and it went to the right guy," Boeheim said, "but Postell got a bad call and it went to the right guy.

Boeheim called the contest "a very well-played game," and the second-half numbers backed up his sentiments.

While the Orange shot a blistering 55.2 percent (16-for-29), St. John’s 63 percent.

Give blood again. It will be felt for a lifetime.
The cheeriest song on the album is "Porcelain," by the Spice Girls' much more talented counterpart, All Saints. The song is warm, catchy, and alluring. "It's a come-to-Jamaica" ads on television, Sugar Ray, whose inclusion on a slate of otherwise edgy artists may seem odd, actually delivers the beat song on the soundtrack. "Spinning Away" has an infectious guitar riff over a beautiful orchestral arrangement, but is far more mellow than you'd expect from Sugar Ray. Mark McGrath sings about a sunset ushering in the end of a beautiful day. The Beach" soundtrack then enters a transition period from carefree to dark.

Wrestlers lose season-ending meet 47-0

Fifteen minutes before matchtime, Shawn Thomas was absent from the bench. The lone senior sat alone 20 yards behind the Syracuse bench, preparing for his last dual match. Fifteen minutes after the dual meet, head coach Scott Miller stormed out of the locker room and sat silent at the scorer’s table as the Manley Field House crew disassembled the mat.

The Orangemen employed a full-court press after the free-throw line, but Booty’s errant shot broke on the left sideline. After a free throw and a Thomas foul, Booty drained two free throws. Following a Shumpert miss, Thornton pushed the dribble and found a cutting Postell for a 10-point cushion.

The Orangemen answered with back-to-back layups, but a defensive three by SU’s Ike Wennihan and a gubernatorial 3-pointer by Blackwell then missed a baby hook in the lane, and SU point guard Erick Barkley found Postell for a Garden-rattling dunk and a 2-3 advantage. Barkley walked the ball back up court, but Griffin stole his pass to Postell and drove a layup, cutting the margin to 101. conform to less academic standards. The nation’s education system is failing our children,” according to McCain’s campaign Web site, www.McCain2000.com. “American students trail those of other countries in the skills of the future, including math, science, and physics.”

Forty percent of American fourth graders are illiterate, compared to 40 million Americans, the Web site reads.

The 1996 National Education Reform Act set the nation’s standards for education by the end of the year 2000. The federal law has established four specific goals for educators, including mandating teachers to have access to continuing development programs and encouraging teachers to develop more challenging teaching strategies.

Under the Act, school districts will create integrated curriculums and support further curriculum development while forging partnerships with communities and parents.

“Eastern competition”

For the past decade, Asian students have been out-performing their American counterparts in the classroom. A recent cross-national study conducted by psychologists Harold Stephenson and James Stigler compared test scores of students from both Asian and American schools.

“U.S. students exhibited a significantly higher self-evaluation of their academic prowess than their foreign peers,” Stephenson and Stigler reported in the study. “They combined a low performance with a high sense of self-esteem.”

According to the study, one root of a child’s failure to succeed in school stems from an overabundance of self-esteem. Certain programs and initiatives that schools use to boost a child’s ego may detract from the education purpose, the study reported.

“As a result, children may feel that they do not need a solid education in order to succeed later in life,” Bossert said. “No other country tries to educate all of its citizens like the United States.”

unsettling tone that will leave most listeners (appropriately) wozzy. Barry Adamson’s track, “Richard, It’s Business as Usual,” featuring DiCaprio’s voice distorted to fit the song, is like a musical “Heart of Darkness.”

More “Heart of Darkness” imagery pervades the next song, “Brutal” by New Order. ”I’m a shadow man, in a hollow land,” the lead singer muses. Sounding like an updated Depeche Mode, the song is fitting of the dark denouement of the soundtrack.

The last song of the album’s dark section is “Lonely Soul,” performed by UNKLE. The arrangement is more traditional guitar and drums, but the conclusion is completely orchestral. The nine-minute opus begins ominously and ends usefully in the Doors classic “The End,” which was coincidentally used in the film “Apocalypse Now,” which was based on the novel “Heart of Darkness.”

Confidence? I think not. If Leftfield’s “Snakeblood” was the album’s prologue, Angela Balantoni & Orbital’s track “Beached” is its epilogue. Sounding like Bas Luhmann’s “Everyone’s Happy” (or the reverse), but not nearly as ridiculous, DiCaprio waxes poetic about the experience of the film over a catchy background beat. “Now, I refuse an invitation,” he says, “and if it hurts, you know what, it’s probably worth it.”

Unlike most soundtracks, these instrumental scores or shameless marketing plays to make more money off a film, “The Beach” is an absorbing and cohesive musical experience. The songs all work together to convey the joys, dangers and ultimate triumphs of DiCaprio’s character, Chon Norrington, to the body of work. As DiCaprio says, just keep your mind open and suck in the experience, and if you do, it will be more than worth it. My Grade: A

After the meeting with Elmore, James taps his weekly "address to the students" to be aired on University television. Among the issues raised, getting a new campus bus service was a recurring demand. "Why aren't they stopping at the Goldstein Student Center," James says. "I have to go all the way to NorthfSouth campus before I can get on the bus.

Strange beginnings

James was a member of the Black Box Players when he attended his first SGA Assembly meeting a year ago. Jen Dee, SGA's public relations director, had invited representatives from Black Box to come to meetings as a way for the two organizations to get to know each other. James was unimpressed. "There were so many alterations," he said. "It was like nothing.

Instead of walking away though, James decided to stay. Pretty soon, he had joined the 50 signatures needed to join the Assembly in mid-season. "SGA was looked at as ineffective," he said. "I felt like when we were working hard enough to do things for the students.

Last fall, still unhappy with the way things were going, James decided to run for president. "I did it to see if I'd win," he said. "And then (when I won) realized that I have influence, that people like to listen to me."

James decorated his of- fice with over a dozen Broadway show posters, including Rent, Miss Saigon and Cabaret. He said that after a Monday night, he wanted to go to New York City and become a casting director, adding that he has never considered a career in politics.

"You ask me a year ago, I'd say hell no," he said. "Now, I'd say anything's possible. I think if I wanted to do it, I could do it."

Right stuff

James was 3:30 in the afternoon, and James is sitting in Chan- cellor Kenneth A. Shaw's plush office waiting to be called inside. After going over the issues he has to address, James decides to focus on the 24-hour study area. He knows that the is- sue has been tried and failed before, he said, but this does- n't stop him from trying.

"I have a different ap- proach," he tells the others in line at the Goldstein Student Center's food court. He knows that the is- sue has been tried and failed before, he said, but this does- n't stop him from trying.

I have a different ap- proach," he tells the others in line at the Goldstein Student Center's food court. He knows that the issue has been tried and failed before, but later said that every time the study area proposal has been tried in the past, not many students have made use of it - end of discussion.

But James hasn't given up yet. The test of his presi- dency, it seems, will be whether or not he can continue to get the support of students, and whether or not he can convince them to go up against adminis- trative inertia and get things done.

James believes he can do it, believing that his personal charisma is enough to put the student government's tradi- tion of ritualized futility behind him.

It's 4:30 p.m., and James' energy is flag- ging. The lack of coffee seems to be catching up with him, and he cancels the 5:30 p.m. cabinet meeting at Faegan's Bar.

"I feel like ash," he says, "even though there isn't much to discuss. Even the seemingly- -tireless "Defender of the Students" needs to go home and take a nap."

The President
A day in the life of SGA president Jamal James

BY GENE MADDAUS
Contributing Writer

Keeping up with Jamal James has never been easy, but since he was sworn in as president of the Student Government Association in January, it has become nearly impossible. The irrepressible junior musical theater major has settled into his new role of president and is now applying his immense energy supply toward the business of governing.

It's Friday, Feb. 11, and James has half a dozen meetings scheduled. The first of many issues he will tackle today is the bail bonds program. SGA has a $2500 fund which has been set aside to bail students out of jail. The Assembly voted at Monday's meeting to formalize the procedure, and James is meeting with SGA advisor Michael Elmore to discuss it. "You realize this means you're gonna get calls at 3 a.m. asking you to bail people out?" Elmore says. "I know," James replies, rocking his knee back and forth and nervously clicking his pen, "but I'm the defender of the students." From watching him work, James seems like the most energetic defender the students have had in a long time. He cannot sit still and is given to spontaneous outbursts of singing and dancing. When he drives, he sings along with the radio at the top of his lungs, interrupting himself only to yell "GO!" at traffic.

"He's very outgoing, and that's what you need in a president," said SGA Parliamentarian Jonathan Taylor, a fifth-year architecture major. "You need someone who will take a proactive stance. We're trying to use that word less, but it fits Jamal."

James doesn't get much sleep — about six hours a night he says — so he generally depends on coffee to maintain his high level of energy.

This morning, however, he has gone without. He woke up at 8 a.m. and brushed his teeth for the first of Syracuse Common Councilors and environmentally-conscious students are concerned about a proposed sewage treatment facility on Midland Avenue, leaders from both groups said.

The Council will meet Wednesday night to discuss the facility, which is part of Onondaga County's plan to clean Onondaga Creek, said Matthew Driscoll, Council president.

Members of the Student Environmental Action Coalition will attend the Council meeting, said Kelly Nagy, SEAC chairwoman.

SEAC believes there are logistical problems with the proposed treatment facility, Nagy said.

"It's an environmental justice issue," she said. "Community property will be destroyed."

Councilors, in addition to SEAC members, are not sure whether the facility is necessary.

"Is this the best way to remedy the biggest problem in this region," Nagy poll asked. "I don't know yet."

The proposal is a result of the heavy water flow into the creek from Syracuse University's swimming pool and other parts of the city that cause sewage backups in the city.

Although the facility is a debate in itself, the pressing issue to be discussed is its proposed location, Nagy said.

"It's not going to be as severe as the policy of the alcohol policy," he said. "But there needs to be a policy."

Senate establishes conference fund

BY NICK SERRANO
Staff Writer

The Graduate Student Organization helped pay travel expenses for 28 graduate students presenting papers, giving speeches and attending conferences across the country earlier this month.

"It's critical," said Elizabeth Skewes, co-chairwoman of the GSO Finance Committee and mass-communications graduate student. "You have to be able to attend conferences and present papers, giving speeches to get money to attend conferences and present papers, giving speeches.

Students must submit application information including the amount of money needed, how the money will be used, the location of the conference, a letter of recommendation from a person familiar with the applicant's work and additional personal data, Carter said.

Applications cannot exceed $400 per person, per conference, and also must show that applicants explained other funding options, she said.

"We see that people look for outside funding," Carter said. "We hope you would look for other channels for money. We see that they try to get funding from other avenues, too. We want to help you out in some way."

Graduate students applying for money must submit an application to the Finance Committee by the first of each month, said Carter, a chemistry graduate student.

The Finance Committee reviews each request and presents a suggested amount of funding to the GSO Senate. The Senate then votes on the final amount, Carter said.

Graduate students can reapply the following month if their application is rejected, said Trent Sutton, co-chairman of the Finance Committee.

"It surprised us how quickly the word got out. We didn't know what to expect. We did our best to get it out as much as possible," Sutton said.

More graduate students are likely to apply for travel funding next month because the first round of applications is complete. Sutton said.

"We've been able to assist at least 28 people this month," Sutton said. "For us it's exciting to do that."

relinquished during the past year, he added.

James said he is hopeful that the program will be an effective recruiting tool for SGA. Only 18 of the 50 total seats in the Assembly are filled, he added.

"There are 18 wonderful people on that I totally adore," James said. "What we'd like to see is more diversity on the Assembly board."

SGA should be an effective forum for students to express needs that would make SU a better place to live and learn, James said.

He said he has tried during his presidency to establish a student government that is available to respond to these needs.

"When I ran for president, one of my ideas was that Assembly would be more of an interdepartmental board," he said. "Assembly has a lot of people who are interested in a variety of things and are willing to make changes if students want them," Taylor said. "Every change you make is going to help. We as a university need to determine what many students are willing to take responsibility for."

The Assembly also examined issues regarding the quality of food in the Smith and Hammett Food Courts and the availability of healthy food options.

The Assembly also heard from David Caetano, a student representative in the Environmental Defense Fund, on a new program that will make it more comparable to other colleges with its range from $0.75 to $0.99. Taylor said.

Each student is charged an annual student fee to fund campus activities. The fee for the spring-summer term was $35.

The program is sponsored by the Environmental Defense Fund, which will charge students a fee to discuss student-directed, student-driven, student-dedicated projects.

The Assembly also heard from the College of Arts and Sciences, which is currently developing a program to encourage students to express their needs and make changes.

County should revise sewage plan

Something smells in Syracuse. It's Onondaga County's plans for a new sewage treatment center.

A New York state mandate calls for the county to erect a sewage treatment plant in order to purify sewage runoff before it's discharged into Onondaga Lake. Preliminary plans place it in a residential section of the city. If the county fails to begin construction by May 1, it will be subjected to hefty fines.

After decades of industrial dumping, Onondaga County already tops the Environmental Protection Agency's superfund list of polluted bodies of water. But a few extra weeks of planning, which could keep dozens of low-income families from being forced out of their homes to make way for the new plant, won't do it any additional harm.

A report from the Army Corps of Engineers, scheduled for release on April 1, may offer options for alternate construction sites. The Syracuse Common Council hopes to bar the county from breaking ground until other solutions are examined.

Millions of dollars are at stake regardless. The city and the county should join forces to explore all possible options before committing to a seven-year construction plan for the middle of the city.

Although the section of the city slated for construction forms a natural basin for sewage runoff, it is also a notoriously poor neighborhood.

While it might be more expensive for the county to divert polluted water to an alternative location, neighborhoods like these need all the breaks they can get. Forcing residents into a forced out of their homes to make way for the new plant, won't do it any additional harm.

Onondaga Lake already tops the list of most polluted bodies of water. The S3Tcuse Common Council hopes to revise sewage plan earlier, but in the shadow of a sewage treatment plant won't do it any additional harm.

Fewer doesn't share my pessimistic outlook. He thinks system, nestling up to all those big wigs he's going to work with after graduation. He thinks as long as he graces those wheels, he's in for a smooth trip.

There's nothing wrong with the system in his eyes. Sooner or later, someone will walk on their head. Then we'll see her work in the background of a TV show, will be resting on J.C. Penny's shelves.

But despite Viel's upsideness, she's immersed in her artistic sphere and pays little attention to the outside world.

Does ethnic cleansing have anything to with soap? If it weren't for her true innocence — a.k.a. being naive — coupled with her cute voice, I'd knock her head off. She's either oblivious or infinitely comfortable with the system, but then again, nothing short of a nuclear explosion would bring her to her knees.

Dmitri Papadopulos is a bit more perceptive. I used to hang with him a lot, freshman year. We played video games and made the opposite sex salivate (run away in terror — perspective is the key).

Ever since he rushed his fraternity, I only see him in passing. He spends a lot of time with his brothers. I guess I was a different path at some point, but I'm only half sure that he was late Thursday night at Acropolis on Marshall Street. I was in a booth with a couple of his frat brothers, chomping away at a gyro.

"Sooooo, how ya been, kid?" he said. "It's been too long! I guess I was a different path at some point, but I'm only half sure that he was late Thursday night at Acropolis on Marshall Street. I was in a booth with a couple of his frat brothers, chomping away at a gyro.

He spoke slowly and deliberately, pretending I couldn't understand him. Even his friends would do it. Dmitri would be more of an activist.

Instead he relegated to making speeches check-full of brilliant ideas, but without any follow through.

When he was the basketball team captain, Dmitri was on the New York summersitties. His name was still on the list to be president of the class. Now he's the one that the system. Why? I'm not even sure. I remember one thing — stereotypes bombard my life and there's not much I can do about it.

Well, that last bit is a bit misleading. At least I can confront them.

Writer, president fail to display professionalism

To the Editor:

Three things at Syracuse University should never be thrown together again: James James, Gene Maddaus and The Daily Orange. Why? Because Monday's article on Mr. James, our pre-eminent SGA president, was more claustral and inchoate than a Thomas Joseph crossword puzzle. The only thing worse than the poor news writing skills was Mr. James' complete lack of professionalism and wit.

As a friend of James James, I know of his passion and intelligence, his grace and charm and his homosexual — an apparent obsession with Gene Maddaus, the story's author. The irrelevant and private facts of James' sexual preferences were tactless, to say the least. Maddaus could not have painted a more homosexual, and coincidentally ignorant, picture of James as he did. But the oblique nature of James' at-titudes and comments cannot strictly be blamed on Maddaus.

Nader announces Green Party presidential bid

Staff Report

Green Party member and consumer advocate Ralph Nader announced Monday his bid for U.S. presidency.

Nader's platform focuses on issues -- such as academic grants and environmental policy -- that directly affect Syracuse University students, said Howie Hawkins, Syracuse Green Party chairman.

SU has about 100 registered Green Party voters, he added.

Nader plans to help students secure grants to fund their college education, Hawkins said. He is hoping to provide students with an alternative to expensive loans, particularly those inclined to lower income students, he added.

"More grants, less loans," he said. "Better terms on the loans."

With an activist team, nicknamed "Nader's Raiders," Nader investigates public interest issues such as corporate and government wrongdoing.

Nader is the founder of several groups including the Public Interest Research Group, Public Citizen, Center for Women's Policy Studies, Connecticut Citizen's Action Group and the Disability Rights Center.

This will be his third presidential bid.

Students need to be aware of the health of students, said Hawkins.

Avenue, Sage said.

"Why did they choose this community?" she asked. "It's a low-income, minority community that they feel they can push around."

"There are vacant areas near the Midland Avenue location that should be used instead," Nagy said. She also questioned why the facility would be built close to the city.

Driscoll said his main concern is that the county will begin construction on the facility before the release of a report from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers -- a federal organization enlisted by Congress this year to clean up Onondaga Lake. The report, to be released April 1, could propose alternative methods for solving the city's sewage problems, he said.

"It might be in the city and county's best interest to wait for the report and then take action," Driscoll said.

One possible alternative to the current plan may be to encourage the current sewage treatment plant on Hiawatha Avenue, said Samuel Sage, president of the Atlantic States Legal Foundation, a Syracuse-based non-profit environmental group.

"This would negate having to build a facility on Midland Avenue," Sage said.

The foundation is preparing a lawsuit against the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency because the agency did not require a complete analysis of every possible solution to the sewage treatment problem, he added.

The county is mandated, by a consent order issued by a New York state court, to begin work on the facility by March 1, after the U.S. Army Corp of Engineers' report is released, Driscoll said.

If the county does not begin work on the project, however, it may be fined for each day construction is delayed, said Joseph Heath, a private Syracuse-based attorney who has been working with the Council regarding cleanup-related issues.

The construction's state-issued consent order would not allow the county to be fined if the city stopped the work, he said.

The Council can deny permission to the county to work under city streets, which is necessary for the project's completion, Heath said.

Representatives from the New York State Attorney General's office sent a letter to the city that implied the county would sue Syracuse if the city did not allow the work to start, Heath said.

But Heath advised the Council that would not necessarily happen.

"I don't think the city would only be sued if they acted improperly," he said.

The Office of Residence Life has received complaints, for violating the proposed smoking policy, said SGA President Jamal James in a report released Monday.

One proposal states that students could be removed from housing after a second smoking offense, the report said.

The office is considering smoking lounges in the residence halls, Eisenmann said. But despite overwhelming student support for the lounges, the ventilation systems in the residence halls would filter the smoke throughout the entire building, he added.

Driscoll said the non-smoking policy, however, is common in universities nationwide, Eisenmann said.

He added that the proposed smoking policies are a result of complaints from SU students and parents, said Tom Ellett, director of the Office of Residence Life.

The policies deny students the rights they are legally entitled to, said Michael Nam, a freshman in The College of Arts and Sciences.

"It's our room and smoking indoors is legal," Nam said. "All the smokers are going to complain -- no matter what they do, they are going to complain."

There are ways of avoiding this policy, said Melissa Steenone, a junior international relations and policy studies major. When the door is shut and the windows are open, the smoke does not leave the room, she added.

"We're going to be a cranky and frustrated group of smokers when they tell us to go outside and freeze," Steenone said.

Gack Smith, a sophomore marketing major, said such smoking policies are violation of student rights and could never be enforced.

"We can go off to war and we can't smoke in our rooms," he said. "That's ridiculous."

GOP prepares Arizona, Michigan battles

BY KATE STEVENSON
Asst. News Editor

Syracuse University College Republicans are waiting to learn the fate of leading presidential candidates Texas Gov. George W. Bush and Arizona Sen. John McCain in today's Michigan and Arizona primaries. "I hope McCain is able to pull out a victory," said Gina DeRossi, College Republicans secretary and senior public relations major. "I think it's going to end up on who comes out to vote." The conservative right-wing made up a large portion of voters during the Saturday's South Carolina Republican primary. The McCain campaign said this was the main reason for Bush's triumph.

McCain's campaign also said the droves of devout Christians at the South Carolina polls were largely a result of pro-Bush conservative religious groups. A spokesperson for Bush could not be reached for comment.

DeRossi added that the relatively liberal nature of the Michigan population and the home state advantage in Arizona could be ingredients for a McCain victory. "I'd hope he would win in Arizona — it is his own state," she said. "I think he needs to pick up the primary tomorrow to still have a chance in the race." McCain lost the South Carolina contest to Bush, 42 to 53 percent. That loss follows a double-digit win for McCain in the Feb. 1 New Hampshire primary and a fifth place finish in the Jun. 24 Iowa Caucus.

McCain garnered only 5 percent of the the Iowa vote while Bush won the caucus with 41 percent. Although Bush won in Iowa and South Carolina, he received criticism from some constituents and Republican party members as a result of his advertising campaign against McCain.

"I don't think (Bush) is capable of running the country," Jamba said. "I think he's trying to follow in his father's footsteps." Bush's father is former U.S. President George Bush, who held office from 1988 to 1992. There is a difference between being a senator like McCain and being a governor like Bush, Jamba said. A governor concerns himself with state issues, while a senator deals with the entire country, he added.

"McCaín is much smarter and can better handle being president," Jamba said.

Former Clinton counsel to speak on campus

BY KEVIN TAMPONE
Asst. News Editor

Former Clinton defense lawyers Cheryl Mills and Bruce Lindsey will visit Syracuse University Wednesday to discuss their roles in the president's impeachment trial before the U.S. Congress.

The event, sponsored by the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications Career Development Center, will take place from 3 to 5 p.m. in the Schine Undergound.

"We thought it would be good for the whole university, but particularly the Law School and Maxwell," said Jennifer Grant, an employee at the CDO and coordinator of Wednesday's event. "They had interesting jobs in the White House and so we thought it would be great for students to hear them." Mills recently left the White House to accept a position as senior vice president and corporate privacy and public programming with Oxygen Media. The company, founded in 1999, is focused on providing women with political information, news and entertainment through cable television and the Internet.

Freshman Brian Edelman, who worked as a legal counsel for Mills when she left the White House in August, recently spoke over the telephone with Mills about her upcoming visit to SU. "She worked pretty closely and became pretty good friends," said Edelman, a broadcast journalism major, of Mills and his father.

Edelman's father handled the legal aspects of Mills' departure after she seven years working as a legal counsel for President Bill Clinton. Mills' new position gives her a unique perspective of the communications industry, Edelman said. "She's moving into a new medium, so what better place to speak than through Newhouse," Edelman said. "This is really her field and her thing."

Mills earned her law degree from the University of Virginia and then joined Clinton's transition team in 1993. She became deputy counsel to Clinton in 1995 and was offered the position of chief White House counsel. But she declined the position to move to Oxygen Media. If she had accepted, she would have been the first woman and the first black in the position.

Mills' accomplishments esteeem her as an excellent example to professional women. Lindsey has been a friend of Clinton's since their undergraduate days and worked together in Little Rock.

Whaley, who was out of town all weekend, said she did not learn of Gerbig's death until Sunday night, and was shocked that he is still shocked by the incident. "How do you get into somebody's head?" he asked. "What motivates someone to take their own life?"

Delta Tau Delta begins belated Cupid Week

BY BETH BRAVERMAN
Contributing Writer

Syracuse University Delta Tau Delta brothers are counting on Cupid this week to bring $1,000 in charity to the American Heart Association.

The fraternity asked all campus sororities to participate in Cupid Week, said brother Sam Milakofsky, a junior marketing major. Twelve out of 13 sororities signed up, he added.

Conflicting schedules prevented the fraternity from hosting the event during the week of Valentine’s Day, Milakofsky said. The week consists of several “friendly” competitions between the greek houses, Milakofsky said.

Sororities participated Monday night in an event designed after the television game show, “Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?” The fraternity will also host a sorority skit competition tonight at Darwin’s Restaurant and Bar, 701 S. Crouse Ave., Milakofsky said. The fraternity expects about 400 students to attend the events, he added.

Alpha Xi Delta sorority is anxious to begin Cupid Week, President Jessica Hecht said. She added that 30 AZD sisters will participate in the skit tonight, and another 15 to 20 sisters have been working on decorations for the houses.

“We had a really good time last year,” Hecht said. “We like to participate because it is a good cause. It is also one of the first activities for our new members to participate in.”

Hecht said her sisters enjoy comparing their skit and banner with those of other houses.

Courtney Thompson, a member of Pi Beta Phi, said her sorority appreciates the philanthropic aspect of the event.

“We like to get involved in all fraternity philanthropy events and give to all of the local charities,” she said.

Milakofsky said he and his brothers encourage students to be on the Quad at 11:20 a.m. Thursday for the week’s culminating event, Cupid’s Run. The fraternity recently collected donations to sponsor brother Mike Cazzolli, who will dress up as Cupid and run around the Quad. Donors will pledge money for every girl Cazzolli kisses as he treks around the Quad on Thursday morning. Cazzolli was chosen from interested sophomores, the fraternity.

The brothers will announce the sorority who won the most events at the end of the week. The prize, he said, is the honor of participating next year as the reigning Cupid Week champions.

In the past, Milakofsky said, the week has been a success. Every year the fraternity receives close to its goal of $1,000. They raised about $1,200 last year, he said.

Cupid Week began in 1969 when a Delta Tau Delta brother, Jim Trance, wanted to take his girlfriend out for Valentine’s Day but did not have enough money. His brothers told him that if he would run around campus kissing girls, they would give him money for each girl he kissed.

Trance accepted their offer and earned enough money to take out his girlfriend.

“That’s when it started,” Milakofsky said. “It expanded from there and it has just gotten bigger and bigger since then.”

Danceworks shows hard work, passion.

I'll admit it — I'm the furthest thing from an expert on dance that you'll ever find anywhere on this campus. Seriously, I'd sooner choose to lapse into a drunken coma at a party than get down and shake my ass like a Travolta wannabe.

So why am I, of all people, talking to you about Danceworks' 16th annual show, being performed Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights at Goldstein Auditorium, and not some movie or TV show that I probably watch on my couch? Could it be because when I was given the chance to watch a bunch of cute girls practice during their rehearsals? I'll be honest, originally that's why I did it — but as I sat and watched the dancers in action, I soon realized how special this program is to its members. For the dancers, it's more than a show — it's a real joy that they have in their lives. It's their once-a-year chance to show their passion to their friends here at school.

What is Danceworks exactly? It's a Syracuse University student-run program, sponsored in part by the Student Government Association and Danceworks member dues, that gives participants a chance to dance in the spotlight. Anyone is welcome to audition for the show, whether they are beginners or seasoned pros. Those who cannot dance are welcome to join the organization and help with offstage aspects of the production.

"It fills a void for many of the girls who came to college and simply stopped dancing," said Danceworks co-director Sara Goldberg, a senior television, radio and film major in the S.I. Newhouse School of Public Communications. "This is their outlet."

Danceworks saw its first performance in 1987, and since then it has only gotten bigger and better. This year's show, "Expressions," features 16 different dance numbers, all designed and choreographed by dancers involved in the show.

They've been working on putting the show on for months, and now it's time to share their hard work with the world.

do much else, says Marge Bardenett. "Kendrick's cognitive skills have not been affected."

"There's no recipe for how it's going to work with each kid," she said. "They're very patient. They've given her a bigger picture of what's out there and what can be done. They're learning what's learning and the end result is helping people."

The environmental twist

The research team at the Center knows the meaning of recycling. Kendrick did not need new devices, but rather, old parts that are used to create new technology come from junkyards.

"Stuff is cheap (at the junkyard), and we don't have much funding," Carbone said.

"It's a tough job to do with recycling equipment, the people are great, creativity's not hampered and there are no 9-to-5 hours," she said. "It's a lot about what you can find and how you can help people."

MUSSER

But Musser always wanted to do play-by-play, and soon he got his chance calling Eagles games in Philadelphia.

"Sometimes you have to go with your heart," said Musser, who returned to SU as part of a series coordinated by Newhouse and Syracuse Sports Properties. "I always loved play-by-play. You have to figure out in your own mind which direction you want to go and what you are best at."

After four years, Musser's station lost the rights to the Eagles' games and, he moved on to WCBS in New York.

Although he's a fan of the New York Giants, Musser regularly sees the team and looks forward to the time he'll cover a Giants game.

"I always loved play-by-play and nobody played harder than Rose," Musser said. "And nobody played harder than Rose."
Recruit hopes for time

James Thues believes he can leap right into the SU basketball lineup next season or contribute.

And, according to these familiar words, the 5-foot-9 point guard from Detroit’s Martin Luther King High posted a 9:00 pace in the 3,000-meter run. Thues hopes to make up for his lack of height with quickness, an aggressive defensive style and a very impressive vertical leap.

“I think I can come in and help the team a lot as their style of player,” Thues said. “I’m quick and strong enough to get past a lot of players, and I can shoot it and get past strong on defense.”

Next fall, Thues will bring his 25 points and 13 assists per contest to Central New York along with high expectations. With Jason Hart graduating this spring, he likely will challenge Thues for more minutes.

What might get Thues into the lineup beyond his offensive ability is the quality that leads to comparisons between himself and Hart. Both play excellent defense.

“His physical gifts really separate him from the competition,” MLK coach Benny White said. “But what he does better than anything is playing the point guard position. He does a great job of contesting balls and getting in position to steal.”

Musser speaks at SU

BY ALISON HISCHAK

Sportscaster Andy Musser decided to stick with the ideas he knows best when he addressed a group of students last Wednesday afternoon in a Newhouse lecture hall.

“We’re going to treat this like a rain delay,” the Philadelphia Phillies broadcaster said. “The sun’s just about to come out, and we’ll see how long it lasts.”

A 1959 graduate of Syracuse, Musser filled in for a long “rain delay” with stories of his college days, favorite baseball players and some words of wisdom.

Musser’s fraternity house is gone, WABR moved into Newhouse and the campus has added more academic buildings since Musser roamed the SU hill.

Still here, though, is WOLF-AM 1490 radio, where Musser worked for 37 years during his college years.

While working as a disc jockey, Musser said he used to sneak into their back room for a can of soup and a little bit of cheese that could provide an escape from the dining hall grub for a night.

After graduating from SU, Musser bounced from station to station as a news reporter or a weekend sportscaster.

He said he never felt comfortable with the sports up tempo, trying to cram all the news into a few minutes.

First-year vaulter excels

BY JASON SACKS
Contributing Writer

Many times, student-athletes have trouble making the transition from high school to college life and competition. After competing in just four track meets, it is safe to say that freshman Joel Carusone has made the transition quite well.

The 5-foot-8 pole-vaulter has won two of his initial meets and holds the second-best jump in the Big East behind Casey Freed of West Virginia. In late January, at the National Open in State College, Pa., Carusone won his event with a jump of 16’5”, topping the conference before Freed bested him a week later.

Carusone captured another victory at the Syracuse Invitational on Feb. 5 with a clearance of 16’2”.

On the track, I have made the transition pretty well,” Carusone said. “I didn’t think I would be jumping well this season. I have been practicing every day. Now it is starting to come around.”

In high school, the Slingerland native ranked as one of the top jumpers in New York State. See CARUSONE page 12

Woodley, Hicks win at Big East

BY JOSH LUKIN
Staff Writer

Adrian Woodley said he was nervous coming into the Big East Championships this past weekend at the Carrier Dome.

The graduate student was competing in only his third meet of the season because of a training program geared toward preparation for the Olympic trials in early July.

However, the SU junior set the final day of competition the No. 1 seed in the 50- and 100-meter hurdles after recording the fastest time in the semifinals Saturday.

By the time Woodley set his mark Sunday morning, the butterflies were gone. The Canadian national star bolted to a first-place finish with a time of 7.84 to retain his Big East title.

“Warming up, I was hesitant and a little nervous about what I was going to do today,” Woodley said. “I got out really well and had a good first hurdle, which is been my emphasis all week in training.”

“Big East is always a big meet, and winning last year, I knew people would be gunning for me. Mentally, I was visualizing winning the race and it felt good to retain the title.”

Although Woodley wanted a slightly faster time in order to automatically qualify for the NCAA Championships, his mark did meet the provisional qualifying time.

The day was far from over for Woodley. His performances acted as a rain delay.
Applicant speaks to students

After personally interviewing about 100 Caribbean immigrant workers in New York City, Linda Carty relayed Tuesday night all she learned about the plight of domestic helpers.

Carty, a University of Michigan at Flint associate professor and lecturer, is an applicant for the chairperson position in the Syracuse University's African-American Studies department.

To a crowd of about 50 people, she explained the difference between domestic help and nannies. Nannies, she said, are white women while only black women — specifically those from Jamaica — are put into positions of domestic help.

"These positions have not only been gendered, but racialized," she said.

"There are terms that are very clear," Carty said. "Nannies, domestically, those from Jamaica — are put into positions of domestic service."

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings — a cherished principle of American education to paychecks harder in school are demand standards. U.S. Secretary of Education Richard W. Riley said Tuesday.

Speaking at a high school in Durham, N.C., Riley said his seven annual status report on American education to warn that nascent by states to demand students learn more and work harder in school are being stymied by a shortage of top-quality teachers.

Returning to a theme he has been making frequently, Riley said states and school districts must do more to identify and train teachers, retain and promote talented math and science teachers. Nationwide, schools need at least 40,000 new teachers over the next decade.

Study shows global warming rates rising

A new analysis by government scientists indicates the Earth's climate is warming at an unprecedented rate, suggesting that the future impact of global warming may be more severe and sudden than predicted.

Such a steep warming rate was not expected for at least a century into the 21st century, said Tamara Steurer, a National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration climate scientist who led the study. Such a rate would probably mean a continuation of the recent three-year summer and fall winter seen by much of the nation, and eventually perhaps increased flooding in certain areas.

Space shuttle lands safely in Florida

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Endeavour and its crew of six returned to Earth on schedule, bringing the equivalent of some 20,000 pounds of radar mapping data that will be transformed into the finest maps of the planet.

China wants to start negotiations

BEIJING — While Asian stock markets generally reacted bluntly to China’s ultimatum on Monday, some major banks are expressing concern about the situation. China on Monday announced a series of rate increases designed to curb the sharp rise in the Chinese economy, which has shown signs of overheating.

Despite its saber-rattling tone, China’s statement Monday contained within it the elements of a compromise, according to Asian and Western analysts. The 16,000-word document drops some significant demands and suggests that China’s negotiating position, possibly increasing instead of diminishing chances for talks.

Group reports Russian killings

MOSCOW — Russian soldiers went on a deadly rampage earlier this month in a small town in the Chechen capital of Grozny, killing at least 60 civilians in the worst case yet disclosed of Russian military atrocities, an international human rights group charged today.

During the attack, which began the morning of Feb. 5 in the suburb of Alani, soldiers “systematically” robbed and murdered more than 100 men and women and burned homes, according to a draft report on the events prepared by Human Rights Watch and based on interviews with witnesses and relatives of those killed.

The group said it has evidence that U.S. military officials have denied that their troops entered Chechnya but, faced with the evidence, Western organizations and governments, acting President Vladimir Putin recently appointed a new human rights commissioner for Chechnya.

Storyteller shares Navajo folktale

BY BETH BRAVERMAN
Contributing Writer

Sharing a story of her Navajo heritage, Sonny Dooley enticed a standing-room only crowd Tuesday night in Eggers Hall with a tale of societal vice.

"I was very pleased with the turnout," said Maurice Trudelic, an assistant professor in the anthropology department and organizer of the event. "I didn't know whether we'd have more than ten people. I am just amazed."

About 80 people attended the event. To peak student interest in Native American culture, Schwarz is working with other faculty members in the anthropology department to organize activities that will familiarize students with tribal traditions.

Maurice Kenny, a Native American author, will visit Syracuse University on Sunday March 26 at The Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Schwarz said.

Dooley grew up in a small Navajo reservation of 2,500 people south of Gallup, New Mexico. She led a distinguished career as an ambassador for her society, said Schwarz, whose specialty is Native American studies.

In the mid-1980s, Dooley was named Miss Navajo, a title earned through demonstration of knowledge of traditional stories and practices such as grinding corn and making bread, Schwarz said.

Influenced by her reign as Miss Navajo and her dedication to life telling stories to children on Native American reservations, Schwarz said. Dooley now visits schools and tells her stories in English so that Navajo children can have an understanding of their culture.

"In 1992 I started storytelling," Dooley said. "That's when I went into a classroom full of Navajo children and their grandparents was cut off," she added. "The stories did not go in between the generations."

Dooley explained to her audience that she could not tell them a complete Navajo story in the time allotted because a traditional tale takes nine days and nine nights to tell.

The part of the story she chose to share would have come around the sixth night, she said.

Dooley told the story of a man who goes off with his brother to battle the monsters that are attacking his mountain. He finds the monsters when he falls into a hole in the ground that is filled with smoke and "smells like stinky feet," Dooley said.

The monsters came in the form of virus and disease, sleep, hunger, dirtiness and old age, Dooley said. Every time the monster slayer drew his bow to kill the monsters, the monsters offered to trade him a gift in exchange for their life.

Although he had gifts to share, the man escaped having never killed the monsters, Dooley said. "The only way we will ever get into the next world is if we kill them," she said. "I tell this story to reawaken the next world is if we kill them," she said. "I tell this story to reawaken the Dooley's story encouraged students to examine their life choices, said Kat Kreuter, a junior magazine major. "It made me think about my life, about the time I waste and the things I could be doing," Kreuter said. "How those demons get to all of us."

The Centre bus system has not suffered because of the board’s membership situation, Ristau added.

"I haven’t really noticed any problems arising from the vacancies on the board, but I think they need to fix that,” said Centre rider Dave McDou- nough, a Syracuse University sophomore political science manor. “There certainly need to be changes and maybe that would improve the system.”

A Feb. 7 letter by Centre Board Chairman Vincent Cook addressed Bragman’s concerns, attempting to answer questions posed by the Assemblyman. Cook could not be reached for comment.

Bragman, however, disputed Cook’s reasoning in another letter sent Feb. 11. He claimed the Cook’s answers were unacceptable because they were written without specificity. He called for a more direct response to the questions he posed.

I find many of your responses to be evasive, condescending and even offensive, not only to me, but I believe also to the people of Central New York,” Bragman wrote. "Relative to problems with recent capital purchases, I remain concerned that these are symptoms of an endemic lack of oversight by members of the Authority. I look forward to your detailed response to these concerns as soon as possible.

Bragman said he wants to know the number of women and minorities who have served on the board. He also questioned absences by board members and the status of projects he considers critical to developing Central New York as a transportation hub.

Bragman could not be reached for further comment.

Cook released a second let-to to Bragman’s office on Tu-

day, Brista said. The board has not missed a meeting because of their failure to reach quorum — the number of members needed in attendance to conduct official business — in 30 years, he added.

There is no compensation, "But they are volunteers. It’s kind of hard to criticize volunteers."

ORL misses mark with smoking ban

There’s no buts about it — the Office of Residence Life’s newest addition to residence hall smoking policies is ridiculous.

Beginning next semester, all residence halls will be smoke-free. Fair enough: Smoking in residence halls creates fire hazards and makes all the other smokers’ air and clothes stink. When ventilation systems spit second-hand smoke into non-smokers’ rooms.

But ORL’s proposal to ban cigarette smoking for 15 feet around the perimeter of each residence hall takes the lights-out crusade a step too far. ORL and Residence Hall Association representatives say the measure aims to keep wayward smoke from drifting into first-floor windows when smokers congregate to puff outside dorms.

Syracuse University lies in the heart of Central New York, where the snow flies from far. ORL and Residence Hall Association representatives say it takes to get lung-fulls of soot and pollutants from the city trash incinerator juxta beyond that it takes to get lung-fulls of soot and pollutants from the city trash incinerator juxta.

Good luck, too, to Public Safety, resident advisers and ORL personnel, who under this plan will be charged to police thousands of campus residents.

It’s nice to again see SU using its resources in the name of a pointless policy.

Original school morphs under administrative control

Once upon a time, there was a school. It was a pretty good school. It had new buildings and equipment, qualified and knowledgeable teachers and most importantly, talented students. Obviously, these students and teachers had a mutual respect for the school’s top priority, because the school was evaluated on the competency of its graduates.

One day, one of the school’s leaders said, “We should make this focus on students prior to the school’s operations. We must be mindful of maintaining a high level of research and scholarship.” So the school officially became a “student-centered research institution.” And it was succeeded.

Other schools were getting a lot of money and overwhelming amounts of publicity because of a new word they used: it was called “Division 1 athletics.” So the school, now called trustees, called a meeting and decided to acquire these Division 1 athletics and make them profitable.

A few teachers raised their voices, cautioning that the young people’s education should be the primary concern, but they were quickly silenced. “You’re standing in the way of progress,” they were told. “Besides, the world is changing and we must stay competitive.” So the student-consumable Division 1 athletics came to the school and time passed.

Initially, the students had been the top priority of the school, because the public perception of the school was based on their scholarship. When Division 1 athletics came, that all changed. More people concerned themselves with the statistics posted by the men’s basketball and football teams than with the research being conducted in the classrooms. In response, the administration (which trustees slowly shifted their focus and more of their energies to the development of Division 1 athletics) and time passed.

By now the school had grown quite large, and in addition to the students and teachers, the trustees felt the need to create beings called “administrators” to keep the students and teachers in line. But soon the administrators came running to the trustees, complaining that the students and teachers wanted too much, constantly asking for new supplies and more money for research and study. The trustees decided that the administrators must be right. After all, they were put in charge of the students and teachers and would know best how to handle the situation, so they slowly began to cut back on funding for educational programs. The students and teachers were shocked, and went to the trustees for an explanation, but were told by the trustees’ secretary that they needed to schedule an appointment with their administrators before they could talk directly to the trustees.

Frustrated, the students and teachers went directly to the home of the trustees, only to discover that they were in the midst of an expensive catered party in appreciation of all the administrators. So the students and teachers did their best to harass and tease with the resources they possessed, while the administration flourished.

Soon the administration had control of almost every aspect of student and teacher life. But there remained a select group of students and teachers that still fought back, that forced to push boundaries and uncover truths. This frightened the administration (when jobs, admittedly, would be easier if not for all of the peaky students attempting to learn) and they pleaded with the trustees to do something about the situation.

So the trustees made a few calls and within weeks, the school was in the iron grip of a law referred to as the “judicial board.” Ignoring any concept of justice which its name might suggest, the judicial board quickly rounded up all of the free thinkers and social commentators, breaking down their resolve with petty accusations and psychological intimidation. By this time, many of the students and teachers were aligned against free speech, having been subdued by the subtle propagandist tool of “political correctness.”

In a final, decisive move, the judicial board locked away all of the truth seekers and silenced the few remaining individuals, and suddenly — all was quiet. There were no dissenting voices and the administration (which had absorbed the judicial board and was by now virtually indistinguishable from the trustees) congratulated itself.

And time passed, but life didn’t really continue, because knowledge and learning, those elements essential to the continuation of life, had died. Amidst the cold, gray similarity, alone in its tower of buzzwords and cooperative learning programs, the administration looked down on what it had created, and smiled.

College Law senator defends group’s role

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to Henry Chung’s Feb. 15 opinion column. In his piece, Chung unnecessarily attacks the Law School Senate, and as such, one may wish to impart a bias into what I say. How, however, in the Senate puts me in a good position to speak to Henry Chung’s concerns.

First, Mr. Chung states the most “political” stance the Law School Senate has taken is to petition the return of the “snack bar lady” to our college. While we did in fact petition for her return, I believe Mr. Chung is forgetting another instance where the Senate has taken such an action. One such instance was working in conjunction with the GSO to bring about changes in the policies that exist within the University Judicial Board, an issue Mr. Chung himself brought to the Senate.

Chung also states that the Senate should be getting involved in more national issues, through speaking engagements and other types of events. If Mr. Chung had checked his work, he would have found that the Law School Senate is currently speaking with Professors Helen Hill and Rudy Giuliani together for a debate on our very campus. Further, the Senate is discussing a speaking engagement with Sam Dash, lead council of the Whitewater investigations, and the Law School Senate and the GSO are currently co-sponsoring an upcoming speaking engagement with Ralph Nader. Given these events, it is, at best, difficult to see where Mr. Chung’s accusations of apathy or lack of involvement have any merit.

If Chung had made the decision to attend our Senate meetings, then he would have realized that anyone is welcome to do, he would have seen occur the very things he claims do not. That he chose to not see for himself what could be unfolding is disappointing. Especially given his own complaints of apathy.

The four-point plan allows New York state residents to have more educational opportunities both in and out of the state, he said.

"For instance, if a student wanted to go to the University of Rochester or UCLA, he would still have funding," Levy said.

The plan will greatly affect many in-state students at Syracuse University and the State University of New York College of Environmental Science and Forestry, Levy said.

There is a tax deduction in the plan to allow private and public tuition to be refunded to families. The Tuition Assistance Program, a grant given to New York state residents, will also be expanded, he said.

The income cap for middle-income families applying for TAP is currently $50,500 and has not been altered since 1990, Levy said. To account for inflation and other changes in the economy, the proposal would move the cap to $80,000. In addition, the proposal will increase the maximum grant to $5,000, he said.

The estimated cost for attendance at SU for the 1999-2000 academic year is $30,280. This includes tuition, health fee, Student Activity Fee, housing, meals, books, personal expenses, school supplies and travel, according to the SU Office of Financial Aid.

"I wouldn't be here if it weren't for TAP," said Michelle Brooks, a freshman political science major. "I hope the proposal passes and helps students have more opportunities in and outside of New York."

Chris Wallace, a junior history major, said he relies on TAP, SU grants and Stafford Loans to pay for college expenses. Stafford Loans are federally subsidized student loans.

"For myself and my older sister at SU, without TAP, it would be hard to afford a tuition like SU's," he said. "If they raised the TAP grant, that would be icing on the cake."

As part of an incentive program, college juniors and seniors who maintain a grade point average of at least 3.5, or are engaged in community service, will be entitled to financial rewards, Levy said.

If the proposal is passed, the plan will be phased in during four years. The government cost, when the plan is fully functioning, will be $365 million, according to reports from DeFrancisco's office.

"I'm proud the state has done something about this," SUNY ESF student Josh Brown said. "It is about time the Senate did something about it."
On April 4, the group will host a celebration in commemoration of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s assassination. It is a national event, Style said.

"We're trying to promote peace, not only on this campus, but everywhere in the world," Style said.

She added that the group is looking for people to speak at the vigil and asked members to search for interested persons.

During Tuesday's meeting, executive board members spoke of past events to inform new members of the group's history on campus.

Style said last semester the group participated in a nationwide boycott of national television networks to protest the lack of minority characters in programming.

Major networks, such as NBC, CBS and FOX, have since joined the NAACP in the quest to diversify programming, said Nahesi Lambert, a sophomore psychology major and the chapter's executive secretary. This is a promising development, she said.

But she also questioned whether the progress would continue.

"Let's see how effective it is," Lambert said. "Maybe they'll start all over again when they don't get as much press. But right now it's a positive thing."

Members also discussed the possible organization of an SU scholarship fund sponsored by the NAACP.

"A lot of people on this campus can't afford the university's tuition," said Shakira Glenn, external vice president and senior information science and technology and marketing major.

The program would require students to write a letter explaining the reasoning for the scholarship, Glenn said. She added that the group would have to raise money to fund the scholarship and that any ideas for fund-raisers would be welcome.

Although only five people attended the meeting, Glenn said she is optimistic about the upcoming semester.

"I think this is going to be a good semester," she said. "I think we are more focused and more mature. I hope we can have a prosperous and positive semester."

Glenn said Tuesday's meeting information was sent out too late on the group's listserv, resulting in the low attendance.

mestic helpers care for the children but also have other duties that include elderly care, housekeeping, cooking and laundry, she said.

The interviewed women told stories of how they were forced to leave their homes and laundry, she said.

Most of the Caribbean women employed in the United States as domestic help are illegal immigrants and have no working papers, Carty said.

U.S. immigration laws traditionally have been restrictive to poorer countries, making it difficult for the women to attain citizenship or visas, she added.

These laws have been praised by New York state Gov.
George E. Pataki and New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, she added.

"The city had too many poor people of color and these people were draining the resources," said Carty, mocking what she said was the message sent by Pataki and Giuliani.

That message, however, has no basis, Carty said. The largest group of immigrant welfare recipients is made of immigrants from the former Soviet Union, not blacks, she said.

Caribbean women from poor countries come to the United States and earn a salary of $350 per week — low by U.S. standards. But it translates into more than double that amount in their home countries, Carty said.

"These women cannot get work in their native countries because the United States and other industrialized, capitalist countries take advantage of these nations," she said.

"As corporations make more and more money, the people become poorer and poorer," she said.

The need for domestic help in the United States is rising for a variety of reasons, Carty said. One cause is the increase in the number of U.S. households with two working parents. With both parents working, there is a need for inexpensive childcare, often coming from illegal immigrants, she added.

"Black women are the cheapest of the cheap labor," Carty said.

Sheikina Liverpool, a freshman broadcast journalism major, said she related to Carty’s lecture because her mother was employed as a domestic helper after moving to the United States. For this reason, she felt it was very important to attend the lecture and show her support for Caribbean educational programs, she said.

Kallima Clarke, SU
Caribbean Student Association controller, also said there is a great need for the study of the Caribbean culture and struggles.

SU needs to know how important this is to the students, said Clarke, a junior accounting and finance major.

"Hopefully this will be a stopping stone to more Caribbean-related courses," Clarke added.

Drug search
The Supreme Court agreed Tuesday to decide whether police are violating motorists' constitutional rights when they set up roadblocks conducting random drug inspections, in a case, to be heard at the Court next fall, could widely affect police operations and implement an array of checkpoint programs to impede the flow of narcotic trafficking. The dispute stems from a case in Indiana, where police officers checked drivers for signs of impairment, such as slurred speech, and led drug-sniffing dogs around vehicles. A federal appeals court ruled that police wrongly detained motorists who have done nothing to raise police suspicions.

Depressed youth
Doctors are prescribing stimulants, like Ritalin, and antidepressants, like Prozac, for preschoolers at rates that are rising rapidly, according to a new study released Tuesday. The study, which examined the use of such medications in children between 2 and 4 years old, found the use of such drugs had doubled — or even tripled — between 1991 and 1995, in the rise in the use of these drugs in such young children that has occurred despite the little research that has been done on the medications' effects on children so young.

Mountain madness
Researchers at the foot of Mt. Washington are excitedly preparing to test their new wind tunnel instrument of its kind — a telescope that measures wind velocity and direction at altitudes up to 40,000 feet. The mountain endurance record is 231.2 mph, set by a wind in 1934, and with its unique combination of ice, wind and cold, it has earned New England's highest peak the undeserved reputation for "The Worst Weather in the World." More than 250 people have died there during the last 100 years.

Walking starts London education
Here in London, I am a full-time pedestrian. I walk to class. I walk to the grocery store. I walk to the tube (subway) station and through its winding tunnels to get from one train line to another. I stroll through museum exhibits and around London's parks. I feel wonderful, despite the pinching sensation that I started feeling a few weeks ago in my right ankle. I tried to ignore it until finally I broke down and went to a doctor. Ironically, I had to walk down four flights of stairs, up a busy city street to the station and again from the tube station to his office. My roommate, Claire, came with me to ease my worries — I do not like doctors' offices — even in America.

Erica Levi

and the receptionist commented that "my follow up" is with me. I can't help but stumble about the fact that there is a waiting room of empty chairs as I leave, and realize as I walk out that, though we speak the same language for the most part, the English practice different customs.

I take my overuse injury and my bill for 50 pounds and begin my journey home. I walk back to the tube, passing the odd street signs and the painted curbsides with messages telling you which way to look for oncoming traffic. I make it down the escalator, which wasn't working, and the Cadbury chocolate machine in the tube station tempts me, like the pizza places on Marshall Street do after a night out.

"We just need to play," SU's head coach said. "Play hard, play with some passion, with some Sergey. We came out very flat against Seton Hall and they didn't get started until then, but we played with some energy."

Another problem for Syracuse this season has been playing to the level of its opponents, regarding what level that might be.

"I think it was a big letdown because we always seem to get up for the big teams like the UCOnns and the Virginias," Aziz said. "But then we have a tendency to play to the level of our competition and we cannot continue to do that.

"We have a couple people show up every fourth in the 200 medley relay. Despite the poor team showing, the women swimmers performed well enough to reach other milestones.

Senior Brett Bergmann qualified for her second NCAA Trials in the 200-yard backstroke and junior Jose Gonzalez, Vucetic said. "I'm pretty happy with the team as a whole," Vucetic said. "I didn't think we could lose the team as a whole," Vucetic said. "I didn't think we could lose the meet's Most Outstanding Swimmer — or multiple-winner Jose Gonzalez, Vucetic said the team lost about 100 points from last year.

"If we did we think a pretty good job," Vucetic said, "but a lot of teams were better than us."

The Orangewomen did not score a hundred points, but they did manage to place enough swimmers in finals to score points. The team finished behind first-place Notre Dame, second-place Louisville and third-place Rutgers.

"I'm very disappointed with how we swam," she said. "On a positive note, we really came together as a team."

Still, Walker said the future of the Orangemen depends on how well the swimmers bounce back from this setback.

"I don't think the Orangemen who will have to make some decisions and make the commitment to do a better job," Walker said. "In terms of a team package, you have to perform across the board, top to bottom, to be successful.

Eight SU times earned consideration for a possible NCAA Championship. The Orangemen and 13 times were good enough for the U.S. Senior Nationals.

Sophomore Djordje Filipovic and junior Josko Vucetic provided a bright spot in the Orangemen's cloudy water by winning two events apiece.

Filipovic won the 200-yard butterfly and 200 IM, while Vucetic topped the field in both fly events and the 100 IM.

The Orangemen also won the event for the first time since 1991 and qualified for the NCAA Championships, on honor only which goes to the 25 fastest swimmers.

Ugly time arrived three weeks ago for Villanova's coach Steve Lappas.

His churning stomach kept him up well past the final airing of SportsCenter.

His already-thinning hair continued to grey and tumble from his head.

The well-groomed coach looked more disheveled after games, jacket sometimes wrinkled and face contorted in disgust.

After a lackluster 74-60 loss to Connecticut Feb. 2, Lappas' Wildcats sat at 11-8 overall with wins in just two of seven Big East contests.

But a three-game victory streak and triumphant in five of Villanova's last six games brought sleep back to the coach's nights and consistency to his scalp.

A happy Lappas and his Wildcats visit Syracuse for a crucial conference showdown today at 7 p.m. at the Carrier Dome.

"Offensively, we've done some real good things," Lappas said. "Defensively, we need to get our act together and get back to the way we were defending early in the year. But we've had some big wins."

Villanova (16-9, 6-6 Big East) and its happy coach, however, remain in a precarious spot on the NCAA Tournament bubble.

Since the UConn setback, the Cats beat up four league foes, including a 17-point rout of surging Notre Dame.

Their lone loss since the UConn collapse came at St. John's 11 days ago.

With just four games remaining and a logjam in the center of the league standings, the Wildcats might need wins in at least three of its final four contests to contend for a share of the Big East title.

"Our fate is definitely in our hands," Lappas said. "We've been there each of the last two seasons and have managed wins in at least three of our final four contests to contend for a share of the title.

Shaw speaks at forum

Syracuse University Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw sat Wednesday in Maxwell Auditorium trying to alleviate students of their campus concerns.

About 70 faculty and administrative members, Student Government Association representatives and students inquired of university actions regarding campus improvements, smoking in residence halls, fire prevention and the honors program.

The university plans to spend about $150 million in the next decade to upgrade computers and renovate facilities, Shaw said.

With the help of a consultant, the home colleges collaboratively devised a plan for campus renovations, he said.

"It's part of the price of being a student-centered research university," Shaw said. "We need state of the art facilities."

The School of Management is currently conducting an additional fund-raising drive that will determine the probability for school expansion, he added.

This summer, the university will begin a three to four-year project installing fire sprinklers in residence halls. Installation of the system, smoking in residence halls, fire prevention and the honors program.

Flemma to submit appeal information

BY TIFFANY LANKES
Asst. News Editor

After learning last week that his appeal needed additional information for review by Syracuse University, former music industry professor Jay Flemma said Wednesday that he will submit the required documents.

Flemma, a 1993 graduate of the SU College of Law and an associate lawyer with Smith, Sovik, Kendrick and Sugnet, P.C. in Syracuse, appealed Feb. 9 to the Department of Human Resources in response to a sexual harassment complaint filed by a former student. The student, an SU senior, filed the complaint with the Syracuse Police Department Feb. 6.

The senior also filed harassment complaints with the SU Department of Human Resources, who investigated the case and dismissed Flemma Jan. 13 on the grounds of failing to follow proper administrative procedures.

"As of now, he has been informed that his services are not required next fall," said Kevin Morrow, an SU spokesman.

University officials reported last week that Flemma's appeal was incomplete because of a lack of information on his failure to follow administrative procedures. Flemma's appeal focused solely on the sexual harassment charges, which were not the basis for his dismissal, Morrow said.

"As of right now Flemma has only filed one appeal dealing with the sexual harassment complaints," he said. "At this point there isn't anything to consider."

Flemma said that he intends to submit the required materials and expects his appeal to be reviewed in full within the next few weeks.

"The appeal is valid. It's going to be heard," Flemma said. See FLEMMMA page 6

Traditional attorney-client confidentiality is dwindling, said Cheryl Mills, former deputy counsel to President Bill Clinton Wednesday afternoon.

Mills and current White House deputy counsel Bruce Lindsey spoke to a crowd of about 30 students and faculty in the Schine Underground regarding the attorney and client relationship and their experiences working in the Clinton administration.

The report said.

"I went to open my door to go to school Wednesday," Szabo said. "I looked up and noticed that my CD player was gone from the dashboard."

The thief attempted to pry open the driver's door, Szabo said. "They couldn't get in there, so he cracked open the sliding door window," he added.

An unidentified suspect stole a stereo system last week from a car belonging to senior Peter Szabo, according to a police report.

Szabo, a television, radio and film major, parked his car, a 1995 Chevrolet Lumina, in front of his apartment at about 10 p.m. Tuesday on the 900 block of Oak Street.

"The bass box was taken from the trunk," Szabo said. "They took everything for the stereo."

Prison riot kills inmate

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Guards and police fire on 125 inmates in an exercise yard at Pelican Bay State Prison, killing one prisoner and wounding 12 others before the racially charged incident ended with the facility in complete lockdown.

State prison officials said 55 others at Pelican Bay were stabbed or otherwise injured in the fighting that erupted about 9:30 a.m. in the "A" yard, where some of the state's toughest convicts are housed. The prison, which is on 270 acres of forest land 20 miles south of the Oregon state line, currently holds about 1,700 inmates.

Inmate lawyers said the prison was on lockout, meaning inmates were allowed to roam freely outside. "There has been a lot of bloodshed," one prisoner said by phone.

"They're just killing people left and right," another prisoner said.

Inmates in the "B" yard, which is on 270 acres of forest land 20 miles south of the Oregon state line, currently holds about 1,700 inmates.

California Corrections Director Cal Terkhnus described the brief, furious eruption that left at least one dead as "the result of a very bad incident in the past three decades." The dead inmate, identified only as a Latino male, was the first to be shot to death by guards in nearly two years.

No correctional officers were injured.

Ever since it opened in 1989, billed as a triumph of high-tech prison architecture, the facility has been at the center of controversy.

In 1995, a federal judge ordered a series of reforms after testimony in a class-action civil rights suit showed that brutality had spilled into the prison's "A" and "B" yards. At the time, there were two of the most violent inmates engaged in fistfights.

Steve Fans, one of the attorneys who brought the action, said Wednesday's fatal shooting was the first since the judge's landmark order. He said the prison remains under federal court scrutiny.

Service agents claim race bias

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A group of black Secret Service agents is asking the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to give them the right to file a class action lawsuit that alleges they were denied promotions and key assignments because of pervasive racial discrimination.

The agents and their lawyers intend to outline their allegations at a news conference here Thursday. If the EEOC gives the go-ahead, they could persuade their job-related grievances on behalf of all black agents in U.S. District Court.

The agents took their first procedural step late Wednesday afternoon by formally filing their complaint with the Treasury Department's equal employment opportunity program.

The black Secret Service agents contend they largely have been kept out of management jobs in the predominantly white agency. They have held a variety of positions in the Secret Service, including presidential details. They also have been denied promotions.

David T. Shaffer, who represented the agents, said they could go to court to obtain the promises that were made in their complaint.

Police examine student's death

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A Georgetown University student died Wednesday after suffering a severe head injury apparently during a late-night fight in a campus parking lot with other students at the school, officials said Wednesday.

David A. Shick, 20, a junior business major, died at Georgetown University Hospital late Tuesday. Doctors said he died due to brain damage, saying he had "suffered a significant brain injury." He was the first to be killed on campus in almost 10 years.

His friends said they were shocked by the sudden death of a popular student who was a member of a fraternity and a senior member of the basketball team.

Police are investigating further to determine whether the case should be treated as a homicide or an accident.

Bridge hopes to bring peace

KOSOVSKA MITROVICA, Yugoslavia — With this town's three bridges barricaded by NATO and Yugoslav forces, peacekeepers have a new plan to end the division between Serbs and ethnic Albanians. They're building another bridge.

A 200-yard west of the main bridge between Kosovska Mitrovica — the town of war and bloodshed — a bullet and car are resting in a bridge that is supposed to be a symbol of peace.

The bridge is supposed to allow ethnic Albanians to freely walk to and from three separatist enclaves in the north, but Serbian leaders immediately condemned it as a provocation that could spark more bloodshed.

The organization set up by President Milosevic was attempting to build an atomic bomb.

Chinese army holds warning

BEIJING — The People's Liberation Army Daily, the mouthpiece of China's military, calling the threat "necessary and timely," the army's response underscored that with China, the military will be the biggest winner from increased tension with Taiwan.

China's State Council issued a white paper on Taiwan saying China would attack the island if it declares independence, if it is occupied by a foreign power or if it indefinite postpones negotiations on reunification.

Taiwan is the main focus of the TAIWAN'S modern day efforts. The Nanjing Military Region and the Guangzhou Military Region have been preparing for the eventuality of a full-scale invasion.

The army announced that it would hold tactical exercises on the southern coast of China's seven military areas.

Colleges nationwide are leaving themselves open to hacker attacks in order to preserve student and faculty access to the Internet.

Computer networks on campuses lack "fortress-like" security making them vulnerable to hackers, said Dave Butler, director of Network and Systems Services for Computer and Media Services at Syracuse University. "I would use a university if I were a hacker," Butler said.

But this vulnerability to hacking is what allows users to learn freely, whereas tight security or visitation from outside the university, he added.

Networks with firewalls for security measures and computer security students are two factors that make university networks susceptible to attacks, said Fred Schneider, a computer science professor at Cornell University. With both ingredients of a successful cyber-attack present — an attacker and a weakly-defended target — one can expect to see attacks," he said.

Hackers attempted to break into SU networks on Feb. 14 and use them to attack outside Web sites. This denial of service attack kept the systems busy for about an hour.

Earlier this month, hackers were also responsible for paralyzing CNN.com, Amazon.com, Hotmail and other heavily used Web sites. These hackers reportedly used computers at three California universities, although no one on the campuses are suspected in the attacks.

Universities have multiple high-bandwidth connections to the Internet that increase the amount of data able to be sent through the Internet, said Bob Mahoney, a senior network engineer at Massachusetts Institute of Technology. As a result, hacking attacks launched from a university can overwhelm a system, Mahoney said.

It is difficult for the university to detect if a hacker is using its bandwidth, which is the quantity of data that can be transmitted in a fixed amount of time, he added.

The large amount of bandwidth available makes it hard to distinguish which information is unauthorized, Mahoney said.

One protective measure for university computer systems is to install firewalls — a security measure that can cost up to $25,000. A firewall acts like a gatekeeper, scanning users to see if they are authorized to enter a site.

But firewalls can also prevent people from communicating with each other, Mahoney said. Consequently, most universities do not use firewalls, he said.

Student records on SU's administrative systems are protected by firewalls. Most campus computers, however, are not as secure, said Peter Plumley, director of Computer and Information Technologies at SU.

"We really don't have any firewalls," he said. "We're wide open."

To address security holes, service patches are loaded onto programs as soon as they become available from the manufacturer, Plumley said. Service patches fix problems undetected before the program was distributed.

It is difficult, however, to stay up to date with service patches because systems are constantly evolving, he added.

SU also uses equipment to monitor Internet traffic and software that scans for vulnerability, Peter Morrissey, senior network engineer for CMS said. These programs have been in place for the past two years.

While the university does try to address security issues in its systems, "an impenetrable wall is not the solution," Butler said. "We're definitely very vigilant," Butler said, "so I don't want to compromise our mission which is to share information."

PROPER ETIQUETTE

Students with technological knowledge can take advantage of weaknesses in computer programs, which can create opportunities for launching denial of service attacks.

"Universities have concentrations of people who are technically minded, at an age that it is illegal to use another person's computer password," said Plumley.

WE REALLY DON'T HAVE ANY FIREWALLS.

"WE'RE WIDE OPEN."

Peter Plumley, director of Computer and Information Technologies

Hacking History

Universities with huge mainframe computers become the first staging grounds for hackers. Hacker is at first a positve term that defined a person with a mastery of computers who can push programs beyond what they were designed to do.

In one of the first arrests of hackers, the FBI busts six teenagers from Milwaukee.

Working from a computer in the basement of a suburban Chicago home, a 17-year-old high school dropout becomes one of the first people prosecuted under the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act of 1986. This sends it illegal to use another person's computer password.

A promotional contest at three Los Angeles radio stations is manipulated by a hacker. He allegedly sold two Porsches, $50,000 and at least two trips to Hawaii.

Nation debates Internet crime

Hackers began reaping Internet net more than a decade ago. But until Feb. 14, Syracuse University has only dealt with minor episodes.

"We imagine we haven't seen the end of this," said Peter Plumley, director of Computer and Information Technologies, of this month's Denial of Service attack.

Although SU staff are not suspected in the incident, some in the past have been found responsible for hacking.

where lapes of judgement are not unusual, and are trying to prove themselves," Schneider said.

The potential for these attacks is enormous, said John Sennett, senior programmer at the University of California at Los Angeles and a key participant in the Stanford University computer network project.

"It is easy to determine who has access to a telephone account," Sennett said. "But in the digital age, it is much more difficult to trace crimes when that person goes by an online alias and the sabotage is done in strings of computer code, he said.

If someone were to send out a death threat, it would be extremely difficult to track — especially if that person was skilled at covering their tracks, said Robert Plummer, senior programmer at the University of Southern California Media Services.

"But this technique did not hold up as the system got bigger," he added.

The Feb. 14 attack affected one of 10 campus research computer labs, which use the operating system LINUX, said Plummer.

"LINUX is a popular choice for researchers because it can be downloaded off the Internet at no charge and is customizable," said Plummer. Many of the Internet hackers use it at SUN to run on a more stable operating system, SUN Solaris, he added.

The research labs are more at risk for hacking because some do not hire systems administrators to keep their systems secure, said Sennett, head of the campus' graduate students who work only for a short duration, said Plummer.

"It's not like you can hire skilled personnel to work in the central administration to do the job," he said. "That's why we've made a lot of cases in the past few decades," Sennett concluded.

Now that the Internet has become more influential, it is difficult to keep in touch with cyber suspects, he said.

But it is easy to determine who has access to a telephone account, said Sennett. "But in the digital age, it is much more difficult to trace crimes when that person goes by an online alias and the sabotage is done in strings of computer code, he said.

If someone were to send out a death threat, it would be extremely difficult to track — especially if that person was skilled at covering their tracks, said Robert Plummer, senior programmer at the University of Southern California Media Services.

"But this technique did not hold up as the system got bigger," he added. "It's much more cumbersome than detecting the origins of a telephone call.

Internet viruses used computer networks this month at the University of California at Los Angeles and Santa Barbara campuses to launch a Denial of Service attack to popular Web sites like eBay.com and Yahoo!.

A Denial of Service attack is when a site is flooded with so much information that Web surfers are blocked from accessing it.

This blockage can make Internet sites lose money, such as retailers who rely on online sales. The mastermind behind the attacks was being hunted.

Sennett said the FBI's success in tracking online saboteurs depends on cooperation between different computer systems, and the Internet is not exclusively a U.S. entity.

"That cooperation isn't always there," he added.

But the U.S. government has been debating Internet regulations to avoid fraud, electronic vandalism and even terrorism, Sennett said. Some people are afraid that the government may become overbearing, he added. "People are concerned about the Internet being different. You can't allow the government to stifle innovation," Sennett said. But this is "because hackers make a practice of finding holes in a security net that they are doing these sites a service by pointing out these weaknesses,

A major cause of this fear, unlike some of the theories, is that the FBI did not experience regulations in its formative years, he said.

"Hacking is a hard skill and most people would say — especially the Web users — that they would do it for fun and a lot of kinds of regulations," he said.

"Hacking is a hard skill," said Sennett. "People are good at coming to vandalize, but do not want to take the risk of getting caught in the real world," Sennett said.

Butler said the government is "thinking that if you throw a brick through a window or trash an office you couldn't be inclined to scramble some database," he said. "You couldn't imagine hacking into something from your family room. There are more people than ever who will be willing to do that.

"The hacking community

The hacking community

sometimes does not appreciate the actual cost of interfering with network operations," Butler said. "Some of these attacks involve hundreds of online security breaches, agents sacrificed to protect virtual deadbolt to protect their information, he said.

"Butler said that the government is not "the only one that the government will try harder to prosecute because hackers make a practice of finding holes in a security net that they are doing these sites a service by pointing out these weaknesses," he said.

"They're doing a disservice by bringing down the computer system," he said. "But they're also pointing out a problem that needs to be worked out.

Sennett, however, said hacking is a serious crime and one that is difficult to prosecute.

"Electronic trespassing is only one of a few steps that create electronic burglary and vandalism," Sennett said. "And in that in turn is only a few steps away from electronic terrorism," he added.

"The Internet is best examined when related to the physical world," he said. "If you could sneak into a vault in a bank in the middle of the night, you'd just go out and get pass security and look around, did you commit a crime?" he added.

"You went somewhere where you didn't have the authority to be.

Butler said the government will try harder to prosecute hackers to maintain consumer confidence in the Internet.

Others were wary of increased government intervention.

"It's a waste of time — what's the government going to do?" Miller asked. "It's just as soon they butt out.

This is why he was concerned that some government hackers would take advantage of the situation by arguing for stronger controls on encryption for translating data, as well as enhanced security codes — and enhanced police powers.

"As the old saying goes, 'A policeman's job is only easy in a police force,'" he said.

Providers and users, not the government, should work to establish guidelines on how such responsibility institutions should hold in regards to the security of their systems, said Sabot Brehm, a computer scientist at the University of California at Los Angeles. His research concerns the security of the Internet and the role of the government.

Butler suggested that any type of Service attack on another site is not to be held liable, Sucher said.

"I have no idea what you're talking about. We don't even have to have the authority to be there. We don't even have to be in the same town," Sucher said.

"Ignorance can still be used as a defense of the government," Speciale said. "And if the government is not held liable, it’s a great excuse.

"I have no idea what you're talking about. We don't even have to have the authority to be there. We don't even have to be in the same town," Sucher said.

"I have no idea what you're talking about. We don't even have to have the authority to be there. We don't even have to be in the same town," Sucher said. But the costliness of the security upgrades is not the hack-er's fault, Sucher said. "We're fighting a war, and the ignorance of Web administrators is to blame, he said.

"Hume said that it is "possible to go to 'information warfare' and paid to maintain site security, yet the sites are still broken into.

"There are sites that have not been broken, Hume said. "There's a reason for that, they have people who are on top of their game."

Butler said the government will try harder to prosecute hackers to maintain consumer confidence in the Internet.

"It's a waste of time — what's the government going to do?" Miller asked. "It's just as soon they butt out.

This is why he was concerned that some government hackers would take advantage of the situation by arguing for stronger controls on encryption for translating data, as well as enhanced security codes — and enhanced police powers.

"As the old saying goes, 'A policeman's job is only easy in a police force,'" he said.

Providers and users, not the government, should work to establish guidelines on how such responsibility institutions should hold in regards to the security of their systems, said Sabot Brehm, a computer scientist at the University of California at Los Angeles. His research concerns the security of the Internet and the role of the government.

Butler suggested that any type of Service attack on another site is not to be held liable, Sucher said.

"I have no idea what you're talking about. We don't even have to have the authority to be there. We don't even have to be in the same town," Sucher said.

"Ignorance can still be used as a defense of the government," Speciale said. "And if the government is not held liable, it’s a great excuse.

Judge blinded to cop’s brutal crime

Parents and teachers tell children that police officers are their friends. In Syracuse, though, kids have to worry that these friends might hit them.

On Friday Judge Langston McKinney dropped charges on Tuesday against Syracuse police officer James Mullen, who allegedly assaulted a 12-year-old girl with his night stick during a domestic dispute last December.

Mullen’s punishment, a four-month, unpaid suspension from the force and a desk jockey spot when he returns to the force, sends a subtle but clear message: He is too dangerous to be pounding the pavement as a street cop. The department fears what he might do next.

The judge’s soft stance is a crime in itself. Society employs cops to protect endangered children from abusers, not beat them further.

Mullen’s actions strip him of the right to wear a badge.

Mullen is white. The girl he allegedly assaulted is black. But a child is a child. It shouldn’t take accusations of race-based police brutality and NAACP crusaders for the public to cry foul on this. Calling Mullen a racist war criminal for his indecency as a human being is blasphemy.

Police officers struggle daily to meet the demands of a high-pressure job filled with challenging situations that test their personal limits. It’s not easy.

But this doesn’t give cops a license to snap, especially at the expense of an unarmed child, and walk away with just a slap on the wrist.

If Syracuse is serious about keeping its streets filled with dedicated, top-notch cops, they’ll have to keep a closer eye on targeting similar issues before they explode.

Implementing better stress management seminars and counseling programs would help law enforcement agents cope with their emotions and the rigors of their jobs.

A uniform and a shiny badge should be synonymous with benevolence. But Syracuse’s actions have tarnished the badge.

Media undermines plight of women in workplace

Two weeks ago, a headline in The Wall Street Journal read, “In Today’s Workplace, Women Feel Freer To Be, Well, Women.”

Devoid of any real social science, scant on legitimate studies, and consisting mostly of anecdotal interviews, the article attempted to purport that women increasingly use sex to further their careers.

The Journal failed miserably in trying to make the article seem completely innocent, painting a picture of women using natural “advantages” in the workplace. The whole piece sets off more bells with me than Jerry Falwell suddenly liking gay people.

First reporter Ellen Pollock fails to point out that no matter what ends supposed these “advantages” serve, women still have to make a choice of two quarters to a man’s dollar and they are only three female CEOs of Fortune 500 companies.

With sub-headlines like, “Floppy Bow Ties Give Way More-Alluring Attire” and “Sex Banter Has Its Place,” the Journal is obviously some kind of weenie. Ally McBeal, the natural one, fails to point out that no matter how attractive one is, the mainstream media seems to think that sex is the only way to get ahead.

Citing an ambiguously accredited writer named Warren Farrell, The Journal digs its own hole. Farrell mouns how in the modern workplace “one mistake” with sexual harassment “can be the end of a man’s career.” He explains that for a man, working around women is “like being alcoholic and seeing drinks all around him.”

Oh, the peer-potential logic. Their evidence is sketchy and their attitudes are outdated. Sex should not be an issue in the workplace. Restricting the sexual behavior of some businessmen at the office is not a violation of anyone’s “rights.” Rape is a crime, not sex.

Then, in a clever slight of hand pulled by the Wall Street Journal, NBC and other major media outlets in covering “the battle of the sexes” in bad journalism posed on Neanderthal logic. Their evidence is sketchy and their attitudes are outdated. Sex should not be an issue in the workplace. Restricting the sexual behavior of some businessmen at the office is not a violation of anyone’s “rights.” Rape is a crime, not sex.

But this doesn’t give cops a license to snap, especially at the expense of an unarmed child, and walk away with just a slap on the wrist.

UU executed Panther speech responsibly

To the editor:

Jumping to conclusions and propagating assumptions are often the source of unnecessary and un-founded animosity. In an effort to reduce any such suspicion and confusion, I would like to address and correct several careless statements regarding Elaine Brown’s lecture.

Any events held in Grant Auditorium on a weekend require a Syracuse employee to unlock the building.

This employee stood in the rear of the auditorium during the 90-minute lecture, waiting to lock the building again upon its completion. The final accounts in Recent SU publications have referred to this gentleman as “security” without any basis in fact. The blatant dis-interest in truth is irresponsible enough, but further chauvinizing SU as “reckless” for hiring such a “guard” is completely unfounded.

Secondly, Event Productions is not involved with venues prepared, equipped with sound systems. The responsibility for the proper functioning of the equipment lies with Classroom Presentations, who gave instructions for the use of the system, but did not send a technician to assist. The amount of disturbance caused by a short period of feedback during the lecture was minimal, and Ms. Brown’s speech ran uninterrupted.

The event was advertised by an advertisement in The D.O. D.O. posters in the atrium of the Schine Student Center and flyers distributed to all residence halls, Race Dialogue Circles and African-American studies professors. The advertising drew about 30 people.

I hope the facts are clear, and I hope any ill will felt toward the UU Speakers Board by Aniran and others can be alleviated. UU’s goal in bringing an interesting, intelligent, historical icon to campus was to raise the consciousness of those who cared to listen. From the comments of many who attended, that goal was achieved.

Sound designer Burtt to speak at technology banquet

BY JOHN ARWEILER

The Daily Orange  February 24, 2000

The voice of R2D2 from "Star Wars" is visiting Syracuse today to share stories from behind the scenes of Hollywood blockbusters.

Sound designer Benjamin Burtt, a former Syracuse University chemistry professor, will speak as part of the Technology Club of Syracuse. Burtt will be at the school's Holiday Inn, 441 Electronics Parkway, for the laser guns, lightsabers and space cruisers in the "Star Wars" series, and sounds used in the Indiana Jones trilogy.

"We are very excited to have such a film great give us insight into special effects," said Dr. John Oldfield, a member of the Technology Club Board of Directors.

The banquet begins at 6:30 p.m. with Burtt's speech scheduled at 6:15 p.m., said Al Brandenburg, master of ceremonies for the event. Exhibits will be on display during the event and awards and scholarships will be given to people whose work helps celebrate technology, he added.

"Ben is a little different from other sound editors," said father George Lucas on Star Wars years later, Burtt found this sound again and helped make it common for laser guns in movies, his father said.

"I think it would be interesting to go and see how he used the technology of the time of Star Wars, as compared with the Phantom Menace," said Ken Good, a junior induc eative education major, referring to Lucas' most recent film.

Burtt's father said he hopes the speech will give students the opportunity to ask questions and get a better sense of the work that goes into movie soundtracks.

"I grew up watching Star Wars, Indiana Jones and all these movies," said Mike Bosco, a sophomore advertising major. "It would be great to see somebody who was behind the scenes working on those projects."

Tickets cost $15 for students. The S.I. Newhouse School of Communications and the L.O. Smith College of Engineering are providing bus service to the event for those students interested in attending.

from, bend attorney-client confiden tiality," she said. "In my expe rience in Washington, it seems the desire for the confidentiality prob lem, Mills said. One of the largest problems is the desire for self-pro tection, she explained.

This desire leads attorneys to break confidentiality just to show off their knowledge, Mills said.

"If you aren't speaking, you don't know and hence, you aren't a player and this is a terrible, terrible place to be in Washington," she added. "You can only demonstrate what you know by telling what you know.

Both Mills and Lindsey opted to speak with the media as a general practice during their tenure in the Clinton administra tion, Lindsey said.

This decision did not hurt Lindsey's position as a "player," he said. Instead, his refusal to talk to the media elevated his "playerness" because the media always assumed he was involved, he added.

An attorney's reputation, par particularly among other lawyers, is also a reason for the betrayal of trust, Mills said. Lawyers often judge the performance of their col leagues in high profile cases in of fices and in the media, she added.

"In Washington, there is a con stant omnipresence of an imme diate watch by the media, by jour nalists, by everyone," Mills said.

A lawyer may also feel com pelled to dispense information that breaks attorney and client trust if it is in the client's best interest, Mills said.

This practice leads to a better reflection of the client in the history books and in the media, she added.

"With respect to the media, if you find yourself talking about your client, you are probably in the wrong place," Mills added.

Mills used examples from the Clinton administration presented in journalist Bob Woodward's"Shadow: Five Presidents and the Looming Shadow of Watergate 1974-1999'in order to support her claims. The books focused on information given to attorneys in confidence and then betrayed by an unnamed source, she said.

Both attorneys and the gen eral public should not take the current conditions in Washington,
D.C., for granted, Lindsey said.
There is an "investigative mentali ty" that is at its peak, he said.

The controversies surrounding the Clinton administration helped to cause that mentality, he added.

"Impeachment took it to its ul timate level," Lindsey said.

The event allowed audience members to see the inner-workings of the Clinton's capital, said Lori Campbell, a freshman magazine major.

"I thought it was interesting and gave me insight into what is goings on politically in Washing ton," she said.

Despite the recent de cay in the attorney and client rela tionship, Mills said lawyers can still help improve society. Her seven year career as deputy counsel to Clinton helped convince her of that fact.

"They reminded me everyday why we are here and that we have a chance to make a difference," Mills said.
Residents dispute sewage treatment plant

BY MAGIN MCKENNA
Asst. Lifestyle Editor

Bearing signs and flyers, more than 50 city residents asked the Syracuse Common Council Wednesday night to vote against the construction of a $75 million sewage treatment plant in the area.

"I don't like the idea that every time they have something dirty they put it on the South side," resident Joanne DelVecchio said. "There is a lot of poor people living there who don't have the resources to fix this. They don't put these kinds of things on the North side, do they?"

The Council does not have the authority to vote on the sewage treatment plant's construction and location and can only decide on the matter of the pipeline, O'Connell said. If the Council does not approve the pipeline's installation, however, it will delay the plant's construction.

The Council will most likely vote on the issue in three weeks, she said.

But the county expects the Council to approve the pipeline installation for construction in May, Cunningham said.

"It is important to give the community a chance to ask questions," O'Connell said. "The Common Council has no legal authority other than the easement of the pipeline. We have nothing to say about the sewage treatment plant."

Questioning the Council

Richard Puchalski, executive director of Syracuse United Neighborhoods, asked the Council to table the vote on the installation until alternative locations for the sewage plant can be investigated. A report on alternate sites will be released by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in April.

He then presented the Council with a "pip" - a sculpture of 11 screws with the words "Don't Screw Our Neighborhood. Vote 'No' On The Raw Sewage Treatment Plant" written on its base.

"SUN is steadfastly opposed to this," Puchalski said. "Why shove this plant down our throats before exploring the alternatives?"

Puchalski also displayed a sign that read "Throw Nick Pirro Off The 14th Floor."

Jim Resti, an attorney representing Citizens for Fair Treatment, urged the Council to vote in the best interests of its constituents.

"There is a question here of political powerlessness," Resti said. "There is no one in the elected government who wants to stand up and say ‘No.’ But the grant of an easement has enormous power. Don't give in to political pressure."

Cunningham acknowledged that the city is still working out the final details for the proposal and will only be ready to begin the first phase, the installation of the pipeline, in late May.

"In the end we don't have all the details and that doesn't sound plausible," Cunningham said. "My grandchildren and my children are going to have to deal with this. You all are supposed to be working for the people and the people are telling you they don't want you to bring this mess in their backyards."

If the plant is constructed in the area near Midland Avenue, residents asked Cunningham if the city would buy their homes so they could move to other neighborhoods.

Cunningham conceded that there is no other logical place for the plant to be constructed other than the Midland Avenue location because that is where the sewage naturally flows.

"It is a viable possibility that this is racist," Withersell said. "The effect of this is overwhelmingly against one group of people. This would be satisfied until this issue is brought up before a Civil Liberties Union."

The Council docs not have the authority to vote on the plant's construction in late May, Cunningham said.

"When I got home, all of the doors were locked," said Rebekah Kuhn, a fellow resident of the apartment that was broken into.

"There was only a 10 minute period that no one was around, which is really weird," she said.

No other items were missing, the report said.

"I don't notice that the computer was missing right away," said Price, an architecture major and comic artist for The Daily Orange. "There was no evidence of the door being tampered with."

Price said she believes the computer was stolen while she was out and her roommate was in the shower, she said.

"I believe the door was locked," she said.

An unidentified person entered a Watson Hall room Sunday afternoon and stole sophomore Jacoby Price's iMac computer, according to a police report.

The thief stole the computer, valuing $1,400, off a desk that was in view from the door, the report said.

"I don't notice that the computer was missing right away," said Price, an architecture major and comic artist for The Daily Orange. "There was no evidence of the door being tampered with."

Price said she believes the computer was stolen while she was out and her roommate was in the shower, she said.

"I believe the door was locked," she said.

Cunningham also denied the council's environmental claims, citing that the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency already approved the sewage treatment plant proposal. Residents, however, have filed many complaints against the plant's proposed location with the EPA, he added.

Because the majority of residents living near Midland Avenue are black, audience members asked the Council to relocate the plant elsewhere since the county is being racist in its proposal.

Cunningham said that no complaints have been filed to the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

A fellow resident of the apartment called for more than 20 people to attend the meeting, community members displayed signs criticizing Onondaga County Executive Nicholas Pirro. They read: "Don't Let Nick Pirro's 5 and Fewer Intimidate You. Do The Right Thing. Stop The Sewage Treatment Plant."

"I don't like the idea that..." Puchalski said.

Richard Puchalski, executive director of Syracuse United Neighborhoods, asked the Council to table the vote on the installation until alternative locations for the sewage plant can be investigated. A report on alternate sites will be released by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in April.

He then presented the Council with a "pip" - a sculpture of 11 screws with the words "Don't Screw Our Neighborhood. Vote 'No' On The Raw Sewage Treatment Plant" written on its base.

"SUN is steadfastly opposed to this," Puchalski said. "Why shove this plant down our throats before exploring the alternatives?"

Puchalski also displayed a sign that read "Throw Nick Pirro Off The 14th Floor."

Jim Resti, an attorney representing Citizens for Fair Treatment, urged the Council to vote in the best interests of its constituents.

"There is a question here of political powerlessness," Resti said. "There is no one in the elected government who wants to stand up and say ‘No.’ But the grant of an easement has enormous power. Don’t give in to political pressure."

Cunningham acknowledged that the city is still working out the final details for the proposal and will only be ready to begin the first phase, the installation of the pipeline, in late May.

"In the end we don't have all the details and that doesn't sound plausible," Cunningham said. "My grandchildren and my children are going to have to deal with this. You all are supposed to be working for the people and the people are telling you they don't want you to bring this mess in their backyards."

If the plant is constructed in the area near Midland Avenue, residents asked Cunningham if the city would buy their homes so they could move to other neighborhoods.

Cunningham conceded that there is no other logical place for the plant to be constructed other than the Midland Avenue location because that is where the sewage naturally flows.

"It is a viable possibility that this is racist," Withersell said. "The effect of this is overwhelmingly against one group of people. This would be satisfied until this issue is brought up before a Civil Liberties Union."

Police targeted areas including Clarendon, Ackerman and Livingston avenues, the reports said.

A Syracuse University student found Wednesday night on the campus of Summer Avenue was broken into and her Samsung television/VCR unit, valued $500, was stolen, according to a police report.

The thief stole the computer, valuing $1,400, off a desk that was in view from the door, the report said.

"I don't notice that the computer was missing right away," said Price, an architecture major and comic artist for The Daily Orange. "There was no evidence of the door being tampered with."

Researchers are now using a computer model to analyze the cost-effectiveness of annual eye exams for patients with Type II (adult-onset) diabetes, the most common form. Because diabetes is a major cause of blindness, an annual eye exam has been the standard recommendation for all diabetics. But a new computer analysis suggests that such a recommendation may be overzealous. The annual eye exam may not be worth the money or the trouble for patients with a relatively low risk of blindness from diabetes, researchers said, and tailoring recommendations to individual circumstances may be preferable.

Guess again
When it comes to estimating how long a terminally ill patient will survive, doctors often are dead wrong, a Chicago study shows. Usually the error is on the optimistic side. In a study of 468 patients referred to five Chicago hospices, doctors predicted that their dying patients would live, on average, more than five times longer than they actually did. The doctors' predictions were accurate in only one out of five cases, in the 80 percent of cases inaccurately predicted, researchers found that survival was overstated nearly four times as often as it was underestimated.

Culture shock
According to the American Medical Association, many foreign-born doctors experience a cultural jolt when they come to work in the United States. Foreign-trained doctors, foreign-born doctors and U.S. residents and citizens who receive medical training abroad make up nearly a quarter of the 700,000 licensed and practicing physicians in the United States. They form a vital cog in the nation's health care system, tending to the very poor and very sick in places other physicians often avoid. American-trained doctors typically seek work in private hospitals or the suburbs.

Lyme disease carries AIDS traits

Lyme disease and AIDS have more in common than you think. According to a report by the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, the neurological symptoms that result from chronic Lyme disease may be a result of the body's immune system turning against itself, like in the tragic case of HIV sufferers. "This finding is a major advance for Lyme disease researchers and their patients," said Anthony Fauci, director of the institute. "We now have a powerful new tool to investigate what role autoimmune mechanisms play in the development of the diseases' chronic symptoms."

The theoretical tool that Fauci discusses is the theory that the bacterium causing Lyme disease, Borrelia burgdorferi, buries itself within parts of T-cells, a vital immune response device. The bacterium-and-T-cell pair go on to attack the immune system in varied and radical ways.

In addition to this new study, the Food and Drug Administration on December 21, 1998 approved a vaccine for this potentially debilitating ailment. But the debate remains whether this so-called cure is worth it.

In spring of 1999, the University of California at Los Angeles School of Medicine found that test results for the vaccine did not necessarily indicate how well a person would respond to treatment. It is virtually possible for the subject to have an infection harbored in the skin, yet have neither a rash nor overt evidence of infection. This condition may result in "partial immunity" that could potentially mask infection.

Balding

hair thinning. Though he used to have long hair, he now keeps it short.

Their friend Eric Atanasio, also sharing their table at the Shine Student Center, does not have much to worry about, he said. Though his brother's hair is thinning, he is confident that he will keep his dense, dark hair. He is the only one out of the three who don't wear a hat.

Joseph B. Neiman, M.D. of the Neiman Center for Hair Transplantation in Williamsburg, treats men of all ages for hair loss and potentially traumatic conditions, he said.

"Most of the time, they are extremely upset or panicky," Neiman said of young clients.

"Some people will not take off a hat because they are so self-con-cious."

Signs of aging

The average human loses 50 to 100 hairs a day, but balding is time and noticeable, Neiman said. There are several types of hair loss, but the most common is male pattern balding, in which the front hairline recedes while the top becomes sparse.

A combination of three factors cause male pattern balding: genetics, hormones and aging. The younger the balding begins, the more drastic the thinning, Neiman said.

"If they start losing hair early on, chances are they will be very bald later on in life," he said.

Treating a peak-a-boo scalp can mean anything from hair weaves to surgery. If it's going to happen, there are only two medica-tional options for bringing it back or slowing the process.

There's Minoxidil, made facily by the over-the-counter table solution Rogaine, and fina-teride, better known as Propespa, a pill taken once a day. Both must be used consistently throughout the rest of a patient's life to be completely effective.

Though Rogaine only works for a small percentage of cases, Neiman said, Propespa proved 78 percent effective in clinical trials for either stabilizing hair loss or causing hair growth. The drug was first used to treat enlarged prostates, but scientists found that it helped bald men to grow hair, Neiman said. Now men can buy it for themselves.

"If you start losing hair earl}y, chances are you will be very bald later on in life," he said.

Judy Kenyon, owner of the hair transplant center at 2020
II, 405 E. Taft Road, North Syracuse, pairs medicinal help with cosmetic surgery. Surgery patients come from all over the world, she said.

"Many men that are just starting, and it may help cease the hair loss by increasing blood circulation," said Kenyon, who has been in the hair replacement business for 22 years.

"In cases where there is more than half of his hair, it's best to stay with a non-surgical remedy," Kenyon said. In dealing with hair loss, it is best to be realistic.

"This is not the end of hair loss, this is only the beginning," he said.

Those looking to treat their thinning hair or baldness should hunt for a qualified physician, not a hair stylist, Neiman said. He board certified and trained physicians, dermatologists or plastic surgeons can be deeply members of the International Society of Hair Restoration Surgery, he added.

"This is an ongoing process," Neiman said, referring to the treatment process. "There are necessary repeated visits, consultations and follow-ups that always fayures of treatments."

Through the process, a patient's progress can be emotional, he added.

"They're socially inhibited," said
Neiman about balding men.

He referred to a segment on the TV show "20/20" where two balding men were sent to a nightclub without hair pieces. With full heads of hair, they were confident and attracted a crowd. Without the wigs, they were wallflowers and virtually ignored by others.

Many men worry that they will be seen as being effeminate, Kenyon said.

"Some men are attractive without hair, but the majority of men are not," said Kenyon, who considers hair replacement and other cosmetic surgery options a "luxury," he said.

"It's a secret. It's like a quiet tragedy," Neiman said. "If you gain weight, you can diet. You can't control hair loss.

"I wouldn't even have my myself," McGuire said. "I'm much more careful where I am and if I'm at risk for getting it."

Risk factors for contracting the disease are fairly easy to avoid unless you're a lumberjack or full-time woods hermit. You must avoid moist, shaded environments, especially thenight-light species of ticks.

Lyme disease is a chronic; appears, it causes the symptoms to disappear, only to become active again months or years later.

A study conducted by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention concluded that 20 to 50 percent of people with Lyme disease are evading diagnosis.

The symptoms of Lyme disease include fatigue, headache, malaise, joint pain, skin rash and nervous system problems.

"The disease is characterized by a red, expanding "bull's-eye" rash that appears within one to two weeks of contact with an infected tick and can persist for years, McGuire said. The larvae feed on a deer tick and are not transmitted through human contact.

"The disease can develop over a period of several years.
After the initial infection, the person suffers from a flu-like illness and can experience muscular pain, joint pain and right night, whoever had the ball earned the assist. As a result, the Orangemen outassisted against the Wildcats (18-10, 6-7) sparkled Syracuse's first-half offense.

He stripped Villanova point guard Jermaine Medley of the ball and took contact going to the basket. After Hart untangled himself free, SU led 29-10 halfway through the first. Marveling at Hart's play at both ends of the floor, Villanova head coach Steve Lappas said SU's captain dominated the game.

"I see the confidence factor for him; it's just unbelievable," Lappas said. "He's in control out there, and he controlled the game. There's no doubt about it."

"I just let the game come to me," Hart said. "I don't think I got too overanxious. I just let the game come to me. My teammates hit the shots, and that was key in getting me all those assists," Hart said.

Syracuse sharpshooters Preston Shumpert and DeShawn Williams led the scoring with 15 points each.

SU's win against the Orangemen leading 13-6, Shumpert caught Villanova's zone in a lapse and fired up a three from the left corner. His bucket sparked a 19-4 Syracuse run, that suggested blowout. Williams put the stretch, his second basket of the game, after his move to the paint in the first half.

Syracuse finished 6-for-16 from behind the arc, but drained five of its 10 first-half attempts, which Boeheim was important.

"The bottom line, still, is when you make some threes, it's just all the difference in the world," Boeheim said. "When you make those shots, it's huge, no question."

The Orangemen also played strong in the paint. With Villanova doubling down on Thomas, it freed up Denmarko Brown and Ryan Blackwell. Brown, who finished with 12 points, looked for a baseline jumper and Kissles a glass during the first-half run. Blackwell, meanwhile, crashed the boards and recorded two blocks. He tallied 10 points and 14 assists.

It was Blackwell's second consecutive solid outing, as he scored 15 points and pulled down five boards in SU's 76-75 loss to St. John's this season.

"He's back to where he was," Boeheim said. "He missed some shots tonight that I think he'll make. But he's looking to shoot, and he's looking to make plays."

The Orangemen captured a tenacious man-to-man defense, mixed with a little bit of zone, to hold Villanova shooters to a just 34 percent from the field, compared to their 42 percent average.

SU also forced 22 Wildcat turnovers. While the Orangemen celebrated the victory, Villanova mourned the loss for several reasons. The defeat dropped the Wildcats into a seventh-place tie with several teams in the Big East. It also does not bode well for Villanova's hopes at earning one of the 64 spots in the NCAA Tournament. Syracuse, however, is on the upswing for tournament time. After losing three of its last five games, the squad turned in its best game in a while Wednesday night, Syracuse guard Tony Bland said.

"We haven't been playing well lately," Bland said. "We've seen a couple games slide away from us, but we're still one of the best teams in the country. We're still going to be in there and not let anyone count us out."

fense instead of its 2-3 zone pressure on the perimeter was tremendous.

Even more impressive, Syracuse (22-3, 11-2 Big East) limited Nova's anemic 3-point shooting percentage of about six percent (1-of-16).

I'm shocked that we got off 18," Villanova head coach Steve Lappas said. "They weren't very good on offense, that's for sure, because the pressure on the perimeter was tremendous. That's why they got their hands on so many balls and did many passes."

The main components of SU's stalwart defense of Villanova (16-10, 6-7) on the perimeter were the Orangemen guards Jason Hart, who had a terrible all-game with 14 assists and nine points, and Williams, who both had 15 steals and nine points.

Williams and Preston Shumpert — who both had 15 steals and nine points, notched three steals and parted each Wildcat handling the ball on the outside.

Asia did not fare any better, contributing to the Orangewomen’s sloppiness with four miscues apiece. The 16 turnovers, however, did not faze SU. The Orangewomen drained shots and got big baskets from Jaime James.

The sophomore guard shot 4-for-6 in the first half for nine points. James and Kecord each scored 19 points, 14 of which came in the second half on the defensive end.

Most of Syracuse’s thin reserves Missy Grosman and Naimah Smith, limited James to just two points in the second half.

But despite the advantage, the turnovers haunted the Orangewomen in the second frame. After a Record jumper gave SU a 59-56 lead, the squad hit an offensive wall with 13:31 remaining.

The Pirates (11-14, 5-10) capitalized on costly SU turnovers to go on a 20-6 run and pull to 45-43 with 3:45 remaining in the game.

Seton Hall took its first lead of the game on a 3-ball from the corner pocket by guard Cecilia Lindqvist.

The 3-pointer was one of only two shots Lindqvist made the entire game.

“She wanted the ball,” Seton Hall coach Phyllis Mangina said. “Plus she played really good defense. When someone wants the basketball like that, you get it to her.”

After the Lindqvist shot, Evans followed with a jumper to regain the lead for SU at 47-46 with 2:10 left.

After two free throws by Naimah Smith, Record drove the other end and launched an off-balanced three with 55 seconds left.

On the next SU possession — with the SHU lead stretched to 52-47 — James made her best Scott Norwood impression by bricking a long 3-pointer wide from two feet behind the arc.

SU would foul, and Seton Hall sealed the 55-49 win.

Increased energy in the second half on the defensive end gave the Pirates the victory, Mangina said.

SU also used its inside game more effectively. Power forward Arminda Moreno scored 19 points, 14 of which came in the second half. Seton Hall pulled down 21 second-half rebounds, with 16 on the defensive glass.

Mangina said the improved interior play was a result of the defensive presence of the Seton Hall guards in the second half.

Lindqvist and shooting guard Cheryl Lindsey combined for 20 points, 14 of which came in the second half.

Most of Syracuse’s thin reserves Missy Grosman and Naimah Smith, limited James to just two points in the second half.

“We started to post up our guards,” Mangina said. “We thought we could take them off the dribble. We went inside early in the first half but we weren’t hitting our shots. We started getting scared and rushing jumpers. We just told them to be more patient, to look inside and go to the rim, get fouled.”

Seton Hall’s win against the Orangewomen was their second defeat of SU in four days. The Hall beat Syracuse 67-50 in the Garden State on Sunday afternoon after the Pirates finished the game on an 8-2 run.

Sunday’s contest was a makeup for the original, postponed because of last month’s residence hall fire at Seton Hall. In the two games against the Pirates, SU’s Shannon Perry impressed Mangina.

The Hurricanes have been to the Final Four in each of the last four seasons. Miami's 11th and 12th seasons have been the best in school history. The Hurricanes have only two losses since November 29, Atlanta. They have won the last four games at the Georgia Dome, including a 78-64 win over Georgia Tech, and a 77-67 win over the Gators.

Two of those wins came at the expense of the defending national champion Hurricanes. Last year, Miami was the only team other than Syracuse to knock off Connecticut, doing so 73-71. This year, they became the first opponent ever to win back-to-back games at Camouflage Pavilion when they beat the Huskies 63-57 on Saturday.

The remaining schedule has some ups and downs for the Canes. Saturday, they host Notre Dame, who they trounced 63-49 in January. Then they travel to Pittsburgh, where they struggled to beat 64-60 earlier this year. Next, they face Duke at home against first place St. John's. Last season, they split a pair of games in the Big East.

Another factor favoring Miami this season is its consistency. They haven't lost consecutive games since early December. And with a defense that has held the last 16 opponents under 70 points, it doesn't look like they'll be dropping two more regular-season games for the rest of the year.

Before last night's out-of-conference victory over Minnesota at Continental Airlines Arena, the Seton Hall Pirates dropped two huge games during the stretch run for the Big East title. After winning five big games to pull within a game of Syracuse, the Pirates lost back-to-back home dates and sit two behind SU in the loss column.

Although the loss to UNC came on one of the Pirates' weaker days this year, they had no excuse for losing their game against Notre Dame. SHU defeated Syracuse three weeks ago because of their stellar shooting. But the Pirates live and die by Darius Lane and the outside shot.

Against the Irish, they shot a nearly 39 percent from the floor while surrendering 50 percent shooting. And the story was even worse from downtown, where they connected on only 6-of-26 attempts.

Although the loss to UNC came on one of the Pirates' weaker days this year, they had no excuse for losing their game against Notre Dame. SHU defeated Syracuse three weeks ago because of their stellar shooting. But the Pirates live and die by Darius Lane and the outside shot.

Against the Irish, they shot a nearly 39 percent from the floor while surrendering 50 percent shooting. And the story was even worse from downtown, where they connected on only 6-of-26 attempts.

Another factor favoring Miami this season is its consistency. They haven't lost consecutive games since early December. And with a defense that has held the last 16 opponents under 70 points, it doesn't look like they'll be dropping two more regular-season games for the rest of the year.

Before last night's out-of-conference victory over Minnesota at Continental Airlines Arena, the Seton Hall Pirates dropped two huge games during the stretch run for the Big East title. After winning five big games to pull within a game of Syracuse, the Pirates lost back-to-back home dates and sit two behind SU in the loss column.

Perimeter defense key to SU victory

Moments after Saturday’s loss to St. John’s, Syracuse head coach Jim Boeheim saw the seeds for his team’s next victory.

Addressing the Orangemen in the bowels of Madison Square Garden following their one-point defeat, the SU coach delivered a speech questioning his squad’s toughness, intensity and desire to win.

“He was just saying basically that we were just chumps,” SU guard DeShaun Williams said, “that people were just chumping us.”

“Right after the game he just let us have it. The freshman Orangeman said, “He was telling us that we weren’t playing hard, that if you’re going to play like that, you might as well quit now. That speech woke up a lot of people.”

In Wednesday night’s 91-63 win over Villanova, the Orange was able to respond to Boeheim’s alarm-clock talk was the Orangemen’s defense.

Syracuse — using primarily a man-to-man defense — outscored Villanova 26-13 in the second half.

Seton Hall rallies late to down Syracuse

When a team has 16 first-half turnovers and leads by 13 points, something isn’t right.

The turnover problem caught up to the Syracuse women’s basketball team on Wednesday afternoon, and the Seton Hall Pirates overcame a 13-point deficit in the second half to split the Orangewomen’s 55-49 on Senior Night at Manley Field House.

The assist-to-turnover-ratio proved to be the Orangewomen’s Achilles heel.

Syracuse (10-14, 3-11 Big East) turned the ball over 27 times, including 16 giveaways in the first half.

“When we turned it over we just got our scoring going, and we carried that into the second half,” SU guard Marianna Freeman said. “There were times when we didn’t make good decisions with the basketball.”

Jakkia Ervin had a team-high 11 turnovers, including 8 in the first stanza, but dished out six assists in the game to lead SU. Beth Record and Leigh See had three.

Foursome battles for conference supremacy

As we approach the final two weeks of the regular season, four teams are battling for the Big East Basketball title. What could look like a cake walk for Syracuse two weeks ago is now an all-out war.

Chuck Petrucione

The toughest game left for the Orangemen is their season finale in Storrs, Conn. Although Connecticut has been a major disappointment this season, they are still a Top 25 ball club. If the Orange can complete the season sweep there, and avoid an embarrassing loss to Georgetown, they will take their first regular-season championship in nearly 10 years.

Storm Brewing

A few weeks ago, St. John’s was a slumping team, owing to the loss of four of five, and it appeared their chances of winning a Big East title were all but dropped. Then SJU caught fire, and it hasn’t lost a game since.

Six straight conference wins, including the most recent over Syracuse and Connecticut, have vaulted the Red Storm to within a half-game of the Orangemen. Although the games were not a pleasant sight.

Three St. John’s starters scored 20 or more points, and its starting backcourt outscored that of the Huskies 42-2. The 79-64 final came on a day.

Keyes to campaign on campus

For months, most Republicans trying to decide where to throw their support for the party's presidential nomination have ignored Alan Keyes. Keyes, a U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Sociology and Economic Council, will speak in Syracuse University's Goldstein Auditorium at 8 p.m. Monday and will throw his support for the event are available beginning today from the Schine Box Office.

"I never really understood why Alan has been written off for the race," said Noah Goldman, coordinator of New York State's chapter of Students for Keyes and member of SU's College Republicans. "Many people don't know who Alan is and that's a shame in and of itself.

The Keyes campaign called Goldman Wednesday night to inform the sophomore of the campaign stop.

"Things have been pretty hectic," said Goldman, a philosophy and television, radio and film major. "Alan's a busy man.

Although the race still involves three candidates, the majority of the attention at this point targets only two men — Arizona Sen. John McCain and Texas Gov. George W. Bush. Neither of those candidates, however, are as talented and qualified as Keyes, Goldman said.

Charter schools are often misunderstood in their mission to publically educate "at risk" children, proponents of the schools argued Thursday.

"There is a real knowledge gap about what these schools are all about," said Bob Bellaflore, State University of New York Charter School Institute executive director. "It's a new idea in an area that everyone cares very deeply about.

Although private companies often manage them, charter schools are still public schools that have to meet the highest standards of the state, Bellaflore said to an audience of about 100 civic and community leaders during a Thursday Morning Roundtable discussion at Drumlins Country Club.

Made legal in New York state last year, charter schools receive state funds to offer an educational focus different from public schools. They sometimes operate on a longer school year or an extended day schedule.

A school's charter expires after five years. Bellaflore said. At that time, the school is re-evaluated for operation by the SUNY Board of Trustees, he said.

Greeks investigate Zeta Psi citations

BY EVANS BOSTON AND KAILYN ENZON Staff Writers

Police arrived at the Zeta Psi fraternity house early Sunday morning and gave seven Syracuse University students noise violation citations for having a loud party, according to a police report. There were about 500 people at the house, the report said.

At 2:30 a.m., the party at 727 Comstock Ave. was "uncontrollable" and "unmanagable," the report said.

City court summons are scheduled for today, said David Lindgren, Zeta Psi president and senior speech communications major.

The case is also being examined by a judicial committee comprised of the vice presidents of SU's Interfraternity Council and the Panhellenic Association, said Brad Yeung, IFC president and senior political science and public relations major.

Lisa Walsh, an Office of Greek Life graduate assistant, who was in charge of residence hall life, said the case is under investigation by a NJA.

"Nothing has really been done yet." said Yeung.

He declined to comment further.

The SU Office of Judicial Affairs will conduct its own investigation, Yeung added.

The SU Office of Judicial Affairs representatives could not be reached for comment.

Zeta Psi returned to campus this fall after losing its campus charter in 1994 because of disciplinary problems. For the previous disciplinary problems, a four year expulsion was necessary so all members involved with the incident would graduate.
Texas executes old woman

HUNTSVILLE, Texas — A 62-year-old woman was executed by injection Thursday afternoon. Gov. George W. Bush rejected her claim that she killed her fifth husband in self-defense and deserved a reprieve.

Bush refused to employ his only option, granting Betty Lou Beets a 30-day delay, since the state parole board did not recommend that her sentence be commuted to life in prison. During his five and half years as governor, 120 convicted killers have been executed in Texas. He has signed every death warrant.

Beets and her lawyers insist that the former bartender-waitress, convicted of fatally shooting fifth husband Jimmy Don Beets nearly 17 years ago and burying his body under a flower bed, was the victim of years of domestic abuse and should be allowed to live.

According to the governor's office, Bush had received 2,105 phone calls and letters opposing Beets' execution by Thursday afternoon, and 57 calls and letters favoring it.

Leap Year Bug causes concern

WASHINGTON, D.C. — While most major systems transitioned smoothly into the New Year, officials are concerned that some computer software has been written in such a way that it will not recognize that 2000 is a Leap Year, meaning that on Feb. 29, next Tuesday, some programs may actually date something a day early or late, or some transactions may simply fail to process.

In a briefing this morning, John Koskinen, the head of the President's Council on Y2K Conversion, said that the government was not expecting any major problems but warned that computer software may come up with the wrong date, meaning interest payments on loans could be off by a day, bills could be mailed early, paychecks could be issued missing one day of work, or some transactions may simply fail to process.

In the briefing, Koskinen said that most federal and state agencies, as well as most major financial institutions, were well-prepared for Leap Year, having anticipated it in all of their updates to recognize the four digits in the year 2000.

Nigerian riots kill 200 residents

KADUNA, Nigeria — Residents started returning to the debris-strewn streets of this northern city today, as Christian and Muslim leaders met to work out a truce, an end to bloody clashes left at least 200 dead.

Schools and most stores remained closed, but hawkers were back in business and soldiers maintained a high presence.

With life starting to return to normal, state authorities eased the 12-hour curfew between 4 p.m. and 7 a.m. and set up a panel to investigate the reasons for the fighting.

Colombian army abuses rights

BOGOTA, Colombia — The Colombian army, on which the Clinton administration promised to supply with up to $1 billion in training, and other assistance over the next two years, maintains a high level of human rights violations. The Department of State is expected to monitor the military's human rights practices.

The report comes at a particularly sensitive time in the administration's effort to ensure in approval for a massive aid package in Colombia, which will help to fight the spread of cocaine and heroin en masse.

BY JOHN ARWEILER
Staff Writer

Affirmative action comes with great costs — stemming from the large amounts of money spent on its research and the social ramifications of its practice, said Jamie Taylor, a Syracuse University College of Law alumna.

And an effective policy has yet to be established, Taylor added.

Taylor, with about 40 students and faculty, debated the controversial policy Thursday afternoon during a forum presented by the SU College of Law Federalist Society.

Once we get an affirmative action law that works, the problem of racial discrimination in hiring practices will cease, said William Wiecek, an SU law professor.

Affirmative action is an effective step taken to benefit underrepresented people, Taylor said. The practice is generally aimed at helping women and minorities get into universities and workplaces.

"I don't agree with affirmative action because I'm black," said Luke Cooper, a second-year law student.

"I agree with it because it makes sense," he added.

Black students in the audience said they feared discrimination in the business world after graduation because 90 percent of upper-management employees at major corporations are white men.

"Everything I have achieved in my life, from the time I advanced to the third grade, has been because I was helped out by someone white, not because of what I've done," Wiecek said.

Affirmative action is any effective step taken to benefit underrepresented people, Taylor said. The practice is generally aimed at helping women and minorities get into universities and workplaces.

Wiecek, a proponent of affirmative action, said the "good old boy network" should not be done away with, but instead should be made open to minorities and women as well. Wiecek said:

"The networks don't promote unqualified people, just not the right people," he added.

Taylor disagreed.

"It's stronger to deal with individuals and individual accomplishments," said the event's moderator.

"I don't agree with affirmative action because I'm part of the good old boy network," said Joel Bennett, a sophomore business major.

"I wasn't really familiar with all the opinions on the issue."
Should ORL ban smoking outside residence halls?

Students talk about plans to prohibit smoking within 15 feet of dorms.

Residents must respect community

It has been nearly a year since the Office of Residence Life announced plans for all Syracuse University residence halls to be smoke-free beginning next semester, but discussion of this issue continues. The primary intent of the new policy is not to infringe upon rights but to protect the rights of others to live in and breathe clean air free from second-hand smoke. As a student actively involved in the residence halls, I have heard many of the objections students have addressed regarding this policy.

Many have objected to the policy in the name of student rights. Residents have claimed that this policy violates a student’s right to smoke in his/her own room. This premise represents a misunderstanding by students into the tenant/landlord relationship that a residence hall experience involves. Students are in effect renting the room they reside in for the academic year, like a tenant wishing to rent an apartment off campus. Each student resides under a set of conditions in the hall when they choose to reside there.

First-year students were made aware of the new smoking policy before they arrived last semester and were aware that this was one of the conditions they would be expected to abide by the beginning of next year. Some students object to the change in policy, for the previous policies allowed smoking as long as there was no smoke coming out from both rooms. But the unique ventilation system existing inside the halls creates an environment where one room’s air becomes contaminated by students into the tenancy of the building. So there’s movement all the parking garages, too, so there’s no movement.

Smoking ban robs students of personal freedom

Just say no. Better yet, how about a resounding, "Hell no!" followed by a stiff kick in the pants — just to add a little insult to injury. That’s how I — and I’m sure not a few other smokers — feel right about now. After Syracuse University managed to pass a rule prohibiting smoking in residence halls, effective fall of 2000, the Office of Residence Life has decided to make the message unnecessarily clear. The fine print states that smoking occurs within fifteen feet of the dorm door. When I think about this, I was so shocked that my cigarette fell straight out of my mouth. Well, damn.

Where did all of this come from? Recently there seems to be a witch hunt to banish all these radicale, smoke-eating vehicular deaths of the face of the earth. (Note to self: Get car emissions checked.) Just as far as I can tell, there’s still a plume of smoke flowing from M-Street on Saturday nights, and backpack-toting loco-motives still trudge across the Quad. Who is it complaining? If my memory serves me correctly, a great group of people made quite a scene when SU slid the dorm ban right under our smoke-filled noses.

But hey, smoking stinks, right? I mean, it’s totally understandable that people don’t like it — that it’s an inconvenience and it’s unhealthy. And in our own home? For shame! But how about this: Your car is making it dangerous for us to walk outside. I’ve heard enough guys make jokes about how everyone pees in the shower and then everyone pees in the shower. I’ve started eyeing the stalls and trying to guess which one is cleaner.

And judging from the music spewing from down the hall, the Rockstreet boys have opened a recording studio on my floor. And don’t even get me started on what I’ve found in the kitchen sink.

My point is, we all got our "thing" that annoys the hell out of somebody else, and more times than not it’s unhealthy. Why is it that smoking has been singled out? We all live together. This is our home, like it or not — as ridiculously high the rent may be, I don’t complain. About everyone’s little quirks, no matter what sort of health code violations they may create. This is the room they come back to every night for a long, long dog, and they should be able to kick back.

Smokers already lost that privilege. Now ORL wants us away from the building? Are we that unsightly and dangerous? Maybe we need "Maintain Safe Distance" tickets. Maybe smoking should be totally banned totally from campus period. After all, it’s our fault the university forces us to live in SU housing our first two years here. We live on private property where we can legally deny us use of a product legal under federal law. Seems kind of like a smoke screen to me.

Yeah, smoking stinks. But so does the kid down the hall — and ORL isn’t kicking him off campus.

Local business flunks asbestos test

Someone needs to remind Northern Environmental Services that cheaters never win.

The East Syracuse company pled guilty Wednesday to violation of federal asbestos removal laws. During the past three years, eleven public and private Upstate New York buildings that Northern Environmental serviced were found in violation of federal laws.

The prosecution predicts that the plea may begin a chain of similar suits statewide, exposing corrupt practices throughout the industry.

The Environmental Protection Agency’s lawsuit against Northern Environmental is no cause for public panic, but it should serve as a wake-up call for the company to tighten up their dangerous and lax practices.

Prolonged exposure to asbestos, a construction material used to make thermal insulation and roofing shingles, has been linked to lung cancer. Asbestos use was outlawed in the 1970s, but remnants still linger in buildings constructed during the first half of the century.

Asbestos particles only become dangerous when they’re airborne — often through removal processes or construction projects — so they don’t pose a health threat under most circumstances. But employees of companies like Northern Environmental may be exposed to the carcinogens on a daily basis.

Asbestos removal is the company’s forte, and by performing sloppy work, they risk not only public health, but their own credibility.

Looking out for the safety of their own workers should be a top priority for asbestos removal companies. Taking shortcuts during the removal process might help profits soar, but by performing sloppy work, they risk not leaving a bigger mess in its place.

Take out the trash the right way — don’t leave a bigger mess in its place.

Foreign roommates offers profound cultural insights

I am living with a tall, bearded Danish man. His name is Klaus and, at 25, he is the keenest cultural scientist I have met. He is honest and observant, and can drink an entire bottle of Jack Daniels in one sitting. I trust his judgment implicitly.

When I moved to Washington, D.C., a little more than a month ago, I planned on learning a lot about myself. As an arrogant American, however, I never counted on learning so much about my country.

Within hours of meeting my talented new roommate, he had taught me to open a beer bottle with a butcher knife. My education had begun.

Over the last month, this metal band guitarist turned Web site programmer has provided me with a perspective of the American society and given me a new, un Filtered view of this nation. Foreigner that he is, Klaus’ off-hand remarks about our culture carry more truth than the sage observations of artists from generations A through Z.

Such truisms can be hard to take, but I insist we examine them together.

Observation 1: American drinking laws are crazy. Notice of this, as Klaus said, “doesn’t take a foreigner to figure out.” Damn right. But just how ridiculous are these laws, Klaus? I mean, what are the drinking laws in Denmark? “Evian,” he pauses rolling his eyes, “there are none.” Oh.

Observation 2: Every game in America is based on a grand prize of a million dollars. The truth pangs of this, of course, is that Americans are greedy bastards. But the root of it all is that we keep upping the ante. And the greediest bastard wins.

“Case in point is the recent rash of money-grab, prime-time game shows, ‘Who Wants To Be a Millionaire,’ ‘Twenty-one,’ ‘Winning Lovers’ and, never to be out-done when it comes to shock television, Fox’s ‘Who Wants to Marry a Multi-millionaire?’” Klaus declared, “all follow the millionaire manor model equals audience. As with our drinking laws, Klaus assures me, the world is laughing at our foolishness. In our unfathomable wealth, we are pharaohs despairing for bigger pyramids.

Observation 3: Every American food product is either vitamin enriched or fat reduced. I have noticed this before, but it took a trip to Europe to see how far over the edge we’ve gone. In Ireland, they actually have food products with calories purposely added. Try to sell that in the United States. It’s funny, though — Americans are generally more obese than any other nation I have visited. Maybe it’s because we drive everywhere.

It is insane that Klaus and I could not find a carton of whole cream anywhere in the District. There was low-fat, half-fat, fat-free, two percent, one percent and so on. Some guy outside the Metro stop even offered me a “lucky” but I am sure what that means.

And why can’t I avoid calcium? I swear to you that even the most brand of flat-dairy — the main character of my D.C. menu — has 200 percent of my daily requirement. Same thing with vitamin C. A regular glass of orange juice is so over-produced that one serving puts you at risk for reverse-scary. Tap water has been vita-blanded to the way.

Observation 4: Every lunch in America comes with a pickle.

There are two possibilities: Americans are eating way too many pickles, or we’re throwing millions away each day. Personally, I believe there is a pickle conspiracy.

We all eat them for some reason, but why?

We think “salty, cucumber, brine bath” and then “yum?” From now on, I’m strictly a pig-foot man.

Observation 5: “Air rules.”

“I was the best show ever,” Klaus explained. “He was laid back and he didn’t give a shit.”

But the lesson here is not AIP’s demeanor. Klaus added, “It’s his dances move.

“After promising to show me the jig outside on 24th street — the one place he still can in this city — Klaus looked up at me from his whiskey glass with child-like wonder and asked, ‘Where did Ali go anyway?’ I didn’t have the heart to tell him.

EPA charges local asbestos removal officials

BY NICHOLAS STEFFENS
Staff Writer

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency announced Thursday one indictment and more than a dozen guilty pleas following the agency’s investigation into illegal removal of asbestos in Central and Upstate New York.

The announcement concluded a more than yearlong investigation into asbestos removal that began when a worker in the industry leaked information alleging falsification of records by asbestos companies, said Craig Benedict, lead prosecutor in the case.

Asbestos is a material that the construction industry used for years as fire-proofing and building insulation. Studies found the material to cause cancer during long-term exposure to asbestos dust.

The agency pursued the claims by launching a sting operation in Watertown, Benedict said.

“We very easily and quickly talked people into falsifying lab results,” he said. “We found that the problem is extremely widespread. It’s an extremely pervasive problem in Central and Upstate New York.”

At least until today it was,” Benedict said Thursday.

“The EPA said they are hoping the indictment and guilty pleas will scare businesses into discontinuing the illegal removal of asbestos, Benedict said.

Asbestos removal companies from Utica, Schenectady, Albany and East Syracuse filed guilty pleas, he added.

Northern Environmental Services Inc., 6838 Ellicott Drive, was one of the companies that pleaded guilty to charges of illegal asbestos removal. The EPA charged the company’s directors with telling their employees to “rip and run” — quickly removing and transporting asbestos without taking the necessary legal steps for environmental protection while working on several buildings in Central and Upstate New York, Benedict said.

“They do it as fast as they can. There are no safeguards,” he said. John Phelps, 247 Pangborn Road, Huntington, and Thomas Strong, 8944 Westmore Lane, Cicero, pleaded guilty to charges. Phelps pleaded guilty to violating a Clean Air Act and Strong pleaded guilty to assisting Phelps cover up the illegal activities during the EPA’s investigation.

Both men will be sentenced July 19 in Syracuse.

Former owner of A+ Environmental Services Inc., Joseph Thorn, 408 Washington Ave., Rensselaer, was indicted of violating the Clean Air Act and laundering money.

The prosecution is claiming that Thorn falsified asbestos test results at more than 130 locations across Central and Upstate New York, Benedict said. The indictment also claims Thorn submitted false documentation that stated his work met all legal standards. He collected $870,000 for jobs that he had not completed, according to the indictment.

If Thorn is found guilty, he could serve 65 years and pay $6.3 million in fines, Benedict said.

“As far as asbestos violations, this is as serious a set of charges as I’ve ever seen,” he said.

The indictment and the guilty pleas do not signal the end of the EPA’s Central and Upstate New York efforts, he added.

“This is an on-going investigation,” Benedict said. “I anticipate additional indictments.”

Law School Republicans return to political action

Staff Reports

After several years of dormancy, the College of Law Republicans are emerging on the Syracuse University campus — just in time for the U.S. presidential elections, members said.

Bill Petrick, chairman of the club and a first-year law student, said he first thought about bringing the organization back to campus last August.

"When I got here, I was really disappointed to discover that there wasn't a College of Law Republicans group," Petrick said. "I figured a law school of all places, would have people who were politically involved.

He then talked to friends and together they decided to start the group again, Petrick said. The total membership is about 35 people, he added.

About 20 of those members gathered for their first meeting at 3:30 p.m. Wednesday to appoint an executive board and discuss upcoming events, said Larry Basham, College of Law Republicans community relations officer and first-year law student.

The group hosted Scott Armstrong, campaign manager for Gonzaga County Executive Nicholas Piro, who spoke about the basics of running political campaigns, Basham added.

The College of Law Republicans previously became inactive mainly because of the heavy work load carried by law students, Basham said.

"I think people have been too busy with law studies to devote a lot of time to it," he said. "I don't know if it was a lack of interest or just didn't think being involved in the organization would benefit them."

The group is hopeful that law students of all party affiliations will involve themselves in the upcoming campaigns and politics in general, Petrick said.

"With the 2000 election here, it's a great opportunity to get people involved with local campaigns," he said.

Included in the list of events planned for the semester are prayer registration drives and speaker presentations. The speakers have yet to be determined, but the group has several options available, Basham said.

The next few meetings will be informal because law school mid-terms are approaching, Petrick said. The next formal meeting will be after Spring Break, he added.

Keyes' obvious intelligence, eloquence and ability to clearly define his stance on campaign issues make him the most attractive candidate, he added.

"He has very innovative views on issues," Goldman said. "The other candidates are squabbling over who's tax plan is better and trying to get people to run for their calculators." Keyes' appearance on campus will expose students to a viable alternative to Bush and McCain, Goldman said. The two leading candidates are becoming increasingly difficult to distinguish, he added.

"People on campus, all they see are the front runners," Goldman said. "Candidates have become so mainstream, they become ambiguous on issues. Love him or hate him, you'll know where Alan stands."

Keyes has not yet dropped out of the race even after losing both of the most recent Republican primaries. He did not take any national convention delegates in Tuesday's Arizona and Michigan primaries, winning only 5 percent of the Michigan vote and 5 percent in Arizona.

"His campaign at this point is just about getting his message out to Republican voters, as well as all voters," said Joe Burns, College Republicans chairman. "He's still in this race because he doesn't believe the other two candidates in the race adequately represent his ideas."

Although the Student Activations officer, the College of Law Republicans as the current sponsor for the visit, the group cannot advocate any candidate until voters decide the GOP nomination, said Burns, a junior political science and history major.

In addition to U.N. past, Keyes' governmental experience includes serving as an aide to former President Ronald Reagan.

Keyes stands for the traditional conservative values that the other candidates abandon in their quest to move toward the center of the political spectrum, according to a Keyes campaign report. "I adamantly oppose abolishing the current income tax system in favor of a tax code based on tariffs and duties on the products we buy, the report stated.

He also favors school prayer, a total ban on abortions except in cases where the mother's life is in danger, a strong national defense program and American sovereignty and economic issues rather than involvement in bodies such as the World Trade Organization, according to the report.

Regardless of Keyes' political beliefs, the speech will be interesting to hear, Burns said.

"He's one of the best orators in America," he said. "He's also one of the most intelligent men I've seen."
